Cromwell, who was at head-quarters, as if to take leave of his friend Fairfax and the army, but who probably was not altogether unprepared, marched speedily from Windsor, and with great facility vanquished a part of the king's force at Islip-bridge in Oxfordshire, where he completely routed the queen's regiment, as it was called, and took their standard, which her majesty herself had presented. Three other regiments at the same time fled before Cromwell and his Ironsides, leaving many of their officers behind them. A portion of the fugitives took shelter in Bletchington House. Cromwell besieged them, and forced them to surrender. Another portion fled to Bampton Bush: Cromwell presently encompassed them also, defeated them, and took their leaders, Vaughan and Littleton prisoners. Charles was so enraged against Colonel Windebank, who surrendered Bletchington House, that in spite of prayers and remonstrances, he had him shot for cowardice. Fairfax then designed to besiege the king in Oxford; but Charles, resolving not to be cooped up in a town, marched out with ten thousand men. "Now," says Sir Philip Warwick, "though the king had understood, both by his own intelligence and from Goring, that this new Independent army, elated with their own prosperity, and their masters being grown weary of the war through the factions among themselves, were resolved to end all by some sharp battle with the king; yet the king, once out of Oxford, declined the counsel which Goring gave him, of calling him with his western army from before Taunton, and to have joined his horse at least to himself. If the state of affairs had been duly and fully weighed, a necessity lay on his majesty to have kept all his forces close together, or to have been in such a nearness for conjunction as might have made one day the decider of the whole controversy; but we still wanted some daring resolution, and so chose rather to die of a hectic fever than of an acute one. For Goring had at least two thousand five hundred good horse, beside a body of dragoons; and a victory over these new men most probably (the old being so highly discontented) would have brought an honorable peace, if not means for a prosperous war. But I fear our chief commanders so little loved one another, that they were not fitted for conjunction." But on moving from Oxford, Charles was joined by Prince Rupert, as also by the forces under Prince Maurice. At first Fairfax followed him with all the force he could get together; but soon, retracing his steps, he invested the city of Oxford, while Cromwell, leaving the army, rode off to the eastern counties, whither it was at first suspected Charles was directing his march. The king, however, moved to the northwest, to relieve Chester, which was then besieged by Sir William Brereton. The parliamentarians raised the siege at his approach, and retreated into Lancashire. It was apprehended that Charles intended to join his army with the triumphant forces of Montrose in Scotland; and the Scottish army in England, which was then advancing to the southeast, hastily fell back upon Westmoreland and Cumberland to guard the approaches to Carlisle and the western borders. But Charles, after his success at Chester, turned round to the southeast, marched through Staffordshire and Leicestershire, and carried the important city of Leicester by assault. This movement revived all the apprehensions about the associated counties in the east; and Fairfax, abandoning the siege of Oxford, marched into Northamptonshire, where he arrived on the 7th of June. His friend Cromwell was then in the Isle of Ely, most actively organizing the militia there, and preparing the means of a defensive war in case the royalists should penetrate into those eastern counties which (chiefly through the zeal and providence of Cromwell) had hitherto been spared the horrors of war. At this critical moment, Fairfax and a general council of war which he had called, requested the House of Commons to dispense again in Cromwell's case with the self-denying ordinance, and appoint him lieutenant-general, that second post in the army, which in all probability had purposely been left vacant from the beginning for Master Oliver. The House, which must have known by this time that no man so entirely possessed the confidence of the cavalry and of a great part of the army, sent him down a commission as lieutenant-general for three months; and Cromwell joined Fairfax just in time to be present at that great battle which was to decide the important question "what the liberties and laws of England, and what the king's power and prerogative, should hereafter be."[1] The king, whose head-quarters were at Daventry, was amusing himself with field sports, and his troops were foraging and plundering in all directions, when, on the 11th of June, old Sir Marmaduke Langdale brought him news of the unexpected approach of Fairfax. The royalist outposts were concentrated and strengthened; but, on the morning of the 12th, Fairfax beat them up at Borough Hill, and spread the alarm into the very lodgings of the king. The parliamentarians, however, who were then very weak in cavalry, did not think fit to venture any further attempt, and Fairfax "propounded" that the horse of Lincolnshire, Derby, and Nottingham should be drawn that way with all convenient speed. And being rather apprehensive that the royal horse might visit his own quarters, Fairfax mounted his charger at midnight, and rode about his horse and foot till four in the morning. The unexpected march of the enemy up so close to him "being in a manner a surprise," his majesty on the morrow (the 13th) thought fit to decamp, designing to march to the relief of Pontefract and Scarborough, "to which he had a great inclination, especially because the same appeared more feasible since the removal of the Scottish army." Charles therefore fired his huts, dispatched his carriages toward Harborough, and followed after them. On the same morning of the 13th, at about six o'clock, Fairfax called a council of war, and, in the midst of their debates, to the exceeding joy of the whole army, Lieutenant-general Cromwell reached head-quarters with a choice regiment of 600 horse, raised by the associated counties of the east. Then all deliberation and hesitation was at an end, the drums beat, the trumpets sounded to horse, and the whole body of parliamentarians were drawn up under arms. Cromwell pointed the way they were to go, and presently horse and foot were in full pursuit of the king. Harrison, then a major, was sent forward to reconnoiter, and Colonel Ireton turned from the main road in order to get upon the flank of the royalists, and attack them if he found good opportunity. Fairfax and Cromwell, with the main body, kept on the road to Harborough, at which town, and at eleven o'clock at night, Charles was warned of the close pursuit, by Ireton's falling upon his outposts, and giving an alarm to the whole army. The king left his quarters at that unseasonable hour, and called a council of war in Harborough. He put the question what was best to be done, seeing that the enemy was so near, and evidently bent upon battle. "It was considered that, should they march on to Leicester, if the rear were engaged, the whole army might be put in hazard, and therefore there was no safety in marching with the van, unless they could bring the rear clear off, which they foresaw would be very difficult to do: and therefore it was resolved to put it to a battle, taking themselves to be more strong in horse than Fairfax; to be much better furnished with old experienced commanders;[1] and having no reason not to rely upon their infantry; for, indeed, they were generally valiant, stout men. And, further, they resolved. since Fairfax had been so forward in pressing upon them, they would not remain in that place where they were, expecting him, but forthwith advance to find him out, and offer him an engagement."[2]

On Saturday, June the 14th, by three o'clock in the morning, Fairfax put himself in march from Gilling to Naseby, intending to bring the royalists to action, and to prevent, if possible, their retreat upon Leicester, in case they should refuse the combat. At five o'clock Fairfax halted close to Naseby, and shortly after several bodies of his majesty's horse showed themselves on the top of a hill in battle array. Presently columns of infantry marched into position, and Fairfax being convinced that the royalists meant to bide the brunt, drew up and faced them on the brow of a gentle hill, placing a forlorn hope of 300 musketeers about a carbine-shot lower down. His right wing, consisting of six regiments of horse, was commanded by Cromwell;

[1] This is Fairfax's letter of summons to Cromwell. (According to Rushworth, it was dated on the 11th of June, the day on which Fairfax had his first skirmish with Sir Marmaduke Langdale.)

"SIR—You will find, by the inclosed vote of the House of Commons, a liberty given me to appoint you lieutenant-general of the horse of this army during such time as that House shall be pleased to dispense with your attendance. You can not expect but that I make use of so good an advantage as I apprehend this to be to the public good; and therefore I desire you to make speedy repair to this army, and give order that the troops of horse you had from hence, and what other horse or dragoons can be spared from the attendance of your foot in their coming up, march hither with convenient speed; and as for any other forces you have there, I shall not need to desire you to dispose of them as you shall find most for the public advantage, which we here apprehend to be that they march toward us by the way of Bedford. We are now quartered at Wotton, two miles from Northampton, the enemy still at Daventry. Our intelligence is, that they intend to move on Friday, but which way we can not yet tell. They are, as we hear, more horse than foot, and make their horse their confidence. Ours shall be in God. I pray you make all possible haste toward "Your affectionate friend,

"To serve you,
"TH. FAIRFAX."

[1] According to Ludlow, the king despised the "new model," as it was called, because most of the old officers were either omitted by the parliament or had quitted their commands in the army; and these considerations greatly encouraged him to risk the battle. Charles and his friends had not yet learned to appreciate the military genius of Cromwell, whom it was the fashion to represent as an unscientific, unmannerly brewer.

the left wing, composed of five regiments of horse, a division of 200 horse of the Association, and a party of dragoons, was, at Cromwell's request, committed to the management of the gallant Ireton, who was for that purpose made commissary-general of horse; Fairfax and Skippon took charge of the main body; and the reserves were headed by colonels Rainsborough, Hammond, and Pride. In the king's army Prince Rupert, with his brother Prince Maurice, led the right wing, and Sir Marmaduke Langdale the left, Charles in person taking the command of the main body: the Earl of Lindsay and Sir Jacob Astley, the Lord Baird and Sir George Lisle, headed the reserves. The two armies were pretty equal as to numbers, there not being the difference of five hundred men between them. The field-word of the royalists was "God and Queen Mary!" that of the parliament, "God our strength!" The place where the battle was chiefly fought was a large fallow field about a mile broad, on the northwest side of Naseby, which space of ground was at one moment entirely covered by the contending forces. The royalists began the battle, "marching up in good order a swift march, with abundance of alacrity, gallantry, and resolution." Fairfax's forlorn hope of 300 musketeers, after they began to be hard-pressed upon, fell back, according to orders previously given, upon the main body. Then Prince Rupert, with his majesty's right wing, charged Ireton and the left wing of the parliamentarians; and Cromwell, at nearly the same moment, with the parliament's right wing, charged Langdale and the king's left. As in other battles, fortune at first seemed to flatter Charles, for the left wing of the parliament was worsted by the furious onslaught of Rupert. Ireton was wounded in the thigh with a pike, in the face with a halbert, and, his horse being killed under him, he was made prisoner and kept by the royalists during the greater part of the battle. After he was lost his men fell into disorder, and were beaten back to the train of artillery, which was in danger of being taken, the foot and firelock men placed to guard the cannon giving way also. Rupert, however, with his usual rashness, spurred on too far; the scattered foot rallied in his rear round their guns; and the broken horse of the left wing formed, closed, and rode up to support the center and the right; and when the prince returned from the skirts of Naseby town, and summoned the train, offering them quarter, they being well defended with firelocks and a rear guard, refused to surrender, and kept him at bay until he perceived that the success of the rest of the king's army was not equal to his,—and then he flew back to succor his friends; but, also as usual, he came too late. Cromwell's charge, though gallantly met by Sir Marmaduke Langdale, was brilliant and decisive: after firing at close charge, and standing to it at the sword's point, the left wing of the royalists was broken, and driven beyond all the king's foot, and nearly a quarter of a mile behind the fallow field. While this was doing there was a very fierce and doubtful encounter between the two main bodies, or the infantry of the two armies. With the exception of Fairfax's own regiment of foot, nearly all his front division gave way, and went off in disorder, falling behind the reserves; but the colonels and officers rallied them and brought them forward with the reserves, and then the king's foot were driven back, and at last put to a disorderly retreat. In this stern conflict the popular, unflinching Skippon was dangerously wounded by a shot in the side. Fairfax considerately desired him to quit the field, but the old soldier replied that he would not stir so long as a man would stand; and, accordingly, he stayed till the battle was ended. Cromwell, now returning victoriously, kept the king's horse in check, and prevented them from coming to the rescue of their foot in the center; and Fairfax, leading up the masses of his infantry, pressed the whole of Charles's main body, and put them all into disorder except one tertia, which stood like a rock, and, though twice desperately charged, would not move an inch. A third charge, however, conducted from several points at once, was more successful, and that last steady body of the king's foot was broken and thrown into confusion. The king had now nothing entire in the field except some regiments of horse, but these were gradually increased; and Langdale, who had rallied, and Charles himself, put them into good order. Prince Rupert, also, being now returned "from his fatal success," joined with his cavalry: but the train of artillery was already lost, the foot broken, and the parliamentarians were busied in taking of prisoners, except some bodies of horse which still faced the king, to prevent his advancing to the succor of his routed infantry. According to Clarendon, Rupert's cavalry thought they had acted their parts, and could never be brought to rally again in order, or to charge the enemy.[1] They stood, with the rest, spiritless and inactive, till Cromwell and Fairfax were ready to charge them with horse and foot, and to ply them with their own artillery. Despair made Charles courageous, and placing himself among them, he cried out, "One charge more, and we recover the day!" but he could not prevail with them to stand the shock of horse, foot, and ordnance, and they presently fled in disorder, both fronts and reserves, hotly pursued by Cromwell's horse, who took many prisoners. Clarendon says that the victors "left no manner of cruelty unexercised that day, and in the pursuit killed above one hundred women whereof some where the wives of officers of quality;" but here the royalist drew from the stores of his imagination and hatred, for neither in this battle and rout, nor in any other in England, were such atrocities committed. Charles left behind him on the field 5000 prisoners, including an immense number of officers of all ranks, besides many of his household servants. There were also taken twelve brass pieces of ordnance, two mortar pieces, eight thousand stand of arms, forty barrels of powder, all the bag and baggage, the rich pillage which the royalist soldiers had got just before at Leicester,[1] above one hundred colors, the king's baggage, several coaches, and his majesty's private cabinet of papers and letters, which last were a means of sealing his doom. If the list of the slain be correctly given, it should appear that his army did not fight very resolutely, for six hundred is the highest number given for the loss of common soldiers, twenty for that of colonels, knights, and officers of note. The mass of his infantry threw down their arms and cried for quarter. The victory was obtained with the loss of very few on the side of the parliament—May says scarcely a hundred. Five days before the battle of Naseby Charles had written to tell his wife, that without being over-sanguine, he could affirm that since this rebellion, his affairs were never in so fair and hopeful a way; but this afternoon, as he fled from the fatal field, it must have been in almost utter hopelessness.[2]

[1] The royalist historian, here as elsewhere, complains bitterly of the want of discipline in the king's army, and does something like justice to Cromwell and Fairfax:—"That difference was observed all along, in the discipline of the king's troops, and of those which marched under the command of Fairfax and Cromwell (for it was only under them), and had never been remarkable under Essex or Waller, that though the king's troops prevailed in the charge, and routed those they charged, they seldom rallied themselves again in order, nor could be brought to make a second charge again the same day, which was the reason that they had not an entire victory at Edgehill; whereas the other troops, if they prevailed, or though they were beaten and routed, presently rallied again, and stood in good order till they received new orders."—Hist.

With Cromwell's horse thundering close in his rear, he got into Leicester, but not judging it safe to remain there, he rode off the same evening to Ashby de la Zouch, where he rested and refreshed himself for some hours; and thence passed on to Litchfield, and so by Bewdley, in Worcestershire, to Hereford, "with some disjointed imagination," of getting together an army in South Wales. At Hereford, Prince Rupert, before any decision was taken as to what the king should do next, left his uncle, and made haste to Bristol, that he might put that place into a condition to resist a powerful and victorious enemy, which he had reason to believe would in a short time appear before it. "Nothing," observes Clarendon, "can be here more wondered at, than that the king should amuse himself about forming a new army in counties which had been vexed and worn out with the oppressions of his own troops and the license of those governors whom he had put over them, and not have immediately repaired into the west, where he had an army already formed, and a people generally well devoted to his service, whither all his broken troops and General Gerrard might have transported themselves before Fairfax could have given them any interruption, who had somewhat to do before he could bend his course that way."[1] Meanwhile Fairfax marched with his victorious army to Leicester, which was soon surrendered to him, and leaving a garrison there, he moved westward, that he might both pursue the king and raise the siege of Taunton. The day after the battle the lord-general sent Colonel John Fiennes and his regiment up to London with the prisoners and colors taken, and with a short letter to the Speaker of the House of Commons, wherein Fairfax humbly desired that the honor of this great never-to-be-forgotten mercy might be given to God in an extraordinary day of thanksgiving, and hoped that it might be improved to the good of God's church and the kingdom. Cromwell, on the day of the battle, wrote to the parliament, averring that this was none other but the hand of God, and that to Him alone belonged the glory, wherein none are to share with him. "The general," continued Cromwell, "served you with all faithfulness and honor, and the best commendation I can give him is, that I dare say he attributes all to God, and would rather perish than assume to himself; which is an honest and a thriving way; and yet as much for bravery may be given to him in this action as to a man. Honest men served you faithfully in this action. Sir, they are trusty; I beseech you in the name of God not to discourage them. I wish this action may beget thankfulness and humility in all that are concerned in it. He that ventures his life for the liberty of his country, I wish he trust God for the liberty of his conscience, and you for the liberty he fights for."[1] But these letters were far inferior in interest to the epistles taken in the king's cabinet, now publicly read in London at a common hall, before a great assembly of citizens and many members of both Houses of parliament, where leave was given to as many as pleased or knew the king's handwriting to peruse and examine them all, in order to refute the report of those who said that the letters were counterfeit. And shortly after, a selection from them was printed and published by command of parliament. "From the reading of these letters," says May, "many discourses of the people arose. For in them appeared his transactions with the Irish rebels, and with the queen for assistance from France and the Duke of Lorrain, of both which circumstances we have already made some mention. Many good men were sorry that the king's actions agreed no better with his words; that he openly protested before God, with horrid imprecations, that he endeavored nothing so much as the preservation of the Protestant religion, and rooting out of popery: yet in the mean time, underhand, he promised to the Irish rebels an abrogation of the laws against them, which was contrary to his late expressed promises in these words: I will never abrogate the laws against the papists. And again, he said, I abhor to think of bringing foreign soldiers into the kingdom; and yet he solicited the Duke of Lorrain, the French, the Danes, and the very Irish, for assistance. They were vexed, also, that the king was so much ruled by the will of his wife as to do every thing by her prescript, and that peace, war, religion, and parliament should be at her disposal. It appeared, beside, out of those letters, with what mind the king treated with the parliament at Uxbridge, and what could be hoped for by that treaty when, writing to the queen, he affirms that, if he could have had but two more consenting to his vote, he would not have given the name of Parliament to them at Westminster: at last he agreed to it in this sense—that it was not all one to call them a parliament and to acknowledge them so to be, and upon that reason (which might have displeased his own side) he calls those with him at Oxford a mongrel parliament."[1] There were other things that equally proved Charles's systematic insincerity, time-serving, double-dealing, arrogance, and thirst for revenge, and the reading of these letters is generally considered to have been as fatal to his cause as the field of Naseby, where they were taken. The royalists themselves were startled by his contemptuous ingratitude; and men who had hitherto been neutral, but who inclined to royalty, began to lose all respect for his character.

From this time nothing prospered with the king. From Hereford he proceeded to Ragland Castle, near the Wye, the seat of the Marquis of Worcester, where, strange to say, he passed days and weeks in sports and ceremonies, in hunting and audience-giving. Fairfax did not follow him into South Wales, but marched rapidly into the west, where Taunton was relieved merely by the rumor of his approach, for Goring raised the siege and went his way. "That constant town of Taunton had been reduced to great extremities; it had suffered much and done great things against strong enemies, and could not at this time in possibility have held out long without some relief."[2] Charles had sent to Rupert nearly all the new levies to strengthen Bristol, which seemed at once threatened by Fairfax and by the Scots under Leven, who were again in motion from the north and marching upon Worcester. When Rupert had done his best in garrisoning Bristol, he crossed the Severn to Chepstow, where he had an interview with his uncle, who at one time had proposed returning with him and making Bristol his temporary court and capital. But Charles was now irresolute, and, instead of facing the danger in the west of England, where his partisans were still numerous and powerful, he withdrew to Cardiff, where he did nothing but press his negotiations with the Irish Catholics, from whom he still expected such an army as would enable him to subdue the English parliament and people. Fairfax, in the mean time, continued his brilliant operations in the west, urged on by the spirit and guided by the military genius of Cromwell. Having dispersed the irregular force of club-men,[3] who at first had put themselves in a

[1] Rushworth. This is the commencement of Cromwell's letter:—"Sir, being commanded by you to this service, I think myself bound to acquaint you with the good hand of God toward you and us; we marched yesterday after the king, who went before us from Daventry to Haverbrow, and quartered about six miles from him. This day we marched toward him; he drew out to meet us; both armies engaged; we, after three hours' fight, very doubtful, at last routed his army, killed and took about 5000, very many officers, but of what quality we yet know not. We took also about 200 carriages—all he had—all his guns, being twelve in number, whereof two were demi-cannon, two demi-culverins, and, I think, the rest sacres. We pursued the enemy from three miles short of Harborough to nine beyond, even to the sight of Leicester, whither the king fled."

[1] Breviary of the History of the Parliament of England.

[2] May. This author adds:—"Three parliament garrisons about that time and the foregoing year behaved themselves with such courage and constancy as might deserve to be celebrated in a larger history, viz., Lyme, Plymouth, and Taunton, all which (having often been besieged by Prince Maurice, generals Greenvile and Goring, and other commanders) had not only held out against those strong enemies, but much broken their forces."

[3] The club-men were first heard of in the west of England, where, for a time, their efforts were principally directed to the checking of the cruelties and licentiousness of Goring and his desperate bands. Gradually gentlemen of rank and substance joined the yeomen and peasantry, and gave a new direction to the association. The day after Fairfax had dispersed them at Blandford he was waited upon at Dor warlike attitude in order to preserve their homes and neighborhood from both royalists and parliamentarians, but who now seemed wholly hostile to the parliament, and having defeated Goring at Langport, Fairfax appeared before the very strong and very important town of Bridgewater, which surrendered on the 23d of July. These reverses made even Prince Rupert advise a peace. Charles replied, "As for the opinion of my business, and your counsel thereupon, if I had any other quarrel but the defense of my religion, crown, and friends, you had full reason for your advice: for I confess that, speaking either as a mere soldier or statesman, I must say that there is no probability but of my ruin: but, as to a Christian, I must tell you that God will not suffer rebels to prosper or his cause to be overthrown; and whatsoever personal punishment it shall please him to inflict upon me must not make me repine, much less to give over this quarrel, which, by the grace of God, I am resolved against, whatsoever it cost me, for I know my obligations to be, both in conscience and honor, neither to abandon God's cause, injure my successors, nor forsake my friends. Indeed, I can not flatter myself with expectation of good success more than this, to end my days with honor and a good conscience, which obliges me to continue my endeavor, as not despairing that God may in due time avenge his own cause; though I must avow to all my friends that he that will stay with me at this time must expect and resolve either to die for a good cause, or, which is worse, to live as miserable in the maintaining it as the violence of insulting rebels can make him." He went on to tell his nephew that, having thus truly and impartially stated his case, and plainly told him his positive resolutions, which by the grace of God he would not alter, he must earnestly desire him not in any way "to hearken after treaties." "Low as I am," he continued, "I will not go less than what was offered in my name at Uxbridge. . . Therefore, for God's sake, let us not flatter ourselves with these conceits; and believe me, the very imagination that you are desirous of a treaty will lose me so much the sooner." At this moment Charles was promising all kinds of things to the Irish Catholics: but still, true to his system of keeping his doings secret, even from his nearest friends and advisers, he labored to mystify his nephew on this point. "As for the Irish, I assure you they shall not cheat me; but it is possible they may cozen themselves: for, be assured, what I have refused to the English I will not grant to the Irish rebels, never trusting to that kind of people, of what nature soever, more than I see by their actions."[1]

chester by Mr. Hollis and other professed leaders of the club-men, who showed him petitions they had drawn up both to the king and the parliament. The subscribers to these petitions asked for a new treaty of peace, for a truce till it should be concluded, and for all the garrisons in Dorsetshire and Wiltshire to be garrisoned pro tempore by them. Fairfax modestly told them that it was evident from the royal correspondence taken at Naseby that the king expected 10,000 men from France, and 6000 from Ireland, and that, under these circumstances, they ought not to expect that the parliament would betray its trust and surrender the garrisons of Dorsetshire, three of which were seaports. The general made other answers of equal weight to the other demands of the petitioners, whom, in the end, he warned to return peaceably to their homes and abstain from further assemblies, arrays, and rendezvous, leaving the parliament to finish the contest for the good of the nation.—Rushworth.—Clarendon. The original motive of the club-men was sufficiently explained in the motto on one of their ensigns or standards:—

"If ye offer to plunder or take our cattle,
Be you assured we'll give you battle."

In the truly regal halls of Ragland Castle, and in the stately ceremonies of the court, Charles had recovered his spirit and his hopes, which now rested not merely on the coming of troops from Ireland and troops from the continent, but also on the wonderful successes of the Marquis of Montrose. That daring adventurer, whose new-born loyalty was kept in life and heat by a deadly hatred of the covenanting Earl of Argyle, and perhaps, also, by some yearning after that nobleman's honors and estates, had penetrated into Scotland early in 1644, and had taken Dumfries; but finding that he could not keep his ground, and that his friend Antrim was not arriving from Ireland with his promised levies, he soon fled back into England. After the battle of Marston Moor he recrossed the border in disguise, and hid himself in the Highlands until the appearance of about 1200 Irish, whom Antrim had sent over. These wild, undisciplined, ill-armed Irish were joined by about 2000 Highlanders, as wild and as badly armed as themselves; and it was with this force that Montrose took the field to restore Charles to his plenitude of power, promising that, if supplied with only 500 horse, he would soon be in England with 20,000 men. His old enemy, Argyle, now lieutenant of the kingdom, and Lord Elcho, marched against him from different points, and each with far superior forces. But Montrose had a wonderful quickness of eye, a sort of instinct for this loose kind of warfare, and his half-naked Highlanders and Irish marched and countermarched with perplexing rapidity. He surprised Elcho at Tippermuir, in Perthshire, defeated him thoroughly, took his guns and ammunition, and shortly after captured the town of Perth, where the Highlanders plundered the citizens, notwithstanding their profession of affection to the royal cause—a revolution of opinion in them, it must be allowed, almost as sudden as the capture of their town. But the Highlanders got rich too fast for Montrose, and the mass of them now left his standard to return with the booty they had made to their native mountains and fastnesses, and few were left with him beyond the wild Irish, who could not retreat because the Earl of Argyle had burned the shipping which brought them over. That covenanting nobleman now approached, and, abandoning Perth as untenable, Montrose turned northward, in the expectation of being reinforced by the whole clan of the Gordons. Two thousand seven hundred men had taken post at the bridge of Dee to intercept his passage: but the northern guerilla crossed at a ford above, fell upon their flank, defeated them, and drove them before him to Aberdeen, which unfortunate town was entered pell-mell by Highlanders, Irish, and flying Covenanters, and made the scene of slaughter, pillage, and abomination. Four years before,

[1] Clarendon, Hist.

when Aberdeen stood for the king, and when Montrose was fighting for the covenant, he had committed or permitted equal atrocities. But Argyle still followed, and, after two or three days, the Highlanders and Irish were obliged to abandon Aberdeen as they had abandoned Perth. Montrose led them northward to the Spey; but he found the banks of that river guarded against him by men who inclined to the king, but who remembered his ill doings when he was in that quarter for the covenant; and, as Argyle still pursued, he buried his artillery in a morass, and hurriedly ascended the stream by its right bank, till he reached the forests of Strathspey and the mountains of Badenoch. From those rugged heights he descended again into Athol, dispatched Macdonnel of the Isles to recall the Highlanders, and penetrated into the county of Forfar, where he was disappointed again in his expectation of being joined by the Gordons and other clans, and where he had a narrow escape from the Earl of Argyle, who almost surrounded him at Fyvie Castle. He, however, deluded the Covenanters with skillful stratagems, and once more got back to the mountains of Badenoch. By this time the few Lowlanders and soldiers of fortune that had followed him were completely worn out by these incessant forced marches and countermarches; and, taking an unceremonious farewell of him, they ran away in search of an easier life or service. Argyle and his Covenanters, not less fatigued, retired into winter-quarters. The earl himself withdrew to his castle of Inverary, at the head of Loch Fyne, "where he hived himself securely, supposing no enemy to be within one hundred miles of him—for he could never before be brought to believe that an army could get into Argyleshire, though on foot, and though in the midst of summer"—and now it was the dead of winter, and the mighty barrier of mountains was covered with deep snow. But when he suspected nothing less, the trembling cowherds came down from the hills, and told Argyle the enemy was within two miles of him. And this was no false alarm; for Montrose, reinforced by clans of Highlanders, had braved the winter snows and the mountain storms, and, crossing moor and morass, burning and destroying as he went, had got to the shores of Loch Fyne, and almost under the shadow of the hill on which the old castle of Inverary stood. As the Earl of Argyle had put a price upon the marquis's head, and as Montrose was a man not likely to forget such a compliment, he for a moment, though no coward, as the royalists have absurdly represented him, trembled for his own head, and he only saved himself by leaping into a fishing-boat and pushing across the loch. Then Montrose, dividing his army into three irregular columns, ranged over the whole country of Argyle, and laid it utterly waste. No mercy was shown to the clansmen of the fugitive earl—slight mercy to any of the clans that had friendship or alliance with him. "As many as they found in arms, or going to the rendezvous to join the earl, they slew, and they spared no man fit for war, and so destroyed, or drove out of the country, or into holes unknown, all the service, and fired the villages and cottages, and drove away and destroyed all their cattle; and these things lasted from the 13th of December, 1644, to the end of January following." Then, departing out of Argyleshire, Montrose led his Irish and his Highlanders through Lorn, Glencoe, and Aber, to Loch Ness, in order to encounter the Earl of Seaforth, a nobleman very powerful in those parts, who had collected the garrison of Inverness, with the strength of Murray, Ross, Sutherland, and Caithness, and the great clan of the Frasers; but, learning that Argyle had gathered forces out of the lowlands, and joined to them such Highlanders as yet adhered to him, and had reached Innerloch, an old castle upon the bank of Lochaber, he thought fit to fight him first, and so, passing by a private, unusual way, straight over the Lochaber hills, he again came upon him unawares. It was night, but Argyle had time to arrange his forces, and all that night both sides stood to their arms, making frequent sallies and skirmishes by moonlight. On the morrow, being Candlemas-day, the 2d of February, 1645, the battle fairly began, and the prime of the Campbells charged very bravely; but when it came to dint of sword they could not stand, but retreated in disorder, and the Montrosians pursued them with great slaughter for several miles; "so that it was reckoned there were near 1500 of them slain; among whom were many gentlemen of the Campbells, chief persons of that clan, and of good account in their country, who, making as much resistance as they were able, received death answerable to their names, in campo belli."[1] Rushworth says, that "it was said that the Earl of Argyle was before withdrawn;" and according to several authorities, he looked on from a boat on the neighboring loch; but this story is scarcely credible, and it is certain that his clan made a gallant resistance before they fled. After his victory, Montrose was joined by the Gordons, and by other clans of less note. On the 3d of April, about midnight, he set out from Dunkeld, then his head-quarters, and marched with such expedition, that he was at Dundee by ten o'clock the next morning, summoning that ill-fortified town. The townspeople, knowing that a considerable force was near at hand to relieve them, made the best defense they could; but Montrose burst into the place. His wild troops, however, had scarcely began to plunder, when he was warned that the Covenanters were at hand: and thereupon he ordered an instant retreat, which was not submitted to without difficulty, "the men being unwilling to part from that booty, and especially the strong drink they there met with." In fact, the enemy were almost within musket-shot when he got his marauders into marching order; but though vigorously pursued, he got them off, and again made his escape to the mountains. For threescore miles together he had been either in fight, or upon a forced march without provisions or any refreshment, and between this pursuit and the storming of Dundee he had lost a considerable number of his small army. It was difficult to know where to expect this erratic comet, whose baneful light was the morning-star of hope to Charles and the royalists. His next appearance was at Aldern, a village near Nairne, where there was a kind of drawn game; and a bloody game it was, for 2000 men, Highlanders and Irish—we can hardly call them royalists—and Covenanters and Parliamentarians, were left dead upon the spot. This was on the 4th of May, a little more than a month before the battle of Naseby. Montrose claimed the victory, and it was reported as an important one to Charles, whose spirits were greatly revived thereby. The general assembly of the kirk of Scotland drew up a humble remonstrance to the king; but though this document was not presented until more than a month after the battle of Naseby, it produced no effect on the royal mind, nor moved Charles a hair's breadth from his wild hopes of still recovering every thing by means of the broadsword of Montrose. The general assembly, after protesting their loyalty and praying to God that he and his posterity might long and prosperously reign over his ancient and native kingdom, and over his other dominions, told Charles that the patience of the Scots was like a cart pressed down with sheaves and ready to break. "Our country," said they, "is now infested, the blood of divers of our brethren spilt, and other acts of most barbarous and horrid cruelty exercised by the cursed crew of the Irish rebels and their accomplices, under the conduct of such as have commission and warrant from your majesty." The pen of the clergy of Scotland had lost none of its old power and sharpness; indeed, their style had manifestly improved in freedom and boldness with the depressed fortunes of the party at whom they discharged their eloquence. They thus told Charles what they considered to be his most crying offenses:—"We make bold to warn your majesty, that the guilt which cleaveth fast to your throne is such, as (whatsoever flattering preachers or unfaithful counselors may say to the contrary), if not timely repented, can not but involve yourself and your posterity under the wrath of the everlasting God; for your being guilty of the shedding of the blood of many thousands of your majesty's best subjects; for your permitting the mass and other idolatry both in your own family and in your dominions; for your authorizing by the Book of Sports the profanation of the Lord's Day; for your not punishing of public scandals, and much profaneness in and about your court; for shutting of your ears from the humble and just desires of your faithful subjects; for your complying too much with the popish party many ways; and, namely, by concluding the cessation of arms in Ireland, and your embracing the counsels of those who have not set God nor your good before their eyes; for your resisting and opposing this cause, which so much concerneth the glory of God, your own honor and happiness, and the peace and safety of your kingdoms; and for what other causes your majesty is conscious, and may best judge and search your own conscience; nor would we have mentioned any particulars, if they had not been publicly known. For all which it is high time for your majesty to fall down at the footstool of the King of Glory, to acknowledge your offenses, to repent timely, to make your peace with God through Jesus Christ (whose blood is able to wash away your great sins), and to be no longer unwilling that the son of God reign over you and your kingdoms in his pure ordinance of church government and worship."

The king had scarcely received this letter when Montrose gained another victory. The Covenanters had been pursuing him with far superior numbers under Baillie and Urry, who committed the folly of dividing their forces and following him into the mountains. On repassing the Don, they were encountered on the 2d of July at Alford, Montrose having doubled upon them, and concealed his reserve behind an eminence. The result was, that the Highlanders and the Irish charged with their usual fury, broke the Covenanters, and drove them before them.

The southern march of the Scottish army in England, under Leven, was not so rapid as had been expected. Historians have accused them of lukewarmness and disaffection to the English Commons, overlooking the important fact that, from the brilliant successes of Montrose, this Scottish army must have felt that their presence might be required for the defense of their own country. Leven, however, after reducing and garrisoning the important city of Carlisle, detached part of his forces into Lancashire, to assist Sir William Brereton; "but the gross of his army hovered to and fro, sometimes advancing southward, and sometimes retreating, as being, 'tis likely, apprehensive of the king's breaking northward to join with Montrose." But in the end of June the Scots advanced to Nottingham; by the 2d of July, the day on which Montrose gained the battle of Alford, they were at Melton Mowbray, whence they pushed forward by Tamworth and Birmingham into Worcestershire and Herefordshire, effectually preventing the royalists from making any new levies in those parts. On the 22d of July, they took by storm Canon-Froom, a garrison of the king's, about midway between the cities of Worcester and Hereford. At this crisis Charles, by means of Sir William Fleming, a Scottish gentleman that adhered to him, tampered with the Earl of Leven (old Leslie), and with the Earl of Calendar, who was Fleming's uncle. Leven told Fleming to follow the straight and public way, applying himself to the parliaments and committees of both kingdoms, and not making his secret address to him; and the Earl of Calendar, after rating his nephew for his disaffection to the good cause, and for his want of judgment and discretion, referred him in the same manner to the parliaments of both kingdoms or their committees. Leven communicated the correspondence to the House of Commons, who voted him a letter of thanks and a jewel worth £500. On the 30th of July the Scots sat down before the strong or well-defended walls of Hereford. This pressed close upon the king, who was collecting recruits in the counties of Monmouth and Glamorgan. Charles was thus driven into action, and he moved from Cardiff with three thousand horse in good condition, and with some hundreds of newly-levied infantry that were worth little or nothing. Nearly all his officers were involved in fierce quarrels with one another, disputing for posts and preëminences when their very existence as an army was compromised. At first the king fancied he could raise the siege of Hereford, and he showed his well-appointed columns of horse in the neighborhood; but he was presently obliged to renounce this project as hopeless, and to dismiss all his foot. He then resolved with his cavalry alone to open his way to the Scottish borders, where it is quite certain he had concerted a meeting and junction with Montrose. The brave Sir Marmaduke Langdale devised and guided the march, and the cavalry swept across the country from the Wye to the Trent, and from the Trent to the Don, without opposition, and with flattering success in the way of picking up partisans and reinforcements, the latter consisting chiefly of garrisons that had surrendered to the parliament, and been dismissed. But by the order of the Earl of Leven, Sir David Leslie, with nearly the entire cavalry of the Scottish army in England, was now in full pursuit, and Poyntz and Rossiter, who commanded the English forces in the north, were advancing in another direction. Charles, who had got as far as Doncaster, halted, wavered, and then turned back, giving up his bold plan of getting to Scotland, and only hoping to be able to regain his strong quarters in the south at Oxford. As Sir David Leslie had a double object—that is, to prevent the king's reaching Scotland, and to check the successes of Montrose there,—and as the latter was now the more important operation, he did not turn to pursue Charles, but rode forward toward the borders. Thus unmolested in his rear, the king fell back upon Newark. There he conceived that, by rapid marches, he might take the associated counties in the east—the country of Oliver Cromwell, which had done so much against him—by surprise, and scatter their unaided foot levies. Proceeding by Stamford, he rushed into Cambridge and Huntingdonshire, ravaging the whole open country, and taking the town of Huntingdon by assault on the 24th of August. He gave Cambridge several alarms, but then drew off and went to Woburn, his flying squadrons of horse spreading in different detachments through Bedfordshire and part of Hertfordshire, and some of them approaching the town of St. Albans. From Woburn he went to Dunstable, and then crossing Buckinghamshire, he got to Oxford on the 28th of August, where the day before the melancholic Lord Keeper Littleton had departed this life. "In this sudden and unexpected march, his majesty's horse got great booty out of those countries adhering to the parliament, through which they had passed, especially at Huntingdon." But at Oxford, or a short time before he got there, Charles was greeted with intelligence from Scotland, far more valuable to him than the plunder of his burghers and peasants of England. Montrose, after threatening Perth, where the Scottish parliament were sitting, resolved to penetrate farther into the south than he had hitherto ventured, and, crossing the Forth a little above Stirling, he directed his march across the narrow isthmus which separates the Frith of Forth from the Frith of Clyde, and which equally opened to him the roads to Edinburgh and to Glasgow. Baillie and the Covenanters came up with him on the 19th of August at Kilsyth, a village adjacent to the Roman wall, and not far from Stirling, but they were defeated and slaughtered in heaps, no quarter being given. It is said that from five thousand to six thousand men, including nearly the entire number of Baillie's infantry, were killed on the field, or butchered in the pursuit, and the Covenanters lost all their artillery, arms, and ammunition. The Earl of Argyle and the chief nobles of that party fled by sea to England, the city of Glasgow opened its gates to the blood-red conqueror, and the magistrates of Edinburgh immediately liberated all their royalist prisoners or friends of Montrose, and sent delegates with them, beseeching his favor or mercy to the city, and promising all obedience to the king—"upon which, and because the plague was then very rife in Edinburgh, he forbore marching thither with his army." The liberated prisoners and no inconsiderable number of the nobility joined Montrose, and accepted commissions in the name of Charles to raise and command Scottish troops; and if Charles had persevered and succeeded in his march northward—if he had joined Montrose, as he possibly might have done immediately after the victory of Kilsyth—his chance, at least in Scotland, would have been wonderfully improved. But still, it was but a chance, and all that could have happened even in that case would have been the prolonging of the war for one or two campaigns more; for whatever was the backsliding of some of the nobles, or the timidity of some of the great towns, the spirit of the Scots was unbroken, the Covenanters were as resolute as ever to maintain their solemn bond, and the Lowlanders, almost to a man, were infuriated at the atrocities committed by the wild hordes from the Highlands and from Ireland. And then in England all opposition was falling prostrate before the energies of Cromwell and Fairfax, and, if needful, a victorious and most highly-disciplined army of twenty thousand enthusiastic Englishmen would have crossed the borders within a month. But Charles, as we have seen, scoured back to Oxford, and David Leslie alone, as we shall see, was sufficient to crush Montrose, and render nugatory all his brilliant victories, and the still more brilliant prospects they had opened to the king and to the queen, who, in her enthusiasm, looked upon the brave and adroit adventurer as a demi-god or a savior. In fact, immediately after his great victory, Montrose was brought to a pause, for most of the Highland tribes that followed him returned to their mountains to secure their plunder, while some of their chiefs were wholly alienated from the cause by jealousies and dissensions; and though he had overrun the country in a desultory war, the success of which was mainly owing to its suddenness and rapidity, he had acquired no fortified place, nor established any durable foundation in the Lowlands, where his authority never extended beyond the ground he actually occupied with his troops. He hanged a few incendiaries at Glasgow; and then, as king's lieutenant or viceroy, summonned a new parliament to meet at that city in the month of October, and rashly advanced southward, expecting to meet at least a reinforcement of cavalry from England. In the mean time, David Leslie, with his horse, had got to Gladsmuir, in East Lothian, his design originally being to throw himself between Montrose and the Forth; and the Earl of Leven, abandoning the siege of Hereford, was falling back toward the borders with the main body of the Scottish army. The king left Oxford on the 31st of August, and went to Hereford, which city he entered in triumph. He then proposed to cross the Severn to the assistance of Prince Rupert, who was besieged in Bristol by Fairfax; but he loitered and lost time—went again to the splendid castle of Ragland, and there received news that his nephew had surrendered Bristol on the 11th of September. Charles, in the anguish of his heart and the bitterness of his disappointment—for Rupert had assured him that he could keep Bristol for four months, and he had hardly kept it four days—heaped reproaches upon his nephew, and even suspected him of treachery, being instigated, it is said, by the Lord Digby, the deadly enemy of Rupert. He sent the prince an order to resign all his commissions and quit the country, and he ordered his arrest in case Rupert should be troublesome. Still believing Montrose to be master of all Scotland, Charles once more resolved to march into the north. Starting from Hereford, he traversed the mountains of Wales, hoping to avoid, by this course, any interruption from the enemy, and to relieve Chester, the only port by which he could now maintain his communication with Ireland.[1] He reached the neighborhood of Chester without any reverse, but the parliamentarians had taken the suburbs of that city; Poyntz, with another division, was advancing by a different road, and on the 23d of September the royalists, on Rowton Heath, found themselves between two fires, being charged on one side by the troops that had taken the suburbs, and on the other by Poyntz. The result, after several remarkable vicissitudes, was the complete defeat of Charles, who had six hundred troopers slain, and lost more than a thousand prisoners. With less than half his horse (he had no foot with him) he retreated to Denbigh, where intelligence reached him that the game was up with Montrose.

David Leslie, when on the east coast of Scotland, was informed that Montrose was advancing to the southwest, his movements apparently being in concert with those of Charles, who was advancing, on his part, by the western side of England; and the Covenanter thereupon, with all the Scottish horse, quitted the shores of the Forth and marched westward in the direction of the Solway Frith. He came up with the royalists in Selkirk forest; and this time, Montrose, who had so often surprised his adversaries, was himself taken by surprise and thoroughly beaten near the village of Philiphaugh. The light-heeled partisan escaped and got back to the Highlands, but his army was utterly annihilated, and many of his friends who had not fallen in battle were executed by the Covenanters, who retaliated the dreadful barbarities which had been committed.

[1] According to Rushworth, he every minute expected the landing at Chester of forces from Ireland.

The person now in greatest credit and favor with the unfortunate king was the whimsical, wrong-headed Lord Digby, who had contrived to quarrel with nearly every other man about the court or camp. Immediately after the affair at Chester, and before it was known that the Covenanters had gained the great victory of Philiphaugh, "the Lord Digby, finding in how ill a posture the king's affairs were, and how ungrateful he himself was unto the soldiery, entered upon a romantic design with a small body of horse to march into Scotland to the assistance of the Earl of Montrose, that most brave loyal Scot, who, to admiration, did defeat so many of the Scots rebels, and clear so much of the country, that, like Elijah's discovery of the true church, where the prophet thought that there were scarce any true worshipers but himself, there were found 7000 knees, or loyal faithful in Scotland, who had never bowed unto Baal, which I set down for the honor of that nation; and had his majesty's affairs been prosperous in England, such a sunshine would have discovered a great many more such worthy persons, who for a time lay as so many undiscernible atoms in that northern air. But the Lord Digby's design (though he did, perchance, as much as any man could have done) evaporated; for he is beaten at his entrance into Yorkshire, and, before he got to Carlisle, defeated, and so forced to ship himself for Ireland instead of Scotland."[1] Digby, who had always been unfortunate in letter-writing, lost his portfolio, which was taken by the enemy, and, being published by the parliament, administered afterward much occasion of discourse.[2] The principal papers were letters from Goff, a secret agent in Holland, to the Lord Jermyn, who was living in the very closest intimacy with Charles's wife at Paris, and which letters related to a project for a match between the Prince of Wales and the daughter of the Prince of Orange, who was thereby to engage the United Provinces to espouse the king's interests—letters from Ireland concerning secret negotiations between the queen and Fitz-williams, an Irishman, who "propounded" to bring over 10,000 men—letters from the Lord Jermyn at Paris to the Lord Digby himself, touching a treaty for bringing over the Duke of Lorrain with an army to the king's assistance, touching aids to be obtained from the King of Denmark, the Prince of Courland, and the pope. Among these letters was one dated June the 9th, 1645, which mentioned that his lordship's relative, Sir Kenelm Digby, had arrived at Rome and had had audience of the pope, who had given him the best reception and the fairest promises in general that could be wished; and it was stated in this epistle that if Sir Kenelm could be relied upon, there were good hopes of getting money there. There was also a remarkable letter written by Lord Digby himself to my Lord Jermyn, and dated the 27th day of August, only a few days before the seizure was made. Digby told his friend that he thought, of all their plans, those of getting troops from Denmark and money from Rome were the most probable—that the business in Ireland was very backward and sadly involved, the Irish Catholics demanding too much from his majesty, such as the granting unto them the Protestant churches in such parishes where the number of the Catholics was greater, that is, in effect, all through Ireland. "And, whereas," continues Digby, to Henrietta Maria's lover, "you write that perhaps my Lord of Ormond is not the fit person to conclude that business, but that the management of it should be remitted to the queen, I am much afraid that the expectation of that in the Irish hath much retarded the hoped-for issue of the treaty. But (God be thanked) we received men; now the certain news is, that the peace there is concluded, and that an express from my Lord of Ormond is upon his way from Chester with all the particulars. The utmost extent of my Lord of Ormond's power to grant was the suspension of Poining's Act as to the passing of such bills as should be first agreed on; the repeal of the penal laws, and the allowing the papists some chapels in private places for the exercise of their religion; but you may not take notice that he had so large a power, for happily he may have obtained a peace upon a better bargain. Thus much for that business." Digby proceeded to tell Lord Jermyn that his majesty approved of the course proposed by him for obtaining aids from Denmark; "but, above all things," said he, "let the matter of money be labored in, for without some competent stock of that against the next spring, it will be impossible for us ever to have a resource again." He (Lord Digby) thought that the king might be safe at Oxford till the setting in of winter, and then the season would prevent that place from being in danger by siege. He could tell his dearest friend, by way of prediction, that, desperate as the cause seemed, having got thus far in the year, they would be safe till the next, and then probably by help from Denmark and Ireland, and moneys from France and other quarters, they might have a fresh and hopeful campaign in the spring. These hopes, he said, the state of affairs would bear, if the humors of the royalists would only bear the patience. "But, alas! my lord," continued Digby, "we must not expect it, there is such a universal weariness of the war, despair of a possibility for the king to recover, and so much of private interests grown from these upon every body, that I protest to God I do not know four persons living beside myself and you that have not already given clear demonstrations that they will purchase their own, and (as they flatter themselves) the kingdom's quiet at any price to the king, to the church, to the faithfullest of his party. And, to deal freely with you, I do not think it will be in the king's power to hinder himself from being forced to accept such conditions as the rebels will give him; and that the next news you will hear after we have been one month at Oxford will be, that I and those few others who may be thought by our counsels to fortify the king in firmness to his principles shall be forced or torn from him, and you will find the prime instruments to impose the necessity upon the king of submitting to what they and most of the king's party at Oxford shall think fit."[1]

[1] Sir Philip Warwick. This very decided royalist, who, on the whole, entertained a great admiration of Digby, thus concludes his account of that eccentric nobleman's life and adventures:—"Afterward he followed his present majesty (Charles II.) beyond sea, where, both among the French and Spanish ministers, he got speedily great credit; but, being super-refined, held it not long. He affected astrology, which I take to be fatal to most that do so, for it too often draws them off from duty by supposing their destiny inevitable, and brings them into the condition of necessary animals, who were created to be voluntary agents. But his skill in this art failed him likewise, for it made him despond of his present majesty's return at a time when he was near his restitution; and so, changing his religion in compliance with Don John of Austria, he incapacitated himself for that public employment of office of secretary of state, which formerly he had held, and certainly would have had again. He held to the old distinction betwixt the church of Rome and the court of Rome, entitling himself to the first. But though he had formerly written very learnedly and solidly in maintenance of our religion to his kinsman, Sir Kenelm Digby, yet, after his change, he never answered his own polemics. And I heard from those that were often with him in his last sickness that it was not perceived that he had either priest of that creed or of ours to administer to him; yet he was observed to be very devout and frequent in prayer."

Clarendon says, that by one blow those 1500 horse which marched northward in search of Montrose were brought to nothing, and the generalship of the Lord Digby (of which the historian did not think highly) was brought to an end. In fact, that catastrophe put an end to all campaigning or fighting in the open field, though there still remained much to do in the way of siege and blockade. For several days Charles, after the affair at Chester, lay at Denbigh uncertain what to do, and distracted by the conflicting projects and opinions of his officers, now fearfully reduced in number. At one moment he thought of wintering in the Isle of Anglesey, an opportune place for receiving succors from Ireland, and deemed very defensible; but he gave up this project for a march upon Worcester, and this march he abandoned at the instigation of Digby, whom at one time he thought of accompanying to the Scottish border, for a movement upon the Trent, and with that object he brushed across the country and got to Newark.[2] Soon after his arrival at that town, Prince Rupert, despising his orders, came to Belvoir Castle, ten miles short of Newark. The king, greatly irritated, commanded him to stay where he was. Rupert proceeded instantly to Newark, and Sir Richard Willis, the royalist governor of that place, and Gerrard, one of the king's principal officers, heedless of the king's commands or wishes, went out with an escort of a hundred horse to meet the prince and do him honor. Without being announced, and followed by a numerous retinue all in arms, Rupert presented himself before his uncle, telling him that he was come to give an account of his surrender of Bristol, and to clear himself from unjust imputations. Charles, greatly embarrassed, scarcely answered a syllable. It was supper-time; the rest withdrew, but Rupert and his brother, Prince Maurice, remained. During the meal Charles discoursed with Maurice, but said not a word to Rupert. As soon as the supper was over, the king shut himself up in his chamber; and Rupert went to lodge with his friend Willis, the governor of Newark. "But the king," says Clarendon, "how displeased soever, thought it necessary to hear what Prince Rupert would say, that he might with the more ease provide for his own escape from thence, which it was high time to make." (For Newark was no longer a safe biding-place, the active Poyntz having marched to the banks of the Trent, and the disaffection of the neighborhood and the insubordination of the royalist troops being such as to threaten Charles with capture or surrender.) Accordingly, on the morrow, he allowed Rupert, who pleaded how impossible it was to defend the fort of Bristol after the line was entered, to make his defense before a species of court-martial; and, after a day or two's debate, he caused a short declaration to be drawn up, "by which the prince was absolved and cleared from any disloyalty or treason in the rendering of Bristol, but not of indiscretion." No solicitation could draw more than this from the king, who evidently from this moment both disliked and distrusted his nephew. "And so," says Clarendon, "that matter was settled; upon which the king expected the prince should have departed, as himself resolved to prosecute the means for his own escape without communicating it to him." But Rupert remained at Newark to be the occasion of fresh disturbances and heart-burnings. A few days after, Charles, who had resolved to begin his march on the Sunday night (which he imparted to none but two or three of the nearest trust), and who wanted to carry the governor, Sir Richard Willis, away with him, for he had quarreled with all the royalists in the neighborhood, privately called that officer into his bedchamber, and told him of his own design to be gone that very night, adding, that he was resolved to make him (Willis) captain of his horse-guards in the place of the Earl of Litchfield, who had been lately killed before Chester, and that he would leave the Lord Bellasis to be governor of Newark, as one that, from his alliances in the adjacent counties and his good estate there, would be more acceptable to the gentry. Perhaps Willis had learned to doubt the royal word—for the post of captain of the horse-guards was a much higher one than that of governor of Newark; and Charles, upon his excusing himself on the grounds of the narrowness of his fortune, which could not maintain him in that high employment, had promised to take care and provide for his support. All all events, when his majesty went out of his chamber, and presently to church, the governor went to complain to his friends, and when the king sat down to dinner, Willis returned to him accompanied by Prince Rupert, Prince Maurice, Gerrard, and about twenty officers of the garrison. Willis, apparently with little ceremony, told him that what his majesty had said to him in private that morning was now the public talk of the town, and very much to his dishonor; Prince Rupert rejoined, that Sir Richard Willis was to be removed from his government, for no fault that he had committed, but for being his friend; and Gerrard added, that this was a plot of the Lord Digby, who was a traitor, and he would prove him to be so. Charles rose in some disorder from the dinner-table, and would have gone into his bedchamber, calling the governor to follow him, but Willis answered aloud, that he had received a public injury, and therefore expected a public satisfaction. Then Charles flew into a paroxysm of rage, and commanded them all to depart from his presence, and to come no more into it. The whole party went accordingly and sounded to horse, intending presently to be gone. Even in this manner did his own officers, his own nephews, beard the fallen king, and brawl in his presence, which he had been taught to consider as second only to the Divine presence. Clarendon seems to think that, all the gentlemen in the town being so very loyal and full of duty, Charles might have hanged or shot all these mutineers together; but the assumption is doubtful. The Lord Bellasis, however, took the command of Newark as governor, and placed guards "where he thought it reason or needful." In the afternoon a paper was carried to the king, signed by his two nephews and about four-and-twenty officers, who desired that Sir Richard Willis might receive a trial by a court of war, and if that court found him faulty, then he might be dismissed. And they told Charles, that if this were not granted, they desired passes for themselves and for as many horse as desired to go with them; and, in the end, they hoped that his majesty would not look upon this action of theirs as a mutiny. To this last clause the king replied, first saying that he would not now christen it, but that it certainly looked very like mutiny. He told them that, for the court-martial, he would not make that a judge of his actions; but for the passes, they should be immediately prepared for as many as desired to have them. A night was allowed to elapse, but the king relented not, nor did Rupert, who ought, indeed, to have remembered that his uncle's condition "was properer to have begot compassion in an enemy than to have raised neglect in so near a kinsman and dependent."[1] On the following morning the passes were sent, and Rupert, with Sir Richard Willis and about 200 horse, turned their backs upon Newark, and rode to Belvoir Castle, whence they shortly after sent one of their company to demand from the parliament "leave and passports to go beyond the seas." The Commons readily sent them the passes; but the princes did not yet quit England, where Rupert had shed torrents of blood. They were subsequently reconciled to their uncle, and shut up with him in Oxford.

These broils, according to Clarendon, had well-nigh broken the design the king had for his present escape from Newark, which was not possible to be executed for some time, Poyntz and Rossiter drawing every day nearer, and believing they had so encompassed him that it would not be possible for him to get out of their hands. The historian adds, that

"nothing but Providence could conduct him out of that labyrinth." He had now fixed his resolution for Oxford, and sent a trusty messenger thither with directions that the horse of that garrison should be ready, upon a day appointed, between Banbury and Daventry. Then, upon Monday, the 3d of November, early in the morning, he sent a gentleman to Belvoir Castle, to learn the true state of the rebels' quarters, and to advertise Sir Gervas Lucas, the governor of that garrison, of his majesty's design to march thither that night, with orders that his troop and guides should be ready at such an hour; but with an express charge, that he should not acquaint the princes, or any of their company, with it. That gentleman being returned with very particular information, the resolution was taken to march that very night, but not published till an hour after the shutting the ports. Then order was given that all should be ready in the market-place at ten of the clock, and by that time the horse were all there, and were in number between four and five hundred of the guards and of other loose regiments; they were all there put in order, and every man was placed in some troop; which done, about eleven of the clock they began to march—the king himself, in the head of his own troop, marched in the middle of the whole body." Thus traveling in the dead of night, Charles reached Belvoir Castle without interruption or alarm; and there Sir Gervas Lucas was ready with his troop, and with good guides, who all attended his majesty till the break of day, by which time he had passed the posts and quarters he most feared. But he had still to march between hostile garrisons and detachments; and, therefore, he paused not to rest, but pressed forward all that day. As he passed near Burleigh upon the hill, where was a garrison of the parliament, some horse sallied out, fell upon his rear, and took and killed some men, who had loitered or whose horses were tired. Sir Philip Warwick says, "On the highway the captain-lieutenant, with the king's own troop, one Tuberville, a good, stout, plain, downright soldierly gentleman (under whom I trooped for some time), was forced, with a party of his men, to engage the enemy, who were in pursuit of the king; and in this engagement the captain lost his life, as well as some others of his common troopers." Toward evening the king was so weary, that he was even compelled to rest for the space of four hours in a village within eight miles of Northampton, where the parliamentarians were in force. At ten o'clock that night he again took the road, and by noon the following day he got to Banbury, where the horse from Oxford received him and conducted him safely to their garrison that evening: "and so," says Clarendon, "he finished the most tedious and grievous march that ever king was exercised in."

Charles, however, soon perceived that he could no longer find security even in Oxford. Cromwell was reducing, in rapid succession, all the garrisons that still held out, and the king knew that he and Fairfax were concerting the best means of blockading or besieging Oxford. Charles's council, as the Lord Digby had predicted, almost instantly proposed a negotiation, because, among other powerful reasons, his majesty had no army at all, nor any forces but what were shut up in garrisons, no means or money to satisfy his officers, or to supply or pay his garrisons, except the contributions of the country, which were wasted by the soldiers of both sides; so that "the people were ready every day to rise against his garrisons, as being no longer able to undergo the heavy pressures which the necessities of his majesty's soldiers and the avarice of his majesty's governors daily put upon them." Ever since the reading of the king's letters taken at Naseby, the parliament, or a majority of it, seems to have determined never to negotiate on the footing they had formerly done at Oxford and Uxbridge; and as it had been observed that his commissioners had always labored to sow dissensions and carry on intrigues, a resolution had been adopted that no more of these emissaries should be admitted. Accordingly, when Charles applied for safe-conducts for two noblemen, he met with a stern refusal. Still, however, it seemed neither decent nor safe wholly to reject terms of pacification, and the two Houses resolved to submit to him certain propositions, in the form of parliamentary bills, for him to give his assent to.

During these deliberations the breach between the Presbyterians and Independents became wider, and Charles finally hoped to find a way through it to the recovery of his former power. The Scots, too, who had their army in the heart of England, and who occupied some of the most important of the garrisons, disagreed greatly with the master minds that had now taken the chief direction of affairs; they suggested numerous revises and alterations of the propositions to be offered to the king, and they seemed quite ready to throw their swords into the scale of their coreligionists, the English Presbyterians. All this caused long delays, but the problem would have been the sooner solved if Cromwell and Fairfax had not deemed it expedient to finish their conquest of the west of England, and reduce the rest of the kingdom to the obedience of parliament, before commencing the siege of Oxford, which promised to be long and difficult. Half of the manœuvers of Charles and his partisans probably escaped detection or record; but those which were discovered and set down would fill a large and not very amusing volume. The king, it appears, was, on the whole, more willing to deal with the Independents than with the Presbyterians; but the queen, who, from France, constantly suggested plans, and generally guided his councils, thought that more was to be gained from the Presbyterians; and she and other friends, both abroad and at home, earnestly recommended him to conclude a good bargain with the Scots, to give up episcopacy, and to establish that exclusive and intolerant Presbyterianism which seemed so dear not only to all his subjects north of the Tweed, but also to so large a portion of the English people. But he would never yield to this advice; and he applied again to parliament, to be heard by his commissioners, or to have himself a personal conference with them at Westminster.

This letter was presented at a most unfortunate juncture; for at that very moment the committee of both kingdoms were communicating to the two Houses all the particulars of a secret treaty between the king and the Earl of Glamorgan, and between Glamorgan and the Irish papists; and in the loud storm that then raged, the words of Charles could scarcely be heard, and his letter was thrown aside without an answer. It was found that the king had authorized Glamorgan to treat with the Catholics of Ireland, and to make them the largest promises, upon condition of their engaging to take up arms and pass over in force to the English coast. It appears, from Charles's own letters, that he never intended to keep these liberal promises—that he meant to cheat them, or make them cozen "themselves;" but it is quite certain that the promises were made in a solemn manner, and that, even without being read with the exaggerating optics of the reigning religious intolerance, they contained matter to put in jeopardy all the Protestants in Ireland, and to incense all the Protestants in England—the latter exasperated enough by the single notion of bringing an army of wild Irish into their country. Yet Charles, "on the faith of a Christian," denied to the parliament all knowledge of Glamorgan's doings; and his partisans declared, that the warrants bearing his name, which had been found in the baggage of the Catholic archbishop of Tuam, slain in a skirmish near Sligo, were mere forgeries. The king, moreover, told the two Houses that he had ordered his lord lieutenant (the Marquis of Ormond) and his privy council in Dublin to proceed against Glamorgan according to law. But Ormond had in his possession, unknown to the parliament, a copy of the warrant wherein the king engaged to make good whatever Glamorgan should promise the papists in his name; and in writing to Ormond, Charles was compelled to shift his ground, and equivocate most miserably, asserting that he did not remember any such warrant; that it was indeed possible he might have furnished the Earl of Glamorgan with some credential to the Irish Catholics; but that if he did, it could only have been with an understanding that Glamorgan was not to employ it without the approval of the lord lieutenant. This language leaves no doubt as to the nature of the transaction. And this, be it remembered, was the king's usual mode of managing business. Digby, who was in Ireland when the papers were taken, and who, as Charles's secretary, knew more of the transaction than any man, instantly saw the fatal consequences that would follow the disclosure—"fearing lest, if this discovery should grow too general among the people, all the former rumors should find credit; as, namely, that the king was author of the Irish rebellion, and sought to confirm popery; from whence a general revolt of all the Protestants might be feared." "And although," continues May, "Digby thought Glamorgan to be an unadvised man, yet he could not suppose him to be so foolish as to have undertaken such a thing as that without any warrant at all: therefore it was agreed betwixt them (Digby and Ormond), that lest, when this discovery should be grown more general, it might be too late to vindicate the king, that Digby should presently accuse Glamorgan of treason. But Ormond and Digby were both troubled with this fear (because at that time three thousand Irish were promised to go over to the relief of Chester), lest, by this unseasonable vindication of the king, Chester might be lost, for want of transportation of those forces. But when they understood that, according to Glamorgan's compact, those Irish were not to go for England, before the king had made good the conditions which Glamorgan promised, and confirmed the peace; and, while they were consulting about this perplexed business, it was told them that the Protestants of Dublin, upon that news, were in a great mutiny, and the worst was feared in a few hours, unless the danger were speedily prevented; Digby was enforced to make haste and accuse Glamorgan (who was not at all dismayed, knowing it was only to deceive the people) of high treason. Glamorgan, therefore, with great confidence and alacrity, went to prison, affirming, that he did not fear to give account at London, or before the parliament, of what he had done by the king's warrant; but it was wonderful to see what a change in the Protestants of Dublin this feigned accusation of high treason suddenly made; and that they who before murmured were now appeased."[1] Digby had made this adroit move before any public notice was taken in parliament of the papers found about the Archbishop of Tuam; but by this time the parliament had received too many lessons to be easily duped or deceived by any feint. Glamorgan, on his side, played his part with no inconsiderable skill. To give the king what he called "a starting hole," he had tacked to his secret treaty a little article termed a defeasance—an invention worthy of the genius of his master—whereby it was expressed, that, notwithstanding the text, the king should not be bound further than he thought proper, after seeing what the Catholics could and would do for him; and that Glamorgan should conceal this said defeasance or release from the king till he had done all that lay in his power to make the Catholics carry into execution all their part of the treaty. Surely these were Figaro scenes, where everybody was deceiving everybody else, or pretending so to do—where nothing was straight, nothing self-evident, except the unvarying resolution of Charles to resort to every means, and to betray or juggle every instrument or party. The lord lieutenant, Ormond, judged this defeasance to be, or to appear to be (the plain language of England becomes a riddle in describing these things!) a sufficient vindication; and as he was fearful lest the Irish, incensed by the injury and insult seemingly offered to Glamorgan, should suddenly fly to arms, he released that nobleman upon bail, after a very short confinement. And what did then the Earl of Glamorgan? He posted off at once to Kilkenny, there to renew his negotiations with the Catholics; and that, too, under the countenance and with the secret assistance of Ormond and Digby. But circumstances had shaken the reliance of the papists upon the king's word and warrants; and Rinuccini, a crafty Italian, archbishop and prince of Fermo, and pope's nuncio, who had lately landed in Ireland, made them the more suspicious of treachery, and urged them to insist upon the open recognition of the establishment of the Catholic worship. A part of the assembly at Kilkenny would have been satisfied with smaller concessions and guaranties; and, apparently through the assistance of this party, Glamorgan collected some five thousand men, whom he led to Waterford, in order to relieve Chester, where Lord Byron was reduced almost to extremities by the parliamentarians. By the time Glamorgan got to Waterford he received news of the proceedings at Westminster, and of the king's public disavowal of his authority, warrant, &c. But the earl knew what this meant: the king had already instructed him "to make no other account of such declarations than to put himself in a condition to help his master, and set him free;" and Glamorgan pressed forward his preparations for shipping the troops. A much more serious check was the unwelcome news that Chester had fallen. "For all these devices nothing availed the king: all his designs were frustrated; nor could he ever bring into England an army either of Irish rebels, Lorrainers, or Danes (God providing better for that kingdom), until at last all his forces, everywhere, were vanquished, and wholly subdued by the parliament. For, in the month of February, that very city of Chester, for which he had been so solicitous —a city so often besieged, and now long defended by Byron—came into the power of the parliament; for Byron, the governor, upon honorable terms, delivered it up to Brereton."[1] Upon this intelligence Glamorgan dispersed his army; and then the king, despairing of the Irish, thought seriously of the Scots, whose dissensions with their allies, the parliament, were now assuming to him a more promising aspect than ever.[2]

Montreuil, a French ambassador or special envoy, had now been for some time in England negotiating secretly with the Scottish commissioners in London. He had brought with him the guaranty of his court to Charles, that if the king would place himself in the hands of the Scottish army they would receive him as their natural sovereign, without violence to his conscience or his honor, protect him and his party to their utmost, and assist him with their arms in recovering his rights, he (the king) undertaking in the like manner to protect them, to respect their consciences, and so forth. As old Richelieu was dead, and as Henrietta Maria was on the best terms with the queen-regent, Anne of Austria, and her minister, Cardinal Mazarin, it should seem that Montreuil was earnest and honest in his endeavors,[3] —and hard was the work he had to go through with the intolerant Presbyterians and the obstinate king. The Scottish commissioners proposed that Charles should take the covenant; and they insisted, as a sine quá non, upon the establishment of Presbyterianism. Finding that they would not yield a line's breadth in these demands, Montreuil posted down to Oxford in the hope of inducing the king, whose situation was daily becoming more desperate, to yield the point of episcopacy. But Charles's conscience—perhaps the hopes he entertained of prevailing by means of the Independents, who at moments seemed almost ready to turn their arms alike against the Scots and their own Calvinistic countrymen—long opposed this course; and the widest concession the king would make was, that when he should be with the Scottish army he would submit to be instructed by their preachers in the doctrines of their kirk. In other matters the king was pliant enough; and it has been suggested that he intended to dupe the Scots into a belief that his conversion must be the inevitable consequence of his consenting to listen to their preachers. Montreuil then posted away to Newark, in front of which the main body of the Scots then lay. The Frenchman was presently disconcerted by the cold and firm tone of the Scottish officers and commissioners with the army, who refused to take cognizance of the proceedings of the Scottish commissioners in London, and who would yield nothing, promise nothing, except that if the king would come to them, attended only by his two nephews and his confidential servant Ashburnham, they would receive him with all honor and protect his person. Further argument on the part of the diplomatist only elicited further caution on the part of the Scots. They told Montreuil that they could not keep Prince Rupert, or Prince Maurice, or Ashburnham, if they were claimed by the English parliament—that the most they could do for them would be to give them timely notice, that they might escape.[1] Montreuil hastened to write

[2] After the fall of Chester, as Cromwell had cleared the whole of Cornwall, where the Lord Hopton made a gallant resistance, there was no longer a landing-place for Glamorgan. If that partisan had landed with his 10,000 men (such was the number he engaged to bring over in all) there must have been a short, but most sanguinary, campaign. The parliament had voted that no quarter should be given to any Irish papists found fighting in England; that they should be excluded from all capitulations, and put to death whenever taken.

[3] And yet, it should be observed, Sir Philip Warwick, who was constantly about the king, insinuates that the French diplomatists all through these troubles, and that Montreuil himself, played Charles false. "Throughout all these transactions," says Sir Philip, "the French wanted not their ambassadors, envoys, private spies, and agents among us. How well affected they were to the privileges of parliament those lords and gentlemen know whom the king would have accused and brought unto a legal trial for corresponding with the French ambassador;—how careful Prince de Harcourt was at Oxford to persuade the king to agree with his two Houses (his master being so careful of his own states), and to insinuate himself into their favor by putting slights upon the king and his ministers there, and yet willing to receive a present suitable to his quality; those that knew least of the king's affairs know this:—how the envoy, M. Montreuil, averred it in his master's name, that if the king would put himself into the hands of the Scots, he should be there safe, both in person, honor, and conscience (I know it, as having been designed to be one that should attend his majesty thither), is certain; and that this assurance fixed him upon this resolution more than any thing else, is unquestionable. But improsperity was always in confusion, and it was safest for the king to go unattended."—Memoirs. From extracts of Montreuil's letters given in Thurloe's State Papers we may gather that that special envoy had had serious disputes as to his mission with Monsieur de Sabran, the resident ambassador.

[1] In his letter of the 16th of April, which is referred to at greater length further on, Montreuil says—"They have at length consented that the two princes and Ashburnham may follow the king with such of his other servants as are not excepted from pardon, and that these three persons should remain with him till demanded by the English parliament, in which case they can not refuse to deliver them up, but they will give them opportunities to escape out of the kingdom."

to Oxford, and told Charles that the step would be too desperate—that the Scots promised absolutely nothing beyond the safety of his person; but it appears doubtful, from an expression in a subsequent dispatch, whether Charles ever received this first letter of Montreuil from the Scottish camp.[1] Charles, who always considered the Scots and Presbyterians as the cause of all his misfortunes, now thought that he would rather throw himself into the arms of a part of the English army, and rely upon their generous feelings and his own talents for intrigue and persuasion. The parliamentarians were fast gathering round Oxford, and Woodstock was not only besieged but reduced to extremities; "and at this instant the governor of Woodstock, Captain Fawcett, sent a messenger to his majesty to inform him of the necessities of that place, and to know his pleasure, whether he should expect relief or deliver it upon the best articles he could get, or perish in it, having made an honorable defense even to the greatest extremity." "This opportunity," continues Ashburnham, a principal agent in these much-disputed transactions, came seasonably to his majesty, who immediately sent to Colonel Rainsborough (then commander-in-chief at that siege) for a pass for the earls of Southampton and Lindsay, Sir William Fleetwood, and myself, to treat with him about the surrender of Woodstock, which was sent accordingly. But the instructions his majesty sent us were, not only to deliver the garrison upon the best terms we could obtain, but also to labor the army's acceptance of his majesty's person with one of these two conditions—either to wait on him to the parliament and prevail with them to receive him with honor and freedom, or that they would preserve him so in their army until they could bring the parliament to that temper. After we had ended the treaty for the garrison, the Earl of Southampton found opportunity to let himself into the other part of our business, which indeed seemed to some of the principal men there (at least so far as we could discover) a thing very agreeable to their judgments. But because they would not adventure on so great a work without the privity of their superior officers (who were that night to quarter not far from that place) they desired liberty to impart the proposition to them, with this satisfaction to us for the present—that, in the representing thereof, they would promise the proffer of that honor should lose no advantage, and, in case it should be accepted, they would send a pass to us the next day, to return and finish that work; but, if the pass came not, we should take it for granted there would be no entertainment given to that motion. At our coming back to Oxford we gave account of our proceedings to his majesty, who had in our absence received letters from Montreuil to this effect, that he found the commissioners of Scotland (residing in the army) not fully resolved to concur in their articles of agreement, which the commissioners of London had submitted for his majesty's satisfaction. The next day being spent, and no pass come from the officers at Woodstock, it is not hard to think into what sad and miserable condition the king was cast, Oxford being almost close begirt on all sides; but within some few hours more letters came from the French agent, which did import that all difficulties were reconciled, and Mr. David Leslie, then lieutenant-general, had orders to meet his majesty with 2000 horse at Gainsborough."[1] But, here, on the evidence of Montreuil's own letters, Ashburnham stands convicted of some inaccuracy and a suppression of part of the truth. In his letter of the 16th of April, the French envoy tells Secretary Nicholas that the Scottish commissioners had taken strict methods to deprive him of all means of warning the king not to leave Oxford; that he had some thoughts that things might mend, and that all his majesty desired, and that he (Montreuil) had promised him, might have been done." . . . "But," continues the ambassador, "after much delay they have at length informed me, from the committee which has been sitting all day, that they will dispatch a strong party to Burton-on-Trent to meet his majesty, but that they can go no farther, though they will send forward some straggling horse to Bosworth, which is half way from Burton to Harborough. The king must send word on what day he will expect them, and they will not fail to be there. When they meet his majesty he must say he is on his way to Scotland; in which case they will allow him to go to their army, instead of proceeding farther. I am not sure that this will be agreeable to his majesty, but they say it can not be otherwise without having a quarrel with the English parliament, and making it impossible for them to keep the king in their quarters. As to the other conditions, see to what they are reduced! They will have no junction with any forces that have served under the king, and (what is unreasonable) they will not even allow the cavalry that escorts him to accompany him to their army." Charles had had the madness to require of the Scotch commissioners that the Marquis of Montrose should be honorably employed on a diplomatic mission—Montrose! who had been the greatest scourge the Covenanters had ever known, and whose hands were yet wet with the blood of the friends and kindred of these very commissioners. "They can not allow," resumes Montreuil, in the same letter of the 16th of April, "the Marquis of Montrose to be sent as ambassador to France, but they have no objection to his going anywhere else. And, with regard to the Presbyterian government, they desire his majesty to agree with them as soon as he can! Such is the account they make here of the engagement of the king my master, and of the promises I had from their party in London; and this is the utmost I have been able to extract from them after much debating, for what they said at first was much less favorable. I shall say no more, except that his majesty, yourself, and

[1] In his letter of the 16th of April, Montreuil says—"The first person I sent to you at Oxford came back two days ago, after making his escape from those who had detained him, so that you can not have been informed of the reception they gave me here," &c.

Mr. Ashburnham know the Scotch better than I do. I state things plainly, as I am bound to do, and have not the presumption to offer any advice to his majesty. If there be any quarter where better conditions can be obtained, I think this ought not to be thought of."[1] This letter was no doubt the first to which Ashburnham alludes; but a short note, received at Oxford a few hours after it, was not more inviting. In it Montreuil informed Charles that he had made another attempt to induce the Scots to advance in force beyond Burton to meet his majesty, and had utterly failed therein. "I have pressed them," says he, "to send fresh horses to Bosworth. I have myself two horses that are tolerably good. I shall send them—one of them at least, which is quite well, and the other if sufficiently recovered."—[By this time the original idea of the king's cutting his way through the parliamentarians with part of his cavalry seems to have been abandoned as hopeless; and besides, the Scots, who had told Montreuil that they would have no junction—none of his cavalry—were determined not to embarrass themselves with any of the royalist troops. The escape of the king from Oxford was, therefore, to depend, as Montreuil thought, upon the speed of his horses and upon his having relays.]—Nor was a third letter more encouraging. In this epistle, dated the 20th of April, the last communication received at Oxford from the ambassador, and that to which Ashburnham must refer in the last paragraph we have quoted from him, Montreuil informed the king, through Secretary Nicholas, that the Scots assured him that they would do more for his majesty than they could venture to promise; but he cautioned the king not to expect much from them, or more than he should send him word. He did not, as Ashburnham states, say a word about Gainsborough, but he said that the Scottish troops had begun to defile toward Burton; and that, as it was of the greatest importance to them that the king should not fall into the hands of the English parliament, he felt convinced that they would do all they could to prevent it. There is not a syllable about a treaty, or any express bargain to maintain and defend Charles. Charles had not agreed "with regard to the Presbyterian government;" and the Scottish commissioners in all probability were aware that he had been and was, down to the very moment of his fligh from Oxford, tampering with the Independents, and promising to join them in rooting presbytery out of the kingdom. The Scottish commissioners would have sacrificed an otherwise popular sovereign upon this sole point; but Charles was any thing but popular in Scotland, where, in the parlance of the time, the blood of the slaughtered saints cried aloud for vengeance upon him. The English parliament and army might be in a frame of mind suited to magnanimity; ever since the battle of Naseby they had been marching from success to success, from one triumph to another: but in Scotland it was far otherwise; there, that interval of time had been filled almost entirely by the victories of Montrose and the reverses of the Covenanters. The civil war, too, as conducted in England, had been, all through, chivalrous and merciful as compared with the unsparing carnage of Montrose's wild Highlanders and Irish. Charles, therefore, had little to hope from the humor of the Scottish commissioners; and the characteristic wariness of those men, who had known his majesty before now, was not likely to permit their pledging themselves in a direct treaty merely upon his equivocating assurances. At the same time they were most certainly anxious to have him in their power, being on the very verge of an open rupture with the English parliament, which stood indebted to them in large sums of money, and which might well fill them with more serious apprehensions than those arising simply out of loss of cash: for Cromwell and Fairfax, and that victorious army, would presently be without any work on their hands, and ready to march, not merely to the Trent, but to the Tyne and the Tweed, if needful. And therefore the Scots, without committing themselves by any treaty or any direct promises, may (and we think it probable they did) have led Montreuil and others to believe that they were much better disposed toward the unfortunate king than in reality they were. But, again, on the other hand, the French ambassador (as ambassadors have done before and since) may have misunderstood men who communicated with him through the medium of a foreign language; and in the desperation of Charles's affairs, and in his earnestness to save the king from worse, he may have been led to judge better of the intentions of the Scots than their words warranted him to do—although, as we have seen, the best he said to the king was far from encouraging—far, indeed, from implying any bond or pledge on the part of the Scots to make the king's cause their own. The expressions of the ambassador which perhaps bear hardest on the Scots are those in his letter of the 16th of April, wherein he mentions the pains taken by the commissioners to prevent his warning the king not to leave Oxford; and from this it might fairly be inferred that "their party in London," —that is to say, the Scottish commissioners resident in the English capital with the parliament, had, as the ambassador intimates, promised him a great deal more than the other Scottish commissioners at the head-quarters of their army would keep; and that the latter, in order to favor his quitting Oxford and throwing himself among them, were anxious to leave the king in ignorance of the discrepancy between the two commissions; which mode of proceeding might be a matter of concert between them, though, on the other hand, it might possibly arise out of a real difference of opinion as to the best or safest manner of dealing with a most difficult and in every way embarrassing subject. But then, again, it must be observed that Montreuil, who afterward got three letters sent to Oxford, warned Charles of this real or seeming duplicity, and told him in express terms of the suspicious-looking precautions adopted by the commissioners with the army; and that Charles, after this knowledge, clung to the Scots with a last and desperate hope, not however, as we believe, till sundry other wild hopes had entirely failed him.

[1] Montreuil adds—"But if every thing is desperate elsewhere and no security can be obtained for his majesty and his servants from the English parliament, I am confident still, after all that has happened, that he and his servants, and he in particular, will be in perfect safety here, though with less satisfaction, perhaps, than he could desire. And I shall not fail, on my part, to press them to the performance of all I have promised to his majesty, as I should not have failed to do before the change I found here."

It is quite clear that all the narrators of these transactions labor to make out the best possible story for themselves, and not only the worst for their enemies, but a very inferior one for their friends (thus, Ashburnham says not a word about the mission of Hudson). But there was now no time to lose; and, if Charles would escape the horrors of a siege certain to end in death or captivity, he must be gone at once. His son, the Prince of Wales, after being driven to Pendennis Castle, in Cornwall, had fled for safety to Scilly, and thence to Jersey, being attended by Clarendon, Culpeper, and other members of the council. Even the brave Sir Ralph Hopton, now that he was ruined, created Lord Hopton, had been obliged to capitulate and disband his forces; and Sir Jacob Astley, who had collected some two thousand horse to cut his way to Oxford, was intercepted at Stowe by the parliamentarians, and made prisoner with many of his officers and more than half his men. "You have done your work, my masters," said Astley, "and may now go play, unless you choose to fall out among yourselves." It had always before been the fashion, and it continued to be the fashion long after, down to the time of the republican generals of France, and that wonderful man whose fortunes in many respects resembled those of Oliver Cromwell. to give over campaigning and fighting by the end of autumn, and retire into winter-quarters. Regular soldiers, foreign-trained tacticians like Essex and Dalbier, would no more have thought of campaigning in winter than the farmer would think of sowing seed at midsummer. But Cromwell and Fairfax, who were slaves to no rules, and whose souls were set on the finishing of this destructive war, disregarded the storms, and darkness, and inclemencies of the season, and fought on all the year through—and this, too, be it always remembered, with a new army. As in Bonaparte's case, the routine men said that this was not the way to manage matters; but it was a wonderfully successful way, notwithstanding. "The things," says May, "which that new army did that year, taking no rest all that sharp and bitter winter, were much to be wondered at; how many strong towns and forts they took, how many field victories they obtained, the stories of every several month will declare."[1] Wherever Cromwell showed himself resistance soon ceased; and he was now approaching, with Fairfax and the army of the west, upon Oxford, which was already surrounded by 2000 foot and 300 horse. Woodstock was surrendered to Rainsborough. Whichever way Charles looked, from tower or bastion, he saw the flag of the parliament of England floating on the breeze; and, now, wherever he turned himself within the loyal city of Oxford, he saw dejection or discontent. His very attendants treated him with sullen disrespect; and the chances are, that if he had stayed there they would, upon the arrival of Cromwell and Fairfax, have delivered him up to the parliament. Still, however, the unfortunate monarch feared and doubted the Scots; and these very doubts may be taken as proofs that Montreuil's negotiation was never so clear and settled a thing as some have represented it. Notwithstanding the entire failure of his overtures to the Independents, he addressed himself to Ireton, who was then before Oxford; "being informed," says Ashburnham, "that he was a man of great power and credit with the soldiery, and very earnestly affected to peace, he thought it fit to make some trial of him, whether he would undertake to accept and protect his majesty's person upon the former conditions; and to that purpose sent Sir Edward Ford (his brother-in-law) to sound his inclinations, with this assurance—that, if he consented, I should follow the next day with power to conclude with him in those or any new matters he should propose in order to his majesty's reception. But, by his not suffering any man to return to Oxford, his majesty found plainly that he did not relish the discourse upon that subject, and so quit the thought likewise of any more advantage by him than by the other he had tried before. By mentioning these particulars I suppose it easy for the world to judge how unwilling his majesty was to have deserted his hopes of reception by the English, having left nothing unassayed wherein there was any possibility of effecting his desires in that point, would any reason, any religion. any affection to the public have brought them to their just consideration of their duty to him, or, in the next relation, the advance of their own private interest. And now, his majesty, conceiving himself to be discharged from all obligation which by any way could be fastened upon him by his parliament, or by any authority derived from them, settled his thoughts upon his journey to the Scots army, and, in order thereunto, did acquaint some of his privy council (as he was pleased to tell me) with his intentions to leave Oxford, if they should approve of that course to be the best for his affairs and their preservation, but did not impart the truth of his design with the Scots, conceiving that most of them would have opposed with some unseasonable heat his conjunction with them; and therefore chose rather to put the design of London upon it, whither he knew (by the measure he had formerly taken of their inclinations) they would be glad (but not advise) he should adventure; which in debate fell out accordingly, they supposing (as, indeed, all wise men would have done) that, if his majesty could have got safe to London, and have personally made great offers of accommodation, trusting himself with confidence in the hands of his two Houses, they would (in relation to their own honor and interest) have accepted him with much more moderation than he could have hoped for by any discourse, under the notions and at the distance they then considered him." Thus, according to Ashburnham, Charles told his council at Oxford that he was going to smuggle himself into London, while he had fully made up his mind to go to the Scots.[1] From other accounts, however, and from the curious, wavering way in which the king proceeded, it should appear that he was not decided whither he should go, even when he had taken to the road.

On the 27th of April, Fairfax and Cromwell reached Newbury, within a day's march of Oxford: about midnight Charles got ready for his flight, submitting his beard to Ashburnham's scissors,[2] and disguising himself as that groom of the chamber's groom. Hudson, the chaplain, who had gone and come between the head-quarters of the Scots and Oxford, and who was, moreover, well acquainted with the by-roads of the country, acted as guide;[3] and between two and three o'clock in the morning the party rode out of Oxford by Magdalen-bridge, the king following Ashburnham as servants follow their masters, with a cloak strapped round his waist. At the same moment, parties like the royal one, of three individuals each, went out of Oxford by the other gates, in order to distract attention and embarrass pursuit. Charles and his two companions got through the lines of the parliamentarians, and reached Henley-upon-Thames without discovery. From Henley, instead of turning directly north toward the Scots, they proceeded to Slough: from Slough again they went to Uxbridge, and from Uxbridge to Hillingdon, a mile and a half nearer London. "Here," according to Hudson, "the king was much perplexed what course to resolve upon—London or northward." But the attitude of the parliament struck terror into his heart, and Charles was always deficient in that spirit which leads to bold and romantic resolutions; the people of London, too, had ever been the most enthusiastic of his opponents, and he probably had small faith in the reported changes of public opinion there. He accordingly rode across the country to Harrow, from whose pleasant hill his good steed might have carried him into the heart of London within an hour. But he turned off thence northward toward St. Albans. As the travelers drew near that antique town, the rapid clattering of horses' hoofs in the rear put them in fear of pursuit; but it turned out to be only a drunken man. From St. Albans they made another circuit, and by cross-roads they got to Downham, in Norfolk.[4] Here Charles lay hid for four days, awaiting the return of Hudson, who had been sent forward to the lodging of Montreuil, at Southwell, near Newark, with a little note from the king to that ambassador, desiring him to make an absolute conclusion with the Scots, and to tell them (or so says Hudson) that, if they would offer "such honorable conditions for him as should satisfy him, then he would come to them; if not, he was resolved to dispose otherwise of himself." Hudson himself continues:—"I came to Southwell next morning, and acquainted the French agent with these particulars, who, on Thursday night (30th of April), told me they would condescend to all the demands which the king and Montreuil had agreed to make to them before Montreuil came from Oxford (of which Montreuil told me the sum), but would not give any thing under their hands. I desired, to avoid mistakes, that the particulars might be set down in writing, lest I should afterward be charged with making a false relation, and so he (Montreuil) set the propositions down in writing:—1. That they should receive the king on his personal honor. 2. That they should press the king to do nothing contrary to his conscience. 3. That Mr. Ashburnham and I should be protected. 4. That, if the parliament refused, upon a message from the king, to restore the king to his rights and prerogatives, they should declare for the king, and take all the king's friends under their protection; and if the parliament did condescend to restore the king, then the Scots should be a means that not above four of them (the king's friends) should suffer banishment, and none at all death. This done, the French agent brought me word that the Scots seriously protested the performance of all these, and sent a little note to the king to accept of them, and such security as was given to him in the king's behalf."

This, be it remembered, is simply the statement of Hudson, a most enthusiastic royalist, who had thrown aside Bible and cassock for sword and breast-plate, and who delivered this confession to the parliament of England at a moment when that body was prepared to receive any evil impressions against the Scots, and when the royalists were still hoping to profit by the jealousies and dissensions existing between the English Commons and the Scottish commissioners. Charles was accustomed to call Hudson—who must have been a better trooper than parson—his "plain-dealing chaplain;" but the priest-soldier was too decided a partisan to be over-honest with the king's enemies, or to indulge in plain dealing when it was hoped that so much might be gained by a different line of conduct. But, even waiving this objection, and taking Hudson's word for all these particulars, what does his story amount to? Simply to this—that Montreuil told him such and such things, and that the Scots told him nothing. The assurance was not given under the hands of the Scottish commissioners—even according to Hudson, they absolutely refused to give any thing of the kind—but it was given, as he says, by Montreuil, who committed the particulars, or "set the propositions down in writing." But even this paper of Montreuil, so important if true, has nowhere been preserved, while great care has been taken of documents relating to this negotiation of far less consequence, but which happen to be corroborated by other state papers. A doubt, therefore, may be fairly entertained whether Montreuil ever really wrote any such paper; and in no part of his correspondence with his own court does he ever pretend to have received any such formal agreement; though he vents himself frequently in indignant complaints and bitter insinuations against the Scots. But, again, was Charles so inexperienced and single-minded a person as to pin his faith to or rely upon such a document as this which Hudson says he received from the French envoy? Does any preceding act of Charles's life, from his boyhood down to his mature manhood, authorize a belief in any such easy credulity? Clarendon, nearly always a prejudiced authority, has been quoted as proving that a formal engagement was made by Montreuil with the Scottish commissioners; but, if such an engagement had ever been made, Clarendon himself shows that Charles placed no confidence in that engagement; for he tells us that the king lurked about the country "purposely to be informed of the condition of the Marquis of Montrose, and to find some secure passage that he might get to him." If the authority of the great royalist historian is to be taken for part of a fact, assuredly it ought to be good for the whole of that fact. But that would prove more than is desired by certain writers; it would prove that, while the king was negotiating with the Scottish commissioners, he was endeavoring to escape to their sworn and most terrible foe, Montrose, who, a very few weeks before, had taxed them "with wicked atheism, barbarous tyranny, and insolent usurpation and rebellion," and who was still in arms in the mountains of Scotland, expecting reinforcements from Ireland, and watching his opportunity to renew his sanguinary warfare. The fact appears to be, that Charles diverged from the northern route and went into the eastern counties on purpose to find some vessel on that coast wherein to escape to Scotland, and that he was deterred by the risk and danger of trusting himself to that element on which the parliament of England rode triumphantly as masters. The coasts were watched by cruisers, and strange stories were told of the fierceness of the English seamen, particularly when any ships from Ireland carrying papists to Scotland fell into their hands. A frail vessel, one or two great shot, or a storm, might have terminated the career of this wretched prince, without the closing scenes at Whitehall. A man who had lived in the midst of perils, and had through many a year faced them all, and reveled in them, was appalled by somewhat similar dangers, and preferred surrendering himself to his oldest or greatest enemies; and, just as Napoleon went on board the Bellerophon, did Charles go to the Scottish camp—because he could go nowhere else—because every other possible way of proceeding seemed infinitely more dangerous.

[1] So completely had Charles deceived his friends at Oxford as to his journey, that, the day after his departure, his kinsman, the Duke of Richmond, with four other noblemen, came into Fairfax's quarters with the hope that they might be permitted to attend their sovereign.

Hudson, continuing his report, says, "I came to the king on Tuesday, and related all, and he resolved next morning to go to them; and so upon Tuesday morning we all came to Southwell to Montreuil's lodgings,[1] where some of the Scots commissioners came to the king, and desired him to march to Kelham for security, whither we went after dinner." This happened on the 5th of May. "Many lords," says Ashburnham, "came instantly to wait on his majesty, with professions of joy to find that he had so far honored their army as to think it worthy his presence after so long an opposition. Some of them desiring to know wherein they might best express their gratitude for the great confidence he had in them, his majesty replied that he should be well satisfied, for the hazards he had run to get to them, if they would cheerfully apply themselves to perform the conditions upon which he came unto them. The Lord Lothian (as his majesty was pleased to inform me) seemed to be surprised with the word conditions, and affirmed that he had never been privy to any thing of that nature, nor did he believe that any of the commissioners residing in the army had any more knowledge of that treaty than himself. Whereupon his majesty desired the French agent to sum up his instructions from the crown of France, and to make a narrative of his negotiations thereupon with the Scots commissioners residing in London;[1] which when he had done, some of the lords did assure his majesty that they were altogether ignorant of those particulars, and that therefore the treaty being with their commissioners in London, and they being a distinct body of themselves could not be responsible, or any way concerned therein. His majesty then demanded how he came to be invited thither, and what reason they had to send him word that all differences were reconciled, and that David Leslie was to have met him with a party of horse. They answered that it was very true, for they approved well of his majesty's confidence in them, believing that the end of his honoring their army with his residence was only to have made that the place where he intended to settle a peace with his two kingdoms; in short, such was the indisposition of the Earl of Lothian toward his majesty as he (being president of that council and of good credit among them) would never suffer any discourse to be made to his majesty, other than the taking of the covenant, and subscribing all the nineteen propositions for the satisfaction of both

[1] "After nine days' travel upon the way, and in that time having passed through fourteen guards and garrisons of the enemies, we arrived safe at the Scots army before Newark; where, being come, his majesty thought the most proper place for his reception by the general and Scots commissioners would be the house of the French agent, that all circumstances belonging to the treaty between his majesty, the crown of France, and the kingdom of Scotland, might be adjusted."—Ashburnham's Narrative. Clarendon says, "It was very early in the morning when the king went to the general's lodging, and discovered himself to him; who either was, or seemed to be, exceedingly surprised and confounded at his majesty's presence; and knew not what to say; but presently gave notice of it to the committee, who were no less perplexed."—Hist. Sir Philip Warwick says, "The Scots seemed surprised at his coming among them, and used him very coarsely, but yet with some show of civility; and, though Montreuil avers as before, yet the king complained they had kept none of those terms he was promised. For, though he was seemingly free, yet his person was under a guard; and for his honor this guard was not given him; because they permitted not the magistrates to do their duty to him in those places he passed through; nor did they as much as admit his own necessary servants about him: and for his conscience, they that pretended to fight for their own denied liberty to his; he being not to be hearkened unto in any proposition for peace upon less terms than the covenant."—Memoirs.

[1] Narrative. There is, however, most abundant proof to show what we have already stated—that the Scottish commissioners had all along insisted on the king's conformity to Presbyterianism, and his consent to the establishment of the Kirk of Scotland in England.

kingdoms; things that, as they were most distant from his majesty's resolution, being most reverse to his conscience and honor, so they were most unexpected from persons so highly favored by the great adventures he had undergone for them." On this point, as on others more important to the character of the groom of the chambers, there are several discrepancies between the account given by Ashburnham and the narrative of Clarendon. The latter goes on to say, "The great care in the (Scottish) army was, that there might be only respect and good manners showed toward the king, without any thing of affection or dependence; and therefore the general never asked the word of him, or any orders, nor willingly suffered the officers of the army to resort to, or to have any discourse with, his majesty." And once, it appears, when the king ventured to give the word to the guard, old Leslie, or Leven, interrupted him, saying, "I am the older soldier, Sir; your majesty had better leave that office to me." Clarendon says that Montreuil was ill looked upon by the Scots "as the man who had brought this inconvenience upon them without their consent;" but that the envoy "was not frighted from owning and declaring what had passed between them, what they had promised, and what they were engaged to do." But, if so, surely Montreuil would have stated all this to his court, which he never did.[1]

In the mean time the king's motions were kept so secret that none could guess whither he was gone; but it was generally reported that he was gone for London; and Fairfax, who had now drawn up his army before Oxford, sent notice to that effect to the two Houses, who, on Monday, May the 4th, only the day before Charles reached the Scottish camp, caused an order to be published by beat of drum and sound of trumpet, throughout London and Westminster, to this effect:—"That it be, and is hereby declared by the Lords and Commons in parliament assembled, that what person soever shall harbor and conceal, or know of the harboring or concealing of, the king's person, and shall not reveal it immediately to the speakers of both Houses, shall be proceeded against as a traitor to the commonwealth, forfeit his whole estate, and die without mercy." And on the same day the Houses passed an ordinance, that all papists whatsoever, all officers and soldiers of fortune, and other persons that had borne arms against the parliament, should, by the 12th day of May, depart and remove themselves twenty miles at the least from the capital and the lines of communication, giving previous notice in writing to the committee of parliament sitting at Goldsmiths' Hall of the places to which they intended to resort. Two days after this—that is, on the 6th of May—the two Houses received intelligence of the king's being in the Scots' army, by means of letters from Colonel Poyntz, and from their commissioners before Newark.[2] The Commons hereupon voted:—"1. That the commissioners and general of the Scots army be desired that his majesty's person be disposed of as both Houses shall desire and direct. 2. That his majesty be thence disposed of and sent to Warwick Castle. 3. That Mr. Ashburnham and the rest of those that came with the king into the Scots' quarters should be sent for as delinquents by the sergeant-at-arms attending the said House, or his deputy; and that the commissioners for the parliament of England residing before Newark should acquaint the Scots' general with these votes, and also make a narrative of the manner of the king's coming into the Scots' army, and present it to the House." While the Houses were thus voting, old Leslie and the Scottish commissioners were employed in writing the following letter:—"The earnest desire which we have to keep a right understanding between the two kingdoms moves us to acquaint you with that strange providence wherewith we are now surprised, together with our carriage and desires thereupon. The king came into our army yesterday in so private a way, that after we had made search for him, upon the surmises of some persons who pretended to know his face, yet we could not find him out in sundry houses. And we believe your lordships will think it was matter of much astonishment to us, seeing we did not expect he would have come in any place under our power. We conceived it not fit to inquire into the causes that persuaded him to come hither, but to endeavor that his being here might be improved to the best advantage, for promoting the work of uniformity, for settling of religion and righteousness, and attaining of peace according to the league and covenant and treaty, by the advice of the parliaments of both kingdoms, or their commissioners authorized for that effect. Trusting to our integrity, we do persuade ourselves that none will so far misconstrue us as that we intended to make use of this seeming advantage for promoting any other ends than are expressed in the covenant, and have been hitherto pursued by us with no less conscience than care. And yet, for further satisfaction, we do ingenuously declare that there hath been no treaty nor capitulation betwixt his majesty and us, nor any in our names, and that we leave the ways and means of peace unto the power and wisdom of the parliaments of both kingdoms. And so far as concerns us, as we have a witness in Heaven, we are confident to make it appear to the world that there is nothing more in our desires than, in all our resolutions and proceedings, to adhere to the covenant and treaty. Our gravest thoughts shall be taken up in studying, and our utmost abilities employed in acting, those things that may best advance the public good and common happiness of both kingdoms; wherein, by the help of the Most High, we shall labor to use so much tenderness and care, that we hope it shall soon appear that our actions have been the issue and result of honest and single intentions. And further, we can not (in a matter of so deep consequence and common interest) but seek your lordships' advice; for which effect we have also written to the Committee of Estates of Scotland, with intentions to move by your joint counsels and resolutions; that we, at last, after a seed-time of many afflictions, may reap the sweet fruits of truth and peace. And in this confidence we remain, &c."[1]

On the same day on which this letter was written, Charles ordered the Lord Bellasis, the new governor of Newark, to surrender that important place; and, also on the same day, Newark, with the castle, forts, and sconces thereunto belonging, was surrendered to the committee of both kingdoms, for the use of the parliament of England. Charles had offered to surrender the place to the Scots, which would have made a fresh garboil, but Leven told him, that, to remove all jealousies, it must be yielded to the parliament of England. Clarendon says, that Charles's readiness on this occasion proceeded from his fear that Fairfax might be ordered to relinquish all other enterprises, "and to bring himself near the Scottish army, they being too near together already;" and that, "therefore he forthwith gave order to the Lord Bellasis to surrender Newark; that the Scots might march northward, which they resolved to do; and he giving up that place, which he could have defended for some months longer from that enemy, upon honorable conditions, that army with great expedition marched toward Newcastle; which the king was glad of." It is said indeed, that the English Commons at one moment entertained the notion of throwing forward Oliver Cromwell with the entire mass of their cavalry, in order to fall upon the Scots by surprise, and to take the king away from them by force; but in effect they only detached Poyntz, who, with a party of horse and dragoons, followed the Scots, and watched them on their march northward from the Trent. Soon after their rising from Newark, the Scottish commissioners sent to the parliament's commissioners, to desire a meeting with them on the 11th of May, in order to give them an account of their "so sudden departure," and their reasons for not delivering up Ashburnham and Hudson. But the meeting did not take place; and Ashburnham, about nine days after the king's departure from Newark,[2] when, as he says, there were disputes in the council of the Scottish army about disposing of him according to the desires of the parliament, was commanded by his majesty to make his escape with all the speed he could. "I besought him," continues Ashburnham, "that he would rather suffer me to be wrested from him, than that of myself I should desert his service upon any apprehension whatsoever; but his pleasure was so positive, that I should lose no time, as I had nothing left but my obedience to satisfy him, so that, his foreign dispatches being closed, I did (with humble acknowledgments to God for the deliverance he then gave me) pass into Holland, my servants, horses, and all I had, being seized upon within two hours after my flight; where being arrived, and having obeyed such instructions as I was intrusted with, I hastened into France, to give the queen an account of what had passed in that unhappy expedition to the Scots."[1] It has been assumed that the Scots connived at the flight of Ashburnham; but he himself only tells us that he did escape, without saying any thing of this connivance. It should appear, indeed, that the Scots, in their great respect to the royal quality, did not guard even the king very closely; for we have Charles's own word, that he too might have got off if he had thought proper. Yet Hudson, when endeavoring to escape, was intercepted, and for the present secured in Newcastle; and, according to their own account, upon the very first notice they had of Ashburnham's flight, they tried to apprehend him also. Newcastle was now the seat of the war, for "wars are not only carried on by swords and guns, but tongues and pens are coinstrumental; which, as they had been too much employed formerly, were not idle now."[2] The king sounded some of the officers of the Scottish army, and offered David Leslie, the general of the horse, the title of Earl of Orkney, if he would consent to espouse his cause and unite with Montrose; but this project, considering the temper of that covenanting soldiery, must always have been a hopeless one, and it came to nothing, though Charles appears to have flattered himself that, by uniting the Scottish army in England and the marquis's Highlanders and Irish, and by profiting by the dissentions between the Presbyterians and Independents, he might still subdue his parliament. The committee of estates at Edinburgh, the champions of covenant, dispatched Lanark, London, and Argyle to Newcastle, to look after both the king and the army; and these noblemen, after telling Charles in the plainest manner that he must take the covenant, or expect no important service from them—that he must not imagine that they would temporize with this great measure, or be put off with promises—required of him, in the first instance, to do all that in him lay to put an end to the civil war in Scotland by ceasing all connection or correspondence with Montrose. And at their instance he

[1] Rushworth. This letter is dated "Southwell, May the 6th, 1646," and signed "Leven, Dumfermling, Lothian, Belcarris, S. D., Hume, Sir Th. Carre, R. of Freeland, W. Glendowyn, John Johnston."

[2] Ashburnham says, about nine days after the king's arrival at Newcastle, but this must be incorrect, as Charles certainly did not leave Newark until the 7th or 8th of May, nor arrive at Newcastle until the 13th; and Ashburnham certainly left Newcastle on the 16th, on which day the king himself wrote to Sir Edward Nicholas,—"Jack Ashburnham is this day gone for France." Nearly all the royalist writers of histories and memoirs wrote after the event from memory, and many of them, not excepting the great Clarendon, must have had very bad memories for dates.

[1] Among the dispatches, of which Ashburnham was the bearer, was the following letter to the queen:—

"Dear Heart, Newcastle, May 15th, 1646.

"The necessity of my affairs hath made me send Jack Ashburnham unto thee; who at this present is the most (and with the greatest injustice) persecuted of all my servants, and merely for his fidelity to me; which is so well known to thee, that I need neither recommend him to thy care, nor take the pains of setting down the present state of my affairs, and how they have changed since I came from Oxford, and why it is so long since I wrote to thee: referring all to his faithful relation; as likewise what I desire thee to do for my assistance; so transferring at this time the freedom of my pen to his tongue, I rest eternally thine, C. R."

"I owe Jack £9,200, which I earnestly recommend thou would'st assist him in for his repayment."

Jack Ashburnham was also the bearer of a warrant, in cipher, to raise money upon such of the crown jewels as he had in his custody, or by a surcharge upon those already pawned. For other particulars see the curious volumes published by the late Lord Ashburnham.

sent a positive order to the hero of Kilsyth to disband his forces and retire to France; which order was obeyed the more willingly as Montrose's name had lost its charm, and as help from Ireland was not to be expected.

About the same time, the king sent a very soft message to the two Houses, stating that, "being informed that their armies were marching so fast up to Oxford as made that no fit place for treating, he did resolve to withdraw himself hither, only to secure his own person, and with no intention to continue this war any longer, or make any division between his two kingdoms, but to give such contentment to both, as by the blessing of God he might see a happy and well-grounded peace. And," continued this practiced dissembler, who now spoke as if he had made up his mind to give up the question of episcopacy, "since the settling of religion ought to be the chiefest care, his majesty most earnestly and heartily recommends to his two Houses of Parliament all the ways and means possible for speedy finishing this pious and necessary work; and particularly that they take the advice of the divines of both kingdoms assembled at Westminster." As for this militia of England, his majesty was well pleased to have it settled as was offered in the treaty at Uxbridge—"all the persons being to be named for that trust by the two Houses of Parliament, for the space of seven years; and after the expiration of that term, that it be regulated as shall be agreed upon by his majesty and his two Houses of Parliament; and the like to be for the kingdom of Scotland." Concerning the wars in Ireland, his majesty engaged to do whatever was possible to give full satisfaction. And if these assurances were not satisfactory, parliament was requested to send all such of the propositions as were already agreed upon by both kingdoms speedily to his majesty, he "being resolved to comply with his parliament in every thing that should be for the happiness of his subjects, and for the removing of all unhappy differences, which have produced so many sad effects." His majesty, it was said in conclusion, would neither question the parliament's thankful acceptance of these offers, nor doubt that his two kingdoms would be careful to maintain him in his honor, and in his just and lawful rights. But the most important part of this message was in a postscript, apparently added under the persuasion, or it may be dictation, of the Earl of Lanark, and the Scottish commissioners. It ran in these words:—"His majesty being desirous to shun the further effusion of blood, and to evidence his real intentions to peace, is willing that his forces in and about Oxford be disbanded, and the fortifications of the city dismantled, they receiving honorable conditions; which being granted to the town and forces there, his majesty will give the like order to the rest of the garrisons."[1] About three weeks later, on the 10th of June, he sent another message to the two Houses, expressing at greater length his earnest desire for the ending of this unnatural war, which in fact was ended by his thorough defeat, for as long as he had any chance of carrying it on, he was far indeed from entertaining any such horror at the effusion of blood. He told them, that in the Scottish army, where he was, he was "in freedom and right capacity to settle a true and lasting peace," and he again earnestly desired that their propositions should be speedily sent to him. He then "further propounded," that he might come to London with safety, freedom, and honor, where he resolved to comply with his Houses of Parliament in every thing which might be most for the good of his subjects. And on the same day he signed a warrant to Sir Thomas Glenham, Sir Thomas Tildesley, Colonel H. Washington, Colonel Thomas Blagge, governors of Oxford, Lichfield, Worcester, and Wallingford, and all other commanders of any towns, castles, and forts in the kingdom of England, commanding them, upon honorable terms, to surrender the towns, castles, and forts intrusted to them, and disband all the forces under their several commands, the more to evidence the reality of his intention of settling a happy and firm peace. Most of these few places, however, had surrendered some weeks before his majesty signed this paper. Banbury, which had been in possession of the royalists from the beginning of the war, opened its gates on the 6th of May, and even Oxford[1] proposed to treat as early as the 17th of May, which was one day before the king's first message to parliament. Parliament, however, considered the terms demanded as much too high, and ordered Fairfax to prosecute the siege, and the place did not surrender until the 24th of June, when very liberal terms were granted to the garrison, to the colleges, and to all persons within the walls of Oxford. Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice received their passports and took shipping at Dover. Charles's second son, the young Duke of York, was brought up from Oxford to St. James's palace. Worcester surrendered on the 23d of July: Wallingford opened its gates on the same day.

Ragland Castle was stoutly defended by the very loyal Marquis of Worcester, who, like many others, considered that the king was under restraint, and that it was his duty to disobey the royal orders for surrender. Moreover, he took exception to his

[1] On the following day Charles addressed a very friendly letter to his "right trusty and well-beloved," the lord mayor, alderman, and common council of the city of London, telling them, that nothing was more grievous to him than the trouble and distractions of his people; and that nothing on earth was more desired by him than that they might henceforth live under him in religion and peace in all godliness and honesty. "And this profession," continued Charles, "we make for no other end but that you may know immediately from ourselves our integrity and full resolution to comply with our parliament in every thing for settling truth and peace, and our desire to have all things speedily concluded which shall be found requisite for that end, that our return to that our ancient city may be to the satisfaction of our parliament, the good liking of you and all our good people, and to our own greater joy and comfort." He thus hoped to persuade the Londoners that his whole soul and nature was changed from what it had been.

[1] This seat of learning had been made a very formidable place of arms. "Here Art herself had contributed her utmost assistance to make the place impregnable; it being encompassed with regular fortifications, furnished with a strong garrison of stout soldiers, stored with abundance of all kinds of provisions, and (which is more than all the rest) governed by one that had given sufficient proof of his valor and faithfulness formerly, in holding out two other garrisons (Carlisle and York) to the utmost extremity; but all this avails not, Oxford must yield."—The Perfect Politician.

majesty's warrant, because it did not name him or his castle.[1] "Truly, sir," wrote the old marquis to Colonel Morgan, who had summoned him, "it is not in the power of man to make me think so unworthily of his majesty, that to one, in the opinion of the world, that hath given himself and family, so great a testimony of his and their faith and fidelity toward him, that he would not please so much as to name his name or Ragland. I entreat you give me leave to suspend my belief. And for your summons, it makes it too evident that it is desired that I should die under a hedge like a beggar, having no house left to put my head into, nor means left to find me bread. Wherefore I make choice, if it so please God, rather to die nobly than to live with infamy." Early in August Fairfax went himself with large reinforcements to reduce this very strong, magnificent, and very important castle; and on the 7th of that month he summoned the old marquis once more. Worcester told him that this was the only house he now had to cover his head. "I desire," said he, "leave to send to his majesty to know his pleasure what he will have done with his garrison. As for my house, I presume he will command nothing; neither am I knowing how, either by law or conscience, I should be forced out of it." Fairfax kindly and courteously told the old nobleman that, touching his sending to his majesty, it was a thing which had been denied to the most considerable garrisons of England, further than an account upon the surrender that for the distinction which his lordship was pleased to make, that Ragland was his house, if it had not been formed into a garrison, he (Fairfax) would never have troubled his lordship with a summons; and that were it disgarrisoned, neither his lordship nor his house should receive any disquiet from him or any that belonged to him. To this letter Worcester replied in a tone in which self-interest (excusable in that extremity, was mingled with loyalty, and in which a very just appreciation of Charles's character may be detected. The marquis told Fairfax —and he might as well say as much of that truly honorable and kind-hearted man—that he confided greatly in his honor; "but," continued the old man, "only one thing which is extraordinary, I offer to your consideration, as the just cause, besides my allegiance, of my reasonable request; which is, that upon his majesty's promise of satisfaction, I am above £20,000 out of purse; and if I should do any thing displeasing unto him, I am sure all that is lost and no benefit to the parliament."[2] At last, on the 19th of August, Ragland was surrendered, and there marched out of the castle the marquis, who was above fourscore years of age, the Lord Charles, his son, the Countess of Glamorgan, the Lady Jones, four colonels, eighty-two captains, above eighty other officers and gentlemen, and above seven hundred soldiers, who had been placed there by the king. As in all other cases where Fairfax was concerned, the terms of capitulation were most honorably observed. Pendennis Castle surrendered three day before Ragland. In the same month the town of Conway, in North Wales, was taken by storm—an event which merits attention were it only for the reappearnce on the scene, in a very different character, of old Williams, the diocese within himself, the ex-lord keeper, bishop of Lincoln, and now archbishop of York, who had quitted the king's party in the preceding month of April, apparently at the very moment when Charles had hopelessly fled to the Scots. This prelate, old as he was, and priest as he was, would not be neutral, but forthwith declared himself for the parliament, the winning party, and, betaking himself to his house at Purin, near Conway, he put a garrison therein for the parliament, and persuaded the county not to pay contribution any longer to Conway. This greatly incensed that garrison; and the Lord Byron, upon notice of the archbishop's revolt, sent out a party from Conway to besiege him in his house. Hereupon Williams sent for assistance to Colonel Mitton, who was serving in those parts for the parliament, and who presently detached a party to interpose and help him. Soon after, when Colonel Mitton laid siege to Conway, his grace the archbishop assisted at a council of war, wherein it was resolved to storm the town, which was accordingly done, but not without deaths and wounds, the most reverend father himself, who "became active on that side in person," being among the wounded. A few days after the storming of the town, the strong castle of Conway surrendered, as did also Flint Castle, and all other places in Wales. "So that now there was not one garrison in England or Wales remaining, but what was reduced to the power of the two Houses, save only those in the north, which remained in the hands of the Scots."

Meanwhile the Scots at Newcastle were laboring hard to make the king take the covenant. Charles thought that he might take it with a mental reservation, but having some scruples, or wishing for the countenance of a leading churchman, he wrote a letter, or, as it is described, "sent a case of conscience," to Dr. Juxon, bishop of London:—"My lord," wrote the king, "my knowledge of your worth and learning, and particularly in resolving cases of conscience, makes me at this time, I confess, put to you a hard and bold task, nor would I do it, but that I am confident you know not what fear is in a good cause. Yet I hope you believe that I shall be loth to expose you to a needless danger, assuring you that I will yield to none of your

[1] And, in fact, Charles himself had just written to his wife that he was in durance in the hands of the barbarous and perfidious Scots, and that she, his son, and all his faithful counselors, were to regard every order from him as forced or surreptitious.

[2] There is something very touching in this passage of the octogenarian's letter. "If you know how well known I was in Henry Earl of Huntington's time unto your noble grandfather at York, I am assured I should receive that favor at your hands that safely you might afford. God knows, if I might quietly receive any means of subsistence and be in security, with the parliament's approbation, and freed from the malice of those gentleman that are of the committee within this county, I should quickly quit myself of the garrison; for I have no great cause to take delight in it. I have that high esteem of your worth, nobleness, and true judgment, that, knowing you will offer nothing ignoble or unworthy for me to do, as the case stands with me, I desire to know what conditions I may have, and I will return you present answer."

friends in my care of your preservation. I need not tell you the many persuasions and threatenings that hath been used to me for making me change episcopal into presbyterial government, which absolutely to do is so directly against my conscience, that, by the grace of God, no misery shall ever make me; but I hold myself obliged, by all honest means, to eschew the mischief of this too visible storm, and I think some kind of compliance with the iniquity of the times may be fit as my case is, which at another time were unlawful. These are the grounds that have made me think of this inclosed proposition, the which as one way it looks handsome to us, so in another I am fearful lest I can not make it with a safe conscience; of which I command you to give me your opinion upon your allegiance; conjuring you, that you will deal plainly and freely with me, as you will answer it at the dreadful day of judgment. I conceive the question to be, whether I may, with a safe conscience, give way to this proposed temporary compliance, with a resolution to recover and maintain that doctrine and discipline wherein I have been bred. The duty of my oath is herein chiefly to be considered; I flattering myself that this way I better comply with it, than being constant with a flat denial, considering how unable I am by force to obtain that which this way there wants not probability to recover, if accepted (otherwise there is no harm done); for, my regal authority once settled, I make no question of recovering episcopal government, and God is my witness my chiefest end in regaining my power is to do the church service. So, expecting your reasons to strengthen your opinion, whatsoever it be, I rest

"Your most, assured, real,
"Faithful, constant friend,
"Charles R.

"P.S.—I desire your opinion in the particulars, as well as in the general scope of it; and yet mend much in the penning of it. I give you leave to take the assistance of the Bishop of Salisbury and Dr. Sheldon, and either of them. But let me have your answer with all convenient speed. None knows of this but Will Murray, who promises exact secrecy. If your opinions and reasons shall confirm me in making of this proposition, then you may in some way be seen in it, otherwise I promise you that your opinion shall be concealed."[1]

It has been judged, from the fact of Charles's not pursuing the line of conduct so ingeniously hinted at, and also from the honest, straightforward character of Juxon, that the bishop's answer, which has not been preserved, was frank and honest, like that which he had given when consulted about the execution of the Earl of Strafford. The king, however, could not decline fulfilling the promise which he had made the Scots through Montreuil, to listen to the arguments of their Presbyterian divines; and Alexander Henderson, the most celebrated of them, was sent for, it is said, at Charles's express desire.[1] The learned theologian chanced to fall sick and die during these disputations, at Newcastle; and the royalists, availing themselves of the circumstance, declared that he had been beaten in argument by the king, and had died of grief and vexation.[2]

But while Charles was pretending to give ear to the Presbyterian teachers, and to have made up his mind to cease all projects of hostility, and agree with every desire of the victorious parliament, he was corresponding with the papists in Ireland, and devising the most desperate if not the most ridiculous plans for resuming hostilities. On the 20th of July he wrote to Glamorgan, expressing a wonderful affection for that nobleman's person and conversation, and telling him that he was not so strictly guarded but that, if he sent a prudent and secret person to Newcastle, he could communicate with him. "If," continued the king, "you could raise a large sum of money by pawning my kingdoms, I am content you should do it; and if I recover them, I will fully repay that money. And tell the nuncio that if once I can come into his and your hands, which ought to be extremely wished for by you both, as well for the sake of England as Ireland, since all the rest, as I see, despise me, I will do it. And if I do not say this from my heart, or in any future time if I fail you in this, may God never restore me to my kingdoms in this world, nor give me eternal happiness in the next."[3] A copy of this letter was transmitted to the pope, who, it is said, "received great comfort from the reading of it, but at the same time shed tears of compassion for the king's circumstances." And Glamorgan, with the advice of Rinuccini, the pope's nuncio in Ireland, drew up in writing urgent reasons for inviting the king into Ireland. At the same moment Henrietta Maria proposed transporting herself to that country; and when her husband would not hear of this hazardous project, she endeavored to make him avow all the secret articles concluded with Glamorgan in favor of the Catholics, upon which avowal she maintained that the pope would subsidize an Irish army, and the Irish papists rise to a man in his favor.

[1] Sir Henry Ellis

[1] On the 16th of May, Baillie writes to Alexander Henderson:—"If that man go now to stickle on bishops and delinquents, and such foolish toys, it seems he is mad; if he have the least grace or wisdom, he may, by God's mercy, presently end the miseries wherein himself and many are likely also to sink. Let me entreat you for one thing, when you have done your uttermost, if it be God's pleasure to deny the success, not to vex yourself more than is meet; si immundus vult vadere, &c. When we hear of your health and courage it will refresh us. Go matters as they will, if men will not be saved, who can help it? And yet you know that I was never among those who had greatest aversion from his person, or least sympathy with his afflictions: if he be resolved to stop our mouths, and bind our hands, that we can neither speak nor do for him, let him go on so to make himself and us miserable; there is a better life coming; but wo to those villains who have bewitched, poisoned, and infatuated a good prince, for his own and so many millions' ruin; we are in a fair way, and daily advance into it, if his obstinacy spoil not all the play."

[2] A paper was even published in London, pretending to be a death-bed declaration of Henderson, in which he was made to recant his former opinions, and to express great remorse for the share he had taken in the war; and which the general assembly thought it necessary, by an act passed on the 7th of August, 1648, formally to denounce as forged, scandalous, and false. Although the controversy respecting the genuineness of this paper was renewed so lately as the middle of the last century, no doubt as to its being a forgery is now entertained in any quarter.

[3] Birch, Inquiry.

Mazarin led her majesty to believe that he would land 10,000 Frenchmen in England to coöperate with the Irish Catholics; and it appears that the cardinal really engaged with Lord Jermyn to seize upon Jersey and Guernsey, two islands which geographically belonged to France, and which it would have suited the French to recover. We can not possibly mention half the wild schemes that were entertained at Newcastle and at Paris, between the going of Charles to the Scots' quarters and his delivery over to the English; but one of the most striking of them was, that Montrose, whom the king had ordered to lay down his arms, should be recalled to head a fresh insurrection in the Highlands, and take the command of fresh hordes from Ireland.

On the 23d of July the final propositions of parliament were presented to Charles at Newcastle by the Earl of Pembroke, the Earl of Denbigh, and the Lord Montague of the peers, and six members of the House of Commons, the commissioners of the parliament of Scotland being present and consenting to them. "The Lords and Commons, commissioners of the parliament of England," says May, "stayed long with the king at Newcastle, humbly entreating him that he would vouchsafe to sign and establish those propositions, being not much higher than those which had been offered to his majesty at Uxbridge, when the chance of war was yet doubtful. The same thing did the commissioners of the parliament in Scotland humbly entreat; and the like did others daily, who came with renewed supplications to that end, from the parliament sitting at Edinburgh. But in vain were the supplications of both kingdoms; the king persisted obstinately in denial of his assent. But daily he seemed to take exception at some particulars, whereby time was delayed for some months, and the affairs of both kingdoms much retarded, which happened at an unseasonable time, when not only dissensions between the two nations about garrisons, money, and other things, were justly feared, but also, in the parliament of England and city of London, the divisions were then increasing between the two factions of the Presbyterians and the Independents, from whence the common enemy began to swell with hopes not improbable. And this, perchance, was the cause of the king's delay."[1]

Many men that did not love the king personally, but that loved monarchy, implored him to accept the propositions as the only means of saving the throne. Others used prayers, mingled with threats. The earls of Arygle and Loudon besought him on their knees, but all in vain. Then Loudon, now chancellor of Scotland, told him that his assent to the propositions was indispensable for the preservation of his crown and kingdoms—that the danger and loss of a refusal would be remediless, and bring on a sudden ruin and destruction. The noble Scot continued with increasing energy—"The differences betwixt your majesty and parliament (known to no man better than yourself) are at this time so high that (after so many bloody battles) no composure can be made, nor a more certain ruin avoided, without a present pacification. The parliament are in possession of your navy, of all the towns, castles, and forts of England; they enjoy, besides, sequestrations and your revenue. Soldiers and moneys are raised by their authority, and, after so many victories and successes, they have a standing strong army, who, for their strength, are able to act any thing in church or commonwealth at their own pleasure. Besides, there are some so fearful, others so unwilling, to submit to your majesty, that they desire neither yourself nor any of your issue to reign over them. The people, weary of war, and groaning under taxes, though they desire peace, yet are so much against the pulling down of monarchy (under which they have long flourished) that they which are weary of your government dare not go about to throw it off until they have (once at least) offered propositions of peace to your majesty, lest the vulgar (without whose concurrence they can not perfect the work) should fall from them. Therefore, when the whole people, weary of war, desire security from pressures and arbitrary rule, the most honorable Houses of Parliament have consented to offer these propositions to your majesty, without which the greater part of the people do suppose the kingdom can neither enjoy peace nor safety. Therefore your majesty's friends and the commissioners of Scotland, though not without some reluctance, were forced to consent to the sending of these propositions (for else none had been sent), or else incur the public hatred as enemies to peace. Now, Sir, if your majesty (which God forbid) should deny to sign these propositions, you would lose all your friends, both in city and country, and all England, as one man, would rise up against you; and it may then be feared (all hope of reconciliation being taken away) that they may cite you, depose you, and set up another government. Moreover, they will require of us to deliver your majesty to them, to restore their garrison towns, and carry our army out of England. Lastly, if your majesty persists in denying, both kingdoms will be compelled to agree together for their mutual safety, to settle religion and peace without you, which (to our unspeakable grief) would ruin your majesty and your posterity. But if your majesty shall despise the counsel of us (who wish nothing more upon earth than the establishment of your majesty's throne), and, by obstinacy, lose England, your majesty will not be suffered to enter Scotland and ruin that.[1] Sir, we have laid our hands upon our hearts—we have prayed to God to direct us—and have seriously considered of the remedy for these mischiefs; but we can find nothing else (as the case now stands) which can preserve your crown and kingdoms than that your majesty should sign these propositions."[1] But Charles would not sign, and he was as deaf to the gentler representations of others as to the rough eloquence of Loudon.

[1] Brev. Hist. Parl.

[1] As far back as the month of May, Robert Baillie had written from London to Alexander Henderson at Newcastle—"If God help you to make him quickly to do his duty, this people seem ready to welcome him; but if he shall remain obstinate, or delay much time, it is very like all his people will join against him and all who will take his part. This delay of a declaration from him and us increase jealousies and clamors. The great God help you to soften that man's heart, lest he ruin himself and us with him. Be assured he must either yield to reason, and altogether change his principles, or else he will fall in tragic miseries, and that without the commiseration of those who hitherto have commiserated his condition."

On the same day that the commissioners from parliament arrived at Newcastle, there came to the same place M. de Bellièvre, a new ambassador from France, who implored the king to accept the propositions, and presented to him fresh letters from the queen, who repeated her arguments and her prayers to the same effect. Bellièvre, seeing that his representations were but too little heeded, "by an express, quickly informed the cardinal (Mazarin) that the king was too reserved in giving the parliament satisfaction, and therefore wished that somebody might be sent over who was like to have so much credit with his majesty as to persuade him to what was necessary for his service. Upon which. the queen, who was never advised by those who either understood or valued the king's true interest, consulted with those about her, and sent Sir William Davenant, an honest man and a witty, but in all respects inferior to such a trust, with a letter of credit to the king, . . . having likewise other ways declared her opinion to his majesty that he should part with the church for his peace and security."[2] This was Davenant the poet, who, according to Clarendon, was personally well known to the king, but under another character than was like to give him much credit in this argument about religion. The poor poet, the better to induce Charles to yield the matter of episcopacy, the great bar to all negotiation, ventured to say that it was the advice and opinion of all his majesty's friends that he should do so. "What friends?" inquired Charles. "My Lord Jermyn," replied Davenant. "Jermyn does not understand any thing about the church," objected the king. "The Lord Culpeper is of the same mind," rejoined the poet. "Culpeper hath no religion," replied Charles. And then, according to Clarendon, who never omits to laud his own orthodoxy, he inquired whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer (that is, Clarendon himself) was of that mind?—and Davenant told his majesty that he did not know, for that Clarendon was not at Paris. The poet then offering some reasons of his own, in which he mentioned the church slightingly, Charles was transported with indignation, and drove him from his presence. "Whereupon," adds the historian, "the poor man, who had in truth very good affections, was exceedingly dejected and afflicted, and returned into France to give an account of his ill success to those who sent him." M. de Bellièvre soon took the same route, having, however, previously paid a visit to the parliament of Scotland.[3]

Edinburgh and other Scottish cities sent tender petitions to the king, imploring him to take the covenant, and save himself and his royal progeny; but all was of no avail. On the 5th of August the commissioners at Newcastle informed the two Houses, by letter, that they could not obtain his majesty's consent to the propositions, nor any answer any way satisfactory; that he had given them a paper containing offers to come up to London to treat in person; and that this was all they could get from him. On the 10th of the same month they wrote again to say that the king still refused to sign, though the commissioners of both kingdoms had begged him on their knees to do it. Two or three days after the commissioners in person made a report of all that had passed at Newcastle between the king and themselves: they received the thanks of the House, and a committee was appointed to give the same thanks to the Scottish commissioners who had acted with them in that business. In the course of this debate a Presbyterian member exclaimed, "What will become of us now that the king has refused our propositions?" "What would have become of us if he had accepted them?" replied one of the Independents; whose query must incessantly occur to those who meditate upon all the circumstances of this great conflict, and upon the declared and confirmed character of Charles.

The vote of thanks to the Scots was a very important circumstance, and one that tended to dissipate the hopes which the king had built upon the jealousies and dissensions existing between the English House of Commons and the Scottish army, and which at one time really presented a prospect of hostile collision. On the 19th of May, without any settlement of the heavy pecuniary claims the Scots had upon them, the House of Commons had voted that England had no longer any need of the Scottish army. And at the same time, out of doors, loud complaints were heard against the Scots for retaining possession of Carlisle, Newcastle, with other towns in the north, and garrisoning them as if they meant to keep them. The Scots, on their part, did not forget to remind the English of how much they and the cause of liberty had owed to their well-timed assistance; and they called for a settlement of accounts and payment of the money rightfully due to them; for, previously to their second coming into England, the parliament had agreed to subsidize them. King or no king in their hands, the Scots would have claimed their money; but it is possible that, without that security, the payment would neither have been so prompt nor so liberal. This business was prolonged from the month of May to the month of September, and it was always considered as separate from any negotiation respecting the keeping or yielding the king's person. The pride of the Scots was incessantly irritated, but their prudence was stronger than their pride. On the 12th of August their commissioners presented a remarkable spirited paper[1] to the English House of Lords, declaring that they were willing "forthwith to surrender the garrisons possessed by them in this kingdom, which they did keep for no other end but the safety and security of their forces, and without delay to recall their army; reasonable satisfaction being given for their pains, hazards, charges, and sufferings; whereof a competent proportion to be presently paid to their army before their disbanding, and security to be given for the remainder, at such times hereafter as shall be mutually agreed on." They demanded or desired that if forces should be kept on foot in either kingdom, they might be put under the command of persons zealous for reformation and uniformity in religion, and tender of the peace of the kingdoms, and against whom neither Scots nor English might have any just grounds of jealousy; that as the kingdom of Scotland had been invaded, and was still invested by forces from Ireland, the honorable Houses, according to the large treaty, should give such assistance to the Scots as might speedily reduce those rebels to obedience; that whereas propositions for a safe and well-grounded peace had been lately sent to the king for obtaining his majesty's consent, and as the utmost endeavors of the kingdom of Scotland had not been wanting to that great end—though the success had not answered their wishes and hopes, the king, to their unspeakable grief, not having agreed to the said propositions—they should still expect to be consulted with in settling that peace, or that, as men engaged in the same cause as the English, laboring

[3] He told the English parliament that he had had it in command from the queen-regent and the King of France to endeavor a good reconciliation between his majesty and them; but that seeing in what a humor they were, and the propositions they had sent to his majesty, he had nothing further to do but to demand his passport. The parliament, in sending him his pass, told him "that they took in good part and thankfully from the King of France his good affections and intentions to these kingdoms, and willingness to see their troubles over, to end the which they had done, and would continue to do, their utmost. But they could not agree that any foreign state should interpose in the remaining differences, nor in particular the King of France, by his extraordinary ambassador."

[1] In the preamble the Scottish commissioners said, with equal truth and dignity—"The same principles of brotherly affection which did induce both kingdoms to a conjunction of their counsels and forces in this cause, move us at this time to apply ourselves to the most real and effectual ways which tend to a speedy conclusion and amicable parting, and to the prevention of misunderstandings between the kingdoms in any of these things, which, peradventure, our common enemies look upon with much joy, as occasions of differences. For this end we have not taken notice of the many base calumnies and execrable aspersions cast upon the kingdom of Scotland, in printed pamphlets and otherwise; expecting from the justice and wisdom of the honorable Houses that they will themselves take such course for the vindication of our nation and army, as the estates of Scotland have showed themselves ready to do for them in the like case. Upon the invitation of both Houses, the kingdom of Scotland did cheerfully undertake, and hath faithfully managed their assistance to this kingdom, in pursuance of the ends expressed in the covenant: and the forces of the common enemy being, by the blessing of God, upon the joint endeavors of both kingdoms, now broken and subdued, a foundation is laid, and some good progress made in the reformation of religion, which we trust the honorable Houses will, according to the covenant, sincerely, really, and constantly prosecute till it be perfected."—Rushworth. The perfection of the covenant of course meant the establishment of the Calvinistic doctrine and Presbyterian kirk in England; but, in censuring the bigotry of the Scots, we should remember that the English parliament, in their hour of need and danger, when they took the covenant, led the Scots to believe, notwithstanding the strokes of Sir Harry Vane's pen, that they fully meant to go hand-in-hand with their allies in the great matter of religion. And it is quite certain that, without this conviction, the Scottish people would have been far less eager to take the field and march into England under the same dangers, and aiming at the same ends, they might consult together and resolve what was next to be done for the safety of the two kingdoms. The Lords returned the Scottish commissioners their thanks, and the next day communicated their paper to the Commons. The Commons, taking the same into consideration, ordered that the sum of £100,000 should be provided forthwith for the Scottish army, and voted that the House thankfully approved of their good affection and zeal, and of their offer to deliver up the garrisons and depart the kingdom. The Commons also appointed a committee to audit and settle the whole money account. The Scots demanded as the balance due to them the sum of £600,000; but, after some debate, their commissioners agreed with the Commons to take £400,000, of which one half was to be paid before the army left England, the security of the public faith being given for the remainder. This bargain was fully concluded four months before the Scots delivered up Charles, and during the whole of those four months their commissioners continued to negotiate with the English parliament in favor of that unhappy prince.

On the 21st of September, after the money account had been settled, the English parliament resolved that the right of disposing of the king's person belonged exclusively to them. The Scots instantly remonstrated against this vote, showing that as Charles was king of Scotland as well as of England, as both nations had been parties in the war, and had an equal interest in all that concerned him and his government, so both had a right to be consulted respecting the disposal of his person. This was a sort of question most difficult to resolve, and several conferences seemed rather to embroil it than clear it, and ill-blood grew on both sides.[1] On the 26th of September, five days after this vote of the English parliament, Charles wrote to the Duke of Hamilton, who had obtained his liberty, and generously renewed his loyalty, notwithstanding all the harsh usage he had received. "I must tell you," said Charles, "that those at London think to get me into their hands by telling our countrymen that they do not intend to make me a prisoner: oh! no, by no means; but only to give me an honorable guard forsooth, to attend me continually for the security of my person. Wherefore I must tell you (and 'tis so far from a secret, that I desire that every one should know it—only for the way, that I leave it to you to manage for my best advantage) that I will not be left in England when this army retires, and these garrisons are rendered (without a visible violent force upon my person), unless, clearly, and according to the old way of understanding, I may remain a free man, and that no attendant be forced upon me, upon any pretense whatsoever. So much for that." Every thing, therefore, that tended to keep the Scottish army in England was acceptable to the king, whose friends (and he still had a few) in Scotland were exerting themselves in his favor. On the 10th of December the Scottish parliament, under the management of the Hamiltons, voted that they should do their best to maintain their monarchical system of government and Charles's title to the English crown; but on the very next day, this vote was rescinded,[1] and a declaration was adopted and published, that the kingdom of Scotland could not lawfully engage on the king's side even if he were deposed in England, seeing that he would not take the covenant nor give any satisfactory answer to the propositions tendered to him for peace. Nor was this all: the parliament of Scotland further declared that Charles should not be permitted to come into Scotland, or that, if he were, his royal functions should be suspended until he accepted the covenant and agreed to the propositions. At this moment the words of May appear very like truth. The Scots, he says, refused to carry the king to Edinburgh, fearing that his presence in an unsettled kingdom might give rise to new commotions: "they rather desired that he might be carried into the southern parts of England . . . . as if England were not in the same danger by his presence. So that in all that whole debate they seemed to contend, not who should have the king, but who should not have him."[2] Elated by the hopes which Hamilton had held out to him, Charles had a short time before written to his wife. "I am most confident that within a very short time I shall be recalled with much honor, and all my friends will see that I have neither a foolish nor a peevish conscience." But now his heart sunk within him, and he resolved to escape, if possible, and fly to the continent—a project which he had entertained once or twice before, but from which he had been dissuaded by his wife, who not only thought that his evasion would be dangerous to the monarchic principle, but who did not wish for his presence or society in France, where she was notoriously wasting the money she could get upon Jermyn and her other favorites. Never was the blindness of political partisanship more severely taxed than in exacting an idolatrous worship to this woman as a heroine—as a pattern of conjugal affection! But now she could no longer prevail with her husband, and Charles, dreading equally the Scots and the English, con-

[1] The Scottish estates, it appears, had been taken completely by surprise. Their vote gave the king's friends there great hopes. "But the next day," says Rushworth, "all was dashed again, for then a warning was presented to the parliament from the commission of the kirk." The laborious collector gives the latter document at full length. It is entitled, "A Solemn and Seasonable Warning to all Estates and Degrees of Persons throughout the Land, by the Commissioners of the General Assembly." The untamed, unreconciled Presbyterians told the parliament that Satan was neither sleeping nor idle, that the Church of Christ, after seeming to be near the port, might be again tossed with another and perhaps a greater tempest; that all men ought to tremble at the remembrance of former, and appearances of future judgments crying mightily to Heaven; that these kingdoms were bound to the league and covenant as long as the sun and moon shall endure; that as his majesty had not yet subscribed that league and covenant, nor satisfied the lawful desires of his loyal subjects in both nations, they had just cause to fear that his coming into Scotland might be very dangerous both to his majesty and to this kingdom, which coming they therefore desired might be timely prevented. The warning ended by expressing a hope that the king might yet take the covenant as the only hopeful means of preserving himself, his crown, and posterity; that he might return to his Houses of parliament in England as a reconciled prince to satisfied subjects; and that acclamations of joy might be heard in all his majesty's dominions, and no sound of war except against the bloody Irish rebels.

certed with Sir Robert Murray and William Murray a plan to escape in disguise. Flight, however, was no longer possible.[1] On the 20th of December the king wrote to the parliament of England, and to the commissioners of the parliament of Scotland at London, to ask again for a personal treaty, or, as he termed it, "a personal free debate with his two Houses of parliament upon all the present differences." The Houses took no notice of this message. The Lords voted that he should be allowed to come to Newmarket, there to remain with such attendants about him as both Houses should appoint; but the Commons would not agree with the Lords, and voted that Holmby House, in Northamptonshire, would be a fitter place for his majesty. This was on Christmas-eve, and the Houses sat on the whole of the following day, debating about the king's coming to Holmby. The Lords agreed with the Commons that that was the fitter place, and the Commons agreed with the Lords that his coming thither should be with all respect to the safety and preservation of his majesty's person, and in preservation and defense of the true religion; and the question being put whether the words, "according to the covenant," should be added, it passed in the affirmative. The Scots had now fully made up their minds to deliver Charles to the parliament; yet they made one effort more to induce him to take the covenant and accede to the propositions. This effort was unsuccessful; but, on the 14th of January, 1647, he submitted the following paper to the Scottish commissioners, starting with a fatal position, which must always have rendered all negotiation with him a mere waste of time and paper, and which, by the way, was always uppermost in the minds of the parliaments of both kingdoms, without his reminding them of it. "It is a received opinion by many, that engagements, acts, or promises of a restrained person are neither valid nor obligatory; how true or false this is, I will not now dispute; but I am sure, if I be not free, I am not fit to answer your or any propositions: wherefore you should first resolve me in what state I stand, as in relation to freedom, before I can give you any other answer. . . . . But if you object the loss of time and urgency of it, certainly in one respect it presses none so much as myself, which makes me also think it necessary that I be not to seek what to do when this garrison shall be surrendered up, to demand of you, in case I go into Scotland, if I shall be there with honor, freedom, and safety, or how?" The answer of the Scottish commissioners to his majesty's queries was very brief? "1. To the first, in what state you stand, as in relation to freedom, the parliaments of both your kingdoms have given such orders and directions as they have thought fittest for the good and safety of your majesty and the kingdoms, to the general and governor. 2. To your majesty's second query, of your going into Scotland, we shall humbly desire that we may not now be put to give any answer; but, if your majesty shall either deny or delay your assent to the propositions, we are in that case to represent to your majesty the resolution of the parliament of England." This was decisive; and two days after—on the 16th of January—the parliament of Scotland gave their full consent for delivering up the king, stating how desirous they were to remove all jealousies, to strengthen the peace and union between the two kingdoms, so firmly tied together by the solemn league and covenant; and how confident they were that the English parliament would satisfy their reasonable desires, and make the integrity of their proceedings and resolutions in all this business concerning his majesty appear to the world, either by declaration or otherwise, as in their wisdom they should think fit, whereby no occasion of calumny might be left to the wicked enemies of either nation.

In the mean time the English parliament had declared episcopacy forever abolished; and, by putting to sale the bishops' lands, money had been obtained to satisfy the claims of the Scottish army, who thus, as they themselves affirmed, got their rightful due out of the spoils of the priests of Baal.[1] On the 16th of December, £200,000 in hard cash had been put in thirty-six carts, and sent off toward Newcastle, under a strong escort of infantry, commanded by that brave and steady soldier, old Skippon. The money-bags arrived safely at York, where, on the 5th of January, 1647, their contents were counted out to the Scottish receiver, or rather began to be counted out, for the process occupied some nine or ten days. On the 21st of January a receipt was signed at Northallerton. On the 30th the commissioners of the English parliament—the Earl of Pembroke with two other lords and six commoners, with a numerous train—received from the Scottish commissioners at Newcastle the person of the king, the Scottish troops evacuating that town on the same day. Charles affected to be pleased with the change: he talked courteously, and even cheerfully, to the Earl of Pembroke and the other commissioners, telling them he was well pleased to part from the Scots and to come nearer to the parliament.[2] It is said, however, that on first learning that the Scotch parliament had given its formal consent to the delivery of his person, he exclaimed, "I am bought and sold!" But, at the very last moment, the earls of Lauderdale and Traquair again pressed the king with more ardor than ever to consent to establish Presbyterianism and approve the covenant, undertaking upon those conditions to carry him off to Berwick, and to make the English content themselves with what his majesty had promised them. "I found the king," continues Montreuil, the authority for this statement, "absolutely confirmed, by letters which he had received from the queen, in his resolution not to do these things; but the Scots did not hesitate to offer me as much as 20,000 Jacobuses if the king would only promise to do what they desired."[3] It should also be continually borne in mind, in judging of this transaction, that the Scots did not deliver the king to the Independents, who had began to declare their aversion to all kingly government, and who were the party that brought him to the scaffold, but to their brethren the Presbyterians, who entertained the highest respect for the kingly office (only loving democracy in the church), and who never entertained any design of republicanizing England or taking the king's life. At that moment the Presbyterians of England, flushed by recent successes in the manœuvers of parliament, were decidedly the party dominant; and they seemed so powerful, and the Independents so depressed, that it would have required the gift of prophecy to foresee the things which happened in the course of two years. It has been a general, yet a strange and almost unaccountable error to connect the surrender of Charles at Newcastle and his execution at Whitehall, like cause and effect, or like circumstances closely allied in time and in motive. The pen of an industrious writer might fall from his hand in despair if he undertook to detail at length the numerous subsidiary causes which brought about the tragical catastrophe.

[1] As late as the 27th of January, 1647, N. S., Montreuil writes to the French court—"The king still thinks of escaping, which I find every day more difficult, and now almost beyond all possibility, if the Scots should not like better to see him out of his kingdom than in the hands of the Independents."—Thurloe State Papers.

[1] Part of the money, however, for paying the Scots was raised by loan in the city of London.

In the mean time the Scottish army recrossed the borders, evacuating Carlisle, Berwick, and all the posts they had held in England; and Charles journeyed by easy stages toward Holmby House, a stately mansion in a pleasant part of Northamptonshire, but at no great distance from the fatal field of Naseby.[1] As they journeyed along, it was made evident that the traditions of royalty, and even an absurd superstition connected with them, had still a powerful hold on the public mind. The people flocked to see him, and accompanied him with their acclamations and their prayers for his preservation; and some there were that came to him to be touched for the king's evil. That witty and somewhat cynical Independent, Sir Harry Martin, said that the touch of the great seal of parliament might very well possess the same curing virtue; but the great mass of the English people were not prepared to relish the joke. "Not any of the troopers," says Herbert, "who guarded the king gave those countrypeople any check or disturbance as the king passed, that could be observed—a civility his majesty was well pleased with. Being arrived at Holmby, very many country gentlemen, gentlewomen, and others of ordinary rank, stood ready there to welcome the king with joyful countenances and prayers." Charles reached Holmby on the 16th of February, and found his house, and table, and little court well furnished with every thing except chaplains. In vain he petitioned to have chaplains of his own church. The dominant Presbyterians sent him chaplains of their church. He would not listen to them, nor permit them so much as to say grace at his table. He passed his time in reading playing chess, walking, riding, and playing at bowls; and as there was no fit bowling-green at Holmby, he would ride to Althorp, or even to Harrowden, a distance of nine miles, to indulge in his favorite game. He seemed to bear his misfortunes with a sort of cheerful dignity, being seldom heard to utter a word of useless complaint. He was attended by two persons selected by the parliament, one being Thomas Herbert, who has left some touching memorials of his last days; the other, James Harrington, the speculative republican and author of "Oceana," who was personally known to his majesty and acceptable to him, and trusted by the parliament because he was no partisan. "His majesty loved his company, and finding him to be an ingenious man, chose rather to converse with him than with others of his chamber. They had often discourses concerning government; but when they happened to talk of a commonwealth, the king seemed not to endure it."[1]

At this moment it was rather the head of Oliver Cromwell than that of King Charles that was in imminent danger. The elections which had been recently made to fill up the vacancies in the House of Commons, caused by deaths of the old members. had gone generally in favor of the Presbyterians, while not a few thorough-going royalists had found seats and friends in that House. Triumphing in their strength, the Presbyterians had proclaimed the establishment of their form of worship to the exclusion of all others, and they had labored, and were still laboring, to crush the many sects included under the general term of Independents, men who differed from them both in political and religious principles. It was the army commanded by, and mainly composed of these Independents that had finished the war, the Presbyterians and their generals having left that war in a doubtful state; but regardless of its great services, and forming a very incorrect estimate of its power and spirit, they now resolved to disband this victorious army and create a new one on the Presbyterian model. The Independents in the House of Commons—the Vanes, the Martins, the St. Johns—the most sagacious of men, who hardly ever made a false step, yielded to the storm as long as it was necessary, profiting by the blunders of their bigoted adversaries. One of these blunders was the haste of the Presbyterians in getting their brethren, the Scots, out of England; another was, that, in their hurry to reduce the army, they disbanded the strong corps of Massey, which was all-powerful in the west of England, and which, with its leader, was far more inclined to Presbyterianism than to Independency. It was, in fact, just that part of the army which the Independents were glad to be rid of.

In the month of February, 1647, it was proposed in the House to reduce the army to a peace establishment, and to dismantle the garrisons in England and Wales. The Presbyterians pretended that the war was at an end, but other parties said that the royalists, though defeated and dispersed, were not much reduced in numbers, and were watching their opportunity to renew the contest. After a few days' debate, it was resolved to dismiss all except 5400 horse and 1000 dragoons, and all the infantry except a number sufficient to garrison forty-five castles and fortresses, which it was thought fit to keep up. It was next voted that Sir Thomas Fairfax should continue commander-in-chief; but, three days after this, it was carried by the Presbyterian majority and their allies, the disguised royalists, that no officer under Fairfax should have a rank higher than that of colonel—that no commander of any garrison should be a member of parliament, and that every officer whatsoever should take the covenant and conform to the government of the church as by ordinance established. Well might the Independents exclaim, What have we gained in religious liberty? Some of these votes were aimed directly at Oliver Cromwell, whose influence with the army excited the liveliest jealousy; and they would also have excluded those brave soldiers and leading men in the parliament, Ludlow, Blake, Ireton, Skippon, Algernon Sydney, and others, who had fought the good fight and won the victory. It was at this crisis that Ireton married the eldest daughter of Cromwell. The Hollises, the Stapletons, and the other leaders of the Presbyterians, blinded by their majorities in the two Houses, thought that they could do what they liked with the army by a vote or a stroke of the pen; and on the 6th of March they resolved that 3000 horse, 1200 dragoons, and 8400 foot, all to be drawn from Fairfax's forces, should be forthwith shipped for Ireland. The soldiers exclaimed, in a fury, that the ungrateful parliament wanted to send them there to die of famine and sickness. But what most rendered them averse to this Irish service was the avowed intention of taking all their old officers from them—those with whom they had prayed and fought most lustily—and substituting none but Presbyterians. Matters, perhaps, might have gone a little smoother if the Presbyterian managers in parliament had contrived to pay the large arrears due to the troops; but at this moment they had neither paid nor spoken of paying. What followed might have been foreseen by every one except such a blundering, wordy blockhead as Denzil Hollis: the army which lay in and round Nottingham, broke up from its cantonments, marched upon London, and halted at Saffron Walden, in Essex. Then the Presbyterians, in a panic, hurried to vote an assessment of £60,000 per month for one year, for paying the army. On the following day, the 17th of March, a petition was presented to both Houses from the common council and Presbyterians of the city of London, praying that the army might be removed to a greater distance from the capital; complaining bitterly of a petition set on foot in the city by the Independents, and recommending the immediate suppression of it, and the punishment of those who had contrived and promoted it. This petition of the Independents was in all respects a remarkable document — the first or the loudest call that had yet been made upon republican principles. It was addressed "To the right honorable and supreme authority of the nation, the Commons in parliament assembled;" and it complained of the power assumed by the House of Lords, of the expensiveness of lawsuits, and the obscurity of the law—of tithes, of the oppressions and persecutions exercised against all those who could not conform in point of church government, and of the exclusion of such persons from all offices of public trust. The Presbyterian majority in the House of Commons, recovering somewhat from their panic, voted that this Independent petition should be condemned,[1] and that the army should not come within twenty-five miles of London. And the committee of government sitting at Derby House for the affairs of Ireland, sent down a deputation to Saffron Walden to treat with Fairfax and the officers of the army, telling them and their men of the money voted for their use, and sounding their intentions. On the day after their arrival at head-quarters Fairfax summoned a convention of officers to communicate with him. These soldiers told the commissioners, that before they could answer their questions about going to Ireland, they must know what particular regiments, troops, and companies it was intended to keep at home for the service and safety of England, who were to be their chief commanders in Ireland, what assurance those that went to Ireland should have of pay and subsistence; and, in conclusion, they demanded the payment of the arrears already due to them, and some indemnity for their past services. The deputation could give no satisfactory answer, and they returned as they had come to those who sent them.

In reporting their doings, or their non-doings, to the Commons, they mentioned a petition in progress in the army. The Commons, to repress this proceeding, summoned to their bar Hammond, lieutenant-general of the ordnance, Colonel Robert Hammond, his nephew, Colonel Robert Lilburn, and Lieutenant-colonel Grimes, purposing to examine these officers together with Cromwell's son-in-law, Ireton, a member of their House; and, as if to terrify the army by a sudden boldness, they voted that the three regiments of the stanch Presbyterians, Poyntz, Copley, and Bethel, should be part of the 5000 horse to be kept at home for the service of England. In these stormy times late debates had become common. This night the House sat very late, and, "being grown thin with long sitting," the Presbyterians voted the petition of the army, which they had not seen, to be an improper petition; and further, that those of the army who continued in their distempered condition, and went on in advancing and promoting the petition, should be proceeded against as enemies to the state and disturbers of the public peace. The hot-headed, imbecile Hollis, who ought to have reflected that there was little or nothing between an unwarlike, divided, crazed parliament, and a victorious army led on by the most adroit of men, drew up this stinging resolution on his knee.

[1] "The committee," says Whitelock, "imprisoned one Tewleday, an active man for that petition. Many excused him as being as lawful for those of one judgment as of another, to petition the parliament, but it was carried in the House to approve of his commitment. . . . . Divers citizens came to the House to avow the petition complained of."

On the morrow the Lords voted their adherence to the resolution. Fairfax remonstrated in a mild manner, but the army complained of the injustice of not being allowed to petition while the petitions against them were not suppressed, and the horse talked of drawing to a rendezvous to compose something for their vindication. Apparently to conjure this storm, the Presbyterians, on the 8th of April, agreed that the regiments of Fairfax, Cromwell, Rossiter, Whalley, and Graves should be five of the regiments of horse to be kept in England.[1] On the 15th of April, a deputation from the two Houses again conferred with the army at Saffron Walden, the Earl of Warwick making "a pathetical speech to the officers, and using many exhortations to make them accept of terms and undertake for Ireland." Colonel Lambert, in the name of the rest, desired to know what satisfaction the parliament had given to the four queries they had put at their last meeting with the deputation. Sir John Clotworthy assured Lambert that, in Ireland, they should all be under the command of the popular Major-general Skippon; but then he added the unpopular name of the Presbyterian, Massey, and said, that the Houses had not yet nominated the rest of their superior officers. Some of the army also had reason to believe that Skippon would not go. Colonel Hammond declared, that if they had good assurance that Skippon would go, he doubted not but a great part of the army would engage; "such was the great, endeared respect, and high esteem the whole army had of the worth and valor of that great soldier." To this the officers cried out, "All, all!" but others shouted still louder, "Fairfax and Cromwell—give us Fairfax and Cromwell, and we all go." After a vain attempt to gain over volunteers, the deputation returned in dismay to London. It was then debated whether the army should be disbanded, and what pay to give them before disbanding; or whether it were not more convenient to send the army entirely into Ireland (that is, with all their old Independent officers); but the Presbyterians feared that Ireland might thus be converted into an independent kingdom under the rule of what they called heretics and anti-Christians, and the question was adjourned from the 23d to the 27th of April. On that day the Presbyterians were greatly encouraged by reports that many of the officers and a considerable body of foot had really volunteered to go to Ireland upon the parliament's conditions; and that all the rest would go but for the obstruction of certain officers in the army. Upon this faint hope—upon these delusive reports, Hollis urged on his party to vote that the whole army, horse and foot, should be disbanded with all convenient speed, and six weeks' pay given upon their disbanding, and that four of the officers should be summoned by the sergeant-at-arms to attend at the bar of the House. Hollis flattered himself that it would be exceedingly easy to draft the well-affected men into other regiments, and to get them speedily into Ireland under Presbyterian commanders; but he most miserably misunderstood the temper and the very composition of this remarkable army, which, in many respects, was unlike any army that had ever existed, and entirely different from the mere mercenaries that take the pay of a government upon all or any terms. On this very day some of the officers of that army presented an energetic petition to the Commons. This paper, which was a vindication of their conduct, rather than a petition, was signed by Thomas Hammond, lieutenant-general of the ordnance, 14 colonels and lieutenant-colonels, 6 majors, and 130 captains, lieutenants, and other commissioned officers. "The misrepresentation of us and our harmless intentions to this honorable House," said these citizen-soldiers, "occasioning hard thoughts and expressions of your displeasure against us, we can not but look upon as an act of most sad importance; tending, in our apprehensions, to alienate your affections from your ever trusty and obedient army; than which nothing can more rejoice your adversaries, or minister greater hopes of their readvancement; nothing more discouraging to us, who should esteem it the greatest point of honor to stand by you till the consummation of your work, the removal of every yoke from the people's necks, and the establishment of those good laws you shall judge necessary for the commonwealth." After insisting on their right of petitioning, they said, "We hope, by being soldiers, we have not lost the capacity of subjects, nor divested ourselves thereby of our interests in the commonwealth; that in purchasing the freedom of our brethren we have not lost our own." "We have not till now," they continued, "appeared in petitioning, though our necessities have been frequent and urgent; not that we doubted our liberty, but because we were unwilling to interrupt you in your other weighty affairs; and we proceeded at this time with the greatest care and caution, intending not to present our petition, but with the approbation and by the mediation of his Excellency, our ever-honored general. . . . . . And it should be known that that petition took its first rise from among the soldiers, and that we engaged but in the second place to regulate the soldiers' proceedings, and remove as near as we could all occasion of distaste." They energetically justified their demands for money. "For the desire of our arrears," said they, "necessity, especially of our soldiers, enforced us thereunto. That we have not been mercenary, or proposed gain as our end, the speedy ending of a languishing war will testify for us, whereby the people are much eased of their taxes and daily disbursements, and decayed trade restored to a full and flourishing condition in all quarters. We left our estates, and many of us our trades and callings to others, and forsook the contentments of a quiet life, not fearing or regarding the difficulties of war for your sakes; after all which, we hoped that the desires of our hardly-earned wages would have been no unwelcome request, nor argued us guilty of the least discontent or intention of mutiny."[1] But before this time an entire disaffection to the Presbyterian majority had declared itself among the common soldiers; and, irritated by the late disbanding vote, and by the House not taking this petition of the officers into immediate consideration, rank and file, troopers, dragoons, and infantry drew closer their recently-formed compact, and prepared a document of their own for the perusal of the House. They here described "a model of a military common-council, who should assemble two commissioned officers and two private soldiers out of every regiment, to consult for the good of the army, and to be called by the name of Adjutators."[2] From this council or conclave the superior officers stood aloof; but Berry, a captain in Fairfax's regiment of horse, and an old and bosom friend of Cromwell, became president of it, whence it has been generally concluded by historians that the whole affair, if not originally got up by Cromwell, was guided and directed by him.[3] On the 30th of April these adjutators, whose name was soon changed into that of agitators, sent three troopers—Sexby, Allen, and Shepherd—to present their first manifesto to the Commons. They protested against the service of Ireland without due satisfaction given; proclaimed the measure for drafting and disbanding to be a plan to break them up most unjustly without pay or recompense, and the authors of that plan to be ambitious men, who, having lately tasted of sovereignty, and been lifted above their proper sphere, sought to become masters, and were degenerating into tyrants. Cromwell, who a few days or weeks before was given to believe that the Presbyterians intended to seize him of a sudden and commit him to the Tower—a plan which appears really to have been entertained at several distinct times—rose up and spoke at great length about the danger of driving the army to extremities, and about the pure and entire loyalty of that meritorious body; and, strange and unaccountable as it is, it is certain that the House forthwith commissioned him, with Skippon, Ireton, and Fleetwood, to repair to head-quarters, and quiet the distempers of the army by assuring them that the House had appointed an ordinance to be speedily brought in for their indemnity, payment of arrears, &c. Cromwell, and those who had been appointed with him, presented themselves to the army on the 7th of May. The officers required time to confer with their regiments, and a second meeting took place on the 15th. Cromwell, Ireton, and Fleetwood encouraged the discontents, and even Skippon wavered, and at last decided in favor of the proposition presented by Lambert, that the redress of the grievances of the army should have precedence of all other questions. But disagreements broke out among the soldiery, some of whom would have closed with the offers of parliament; and, emboldened by these symptoms of division, the Presbyterian leaders, after hearing the report of Cromwell, who had returned from the camp to the House, passed a resolution, that immediate measures should be taken for auditing the accounts of the soldiers, and disbanding the regiments, coupled, however, with an assurance that no person who had been engaged in the late war should be liable to be pressed for service beyond sea. This was on the 21st of May. On the 25th it was further settled that such of the foot regiments as did not engage for the war in Ireland should be disbanded at certain times and places specified in the votes, the places of disbanding being distant from each other. On the same day Fairfax, who had been in London under a real or pretended sickness, returned to the army by the desire of the House of Commons, and on the morrow he removed the mass of that army from Saffron Walden to Bury St. Edmund's. Fairfax found the soldiers resolute not to disband without previous redress and payment, and the punishment of those who, as they said, had contrived their destruction; and they called for a rendezvous, telling their officers that, if they would not grant it, they would hold it without them. He communicated all this to both Houses. "I entreat you," he wrote to the Speaker of the Commons, "that there may be ways of love and composure thought upon. I shall do my endeavors, though I am forced to yield something out of order to keep the army from disorder or worse inconveniences." The Presbyterians disregarded the warning; they were deluded by hopes that the dissensions which they had encouraged in the army would end in the majority of the troops submitting to their will and pleasure; and on the 28th of May they appointed the Earl of Warwick and Lord Delawar, with Sir Gilbert Gerrard and three other members of the House of Commons, to be a committee to act with the general (Fairfax) in executing the disbanding vote. Fairfax told the deputation that he could venture to do nothing of the sort for the present, and must wait for further orders from parliament.

[1] On this same day parliament was informed by the commissioners at Holmby House that, notwithstanding all their care to prevent the delivery of papers to his majesty, one Colonel Bosville, formerly of the king's party, in the disguise of a countryman, put a packet of letters into the king's hands, as his majesty and the commissioners were passing over a narrow bridge; that the commissioners had apprehended him, and that he had confessed that the letters came from France. The House ordered that Colonel Bosville should be sent up as a delinquent. On the 12th of April other letters from Holmby certified, that when Bosville delivered the letters to the king, no man perceived it but a miller that stood by, and he, espying it, cried out, "Nobles and gentlemen, there is a man gave his majesty letters!" That Bosville offered gold to the miller to be silent, but he would not take it; that Bosville got away, and the miller told some of it that attended the king, and they rode after Bosville, and brought him back, who, being examined, confessed he brought the letters from Paris from the queen, being told that the letters contained a desire of the prince (Charles) to go into the war with the Duke of Orleans this summer, in point of honor; and that the king being desired to make known the contents of the letters, answered he was not to give an account to any man living.—Whitelock.

The crisis was now hurried on. The Lords voted that the king should be brought from Holmby to Oatlands near the capital, and that a fresh treaty should be opened with him. The army and the Independents, who were almost one, resolved to forestall the Lords and the Presbyterians, who flattered themselves that, with the sovereign in their power, they could dictate to their opponents. On the 3d of June, a little after midnight, a strong party of horse, commanded by Joyce, a cornet in Whalley's regiment, presented themselves at Holmby House. After surrounding the mansion, and setting guards at the different avenues, Joyce dis-

[3] Two other officers, said to have had great influence with the adjutators, were Ayres and Desborough. They were both old friends of Cromwell—they both took service with him when he first raised a troop of horse at his own expense—and Desborough, six years before, had married a sister of Cromwell.

mounted and demanded to be admitted, telling Colonel Graves and Brown, who commanded the small garrison there, that he came to speak with the king. They asked him from whom? "From myself," said Joyce; at which they laughed. "This is no laughing matter," said Joyce. Graves and Brown advised him to draw off his troops (they were seven hundred, or, as some say, a thousand strong), and in the morning he might speak with the commissioners placed by parliament over his majesty. "I came not hither to be advised by you," said Joyce, "nor have I any business with the commissioners; my errand is to the king, and speak with him I must and will presently." Brown and Graves commanded their soldiers in the house to stand to their arms and defend the place; but, instead of obeying these orders, their men threw open the gates, and bade their old comrades welcome. Joyce then proceeded to the chamber where the commissioners lay, and told them that there was a secret design to convey or steal away the king, and to raise another army to suppress that under the command of his Excellency Sir Thomas Fairfax: that there was no other way to keep the kingdom from blood and another war but by making sure of the king's person, and seeing that he was no more misled. "And," said Joyce, "there be some who endeavor to pull down king and people, and set up themselves." He then retired to another apartment, lest the king should be disturbed in his bed-chamber; and then Major-general Brown went to the king, and assured his majesty that no hurt should come to him, for that they were all civil gentlemen. As the morning grew, Joyce repaired again to the commissioners, and found that Colonel Graves was gone quite away, upon some secret design, as was supposed; "and some of his damning blades did say and swear they would fetch a party." According to the "True and Impartial Narration concerning the Army's preservation of the King," Joyce and his followers then unanimously declared that they thought it most convenient to secure the king in another place from such persons as might cunningly and desperately take him away, to break the peace of the kingdom and the prosperity of the army. All this time, it appears, the king had not been spoken to; but at ten o'clock at night Joyce sent to demand audience. But some of the commissioners, being unwilling, held him in discourse till the king was asleep in his bed. Yet, notwithstanding, the cornet would not be contented till he had spoken with his majesty; and, with as much gentleness and tenderness as he could, he went in to the king, and told him that dangerous plots were afoot, as all rational men might see by the actions of the Presbyterian leaders; adding, "It is now come to this—they must sink us or we must sink them." According to this narration, which, like all others bearing on the same point, is open to a variety of doubts, Charles told Joyce—because the commissioners of the parliament were present—that he could not go with him; adding, however, that reasons might be produced that might prevail with him, and that then nothing should stay him, and that he would go whether the commissioners would, yea or nay; and reasons were thereupon given which did prevail with his majesty to promise to go with Joyce the next morning. He said, however, he should be the more willing to go if the cornet would promise him the things which he would now propose. Joyce said he would promise them if they were just and warrantable. Then his majesty, speaking before the commissioners, said, "I will propound them." "May it please your majesty," returned Joyce, "I am willing to hear, but I am sorry I have disturbed you out of your sleep." "No matter, if you mean me no hurt," said the king—"if you will promise me that I shall have no hurt, seeing you may take away my life if you will." The cornet assured him that the army had no ill intention of that sort, but only desired to secure him from being taken away, and put at the head of another army. The king's second demand was, that he should not be forced to any thing against his conscience. Joyce replied that he would be most unwilling to force any man against his conscience, much less his majesty; that he hoped he was sensible of those that did endeavor to force men against their consciences, and yet delayed to do justice or settle the kingdom, endeavoring to disband or break the army in pieces, who sought nothing but justice, as would appear hereafter to all the world. "Pray God it may!" said the king. His third demand was, whether he should have his servants with him, and whether he should be provided for like a man in his place? The cornet assured him that he should have his servants, and be treated with all just and due respect. "Then," said the king, "I will willingly go along with you, if the soldiery will confirm what you have promised me." And, it being now eleven o'clock at night, he dismissed Joyce, saying that he would be ready by six the next morning to hear what the soldiers would say; that it was so bad an air at Holmby that he could never be so well as he had been; and that, if he were once gone, he would be unwilling to come back again to that place. According to his promise, Charles appeared at six o'clock in the morning. The soldiers were mounted, and ready to accompany him; but, before he would set out, he desired to say the same things to the soldiers which he had spoken over night to the cornet, to see if they would confirm what he had promised, which they did with one consent. Charles, then, in presence of all the soldiers, asked Joyce what commission he had to secure his person? Joyce replied, that, if the parliament had ever made an order that the army should not secure the king's person, he should not have dared to do what he had done; but, being informed his majesty was to be conveyed away to cause another war, this was the only cause of his securing the king's person. This answer did not satisfy Charles, who again demanded what commission he had. "I told his majesty," says Joyce (himself the author of this impartial narration), "the soldiers of the army, or else I should not have dared to have done what I have: and conceiving it to be the only way to bring peace to England, and justice with mercy, the thing which all honest men desire, and none will hinder but some guilty consciences, who seek to destroy both king and people, to set up themselves." But still the king was not satisfied: and he asked whether Joyce had nothing in writing from Sir Thomas Fairfax, his general? The cornet desired the king not to ask him such questions, for he conceived he had sufficiently answered him before. "I pray you, Mr. Joyce," said the king, "deal ingenuously with me, and tell me what commission you have?" "Here is my commission," said Joyce. "Where?" said the king. "Here!" replied Joyce. His majesty again asked, "Where?" "Behind me," replied Joyce, pointing to the mounted soldiers, "and I hope that will satisfy your majesty." Charles smiled, and said, "It is as fair a commission and as well written as I have ever seen a commission written in my life; a company of handsome, proper gentlemen as I have seen a great while. But what if I should refuse yet to go with you? I hope you would not force me? I am your king; you ought not to lay violent hands on your king; I acknowledge none to be above me here but God." Joyce assured his majesty that they meant not to injure him, nor so much as to force him thence against his will; and after some more talk, Charles said, "Now, gentlemen, for the place you intend to have me to?" "If it please your majesty, to Oxford," said Joyce. "That is no good air," replied Charles. "Then to Cambridge," said Joyce. The king did not like that either, but said he liked Newmarket; that was an air that did very well agree with him. Thereupon it was granted by Joyce that he should go to Newmarket. Then the king asked how far he intended to ride that day. "As far as your majesty can conveniently ride," answered the cornet. The king smiled, and said, "I can ride as far as you or any man here." And so he courteously took his leave to prepare for his journey. Joyce and his troopers conducted him that day as far as Hinchinbrook, whence, on the morrow, they led him to Childerley, near Newmarket.[1]

On the same day that Joyce had moved from Holmby House, Cromwell had left London, having, it is said, intimation of a private resolution that had been taken by the parliament to secure him, and not suffer him to return to the army. He got hastily and secretly out of town, and, without stop or stay, rode to Triploe Heath, his horse all in a foam, and there was welcomed with the shouts of the soldiery.[2] Forthwith the army entered into a solemn engagement not to disband or divide without redress of grievances, security against oppression to the whole free-born people of England, and the discontinuance of "the same men in credit and power," that is, the dismissal of the present Presbyterian government, who were charged with entertaining cruel and bloody purposes, to be executed when the army should be disbanded or divided—purposes which some of that party were quite capable of entertaining. Fairfax, Cromwell, Ireton, Hammond, and other officers of rank, waited upon the king. That their demeanor was respectful is certain; but nearly every thing else that passed at this meeting, or these meetings, is involved in doubt, and in an obscurity which will probably never be cleared up. Fairfax and Cromwell both protested that they were wholly ignorant of Joyce's design; and it has been pretty generally admitted, though perhaps on insufficient grounds, that Fairfax at least spoke the truth. The lord-general, it is said, urged the king to return to Holmby House, and and was told by Charles himself that he would rather stay with the army—that he had as good interest in the army as Fairfax himself. Nor are there wanting authorities to show that the king, though keeping up the appearance of being forced from Holmby against his will, had in reality gone willingly and full of hope. "The king," says Herbert, "was the merriest of the company, having, as it seems, a confidence in the army, especially from some of the greatest there, as was imagined." He was not, indeed, without sundry reasons for congratulating himself on his change of keepers. The Presbyterians had refused him the attendance of any minister of the church of England; the Independents and the army allowed him whatever clergymen he chose. One of the most devoted or heated of his partisans says, in a strange sentence, "The deep and bloody-heated Independents all this while used the king very civilly, admitting several of his servants, and some of his chaplains, to attend him, and officiate by the service-book."[1]

On the 10th of June, while parliament was voting that no part of the army should come within forty miles of the capital, the whole of that army marched upon London, sending out manifestoes as they advanced, collecting addresses of confidence from Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, and other counties, and demanding the speedy purging of parliament of such members as were disentitled to sit there by delinquency, corruption, abuse to the state, or undue election. On the 15th of June, from their head-quarters, at St. Albans, the army formally accused Hollis, Waller, Clotworthy, Stapleton, Lewis, Maynard, Massey, Harley, Long, Glynne, and Nichols. The House of Commons repeated ts command to the army not to advance, and voted the removal of the king to Richmond, there to be in the custody of their commissioners. The army advanced immediately by Berkhampstead upon Uxbridge; and then the "eleven members," that is, Hollis and the other Presbyterian leaders, went and hid themselves. At first the House of Commons had made a show of resistance, had doubled the guard they had from the city of London, and had filled their rooms and lobbies with arms; but now they abandoned this hopeless course, and voted that the army under Fairfax was in very deed the army of England, and to be treated with all respect and care; and they sent propositions to the general, which induced him to remove his head-quarters from Uxbridge to Wycombe. This movement gave wonderful courage to the eleven accused members, who came forth from their hiding-places to their seats in the House, accusing their accusers, and demanding a trial; but very soon they lost heart, and obtained leave of absence and the speaker's passport to go out of the kingdom. Their party, by this time, had rendered themselves contemptible by their rashness, weakness, and vacillation.

Meanwhile the king had been removed from Newmarket to Royston, from Royston to Hatfield, the Earl of Salisbury's house, from Hatfield to Woburn Abbey, and thence to Windsor Castle. Among the "several servants" that were admitted to attend him were Ashburnham, one of the companions of his flight from Oxford to the Scottish army,[1] Sir John Berkeley,[2] and Legge, another favorite and confidential attendant. By means of these gentlemen Charles opened, or continued, a very secret negotiation with Cromwell, Ireton, and other chief officers. Ashburnham says that on his arrival he found his master already deep in this treaty, and that he and Berkeley were then appointed to conduct it, which they did for about three weeks with good hopes of success. It seems scarcely possible to believe that Fairfax could be a stranger to these negotiations; but the king probably knew, as did every one else, that Cromwell was mightier than he. At this time Fairfax requested the parliament to consent that the king should see his children, who had so long been in their hands. The House of Commons apprehended that the army would keep the children as well as the father; but, on Fairfax's pledging his word of honor that they should be returned to St. James's palace, they very reluctantly sent the Duke of York, the Duke of Gloucester, and the Princess Elizabeth, to the beautiful little village of Caversham, near Reading, where the king was then residing. The interview was tender in the extreme, for Charles was a fond father, and the children were young, innocent, and helpless. Cromwell shed tears. After passing two days with their unfortunate parent, the children went back to London, where the Presbyterians were making a last and blundering effort to regain the ascendency. The army and the Independents resident in the city had demanded that the command of the London militia should be put into other hands. The Presbyterians not only refused, but chose this very moment for getting up a petition, calling for the suppression of all conventicles; that is, all chapels wherein the Independents worshiped God according to their own notions. At the same time they exhibited for signature, in Guildhall, another paper, which, after reciting the Covenant, engaged the subscribers of all degrees, soldiers or sailors, citizens, apprentices, or trained-bands of the city, to keep away the army, and bring the king to Westminster, for the purpose of concluding a personal treaty. One hundred thousand signatures were set to this paper; and a few days after a disorderly rabble, consisting probably of as many royalists as Presbyterians, surrounded the houses of parliament, and caused such terror there that both speakers and many members fled to the army for protection. After an adjournment of three days the residue of the two Houses met, and then—on the 30th of July—elected Lord Willoughby of Parham to be temporary speaker, forbade the army to advance, appointed a committee of safety, called out the city militia, to be put under the command of Massey, Waller, and Poyntz, and recalled the eleven fugitive Presbyterian members. Fairfax, who had advanced with the army to Hounslow Heath, there met the fugitive Independent members. Besides the two speakers, there were fifteen lords and a hundred commoners. The general forthwith published a declaration, "showing the grounds of his present advance to the city of London, and ordered Colonel Rainsborough to cross the Thames at Kingston-bridge, and take possession of the borough of Southwark, which wholly disavowed the proceedings of the city. Rainsborough executed his commission without any difficulty, and detached soldiers that occupied the blockhouses near Gravesend and all the posts on that side of the river between Gravesend and Southwark. "And when the citizens heard of the army's approach, their stomachs being somewhat abated, and their opinions so much divided in common council that it appeared impossible for them suddenly to raise any forces to oppose the army, they sent to the general for a pacification, which by consent of the members of parliament then with him, was granted to them upon these conditions:—1. That they should desert the parliament now sitting, and the eleven impeached members. 2. That they should recall their declarations lately published. 3. That they should relinquish their present militia. 4. That they should deliver up to the general all their forts and the Tower of London. 5. That they should disband all the forces they had raised, and do all things else necessary for the public tranquillity. All which things, none of them daring to refuse, were presently ratified."[1]

On the 6th of August Fairfax came to Westminster, with the speakers of both Houses, and the rest of the expelled lords and commoners, whom he restored to their seats. The speakers, in the name of the whole parliament, gave thanks to the general, made him commander of all the forces in England and Wales, and Constable of the Tower of London; and as a gratuity a month's pay was given to his army. On the next day Fairfax and Cromwell, with the whole army, marched through London to the Tower, where some commands were changed, and the militia settled in the hands of the Independents. "And lest the city should swell with too much power, her militia, by order of parliament, was divided, and authority given to Westminster, Southwark, and the hamlets about the Tower to exercise and command their own militias. Thus was the Presbyterian faction depressed."[1] Never, perhaps, did a great party fall with less honor. Hollis, Stapleton, Waller, Clotworthy, Lewis, and Long, ran away to the sea-coast, and were allowed to escape into France. They were thereupon charged with treason, the lord mayor of London, four aldermen, and two officers of trained-bands, the earls of Suffolk, Lincoln, and Middleton, the lords Willoughby, Hunsdon, Berkeley, and Maynard were included with them in the charge. But the conduct of the now triumphant Independents did not betray in them any great anxiety for retaliation or party vengeance, or severity of any kind; and the army—giving another proof that it was no mere mass of soldiery—behaved with the greatest moderation and justice. Half the number of Presbyterian preachers at a like crisis would have set the city in a blaze. Fairfax, presently marching out of London, quartered his troops in the towns and villages adjacent, fixing his head-quarters at Putney, and only leaving two or three regiments about Whitehall and the Mews to guard the parliament. While these things were in progress the council of officers had prepared their "Proposals," wherein they provided for the general reform and resettlement of the kingdom upon principles of the largest liberty, both civil and religious, and of a glorious toleration, which Europe had not yet seen even in a theory. The great fault of this theory was, that it too much overlooked the intellectual condition of the people, who were not yet fit for its application. Ireton is generally considered to have been the principal author of this ever-remarkable paper; but he acted concurrently with his father-in-law, Cromwell, who entertained the highest and justest notions about religious liberty, freedom of trade, and the other points which reflect the most honor upon this scheme.[2] In many respects, notwithstanding the republican tendencies of Ireton and its other framers, this constitution would have left Charles more power and dignity as a king than the Presbyterian parliament had ever thought of giving him. And how acted Charles when these proposals were privately submitted to him? This is the account given by one of his own partisans, Sir John Berkeley:—"What with the pleasure of having so concurring a second as Mr. Ashburnham, and what with the encouraging messages which his majesty had (by my Lord Lauderdale and others) from the Presbyterian party and the city of London, who pretended to despise the army, and to oppose them to death, his majesty seemed very much erected: insomuch that when the proposals were solemnly sent to him, and his concurrence most humbly and earnestly desired, his majesty (not only to the astonishment of Ireton and the rest, but even to mine) entertained them with very tart and bitter discourses, saying, sometimes, that he would have no man to suffer for his sake, and that he repented of nothing so much as the bill against the Lord Strafford (which though most true, was unpleasant for them to hear); that he would have the church established according to law, by the Proposals. They replied, it was none of their work to do it; that it was enough for them to waive the point, and they hoped, enough for his majesty, since he had waived the government (of the church) itself in Scotland. His majesty said, that he hoped God had forgiven him that sin, and repeated often, You can not be without me; you will fall to ruin if I do not sustain you. Many of the army that were present, and wished well (at least, as they pretended) to the agreement, looked wistfully and with wonder upon me and Mr. Ashburnham; and I, as much as I durst, upon his majesty, who would take no notice of it, until I was forced to step to him and whisper in his ear—Sir, your majesty speaks as if you had some secret strength and power that I do not know of; and since your majesty hath concealed it from me, I wish you had concealed it from these men too. His majesty soon recollected himself, and began to sweeten his former discourse with great power of language and behavior. But it was now of the latest; for Colonel Rainsborough (who of all the army seemed the least to wish the accord) in the middle of the conference stole away, and posted to the army, which he influenced against the king with all the artificial malice he had."[1] Nor does Charles's conduct or good policy improve in the report of his other principal agent. Ashburnham, after mentioning sundry instances of double dealing, goes on to describe a very remarkable interview he had for the king's business, a few days after the army's marching through London, with Cromwell and Ireton. "Being commanded by his majesty," says this confidential agent, "to desire from Cromwell and Ireton that he might go from Stoke to one of his own houses, they told me, with very severe countenances, he should go if he pleased to Oatlands; but that they had met with sufficient proof that the king had not only abetted and fomented the differences between them and their enemies, by commanding all his party to take conditions under the then parliament and city, but that likewise he had at that instant a treaty with the Scots, when he made greatest profession to close with them; for the justification of which, they affirm that they had both his and the queen's letters to make it good, which were great allays to their thoughts of serving him, and did very much justify the general misfortune he lived under of having the reputation of little faith in his dealings."[2] And, in

[2] Narrative.—"Lord Bolingbroke told us—Mr. Pope, Lord Marchmont, and myself (June 12th, 1742)—that Lord Oxford had often told him that he had seen, and had in his hands, an original letter that King Charles I. wrote to the queen, in answer to one of her's that had been intercepted, and then forwarded to him, wherein she had reproached him for having made those villains too great concessions (viz., that Cromwell should be lieutenant of Ireland for life without account; that that kingdom should be in the hands of the party, with an army there kept, which should know no head but the lieutenant; that Cromwell should have a garter, &c.). That in this letter of the king's it was said that she should leave him to manage, who was better informed of all circumstances than she could be; but she might be entirely easy as to whatever concessions he should make them; for that he should know in due time how to deal with the rogues, who, instead fact, Charles at this moment was negotiating, not only with Cromwell and Ireton, and with other officers in the army who entertained very different views, but also with Lauderdale and the Scottish Covenanters, with the English Presbyterians, and with the Irish Catholics—to each and all of whom he made promises and paid compliments.

Doubts have been raised — perhaps unjustly — touching the sincerity of Cromwell and Ireton in their negotiations with the king: but the king was certainly insincere to all parties, with the exception of the old and devoted royalists, now headed by the Marquis of Ormond, that nobleman, after making terms with the parliament in Ireland, having been allowed to come over to England. Nor could the king control his own temper sufficiently to cloke his designs. In talking one day with Ireton, he had the folly to exclaim—"I shall play my game as well as I can!" Ireton instantly replied—"If your majesty have a game to play, you must give us also liberty to play ours."[1] On other occasions he grossly insulted both Ireton and Cromwell to their faces. And now, according to Ashburnham, Cromwell first began to talk of "the happy condition the people of this kingdom would be in if the government under which they in Holland lived were settled here;" and both Ireton and Cromwell were found "at a great distance to what formerly they appeared to be in relation to his majesty's good;" so that Ashburnham saw clearly that there was no more to be hoped from them. After his rude refusal of the "Proposals," Charles sent Sir John Berkeley to the army to desire a meeting with Ireton and the rest of the superior officers. Berkeley, putting a leading question, asked, "If the king should grant the Proposals, what would ensue?" The officers replied, that they would offer them to the parliament. "But," continued Berkeley, "if they refuse them, what will you do then?" They replied that they would not tell him. "I then returned," says Berkeley, "that I would tell them I would lose no more time with them; for if there came of proposals nothing but the propounding, I could then propound as well as they. They all replied that it was not for them to say directly what they would do against the parliament; but intimated that they did not doubt of being able to prevail with the parliament. When I appeared not fully satisfied with this reply, Rainsborough spoke out in these words—If they will not agree we will make them; to which the whole company assented." With this assurance — which was something weighty and wished for—Berkeley posted back to the king; but there, he says, he had "harder work with his majesty," who was still "far from consenting." "At this time," says Berkeley, "those that were supposed best inclined to his majesty in the army seemed much afflicted with his majesty's backwardness to concur with the army in the Proposals." Two or three days before the army got undisputed possession of London, and before it was commonly thought that the city would submit, Cromwell and Ireton requested that, since his majesty would not yield to the Proposals, yet he should, at least, send a kind letter to the army. A meeting was held at Windsor by Cromwell, Ireton, Berkeley, and Ashburnham, and a letter was immediately drawn up; but Charles would not sign it till after three or four days; that is, not until the army, contrary to the expectations of many persons, were become absolute masters of the city. Berkeley, making the best of the business for his master's honor, says, "Mr. Ashburnham and I went with it, at last, and, upon the way, met with messages to hasten it. But, before we came to Sion, the commissioners from London were arrived, and our letter was out of season; for, though his majesty was ignorant of the success when he signed the letter, yet, coming after it was known, it lost both its grace and its efficacy. All that the officers could do they did; which was, while the army was in the act of thanksgiving to God for their success, to propose that they should not be elevated with it, but keep still to their former engagements to his majesty, and, once more, solemnly vote the Proposals, which was accordingly done." Even after this, when his majesty was lodged at Hampton Court, "Mr. Ashburnham had daily some message or another from the king to Cromwell and Ireton, who had enough to do both in the parliament and council of the army—the one abounding with Presbyterians, the other with Levelers, and both really jealous that Cromwell and Ireton had made a private compact and bargain with the king, Lilburne printing books weekly to that effect. . . . On the other side, the Presbyterians were no less confident of their surmises; and, among them, Cromwell told me, that my Lady of a silken garter, should be fitted with a hempen cord. So the letter ended: which answer, as they waited for, so they intercepted accordingly—and it determined his fate. This letter Lord Oxford said he had offered £500 for."—Richardsoniana.

Morrice, in the Life of Lord Orrery, prefixed to the Orrery State Papers, gives a story in detail about the seizure of this important letter. He says that one day (in the year 1649) when Lord Broghil was riding between Cromwell and Ireton, Cromwell declared to him, that if the late king had followed his own mind and had trusty servants, he would have fooled them all; and further told his lordship that at one time they really intended to close with Charles. Broghil asked a question or two, to which Cromwell freely replied, saying, "The reason why we would once have closed with the king was this, we found that the Scots and the Presbyterians began to be more powerful than we; and if they had made up matters with the king, we should have been left in the lurch; therefore, we thought it best to prevent them, by offering first to come in upon any reasonable conditions." But, while they were occupied with these thoughts, they were told by one of their spies, who was of the king's bedchamber, that their doom was decreed by Charles, as they might see if they could only intercept a letter from the king to the queen, which letter was sewed up in the skirt of a saddle, and the bearer would be that night at the Blue Boar Inn, in Holborn, where he was to take horse for Dover. Upon this warning, Cromwell and Ireton, disguised as troopers, and with one trusty fellow with them, went to the inn, called for cans of beer, and continued drinking till the man with the saddle came in, when they seized the saddle, ripped up the skirts, and there found the letter, in which the king informed the queen that he was now courted by both factions—the Scotch Presbyterians and the army—and which bid fairest for him should have him; but he thought he should close with the Scots sooner than the other, &c. Upon this, Cromwell took horse and went to Windsor, and they immediately, from that time forward, resolved the king's ruin. This story is sufficiently romantic; but these were times full of romantic incidents, and we think it not improbable that something of the kind really happened. With Cromwell and his party it was matter of life or death to ascertain Charles's real intentions. Oliver, it is said, held the principle that it was right to be crafty with the crafty, and the men who acted with him had their eyes everywhere.

Carlisle affirmed that he was to be Earl of Essex and captain of the king's guards."[1]

About three weeks after the army had entered London, the Presbyterians in parliament, who were still a majority, encouraged by Lauderdale and the other Scottish commissioners, who, like themselves, held religious toleration to be monstrous wickedness, voted another solemn address to the king, which was conceived on the basis of the old nineteen propositions which had been presented at Newcastle. The army was, of course, very unwilling that the king should accept these propositions; and all Charles's friends were of opinion that it was unsafe for him to close with the enemies of the army while he was in its hands. And, therefore, he refused the articles offered by parliament, saying that he thought the Proposals of the army a better ground for an arrangement than these nineteen propositions, and again desiring a personal treaty. "We gave our friends in the army," says Berkeley, "a sight of this answer to parliament the day before it was sent, with which they seemed infinitely satisfied, and promised to use their utmost endeavors to procure a personal treaty, and, to my understanding, performed it: for both Cromwell and Ireton, with Vane and all their friends, seconded with great resolution this desire of his majesty. But, contrary to their and all men's expectations, they found a most general opposition, and that this message of his majesty had confirmed the jealousy of their private agreement with the king; so that the more it was urged by Cromwell, &c., the more it was rejected by the rest, who looked on them as their betrayers. The suspicions were so strong in the House, that they lost almost all their friends there; and the army that then lay about Putney were no less ill satisfied; for there came down shoals every day from London of the Presbyterian and Leveling parties, that fomented these jealousies; insomuch that Cromwell thought himself, or pretended it, not secure in his own quarters. The adjutators now began to change their discourses, and complained openly in their counsels both of the king and the malignants about his majesty. One of the first they voted from him was myself. They said that, since his majesty had not accepted of their Proposals, they were not obliged any further to them; that they were obliged to consult their own safety and the good of the kingdom, and to use such means toward both as they should find rational: and, because they met with strong opposition from Cromwell and Ireton, and most of the superior officers, and some even of the adjutators, they had many private solemn meetings in London, where they humbled themselves before the Lord, and sought his good pleasure, and desired that he would be pleased to reveal it to his saints, which they interpret those to be who are most violent or zealous (as they call it) in the work of the Lord. These found it apparent that God had, on the one side, hardened the king's heart and blinded his eyes, in not passing the Proposals, whereby they were absolved from offering them any more; and, on the other side, the Lord had led captivity captive, and put all things under their feet, and, therefore, they were bound to finish the work of the Lord, which was to alter the government according to their first design: and to this end they resolved to seize the king's person, and to take him out of Cromwell's hands."

[1] Memoirs of Sir John Berkeley.—What Berkeley adds immediately after these revelations is far too important to be overlooked in the story of these, in part, mysterious and almost inexplicable intrigues. "But these, and the like discourses made great impression on the army; to which Mr. Ashburnham's secret and long conferences contributed not a little, insomuch that the adjutators, who were wont to complain that Cromwell went too slow toward the king, began now to suspect that he had gone too fast, and left them behind him; from whence there were frequent complaints in the council of the army, of the intimacy Mr. Ashburnham and I had in the army; that Cromwell's and Ireton's door was open to us when it was shut to them; that they knew not why malignants should have so much countenance in the army and liberty with the king. These discourses, both in public and private, Cromwell seemed highly to be offended with; and, when he could carry any thing to his majesty's advantage among the adjutators, could not rest until he had made us privately partakers of it; but withal he told Mr. Ashburnham and me, that if he were an honest man, he had said enough of the sincerity of his intention—if he were not, nothing was enough; and therefore conjured us, as we tendered his majesty's service, not to come so frequently to his quarters, but send privately to him, the suspicions of him being grown to that height, that he was afraid to lie in his own quarters. But this had no operation upon Mr. Ashburnham, who alledged that we must show them the necessity of agreeing with the king, from their own disorders."

Thus threatened on all sides by the hatred and power of the Presbyterians and Scots, who had disliked him from the first—by the vacillation, insincerity, and duplicity of the king, and by the violence of the republican party in the army—Cromwell, by the instinct of self-preservation, was obliged to choose; and nobody can reasonably doubt that for his own safety the best choice he could make was the republican section. At the same time he and Ireton devised how they might at once check the spirit of mutiny and the leveling principles in politics which had spread so widely in the army. If we are to believe a story told by two cotemporaries, the hot-headed levelers already looked upon Cromwell as their greatest enemy; and our old acquaintance freeborn John, now Colonel John Lilburne, but a leader of the adjutators, in alliance with Wildman, another adjutator, a man of the same stamp, had formed a plot to assassinate him as a renegade to the cause of liberty.[1] Ireton agreed with Cromwell, that the best thing to do, under the circumstances, was to draw the army together to a general rendezvous at Ware; and, as Fairfax readily consented, that meeting was fixed for the 16th of November. As soon as the tumultuous part of the army had notice of it, they resolved, before the day of the rendezvous, to seize the king's person.[2] And these Levelers had already given indications which had filled Charles with terror: they had declared him to be an Ahab—a man of blood—an everlasting obstacle to peace and liberty, and they had called for justice upon his head as the cause of the murder of thousands of freeborn Englishmen. They had published "The Case of the Army," and "An Agreement of the People," which contained a new scheme of government on an essentially republican model, without king or lords. According to this constitution, the sovereignty resided solely in the people; parliaments were to be triennial, the elective franchise was to be extended, the representation to be distributed more equally; the law was to be reformed; and an entire freedom of conscience was to be granted to every man. Sixteen regiments seemed ready to draw the sword for this theory, and for the trial and punishment of the king. About a fortnight before the time appointed for the drawing together of the army, Ashburnham went from Hampton Court to Ditton, and told Sir John Berkeley that his majesty was really afraid of his life from the tumultuous part of the army, and was resolved to make his escape. Two nights after this interview Berkeley went to Hampton Court, where he was introduced privately by a back way. The king told him that he was afraid of his life, and that he would have him assist in his escape. Berkeley then asked which way his majesty would go; and Charles told him he should know that through Will Legge. It is generally asserted that it was Cromwell that gave Charles warning of his danger from the Levelers, though opinions are divided whether this were done out of a real regard to the king's safety, or as a device to frighten him into the hands of his worst enemies; but Berkeley, one of Charles's main agents, never alludes to Cromwell as the cause of the king's fears, and charges a very different party. "The Monday before," says Berkeley, "Mr. Ashburnham told me that the Scots had much tampering with the king, but could come to no agreement; that they would fain have his majesty out of the army, and to that end had much augmented his just fears." But Ashburnham, the other chief instrument, though he mentions that Lord Lanark and the Scotch commissioners had been with Charles, and engaged to assist him, does not mention their inspiring these fears, saying, "that his majesty . . . . being then confined to his chamber, was frequently advertised by persons of good affection to him, that there was some private practice upon his life; particularly Mr. Ackworth informed his majesty that Colonel Rainsborough was resolved to kill him."[1] Clarendon says—without any allusion to Cromwell—"The king every day received little billets or letters, secretly conveyed to him without any name, which advertised him of wicked designs upon his life: many who repaired to him brought the same advice from men of unquestionable sincerity." But, perhaps, without any warning from sincere friends, or any plot from Cromwell or from enemies, the manifestoes of the Levelers in the army, and the reports of their behavior, which must have reached the king's ears, were of themselves cause sufficient to make him tremble and fly. At one moment, it appears, Charles thought of taking refuge in the city of London. Berkeley says that Ashburnham asked him what he thought of his majesty's going privately to London, and appearing in the House of Lords, and that he (Berkeley) replied, very ill; because the army were absolutely masters both of the city and parliament, and would undoubtedly seize his majesty; and, if there should be but two swords drawn in the scuffle, they would accuse his majesty of beginning a new war, and proceed with him accordingly. Here again there is some discrepancy. Ashburnham says that he proposed that his master should ask the Scottish commissioners whether they would meet his majesty at the lord mayor's house in London (whither he, Ashburnham, undertook to carry him), and there declare their whole nation to be satisfied with the king's last answer to the propositions delivered to him, and endeavor to make all the Presbyterian party in the city acquiesce; and that, that being done, his majesty should instantly send to the House of Peers to make the like offer, with this addition—that if the Peers were not satisfied, he would go in person to their House, and, with reservation of his conscience and honor, give them all other imaginable contentment; that Lanark and the Scottish commissioners, after declaring that his majesty had never any thing in view since the beginning of his troubles that was so likely to do his work, and unanimously agreeing to do their parts, cooled upon reflection, and finally excused themselves upon the defect of their power to undertake so weighty a business without the knowledge and command of the estates of Scotland, saying, likewise, that it would be too hazardous an attempt both for his majesty and them; yet handsomely offering to wait upon him in the utmost dangers as private persons, though they could not do it as public ministers.[1] Ashburnham adds, that upon this his majesty commanded him to propose some other place for him to go to, he being resolved to stay no longer at Hampton Court. "I did then," he says, "calling to mind what Colonel Hammond had said to me some few days before, that he was going down to his government because he found the army was resolved to break all promises with the king, and that he would have nothing to do with such perfidious actions; as likewise what had passed between the king and the Scots commissioners, and between me and Sir John Berkeley, in their dissent from his majesty's going to London, unfortunately (in regard of the success, not of the ill choice of the place), offer to their thoughts Sir John Oglander's house in the Isle of Wight, where his majesty might continue concealed till he had gained the experience of the governor's inclinations to serve him, which, if good, that place would secure him certainly from the fears of any private conspiracy of the agitators at Putney (the principal end of his remove), there being then no soldiers of the army in that island; keep intelligence with the army if by any accident they should resume their desires of serving him (his flight from thence being liable to no other interpretation than to save his life); hold up the drooping hearts of his own party; give opportunity to the Scots or the Houses of parliament (both being then highly in opposition to the army) to make some further application to his majesty, and be more in readiness there than in any other part of the kingdom, to receive advantage by the fleet, if at any time the seamen should return to their duties. But if no conditions could be had from the governor, his majesty would be then close by the water-side, and might (when there should be no argument left for his stay) take boat and dispose of his person into what part beyond the seas he pleased."

[1] It is not the least perplexing part of this story that the chief actors in it—Berkeley and Ashburnham—frequently disagree with one another.

[1] The following passage fully agrees with the king's plans as they were made more evident afterward:—"One of the principal ends in that proposition was, to engage that nation (the Scotch) in such a public action as they would have no color left them to desert his majesty any more; that either they should have prospered and had a very remarkable part in his restoration, and the rewards justly due to their merits, or have run the same fortune with the king, whereby a certain foundation would have been laid for a faithful conjunction between his majesty and them."—Ashburnham's Narrative. Sir John Berkeley, in describing the journey or flight from Hampton Court, says that his majesty "complained very much of the Scots commissioners, who were the first that presented his dangers to him, and offered him expedients for his escape; but when he proposed to make use of those they had offered, they were full of objections to them, saying, that his coming into London was desperate, his hiding in England chimerical, and his escape to Jersey prevented." Berkeley adds other circumstances which reflect rather severely on the honor or sincerity of the Scotch commissioners.

Ashburnham adds, that Sir John Berkeley fully concurred in this plan; and that, having but a very little time to debate any thing, "so pressing, and so impatient was the king to be gone," they sent Mr. Legge to desire his majesty to come in the evening into the gallery at Hampton Court, where Sir John Berkeley and himself would find means to gain access to him; that the king met them at the place appointed; that he (Ashburnham) besought his majesty to say whether really and in very deed he was afraid of his life in that place, as his going from thence seemed to them likely to produce a very great change in his affairs; that his majesty protested to God that he had great cause to apprehend some attempt upon his person, and did expect every hour that it should be; that thereupon they said that it did not become them to make any further inquiry, but if his majesty would be pleased to say whither he would go, they would carry him thither or perish in the attempt; that the king replied that he had some thoughts of going out of the kingdom, but, for the shortness of the time to prepare a vessel, he was resolved to go to the Isle of Wight; and that then, the manner of his escape being agreed upon, they left him till the next night.

On the 11th of November, late at night, news reached London that the king was gone from Hampton Court. According to Rushworth, "about nine of the clock, the officers who attended him wondered he came not forth of his chamber, went in, and missed him within half an hour after his departure." He had left his cloke in the gallery, and some letters in his own handwriting upon the table in his withdrawing-room. One of these letters was addressed to the parliament, to the following effect:—"That liberty, the thing now generally pretended and aimed at, was as necessary for kings as any other; that he had a long time endured captivity and restraint, hoping it might tend to the settlement of a good peace; but, finding the contrary, and the unfixedness of the army, and new guards set upon him, he had withdrawn himself. That wheresoever he should be he would earnestly labor the settlement of a good peace, and to prevent the effusion of more blood; and if he might be heard with honor, freedom, and safety, he would instantly break through his cloud of retirement, and show himself ready to be Pater patriæ. Charles Rex."[1]

On the morrow the Lord Montague acquainted the House of Lords of the king's flight the preceding night; and a letter from Cromwell, dated on the 11th, at twelve at night, was read in the Commons. "signifying the king's escape; who went away about nine of the clock yesterday evening." On the 13th Colonel Whalley made a narrative to the Lords concerning his guarding of the king, and the manner of his majesty's escape.[2] On the same day the Scottish commissioners directed a letter to the Speaker of the House of Lords, stating that they had heard that his majesty was gone from Hampton Court, and desiring that both Houses would make known to them the certainty thereof. The Commons declared it to be high treason to conceal or harbor the king's person, or know of any that did without revealing it immediately to the speakers of both Houses, and that every person so guilty should forfeit his whole estate and die without mercy.

Neither Ashburnham nor Berkeley gives any clear account of the escape from Hampton Court. Ashburnham, indeed, says not a word about the journey until they were within less than twenty miles of the Isle of Wight. Berkeley says that on the Wednesday they had orders to send spare horses to Sutton. in Hampshire; and that on the Thursday his majesty, with Will Legge, came out at the close of the evening, and immediately went toward Oatlands, and so through the forest, where his majesty acted

[1] Whitelock; who adds, "On the night of the 11th news came to town of the king's escape; that the officers who attended him, wondering that he came not forth of his chamber, where he had been writing most part of the night before, went in and missed him: that posts were sent into all parts to discover and stay him."

[2] Journals.—Parl. Hist.—Whalley, in a letter to the Speaker of the House of Commons, says, "And as for the manner, Mr. Speaker, of the king's going away, it was thus. Mondays and Thursdays were the king's set days for his writing letters, to be sent into foreign parts. His usual time for coming out of his bed-chamber on those days was betwixt five and six o'clock. Presently after he went to prayers. And about half an hour after that to supper; at which times I set guards about his bed-chamber. Because he made no long stay after supper before he retired himself thither. About five of the clock I came into the room next his bed-chamber, where I found the commissioners and bed-chamber men. I asked them for the king: they told me he was writing letters in his bed-chamber. I waited without mistrust till six of the clock; I then began to doubt, &c." The following account was given by a newspaper of the day:—"Nov. 11. This day will be famous in aftertimes, because toward the end of it his majesty escaped a kind of restraint, under which he was at Hampton Court; and, according to the best relation, thus:—He, as was usual, went to be private a little before evening prayer; staying somewhat longer than usual, it was taken notice of; yet at first without suspicion; but he not coming forth suddenly, there were fears, which increased by the crying of a grayhound again and again within; and upon search it was found that the king was gone; and by the way of Paradise, a place so called in the garden; in probability suddenly after his going in, and about twilight. He left a paper to the parliament, another to the commissioners, and a third to Colonel Whalley."—The Moderate Intelligencer, from Thursday, Nov. 14, to Thursday, Nov. 18, 1647, as quoted by Lord Ashburnham, in Vindication of the Character and Conduct of John Ashburnham. There is confirmation for this touching little newspaper story about the crying of the poor hound that missed its master. In the postscript to one of the letters which Charles left on his table, he said to Whalley, "I had almost forgot to desire you to send the black-gray bitch to the Duke of Richmond." And Sir Philip Warwick tells us that Charles had a great love for grayhounds, preferring them much to spaniels. In the same letter to Whalley there are other and more affecting passages relating to Charles's disposal of the family pictures he had kept with him at Hampton Court.

as guide. The other particulars given by Berkeley are, that that November night was exceedingly dark and stormy; that they lost their way in the forest, though his majesty was so well acquainted with it; that in the course of conversation the king agreed that the Scottish commissioners had deceived him in saying that he (Berkeley) had a ship ready, and that that ship had been discovered; and that they had so acted in order that "by this means his majesty, being excluded from all other means of escaping, should have been necessitated to make use of Scotland." Berkeley does not pretend, however, that he had ever had any ship, but intimates that he expected that Ashburnham, who kept the king's money, would have provided some vessel. If we are to credit Berkeley, Charles, even in that stormy night was undecided whither he would go. "I asked his majesty," says he, "which way he would go," and his majesty replied that he hoped to be at Sutton three hours before day, and that, while our horses were making ready, we would consider what course to take. But, what by the length and badness of the road, the darkness of the night, and our going at least ten miles out of our way, it was day-break when we came to our inn at Sutton, where our servant came out to us, and told us there was a committee of the county then sitting about the parliament's business." Berkeley goes on to say, that thereupon, without venturing into Sutton, they sent for their horses out, and continued their way toward Southampton; that, on descending a hill, they all alighted, and, leading their horses in their hands, consulted what they were to do; and that then for the first time, for aught he (Berkeley) could discover, his majesty resolved to go to the Isle of Wight. Ashburnham, on the other hand, who has before asserted that Berkeley knew every thing, and fully concurred in the scheme of going to the Isle of Wight, says, that now his majesty's mind was changed, and he would not go into the isle until he knew how the governor would receive him. These two managers of the flight agree in stating that they were sent forward to confer with Hammond; and that his majesty, with Legge, went to a house of my Lord Southampton's at Titchfield, there to wait till he heard from them. But Berkeley relates other circumstances, of which Ashburnham says nothing, affirming that they carried with them (to show to the Governor of the Isle of Wight) a copy of the letter his majesty left at Hampton Court, and of two letters sent to him, one from Cromwell, the other without a name, both expressing great apprehensions and fears of the designs of the leveling party in the army and city against his majesty; that from Cromwell adding, that, "in prosecution thereof, a new guard was the next day to be put upon his majesty of that party." There are other disagreements in the accounts of these two servants of royalty, who both endeavor to exculpate themselves from the charge of being the cause of leading the king into captivity (that either of them did so knowingly we can not credit), and who were both but too ready to seek to relieve themselves from their share in the misadventure, at the expense of any body and every body else. We believe, for our own part, that their heads and that of the king as well were utterly bewildered, that they knew not what to do for the best, and the circumstances of the case may well excuse their confusion and wavering. Berkeley says that they came to Lymington that night, but could not pass over to the island by reason of a violent storm: that the next morning they got over and went to Carisbrook Castle, where the governor dwelled; that, at Mr. Ashburnham's desire, he took Hammond aside, and delivered the king's message to him word for word. "But," continues Sir John, "he grew so pale, and fell into such a trembling, that I did really believe he would have fallen off his horse; which trembling continued with him at least an hour after, in which he broke out into passionate and distracted expressions, sometimes saying, O, gentlemen, you have undone me by bringing the king into the island, if, at least, you have brought him; and, if you have not, pray let him not come; for, what between my duty to his majesty, and my gratitude for this fresh obligation of confidence, on the one hand, and my observing my trust to the army, on the other, I shall be confounded. Otherwhile he would talk to a quite contrary purpose. I remember that, to settle him the better, I said that, God be thanked, there was no harm done; that his majesty intended a favor to him and his posterity, in giving himself an occasion to lay a great obligation upon him, and such as was very consistent with his relation to the army, who had so solemnly engaged themselves to his majesty: but if he thought otherwise his majesty would be far from imposing his person upon him. To that he replied, that then, if his majesty should come to any mischance, what would the army and kingdom say to him that had refused to receive him? To this I replied, that he did not refuse him who was not come to him. He returned, that he must needs know where his majesty was, because he knew where we were. I told him he was never the nearer for my part. He then began a little to sweeten, and to wish that his majesty should have reposed himself absolutely upon him, because it would have been much the better for both. I then went to Mr. Ashburnham, and told him that this governor was not a man for our purpose, and that, for my part, I would never give my consent that his majesty should trust him. Mr. Ashburnham acknowledged that he did not like him; yet, on the other side, he much feared what would become of his majesty if he should be discovered before he had made his point, and made appear what his intention was: for then he would be accused of what his enemies pleased to lay upon him." Thus far Sir John Berkeley. But Ashburnham describes this strange scene very differently. He says that, on first addressing the governor, Berkeley asked him who he thought was very near him! That Hammond said he knew not; and that Berkeley replied, "Even good King Charles, who is come from Hampton Court for fear of being murdered privately." "This," continues Ashburnham, "was, to speak modestly, a very un skillful entrance into our business, nothing being to be preserved with greater secrecy from him, than that the king was come from Hampton Court, our pretense naturally being to have to return thither with his answer, to the end that his majesty might have made a judgment of Hammond's resolution at his own leisure, which of necessity he must have done, if Sir John Berkeley had not discovered that the king was so near him." Ashburnham confirms Berkeley's account of Hammond's confusion. "At the first," says he, "the governor seemed very much discomposed, but, after some pause, desired to know what his majesty would expect from him. I told him, to preserve him in honor and safety so as became his duty to the peace of the nation, by a happy reconciliation between him and the parliament and army; so he desired we would dine with him, and he would think further of what we had proposed, professing to be very willing to serve the king." Ashburnham goes on to inform us that, by this invitation to dinner, Sir John Berkeley and he got opportunity to confer together, and concluded that, as his majesty was in great danger to be taken if he stayed where he then was, it was necessary they should shorten the work with the governor by desiring his positive answer to this question—whether he would deliver his majesty to the parliament or army, in case they should desire unreasonable things from him, such as were altogether repugnant to his conscience and honor, and such as he must refuse to grant; that the governor hesitated a little, but, after debating the question for a while with Sir John Berkeley alone, he cheerfully offered to bind himself thus far, that, since it appeared his majesty came from Hampton Court to save his life, if he pleased to put himself into his hands, whatever he could expect from a person of honor or honesty his majesty should have it made good by him; and that then both Ashburnham and Berkeley, setting still before them the sad apprehensions of the king's being pursued and taken before they could get back to him, concluded upon closing with this engagement. Berkeley, on the other side, saying not a word about the invitation to dinner, asserts that the conference apart was between Ashburnham and the governor; that, after some conference, they came both to him, when the governor said that, since they desired it, he would say that, because his majesty had made choice of him as a person of honor and honesty, to lay this great trust upon, he would not deceive his majesty's expectations; that thereupon he (Berkeley), more cautious than his companion, replied that the governor's expressions were too general, and did not come home to their instructions from the king; that Hammond then made many discourses not much to the purpose, during which time he kept himself between him (Berkeley) and Mr. Ashburnham, and when he found him still unsatisfied, he told him that he was harder to content than Mr. Ashburnham, and that he believed his majesty would be much easier pleased than either of them; and that thereupon he (Hammond) concluded that Berkeley should go into the castle, and that Mr. Ashburnham should take his horse and go to the king, and tell his majesty what he had said. "I embraced the motion," continues Berkeley, "most readily, and immediately went over the bridge into the castle, though I had the image of the gallows very perfectly before me. Mr. Ashburnham went, I believe, with a better heart to horse: but before he was gone half a flight-shot, the governor, being before the castle gate, called to him, and had a conference of at least a quarter of an hour with him, to what purpose I never knew until I came into Holland, where a gentleman of good worth and quality told me that the governor affirmed afterward in London, and in many places, that he then offered to Mr. Ashburnham that I should go and he should stay, as believing his majesty to be less willing to expose him than me, but that Mr. Ashburnham absolutely refused.[1] Whatever passed between them, I am sure they came both back to me; and the governor, putting himself between us, said that he would say that which he was sure ought to content any reasonable man, which was, that he did believe his majesty relied on him, as on a person of honor and honesty, and therefore he did engage himself to us, to perform whatever could be expected from a person of honor and honesty. Before I could make any, Mr. Ashburnham made this reply—I will ask no more. The governor then added, Let us all go to the king, and acquaint him with it. Mr. Ashburnham answered, With all my heart. I then broke from the governor, who held me in his hand, and went to Mr. Ashburnham, and said, What! do you mean to carry this man to the king before you know whether he will approve of this undertaking or no? Undoubtedly you will surprise him. Mr. Ashburnham said nothing but—I'll warrant you. And so you shall, said I; for you know the king much better than I do. . . . . Well; he would take that upon him. I then desired he would not let the governor carry any other person with him, that, in all events, we might the more easily secure him (the governor), which he consented to. Nevertheless, when we came to Cowes Castle, where we were to take boat, Hammond took Basket, the governor of the castle, along with him; and when I complained of it to Mr. Ashburnham, he answered, it was no matter, for that we should be able to do well enough with them two." Though he tells the story somewhat differently, taking to himself the credit of refusing to stir if Hammond should take any soldiers with them, Ashburnham agrees with Berkeley in the main point of their conducting Hammond to the king's hiding place, saying, "I presently laid hold of his going to the king, and was very glad of that motion, there being no better salve, in any understanding, for the only difficulty which rested with me, which was, that his majesty would not be at liberty to do any thing else, in case he should not approve of what was tendered to him.

[1] Ashburnham says that Sir John Berkeley offered himself to stay, which proposal he (Ashburnham) did not much dispute, both because he thought that part (the staying in the castle) least dangerous, "signifying only a man's drawing his neck out of the collar," and because he (Ashburnham) believed himself likely to be the more useful of the two to his majesty in case he had taken up any other resolution, as he well knew all the sea-coasts of that country. How Berkeley's going into a strong castle—which he himself says he did with the fear of the gallows before his eyes—can be described as a man's drawing his neck out of the collar, we are at a loss to understand.

The governor having then the knowledge of his being come from Hampton Court, and not far from him, would certainly have sent spies with either of us, and so have been sure to have seized him, if he should have taken any other course; and by his going I conceived a good expedient was offered to put into his majesty's power to dispose of himself any other way, if he liked not to go to the Isle of Wight upon these conditions."

What the good expedient was which offered itself to Ashburnham's mind we shall see presently. Crossing the narrow strait which separates the beautiful isle from the main, the party landed, and went on all together—Berkeley, Ashburnham, Hammond, and Basket—to the Lord Southampton's house; and there, as the two narrators agree, Ashburnham first went up and spoke with Charles. He himself says, that when he had made the whole relation, the king told him, with a very severe and reserved countenance, that notwithstanding the engagement he verily believed the governor would make him a prisoner. "I presumed to tell him," continues Ashburnham, "that I was sure his instructions had been fully obeyed, they being to try what conditions we could get for him; but since what was done did not please him, I was happy that I had provided an expedient; so that if he would say what other course he would steer, I would take order that the governor should not interrupt him. (It would be curious to know whether Hammond had any notion of the risk he was running in accompanying this very desperate servant of royalty.) His majesty asked me how that could possibly be, since the governor was come with us? I answered, that his coming made any other way more practicable than if he had stayed behind. He then told me that he had sent to Hampton for a vessel, to transport him into France, and was in good hope to be supplied, and that he expected news of it every moment, but earnestly pressed to know how I would clear him of the governor; I answered that I was resolved and prepared to kill him and the captain with my own hands. His majesty, walking some few turns in the room, and (as he was afterward pleased to tell me) weighing what I had proposed to him, and considering, that if the ship should not come, it would not be many hours before some (in pursuance of him) would seize him, the consequence whereof he very much apprehended, resolved he would not have execution done upon the governor, for he intended to accept of what he had proffered, and to go with him, and therefore commanded he should be called up—Sir John Berkeley being not yet come to the king."[1] The governor (Hammond) and Sir John Berkeley were then called up. "His majesty," says Berkeley, "judged that it was now too late to boggle, and therefore received Hammond cheerfully, who promised more to his majesty than he had done to us; and we all went over that night to the Cowes." The next morning they went to Carisbrook Castle—Charles being comforted on the way by divers gentlemen of the island, who assured him that the whole island was in his favor, except the governors of the castles and Hammond's captains. The king had for a while nothing to complain of, and no apparent grounds for any other than feelings of satisfaction: he was allowed to ride abroad, and led to believe that he might freely quit the island whenever he chose. His friends at a distance approved, by their letters, the step he had taken; and he and Ashburnham assailed the governor very prosperously: so that Hammond and his captains seemed to desire nothing but that he would send a civil message to the Houses, signifying his inclination to peace and agreement. Three days after their arrival at Carisbrook, the parliament, informed by Hammond where the king was, send to demand his three attendants—Ashburnham, Berkeley, and Legge; but the governor refused to let them go. At the same time, nevertheless, Hammond attended to the order that he was to guard the person of the king with all vigilance.

On the fifth day after their arrival in the Isle of Wight, Charles and his friends learned the result of the rendezvous of the army, which they had looked forward to with extreme anxiety, apprehending nothing but destruction from the triumph of the mutinous soldiery. Nor had Cromwell been less anxious: the Levelers had accused him of taking the king out of their hands and smuggling him away; and they had threatened to take the life of the renegade. But wise measures had been adopted; Fairfax had set his high name and authority against the adjutators and Levelers, and at the decisive moment it was found that that faction was numerically weak. When the troops met at Ware, only two regiments—Harrison's horse and Robert Lilburne's foot, who both came to the ground wearing in their hats the motto "The people's freedom and the soldier's rights"—showed any mutinous spirit. Cromwell, followed by some of his favorite officers, galloped into the ranks of these mutineers, seized one of the ringleaders, and caused him to be shot on the instant; and in that single instant all opposition vanished. The army was thus again united, but it was presently seen that Ireton and Cromwell, though they had checked the ultra-revolutionary Levelers, had thrown themselves into the republican movement. Within a week after the rendezvous at Ware, the officers of the army and a vast number of the soldiers waited upon Cromwell and Ireton, and told them, that though

[1] Berkeley, who acknowledges that he was not present, thus describes what passed between the king and Ashburnham. "I afterward understood, that when Mr. Ashburnham had given an account of our message and the governor's answer, and came to say that he was come along with us to make good what he had promised, his majesty struck himself upon the breast, and said, What! have you brought Hammond with you? O, you have undone me; for I am by this means made fast from stirring. Mr. Ashburnham replied, that if he mistrusted Hammond, he would undertake to secure him. His majesty said, I understand you well enough; but the world would not excuse me. For, if I should follow that counsel, it would be said, and believed, that he (Hammond) had ventured his life for me, and that I had unworthily taken it from him. No, it is too late now to think of any thing but going through the way you have forced upon me, and to leave the issue to God. But when his majesty began anew to wonder that he could make so great an oversight, Mr. Ashburnham, having no more to reply, wept bitterly."

they were certain to perish in the enterprise, they would leave nothing unattempted to bring the whole army over to their side; and that, if all failed, they would make a division in the army, and join with any one who would assist them in the destruction of those that should oppose them. This signified that Cromwell and Ireton must join the republican party, or lose every thing. It is said that Cromwell and his son-in-law thereupon concluded that, since they could not bring the army over to their views, it would be best for them to comply with the demands of the army—a schism between them being sure destruction to both parties. In pursuance of this resolution, Cromwell bent all his thoughts to make his peace with that party which was most opposed to the king—acknowledging to them that the glory of the world had so dazzled his eyes that he could not discern clearly the great works that the Lord was doing. And from this time it is certain that the commonwealth or republican party, both in the army and in parliament, were resolved to decline treating with the king for his restoration to the exercise of the royal authority, upon any terms at all, thinking it safer and better, for the permanent peace and welfare of the nation, to settle the state without him.[1]

In the mean time Charles had sent Sir John Berkeley from the Isle of Wight with letters to Fairfax, Cromwell, and Ireton, at Windsor. "As I was half-way between Bagshot and Windsor," says Berkeley, "Cornet Joyce, a great adjutator, and he that had taken the king from Holmby, overtook me. . . . Upon my discourses with him, I found that it had been discoursed among the adjutators, whether for their justification the king ought not to be brought to a trial; which he held in the affirmative: not, he said, that he would have one hair of his head to suffer, but that they might not bear the blame of the war." On reaching Windsor, Berkeley went to Fairfax's quarters, and found the officers met there in a general council. After waiting an hour he was admitted into that full assembly; and, having delivered his letters to the general, he was desired to withdraw. After waiting another half hour he was again called in. "The general," says he, "looked very severely upon me, and, after his manner, said that they were the parliament's army, and therefore could not say any thing to his majesty's motion of peace, but must refer those matters to them, to whom they would send his majesty's letters." Berkeley then looked about, upon Cromwell and Ireton and the rest of his acquaintance among the officers, who saluted him very coldly, and had their countenance quite changed toward him. The next morning Berkeley contrived to let Cromwell know that he had secret letters of instruction to him from the king; but Cromwell now sent him word that he durst not see him, bade him be assured that he would serve his majesty as long as he could do it without his own ruin, but desired him not to expect that he should perish for the king's sake. Berkeley thereupon proceeded to London, and put himself in communication with the lords Lauderdale and Lanark. At the same time, the queen was applied to for a ship of war to carry off Charles from the Isle of Wight. Almost at the same moment, while the parliament were again deliberating about fresh propositions to be sent to the king, Charles addressed a letter to the Speaker of the Lords' House, to be communicated also to the House of Commons. He reiterated his scruples of conscience concerning the abolition of episcopacy, but said that he hoped he should satisfy the parliament with his reasons, if he might personally treat with them. The commissioners of Scotland, who were almost frantic at the triumphant march of the Independents, urged with great vehemence that this desire of the king for a personal treaty might be granted. The parliament "resolved upon a middle way," and on the 14th of December they passed four propositions, drawn up in the form of acts, which, when the king had signed, he was to be admitted to a personal treaty at London. These propositions were—1. That his majesty should concur in a bill for settling of the militia. 2. That he should call in all declarations, oaths, and proclamations, against the parliament, and those who had adhered to them. 3. That all the lords who were made after the great seal was carried away should be rendered incapable of sitting in the House of Peers. 4. That power should be given to the two Houses of Parliament to adjourn as they should think fit. The commissioners of Scotland, who had been acted upon by Lauderdale and Lanark and Berkeley, and who had received several communications from Charles himself, protested against the sending of these four bills to the king before he should be treated with at London. On the 24th of December the bills were presented to Charles at Carisbrook Castle, where the king, understanding the mind of the Scots, and the factions in London, absolutely refused to give his assent; and the commissioners, with this stern denial, returned to London. But, by this time, Charles, notwithstanding his scruples of conscience, had made up his mind to a secret treaty with the Scots, in which he engaged to renounce episcopacy and accept the covenant, the Scots, on their part, engaging to restore him by force of arms; and on the 28th of December he privately signed this treaty.

A.D. 1648. And now Charles thought of flying from the Isle of Wight, being probably alike apprehensive of the consequences of his refusing the four propositions of parliament, and of those which must follow any detection of his treaty with the Scots, or of his other plans—for other plans of various kinds were certainly entertained. But Hammond had now sent Ashburnham, Berkeley, and Leggo out of the island, so that they could no longer be active in the business of contriving the king's escape from Carisbrook, and the guards had been doubled at the castle. In fact, Charles was now, for the first time, a close prisoner. A French vessel had arrived in Southampton Water, but it was dismissed. Ashburnham and Berkeley, however, kept a relay of saddle-horses on the coast, hoping that Charles might get out of the castle; and such was the activity and ingenuity of these men, and of the king himself, that an active correspondence was still carried on between the royal captive and his friends in France, Scotland, and London. On one dark night Charles well-nigh got out of the castle. "Being confident," says Ashburnham, "of the assistance of one about him, and having discovered (upon trial) that he could pass his body between the bars of the window of his chamber, because he found there was room for his head (the rule being that where the head can pass the body may); but most unhappily he mistook the way of measure. for, instead of putting forth his head sideways, he did it right forward; by which error, when all things were adjusted for his escape the second time, and that he thought to put in execution what he thought so sure (his passage through the window) he stuck fast in it, and (as he was pleased to send me word) did strain so much in the attempt as he was in great extremity, though with long and painful strugglings he got back again without any certain notice taken by any man but by him who waited to have served him when he had come down." On another occasion a drum beat suddenly at dead of night in the quiet little island town of Newport; and one Captain Burley tried to get up an insurrection and rescue the king—"a design so impossible for those that undertook it to effect, they consisting chiefly of women and children, without any arms, saving one musket, that no sober man could possibly have been engaged in it." Poor Burley was made prisoner and subsequently put to death as a traitor. Silken cords wherewith to descend, and aqua fortis wherewith to corrode the bars of his prison, it is said, were adroitly conveyed to the royal prisoner.[1] But the parliament was now working with more corrosive acids. On the 3d of January, 1648. the Commons took into consideration the king's refusal of their four propositions. "The dispute," says May, "was sharp, vehement, and high, about the state and government of the commonwealth; and many plain speeches made of the king's obstinate averseness and the people's too long patience. It was there affirmed, that the king, by this denial, had denied his protection to the people of England, for which only subjection is due from them; that, one being taken away, the other falls to the ground; that it is very unjust and absurd that the parliament, having so often tried the king's affections, should now betray to an implacable enemy both themselves and all those friends who, in a most just cause, had valiantly adventured their lives and fortunes; that nothing was now left for them to do but to take care for the safety of themselves and their friends, and settle the commonwealth (since otherwise it could not be) without the king."[2] Sir Thomas Wroth declared that kings of late had carried themselves as if they were more fit for Bedlam than Tophet—that he cared not what forms of government were set up, so it were not by kings or devils; and there were other members equally violent against monarchical government. Ireton spoke with great force, declaring that the king had denied that protection to the people which was the condition of their obedience to him; that they ought not to desert the brave men who had fought for them beyond all possibility of retreat or forgiveness, and who would never forsake the parliament, unless the parliament first forsook them. "After some further debate, Cromwell brought up the rear. It was time, he said, to answer the public expectation; that they were able and resolved to govern and defend the kingdom by their own power, and teach the people they had nothing to hope from a man whose heart God hardened in obstinacy." It is said, that in warning the House of the danger of driving the army to despair, he laid his hand upon his sword, and told them he trembled to think of what might follow.[1] The end of all this was a vote, in which the Lords concurred with the Commons —that no further addresses or applications should be made to the king, or any message received from him, without the consent of both Houses, under the penalties of high treason.[2] At the same time, it was voted that a committee should draw up a declaration to satisfy the kingdom.

This learned and acute writer adds, "And in this resolution Cromwell, since his late reconciliation with the Commonwealth party, seems to have concurred; but till that event, I conceive him to have continued sincere in his professions of attachment to the king, and his desire of being the chief instrument of his restoration to the royal authority upon the moderate proposals drawn up by Commissary general Ireton, or such others as might be thought sufficient to protect the liberties and privileges of the people against any future attempts of arbitrary power in the crown.

[1] According to Herbert, while Charles was in Carisbrook Castle he spent much of his time in reading. "The Sacred Scripture was the book he most delighted in: he read often in Bishop Andrews' Sermons, Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity, Dr. Hammond's works, Villalpandus upon Ezekiel, Sands's Paraphrase of King David's Psalms, Herbert's Divine Poems, and also Godfrey of Bulloigne, writ in Italian by Torquato Tasso, and done into English heroic verse by Mr. Fairfax—a poem his majesty much commended—as he did also Ariosto, by Sir John Harrington, a facetious poet, much esteemed, &c., and Spenser's Fairy Queen, and the like, for alleviating his spirits after serious studies."—Memoirs.

On the 9th of January there was sent up from head-quarters at Windsor, "a declaration from his Excellency Sir Thomas Fairfax and the general council of the army, of their resolution to adhere to the parliament, in their proceedings concerning the king." After a rapid review of the history of the case, of the king's denials, &c., this remarkable declaration ended thus: "We do freely declare for ourselves and the army, that we are resolved, through the grace of God, firmly to adhere to, and stand by, the parliament, in the things voted concerning the king, and in what shall be further necessary for prosecution thereof, and for settling and securing of the parliament and kingdom, without the king, and against him, or any other that shall hereafter partake with him."[3] Both Houses passed a vote of thanks to the army for this declaration.

The Scottish commissioners, whose secret treaty with the king was more than suspected, now ran down to Scotland to prepare for war. As long as these noble Scots remained in London, and in good agreement with the English parliament, they had had a share in the executive power, which was vested in a committee of both kingdoms. Now this executive power was lodged solely in an English committee, called the Committee for the Safety of the Commonwealth. It was composed of seven peers—the earls of Northumberland, Kent, Warwick, and Manchester; the lords Saye, Wharton, and Roberts, and thirteen members of the House of Commons—Mr. Pierpoint, Mr. Fiennes, Sir Harry Vane, senior, Harry Vane, junior, Sir William Armine, Sir Arthur Hazelrig, Sir Gilbert Gerrard, Sir John Evelyn, Lieutenant-general Cromwell, Mr. St. John, Mr. Wallop, Mr. Crew, and Mr. Browne, who all sat together at Derby House, and who had power to suppress tumults and insurrections, and to raise forces as they saw occasion. Part of the army, which had certainly overawed the House of Lords and driven them into compliances, was now quartered about Westminster, the Mews, and the city. "The parliament," says May, "though victorious, though guarded with a gallant army, no forces visibly appearing against it, was never in more danger. All men began, in the spring, to prophesy that the summer would be a hot one, in respect of wars, seeing how the countries were divided in factions, the Scots full of threats, the city of London as full of unquietness. And more sad things were feared, where least seen; rumors every day frightening the people of secret plots and treasonable meetings. . . . The king's party began to swell with great hopes, and look upon themselves not as vanquished, but as conquerors; nor could they forbear vaunting every where, and talking of the king's rising, and the ruin of the parliament. The same thing seemed to be the wish of those whom they called Presbyterians, who were ready to sacrifice themselves and their cause to their hatred against the Independents, who wished that quite undone which themselves could not do, and desired that liberty might be quite taken away by the king, rather than vindicated by the Independents. The king himself (though set aside, and confined within the Isle of Wight) was more formidable this summer than in any other, when he was followed by his strongest armies. The name of king had now a further operation, and the pity of the vulgar gave a greater majesty to his person. Prince Charles also, by his absence, and the name of banishment, was more an object of affection and regard to those vulgar people than he had ever been before; and, by his commissions (which his father privately sent him), seeming to be armed with lawful power, did easily command those that were willing to obey him; and, by commands, under his name, was able to raise (as will afterward appear), not only tumults, but wars."

In the course of the late debate, which ended in the vote against more addresses, one member of the Commons at least had proposed setting the king aside and confining him for life in some inland fortress; but the present aspect of things showed that, be where he would, Charles would ever be a most dangerous enemy. The first insurrectionary movement of any consequence took place in London, upon Sunday, the 9th of April, when a mob of apprentices and other young people stoned a captain of the trainbands, in Moorfields, took away his colors, and marched in disorderly rout to Westminster, crying out, as they went, "King Charles! King Charles!" They were quickly scattered by a troop of horse that sallied out of the King's Mews; but, running back into the city, they filled it with fears and disorders all that Sabbath night, broke open houses to procure arms, and enforced the lord mayor to escape privately out of his house and fly into the Tower. On the morrow morning Fairfax stopped this mischief in the beginning, but not without bloodshed. Shortly after, a body of about three hundred men came out of Surrey to Westminster, demanding that the king should presently be restored. As they cursed the parliament and insulted the soldiers on guard there, a collision ensued, in which several lives were lost. At the same time the men of Kent drew together in great numbers, and, on the other side of the Thames, Essex became the scene of a great rising for the king. In various other parts of the kingdom there were tumultuary gatherings or attempts made by the royalists to surprise castles and magazines of arms. Pontefract Castle was nearly carried in the night by eighty cavaliers, each with a foot-soldier mounted behind him. The Presbyterians, uniting with the concealed royalists, seemed again to acquire the ascendency in the House of Commons; and to Cromwell and the Independents the triumph of the Presbyterians would have been nothing less than destruction. On the 24th of April[1] a Presbyterian majority voted that the military posts and defenses of the city of London should again be intrusted to the common council; and four days after they carried their motion that the government of the kingdom should continue to be by king, lords, and commons, and that a new treaty should be opened with King Charles, notwithstanding the recent vote of non-addresses. And, being as intolerant as ever—hating the Independents much more on account of their religious opinions than on that of their republicanism—they revived an ordinance which punished heresy and blasphemy with death.

The men of Kent, after threatening the parliament for some time at a distance, marched boldly upon London. Fairfax encountered them in the end of May on Blackheath, with seven regiments, and drove them back to Rochester. But Lord Goring, with several officers of the late army of the king, made head again and got into Gravesend, while other bodies of the Kentish men took possession of Canterbury and tried to take Dover. Ireton and Rich soon gave an account of the latter, and Goring was soon fain to cross the Thames and raise his standard in Essex. He was followed by Fairfax, who drove him into Colchester, and shut him up in that place. Simultaneously with these movements the royalists had risen in Wales and had taken Pembroke Castle; and at this time it may be said that scarcely any part of England was quiet. But victorious Cromwell got again to horse, rode rapidly into Wales, defeated Langhorn and the royalists there, and retook Pembroke Castle. The whole of the north of England was in commotion, and every day a Scottish army was expected across the borders, not to fight as aforetime against the king, but for him. Upon the return of their commissioners, the Scottish parliament, after demanding from the English the establishment of presbytery, the extirpation of heresy, the disbanding of Fairfax's heretical army, the immediate restoration of the king, and other things equally unlikely to be granted, voted that they would preserve the union and ends of the covenant, and oppose the popish, prelatical, and malignant party, as well as the sectaries, if they should be put to engage in a new war; that they would endeavor to rescue his majesty, and put the kingdom of Scotland into a posture of defense. And soon after they began to raise an army, not for the defense of Scotland, but for the invasion of England. Duke Hamilton and his party, who managed these matters, took care to proclaim that Charles would take the covenant, and give his assurance by oath and under his hand and seal to uphold the true Presbyterian kirk; but the old Covenanters, now headed by Argyle, the declared enemy of Hamilton, and the clergy, the most effective soldiers in all these warfares, were as far as possible from being satisfied with these assurances, and soon the whole kirk of Scotland cursed the war as impious. The vote which Hamilton had carried in parliament was for 30,000 foot and 6000 horse; but he could only raise 10,000 foot and 400 horse, nor even these till the month of July, by which time Cromwell and Ireton and Fairfax had restored order in most parts of England. When the Scots crossed the borders, they were disgusted and horrified at the thought of being joined by the English royalists under Langdale, because they were prelatists or papists, or men that had fought against the blessed covenant. The forces of the parliament in the north, being too weak to risk a battle, retreated before Langdale and Hamilton, but not far; for Cromwell, who had entirely finished his work in Wales, came up, joined Lambert and Lilburne, surprised Langdale near Preston, in Lancashire, drove him back upon the main body of the Scots, and then, on the same day, completely routed Hamilton, whom the conqueror pursued to Warrington. Lieutenant-general Baillie, with a great part of the Scotch army, who had only quarter for their lives, was taken prisoner. Duke Hamilton himself was captured within a few days at Uttoxeter, and Langdale not long after was taken in a little village near Widmerpool. And this was the success of Duke Hamilton's invasion of England to liberate the king. His party, never strong in Scotland, was utterly annihilated; Argyle, the friend and correspondent of Cromwell, organized a new government,[1] invited the conqueror, who had pursued part of the routed army beyond the Tweed, to Edinburgh Castle, and there most honorably entertained him. Thanks were given by the ministers to Cromwell, whom they styled the preserver of Scotland under God. And it was forthwith ordered by the committee of estates and the assembly of the kirk, that no man who had joined with Hamilton in the late invasion of England should be elected for the new parliament or admitted a member of the assembly, for the faction of Hamilton were adjudged enemies to religion and to both the kingdoms.[2]

[1] On the preceding day, "at a conference, the Lords acquainted the Commons that the Duke of York, with the Duke of Gloucester, and the Lady Elizabeth, being together playing in a room the last night after supper by themselves, the Duke of York privately slipped from them down the back stairs, without cloak or coat, in his shoes and stockings, and by the way of the Privy Garden, having got a key of the door, he escaped away through the park, and could not be found."—Whitelock. Charles, who, as we have mentioned, contrived to maintain communications with St. James's, had ordered his second son to fly.

On the 16th of October, having finished his business in Scotland, Cromwell left Edinburgh, being conducted some miles on his road by Argyle and the Scottish nobles of that party, at whose parting great demonstrations of affection passed betwixt them.[1] During his absence in the north the royalists had not been idle in the south. The Earl of Holland, who had served and deserted every party, veered round once more to the court, irritated by the contempt in which the parliament held him, and animated perhaps by a hope that the Presbyterians, united with the Scots, must now prove victorious. He corresponded with Duke Hamilton, and engaged to make a rising in London on the same day on which Hamilton should cross the border. And upon the 5th of July, while Fairfax was busy at Colchester, he collected five hundred horse in the city, and called upon the citizens to join him for King Charles. This call was little heeded, for the citizens had suffered severely for their late apprentice-boy riot, and the earl marched away to Kingston-upon-Thames, whence he issued invitations to join him, and manifestoes of his intention of ending the calamities of the nation. Sir Michael Levesey and other gentlemen, "who took occasion by the forelock," fell suddenly upon him, and put him to flight after a short but sharp engagement, in which the Lord Francis Villiers, who, with his brother, the Duke of Buckingham, had joined Holland, was piteously slain. Holland fled with a small part of his horse to the town of St. Neots, but, being pursued by Colonel Scrope, whom Fairfax detached for that purpose, he surrendered at discretion on the 10th of July. On the 27th of August Goring and the royalists, who had bravely defended themselves in Colchester for more than two months, surrendered at discretion to Fairfax, who refused any other terms, as the officers had been declared traitors by parliament. Cromwell had set the example at Pembroke Castle, by shooting one officer, whose fate was determined by drawing lots; and now Fairfax shot two, Sir Charles Lucas and Sir George Lisle, in the same manner at Colchester. Goring was committed to close prison to abide the doom of parliament.

While the Earl of Holland was going over to the king, his brother, the Earl of Warwick, remained steady to the parliament, and performed the most important of services. About the beginning of June several of the chief ships in the national fleet revolted, put their vice-admiral, Rainsborough, ashore, affirming that they were for the king, and would serve Prince Charles, and sailed away to Holland, where the prince then was, and with him his brother, the Duke of York. The parliament at this crisis reappointed the Earl of Warwick to be lord high admiral; and this nobleman, so beloved by rary, whose affections were with the Independents, "that that English army which were by the religious party of Scotland called a bundle of sectaries, and reviled by opprobrious names, should now be acknowledged by the same Scots to be the instruments of God, and vindicators both of the church and of the kingdom of Scotland. The greatest peers of Scotland, also, did ingenuously confess their rashness and error the year before, for accusing this army as rebellious, for acting the very same things in England which now themselves were enforced to act in Scotland, for preservation of that kingdom. This great change in the council of Scotland would have been much to be wondered at if the change that then happened in the English parliament had not been a still greater miracle. Who would not be amazed at this, that Cromwell, for vanquishing a Scottish army (by which he delivered England from the worst of miseries), should be acknowledged there to have been the preserver of Scotland, and yet should not here be allowed to have been the preserver of England! And that the same victory of his against the Scots should please the Presbyterian Scots for religion's sake, and yet, for religion's sake, should displease the Presbyterians of England! Œdipus himself can not unriddle this; especially if he judge according to reason, and not according to what envy, hatred, and imbittered faction, can produce."

the seamen, entered upon the command with a cheerful certainty of success. From the moment that he raised his flag mutiny and desertion ceased. He stationed himself at the mouth of the Thames to watch the Essex coast, to prevent supplies and reinforcements being sent to Colchester, and to defend the approach to London. In the month of July the Prince of Wales appeared in the Downs with a good fleet, consisting of the English ships which had deserted to him, and of some which he had procured abroad. Men would naturally have imagined that the son's first attempt would have been for the liberation of his father from Carisbrook Castle; but, though young Charles remained absolute master of the sea and coasts for several weeks, Warwick being too weak to face him, no such attempt was ever made. Clarendon says plainly that the person of the king was not wanted, or at least that "it can not be imagined how wonderfully fearful some persons in France were that he should have made his escape, and the dread they had of his coming thither." The prince sent a command to Warwick to strike his flag, and yield obedience to him as supreme admiral by the king's commission; but the earl kept his flag flying, and, avoiding an engagement, waited the arrival of reinforcements from Portsmouth, still covering the Essex coast. The prince, from the mouth of the Thames, maintained a secret correspondence with some persons in the city of London; but the merchants there were greatly indisposed to his service when he demanded money from them to save their ships from capture. The utter failure of Hamilton's expedition and of all the royalist risings, the surrender of Colchester, and the temper of the people along the coasts, rendered the presence of the royalist fleet useless; but still if it had sailed to the Isle of Wight it might have saved the king, whose very life was now threatened. The hapless prisoner expressly urged this course by a message, yet the prince still lay about the Downs, the sailors, it is said, insisting upon fighting the fleet under Warwick. To our minds, these things suggest darker thoughts than arise out of any other transaction of these times. On the other side, Warwick waited patiently till Sir George Ayscough, successfully sailing by Prince Charles in the night, brought round the reinforcements from Portsmouth. Then the parliament's fleet was a match for the royalists, but the prince ventured no attack, fired not a gun, and, through a real or pretended want of provisions, stood round and steered away for the Dutch coast, without an effort for—apparently without a thought of—his hapless father. The Levelers reproached Warwick for not engaging and destroying the prince and his fleet; but, by the course he pursued, that commander, perhaps, did better service for the parliament: he followed the retreating fleet to the coast of Holland, most carefully avoiding any collision with such of the ships as were English; he sent his men on shore to talk with their countrymen and old comrades about the wickedness and folly of deserting their own country, and serving against it with foreigners; he offered the mutineers a free pardon from the parliament, and he soon recovered most of the ships and nearly every English seaman that had deserted.

While Cromwell, who had with him several of the republican leaders in parliament, was engaged as yet with the war in Wales, the Presbyterians carried several important votes, and entirely annulled and made void the resolution against making more addresses to the king. Emboldened by their success, they proposed that, without binding him to any thing, they should bring the king to London, and there treat with him personally with honor, freedom, and safety; and this would have been carried but for Cromwell's decisive victories, the ruin of Hamilton, and the other circumstances which revived the hopes and courage of the Independents, the fears and misgivings of the Presbyterians. At last, as a sort of compromise between the two parties, it was voted that fifteen commissioners—the earls of Northumberland, Pembroke, Salisbury, Middlesex, and Saye, of the Upper House, and the Lord Wenman, Sir Harry Vane, junior, Sir Harbottle Grimstone, Hollis, Pierpoint, Browne, Crewe, Potts, Glynne, and Buckley, of the Commons—should conduct a treaty personally with Charles, not in London, but at Newport, in the Isle of Wight. The treaty was not fairly entered upon until the 18th of September, when Prince Charles had returned to Holland, and when Cromwell was thinking of returning from Scotland. "The king," says May, "during this treaty, found not only great reverence and observance from the commissioners of parliament, but was attended with a prince-like retinue, and was allowed what servants he should choose, to make up the splendor of a court. The Duke of Richmond, the Marquis of Hertford, the earls of Southampton and Lindsey, with other gentlemen of note, and a competent number of them, waited in his train; his own chaplains and divers of his lawyers, to advise him in the treaty, were allowed there. But while this treaty proceeded, and some months were spent in debates, concessions, and denials, behold, another strange alteration happened, which threw the king from the height of honor into the lowest condition—so strangely did one contrary provoke another. While some labored to advance the king into his throne again, upon slender conditions or none at all, others, weighing what the king had done, what the commonwealth, and, especially, what the parliament's friends might suffer if he should come to reign again with unchanged affections, desired to take him quite away. From hence divers and frequent petitions were presented to the parliament, and some to the General Fairfax, that whosoever had offended against the commonwealth, no persons excepted, might come to judgment."[1] The first of these petitions, entitled "The humble petition of many thousands of well-affected men in the cities of London and Westminster, in the borough of Southwark, and the neighboring villages," was presented to parliament on the 11th of September; it was followed by many others from different counties of England, and from several regiments of the army, the scope of them all being the same—that is, that justice might be done; that the chief authors of so much bloodshed, and particularly those who had been the raisers of this second civil war, and were now in the parliament's custody, as Hamilton, Holland, Goring, Capel, and the rest, should be proceeded against; that the king himself, the chief offender, the raiser of the whole war, should be called to judgment; that the parliament should not ungratefully throw away so many miraculous deliverances of Almighty God, nor betray themselves and their faithful friends by deceitful treaties with an implacable enemy. The important cities of Newcastle, York, and Hull, with others that had been among the greatest sufferers in the war, called for impartial and speedy justice, for the execution of incendiaries, and the forfeiture of their estates to go toward discharging arrears and paying the public debt. The counties of Oxford, Somerset, and Leicester, petitioned to the same effect. On the 4th of October the petition of many commanders in the army was presented; on the 10th three other petitions were brought up in one day; on the 18th Ireton's regiment petitioned for justice upon the king, as if he were the humblest commoner; and on the 21st Ingoldsby's regiment proclaimed the king to be a traitor, and the negotiations at Newport a trap.

But there was small chance now that the Presbyterians and Independents would agree with the king in any treaty. The matured successes of Cromwell had removed all cause of apprehension from Sir Harry Vane, the chief manager for the Independents, and the Presbyterians were wholly disconcerted by the king's determined resolution not to gratify them in church matters. The articles submitted to the king were substantially the same as those which had been proposed to him at Hampton Court, and not much harsher than the articles which had been discussed so long before at Uxbridge. Again were the liturgy and episcopacy debated at a wearisome length. Charles asked what fault they found in the Book of Common Prayer. The Presbyterians replied that the liturgy was taken out of the mass-book, only spoiled in the translation. The king said that, if it were good in itself, that did not make it ill. The sale of bishops' lands Charles held to be sacrilege. He insisted that episcopacy should not be abolished, but only suspended; that the bishops' lands should not be sold, but only leased for a term of years; that all his adherents and followers should be admitted to composition for their delinquency; and that the covenant should be forced neither upon any of them, nor upon himself, until his conscience were better satisfied. The Presbyterian commissioners, who saw their own ruin in that of the king, knelt, and wept, and prayed, but all was in vain. Other points Charles yielded readily enough, but he promised, as he had ever done, with a mental reservation to break his promises as soon as he should be able. On the 24th of October, when he had assented to the propositions of the commissioners about the command of the army, he wrote to Sir William Hopkins, a gentleman in the Isle of Wight, with whom he was concerting some new means of escape:—"To deal freely with you, the great concession I made this day was merely in order to my escape, of which if I had not hope, I would not have done it." He had also agreed to cease all connection with the papists in Ireland; and yet, encouraged by some circumstances which had occurred in that island, he wrote to Ormond, who, after yielding to the parliament, was ready to do every thing against it, desiring him to obey all the queen's commands, not to obey any command of his own until he should advertise him that he was free from restraint, and not to be surprised at his great concessions concerning Ireland—"for," said Charles, "they will come to nothing." This letter, which was written on the 10th of October, was soon followed by another, in which he spoke in the following terms of the pending treaty with the parliament:—"And though you will hear that this treaty is near, or at least most likely to be concluded, yet believe it not, but pursue the way you are in with all possible vigor. Deliver also this my command to all your friends, but not in a public way, because otherwise it may be inconvenient to me." The English parliament had no knowledge of these royal letters; but a letter written by Ormond came into their hands, and from it they learned that Ormond had returned from France to Ireland with authority to treat with the insurgents. The commissioners consequently desired his majesty to make a public declaration that he had given no authority to Ormond, and that he disapproved of his proceedings. After several palpable falsehoods, Charles wrote a public letter commanding Ormond to desist; but the marquis, who had been well schooled, went on more vigorously than ever.[1]

All this time the king was buoying himself up with hopes that he should be able to escape—that his friends would relieve him—or that, if all failed, he should give that color to his resistance that would entitle him to the honor of a martyr. "Though they can not relieve me in the time I demand it," said Charles, "let them relieve me when they can, else I will hold it out till I make some stone in this building my tombstone. And so will I do by the church of England."[2] In the course of the discussions at Newport, he always put the church question foremost, and it is said that he displayed very considerable knowledge upon that head, and a presence of mind and of wit in no way impaired by misfortune. "For," says Warwick, "through the whole treaty, managing all thus singly himself, he showed that he was very conversant in divinity, law, and good reason, insomuch as one day, while I turned the king's chair, when he was about to rise, the Earl of Salisbury came suddenly upon me and called me by my name, and said, The king is wonderfully improved; to which I as suddenly replied, No, my lord, he was always so; but your lordship too late discerned it."

army, and deeming their only salvation to lie in a successful termination of the negotiations with the king, added twenty days to the forty originally prescribed for the duration of the treaty. This brought them down to the 27th of November; but, in the interval, their scheme had been shaken to pieces by the Independents. The army had drawn together in the town of St. Albans, and there a council of officers, after a week's deliberation and preparation, drew up a remonstrance to the House of Commons, which was presented by a deputation from their own body, and seconded by a letter from Fairfax. The remonstrance urged their sad apprehensions of the danger and evil of the treaty with the king, and of any accommodation with him; that he ought to be brought to trial on account of the evils done by him; that the English monarchy should henceforward be elective, or, "that no king be hereafter admitted but upon the election of, and as upon trust from, the people by their representatives, nor without first disclaiming and disavowing all pretense to a negative voice against the determinations of the said representatives or commons in parliament, and that to be done in some certain form, more clear than heretofore in the coronation oath;" that a period should be set to this present parliament; that parliaments for the future should be annual or biennial: and that the elective franchise should be extended and made more equal. This remonstrance, which is of very great length, and signed by Rushworth, now secretary to the Lord-general Fairfax, "induced a long and high debate, some inveighing sharply against the insolency of it, others palliated and excused the matters in it, and some did not stick to justify it, but most were silent because it came from the army, and feared the like to be done by them as had been done formerly: in fine, the debate was adjourned."[1]

In fact Cromwell was now at hand; and he, the most powerful of all, was determined, above all, not to trust for an hour to so weak a reed as a treaty with Charles—not to brook the existence of the Presbyterian faction, which of late had carried most of their measures by large majorities. He had been for some time in earnest correspondence with Governor Hammond, representing to him that, before the Lord and in his own conscience, he would be justified in keeping the person of the king for the service and uses of the army, which alone combated for the good cause; and now he and Ireton, perceiving that Hammond withstood these appeals and inclined to keep the king for the parliament, procured his recall to head-quarters, and got Colonel Ewer appointed in his stead. Ewer, a zealous republican, hastened to the Isle of Wight; and there, on the 30th of November, he sent a squadron of horse and Lieutenant-colonel Cobbet to make sure of his majesty. Cobbet presented himself to the king in an abrupt manner, telling him that he had orders to remove him from Newport. Charles, much moved, asked for a sight of these orders, and to know to what place he was to be carried. Cobbet told him that it was to be out of the island, but he would not show any orders. The noblemen, bishops, and officers of the household gathered round in alarm and grief; "but, no remedy appearing, they approached to kiss the king's hand, and to pour forth their supplications to Almighty God to safeguard and comfort his majesty in that his disconsolate condition; and his majesty, who at other times was cheerful in parting from his friends, showed sorrow in his heart by the sadness of his countenance."[1] He was sent over to the surer prison of Hurst Castle, situated on a little promontory which projects from the coast of Hampshire, right over against the Isle of Wight, —"a place which stood in the sea (for every tide the water surrounded it); and it contained only a few dog-lodgings for soldiers, being chiefly designed for a platform to command the ships."[2] The solitude and dreariness of the place struck like a death-damp to the heart of Charles. So confident was he that the "treasons" of the Independents were "not able to endure the sight of day" that he never, until the last moment, suspected that they would venture to bring him to a public trial and execution; but darker suspicions of secret assassination haunted his mind, and, as he looked round the dreary walls of Hurst Castle, he thought that were a fitting place for such a deed. Yet, whatever were the errors or crimes of the great leaders of the Independents, they were certainly men that abhorred this kind of guilt, and that had courage equal to the open course which they deemed essential to the preservation of their party—their own lives—their country. No notion of secret murder or assassination ever entered their heads. The enthusiasts on the other side were less innocent in this respect, and one of the bravest officers in the army had recently fallen beneath their daggers. This was Colonel Rainsborough, a thorough-going republican, who was shot and stabbed to death at Doncaster by three royalist ruffians, who got access to him by pretending that they were the bearers of a letter from his friend Cromwell.[3] Several other officers of less note were assassinated, and many persons were attacked, so that the report of the desperate royalists being banded for the purpose of removing in this way the enemies of the king was not altogether an absurd rumor.

On the 30th of November, the same day on which Ewer removed the king from Newport, the question, whether the remonstrance of the army should be taken into speedy consideration, was negatived by the Presbyterian majority in the Commons, and a letter from Fairfax, demanding money and threatening to take it where he could find it if he were not seasonably supplied, was voted "a high and unbeseeming letter." And on the same eventful day a "declaration" from a full council of the army was presented to the House, wherein the officers, after reciting their late remonstrance and justifying the heads of it, said, that to their great grief they found that, instead of a reasonable answer, they were put off from day to day; that they could see, in the majority of those trusted with the great affairs of the kingdom, nothing less than a treacherous or corrupt neglect of, and apostasy from, the public trust reposed in them; that, this parliament being sole judges of their own performance or breach of trust, they (the officers) held themselves necessitated to, and justified in, an appeal from the parliament as now constituted unto the extraordinary judgment of God and good people; that yet, in the prosecution of this appeal, they should wholly seek the speedy obtaining of a more orderly and equal judicature in a just representative, endeavoring to preserve so much of the present parliamentary authority as might be safe or useful till a purer constitution could be introduced; that they should rejoice if the majority of the House of Commons would become sensible of the destructiveness of their late ways, and exclude all such corrupt and apostatized members as had obstructed justice, safety, and public interest; desiring, however, that so many of them as God had kept upright would, by protests or otherwise, acquit themselves of guilt, promising to own such as should so do as having the chief trust of the kingdom remaining in them, &c. But the last clause of all was the most effective, for it told the House that, for all these ends, they were drawing up with the army to London, there to follow Providence as God should clear their way.[1]

[3] Rushworth.—Whitelock says, "They came to his chamber, there called to him, and said they had a letter from Lieutenant-general Cromwell. The colonel rose and opened his door to them, expecting such a letter that morning, and presently the three soldiers fell upon him, shot him into the neck, and another shot him into the heart, with other wounds, and left him dead, escaping away without any alarm given." Clarendon says that they only intended to carry him off as security for the life of their general, Sir Marmaduke Langdale, who had been taken prisoner; that they found Rainsborough in his bed, and that, upon his beginning to struggle and to cry out, seeing no hope of carrying him away, they immediately ran him through with their swords; that, when Rainsborough's soldiers found their general dead upon the ground, without any body in view, they thought the devil had been there, and that the "gallant party" (for so the royalist historian styles the assassins) got safe home without the least damage. The victim was as much distinguished by his knowledge of maritime affairs and his services at sea as by his military ability and services on shore. "There was not an officer in the army," says Clarendon, "whom Cromwell would not as willingly have lost as this man."

The Presbyterian majority mustered courage to fall with some dignity. Notwithstanding this unequivocal declaration, notwithstanding the approach of the army, they, on the following day, the 1st of December, twice read over the report of the commissioners, detailing all his majesty's concessions in the treaty at Newport, and passed a vote of thanks to Hollis,[2] Pierpoint, and the Lord Wenman, three of the commissioners who had come last to town, for their great pains and care in managing that good treaty; Hollis then moved that the king's answer should be declared satisfactory and sufficient; but this vital question was adjourned to the next day. Before they rose they ordered that a letter should be written to Fairfax to acquaint him that it was the pleasure of the House that he should not bring the army nearer to London. On the 2d of December, when the question of the king's answer was resumed, and while they were in a long and high debate, Fairfax and his army arrived at London, and took up their quarters in Whitehall, St. James's, the Mews, York House, and other vacant houses. Another adjournment took place, and the House did not meet till the 4th of December. Then they learned—apparently for the first time—that the army had the person of the king in their hands; and they voted that the seizing of the king, and carrying him prisoner to Hurst Castle, was without the advice and consent of the House. It was on this day that Cromwell arrived in London. The debate about the answer and treaty was stoutly maintained by the Presbyterians, and the House sat all that night. Yet on the morning of the 5th they proceeded with the same debate. In the course of this long and fierce struggle many remarkable speeches were made on both sides. Sir Harry Vane the younger, said that a treaty had been carried on for months, and that, after all, the king, if he were to be understood even by his own answers, reserved to himself the power or right of being as great a tyrant as before; and he moved that the House should instantly return to its former vote of non-addresses, cease all negotiations, and settle the commonwealth on another model. Sir Henry Mildmay declared that "the king was no more to be trusted than a caged lion set at liberty:" this was the conviction of the entire body of the Independents, and of a very considerable portion of the nation besides; nor can we conceive how the case should possibly have been otherwise. The Presbyterians, in the end, modified their resolution so as to make it assert, not that the king's answers were satisfactory, but that his concessions to the propositions of the parliament upon the treaty were sufficient grounds for settling the peace of the kingdom; and in this form it was carried in the course of the morning of the 5th by a majority of 140 to 104. This done, they appointed a committee to confer with Fairfax and the officers of his army for the continuance of a good correspondence and friendship between the parliament and them. But the mighty stream of revolution could not now be checked—the sword was all-powerful—the mace become a bauble. Twenty thousand brave and enthusiastic men had vowed in their hearts that they would purge this parliament; and on the morning of the 6th the regiment of horse of Colonel Rich and the foot regiment of Colonel Pride surrounded the Houses and dismissed the city trainbands who had kept guard. Colonel Pride, from whose active part in it the operation has been called "Pride's purge," drew up divers of his foot in the Court of Requests, and upon the stairs and in the lobby of the house; and, as the members were going into the house, the colonel having a paper of names in his hand, and one of the door-keepers, and sometimes Lord Grey of Groby standing by him to inform him who the members were, he seized upon such as were down on the list, and sent them away as prisoners, some to the Queen's Court and Court of Wards, and some to other places, by special order from the general and council of the army. Forty-one leading Presbyterians were thus secured; and Pride continued his purge on the following day. Not a few of the members fled into the country or hid themselves in the city; so that, by the 8th of December, all that were left in the House of Commons were some fifty Independents, who were afterward styled the Rump.

[1] This declaration is signed by Rushworth, "by the appointment of his Excellency the Lord Fairfax, lord-general, and his general council of officers held at Windsor." It was followed on the morrow by a letter from Fairfax to the mayor and common council of London, telling them of the immediate advance of the army toward the city, and referring them for the reasons thereof to their late remonstrance and declaration. The general assured the civil authorities that they were far from the least plunder or wrong to any, and that, for the better prevention of any disorder, they desired £40,000 should be paid to them forthwith, and then they would quarter in the void and great houses in and about the city.—Whitelock.

On the 6th, which Whitelock calls "a sad and most disorderly day," Cromwell went into the purged or purified House, and received their hearty thanks for his great services to the kingdom. On the 8th, which was kept as a solemn fast, accompanied by a collection of money for poor soldiers' wives and widows, they adjourned till the 11th. On the Sunday, Hugh Peters, the Independent minister and great advocate of republicanism, preached in St. Margaret's, Westminster, upon the significant text, "Bind your king with chains, and your nobles with fetters of iron;" and, in the course of his sermon, he called King Charles the great Barabbas, murtherer, tyrant, and traitor. Twenty commoners of note, four earls, and the Prince Palatine, Charles's own nephew, were present at this discourse.

The Houses did not sit, as they had appointed to do, on the 11th; but Fairfax and the council of the army received on that day a new scheme of government, styled "A new representative, or an agreement of the people," which was said by its authors to be published with the view that any man might offer what he thought fit by way of alteration or addition to any part of it. The composition was generally thought to be Ireton's. It contained much the same matter as the late remonstrance of the army; but it went into more particulars about elections, and it prescribed that the present parliament should be wholly dissolved by April next, and a new one chosen according to the new rules. It declared that officers and malignants should be incapable of electing or being elected; that the country should be more equally represented; and that the House of Commons should consist in all of 300 members. On the following day both Houses—if we can call them by that name—sat, and letters from Ireland were received, intimating that the Marquis of Ormond was acting openly with the papists and insurgents, whose main design was to seize upon Dublin. In the Commons the Independents, who had it all their own way, annulled the vote for revoking the order of disabling the eleven Presbyterian members, and for readmitting them into the House; and they likewise voted that the House, by concurring with the Lords in rescinding the former vote, which forbade any more addresses to the king, had acted in a manner highly dishonorable to parliament and destructive to the good of the kingdom. On the 13th they finished this part of their business, by deciding that the old vote of non-addresses should stand; and that the treaty in the Isle of Wight had been a monstrous error, a dishonor, and a great peril to the country. On the 16th a strong party of horse, under the command of Colonel Harrison, were detached to Hurst Castle with orders to remove the king to Windsor Castle. It was at the dead of night when Charles was startled by the creaking of the descending drawbridge and the tramp of horsemen. Before dawn he summoned Herbert to his bedside, and bade him learn what was the matter. Herbert soon told him that it was Colonel Harrison that had arrived. The king, in great trepidation, bade Herbert wait in the outer room, and went himself to his devotions, being still haunted by the dread of secret assassination, and believing that his last hour was now come. He prayed for nearly an hour, and then calling in Herbert, told him that Harrison was the man that had been named to him as designing to assassinate him. The king added, "I trust in God, who is my helper, but I would not be surprised; this is a place fit for such a purpose." He was completely unmanned—he shed tears. Herbert went to glean more news, and, when he returned this second time, he told the king that Harrison's commission was merely to remove him to Windsor. Harrison, the suspected assassin, still kept out of sight. On the morrow Charles, with great alacrity, "bade solitary Hurst adieu." The party of horse guarded him to the entrance of Farnham, when another troop appeared drawn up in good order. "In the head of it was the captain gallantly mounted and armed; a velvet montier was on his head, a new buff coat upon his back, and a crimson silk scarf about his waist, richly fringed; who, as the king passed by with an easy pace, as delighted to see men well horsed and armed, gave the king a bow with his head à la soldade, which his majesty requited."[1] It was Harrison; and Charles, who professed to have some judgment in faces, declared, after a searching gaze, that that man did not look like a murderer. That night, in the house where he was to lodge, the king took Harrison by the arm, and led him to the embrasure of a window, where they conversed for half an hour or more. Charles reminded the republican soldier how he had been warned that he had meant to assassinate him. Harrison replied, "that what was reported of him was not true; what he had said he might repeat—that the law was equally obliging to great and small, and that justice had no respect to persons—or words to that purpose."[2] Herbert tells us that his majesty finding these things "affectedly spoken, and to no good end, left off further communication with him, and went to supper, being all the time very pleasant." On the 22d of December he slept at Lord Newburgh's house, or lodge, in the royal park of

[2] Clarendon says, "In this journey, Harrison observing that the king had always an apprehension that there was a purpose to murder him, and had once let fall some words of the odiousness and wickedness of such an assassination and murder, which could never be safe to the person who undertook it, he told him plainly that he needed not to entertain any such imagination or apprehension—that the parliament had too much honor and justice to cherish so foul an intention—and assured him that whatever the parliament resolved to do would be very public, and in a way of justice, to which the world should be witness, and would never endure a thought of secret violence; which his majesty could not persuade himself to believe, nor did imagine that they durst ever produce him in the sight of the people under any form whatsoever of a public trial."—Hist.

Bagshot, and on the 23d he was safely lodged in Windsor Castle.[1]

A.D. 1649. On the same day the Independents, calling themselves the House of Commons, appointed a committee of thirty-eight "to consider of drawing up a charge against the king, and all other delinquents that may be thought fit to bring to condign punishment." A few voices were raised for the saving of life; but on the 1st of January an ordinance, prepared by a committee of thirty-eight, was reported to the fragment of the House. The preamble was to this effect:—"That the said Charles Stuart, being admitted king of England, and therein trusted with a limited power to govern by and according to the laws of the land, and not otherwise; and, by his trust, oath, and office, being obliged to use the power committed to him for the good and benefit of the people, and for the preservation of their rights and liberties; yet, nevertheless, out of a wicked design to erect and uphold in himself an unlimited and tyrannical power, to rule according to his will, and to overthrow the rights and liberties of his people; yea, to take away and make void the foundations thereof, and of all redress and remedy of misgovernment, which, by the fundamental constitutions of this kingdom, were reserved, on the people's behalf, in the right and power of frequent and successive parliaments, or national meetings in council; he, the said Charles Stuart, for accomplishing of such his designs, and for the protecting of himself and his adherents in his and their wicked practices, to the same ends hath traitorously and maliciously levied war against the present parliament and the people therein represented."[2] This ordinance was sent up to the Lords on the next day. Those few lords that remained in the House rejected it without a dissentient voice, and then adjourned.[3] Forthwith the Commons, with closed doors, came to this resolution—"That the Commons of England, in parliament assembled, do declare that the people are, under God, the origin of all just power. And do also declare that the Commons of England, in parliament assembled, being chosen by representing the people, have the supreme power in this nation. And do also declare, that whatsoever is enacted or declared for law by the Commons in parliament assembled, hath the force of a law; and all the people of this nation are concluded thereby, although the consent and concurrence of king or House of Peers be not had thereunto."[4]

While these things were passing at Westminster, Charles, confident in the sacred dignity of majesty, was deluding himself with unaccountable hopes at Windsor. According to the Earl of Leicester's journal, it was reported, on the 2d of January, "that the king seems to be as merry as usual, and saith that he fears none; he makes the business talked on, for questioning him, a jest; and he saith that he hath yet three games to play, the least of which gives him hope of regaining all." And, under the date of the 3d of January, the same nobleman notes, on the authority of Sir John Temple,—"The king yet takes no notice of their proceedings, and gave order very lately for saving the seed of some Spanish melons which he would have set at Wimbledon. He hath a strange conceit of my Lord Ormond's working for him in Ireland; he hangs still upon that twig."[1]

But in the House of Commons the storm rolled onward with increasing rapidity. On the 6th of January the ordinance for trial of the king was brought in, and the same day engrossed and passed. By this ordinance the Independents erected what they styled a High Court of Justice for trying the king, and proceeding to sentence against him; to consist of a hundred and thirty-five commissioners, of whom any twenty were to form a quorum. Among the commissioners were Fairfax, Cromwell, Ireton, Waller, Skippon, Harrison, Whalley, Pride, Ewer, Tomlinson—in all, three generals and thirty-four colonels of the army; the lords Monson, Grey of Groby, and Lisle; most of the members of the Rump; Wilson, Fowkes, Pennington, and Andrewes, aldermen of the city; Bradshaw, Thorpe, and Nicholas, sergeants-at-law; twenty-two knights and baronets; various citizens of London, and some few country gentlemen. But, of all this number, there never met at one time more than eighty. On the 8th of January, fifty-three assembled in the Painted Chamber, headed by Fairfax, who never appeared after that day, and ordered that, on the morrow, a herald should proclaim, and invite the people to bring in what matter of fact they had against Charles Stuart. And, on the morrow, Sergeant Dendy, who attended the commissioners, rode, according to their order, into Westminster Hall, with the mace on his shoulder, attended by some officers of the army and six trumpeters on horseback, guards both of horse and foot being drawn out in Palace-yard. The trumpets sounded in the middle of the Hall, the drums beat in the yard, and then proclamation was made that the commissioners for trial of the king would sit again on the morrow, and that all those who had any thing to say against the king might then be heard. And by order of the House of Commons, then sitting, the like proclamation was made at the old Exchange, and in Cheapside.[2] On the same day (the 9th) the residue of the Commons voted that the great seal in use should be broken, and a new one forthwith made, and that this new seal should have on one side the inscription, "The Great Seal of England;" and on the other, "In the First Year of Freedom, by God's Blessing restored, 1648."[3] The commissioners for the trial chose Sergeant Bradshaw to be their president, Mr. Steel to be attorney-general, Mr. Coke to be solicitor-general, and Dr. Dorislaus and Mr. Aske to act as counsel with them in drawing up and managing the charges against the prisoner. All preliminaries being arranged, Charles, on the 19th of January, was brought up from Windsor to St. James's, and on the following day he was put upon his trial.

The place appointed for the trial was the site of the old courts of Chancery and King's Bench, at the upper end of Westminster Hall. That vast and antique hall was divided by strong barriers placed across it. The gothic portal was opened to the people, who assembled in immense crowds. Every where, within the hall and around it, were soldiers under arms—every avenue of approach was guarded. The king was brought in a sedan-chair to the bar, where a chair, covered with velvet, was prepared for him. He looked sternly upon the court and upon the people in the galleries on each side of him, and sat down without moving his hat. His judges returned his severe glances, and also kept on their hats. Upon a calling of the names sixty of the commissioners answered. Bradshaw, as president, in a short speech acquainted the prisoner with the cause of his being brought thither:—"Charles Stuart, king of England: the Commons of England being deeply sensible of the calamities that have been brought upon this nation, which are fixed upon you as the principal author of them, have resolved to make inquisition for blood; and, according to that debt and duty they owe to justice, to God, the kingdom, and themselves, they have resolved to bring you to trial and judgment, and for that purpose have constituted this high court of justice before which you are brought." Then Coke, as solicitor for the Commonwealth, stood up to speak; but Charles held up his cane, touched him two or three times on the shoulder with it, and cried "Hold! hold!" In so doing the gold head dropped from his cane.[1] Nevertheless Bradshaw ordered Coke to go on, who then said, "My lord, I am come to charge Charles Stuart, king of England, in the name of all the Commons of England, with treason and high misdemeanors: I desire the said charge may be read." Coke then delivered the charge in writing to the clerk, who began to read it. Charles again cried "Hold!" but, at the order of the president, the clerk went on, and the prisoner sat down, "looking sometimes on the high court, sometimes up to the galleries; and having risen again, and turned about to behold the guards and spectators, sat down again, looking very sternly, and with a countenance not at all moved, till these words—namely, "Charles Stuart to be a tyrant, a traitor," &c., were read; "at which he laughed, as he sat, in the face of the court." When the long charge was finished, taxing the king with the whole of the civil war, with the death of thousands of the free people of the nation, with divisions within the land, invasions from foreign parts, the waste of the public treasury, the decay of trade, the spoliation and desolation of great parts of the country, the continued commissions to the prince and other rebels, to the Marquis of Ormond, the Irish papists, &c., Bradshaw, the lord president, told him that the court expected his answer. Charles replied with great dignity and clearness.[2] He demanded by what lawful authority he was brought thither. "I was not long ago," said he, "in the Isle of Wight; how I came there is a longer story than is fit at this time for me to speak of; but there I entered into a treaty with both Houses of parliament with as much public faith as is possible to be had of any person in the world. I treated there with a number of honorable lords and gentlemen, and treated honestly and uprightly. I can not say but they did very nobly with me. We were upon a conclusion of the treaty. Now, I would know by what authority, I mean lawful—for there are many unlawful authorities in the world, thieves and robbers by the highways—but I would know by what authority I was brought from thence, and carried from place to place. Remember I am your lawful king. Let me know by what lawful authority I am seated here—resolve me that, and you shall hear more of me." Bradshaw told him that he might have observed he was there by the authority of the people of England. whose elected king he was. "England," cried Charles, "was never an elective kingdom, but an hereditary kingdom for near these thousand years. I stand more for the liberty of my people than any here that come to be my pretended judges." "Sir," said Bradshaw, "how well you have managed your trust is known. If you acknowledge not the authority of the court they must proceed." "Here is a gentleman," said Charles, pointing to Colonel Cobbet; "ask him if he did not bring me from the Isle of Wight by force. I do not come here as submitting to this court. I see no House of Lords here that may constitute a parliament; and the king, too. must be in and part of a parliament. "If it does not satisfy you," exclaimed Bradshaw, "we are satisfied with our authority, which we have from God and the people. The court expects you to answer; their purpose is to adjourn to Monday next." He then commanded the guard to take him away, upon which Charles replied, "Well, sir." And as he went away facing the court, he added, pointing to the sword, "I do not fear that." Some of the people cried "God save the king!" others shouted "Justice! justice!"[1] He was remanded to Sir Robert Cotton's house, and thence to St. James's: and the high court adjourned, and kept a fast together at Whitehall, where they heard much praying and preaching.

On Monday the 22d of January, in the afternoon, Charles was led back to Westminster Hall. As soon as he was at the bar, Coke rose and said, "I did at the last court exhibit a charge of high treason and other crimes against the prisoner in the name of the people of England. Instead of answering, he did dispute the authority of this high court. I move. on behalf of the kingdom of England, that the prisoner may be directed to make a positive answer by way of confession or negation; and that if he refuse so to do, the charge be taken pro confesso, and the court proceed to justice." Then Bradshaw told the prisoner that the court had taken into consideration what he had said as to its incompetency; that they were fully satisfied with their own authority, and did now expect that he should plead guilty or not guilty. Charles repeated that he still questioned the legality of this court: that a king could not be tried by any jurisdiction upon earth; but that it was not for himself alone that he resisted, but for the liberty of the people of England, which was dearer to him than to his judges. He was going on in this strain, talking of the lives, liberties, and estates of his people, when Bradshaw interrupted him by telling him that he, as a prisoner, and charged as a high delinquent, could not be suffered any longer to enter into argument and dispute concerning that court's authority. Charles replied, that, though he knew not the forms of law, he knew law and reason; that he knew as much law as any gentleman in England, and was therefore pleading for the liberties of the people more than his judges were doing. He again went on to deny the legality of the court, and Bradshaw again interrupted him; and this was repeated many times. At last the president ordered the sergeant-at-arms to remove the prisoner from the bar. "Well, sir," exclaimed Charles, "remember that the king is not suffered to give in his reasons for the liberty and freedom of all his subjects." "Sir," replied Bradshaw, "how great a friend you have been to the laws and liberties of the people, let all England and the world judge." Charles, exclaiming, "Well, sir," was guarded forth to Sir Robert Cotton's house. The court then adjourned to the Painted Chamber, on Tuesday at twelve o'clock. At the appointed time sixty-three commissioners met in close conference in the Painted Chamber, and there resolved that Bradshaw should acquaint the king that if he continued contumacious he must expect no further time; but if he submitted to answer; and demanded a copy of the charge, Bradshaw was to grant it, desiring him to give in his reply by one o'clock in the next afternoon. This done, the court adjourned to Westminster Hall, and the king was brought in with the accustomed guard. Coke again craved judgment. "My lord president," said he, "this is now the third time that this prisoner hath been brought to the bar. I exhibited against him a charge of the highest treason ever wrought on the theater of England. My lord, he did dispute the authority of this court. I might press your lordship, that when a prisoner is contumacious, according to the law of the land it shall be taken pro confesso against him. The House of Commons, the supreme authority and jurisdiction of the kingdom, have declared that it is notorious the charge is true, as it is in truth as clear as crystal and as the sun that shines at noon-day; which, however, if the court are not satisfied in, I have, on the people of England's behalf, witnesses to produce, and therefore I pray (and yet it is not so much I as the innocent blood that hath been shed, the cry whereof is very great for justice and judgment) that speedy judgment be pronounced." Bradshaw followed in the same strain, saying, in conclusion, "Sir, you are to give your positive and final answer in plain English, whether you be guilty or not guilty of these treasons." Charles, after a short pause, said—"When I was here yesterday, I did desire to speak for the liberties of the people of England; I was interrupted. I desire to know whether I may speak freely or not?" Bradshaw replied, that when he had once pleaded he should be heard at large; and he invited him to make the best defense he could against the charge. "For the charge," cried Charles, "I value it not a rush; it is the liberty of the people of England that I stand for. I can not acknowledge a new court that I never heard of before. I am your king, bound to uphold justice, to maintain the old laws; therefore, until I know that all this is not against the fundamental laws of the kingdom, I can put in no particular answer. If you will give me time I will show you my reasons why I can not do it, and"—here the president interrupted him; but Charles, as soon as his voice ceased, continued his reasoning; and after several interruptions of this kind, Bradshaw said, "Clerk, do your duty;" and the clerk read:—"Charles Stuart, king of England, you are accused in behalf of the Commons of England of divers crimes and treasons, which charge hath been read unto you; the court now requires you to give your positive and final answer, by way of confession or denial of the charge." Charles once more urged that he had done nothing against the trust that had been reposed in him; that he could not acknowledge a new court or alter the fundamental laws. Bradshaw replied, "Sir, this is the third time that you have publicly disowned this court and put an affront upon it. How far you have preserved the liberties of the people your actions have shown. Truly, sir, men's intentions ought to be known by their actions; you have written your meaning in bloody characters throughout this kingdom. But, sir, you understand the pleasure of the court. Clerk, record the default. And, gentlemen, you that took charge of the prisoner, take him back again." "Sir," rejoined Charles, "I will say yet one word to you. If it were my own particular, I would not say any more to interrupt you." "Sir," replied Bradshaw, "you have heard the pleasure of the court, and you are, notwithstanding you will not understand it, to find that you are before a court of justice." And then the king went forth with his guards to Sir Robert Cotton's house, where he lay.

[1] This little accident was deemed very ominous and of great importance. The loyal Sir Philip Warwick, who does not mention the king's tapping Coke on the shoulder, says, "He confessed himself to the Bishop of London, that attended him, one action shocked him very much; for while he was leaning in the court upon his staff, which had a head of gold, the head broke off on a sudden; he took it up, but seemed unconcerned; yet told the bishop, it really made a great impression upon him; and to this hour, says he, I know not possibly how it should come. 'Twas an accident, I confess, I myself have often thought on, and can not imagine how it came about, unless Hugh Peters (who was truly and really his jailer, for at St. James's nobody went to him but by Peters's leave) had artificially tampered upon his staff; but such conjectures are of no use."

[2] The king had a natural impediment in his speech, but it appears that at this exciting, awful moment his stammering left him. Warwick says, "The king's deportment was very majestic and steady; and, though his tongue usually hesitated, yet it was very free at this time, for he was never discomposed in mind."

[1] On this day, Whitelock says, "There were strict guards, many soldiers, and a great press of people at the trial of the king. The House sate only to adjourn. Some who sate on the scaffold about the court at the trial (particularly the Lady Fairfax, the lord-general's wife) did not forbear to exclaim aloud against the proceedings of the high court, and the inveterate usage of the king by his subjects, insomuch that the court was interrupted, and the soldiers and officers of the court had much to do to quiet the ladies and others.

As early as the 17th of January, the Rump had been advertised, by private letters from Scotland, that the parliament there, nemine contradicente, did dissent from the proceedings of the parliament of England; 1. In the toleration extended to sectaries. 2. In the trial of the king. 3. In alteration of the form of government. And upon this day, Tuesday the 23d, the Scottish commissioners, the Earl of Lothian, and Sir John Cheseley, who were in London for the purpose of treating with Charles and the parliament, and who had been dissatisfied with the concessions as to matters of religion made by the king at Newport, sent to the speaker of the Rump their solemn protest against all proceedings for bringing the king to trial. They proclaimed, in the name of the parliament and kingdom of Scotland, that they dissented, abominated, and detested the horrid design against his majesty's life; and that, as they were altogether free from the guilt of the same, so they hoped to be free from all the evils, miseries, confusions, and calamities that would follow thereupon.[1]

On the 24th and 25th of January, the fourth and fifth days of the trial, the court sat in the Painted Chamber, hearing witnesses, having determined that, though the king refused to plead, they would proceed to the examination of witnesses ex abundanti, in other words, only for the further satisfaction of themselves. On the sixth day the commissioners were engaged in preparing the sentence, having then determined that the king's condemnation should extend to death. A question was agitated as to his deprivation and deposition previously to his execution; but it was postponed, and the sentence, with a blank for the manner of death, was drawn up by Ireton, Harrison, Harry Marten, Saye, Lisle, and Love, and ordered to be engrossed.

On the morrow, the 27th of January, and the seventh day of this memorable trial, the high court of justice sat for the last time in Westminster Hall; and the Lord President Bradshaw, who had hitherto worn plain black, was robed in scarlet, and most of the commissioners were "in their best habit." After the calling of the court the king came in, as was his wont, with his hat on; and as he passed up the hall a loud cry was heard of "Justice!—justice! Execution!—execution!" "This," says Whitelock, "was made by some soldiers, and others of the rabble." The fact was, the soldiers, as had happened before, had begun to distrust the good faith or determination of their leaders, and to fancy darkly that, as six days had been allowed to pass without judgment, the king would be allowed to escape. One of the soldiers upon guard, moved by a better feeling, said, "God bless you, sir!" Charles thanked him; but his officer struck the poor man with his cane. "Methinks," said Charles, "the punishment exceeds the offense." Bradshaw's scarlet robe and the solemn aspect of the whole court convinced the king that this would be his last appearance on that stage. The natural love of life seems to have shaken his firmness and constancy, and as soon as he was at the bar he earnestly desired to be heard. Bradshaw told him that he should be heard in his turn, but that he must hear the court first. Charles returned still more eagerly to his prayer for a first hearing, urging repeatedly that hasty judgment was not so soon recalled. Bradshaw repeated that he should be heard before judgment was given, and then remarked how he had refused to make answer to the charge brought against him in the name of the people of England. Here a female voice cried aloud, "No, not half the people." The voice was supposed to proceed from Lady Fairfax, the Presbyterian wife of the lord-general, who still kept aloof, doing nothing; but it was soon silenced, and the president continued his speech, which ended in assuring the king that, if he had any thing to say in defense of himself concerning the matter charged, the court would hear him. Charles then said, "I must tell you, that this many a day all things have been taken away from me, but that I call more dear to me than my life, which is my conscience and honor; and if I had a respect to my life more than to the peace of the kingdom and the liberty of the subject, certainly I should have made a particular defense; for by that, at leastwise, I might have delayed an ugly sentence, which I perceive will pass upon me. . . . I conceive that an hasty sentence once passed may sooner be repented of than recalled; and truly the desire I have for the peace of the kingdom and the liberty of the subject, more than my own particular ends, makes me now at least desire, before sentence be given, that I may be heard in the Painted Chamber before the Lords and Commons. I am sure what I have to say is well worth the hearing." Bradshaw told him that all this was but a further declining of the jurisdiction of the court, which was founded upon the supreme authority of the Commons of England, and sternly refused his prayer for a hearing in the Painted Chamber, which is generally, though perhaps very incorrectly supposed, to have related to a proposal for abdicating in favor of his eldest son. But one of the commissioners on the bench, John Downes, a citizen of London, after saying repeatedly to those who sat near him, "Have we hearts of stone? Are we men?" rose and said in a trembling voice, "My lord, I am not satisfied to give my consent to this sentence. I have reasons to offer against it. I desire the court may adjourn to hear me." And the court adjourned in some disorder. After half an hour's absence they all returned to their places, and that, too, with a unanimous resolution to send the king to the block. Bradshaw cried out, "Sergeant-at-arms, send for your prisoner;" and Charles, who had passed the time in solemn conference with Bishop Juxon, returned to his seat at the bar. "Sir," said Bradshaw addressing him, "you were pleased to make a motion for the propounding of somewhat to the Lords and Commons for the peace of this kingdom. Sir, you did in effect receive an answer before the court adjourned; truly, sir, their withdrawing and adjournment was pro forma tantum, for it did not seem to them that there was any difficulty in the thing; they have considered of what you moved, and have considered of their own authority. Sir, the return I have to you from the court is this—that they have been too much delayed by you already." After some more discourse to the same effect, Bradshaw was silent; and then the king, saying that he did not deny the power they had, that he knew they had quite power enough, again implored to be heard by the Lords and Commons in the Painted Chamber. Bradshaw again refused in the name of the whole court, and proceeded to deliver a long and bitter speech in justification of their sentence. He told the fallen king that the law was his superior, and that he ought to have ruled according to the law; that as the law was his superior, so there was something that was superior to the law, and that was the people of England, the parent or author of the law; that this was not law of yesterday, but the law of old; that there were those things called parliaments—that the parliaments were wont to be kept anciently twice in the year—that afterward, by several acts in the days of his predecessor Edward III., they were appointed to be held once a year. "What the intermission of parliaments hath been in your time," continued Bradshaw, "is very well known, and the sad consequences of it; and what in the interim instead of these parliaments hath been by you with an high and arbitrary hand introduced upon the people, that likewise hath been too well known and felt. But when God, by his providence, had so far brought it about that you could no longer decline the calling of a parliament, yet it will appear what your ends were against the ancient and your native kingdom of Scotland; and the parliament of England, not serving your ends against them, you were pleased to dissolve it. Another great necessity occasioned the calling of this parliament; and what your designs, and plots, and endeavors all along have been, for the crushing and confounding of this parliament, hath been very notorious to the whole kingdom. And truly, sir, in that you did strike at all; for the great bulwark of the liberties of the people is the parliament of England. Could you but have confounded that, you had at one blow cut off the neck of England; but God hath pleased to confound your design, to break your forces, to bring your person into custody, that you might be responsible to justice." After mentioning cases and countries in which the laws had brought evil kings to their doom, the president went on: "But truly, sir, to you I need not mention these foreign examples. If you look but over Tweed, we find enough in your native kingdom. . . . Sir, if I should come to what your stories make mention of, you know very well you are the 109th king of Scotland: to mention so many kings as that kingdom, according to their power and privilege, have made bold to deal withal—some to banish, and some to imprison, and some to put to death—it would be too long. . . We will be bold to say, that no kingdom hath yielded more plentiful experience than that your native kingdom of Scotland hath done concerning the deposition and the punishment of their transgressing kings. It is not far to go for an example: near you, your grandmother set aside, and your father, an infant, crowned. And the state did it here in England: here hath not been a want of some examples. They have made bold (the parliament and the people of England) to call their kings to account. There are frequent examples in the Saxons' time; since the Conquest there want not some precedents neither. King Edward II. nor King Richard II. were dealt with so by the parliament, as they were deposed and deprived; and truly, sir, whoever shall look into their stories, shall not find the articles charged upon them to come near to that height and capitalness of the crimes that are laid to your charge." Bradshaw then asserted the existence of a contract and a bargain made between king and people — that the bond was reciprocal — that the sovereign was as much bound by his coronation oath as the subject was bound in his allegiance — that if this bond were once broken, farewell sovereignty! "Sir," he continued, "that which we are now upon, by the command of the highest court, is to try and judge you for your great offenses. The charge hath called you tyrant, traitor, murderer. (Here the king uttered a startling 'Hah!') Sir, it had been well if any of these terms might justly have been spared." Bradshaw concluded his long speech by protesting that in those proceedings all of them had God before their eyes, and by recommending the repentance of King David as an example proper for the king to imitate. Charles then said, hurriedly, "I would desire only one word before you give sentence—only one word." Bradshaw told him that his time was now past. Again the king pressed that they would hear him a word—at most a very few words. Bradshaw again told him that he had not owned their jurisdiction as a court; that he looked upon them as a sort of people met together; that they all knew what language they received from his party. The king said that he knew nothing of that, and once more begged to be heard: and Bradshaw once more told him that they had given him too much liberty already, and that he ought to repent of his wickedness, and submit to his sentence; and then, raising his sonorous voice, he said — "What sentence the law affirms to a traitor, a tyrant, a murderer, and a public enemy to the country, that sentence you are now to hear. Make silence! Clerk, read the sentence!" Then the clerk read the sentence, which, after reciting the authority of the court, the charge exhibited, and the king's refusal to plead or admit the court's jurisdiction, went on to state that the commissioners, after examining witnesses upon oath, were in conscience satisfied that the said Charles Stuart was guilty of levying war against the parliament and people, and was, in the general course of his government, counsels, and practices, guilty of the bloody wars, murders, rapines, burnings, spoils, desolations, damages, and mischiefs the nation had undergone; and ended thus: "For all which treasons and crimes this court doth adjudge that he, the said Charles Stuart, as a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and public enemy to the good people of this nation, shall be put to death by severing his head from his body." Charles raised his eyes to heaven, and said, "Will you hear me a word, sir?" "Sir," replied Bradshaw, "you are not to be heard after sentence." Charles, greatly agitated, said inquiringly, "No, sir?" "No, sir, by your favor," rejoined the inflexible president; "guards, withdraw your prisoner." Still struggling to be heard, Charles said, confusedly, "I may speak after the sentence by your favor, sir. I may speak after the sentence, ever. By your favor"——"Hold!" cried Bradshaw. "The sentence, sir," stammered Charles, "I say, sir, I do"——Again Bradshaw stopped him with his determined "Hold!" And then the king, muttering, "I am not suffered to speak: expect what justice other people will have;" gave up his hopeless efforts, and turned away with his guard; and as he went through the hall there was another cry for justice and execution. "Here," says Whitelock, "we may take notice of the abject baseness of some vulgar spirits, who, seeing the king in that condition, endeavored in their small capacity, further to promote his misery, that they might a little curry favor with the present powers, and pick thanks of their then superiors. Some of the very same persons were afterward as clamorous for justice against those that were the king's judges." But it should appear that these vulgar spirits were few in number—that they confined themselves to mere words, the expression of their impatience and their still lingering doubts that the court, after all, would not have the courage to proceed to execution; and it has been almost positively proved that the worst insults reported by the royalist writers, such as spitting in the king's face, throwing pipes at him, and the like, were nothing but inventions. And if Bradshaw was harsh and unrelenting—if nearly every man that sat on that unprecedented trial had strung his nerves to do what he considered essential to his own safety and the salvation of his country—it must still be confessed by every impartial examiner into the circumstances that there was no want of decency or dignity in the proceedings of the court. In fact, in spite of the representations of his partisans and the sympathy felt for the fate of Charles, that high court of justice appeared in the eyes of all Europe a solemn and imposing scene; and from that day down to the day of the savage and brutal retaliation which followed the Restoration, the king's judges, and the commonwealth men generally, made it their proudest boast that they had neither acted with a timid hand nor with a mean spirit—that what they had done was not done in a corner, but openly in the eyes of all England.

On retiring from the court Charles felt that his doom was inevitable. He had represented, and his family and friends still continued to represent, that his cause was the cause of all the crowned heads in Europe—that the triumph of a people over a legitimate sovereign had been the most fatal of examples. But the crowned heads were full of cares, and projects, and hopes, and fears of their own. France, the native country, and then the residence of the queen, who had with her the Prince of Wales and the Duke of York, was convulsed by civil dissensions; and while Charles was undergoing trial for his life in England, the parliament of Paris proclaimed Cardinal Mazarin, the prime-minister, the every thing in France, to be a disturber of the public peace and an enemy to the king and kingdom. The great monarchy of Spain was falling to ruin under the rule of the weak though amiable Philip IV., who in the preceding year had well-nigh lost Naples and Sicily, and all his rich dominions in Italy, through the insurrections headed by the tanner Giuseppe Alessi, the fisherman Masaniello, and the armorer or blacksmith Gennaro Annese. Philip, too, in the affair of the Spanish matrimony and journey to Madrid had been treated most insultingly and dishonorably by Charles, who, after affiancing, had rejected his sister,[1] and in other matters that sovereign was certainly under no obligation to the English king. But even if Philip had had every good feeling and intention toward the fallen Charles—and his was not a nature to cherish revenge—he had not the power of changing or retarding his fate; and as much may be said of all the rest of the cotemporary crowned heads. It might, however, have been expected that, if merely in decency, these kings and princes would have made some effort, some remonstrance; but not one of them offered so much as an intercession in his favor. This generous office was reserved for a republican people, who had become rich and great by casting off the monarchic yoke of Spain. As soon as the government of the United Provinces saw the turn affairs were taking, they sent over ambassadors to intercede for the king's life, and to preserve friendship between England and the States. These ambassadors failed, as we believe all the ambassadors of Europe would have done; but their coming was memorable and highly honorable.[1] Henrietta Maria had long forgotten her duties as a wife with her lover Jermyn, whom she married soon after the execution of the king;[2] but, at the awful prospect of the scaffold and the block, she got a tender and a forcible letter delivered to the speaker, by means of the French ambassador, in which she prayed that the House of Commons would grant her a pass to come into England, in order that she might use all the credit and influence she had with him to induce the king to give them full satisfaction in every thing they desired; or, failing in that, that she might be permitted to perform the duty she owed him, and to be near him in his uttermost extremity.[3] The House would not suffer this letter to be read; nor did they or Fairfax, or the army, pay any more respect to a letter from Prince Charles, wherein he sent a sort of carte blanche, signed and sealed, offering any conditions, provided only the life of his father were spared.[4]

On the evening of the day on which he received his sentence, Charles entreated the commissioners, through the medium, it appears, of Hugh Peters, the republican preacher, to allow him the company of Bishop Juxon; and this was readily granted, as was also the society of the only children he had in England—the Princess Elizabeth, then in her thirteenth, and the Duke of Gloucester, in his ninth year. On that night Juxon preached to the king in his private lodgings at St. James's; and on the morrow, being a Sunday, the commissioners of the High Court of Justice kept a fast in the chapel at Whitehall. On Monday, the 29th of January, the House sat early, and, as one of the secluded members, as they termed those who had been forcibly expelled by Pride and his soldiers, ventured to present himself, they passed a vote that all such members as

[1] The Infanta Donna Maria, the rejected of Charles, was married some years afterward to the King of Hungary, who became emperor in 1637, by the style of Ferdinand III. In the court of Vienna she continued to be remarkable, not only for the beauty of her person, but for the purity of her morals. She lived to see Henrietta Maria, who is generally supposed to have been a main cause of Charles's forsaking her, driven a fugitive out of England; she lived to hear of the fatal fields of Marston Moor and Naseby, but not of Charles's death on the scaffold, for she died in childbed in 1646.

[1] The Commons gave no answer to the Dutch ambassadors until the 5th of February, or six days after the execution. Then "they thanked the States for their grave advice concerning the king, and let them understand that the Commons of England had proceeded according to the laws of the land in what they had done, and as they leave all other nations and kingdoms to move according to their rights and laws, so they hope none will think ill if they act according to those of England, and that they shall be always ready to show themselves friends to the United Provinces."—Whitelock. It may be doubted, however, whether the United Provinces would have interfered, if they had not been instigated by the quasi-royal House of Orange.

[2] Bishop Burnet positively asserts that the queen had had a child by Jermyn some time before her husband's death; and several of the French memoir-writers assert more than this.

[3] Clarendon.

[4] Burnet says that at the crisis the king's party was without spirit; and that many of themselves had told him they could never believe his death was really intended till it was too late. "They thought all was a pageantry to strike terror, and to force the king to such concessions as they had a mind to extort from him."

had voted that the king's concessions were a ground of settling peace should be forever disabled to sit in that House. They passed an act for altering the style and form of all writs, grants, patents, &c., which henceforward, instead of bearing the style and title, and head of the king, were to bear "Custodes libertatis Angliæ auctoritate parliamenti," &c. The date was to be the year of our Lord, and no other: the former words, "juratores pro domino rege," were to give place to "juratores pro republica;" the words "contra pacem, dignitatem, vel coronam nostram," were to be changed simply into "contra pacem publicam," &c. The High Court of Justice sat, and appointed the time and place of execution. The king's children came from Sion House to take their last farewell of their father. He took the princess up in his arms and kissed her, and gave her two seals with diamonds, and prayed for the blessing of God upon her and the rest of his children, and there was a great weeping.[1] Charles had ever been an indulgent and tender parent. According to Herbert, who was present, this touching scene moved those to pity that had been most hard-hearted before. The last night of all was spent by the king in the palace of St. James's, where he slept soundly for more than four hours.[2] Awaking about two hours before the dismal daybreak of the 30th of January, he dressed himself with unusual care, and put on an extra shirt because the season was so sharp. He said, "Death is not terrible to me, and, bless my God, I am prepared." He then called in Bishop Juxon, who remained with him an hour in private prayer. About ten o'clock Colonel Hacker, who was commissioned to conduct him to the scaffold, tapped softly at the chamber-door, to say they were ready. Herbert was so unnerved that he could scarcely open the door when commanded so to do by the king. When Hacker entered his voice faltered, and he was paler than the king. They went together from St. James's through the park toward Whitehall, in the front of which the scaffold had been erected. In the park several companies of foot were drawn up with drums beating and colors flying. Charles walked erect and very fast, having on the right hand Bishop Juxon, and on the left Colonel Tomlinson, and being followed by a guard of halberdiers and by some of his own gentlemen and servants, who walked bareheaded. There was no shouting, no gesticulating, no turmoil of any kind: the troops, men and officers, the spectators of all

[2] It was inevitable that some of Charles's last thoughts should be turned upon Laud. According to Herbert, who had been lying by his bedside upon a pallet, "where he took small rest," the king, when he awoke, opened his curtains to call him, "there being a great cake of wax set in a silver basin, that then, as at all other times, burned all night." By this dim light Charles perceived that his attendant was disturbed in his sleep; but he called him and bade him rise, saying that he had a great work to do that day. However, he would know why he was so troubled in his sleep. Herbert replied that he had been dreaming. "I would know your dream," said the king. The dream was this:—He saw Archbishop Laud enter that sad room; saw the king take him aside and speak to him with a pensive countenance; and then saw the archbishop heave a sigh, retire, and fall prostrate on the ground. "It is very remarkable," said Charles, "but he is dead, yet had we conferred together in life, 'tis very likely (albeit I loved him well) I should have said something to him might have occasioned his sigh."

ranks, were silent as the grave, save now and then when a prayer or a blessing escaped from some of them.[1] At the end of the park Charles entered Whitehall, and, passing through the long gallery, went into his own old cabinet chamber. There he was delayed, for the scaffold was not quite ready: he passed the time in prayer with the bishop. He refused to dine, having before taken the sacrament; but about twelve o'clock at noon he drank a glass of claret wine and ate a piece of bread, and then (being summoned by Colonel Hacker, who came to the chamber-door) he went thence with Juxon, Colonel Tomlinson, Colonel Hacker, and the guards, through the Banqueting-House to the scaffold, which was hung round with black, and the floor covered with black, and the ax and block laid in the middle of it.[2] Companies of foot and horse were on every side of the scaffold, and vast multitudes of people had come to be spectators. He could hear many, both men and women, praying for him, "the soldiers not rebuking any of them—by their silence and dejected faces seeming afflicted rather than insulting." Fixing his eye earnestly upon the block, he asked Colonel Hacker if there were no place higher, and he then addressed a speech to the gentlemen upon the scaffold. Perceiving that the people could not approach near enough to hear him, he said that he felt it to be his duty, as an honest man, a good king, and a good Christian, to declare his innocency to those who could hear him; and he called God to witness that he never did begin a war with the two Houses of Parliament; that they began it upon him by claiming the militia. He said that God would clear him; that, being in charity with all, he would not lay it upon the two Houses; that he hoped they were free of this guilt; that he believed that ill instruments between them and him had been the chief cause of all this bloodshed; that, as he found himself clear of guilt, so he hoped and prayed God that they might, too. Then, alluding to the death of Strafford,

[1] Sir Philip Warwick—and he alone—says, that, as Charles was going through the park, "one of the commanders, thinking to disturb him, asked him whether he were not consenting to his own father's death. 'Friend,' said the king, 'if I had no other sin—I speak it with reverence to God's majesty—I assure thee I would never ask him pardon.'"

[2] Whitelock.—Warwick says that after Charles had taken the sacrament he said, "Now let the rogues come; I have heartily forgiven them, and am prepared for all I am to undergo." He adds, "It was a very cold day, and they at Whitehall had prepared two or three dishes of meat for him to dine upon; but he refused to eat any thing; and the bishop told me he resolved to touch nothing after the sacrament: but the bishop expostulated with him, and let him know how long he had fasted; how sharp the weather was; and how some fit of fainting might take him upon the scaffold; which he knew he would be troubled at, for the interpretation his murderers would put upon it; which prevailed with him to eat half a manchet of bread and drink a glass of wine. And, thus prepared, when he was called, he marched to the scaffold; and a gentleman of my acquaintance, that had so placed himself in Wallingford House that he could easily discern all that was done upon the scaffold, protested to me he saw him come out of the Banqueting-House on the scaffold with the same unconcernedness and motion that he usually had when he entered it on a masque night. And another gentleman, whom I'll name—Dr. Farrar, a physician, a man of a pious heart but fanciful brain (for this was he that would have had the king and parliament have decided their business by lot) —had gained such a place upon the stage, that he assured me that, as he had observed him before very majestic and steady, so, when he had laid down his neck upon the block, he standing at some distance from him in a right line, he perceived his eye as quick and lively as ever he had seen it"—Memoirs.

he added, "Yet, for all this, God forbid that I should be so ill a Christian as not to say that God's judgments are just upon me. . . . . I only say this, that an unjust sentence that I suffered to take effect is punished now, by an unjust sentence upon me." He said, pointing to Dr. Juxon, "There is a good man that will bear me witness that I have forgiven all the world, and even those in particular that have been the chief causes of my death. Who they are God knows; I do not desire to know; I pray God forgive them." He told them that they would never have peace, that they would never do right, that God would never prosper them, until they gave the king, his son and successor, his due, and the people their due; and, still fixed in his old theory of monarchic government, he assured them that the people ought never to have a share in the government, that being a thing "nothing pertaining to them, and that he died the martyr of the people." While he was speaking, one of the gentlemen on the scaffold touched the edge of the ax. "Hurt not the ax," says Charles, "that may hurt me." When he had ended his long speech with a prayer to God that the people might take those courses that were best for the good of the kingdom and their own salvation, Juxon suggested that his majesty might say something about his affections in religion; and thereupon Charles declared that he died a Christian according to the profession of the church of England, as he found it left by his father. Then, turning to Colonel Hacker, he said, "Take care that they do not put me to pain." To a gentleman that approached the block he said, "Take heed of the ax, pray take heed of the ax." Two men in disguises and visors stood by the block. To one of them Charles said, "I shall say but very short prayers, and then thrust out my hands for the signal." Then he called to Dr. Juxon for his nightcap, and, having put it on, he asked the executioner, "Does my hair trouble you?" and he put up all his hair under his cap with the help of the headsman and the bishop. And then, turning to the bishop, he said, "I have a good cause and a gracious God on my side." "You have now," said Juxon, "but one stage more: the stage is turbulent and troublesome, but it is a short one: it will soon carry you a very great way: it will carry you from earth to heaven." "I go from a corruptible to an incorruptible crown, where no disturbance can be," was the last reported sentence of Charles. "You are exchanged from a temporal to an eternal crown—a good exchange," was the response of the bishop. And now the king took off his cloak, and gave his George to Juxon, with the single word "Remember!" stooped, laid his neck across the block, stretched out his hands; the executioner let fall the ax, which severed the neck at one blow; and the other man in the mask took up the head, and shouted, "This is the head of a traitor!" The bloody deed was accompanied by "a dismal, universal groan."[1]

THE COMMONWEALTH.

Great Seal of the Commonwealth.

A.D. 1649. On the day of the king's execution, the Independents constituting the House of Commons passed an act prohibiting, under pain of high treason, the proclamation of the Prince of Wales, or any other, to be king or chief magistrate of England or Ireland, without consent of parliament; and copies of this act were ordered to be sent down to the sheriffs to be proclaimed in all the counties. On the same mournful day, Duke Hamilton, who knew that his life was aimed at, escaped with the Lord Loughborough out of Windsor Castle, and Sir Lewis Dives broke from his prison in London. The escapes of these persons hastened the doom of three of the royalists, for the House immediately debated the question of bringing some of the chief delinquents to a speedy trial, appointed a committee to constitute a court, and ordered the vacillating and unprincipled Earl of Holland to be removed to London. Hamilton was retaken, the day after his flight, by some troopers, who found him knocking at an inn gate in Southwark, and who recognized him in spite of his humble disguise. On the 1st of February it was voted that Hamilton and Holland, with Lord Goring, Lord Capel, and Colonel Owen, should be the "next persons to be proceeded against for justice." The Lord Capel, who was eventually one of the victims, escaped by a desperate attempt out of the Tower, over the moat, but he was apprehended two days after, by two London watermen, in a house at Lambeth. The preparations for the trial of these royalists, the voting a bill for the strengthening of the fleet, and the receiving of friendly petitions from Surrey and Kent, occupied the first days of the Commonwealth. But on the 5th of February the Commons took up the important question of the peerage, and debated till six o'clock at night whether the House of Lords should be continued a court of judicature or a court consultatory only. During the debate the Lords, as they had done several times before, sent once more to propose a committee of both Houses to act together in settling the kingdom; but, again, their messengers were left in the lobby without an answer and without being called in.[1] On the 6th of February the debate was renewed, and the question being put whether the House of Commons should take the advice of the House of Lords in the exercise of the legislative power of the kingdom, it was carried in the negative by a large majority; and then, without hesitation, they passed to the vote "that the House of Peers in parliament is useless and dangerous, and ought to be abolished, and that an act be brought in to that purpose." This was carried by a majority of 44 to 29.[2] Harry Marten proposed that the word "dangerous" should be omitted, and the term "useless" alone retained; or that it should be declared that the Lords were useless, but not dangerous. And the peers had so acted and had fallen into such a condition as almost to justify this bitter sarcasm. On the very next day (the 7th of February) it was voted "that it hath been found by experience, and this House doth declare, that the office of a king in this nation, and the power thereof in any single person, is unnecessary, burdensome, and dangerous to the liberty, safety, and public interest of the people of this nation, and therefore ought to be abolished." This vote was soon followed by another, proposed by Marten, for the taking down of the late king's statues at the Royal Exchange and other places, and for the inscribing on the places where they stood these words :—"Exit Tyrannus, Regum ultimus, Anno Libertatis Angliæ restitutæ primo, Anno Dom. 1648,[1] Jan. 30." Two acts in conformity with these votes were soon passed; and an elaborate declaration was published in English, Latin, French, and Dutch, to explain and justify the late proceedings and the changing of England into a republic and free state. Six of the twelve judges—Bacon, Brown, Bedingfield, Creswell, Trevor, and Atkins—refused to act; but the others—Rolles, Jermyn, St. John, Pheasant, Wilde, and Yates—agreed to hold their offices, provided only that it should be declared, by act of the Commons, that the fundamental laws were not to be abolished. The new great seal was confided, during good behavior, to Whitelock, Keble and Lisle being joined in the commission. St. John, who, almost as much as any single man, had helped to make this memorable revolution, became chief justice; the denomination of "King's Bench" being converted into that of "Commons' Bench."

[2] At the same time a committee was appointed to draw up an act for making the estates of the late members, both of the House of Lords and likewise of the House of Commons, liable to the law for payment of all debts. And it was referred to a committee to consider of a way to take away all appeals to the Lords, and to discharge all persons committed by them, and how the peers might be elected burgesses and knights to serve in the House of Commons.

For some time the executive had resided in the committee of government at Derby House; and this, with some very immaterial changes, was now converted into the "Executive Council of State," consisting of forty members, among whom were the earls of Pembroke, Salisbury, Denbigh, and Mulgrave; the Lord Grey of Werke, Viscount Lisle, the Lord Grey of Groby, Whitelock, St. John, Chief Baron Wilde, Fairfax, Cromwell, Skippon, Sir Arthur Hazelrig, Sir Henry Mildmay, Sir Harry Vane, Harry Marten, Bradshaw, and Ludlow.[2] The president of this council of state was Bradshaw, the king's judge; and its secretary for foreign correspondence was Bradshaw's intimate friend and relative, the immortal Milton, who employed his genius in defending the judgment and execution.

The church was a more difficult matter to settle, or to give any appearance of settlement to, than was the state; and on this point the Commonwealthmen showed their wisdom by doing or attempting very little, and their right feeling by enlarging the bounds of toleration. The Catholics, who would have been harrowed out of the land by the Presbyterians, were allowed more liberty than ever they had known before since the days of Queen Mary, when they were the persecutors. It sufficed to escape the old penal code that men did not attack any of the fundamental principles of Christianity. The form and discipline of the Presbyterian church, slightly modified, were retained; but that fanatic clergy was left without any temporal power whatsoever.

[2] The other members of the Council of State were—the lords Lisle and Rolle; Sir Gilbert Pickering, Sir William Masham, Sir William Armine, and Sir William Constable, baronets; Sir John Danvers and Sir James Harrington, knights; Valentine Walton, William Pourefy, Robert Wallop, John Hutchinson (the conscientious colonel and governor of Nottingham), Antony Stapely, William Heveningham, Dennis Bond, Alexander Popham, John Jones, Alderman Rowland Wilson, Alderman Isaac Pennington, Thomas Scot, Cornelius Holland, and Luke Robinson.

The army remained under the command of the men that had created it, and made it the best army then in the world; and Fairfax, though he had abstained from committing himself upon the king's trial, continued to be commander-in-chief. But in the navy an important change was made immediately: the Earl of Warwick was removed from the post of high-admiral; Blake, the double-handed, the sea-hero of the age, was appointed, with Dean and Popham, to command the fleet; and a board of admiralty, or committee for naval affairs, was formed, consisting only of three members, the head of whom was the zealous and capable Vane.

The trial of Duke Hamilton and the other two royalists, whose blood the Independents thirsted after, was probably hastened by the hostile demonstrations in Scotland. As early as the 5th of February it was reported in London "that the Scots were talking big of raising an army, in revenge of the king's blood, and saying that all would join unanimously against the sectaries of England, and ground themselves upon the breach of the Covenant." And on the 10th letters from Scotland were read in the House, "of their threatening revenge for the king's blood, and that some there had proclaimed Prince Charles king of Scotland, which was not contradicted by the parliament nor kirk." The High Court of Justice specially named by the Independents, who were in fact the prosecutors and the judges, sat in Westminster Hall, to the number of fifty; and Duke Hamilton (in his unlucky English quality and title of Earl of Cambridge), Lord Goring, Lord Capel, and Sir John Owen were put to the bar, and charged with treason and other high crimes. Hamilton pleaded that he was of another nation; that what he had done was as a servant of the kingdom of Scotland; that he was never naturalized Earl of Cambridge, that he knew of; and that he was a prisoner of war, and had articles given him. The court caused the act to be read for the naturalization of his father, and consequently of him, being his heir.[1] The Lord Goring pleaded not guilty, and was dismissed for the present, "behaving himself with great respect to the court." The Lord Capel pleaded that he was prisoner of war to the Lord-general Fairfax, and had conditions given him, and his life promised him at Colchester; maintaining that if all the magistrates in Christendom were combined together they could not call him in question. Sir John Owen pleaded quarter. The Earl of Holland was not produced at first, his lady having represented that he was so ill that he could not with safety be removed up to London; but a few days after he was brought to the bar, and charged, among other crimes, with being "an eminent courtier," and a double turn-coat. He pleaded (what was notoriously false) that he had free quarter given him when he was taken in his insane insurrection at Kingston. On the 6th of

[1] But it was proved on the trial that the unfortunate Hamilton had been called by the late king's writ to sit in the House of Lords as Earl of Cambridge—that he had acted as a peer of England, sitting in the Lords' House and in divers committees—that, as a peer of England, he had taken the national covenant, and subscribed "Cambridge."

March the court pronounced judgment against them all—"that their heads should be severed from their bodies, yet with relation to the mercy of parliament." The Earl of Warwick, his brother, and the Countess of Holland, his wife, presented a petition for the life of the Earl of Holland; and divers ladies petitioned for Hamilton, Goring, and the other two. The House, after some hours' debate, rejected these petitions, and left the prisoners to the justice of the court that sentenced them. Then the ladies petitioned the High Court itself, which only granted a reprieve for two days. On the 8th the condemned lords themselves petitioned the House; but Sir John Owen neglected or despised taking this course. The petitions of Hamilton and Capel were unanimously rejected: it was carried by one vote that the Lord Goring should be reprieved, and "this one vote was the speaker's, who carried the House, being equally divided, four-and-twenty of each part; and he said he did it because he had formerly received some civilities from the Lord Goring, and his single vote now saved his life."[1] The House was also equally divided upon the question of the Earl of Holland's reprieve; but here the speaker gave his voice for death. Sir John Owen was respited, and ultimately spared. On the very next day (the 9th of March) Hamilton, Holland, and Capel were beheaded upon a scaffold in Palace-yard.

Although the royalists had been greatly excited and increased in number by the incident of the king's death, the heroic way in which he met his fate, and by the publication of the Eikon Basilike (a specious cheat) which was distributed under his scaffold, and which went through many editions in the course of a few months, that party made no effort whatever to disturb the first days of the commonwealth. The Presbyterians, who were equally inflamed against the Independents, were equally quiescent. If the two had united they might possibly have nipped the republic in its bud; but the hatred the royalists bore to the Presbyterians, and the Presbyterians to the royalists, was scarcely inferior to that which they entertained in common toward the triumphant party. The first attack that was made upon the new government was made by a part of that army which had raised them to their preëminence. "Free-born John," who thought that the revolution had not gone half far enough, and that the leaders of it were betraying the cause of the people, put forth a vehement pamphlet entitled "England's New Change," and endeavored to revive the spirit and practices of the agitators in the army. A mutiny broke out at Salisbury and Banbury; but Fairfax and Cromwell presently crushed it, and executed two cornets and two corporals. This, with the three executions already mentioned, was all the blood that was shed in this mighty revolution—less blood than ever was wasted at any similar convulsion. Lilburne was shut up in the Tower; and some few leaders of a set of madmen, who were sighing after something very like the republic of the illustrious Trinculo, were committed to meaner prisons. It was necessary to reconstruct the law which guarded the state; but, in doing this, that residue of the parliament which, for brevity, we must call the parliament, or House of Commons, entirely lost sight, in several cases, of the principles of liberty they professed, and took some of the worst pages out of the accursed book of despotism. They made it treason to affirm in speech or writing that the commonwealth was unlawful, usurped, or tyrannical; treason to deny the supremacy of parliament; treason to plot, or conspire, or levy war either against the commonwealth or the council of state; treason for any, not being of the army, to stir up mutiny or insubordination therein. Words spoken were made capital; and simple sedition was converted into high treason. The press was put into its old shackles, and extreme punishments declared against such as printed or put forth any thing against the commonwealth, the council of state, &c.

In the mean time, the late king's eldest son had been proclaimed, as Charles the Second, in Scotland by the parliament, in Ireland by the Marquis of Ormond. Both countries, in taking up arms, had invited him over; but he had no affection for the Scots and their covenant, and Ireland offered but rude accommodation for a prince of such delicate nurture; and Charles therefore left the Scots and Irish to fight by themselves. On the 15th of August, Cromwell, with his son-in-law, Ireton, landed near Dublin to suppress the formidable insurrection, and, if possible, to restore peace to a country which had never been quiet. His army did not exceed 6000 foot and 3000 horse; but it was an army of Ironsides, the best disciplined and the best officered, and it carried with it a rare train of artillery. When these men landed hardly any thing was left to the Protestants and the parliament except Dublin and Derry: in all the other principal towns floated the royal standard; but, now town after town was retaken with the utmost rapidity, and the undisciplined Irish were beaten wherever they presented themselves in the open field. Drogheda was stormed on the 11th of September, Cromwell himself fighting in the breach. In the civil war in England he and his men had ever been merciful to the vanquished; but here and everywhere in Ireland little or no mercy was shown to the papists or idolaters. Wexford was taken by storm, and underwent the same barbarous fate as Drogheda: Cork, Kinsale, and numerous other places opened their gates; but the terrible state of the weather, the obstinacy of the resistance, and the strength of the place, obliged the conqueror to turn aside from Waterford. He put garrisons in Passage Fort and other places that were of great importance to the reduction of Munster, then moved to the south, and put his troops in winter-quarters at Kinsale, Cork, Wexford, Youghal, and Bandon-bridge. While the army lay in these quarters Cromwell was not idle: he visited all the garrisons that were in his possession in Munster, and ordered all affairs both military and civil. By the end of January, 1650, before his soldiers "had breathed in their winter-quarters fully two months," he marched out of Youghal with about 3000 men. This force he divided into two parties·

one was led by Ireton toward Carrick; Cromwell led the other over the Blackwater, toward Limerick and Tipperary. In general, the Irish quailed before him; where they resisted they were cut to pieces. Ireton was equally successful; and, when they formed a junction under the walls of Kilkenny, they laid siege to that important city, and reduced it in six days. From Kilkenny the conquerors moved to Clonmel, where, according to Cromwell, they found "the stoutest enemy that ever was found by an army in Ireland."[1] "These achievements being obtained," says an admiring Protestant cotemporary, who, like the parliament—like the whole English nation—saw nothing wrong in the bloodshed by which they had been attended, "and care taken to secure what they had gotten, the lord-general addresses himself to his journey for England, having been in Ireland about ten months—namely, from the middle of August, 1649, to the next May following, 1650—a time inconsiderable, respect had to the work done therein, which was more than ever could be done in ten years before by any king or queen of England. Queen Elizabeth, indeed, after a long and tedious war there, at last drove out the Spaniards that came in to the assistance of the rebellious natives, but could never utterly extinguish the sparks of that rebellion. And not only did the shortness of the time render the work admirable, but the nature of the work itself, it being against a most obstinately desperate, bloody enemy—people that had put themselves out of all hopes of favor or mercy by acting the most bloody tragedy that ever hath been seen or related, in that their universal massacre of the English, yet recent in memory."[2] There remained only Limerick, Waterford, and some few inconsiderable garrisons to be reduced; and this business was left to the charge of Ireton. Cromwell, after a boisterous passage, arrived at Bristol, where he was received with a thrice-repeated volley of great guns and other demonstrations of joy. From Bristol he proceeded post-haste to London, where his presence was most eagerly looked for. "Drawing near Hounslow Heath, he was met by the Lord-general Fairfax, accompanied by many members of parliament and officers of the army, with multitudes that came out of curiosity to see him of whom fame had made a loud report. Hence, after mutual salutations, congratulations, and other testimonies of high respect, he proceeds on, and passing near Hyde Park Corner, he is saluted with great guns and several volleys of small shot by Colonel Barkstead's regiment, which was drawn up in the highway for that purpose. Continuing thus their march (multitudes increasing to behold him), the Lord Cromwell is conducted to the house called the Cock-pit, near St. James's, which had been appointed and prepared for him. Here he was visited by the lord mayor and alderman of London, and by many other persons of quality, all of them expressing their own and the nation's great obligations to him for his eminent services in Ireland. After some time of respite and refreshment he attended his charge in parliament, where the speaker, in an elegant speech, gave him the thanks of the House."[1]

The parliament, "who had faithful scouts abroad in the world," had been, and still were alarmed by secret combinations against them at home and open acts of hostility abroad. Scilly, Jersey, and the Isle of Man stood out and infested the seas with their piracy. Virginia and the islands in the Caribbee Sea revolted from them, "being very hot for monarchy and the liturgy." In Russia the English merchants were insulted and ill treated by the government; the French had fitted out ships which, under the flag of Charles II., made prize of every English vessel they could master; in Portugal a hostile fleet, which Prince Rupert had got to sea, was protected from the fleet of the commonwealth: and in Holland, Dorislaus, the resident minister of the commonwealth, was assassinated by six royalist ruffians in masks. "But," says Ludlow, "the enemy which most threatened the disturbance of the parliament was that of Scotland, where all interests were united in opposition to the present authority in England. They had also many who favored their designs in our nation, as well Presbyterians as Cavaliers; the former of these were most bold and active, upon presumption of more favor in case of ill success. The parliament being sensible of these things, published a declaration, showing that they had no design to impose upon the nation of Scotland any thing contrary to their inclinations; that they would leave them to choose what government they thought most convenient for themselves, provided they would suffer the English nation to live under that establishment which they had chosen; but it evidently appeared that the Scots were actuated by a spirit of domination and rule; and, that nothing might be wanting to compel us to submit to their imposition, they had espoused the interests of that family, which they themselves had declared guilty of much precious blood, and resolved to force the same upon England."

But even after proclaiming Charles, the Scottish Presbyterians were not prepared to admit him, save upon conditions and the express acknowledgment of their kirk. These negotiations, which were carried on at Breda, occupied some time. As Charles's precursor, the Marquis of Montrose, who was shrewdly suspected of having headed or directed the murderers of Dorislaus, crossed over to the Orkneys in this spring (1650) with a few hundred foreign soldiers. From these isles, where he obtained a few recruits, Montrose proceeded to the mainland, and disembarked on the shores of Caithness, with the design of penetrating into the Highlands, and calling his former followers to his standard. But Montrose was a royalist such as the Presbyterian royalists could not tolerate; the Committee of Estates were well prepared, and Strachan, their general, surprised the marquis just as he had advanced beyond the pass of Invercarron, on the confines of Ross. After repulsing with his old gallantry the first charge of the Covenanters, he saw his men lay down their arms on a second charge. His horse was shot under him, but a friend generously remounted him, and he fled from that his last fight, leaving his cloak and star, his sword and the garter with which he had been lately invested, behind him. He swam across a rapid river, disguised himself as a peasant, and got safe to the house of another friend; but that friend proved false, and basely betrayed him to the Covenanters, whose kirk had excommunicated him, and whose hearts were hardened against the sentiments of compassion or generosity. In the mean disguise in which he was betrayed, bound with ropes and subjected to all kinds of insult, he was carried to Edinburgh, and there, in virtue of a former attainder, he was hanged on a gallows thirty feet high. Such was the wretched end of Montrose, in the thirty-eighth year of his age, in the middle of the month of May. The day of his execution the Covenanters kept as a day of thanksgiving, and the ministers prayed exceedingly for the king's speedy coming, as one brought into the kirk, and therefore unto God. And, in effect, that godly prince Charles II. was coming, they having concluded their bargain with him at Breda, and he having promised, on the word of a prince, to recall and disclaim all commissions and declarations to the prejudice of the covenant; to acknowledge their present parliament; to swear, subscribe, and seal the national covenant, and the solemn league and covenant, as soon as he should reach Scotland, and before his admission to the exercise of royal power. He landed in the Frith of Cromarty in June, about a month after Montrose was hanged, being constrained to swallow the covenant as best he could ere he was allowed to set foot on shore. Troops had been already raised, and the Border was in a ferment; and now an army was collected for the king of England, Scotland, and Ireland; and the English parliament were denounced as regicides and traitors. The latter, therefore, thought it not prudent to be behindhand with the enemy, nor stay till they should first invade England, but resolved rather to carry the war at once into Scotland. The command of the invading army was offered to Fairfax, who positively declined it; and it was then conferred upon Cromwell, an act being passed on the 26th of June for repealing the ordinance, whereby Fairfax was appointed commander-in-chief of all the forces of the parliament, and another act passed on the same day, nemine contradicente, for constituting and appointing Oliver Cromwell, Esq., to be captain-general-in-chief of all the forces raised, and to be raised, by authority of parliament within the commonwealth of England. By the 29th of June Cromwell had left London and was on his march to the Borders.[1]

The army having come to a body and quartered upon the very edge of Scotland, Cromwell, upon the 22d of July, drew them forth to a rendezvous upon a hill within Berwick bounds, whence they had a full view of the adjacent parts of Scotland, "a stage whereon they were to act their parts in the ensuing tragedy." He made a speech to his men, exhorting them to be faithful and courageous; and then not to doubt of a blessing from God, and all encouragement from himself. The soldiers answered with a loud and unanimous shout; and on the morrow, going cheerfully about their work, they advanced into Scotland by the eastern shore of the Frith of Forth. On that night they quartered in the fields near Mordington, and there Cromwell proclaimed throughout the camp that none, on pain of death, should offer violence or injury to the persons or goods of any in Scotland not in arms; and that no soldier should presume, without special license, to straggle half a mile from the army. Part of this proclamation was altogether unnecessary, for there were no goods of any kind to injure or plunder; the whole country between Berwick and Edinburgh had been swept as if with a broom; nothing was left that could yield any comfort or succor to the invaders. Cromwell, who had expected no better entertainment, advanced to Dunbar, where he received provisions from English ships, sent thither on purpose. He then moved to Haddington, only seventeen miles from Edinburgh. not seeing all this while the face of an enemy in arms. But although the Scots were not seen, they were heard of, giving out that they would meet the English at Gladsmuir. But when Cromwell got there there were no Scots; and so he went on to Edinburgh, "where some bickering happened about the possession of Arthur's Seat, which the English obtained." But notwithstanding all these provocations, the Scots would not forsake their trenches, "but lay upon the catch."[1]

"The English army," says Ludlow, "drew up within sight of the town of Edinburgh, but the Scots would not hazard all by the decision of a battle, hoping to tire us out with frequent skirmishes and harassing our men, relying much upon the unsuitableness of the climate to our constitutions, especially if they should detain us in the field till winter. Their counsels succeeded according to their desires, and our army, through hard duty, scarcity of provisions, and the rigor of the season, grew very sickly, and diminshed daily, so that they were necessitated to draw off to receive supplies from our shipping, which could not come nearer to them than Dunbar, distant from Edinburgh above twenty miles. The enemy, observing our army about to retire, followed them close; and falling upon our rear-guard of horse in the night, having the advantage of a clear moon, beat them up to our rear-guard of foot; which alarm coming suddenly upon our men, put them into some disorder: but a thick cloud interposing in that very moment, and intercepting the light of the moon for about an hour, our army took that opportunity to secure themselves, and arrived without any further disturbance at Dunbar, where, having shipped their heavy baggage and sick men, they designed to return into England." But David Leslie and the army of the kirk had got between Dunbar and Berwick, and had possessed themselves of all the passes, confident of success, and calculating on the entire destruction of the invaders. And, indeed, the position of the English seemed very desperate: contrary winds had prevented the arrival of provisions at Dunbar, and the 12,000 men, to which the force was now reduced, had scarcely a mouthful of victuals, while Leslie, well provided, was girding them in with 27,000 men. It was Sunday, the 31st of August, when Cromwell drew up in the fields near Dunbar: the enemy flanked him in great force on the hills to the right; he could not, without great disadvantage, go up the hills to engage them, nor would they come down to engage him. Both parties stood to their arms, watching each other; the Scots still gathering and increasing upon all the adjacent hills, "like a thick cloud menacing such a shower to the English as would wash them out of their country, if not out of the world; . . . and they boasted that they had them in a worse pound than the king had the Earl of Essex in Cornwall." But, on the Monday morning, the Scots urged on, it is said, by their impatient preachers, who proved by Scripture that their victory must be sure, drew down part of their army and their train of artillery toward the foot of the hills; and then Cromwell, who had always as much Scripture at command as any Presbyterian preacher, exclaimed, joyously, "The Lord hath delivered them into our hands!" But there was a great dike or ditch between the two armies, "of great disadvantage to those who should first attempt to pass it;" and all that day was allowed to elapse. But at night the English marched as close to the ditch as possibly they could, each regiment having several field-pieces with it; and, as morning dawned, Cromwell resolved to attempt to force one of the passes between Dunbar and Berwick, by which he might, with the more ease, attack the enemy's position. Accordingly a brigade of three regiments of horse and two regiments of foot was thrown forward to the pass. The Scots gallantly repulsed the assailants; but Cromwell led up his own regiment, and, after a fierce dispute, which lasted nearly an hour, and in which the English infantry fought desperately with their pikes and the butt-ends of their muskets, the important pass was carried. The Scots now came down and charged with all their horse, being most of them lancers, and they charged strongly. Just at this moment a thick mist was dispersed by the risen sun, which now lighted up that field of blood, and fully revealed the two armies to each other. Cromwell shouted, "Now let God arise, and his enemies shall be scattered." And before the sun was much higher the army of the kirk was scattered, with the tremendous loss of 4,000 slain and 10,000 prisoners. The conqueror ordered the 107th Psalm to be sung in the field, and then marched again to Edinburgh, which threw open its gates at his approach. Glasgow followed the example; and the whole of the south of Scotland, where the English parliament had many friends, quietly submitted. Strachan, who had destroyed Montrose, took service with Cromwell. The king fled toward the Highlands, with the intention of quitting Scotland, or at least the Covenanters, forever; but the chiefs of that party made him stay, and prepared to crown him, at Scone, as monarch of the three kingdoms, when he was not master of the least of them.

[1] We have mentioned the assassination of Dorislaus in the preceding year. In this month of June news was received of the vile murder of another of the commonwealth diplomatists. This was Mr. Ascam, who had just arrived at Madrid and was lodging in an inn. Being at dinner in the inn with his interpreter, and with one footman attending him, six Englishmen—three dressed like merchants, and three like soldiers—knocked at the door, and being admitted, because they were English, Mr. Ascam rose from the table to salute them. As he saluted them, the foremost laid hold of his hair and stabbed him; the interpreter endeavored to escape, but he was stabbed also, and they both fell down dead. The murderers fled for refuge to the Venetian ambassador, but he denied them entrance, and then, knowing the customs of the country, they took sanctuary in the nearest church.—Whitelock.

A.D. 1651. But while Cromwell was besieging

Edinburgh Castle, disputing upon points of theology with the Presbyterian preachers, and suffering from a fit of the ague, Charles collected another army, and took up a strong position near Stirling. In vain Lambert attempted to bring him to action; the Scots remembered the lesson that had been taught them at Dunbar, and would not leave their fortified hills. Cromwell then crossed the Forth, and, after taking every town and castle that he approached, he sat down before Perth, "thereby to stop the Highlanders from sending any supplies to the king at Stirling, either of men or provisions." But Cromwell had scarcely taken possession of Perth when he learned that Charles had adopted the bold resolution of marching, in his absence, into England. And, in effect, the king left Stirling on the 31st of July, and reached Carlisle on the 6th of August. "The noise of this irruption made a terrible echo through all the nation, especially in the ears of the parliament at Westminster; but they had beforehand provided to welcome these new-come guests, and, first of all, Major-general Harrison, attended by 3000 horse and dragoons, joining himself with Colonel Rich and some other great commanders, marched away to salute them upon their entrance into England." Cromwell, too, instantly left Scotland in pursuit; but so rapid and well-directed were the movements of the invading army, that Charles got to Worcester without molestation, and established himself there with about 16,000 effective men. As Cromwell spurred through the northern counties he encountered a band of royalists, commanded by the Earl of Derby,[1] and cut them to pieces; and, having formed a junction with Harrison, Rich, Robert Lilburne, and Fleetwood, he arrived before Worcester on the 28th of August with a force superior to that of the king. The parliament's troops dashed across the Severn; and on the 3d of September, the anniversary of the battle of Dunbar, Cromwell gained what he called his "crowning mercy" at Worcester. The royalists, after a gallant contest, were thoroughly defeated, and Charles, escaping with difficulty, fled for his life, "knowing full well that should he be taken, he might expect no better treatment than his father had." It is said by some that he showed courage in the battle—it is certain that he showed great ingenuity and presence of mind in the flight: nevertheless, but for the devoted loyalty, the incorruptible fidelity of his partisans, he must have been taken by his pursuers. After a variety of romantic adventures and wanderings from place to place, Charles, in the disguise of a servant, got to Shoreham, on the Sussex coast, and from thence, about the middle of October, he crossed over to France in a collier. He did not see England again until he was brought back triumphantly by General Monk.

On leaving "the Golgotha of Worcester," Cromwell hastened to lay his victorious palms at the feet of parliament. He was again met, at his approach to London, by the speaker, by the whole parliament, by the lord mayor and aldermen, and by an immense concourse of people. The royal palace of Hampton

[1] This firm adherent to the royal cause was taken prisoner a few days after this by a party of the parliamentary troops, as he was flying from the battle of Worcester, and was beheaded in his own town of Bolton, by sentence of what was called a High Court of Justice, composed of some military officers, on the 16th of October following. By this time the parliament, considering itself as the established government of the country, assumed the right of treating all armed opposition to its authority by any English subject as treason. The royalists, however, of course regarded such proceedings as nothing less than "murdering in cold blood"—the expression used on this occasion by Clarendon.

Court was prepared for his reception; and shortly after an estate in land, worth £4000 a-year, was voted to him. From this moment, as is generally admitted by those who have most carefully studied his character and history, Cromwell began to entertain vague notions of grasping at the supreme authority.[1] As he had left Ireton to complete the conquest of Ireland, so he had left Monk, who at this time enjoyed an unusual degree of his favor, to reduce the king's party in Scotland; and both these generals were successful. Scilly, Jersey, Guernsey, and the Isle Man (the last made famous by the celebrated Countess of Derby) were easily reduced; and wherever the flag of the commonwealth showed itself, whether by land or sea, it was victorious. Vane, St. John, and six others were appointed commissioners to settle the kingdom of Scotland by a union with England, or, as it was termed, to "incorporate" Scotland with the commonwealth. Though Scottish commisioners were found to act with them, the Presbyterian clergy and the mass of the nation detested alike the words "union" and "incorporation;" but among the cogent arguments of the English were a victorious army, a chain of forts, an entire command of the coasts and the trade of Scotland; and, in the end, eighteen out of thirty-one counties, and twenty-four out of fifty-six cities and boroughs, consented to the union, and sent up twenty-eight members to sit in the English parliament. Ireland also was incorporated with the commonwealth, and all signs of royalty were effaced in both those countries.

Ever since the unavenged massacre at Amboyna, the English sailors and people had borne great ill will to the Dutch; and many recent circumstances had contributed to exasperate this feeling. The government of the United Provinces had treated the envoys of the commonwealth with marked disrespect; nor did they send any ambassadors to London till nearly three years after the execution of Charles, when, warned by the victory of Worcester, they sent over in a hurry to solicit, with great humility, the renewal of friendly negotiations. But these envoys came too late: the parliament had issued letters of marque to indemnify the country for losses sustained at the hands of Dutch vessels, and they had passed the memorable Navigation Act, which established as national law that no goods from any quarter beyond Europe should be imported into England, except by vessels belonging to England or to English colonies; and that no production of Europe should be imported except by English ships, or ships belonging to the country which furnished the production. This deadly blow was aimed at the carrying-trade of the Dutch, one of the most fruitful sources of their commercial prosperity. Nor was this all: the English parliament demanded arrears due by the Dutch for their right of fishing on the shores of England and Scotland, and also the opening of the Scheldt, with a free trade to the flag of the commonwealth. It was, moreover, clamorously demanded by the English mariners and people, that the survivors of the Dutch that had assisted in the massacre of the English at Amboyna should be given up to justice. All these things were quite enough to produce hostilities between two proud and warlike nations; but no doubt the two facts which most contributed to the war were these:—1st. The House of Orange, closely allied by marriage to that of Stuart, had strenuously exerted itself to avenge the late king's death, and restore his son. 2d. The English parliament had formed the grand scheme of a republican union, proposing to incorporate the United Provinces with the English commonwealth, and with that view had opened a correspondence with the republican party in Holland, who were irritated by the despotic encroachments of the princes of Orange (who were rendering themselves as absolute, under the name of stadtholders, as were any of the kings of Europe). All the money which had enabled Charles II. to land in Scotland and invade England had been furnished by the House of Orange; and, on the other side, all the disaffection in the Low Countries, which threatened the ruin of that House, had of late looked for hope and encouragement to the English parliament; though, in effect, the republicans of the United Provinces were too wise and too national to contemplate seriously the incorporation proposed. A collision was inevitable. Van Tromp, the best of the Dutch admirals, and a devoted partisan of the House of Orange, sailed up the Channel with forty sail. Blake, who had swept the fleet of Prince Rupert from the seas, was in the Downs with only twenty sail; but the English admiral insisted that the Dutch should strike their topmasts to his flag, in acknowledgment of the old sovereignty of the nation over the narrow seas. Van Tromp of course refused, and kept his course till he came nearly alongside of the English admiral. Then Blake ordered a gun to be fired at Van Tromp's flag, which was done thrice; but, instead of striking his flag, Van Tromp poured a broadside into Blake. Then the action, as far as the wind and weather would permit, became general, and lasted from three o'clock in the afternoon till nightfall, when the Dutch sheered off, with the loss of two ships, one of which was taken, the other sunk. This fight, in which the commonwealth sailors displayed wonderful ardor, was fought on the 19th of May, 1652.

[1] The determined republican Ludlow, who became the bitter enemy of Cromwell, says:—"His pernicious intentions did not discover themselves openly till after the battle of Worcester, which, in one of his letters to the parliament, he called 'the crowning victory.' At the same time, when he dismissed the militia, who had most readily offered themselves to serve the commonwealth against the Scots, he did it with anger and contempt, which was all the acknowledgment they could obtain from him for their service and affection to the public cause. In a word, so much was he elevated with that success, that Mr. Hugh Peters, as he since told me, took so much notice of it, as to say in confidence to a friend upon the road, in his return from Windsor, that Cromwell would make himself king. He now began to despise divers members of the House whom he had formerly courted, and grew most familiar with those he used to show most aversion to; endeavoring to oblige the royal party, by procuring for them more favorable conditions than consisted with the justice of the parliament to grant, under color of quieting the spirits of many people, and keeping them from engaging in new disturbances to rescue themselves out of those fears which many who had acted for the king yet lay under; though at the same time he designed nothing, as by the success was almost manifest, but to advance himself by all manner of means, and to betray the great trust which the parliament and good people of England had reposed in him."

The States-General accused Blake of being the aggressor, and intimated a desire to treat amicably for the adjustment of all difficulties: but, at the same time, they continued to increase their fleet; and the Dutch seamen—then esteemed the best in the world—were eager for their revenge; and on the 19th of July the English parliament put forth an open and spirited declaration of war, affirming that they found too much cause to believe that the states of the United Provinces had an intention, by force, to usurp the known rights of England in the seas, to destroy her fleets, that were, under God, her walls and bulwarks, and thereby to expose the commonwealth to invasion. In the mean time, Blake had made many prizes, both merchantmen and Dutch men-of-war; and Sir George Ayscough, the vice-admiral, had been recalled with his squadron from the West Indies. When Van Tromp again put to sea his force more than doubled the concentrated fleet of the parliament, and he talked loudly of annihilating his enemy. But he shaped so bad a course that he never got into action; and, when a dreadful storm arose, which scattered his fleet of a hundred sail, he sailed back to Holland with the loss of five frigates. The famous Admiral De Ruyter then put to sea with a much smaller force, and came up with Ayscough off Plymouth. A drawn battle, gallantly fought, was the result of this meeting. Soon after De Ruyter was reinforced by all the Dutch squadrons under De Witt; and on the 28th of September, after several smart skirmishes, he came up with Blake, who, however, so manœuvered as to get and keep the weather-gage. After fighting resolutely for many hours, De Ruyter and De Witt, under cover of night, bore away for their own coast, having lost one ship, which was taken by Captain Mildmay, and three or four which went down at sea after the action. A few days after this action a small English fleet in the Mediterranean (for the commonwealth had already a fleet there to protect trade) was attacked near Leghorn by a superior force; but the Dutch gained no advantage. Many other chance encounters took place; and, though not everywhere successful, the English seamen invariably vindicated their old reputation, which (through no fault of theirs) had been somewhat tarnished since the days of Elizabeth and Drake. The King of Denmark laid an embargo on the English merchantmen in the Baltic, closed the passage of the Sound to the English flag, and sent five of his great ships to join the Dutch; and, at the same time, ships of various nations, but bearing the French flag, were cruising everywhere as privateers. On the 29th of November, when Blake had been obliged to divide his fleet in order to watch the enemy in various quarters, and when he had only thirty-seven ships with him, Van Tromp faced him in the Downs with eighty sail of men-of-war and ten fire-ships. Being either unwilling to decline the combat, or unable by reason of the wind, which is stated to have been unfavorable to him, Blake engaged with the whole Dutch fleet, and fought furiously from ten in the morning till six at night, when he was happy to escape in the darkness. The Dutch had taken the "Garland" frigate, burned the "Bonaventure," and sunk three others; but one of their flag-ships had been blown up, and the ships of Van Tromp and De Ruyter greatly damaged. After the fight Van Tromp sailed through the Channel to convoy home the Dutch-French fleets; and the Dutch were so elated by their victory that they talked of nothing but blocking up the River Thames, and forcing the English commonwealth to an ignominious peace; and Van Tromp clapped a broom to his mast-head to proclaim that he meant to sweep the English navy from the seas.

A.D. 1653. But Van Tromp, who was drunk, and the Dutch, whether drunk or sober, were hugely mistaken as to the spirit and resources of the young republic. The Rump, with incredible diligence and conduct, repaired their shattered fleet, and fitted out another, to the amazement of Europe; and, by the 8th of February, Blake again took the sea, having with him Dean and Monk and sixty men-of-war. Sailing from Queensbury, he went to Portsmouth, where he was joined by twenty more men-of-war. Then he sailed over against Portland, "half seas over, to call Tromp to an account for passing the Channel without the Rump's leave;" and upon the 18th of February he descried the enemy, and brought him to action—at first with only thirteen of his ships, Blake and Dean being both on board the "Triumph," which received seven hundred shots in her hull, but was bravely relieved by Captain Lawson, the rest of the fleet being not able to come up for some time. But, when the rest of the English fleet came, a most furious fight succeeded, wherein the Dutch had six men-of-war taken or sunk, the English losing not one ship. When the action began Van Tromp had seventy-six men-of-war and about thirty merchantmen, most of which were armed. Night separated the combatants, but Blake renewed the fight on the morrow off Weymouth. Van Tromp, after the first shock, put his merchantmen before him, and fought retreating toward the port of Boulogne; but the English frigates took many of his merchantmen, and Captain Lawson boarded and carried one of the Dutch men-of-war. Again night stopped that deadly fire, but on the morrow—it was a Sabbath morn—Blake again brought Van Tromp to action, and fought him with advantage till four o'clock in the afternoon, "when, the wind proving cross to the English at N.N.E.," Tromp got to Calais sands. At the end of this three days' fight Blake had taken or destroyed eleven ships-of-war and thirty merchantmen, had killed two thousand men, and taken fifteen hundred, having himself lost only one ship, but suffered severely in killed and wounded. Upon the return of the humbled Van Tromp the common people in the Dutch provinces were all in an uproar and tumult; and the province of Holland, without the consent of the other provinces, privately employed Colonel Doleman and some others—gaining over Hugh Peters, the famous preacher—to try the inclinations of the Rump for a peace.[1]

But, while the commonwealth was thus triumphing on its proper element by means of the able and heroic Blake and his enthusiastic seamen, who now said, with no vain boast, that they had paid the Dutch for their cruelties at Amboyna, the parliament, from an accumulation of circumstances, was falling into disrepute and disrespect in the country. They had not, except to a very limited degree, filled up the vacancies in the House of Commons, feeling that any election, however managed, would leave them in a minority; and though, at the instance of Cromwell, they had, in November, 1651, decided that the present parliament should cease in November, 1654, they continued to act as if they contemplated no dissolution—as if they considered their power to be perpetual. It was only of the army, which had made them what they were, that they were apprehensive or jealous; and while Cromwell, whose control over the army was now absolute, urged them to give up their power, they urged Cromwell to reduce the army. If there were personal ambition and the intoxication of power on both sides, there were certainly on both sides—as well on that of Cromwell as on that of the Vanes, the Martens, and the other commonwealth-men—high, and noble, and patriotic motives. Each, in fact, wished for power for the establishing or working out a system which each deemed the best for the peace, the happiness, and the glory of the nation; and, in justice to Oliver Cromwell, it must be avowed that his scheme of social policy was in itself one of the purest which had as yet entered into the mind of any statesman, and one that adapted itself more readily to the character and habits of the community than the more finely-drawn theories of the republicans. This wonderful man had certainly a long and doubtful struggle, not merely with his former friends, but now-republican opponents, but also with his own heart and conscience; and he was quiet, or at least abstained from any very open act, until the parliament betrayed an intention of coalescing with the Presbyterians, who, in their hearts, hated both Cromwell and parliament alike. "It was about this time," says Whitelock himself, "that the Lord-general Cromwell, meeting with Mr. Whitelock, who then held the great seal, saluted him with more than ordinary courtesy, and desired him to walk aside that they might have some private discourse together." In that private discourse Cromwell said that they ought not to be fooled out of the mercies and successes which God had given the nation, nor be broken in pieces by their particular jarrings and animosities one against another; that they ought to unite their counsels, hands, and hearts, to make good what they had so dearly bought with so much hazard, blood, and treasure, and not hazard all again by their private jangling, and bring those mischiefs upon themselves which their enemies could never do. Whitelock says that he hinted to Cromwell that his gallant army, after full conquest of their enemies, might grow into factious and ambitious designs; and that Cromwell, after speaking of his poor endeavors to keep the army in all order and obedience, averred that the officers were given to particular factions, and to murmurings that they were not rewarded according to their deserts, that others who had adventured least had gained most, and that they had neither profit, nor preferment, nor place in the government, which others held who had undergone no hardship nor hazard for the commonwealth. "Then," continued Cromwell, "as for the members of parliament, the army begins to have a strange distaste against them; and I wish there were not too much cause for it. And really their pride, and ambition, and self-seeking; their engrossing all places of honor and profit to themselves and their friends; their daily breaking forth into new and violent parties and factions; their delays of business, and design to perpetuate themselves, and to continue the power in their own hands; their meddling in private matters between party and party, contrary to the institution of parliament; their injustice and partiality in these matters, and the scandalous lives of some of the chief of them, do give too much ground for people to open their mouths against them and to dislike them. Nor can they be kept within the bounds of justice, or law, or reason; they themselves being the supreme power of the nation, liable to no account to any, nor to be controlled or regulated by any other power, there being none superior or coordinate with them. And unless there be some authority and power, so full and so high as to restrain and keep things in better order, and check these exorbitances, it will be impossible to prevent our ruin." Whitelock admitted the danger and the extreme difficulty of the case, confessing that the greatest difficulty lay with the parliament, who were acknowledged the supreme power of the nation, and who had given both Cromwell and Whitelock the commissions they held; and acknowledging that too many of them were much to blame on account of the lives they led, he hoped that his excellency would not look upon them as generally depraved. Cromwell then, speaking hastily, said that there was nothing to hope, but a great deal to fear, from them; that they would destroy what the Lord had done graciously for them in the kingdom. "We all forget God, and God will forget us," cried Cromwell, whose deep religious feelings have been so generally and so unjustly set down in all cases as rank hypocrisy; "God will give us up to confusion, and these men will help it on if they be suffered to proceed in their ways. Some course must be thought of to curb and restrain them, or we shall all be ruined." Whitelock again represented that Cromwell and himself had acknowledged their supreme power, and taken their commissions and authority in the highest concernments from them, and that it would be hard to find out a way how they could restrain and curb them after this. Then Cromwell put this significant question—"What if a man should take upon him to be king?" Whitelock replied that he thought that remedy would be worse than the disease; and, on being asked why he thought so, he thus (as he says) stated his reasons, as follows:—"As to your person, the title of king would be of no advantage, because you have the full kingly power in you already concerning the militia, as you are general. As to the nomination of civil officers, those whom you think fittest are seldom refused: and, although you have no negative vote in the passing of laws, yet what you dislike will not easily be carried; and the taxes are already settled, and in your power to dispose the money raised. And as to foreign affairs, though the ceremonial application be made to the parliament, yet the good or bad success in it is from your excellency; and particular solicitations of foreign ministers are made to you only; so that I apprehend, indeed, less envy, and danger, and pomp, but not less power and real opportunities of doing good in your being general than would be if you had assumed the title of king." [And, indeed, if all this were true, Cromwell was almost as much a sovereign before destroying the Rump as he was after that great coup d'état.] But Cromwell, still clinging to the notion of kingship, told Whitelock that he had heard some lawyers observe that he who was actually king, whether by descent or merely by election, yet, being once king, all acts done by him as king were, by an act of parliament in Henry VII.'s time, as lawful and justifiable as if they had been done by any king that had the crown by inheritance from his forefathers; so that it was safer for those who acted under a king, be his title what it might, than for those who acted under any other power. "And, surely," continued Cromwell, "the power of a king is so great and high, and so universally understood and reverenced by the people of this nation, that the name of it might not only indemnify in a great measure those that act under it, but likewise be of great use and advantage in such times as these, to curb the insolences of those whom the present powers can not control." Whitelock rejoined, that, if their enemies should come to get the upper hand of them, that act of parliament of Henry VII. would be little regarded. "But what do you apprehend would be the danger of taking this title?" asked Cromwell. Whitelock replied, that the danger was simply this—that the main controversy between them and their adversaries was, whether the government should be established in monarchy or in a free state or commonwealth, most of their friends having engaged with them, and undergone all their hazards and difficulties, upon the hopes of having the government settled in a free state, they being persuaded that under the government of a commonwealth they should enjoy more civil and religious liberty than they should under a monarchy, the evils and abuses of which were so fresh in their memories and sufferings: but the question would then be whether Cromwell or Stuart should be king and monarch. Cromwell confessed that there was reason in these objections; but he asked Whitelock what other thing he could propound to obviate the present danger; and Whitelock, after a long discourse, in which he spoke of the busy and turbulent spirits of many men in the army, that wanted not counsel and encouragement—it might be, from some members of the very parliament—begged "a little to consider the condition of the King of Scots"—as he correctly designated Charles II. "That prince," continued the man of the long robe, "is reduced to so very low a condition, that both he and all about him can not but be very inclinable to hearken to any terms whereby their lost hopes may be revived of his being restored to the crown, and they to their fortunes and native country. By a private treaty with him you may secure yourself, and your friends, and their fortunes; you may make yourself and your posterity as great and permanent, to all human probability, as ever any subject was, and provide for your friends. You may put such limits to monarchical power as will secure our spiritual and civil liberties; and you may secure the cause in which we are all engaged by having the power of the militia continued in yourself, and whom you shall agree upon after you. I propound, therefore, for your excellency to send to the King of Scots, and to have a private treaty with him for this purpose." But the man of the sword could not but remember the private negotiations he had with Charles I.—could not but entertain the doubt that duplicity and insincerity were family vices of the Stuarts—could never expect that the son should forgive the death of the father. He broke off the conference, "seeming, by his countenance and carriage, to be displeased with what had been said; yet he never objected it against Whitelock in any public meeting afterward; only his carriage toward him from that time was altered, and his advising with him not so frequent and intimate as before."[1] Other conferences took place between Cromwell, St. John, Lenthall, the speaker, Desborough, Harrison, Fleetwood, and Whalley; and to all these men the potent lord-general openly declared that a "settlement with somewhat of monarchical power in it would be very effectual." Other conferences were held between the chief officers of the army and certain members of the parliament, with respect to the dissolution of the present House, and the provisions to be made in order that a "new representative" might be convened, consisting solely of members friendly to liberty. An unshackled election was out of the question;—the Presbyterians so returned would alone have more than doubled the number of the Independents or Republicans, who would have been voted to the Tower and the scaffold, or again obliged to call in Cromwell's pikes and muskets. Yet, notwithstanding this certainty, a committee of the House adopted the resolution of bringing into the new parliament a number of Presbyterians under the name of "Neutrals," and this, too, in spite of Cromwell and his officers, who had told them that none of the Presbyterians who had deserted their cause and interest should have any power in parliament—that they would as soon deliver up their cause to the royalists—"that it was one thing to love another in matters of religion, and another thing to set him in the saddle so as to command all his brethren." And here Cromwell decidedly spoke the sense of the whole body of the Independents (excepting such as were blind to facts in their eagerness to retain power), who well knew

On the 19th of April there was a great meeting, at Cromwell's lodgings in Whitehall, of parliament-men and officers of the army, who had been summoned on purpose by their general; and it was there debated, at length, what expedient might be found for carrying on the government and putting a period to the present parliament; for, as things then stood, the dissolution of the House of Commons was nothing less than the dissolution of the government. Most of the parliament-men represented that it would be a most dangerous thing to dissolve the present parliament; but St. John and several others with him, and all the officers, "who stuck close to their general," were for an instant dissolution, declaring that it was necessary the thing should be done one way or other, and the members of parliament not permitted to prolong their own power. This conference lasted till late at night, when Widderington and Whitelock—and, we may suppose, most of the members—"went home, weary and troubled." On the morrow morning (the 20th) there was another meeting, according to appointment, in Cromwell's lodgings, but few parliament-men attended, and not many officers. "A point was again stirred which had been debated the last night, whether forty persons, or about that number, of parliament-men and officers of the army, should be nominated by the parliament, and empowered for the managing the affairs of the commonwealth till a new parliament should meet, and so the present parliament to be forthwith dissolved." But, while they were debating this question, news was brought from the House, by Colonel Ingoldsby, that the Commons were hurrying through their own obnoxious bill, with all its clauses about Neuters, &c.; and, in fact, the majority of the House hoped, by indecent speed, to pass this important bill, in the form upon which they had privately agreed, before the meeting at Whitehall should be aware of their proceedings. But now, on Ingoldsby's warning, the members present at that meeting ran down to the House, and Cromwell, greatly excited, commanded some of the officers to fetch a party of soldiers to accompany him. He then marched away to the House, attended by Lambert, a few other officers, and a file of musketeers, whom he left at the doors and in the lobby of the House. Going, then, straight to his seat, he sat for some time in silence, listening to the discussion; but, when the speaker was about to put the motion, he beckoned Harrison to him, and said, "Now is the time—I must do it." Harrison, a religious enthusiast, a Fifth Monarchy-man, who had been weaned with difficulty from his republicanism, advised him to consider what he was doing. He sat down, paused for a minute, then rose, and, removing his hat from his head, began a speech to the question before the House. Soon growing warm, he told them, in violent language, that they were deniers of justice; oppressors; openly profane men, who intended their own aggrandizement; who were planning, at that very moment, to bring in the Presbyterians; who would lose no time in utterly destroying the cause which they had deserted. Sir Harry Vane or Sir Peter Wentworth, or both, rose to remonstrate, and told him that this was not parliamentary language. "I know it," cried Cromwell; who then rushed from his seat to the stage or floor in the midst of the House, where he walked up and down, with his hat on his head, reproaching the members personally, not naming them, but showing by his gestures who it was he meant. Pointing at Vane, he said, "One person might have prevented all this, but he is a juggler, and hath not so much as common honesty. The Lord hath done with him, however, and chosen honester and worthier instruments for carrying on his work." Vane, Wentworth, and Harry Marten raised their voices. "I'll put an end to your prating," shouted Cromwell; "you are no parliament; I'll put an end to your sitting. Get ye gone! Give way to honester men." And stamping with his foot heavily upon the floor, the door opened, and his musketeers rushed in and surrounded him. Then pointing to the speaker in his chair, he said to Harrison, "Fetch him down." Harrison went to the speaker, and bade him come down; but the speaker sat still, and said nothing. "Take him down," cried Cromwell; and then Harrison pulled at his robe, and the speaker came down. Algernon Sydney, that stanch republican, and then a young member, happened that day to be seated next to the speaker. "Put him out," cried Cromwell to Harrison, who was as active in ending the parliament as Pride had been in purging it. Harrison instantly ordered Sydney to go out. But Sydney said he would not go out; and sat still till the general said again, "Put him out;" and Harrison and Worsley, who commanded Cromwell's own regiment of foot, laid their hands upon his shoulders, as if they would force him. Then Sydney rose, and went toward the door; and Cromwell went up to the table where the mace lay, and, pointing to it, cried, "Take away that bauble." As the members withdrew, Alderman Allen said that, if he would send out the soldiers, all might yet be repaired; but Cromwell replied by accusing the alderman of embezzlement and dishonesty in his office as treasurer to the army. And, pointing to them as he spoke, he called Challonor a drunkard, Sir Peter Wentworth an adulterer, and his old friend Harry Marten a whoremaster. As Vane passed he said aloud to Cromwell, "This is not honest; yea, it is against morality and common honesty." "Sir Harry Vane! Sir Harry Vane! the Lord deliver me from Sir Harry Vane!" was the general's retort to the wisest and greatest of all the commonwealth-men. And thus the House was soon cleared: "for," says Whitelock, who was present, and who is said to have come in for a share of the abuse, "among all the parliament, of whom many wore swords, and would sometimes brag high, not one man offered to draw his sword against Cromwell, or to make the least resistance against him, but all of them tamely departed the House." When they were all gone the doors were locked, and Cromwell, with the keys in his pocket, walked back to his lodging at Whitehall, and told the council of officers, still assembled there, what he had done. "When I went to the House," said he, "I did not think to have done this; but, perceiving the spirit of God strong upon me, I would no longer consult flesh and blood." But he had still work to do which required a masterly command over flesh and blood; for there still remained the council of state, which had been chosen by, and in great part out of, the destroyed parliament. And on the afternoon of the same memorable day he proceeded to Derby House, accompanied by Harrison and Lambert, and told the members of the council, at his entrance, "Gentlemen, if you are met here as private persons, you shall not be disturbed; but if as a council of state, this is no place for you; and since you can not but know what was done at the House in the morning, so take notice that the parliament is dissolved." Bradshaw, who was in the chair, replied, "Sir, we have heard what you did at the House in the morning, and before many hours all England will hear it. But, sir, you are mistaken to think that the parliament is dissolved, for no power under heaven can dissolve them but themselves; therefore, take you notice of that." Sir Arthur Hazelrig, Mr. Love, and Mr. Scot, said something more to the same purpose; but they all rose and departed, nevertheless, "perceiving themselves to be under the same violence."[1]

On the morrow, the 21st of April, Cromwell and his party were busied in consultations about a new government and governors; on the 22d they ordered that all courts of justice should sit as formerly, and they put forth a declaration of the grounds and reasons for their dissolving the late parliament, "which declaration, being sent abroad into all the dominions of the commonwealth, was readily assented to by all the chief officers both by land and sea." In this paper Cromwell spoke of the dilatoriness, the wavering, the selfishness, the corruption, and the jealousies of the late members, who could never answer those ends which God, his people, and the whole nation expected from them. "All this," the declaration continued, "being sadly and seriously considered by the honest people of the nation, as well as by the army, it seemed a duty incumbent upon us, who had seen so much of the power and presence of God, to consider of some effectual means whereby to establish righteousness and peace in these nations. And, after much debate, it was judged necessary that the supreme government should be by the parliament devolved upon known persons, fearing God, and of approved integrity, for a time, as the most hopeful way to countenance all God's people, reform the law, and administer justice impartially: hoping thereby the people might forget monarchy, and understand their true interest in the election of successive parliaments; that so the government might be set upon a right basis, without hazard to this glorious cause, or necessitating to keep up arms for the defense of the same." After mentioning his unsuccessful conferences "with about twenty members of parliament," which convinced him that they intended "to perpetuate themselves," Cromwell continued: "For preventing the consummating whereof, and all the sad and evil consequences, which upon the grounds aforesaid must have ensued, and whereby at one blow the interest of all honest men and of this glorious cause had been endangered to be laid in the dust, and these nations embroiled in new troubles, at a time when our enemies abroad are watching all advantages against, and some of them actually engaged in war with us, we have been necessitated (though with much reluctance) to put an end to this parliament." Two other proclamations followed this; but it was not till nearly three months had elapsed that the people saw what sort of "known persons, fearing God and of approved integrity," Cromwell chose to hold under him the legislative power of the nation. One hundred and thirty-nine persons for the counties and towns of England, six for Wales, five for Scotland, and six for Ireland, were summoned by writ, running simply in his own name, to meet in the council-chamber at Whitehall, and take upon them the trust of providing for the future government. And on the 4th of July about one hundred and twenty of these individuals of his own selecting met at the place appointed. It was, on the whole, an assemblage of men of good family or of military distinction, "many of them being persons of fortune and knowledge;"[1] but, mixed with these, were some persons of inferior rank, who were recommended by their religious enthusiasm, their dislike of the Presbyterians, and their influence over the common people and sectarians. Of these the most noted was one Barbone, a dealer in leather, whose name, converted into Barebone, was afterward applied to the whole parliament, though the more common appellation for that assemblage was "The Little Parliament."[2] These members being seated round the council-table, Cromwell and the officers of the army standing about the middle of the table, the lord-general made a very long and very devout speech, showing the cause of their summons, and that they had "a clear call to take upon them the supreme authority of the commonwealth," and quoting scripture most copiously to admonish and encourage them to do their duties. He related the wonders of God's mercy shown to himself in the battles he had fought from the beginning of the civil war, "down to the marvelous salvation wrought at Worcester;" he insisted (and, as we are convinced, believed) that he and his friends had been eminently and visibly protected by the special providences of the Almighty, saying, that even their enemies had many times confessed that God himself was engaged against them. He then spoke of the reasons which had forced him and his officers to dissolve the Long Parliament, "which was as necessary to be done as the preservation of this cause;" and he then told his little parliament that truly God had called them to the work by as wonderful providences as ever passed upon the sons of men; that he meant to be a servant to them who were called to the exercise of the supreme authority, and he reminded them of what had been much upon his spirits, that "Judah ruleth with God, and is faithful among the saints." "This speech," says a friendly biographer, "was pronounced in so excellent a manner, as sufficiently manifested (as the lord-general himself was thoroughly persuaded) that the spirit of God acted in and by him."[1] When he had ended he produced an instrument in writing, whereby he did, with the advice of his officers, devolve and intrust the supreme authority and government of the commonwealth into the hands of the persons then met, but stipulating that they should not sit longer than the 3d of November, 1654, and that three months before the dissolution they were to make choice of other persons to succeed them, who were not to sit longer than a year, and then to dissolve themselves after providing in like manner for a succession and government. And, delivering this instrument into their hands. his excellency commended them to the grace of God, and retired with his officers. The Little Parliament adjourned until the morning, when it was appointed that they should meet at Westminster, where the late parliament had sat, there to keep that day in fasting and prayer. About eight o'clock the next morning they met in the old Parliament House, and prayed and preached—"not finding any necessity to call for the help of a minister"—till about six o'clock in the evening, when they proceeded to business, by appointing Francis Rouse, esq., to be their speaker, and by nominating a committee to go to the lord-general and desire him to afford his presence and assistance as a member of the House. On the 6th of July, the second day of their sitting, the question was put, "that the House go on in seeking the Lord this day;" but it was negatived, and Monday, the 11th, was fixed for that holy exercise. They then debated about the style and titles they should assume, and resolved to call themselves "The Parliament of the Commonwealth of England." On the 9th they reappointed the late council of state, adding to it some new members, among whom was Sir Antony Ashley Cooper, and of which Cromwell was of course the head. If the Long Parliament had been too slow, this Little Parliament was soon found to be too quick. They voted the abolition of the High Court of Chancery, "a measure provoked by its insufferable delay, its ingrossing of almost all suits, and the uncertainty of its decisions;"[2] they nominated a set of commissioners to preside in courts of justice, among whom they with difficulty admitted two of the legal profession; they enacted, for the relief of Dissenters, that marriages should be solemnized before justices of the peace; and they aimed a death-blow at tithes, without taking much care to provide an equivalent. They entertained also other projects which alarmed their nominator, who could never command a steady majority either in this or in any other of his parliaments; and on the 12th of December, little more than five months after their first meeting, they were prevailed upon by the manœuvers of Cromwell, to dissolve themselves, and surrender their trust into his hands.

Then the lord-general held a council of officers, and, certain other persons being joined with them to advise, it was resolved to have a commonwealth in a single person—"which person should be the Lord-general Cromwell, under the title and dignity of Lord Protector of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the dominions and territories thereunto belonging, to be advised and assisted by a council of godly, able, and discreet persons, to be not more than twenty-one." And, accordingly, as lord protector, Oliver Cromwell, on the 16th of December, proceeded from Whitehall to the Chancery Court, attended by the lords commissioners of the great seal of England, the barons of the Exchequer, and the judges all in their robes, the council of state, and the lord mayor, aldermen, and recorder of the city of London, in their scarlet gowns, and many of the chief officers of the army. A chair of state was set in the midst of the Court of Chancery, and there, Cromwell, in a plain suit of black velvet, stood on the left hand of the chair uncovered, till a large writing in parchment was read, containing the power with which he was to be invested, and the rules for his governing the three nations. This parchment declared that the supreme legislative authority should be and reside in the lord protector and the people assembled in parliament; that all writs, processes, commissions, patents, &c., which then ran in the name and style of the keepers of the liberty of England, should run in the name and style of the lord protector, from whom, for the future, should be derived all magistracy and honors, and all pardon, except in cases of murder and treason; that he should govern in all things by the advice of the council, and according to the present instrument and laws; that the militia and all forces both by sea and land should, during the sitting of parliament, be in his and their hands, but, in the intervals of parliament, in his and the council's only; that he and the council should have the power of making war and peace with foreign princes; that the laws should not be altered, suspended, abrogated, or repealed, nor any new law made, nor any tax, charge, or imposition laid upon the people, except by common consent in parliament; that a parliament should be called within six months, and afterward every third year, and if need oftener, which the protector should not dissolve without its own consent till after five months; that the parliament should consist of four hundred English members, thirty Scotch members, and thirty Irish, to be chosen by equal distribution in counties and boroughs; that none that had borne arms against the parliament, no Irish rebels, or papists, should be capable of being elected; that none should be elected under the age of twenty-one years, or that were not persons of known integrity, fearing God, and of good conversation; that all persons seized or possessed, of any estate, real or personal, to the value of £200, should have votes in county elections; that sixty members should be deemed a quorum; that bills offered to the protector, if not assented to by him within twenty days, should pass into, and become law, notwithstanding; that Philip Lord Viscount Lisle, Charles Fleetwood, esq., John Lambert, esq., Sir Gilbert Pickering, baronet, Sir Charles Wolsey, baronet, Sir Antony Ashley Cooper, baronet, Edward Montague, John Desborough, Walter Strickland, Henry Lawrence, William Sydenham, Philip Jones, Richard Major, Francis Rouse, Philip Skipton, esquires, or any seven of them, should be a council of government, with power in the lord protector and the majority of the council to add to their number; that a regular yearly revenue should be settled for the maintenance of ten thousand horse and fifteen thousand foot, and that the navy should not be altered or lessened but by advice of the council; that the office of lord protector should be elective, and not hereditary—care being taken that none of the children of the late king, nor any of his line or family, should ever be elected; that Oliver Cromwell, captain-general of the forces of England, Scotland, and Ireland, should be declared to be lord protector of the commonwealth for life; that all the great officers, as chancellor, keeper or commissioner of the great seal, treasurer, admiral, chief governors of Ireland and Scotland, and the chief justices of both the benches, should be chosen by the approbation of parliament, and in the intervals of parliament, by the majority of the council, whose choice was to be afterward approved by the parliament; that the Christian religion, as contained in the Scriptures, should be held forth and recommended as the public profession of these nations; that as soon as might be, a provision less subject than tithes to scruple, and contention, and uncertainty, should be made for the encouragement and maintenance of able and painful teachers, and that until such provision were made, the present maintenance should not be taken away or impeached; that none should be compelled to consent to the public profession of faith by fines or penalties or otherwise, but that endeavors should be used to win them by persuasion and example, and that such as professed faith in God by Jesus Christ, though differing in judgment from the doctrine, worship, or discipline publicly held forth, should not be restrained from, but protected in the exercise of their religion, so that they did not quarrel with and disturb others in the exercise of theirs; provided that (for Cromwell was either unwilling or unable to extend this wide toleration to the church of Rome and the Anglican episcopal church) this liberty were not extended to popery or prelacy, or to such as under the profession of Christ held forth and practiced licentiousness. Such were the principal clauses of the instrument of government which the lord protector swore to, and to which he put his signature, promising, in the presence of God, not to violate or infringe the matters and things contained therein. And hereupon he sat down, covered, in the chair of state, and the lords commissioners delivered to him the great seal of England, and the lord mayor his sword and cap of maintenance, all which the lord protector returned immediately to them again. The court then rose, and Cromwell went back in state to the Banqueting-House at Whitehall, the lord mayor carrying the sword before him all the way, the soldiers shouting, and the great guns firing. On the following day (the 17th of December) the lord protector was proclaimed by sound of trumpet in the Palace-yard at Westminster, at the Royal Exchange, and other places in the city; and soon after, the lord mayor and corporation invited him to a great feast at Grocers' Hall.[1]

Thus was the government of England converted into a republic with a chief magistrate at its head. In the interval which had elapsed since the forcible expulsion of the Long Parliament, the maritime war had been conducted with vigor and success—the English fleet having, according to a pun of those days, out-trumped Van Tromp. This Neptune of the Dutch had again presented himself in the Downs on the 25th of May, and that, too, with a fleet of 108 ships. On the 2d of June Monk and Dean engaged him; on the 3d the gallant Blake came up and decided the action, in which the Dutch lost seventeen of their ships, which were sunk or taken, and, beside the slain, more than 1300 men that were made prisoners. The English lost none of their ships, but General Dean unfortunately fell by a great shot on the first day of the action. After the battle the English went and lay off the ports of Holland, taking prizes at their pleasure. But by the 29th of July Van Tromp again got to sea with 120 sail, and put all in a fighting posture to engage the English the next day. As the night was foul, and flats and shoals close under his lee, Monk, who now commanded in chief, hoisted sail aud stood out to sea. "This sight made the Dutch suppose a flight, insomuch that one of their captains desired Van Tromp to pursue: for, said he, these Schellums dare not stand one broadside from your excellency; you may see them plainly running home, and therefore, my lord, miss not the opportunity. This was not the first time that Tromp had seen the English at sea, and he therefore returned the captain this short answer: Sir, look to your charge; for, were the enemy but twenty sail, they would never refuse to fight us. So it fell out; for, the weather proving fair and calm, the English contracted their fleet together, and, in a body, tacked about to meet the enemy."[1] On Sunday morning, the 31st of July—a cloudy, gloomy morning—the two fleets engaged with an excess of fury, the Dutch having the weather-gage, and beginning the fight at long shots. But it was not long before they fought board and board, and so they continued fighting, the Dutch using fire-ships, which stuck like plasters to the sides of some of the English, from five in the morning till ten, "about which time, Van Tromp, fighting in the midst of the English fleet, had a passport sent him for another world, being shot with a musket-bullet into the left breast near the heart. . . . And no sooner was his life spent, but the hearts of his men were broken, a general consternation suddenly possessing the whole fleet, so that the seamen had more mind to carry home the news of their renowned admiral's death than to take vengeance on the English for killing him."[1] This tremendous battle, in which the Dutch lost thirty ships, and the English only two, put an end to the war, and allowed the protector time to attend to business at home.

DEFEAT OF THE DUTCH FLEET BY BLAKE, DEAN, AND MONK. From a Painting by Cleverly.

A.D. 1654. Whenever Cromwell, who would frequently bemoan the animosities among the people, caused by diversity in religion, was pressed by preachers and zealots to put an end to them by enforcing a settlement and conformity to one creed, he represented that his power in the nation was merely that of a constable, who was to keep peace and quietness among all parties, and misuse none; but he thought himself obliged to imprison for a month some expounders of the gospel who represented him as a tyrant, and a worse protector than Richard III. In the courts of law he made some new appointments, among which was that of the great Sir Matthew Hale, who was put on the Bench of the Common Pleas. Thurloe, the friend of Milton, was made secretary of state; and a higher tone was noticeable in the state-papers of the country than had ever been known before, not excepting even the productions of Elizabeth's time. The French government made haste to congratulate the lord protector, and engaged to dismiss the family of the late King Charles from France; Spain made a tender of friendship and alliance; and Portugal, which had, in effect, been at war with the commonwealth ever since the affair of Prince Rupert, sent over an ambassador extraordinary to negotiate for a peace with Cromwell. Don Pantaleon Sa, brother to the Portuguese envoy, was insulted one day in London by an Englishman of the name of Gerrard, commonly called "Generous Gerrard," an enthusiastic royalist; and on the next day, toward evening, the vindictive Portuguese sallied out with "a fanatic crew," armed with swords, pistols, and daggers, in search of Gerrard, whom they found at the New Exchange. An affray ensued; an Englishman named Greenway was shot, and Colonel Mayo received seven dangerous wounds; but Gerrard, "with his good rapier and with a magnanimous spirit, drove the Portugals all before him." Don Pantaleon fled for refuge to the house of his brother, who pleaded the ambassadorial right of considering his house as a sacred asylum in all cases; but, soon seeing that nothing less would satisfy, he delivered up his brother, his friend, a knight of Malta, and some others. The ambassador then addressed himself to Cromwell, chiefly for his brother: but Cromwell told him that his business concerned the public, and that his excellency must apply to the parliament and council of state. In fact, Cromwell had resolved that Don Pantaleon should suffer the extremity of the law, and, without heeding prayers, promises, or threats, he brought him publicly to trial before a jury (for more fairness, and as was usual in such cases, it consisted of half Englishmen and half foreigners), who returned a verdict of guilty, which was followed by the sentence that he should be hanged. On the 10th of July, his sentence being commuted to beheading, he was conveyed from Newgate to Tower Hill in a coach-and-six, with divers of his brother the ambassador's retinue with him, all in mourning, and there his head was chopped off at two blows.[1] Yet, in spite of this catastrophe, the ambassador was fain to sign the treaty of peace with the lord protector. It appears, indeed, that he signed on the very day of the execution, and then made haste to get away from a country where the laws and the ruler would make no distinction of persons, nor tolerate assassination in any. But also on the same day, the "generous" Gerrard, who was himself capable of a worse species of assassination than that perpetrated by the Portuguese, was beheaded on the same spot; for he had engaged with Charles II.[2] to surprise and murder Cromwell, and then proclaim Charles. He had fully concerted this plan with a set of men as desperate and lawless as himself, and his plot was only discovered by the protector a few hours before the time fixed for its execution. Only one of his accomplices suffered death: this was a Mr. Vowel, who was hanged at the Mews' gate.

At the same time the authority, if not the life of Cromwell was threatened by some of the discontented republican officers of the army; and he justified himself by the necessity of the case in imprisoning a few of the most distinguished of those men, who had prayed with him and fought with him from the beginning, but never with any intention of making him a sovereign. Ireland remained tolerably tranquil under his lieutenants, and subsequently under the rule of his second son, Henry Cromwell, who, according to the report of one who is no partial narrator, "ruled with so much discretion, that in a small time he brought that disordered nation into the most hopeful condition of a flourishing state."[1] But in Scotland the Highlanders for the most part defied the authority of the commonwealth, maintaining a loose, predatory warfare; and the lords Glencairn, Athol, Lorn, and Balcarras, with other royalists, kept the standard of Charles II. flying, and, upon being joined by General Middleton, who came over from the continent, they assumed a very menacing attitude. But jealousies and fierce dissensions broke out among them; some of the officers turned their arms against one another, and when General Monk, reappointed by Cromwell to the chief command in Scotland, returned to that country after his victories over the Dutch, he quelled the insurrection with infinite ease, and made Middleton run back to his exiled master. It appears that, as early as this at least, Charles was tampering with Monk; but that third-rate, selfish man could see no chance of mastering Cromwell, and his interest, and his conviction that any attempt at a royalist revolution must fail, kept him for the present faithful to the protector and commonwealth.

On the 3d of September—"the Lord's Day, yet the day of the parliament's meeting"[2]—the newly-elected members met first in the afternoon at sermon in Westminster Abbey; and after the sermon they attended the protector in the Painted Chamber. There Cromwell addressed them as to the cause of their being summoned; and then they went to their House and adjourned till the next morning. On that morning the protector rode in state[3] from Whitehall to the Abbey, where another sermon was preached, and whence the members followed him back to the Painted Chamber. He took his seat in a chair of state set upon steps—as like a throne as it well might be; the members, all uncovered, sat upon benches round about him; and, all being silent, "his highness" took off his hat, and made what Whitelock calls "a large and subtil speech." He spoke to them of—what he assuredly might have felt as a citizen, as an English gentleman—the great danger resulting from the anarchic principles of the Levelers, and the fantastic opinions of the Fifth-monarchy men, who, if left to themselves, would destroy liberty, property, law, and rational religion, in order to introduce their wild systems and theories of government under the mask of the most sacred of all liberties—the liberty of conscience.[1] "They can tell the magistrate," continued the protector, "that he hath nothing to do with men in these matters—for these are matters of conscience and opinion; they are matters of religion—what hath the magistrate to do with them? He is to look to the outward man, but not to meddle with the inward. And truly it so happens, that though these things do break out visibly to all, yet the principle wherewith they are carried on so forbids the magistrate to meddle with them, as it hath hitherto kept the offenders from punishment. . . . . The aforementioned abominations did thus swell to this height among us. The ax was laid to the root of the ministry. It was anti-Christian—it was Babylonish: it suffered under such a judgment, that the truth of it is, as the extremity was great on that, I wish it prove not so on this, hand. The extremity was, that no man having a good testimony, having received gifts from Christ, might preach, if not ordained. So, now, many on the other hand affirm that he who is ordained hath a nullity, or anti-Christianism, stamped upon his calling: so that he ought not to preach, or not be heard. I wish it may not too justly be said that there was severity and sharpness: yea, too much of an imposing spirit in matters of conscience; a spirit unchristian enough in any times, most unfit for these; denying liberty to those who have earned it with their blood; who have gained civil liberty, and religious also, for those who would thus impose upon them."[2] He went on to tell them that there had been too much subverting and undoing; that "overturn, overturn, overturn," was a Scripture phrase very much abused, and applied by men of discontented spirits to justify all kinds of unpeaceable practices; that the common enemy in the mean time was not sleeping; that swarms of Jesuits were coming over to meddle in the affairs of England, to hinder the good work in Ireland, to obstruct it in Scotland. After speaking of the successful termination of the war with the Portuguese, and the war with the Dutch, he asserted that it was his government that had applied the remedy, and that he and that government were calculated for the interest of the people, for their interest alone, and for their good, without respect had to any other interest. "I may," continued the protector, "with all humbleness toward God, and modestly before you, say something in the behalf of this government. It hath endeavored to reform the laws, and for that end hath joined persons of integrity and ability to consider how the laws may be made plain, short, and easy. . . . . It hath taken care to put into the seats of justice men of the most known integrity and ability. The Chancery hath been reformed, and, I hope, to the just satisfaction of all good men. It hath put a stop to that heady way, for every man that will to make himself a preacher, having endeavored to settle a way for approbation of men of piety and fitness for the work, and the business committed to persons both of the Presbyterian and Independent judgment. . . . . One thing more this government hath done. It hath been instrumental to call a free parliament. Blessed be God, we have this day a free parliament! And that it may continue so, I hope is in the heart and spirit of every good man in England. For mine own part, as I desired it above my life, so to keep it free I shall value it above my life."[1] When Cromwell had done speaking, the members went to their House; elected the old speaker, Lenthall; reappointed several of the officers of the Long Parliament; and appointed the 13th of September as a day of humiliation, to be kept by the parliament, city, and parts adjacent. But, on the morrow (the 5th), their very first proceeding was to call in question the recent "instrument of government," or charter, by appointing a committee of privileges, and by moving that the House should resolve itself into a committee to deliberate whether the legislative power should be in a single person and a parliament, or, in other words, whether they should or should not acknowledge the late instrument which had made Cromwell protector and them a parliament.

[2] Gerrard had recently returned from Paris with a proclamation running in the name of Charles II., offering a reward to any "who should, by pistol, sword, poison, or other means, do an act acceptable to God and good men, in destroying the life of a certain base mechanic fellow, by name Oliver Cromwell, who had usurped the supreme power." Clarendon, who is suspected to have penned this atrocious paper, denies that there was any plot of the kind; but there are few things more clearly proved than Gerrard's guilt, or more obvious than the fact that not one, but many, of the royalists thought it would be no sin to shoot, stab, poison, or otherwise dispose of the usurper.

[2] Whitelock. The 3d of September, though a Sunday, had been chosen, because it was the anniversary of the great victories of Dunbar and Worcester, and because Cromwell considered it his lucky day.

[3] "About nine in the morning his highness (not much affecting pomp and bravery) rode in his coach to church; with him there sat his son Henry and the Lord Lambert: his gentlemen, very richly clad, marched first, bareheaded; next before the coach went the pages, and on one side of the coach walked on foot Mr. Strickland, one of the council, and captain of the guard, together with the master of the ceremonies; on the other side, in like manner, was Captain Howard, captain of the Lifeguard. After these followed, in coaches, the lords commissioners of the Great Seal, of the Treasury, and the Council; at last, the ordinary guard of the protector put an end to the train. In this manner he went to the Abbey. As he entered the church, there was borne before him four maces, the purse and a sword, which the Lord Lambert carried bareheaded."—Perfect Politician.

If Cromwell had taken any great pains in influencing the election of these men, his pains had been thrown away in good part—for not only had many republicans been returned, but also many Presbyterians; and the united opposition of these two parties was too strong for the protectorians, or the court party, as Cromwell's adherents were already called. Bradshaw was one of the republican members: and he and Scott headed that section. and spoke with great boldness in support of their own theory of government, possibly not reflecting sufficiently upon the undeniable fact, that there were not materials in England to constitute or sustain a republic. Ludlow, who was as enthusiastic as Bradshaw, says, that these speeches "were very instrumental in opening the eyes of many young members, who had never before heard the public interest so clearly stated and asserted; so that the commonwealth party increased every day, and that of the sword lost ground proportionably." These speeches, or the reports of them, are among the many things of this period that have perished; but we learn, from a cotemporary, that a noble gentleman, whom he names not, made one "excellent speech, wherein he showed the snares that then were laid to entrap the people's privileges: for his own part, he declared that God had made him instrumental in cutting down tyranny in one person. and now he could not endure to see the nation's liberties ready to be shackled by another, whose right to the government could be measured out no other ways than by the length of his sword—'twas this emboldened him to command his commanders. To the same effect many more speeches were made, in direct opposition to a single person."[1] When they had jarred for eight days together upon this string, Cromwell summoned all the members before him in the Painted Chamber, and there gave them to understand that the government by a single person and a parliament was a fundamental principle, fully established, and not subject to their discussion; that the "instrument of government" expressly provided that no parliamentary bills should contain any thing in them contrary to the clauses of the said instrument; that the same instrument of government that made them a parliament made him a protector; and as they were intrusted with some things, so was he with others; and that these fundamentals could not be altered or called in question. They were—1. That the government should be in one person and a parliament. 2. That parliament should not be made perpetual. 3. That the militia was not to be trusted to any one hand or power, but to be so disposed that the parliament should have a check upon the protector, and the protector upon the parliament. 4. That, in matters of religion, there should be a due liberty of conscience, with bounds and liberties set, so as to prevent persecution. As for all other points, he assured them that they were examinable and alterable as the occasion and the state of affairs might require. "I told you," continued Cromwell, still leaning upon the clear clauses in the instrument of government, "I told you you were a free parliament; and so you are, while you own the government and authority that called you hither: for, certainly, that word implied a reciprocation, or implied nothing at all. .... I called not myself to this place. I say, again, I called not myself to this place; of that, God is witness..... If my calling be from God, and my testimony from the people, God and the people shall take it from me, else I will not part with it." In the end, he told them that he was necessitated to appoint a test or recognition of his government, which must be signed by them all before they went any more into the House. The test or recognition was simply in these words:—"I do hereby promise and engage to be true and faithful to the lord protector and the commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland; and shall not (according to the tenor of the indenture whereby I am returned to serve in parliament) propose or give my consent to alter the government as it is settled in one person and a parliament." This parchment was placed on a table near the door of the House, and about one hundred and thirty members subscribed it immediately, and went back to their seats, when they adjourned for one day, to give time for the rest to sign it. In the course of the day Major-general Harrison, who had returned to his republicanism, regarded the rule of one man as contrary to the law of Christ, and who had played so conspicuous a part in driving out the Long Parliament, but who had himself been driven out of the Little Parliament, was secured by a party of horse at the lord protector's order. On the 14th of September many more of the members subscribed the recognition; the House, however, voting and declaring that this recognition did not comprehend, nor should be construed to comprehend, the whole instrument of government, consisting of forty-two articles, but only the clauses which concerned the government of the commonwealth by a single person and successive parliaments. On the 18th they voted that all persons returned, or that should be returned hereafter to serve in this present parliament, should, before they were admitted to sit in the House, subscribe the test or recognition; and that the subscription should be taken in the presence of any two members who had themselves subscribed it. On the 19th they began to sit in grand committee to debate, de die in diem, the instrument of government, till they should go through all the forty-two articles, and confirm or reject them. And upon the same day they voted that the supreme legislative authority should reside in a lord protector and the people assembled in parliament, and that the present lord protector should continue during life. By the 6th of October three hundred of the four hundred members had signed the recognition. On the 16th of October they took up the critical question whether the office of the single person or protector should be elective or hereditary, and, after a high debate, which lasted several days, it was carried by a very large majority that the office should be elective. The veto allowed to the lord protector by the instrument of government was less than the shadow of that royal prerogative as allowed to modern constitutional kings; but, thin and airy as it was, the medley majority of republicans and Presbyterians made their attack upon it.[1] On the 11th of December they voted that, in bills touching liberty of conscience, the protector should have a negative, but not in bills for suppressing heresies; and that a bill should be drawn up wherein should be enumerated all the damnable heresies existing. Here the hoof of Presbyterian intolerance is again visible, and the sight of it forces us to reflect on what a blessed kind of government, and what a tenderness to religious liberty, the nation would have found if a parliament with such a majority had prevailed over Cromwell.[2]

A.D. 1656. Nearly five months—the time prescribed by the instrument of government—had now elapsed since this parliament began its sitting, "in all which time they did much in doing nothing." They had not presented a single bill to the protector; they had not honored him with the slightest communication; they had not voted him a sixpence for meeting the expenses of the government. On the 22d of January, the earliest day that the letter of the instrument would allow—and here

[1] While these debates were in progress, Cromwell's mother died, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, where, some time before, he had interred his son-in-law, Ireton, who died in Ireland—according to some, to the no great grief of Cromwell, who had been deterred and hampered in his schemes by Ireton's determined republicanism.

[2] On the very next day the parliament voted two books, printed under the name of John Biddle, to contain many impious and blasphemous opinions against the Deity of the Holy Ghost, and that the books should be burned by the hand of the hangman; and a committee named to examine and find out the authors, printers, and publishers — Whitelock.

Cromwell thought fit to make parliamentary months lunar months of twenty-eight days each—he summoned them before him to tell them that it was not for the profit of these nations that they should continue any longer; and that, therefore, he did dissolve this parliament. In his long speech he regretted that they should have lost so good an opportunity of establishing a rational government, equally removed from the extremes of monarchy on the one hand, and of democracy on the other; that they must remember how carefully he had declined to intrench upon their privileges, offering them no manner of interruption or hinderance, no injury, no indignity, no vexing with messages or questionings. "As I may not take notice," he continued, "of what you have been doing, so I think I have a very great liberty to tell you that I do not know what you have been doing; that I do not know whether you have been alive or dead! I have not once heard from you in all this time. I have not! And that you all know." He then alluded to his own melancholy thoughts, and proceeded to tell them what he had been doing, and what the enemies of the country had been doing; that, while they had been disputing about abstract principles of government, the enemies of the peace of these nations abroad and at home, the discontented humors throughout the nation, had been nourishing themselves under their shadow; that the cavalier party had been designing and preparing to put the nation into blood again; and "that another sort than those before-mentioned" had been, and yet were, endeavoring to put all into blood and into confusion—a confusion more desperate and dangerous than England ever yet saw; in fine, that the royalist and leveling factions alike had been threatening to subvert all liberty whatsoever, and all right religion.

And, in fact, as many members of the now dissolved parliament must have known, these dangers were not yet passed. A few days after the dissolution Cromwell discovered the particulars of a most extensive plot, wherein many of the king's party and some of the leveling party were engaged and acting in strange concert, each hoping, in the end, to dupe the other. "The conspiracy," says Whitelock, "was generally laid to bring in the king; and the design so far took effect that, in several counties, small, armed parties began to gather into a body. In Shropshire, Sir Thomas Harris, with a party, endeavored to surprise Shrewsbury Castle, but was prevented and taken prisoner. Others were prevented at Chirke Castle, endeavoring to surprise it; and the like was in other places. This design, the protector had a jealousy, was countenanced by the late parliament, and he gave out that to be a cause of the dissolving of them." At this moment, indeed, Major Wildman was seized by a party of horse, and carried from Exton, near Marlborough, to Chepstow Castle. At the time of his arrest he was found in his chamber, leaning upon his elbow, and dictating to his man—"The Declaration of the Free and Well-affected People of England now in Arms against the Tyrant Oliver Cromwell, Esquire." "Many," says Whitelock, "who viewed this declaration knew that there was too much truth in it; and, had not the design been nipped in the bud, and timely discovered and prevented, it might have caused some disturbance to the protector and to the peace of the new government; but, by the commitment of the chief conspirators, this plot was crushed, and the peace not interrupted. Divers wondered most that Wildman, and others of his party who had served the parliament, should now join in this design with those of the king's party; but they alledged the strengthening of themselves, and their power afterward, to suppress the cavaliers, or any other who should oppose their ends." On Sunday, the 11th of March, two hundred new conspirators burst into Salisbury at midnight, seized many horses, and took away the commissions of the judges who were then on their circuit in that place. From Salisbury the insurgents marched westward, but they were soon overtaken by one of Cromwell's regiments at South Molton, in Devonshire, and there, after a sharp conflict, routed and cut to pieces. For this affair captains Penruddock, Grove, and Lucas were executed; and the prisons in those parts were filled with royalists. The Earl of Rochester came over from Charles II., made a feeble attempt in Yorkshire, and then fled for his life. Overton was equally unsuccessful in Scotland, Colonel Birch in Herefordshire; and others, whether royalists or republicans, failed in other places. But these insurrections and plots, which at one time extended from the Scottish Highlands to the hills of Cornwall, made the protector adopt the system of military government. He divided England and Wales into eleven districts, over each of which he placed a major-general, who was authorized to exact payments of fines and forfeitures imposed on the royalists and other insurgents, to suppress tumults, and to secure obedience to the existing government. The first major-generals appointed were Fleetwood, Desborough, Skippon, Whalley, Lambert, Kelsey, Goff, Berry, Butler, Wortley, and Barkstead; and these officers, acting for the most part with the militia of the counties, and not with the soldiers of the old army, effectually put down insurrection, and established every where the indisputable authority of the protector.

And Cromwell's success abroad, and the high estimation in which he was held by foreign powers, still continued on the increase. Spain and France, at war with each other, both courted his friendship, and neither of them spared any baseness or prostration to secure his alliance. In the plenitude of his power he demanded from Spain that no Englishman should ever be subject to the Inquisition, and that the West Indies and the South American continent should be thrown open to his flag, with a free trade to all English subjects. The Spanish ambassador told him that this was like asking for the King of Spain's two eyes.[1] The protector, by the advice of one Gage, a minister who had been long in the West Indies, sent forth a gallant fleet under the command of Vice-admiral Penn, with a land army under General Venables; and this expedition, which had alarmed nearly all the courts of Europe, its object being kept a profound secret, took and secured the very important island of Jamaica, after making a blundering and unsuccessful, and not very honorable, attempt on Hispaniola. At the same time, a second fleet, under Blake, put down or checked for the time the Barbary pirates in the Mediterranean, and exacted indemnities from the Grand Duke of Tuscany, who, some years before, had permitted Prince Rupert to sell English prizes at Leghorn. Cromwell, who was accustomed to say that a ship of the line was the best ambassador—that he could make the thunder of his cannon in the Mediterranean heard by the pope in Rome—next interfered in favor of the persecuted Waldenses, a Protestant people dwelling in the upper valleys of Piedmont, "amidst the wildest and most secluded of the Alpine fastnesses which lie between the Clusone and the Pelice, two mountain-torrents that fall into the river Po."[1] In this negotiation, as in many others, Cromwell was assisted by the mighty pen of Milton. He could scarcely make his sea-cannon even heard by the Duke of Savoy, the sovereign of Piedmont and the persecutor of the Waldenses, but he was now engaged in a treaty with the French, and he refused to sign it until Cardinal Mazarin, who was said to fear Cromwell more than he did the devil, had read a lesson of toleration to the court of Savoy, and had obtained from it a solemn engagement to allow the Protestant mountaineers liberty of conscience and the restoration of all their ancient rights. Then Cromwell finished his treaty with his brother the King of France; and a declaration of war, in confederacy with the French monarch, was issued against the King of Spain, who, after the unannounced attack on his territories in the West Indies, had laid an embargo upon English ships. In this naval war with Spain Blake was again the hero; and he and his captains presently began to fill the ports of England with rich prizes.

Encouraged by these successes, Cromwell ventured to call a third parliament, which he opened on the 17th of September, 1656, after rejecting nearly a hundred of the members elected, or one fourth of the whole. In his speech he again asserted the undeniable fact, that Charles Stuart was soliciting aid in every direction, and that his partisans in England—the cavaliers and papists—were joined with Levelers and Fifth-monarchy men. In this "purified" assembly money was voted liberally, and other bills were passed according to the lord protector's desire. A conspiracy against his life, in which one Syndercombe, a republican officer, who had been quartermaster to Monk, undertook to assassinate the protector,[2] and the discovery of a correspondence between some of the English republicans and the court at Madrid, wherein the Spaniards were invited to land an army in England, hurried on the debates and events which we have now briefly to relate.

A.D. 1657. It had long been felt that any parliament of one chamber or house was a mere nullity, and that, as affairs now stood, there was nothing but the single life of Cromwell between comparative tranquillity and prosperity, and civil war and anarchy; and many men, not the protector's dupes or tools, and who were neither selfish nor short-sighted, had seriously deliberated upon the restoration of the House of Lords and of hereditary monarchy. One member, bolder than the rest, ventured to recommend something which would tend very much to the preservation of his highness and the nation, and to the quieting of all the designs of their enemies; and this was, that his highness would be pleased to take upon him the government according to the ancient constitution. And, after a short but passionate dispute, it was concluded that this suggestion should be seriously debated.[1] On the 23d of February Sir Christopher Pack, who had recently been lord mayor of London, suggested, without periphrases, that, as the best way of settling the nation, the lord protector should be desired to assume the title of king! He had scarcely said the words when the republican and military members forced him from his seat, near the speaker, down to the bar of the House, with a paper which he held in his hand. But Pack's friends rose to assist him, and, in spite of much violence and tumult, his paper was read in the House. It was entitled "A humble Address and Remonstrance of the Knights, Burgesses, and Citizens assembled in Parliament;" and its purport was to denounce the military government under the eleven major-generals and their delegates, and to urge the protector to assume a higher title, and to put himself at the head of a government which should be managed with the advice of two Houses of parliament: a motion that it should be discussed seriatim was carried by a majority of 100 to 44; and it was debated, day after day, from the 23d of February to the 26th of March. If the major-generals, whose almost proconsular authority was menaced by it, were among the sturdiest of its opponents, there were others who opposed it without any apparent selfish motive; but, after all opposition, the substance of the paper was adopted by the House, who changed its title into that of "The humble Petition and Advice of the Parliament of England, Scotland, and Ireland." On the last day of the debate the blank left for the title to be borne by Cromwell was filled up with the word "KING" by a majority of 123 to 62. On the 4th of April the paper was presented to his highness at Whitehall by the speaker and the House, who desired "that his highness would be pleased to magnify himself with the title of king;" six or seven members being appointed to persuade his highness thereto. The principal arguments used were these:—that the title of king had obtained from the very infancy of this nation; that sometimes the person of the king had been unpleasant to the people, but not his title or office; that the title was interwoven in the laws, accommodated to the genius of the people, approved by the suffrages of parliaments; that it was for the honor of the nation to call their supreme governor king; that by the statutes of the 9th of Edward IV. and 3d of Henry VII., it was enacted that none taking up arms for the king, although unjustly, should be punished therefore; that it was more upon account of these laws, than of any affection, that many took part with the king in the late wars; that as to Providence, that would be no less conspicuous in turning the government again into monarchy for avoiding confusion, and bridling the tumults of the people, than in changing the name of monarchy into protectorship; and that good and pious men would acquiesce in the decree of parliament, although, perhaps, they might seem privately to differ. Cromwell urged his reasons against these arguments, declaring that he did not find it his duty to God and the country to accept the proposed new title. He desired time to reflect upon this part of "the great machine of England's government, called the Petition and Advice;" but, as to that other great clause of the paper, which recalled into existence the House of Peers, he did not hesitate for a moment.

[2] Syndercombe's plan was to murder Cromwell on one of his frequent journeys from Whitehall to Hampton Court, which last place the protector most loved. The frequency of these plots had rendered Cromwell wary in the extreme, and had led to his employing secret spies in all directions. Syndercombe was seized in his bed, and brought to trial; but he escaped the horrible execution, to which he was sentenced as a traitor, by committing suicide

Meanwhile, certain of the Fifth-monarchy men had resolved that there should be no king but Jesus Christ, and no parliament but a sanhedrim, to consist entirely of saints—that is, of themselves. Through the vigilance of Thurloe this precious plot was discovered, and a number of the conspirators were arrested with arms in their hands. Their leader appeared to be one Venner, a wine-cooper (called, by Thurloe, "a desperate and bloody spirit"); but Major-general Harrison, Vice-admiral Lawson, Colonel Rich, and other officers of that stamp, were implicated, and were all seized and sent to the Tower.[1] By the laws passed in the Long Parliament the offense of these men was capital, but not one of them suffered death. The discovery of the plot interrupted the proceedings about the petition and advice, and the kingly title, for several days; but on the 12th of April a committee of the House, headed by Whitelock, waited upon the lord protector; and, on the 14th, Whitelock reported the "passages yesterday betwixt his highness and the committee about the title of king." On the 16th Whitelock moved that the committee should meet again with his highness, which was ordered, and the committee attended; but the protector, being busy in examining the plot, put them off to another day. On the 20th, upon Whitelock's motion, the committee were again ordered to wait upon "his highness." Whitelock himself says, here, "The protector was satisfied in his private judgment that it was fit for him to take upon him the title of king, and matters were prepared in order thereunto; but afterward, by solicitation of the commonwealth-men, and fearing a mutiny and defection of a great part of the army in case he should assume that title and office, his mind changed; and many of the officers of the army gave out high threatenings against him in case he should do it; he therefore thought best to attend some better season and opportunity in this business, and refused it at this time, with great seeming earnestness." And, indeed, Cromwell's assumption of hereditary royalty was most strenuously opposed, not merely by Lambert, the best soldier in England next to the protector, and who entertained the hope of succeeding Cromwell in the protectorship, but also by Cromwell's brother-in-law Desborough, his son-in-law Fleetwood, his old instrument Colonel Pride, and above a hundred officers of name and influence, who, after waiting upon the protector in a body, sent up a petition to the House, setting forth—"That they (the petitioners) had hazarded their lives against monarchy, and were still ready to do so in defense of the liberties of the nation; that, having observed in some men great endeavors to bring the nation again under their old servitude, by pressing their general to take upon him the title and government of a king, in order to destroy him and weaken the hands of those who were faithful to the public; they, therefore, humbly desired that they would discountenance all such persons and endeavors, and continue steadfast to the old cause, for the preservation of which they, for their parts, were most ready to lay down their lives."[1] Therefore, if Cromwell (and, after all that has been said by his enemies of all colors, the subject is still open to doubt) had set his heart upon the mere title of king (the power he had), he was disappointed, and obliged to recede. On the 19th of May, after he had submitted several papers to

[1] Whitelock.—Thurloe, State Papers.—"This insurrection," says Thurloe, "was to have been upon Thursday night: the place of their first meeting was to have been at Mile-End Green. The party engaged to begin this insurrection (for this was to have been but as a forlorn) were those who falsely and profanely style themselves the Fifth-monarchy, and pretend to have no king but Jesus; for they do most impiously and wickedly father all their counsels and Satan's delusions upon him, calling that which is earthly, sensual, and devilish, to be the working of the Holy Spirit, and the power of Christ's love in them. .... They encouraged one another with this, that though they were but worms, yet they should be made instrumental to thresh mountains. .... That which they relied upon was, that many thousands would soon flock to them out of the city, and that others in the country would be also up. And though they speak great words of the reign of the saints, and the beautiful kingdom of holies which they would erect, yet the baits they lay to catch men with are, taking away taxes, excise, customs, and tithes. .... Upon their first meeting there was a book read among them called 'A Healing Question.' They had their correspondents at Bedford, Manchester, Abingdon, Oxford, Portsmouth, Hull, Bristol, Lincoln, and many other places."

[1] Ludlow, Memoirs.—"The protector," says Whitelock, "often advised about this and other great businesses with the Lord Broghill, Pierpoint, Whitelock, Sir Charles Wolsey, and Thurloe, and would be shut up three or four hours together in private discourse, and none were admitted to come in to him: he would sometimes be very cheerful with them, and laying aside his greatness, he would be exceeding familiar with them, and, by way of diversion, would make verses with them, and every one must try his fancy. He commonly called for tobacco, pipes, and a candle, and would now and then take tobacco himself; then he would fall again to his serious and great business, and advise with them in these affairs."

the House, it was voted that his title should continue to be that of lord protector; on the 22d the House fixed "the bounds and limits of the title of lord protector;" and on the 25th a committee waited upon "his highness" with the "Petition and Advice," which had been slightly modified in a few other particulars. By this instrument the knights, citizens, and burgesses, in parliament assembled, acknowledged their thankfulness to the wonderful mercy of Almighty God in delivering them from that tyranny and bondage, both in their spiritual and civil concernments, which the late king and his party designed to bring them under; their obligations to his highness, whose person the same gracious God had preserved in so many battles, and who had been an instrument for restoring peace and tranquillity, although environed by enemies abroad and unquiet spirits at home; and their conviction that the destruction of his person would throw all back into blood and confusion. They begged that he would be pleased to hold and exercise the office of chief magistrate, by and under the name and style of Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, &c.; to appoint and declare, during his lifetime, the person who should be his successor; and to create the "Other House," the members to be such as should be nominated by his highness and approved by the Commons.[1] By the same instrument it was provided that those who had advised, assisted, or abetted the rebellion of Ireland, and those who did or should profess the popish religion, should be disabled and made incapable forever to be elected or to give any vote in elections, and that the same disability should be extended to all who had aided, abetted, advised, or assisted in any war against the parliament since the 1st of January, 1641, unless they had since borne arms for the parliament, or for his highness, or had otherwise given signal testimony of their good affection to the commonwealth; that the House should have an exclusive jurisdiction over its privileges and constituent members, &c., &c. When the clerk of the parliament had read this long instrument, Cromwell, after a solemn speech, said, "The lord protector doth consent." On the 25th of June the parliament ordered the master of the ceremonies to give notice to foreign ambassadors of the inauguration of the protector; and on the next day that ceremony was performed with pomp and circumstance little inferior to those which attend a coronation. "It was appointed by the parliament to be performed in Westminster Hall, where, in the upper end, there was an ascent raised, where a chair and canopy of state was set, and a table with another chair for the speaker, with seats built scaffoldwise, for the parliament, on both sides; and places below for the aldermen of London and the like: all which being in readiness, the protector came out of a room adjoining to the Lords' House (having come thither from Whitehall by water), and in this order proceeded into the Hall. First went his gentlemen, then a herald; next the aldermen, another herald, the attorney-general; then the judges, then Norroy, the lords commissioners of the Treasury, and the seal carried by Commissioner Fiennes; then Garter, and after him the Earl of Warwick with the sword borne before the protector, bareheaded, the Lord Mayor Tichborn carrying the city sword by his left hand. Being seated in his chair, on the left hand thereof stood the lord mayor and the Dutch ambassador;

[1] The commonwealth-men, it appears, would tolerate neither the designation "House of Lords," nor that of "Upper House." The thing was, therefore, termed "the Other House;" that branch of the legislature losing not less in real power than it lost in name or dignity: they were not to exceed seventy in number, nor to be less than forty, whereof one-and-twenty were to form a quorum; they were not to give any vote by proxy; on death or removal no new members were to be admitted to sit and vote but by consent of the House of Commons, &c.

the French ambassador and the Earl of Warwick on the right; next behind him stood his sons, Richard, Fleetwood, Claypole, and the privy council; upon a lower descent stood the Lord Viscount Lisle, Lord Montague, and Mr. Whitelock, with drawn swords."[1] When the protector had taken his place, standing up under a cloth of estate, the speaker, in the name of the parliament, presented to him a robe of purple velvet lined with ermine (which the speaker, assisted by Whitelock and others, put upon his highness); then he delivered to him the Bible richly gilt and bossed; and the speaker girt the sword about his highness, and put into his hand the scepter of massy gold, and then made a speech to him upon those several things, wished him all prosperity in his government, and administered the new oath. This done, Mr. Manton, one of the chaplains, made a long prayer, recommending his highness, the parliament, the council, the forces by land and sea, and the people of the three nations, to the blessing and protection of God. And after this prayer, "the heralds, by sound of trumpet, proclaimed his highness Protector of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the dominions thereunto belonging; requiring all persons to yield him due obedience. Hereupon the trumpets sounded again, and the people (after the usual manner) gave several acclamations, with loud shouts, crying 'God save the lord protector!' At the end of all, the protector, with his train, returned to Whitehall, and the members to the parliament-house, where they prorogued their sitting to the next January."[1]

The court and the manner of life of Cromwell continued quiet and modest, as they ever had been; not wanting, however, a certain sober dignity, which was more imposing than the tinsel and parade of most royalties. Every thing at Hampton Court, his favorite residence, had an air of sobriety and decency: there was no riot, no debauchery, seen or heard of; yet it was not a dull place, the protector's humor being naturally of a cheerful turn. "He now provided him a guard of halberdiers in gray coats, welted with a black velvet, over whom Walter Strickland was captain. He frequently diverted himself at Hampton Court, whither he went and returned, commonly in post. with his guards behind and before. His own diet was spare and not curious, except in public treatments, which were constantly given the Monday in every week, to all the officers in the army not below a captain, where he used to dine with them. A table was likewise spread every day of the week for such officers as should casually come to court. He was a great lover of music, and entertained the most skillful in that science in his pay and family. He respected all persons that were eximious in any art, and would procure them to be sent or brought to him. Sometimes he would, for a frolic, before he had half dined, give order for the drum to beat and call in his foot-guards, who were permitted to make booty of all they found on the table. Sometimes he would be jocund with some of the nobility, and would tell them what company they had lately kept; when and where they had drunk the king's health and the royal family's; bidding them, when they did it again, to do it more privately; and this without any passion, and as festivous, droll discourse."[1] He delighted especially to surround himself with the master minds of his age and country—with men who had left immortal names behind them. Milton, the Latin secretary, was his familiar; honest Andrew Marvel was his frequent guest; Waller was his friend and kinsman; nor was the more youthful genius of Dryden excluded. Hartlib, a native of Poland, the bosom-friend of Milton, and the advocate of education, was honored and pensioned; and so was Usher, the learned and amiable archbishop, notwithstanding his prelacy; and John Biddle, called the father of English Unitarians, received an allowance of a hundred crowns a year. Even the fantastic, plotting Catholic, Sir Kenelm Digby, was among the protector's guests, and received support or assistance, on account, chiefly, of his literary merits. The general course of the protector's government was mild and just. One who was his physician, but not his panegyrist, says—"Justice (that we may not scourge him beyond his desert) was renewed almost to her former grace and splendor, as well distributive as commutative; the judges executing their office with equity and justice, far from covetousness; and the laws suffered, without delay or let, to have their full force upon all (a few excepted, where he himself was immediately concerned). The lives of men, outwardly at least, became reformed, either by withdrawing the incentives to luxury, or by means of the ancient laws now of new put into execution. There was also a strict discipline kept in his court; one could find none here that was either drunkard or whoremaster, none that was guilty of extortion or oppression, but he was severely rebuked. Now trade began to flourish; and (to say all in a word) all England over there were halcyon days."[2]

About six weeks after Cromwell's inauguration he was afflicted by receiving the news of the death of the brave Blake, who, with wonderful success, had asserted in all seas the supremacy of the British flag—who had done the most eminent service to parliament, to commonwealth, to the protector—who had been the "first man that declined the old track, and made it manifest that the science might be attained in less time than was imagined, and despised those rules which had long been in practice to keep his ship and men out of danger, which had been held, in former times, a point of great ability and circumspection, as if the principal art requisite in the captain of a ship had been to be sure to come safe home again—the first man who brought the ships to contemn castles on shore, which had been thought ever very formidable—the first that infused that proportion of courage into the seamen, by making them see what mighty things they could do if they were resolved, and taught them to fight in fire as well as upon water."[1] "The last part he ever acted in a sea of blood," says a quaint but spirited and correct narrator, "was against the Spaniards at Santa Cruz: here, with twenty-five sail, he fought (as it were in a ring) with seven forts, a castle, and sixteen ships, many of them, being of greater force than most of those ships Blake carried in against them: yet, in spite of opposition, he soon calcined the enemy and brought his fleet back again to the coast of Spain full fraught with honor."[2] But his constitution was now worn out by long services and by the sea-scurvy; and he "who would never strike to any other enemy, struck his topmast to Death," as he was entering Plymouth Sound.

The protector, drawing more closely to France, according to a private agreement, had prepared troops to join the French army under Turenne; and six thousand foot, some of them veterans, but most new recruits, were sent over to Boulogne under the command of Sir John Reynolds and Colonel Morgan. These red-coats marched with Turenne into Spanish Flanders, and took Mardick, a very strong fort about two miles from Dunkirk. In the course of the following winter, while the English were in quarters, the Duke of York, the late king's second son, took the field suddenly with a strong body of Spaniards, and endeavored to drive the English out of Mardick; but he was repulsed with great loss. Abandoned and cast out by the French, and hoping little from the Spaniards, Charles II., who was quite capable of meaner things, offered to espouse one of Cromwell's daughters; but the lord protector told Orrery, who recommended the match, that Charles was so damnably debauched, he would undo them all.[3]

A.D. 1658. On the 28th of January the parliament met according to their adjournment, and received into the House their fellow-members who had been prevented from taking their seats in the preceding session; this being done upon the fourth article of "The Petition and Advice," by which it was provided that no member legally chosen should be excluded from performance of his duty, but by consent of parliament. In the interval of the parliament's sitting, the protector had provided his peers who were to make up the other House, and these quasi-lords had been summoned by the same form of writs which had formerly been used for calling the peers to parliament. They were in all sixty, and among them were several noblemen, knights, and gentle-

[2] Perfect Politician.—The writer of this rich little volume adds, "He was a man wholly devoted to his country's service, resolute in his undertakings, and most faithful in the performance: with him, valor seldom missed its reward, nor cowardice its punishment. When news was brought him of a metamorphosis in the state at home he would then encourage the seamen to be most vigilant abroad. For (said he) 'tis not our duty to mind state affairs, but to keep foreigners from fooling us. In all his expeditions the wind seldom deceived him, but most an end stood his friend; especially in his last undertaking at the Canary Islands. To his last he lived a single life, never being espoused to any but his country's quarrels. As he lived bravely, he died gloriously, and was buried in Henry VII.'s Chapel; yet enjoying at this time no other monument but what is reared by his valor, which time itself can hardly deface." Whitelock tells us that Blake's funeral was performed with great solemnity, and that, at the time of it, new plots were discovered against the protector.

men of ancient family and good estates, the rest being for the most part colonels and officers of the army. Foremost on the list appear the names of the Lord Richard Cromwell, the protector's eldest son, the Lord Henry Cromwell, his other son, lord deputy of Ireland, Nathaniel Fiennes, Lisle, Fleetwood, the Earl of Warwick, the Earl of Mulgrave, the Earl of Manchester, Lord Eure, Viscount Saye, Viscount Lisle, Lord John Claypole, Charles Viscount Howard, Lord Wharton, Lord Falconbridge, General Monk, commander-in-chief of his highness' forces in Scotland, and Lord Edward Montague; and Whitelock, Hazelrig, Whalley, Barkstead, Pride, Goff, Sir Christopher Pack, the ex-lord mayor of London, St. John, and other old friends of the protector, were among the remainder.[1] If Cromwell had been ever so much disposed to call upon the old peers, and if that aristocracy had been ever so well inclined to obey the summons, such a measure was rendered impracticable by the last constitutional instrument, "The Petition and Advice," expressly stipulating that the members of "the Other House" should be subject to the same excluding clauses as the members of the House of Commons; and with this additional bar, that all the members of that other House, though nominated by his highness, must be approved by the Commons, who, in truth, having with difficulty consented to the formation of a second chamber or house, were determined that it should be second and inferior in all senses. But nearly every possible circumstance set strongly against the revival of the ancient Upper House; the vast majority of the peers had been devoted to the late king, and even the feeble minority of their number that remained at London with the parliament had refused taking any part in the king's trial; with the exception of a few united to him by old ties of friendship, or by their marrying into his family, there was not a single old peer that would trust Cromwell, or that he could trust; the whole of that body feared to commit their hereditary right by sitting in an assembly where the tenure was only during life (the commonwealth-men utterly abhorred the notion of an hereditary peerage), and in the pride and insolence of an aristocracy not yet accustomed to this kind of recent creations, they disdained to sit in a House with men who had made their fortune with their sword or by their genius in war or law. Even the Earl of Warwick, who had gone along with the commonwealth-men in most things, and whose grandson and presumed heir had married one of the protector's daughters, declared that he could not sit in the same assembly with Colonel Hewson, who had been a shoemaker, and Colonel Pride, who had been a drayman. And Manchester, Saye, and the other members of the old House of Lords, who have been named, contemptuously kept aloof, not one of them, it should appear, taking his seat except Lord Eure. The rest of the members of the other House took their seats as the old lords used to do formerly, and the protector went thither to open the session according to the ancient and royal form. And the speaker, with the House of Commons, being sent for by the black rod, came to the Lords' House, where the protector made a solemn speech to them, "but was short by reason of his indisposition of health."[1] Indeed, at the opening of this stormy session, wherein he was to be assaulted on all sides by his old Presbyterian enemies, and by his old friends, the Independents, who had become his worst enemies, his iron constitution was giving way under the effect of labor, anxiety, and grief: his daughter, the Lady Claypole, the darling of his heart, was visibly declining, and in no human heart were the domestic affections ever stronger than in that of this wonderful man. In his short speech, however, he told the republicans or the levelers some unpalatable truths, and betrayed no fear, no misgiving as to his own powers of preserving peace in the land. When he had done, the Lord Commissioner Fiennes harangued "my lords and gentlemen of both the most honorable Houses of Parliament," quoting Scripture most copiously, yet not more copiously than was sanctioned by the then general custom. He told them to reflect upon the posture that the three nations were then in—a posture of peace—a quiet posture, a posture looking toward a settlement, a perfect settlement, with the blessed fruits thereof, justice and piety, plenty and prosperity: he alluded to the republicans, the party most feared, as to others "who would build upon contrary foundations, or upon no foundation at all. I need not," continued Fiennes, "say much of them either; for those who conceit Utopias of I know not what kind of imaginary commonwealths, or day-dreams of the return of I know not what golden age, their notions are rather bottomed in conceit than in reason, and must rather be worn out by experience than argued down by reason; for, when they come to be put in practice, they presently discover their weakness and inconsistency, and that they are altogether unpracticable and infeasible, or of very short durance and continuance; as hath appeared so often as they have been assayed or attempted." From hearing his long discourse, the Commons returned to their own House with irritated and hostile feelings; and there it was soon seen that the protector, by removing so many of his friends to "the Other House," had left himself in a deplorable minority in this; and also that those members who had taken their seats by virtue of, and in acknowledgment of, "The Petition and Advice," were determined to destroy that last instrument of government, and to aim their first blows at the new House, which was an integral and essential part of that constitution. The attack was led by Hazelrig, who, though nominated to "the Other House," persisted in retaining his place in the Commons, by Scot, a most resolute republican, and by others who detested any approach to the old aristocratic House of Lords. On the fourth day of the session a message "from the Lords," delivered by two of the judges, who all attended as formerly in the Upper House, desired the concurrence of the Commons in an address to the protector for a day of humiliation and fast. The Commons vehemently protested against the title assumed in the message, and would admit of no other than that of "the Other House;" and in the course of a fiery debate many spoke both angrily and contemptuously of the dignity and authority of that lamely-restored branch of the legislature; insomuch "that now they would not own the work of their creation, but looked upon it as a by-blow, a thing by chance, or a pageant parliament set up on purpose to mock them." On the morrow, the 25th of January, upon a letter from the protector to the Speaker of the House of Commons, they met his highness in the Banqueting-House, and there he exhorted them to unity, and to the observance of their own laws and rules in "The Petition and Advice." Whitelock adds that he gave them a state of the public accounts and much good advice. But all this was of no avail; the majority in the Commons persevered in their attack, and presently broached the doctrine that the new House was, and must be, a mere dependency of the Commons—a thing invested with certain functions of legislature, and with nothing more—that it could never be a coördinate power with the Commons. Scot, who was right in his reasoning, as applied to that mongrel "the Other House," but who was madly wrong in fancying that a constitution could march with one unchecked and irresponsible chamber, raked up the whole history of the peers (a lamentable one!) since the commencement of the civil war; and then coming to the grand crisis, he said, "The lords would not join in the trial of the king. We must lay things bare and naked. We were either to lay all that blood of ten years' war upon ourselves, or upon some other object. We called the King of England to our bar, and arraigned him. He was for his obstinacy and guilt condemned and executed; and so let all the enemies of God perish! The House of Commons had a good conscience in it. Upon this, the Lords' House adjourned, and never met, and hereby came a farewell of all those peers, and it was hoped the people of England should never again have a negative upon them."[1] Nor did Scot and his associates limit their attack to the other House or to mere declamation and oratory; they assaulted the protectorate itself, and a petition was circulated in the city by them and by some officers of the army for the purpose of abolishing Cromwell's all but kingly office. "All these passages," says Whitelock, "tended to their own destruction, which it was not difficult to foresee. The protector looked upon himself as aimed at by them, though with a side wind, and with testimonies of their envy toward him; and he was the more incensed, because at this time the Fifth-monarchy men began again their enterprises to overthrow him and his government by force; whereof there were clear discoveries: he, therefore, took a resolution suddenly to dissolve this parliament." Accordingly, on the 4th of February, the protector, without any intimation of his purpose, went down to the House of Lords early in the morning, summoned the Commons before him, told them of the hostile temper and the contempt of "The Petition and Advice" which they had betrayed, of the intrigues in which many of them were engaged, and then saying, that urgent and weighty reasons made it necessary in order to the public peace and safety to proceed to an immediate dissolution, he concluded with these words:—"I do dissolve this parliament, and let God judge between me and you." And thus ended Cromwell's last parliament, which had sat only fourteen days. The protector was never in so much danger as at this moment: the republicans and their friends "were ready both with arms and men to fall in with swords in their hands;" the army was murmuring for want of pay; the royalists were spirited and combined by means of the Marquis of Ormond, who, during the sitting of parliament, had passed several days in disguise and concealment in the city of London, and had returned safely to Charles II. at Bruges; the Levelers and Fifth-monarchy men were pledging their desperate services to those that could dupe them; Cromwell's old friend, Harrison, who had been released from the Tower after a short confinement, "was deep in the plot;" Colonel Silas Titus, a Presbyterian royalist, or Colonel Sexby, or whoever was the author of the famed tract entitled "Killing no Murder," had invited all patriots to assassination, proclaiming that the greatest benefit any Englishman could render his country would be to murder Cromwell; and yet the protector, even sick and dispirited as he was, was capable of conjuring this universal storm. He called a meeting of officers; he harangued the city and common council; beheaded Dr. Hewit and Sir Henry Slingsby; threw other plotters into prison; hanged three that were taken with arms in their hands in Cheapside; and not only preserved his authority at home, but also prosecuted his wars abroad with vigor and success. His general in the Low Countries, Sir John Reynolds, had been cast away and drowned upon the Goodwin Sands, but Lockhart, who succeeded to his command, was not only equal to Reynolds as a soldier, but an excellent and tried diplomatist to boot. The English troops, serving with Turenne, gained a brilliant victory over the Spaniards, commanded by Don Juan and the Duke of York; helped to take Dunkirk, which according to the treaty was delivered to Cromwell, and well garrisoned with Englishmen by Lockhart, who bore an honorable share (at least a soldier's) in that brilliant campaign, wherein Turenne gained Dixmude, Gravelines, Oudenard, and a congeries of other important fortresses. And the young Louis XIV., who had begun to make his promenades to the army, congratulated his brother, the protector, on the admirable tenue, discipline, and bravery of his troops.

"The year gliding thus away in victories and triumphs, Dunkirk enforced to grow under the shade of the English oak, and all prospering so well in Flanders as if Mars himself had borne the English banner, caused endearing congratulations mutually to pass between the protector and his cousin of France. The Lord Falconbridge being made one of the blood by matrimony, carried the first compliment to Calais, and there presented it to the king; which was quickly after returned back again by Monsieur Mancini, nephew to Cardinal Mazarin, and the Duke de Crequi: these arrived at London to present their respects; which having done, they returned with high satisfaction. These being departed, another far less welcome messenger arrived at the English court, even Death itself, who came to require of our great Cromwell what was his due by nature. . . . . The first symptoms of this great man's last sickness appeared presently upon the death of his daughter Claypole, whose end is thought by many to have hastened his dissolution. About the beginning of October his distemper discovered itself to be a bastard tertian ague, which for a week's time threatened no danger, for on his well-day it hindered him not from going abroad. But presently he began to grow worse, and so was brought from Hampton Court (where he first fell sick, and where he made a will as to his domestic affairs) to London."[1] At first he spoke confidently of his recovery, and of the good things he intended, by the grace of Heaven, to do for his country; but his malady gained rapidly upon him, and during the night of the 2d of September, less than a month after the death of his dear daughter, he was assured that his end was approaching, and was overheard by Major Butler uttering this prayer:—" Lord, I am a poor foolish creature; this people would have me live; they think it will be best for them, and that it will redound much to thy glory. All the stir is about this.[2] Others would fain have me die. Lord, pardon them, and pardon thy foolish people; forgive them their sins, and do not forsake them; but love and bless them, and give them rest; and bring them to a consistency, and give me rest. . . . I am a conqueror, and more than a conqueror, through Jesus Christ who strengtheneth me."[1] In the course of that night, and not before, he declared, in the presence of four or five of the council, that " my Lord Richard" should be his successor.[2] On the following morning he was speechless, and he expired between three and four o'clock in the afternoon of the 3d of September, the day which he accounted his happiest day, the anniversary of his great victories of Worcester and Dunbar. He was in the 60th year of his age, having been born on the 25th of April, 1599.

Immediately after the death of Oliver Cromwell the council assembled, and being satisfied that the protector in his lifetime, according to "The Petition and Advice," had declared his son Richard to be his successor, they gave orders for his being proclaimed in a solemn manner, first in London and Westminster, and then in all the chief cities and towns in England, and at Dunkirk, and in all other possessions abroad. Addresses poured in to the new lord protector, declaring great satisfaction in his succession, and resolutions to adhere to him. The congregational churches hastened to express their gladness, and all the minor sects their joy, and their hopes that he would follow the footsteps of his glorious father, and secure freedom of conscience to all Christians. The neighboring princes and states sent ministers to condole with him on the death of his father, and to congratulate him on his happy and peaceable succession to the government. The army serving in Flanders, and still gaining laurels there, proclaimed Richard at Dunkirk and in their camp, and sent over respectful addresses to him. The officers of the navy gladly acknowledged his authority, and pledged themselves to stand by him; and the same was done by General Monk and his officers in Scotland.[1] "It has pleased God hitherto," writes Thurloe to Henry Cromwell, on the 7th of September, "to give his highness your brother a very easy and peaceful entrance upon his government. There is not a dog that wags his tongue, so great a calm are we in. The Lord continue it, and give him a just and understanding heart, that he may know how to go out and in before this great people, whose peace and liberty he is intrusted with!" But Richard Cromwell was no soldier, and destitute of high commanding powers of any kind; he had lived a quiet, retired life, as far as possible away from the turmoil of government and the bustle of the camp, and he was almost a stranger to that soldiery which his father had known personally almost to a man, and over which, by a rare combination of qualities—by a mixture of unflinching firmness in essentials, and good nature in minor points—by devotion and by an easy familiarity which condescended to drollery—he had exercised an almost magical influence. The payment of the troops, too, was somewhat in arrears, and Richard found the coffers of the state almost empty. From these and other circumstances, which may be easily conceived, the military presently betrayed symptoms of discontent. In the same letter of the 7th of September, wherein Thurloe speaks of the "easy and peaceable entrance," he says: "But I must needs acquaint your excellency that there are some secret murmurings in the army, as if his highness were not general of the army, as his father was; and they would look upon him and the army as divided, and as if the conduct of the army should be elsewhere, and in other hands; but I am not able to say what this will come to." Richard soon saw what it came to. His brother-in-law, Fleetwood, a good soldier, a favorite with the army, but a weak man in other respects, as well as ambitious and imprudent, became jealous of the new protector, who had nominated him to be, under himself, commander-in-chief of the land forces. Fleetwood secretly encouraged a strange petition, which was drawn up and presented, requiring the protector, in effect, to give up his control over the army.[2] Richard replied, that he had given the command of the forces to Fleetwood, who seemed generally acceptable to them; but that to gratify them further, or wholly to give up the power of the sword, was contrary to "The Petition and Advice," which lodged that power in the hands of the protector and parliament jointly.

[1] Whitelock.—Thurloe.

[2] The petitioners required that no officer should be deprived of his commission except by a court-martial; and that the power of granting commissions should be intrusted to some person whose services had placed him above suspicion.

His father had been prevented only by death from calling another parliament; and now Richard was advised by Thurloe, St. John, Fiennes, and other of his father's ministers, to assemble the representatives of the people and "the Other House," as it had been constituted by Oliver. Contrary to the spirit and the letter of "The Petition and Advice," and the other instruments of government, framed in his father's time, and on which alone, Richard could found any claim to his high station, he was induced by his advisers to return to the old system of election, and to issue writs to the smaller or rotten boroughs, in lieu of the populous and opulent boroughs which had been called into parliamentary existence by Oliver's institutes of government; and there can be little doubt that this retrograde movement, this undoing of a grand representative improvement, was adopted solely because those insignificant boroughs could be the most easily bought or controlled. In effect, the members returned for those places were all friends of the new protector.

A.D. 1659. The parliament met on the 27th of January, the members of "the Other House" being summoned by the same writ as had been used before, according to "The Petition and Advice,"—and being the same despised nullity that they were before. In the Commons, the members returned for Scotland and Ireland "appeared very full;" but the House voted several members incapable of sitting because they had been in arms against the parliament. Scarcely half of the members of the Commons would obey the summons of Richard to meet him in "the Other House," at the opening of the session; and the Commons proceeded immediately to debate and question the bill of recognition of his highness to be lord protector; "and some were very cross in that business, which caused doubts of the good issue of this parliament."[1] Next, they fell upon the whole substance and bearing of that last constitutional instrument, "The Petition and Advice;" and took into consideration the constitution of parliament in two Houses, and the inexpediency and peril of allowing "the Other House." "All this," says Whitelock, "caused much discourse and doubts in many, lest a disagreement should follow; and some of the court and relations of Richard were not backward to promote a difference." The republicans, who mustered about fifty members in this parliament (and not more), but who were invigorated by the return of Sir Harry Vane, Ludlow, and Bradshaw, whom Cromwell had imprisoned or had kept at a distance, denounced the protectorate and "the Other House," as tending to the old tyranny, as under-buildings whereon to set up again the supreme Stuart; and they proposed a return to the commonwealth as it existed under the Rump. The disguised royalists, who were pretty numerous, joined the republicans in increasing the confusion; and the moderates—"the waiters upon Providence"—vacillated in a miserable manner, and waited events. After a quibbling about words, scarcely worthy of the genius of Vane, the act of recognition was passed, and a revenue was settled for the new protector. The question whether the House of Commons should transact business with the persons sitting in the other House as with a house of parliament, was carried in the affirmative by a majority of sixty-four; but that other House was denied any claims of peerage or any negative voice; and, though several of the ancient peers who had been faithful to the parliament were now admitted to sit in it, it did not rise in consideration. Then a fierce attack was made upon the late administration. Thurloe, as secretary of state, was threatened with impeachment; the conduct of Oliver's major-generals was held up to public detestation; and Butler, one of those proconsuls, was selected for prosecution. But the army soon stayed these proceedings by joining with the republican section, and resolving to put an end to this parliament, which, as they affirmed—and not without some reason—was ruining the good old cause, and preparing the way for the restoration of the Stuarts. The army itself was now divided into three factions, the weakest of which adhered to Richard, but the strongest of which was controlled by Lambert, who seems to have fancied that he was the fittest man to succeed Oliver Cromwell. These Lambertians established what they called a general council of officers, and voted that the command of the army should be put into better hands, and that every officer should declare his approval of the conduct of the army and the proceedings against the late Charles Stuart, or resign his commission. The House of Commons, or the helpless majority of it, who must have seen that the small republican minority, when backed by the mass of the army, could not fail to be too strong for them, declared that such meetings were illegal. On this the Lambertians, or the Wallingford House party, as they were called from their place of meeting, drew up a representation to Richard, which was presented on the 14th of April, and which set forth their want of pay, the insolences of their enemies, and their designs, together with some in power, to ruin the army and the good old cause, and to bring in the enemies thereof; to prevent which they desired his highness to provide effectual remedy. "This," says Whitelock, "was the beginning of Richard's fall, and set on foot by his relations—Desborough who married his aunt, and Fleetwood who married his sister, and others of their party; and the parliament disputed about the other House, but took no course to provide money, but exasperated the army, and all those named of the other House." The Quakers delivered a paper to the speaker (these sectarians knew the persecution which would follow a restoration or any triumph of the Presbyterian royalists) seconding the representation of the army, and adding to it fresh clauses and demands; and a day or two after the officers of the trained-bands of London sent up a representation of their own to his highness, representing the great danger from the public enemy, and seconding the representation of the army. "The parliament," continues Whitelock, "grew into heats; Hazelrig and Nevil, and their party, labored to overthrow the government by a protector and two Houses of parliament, and pretended to have a free commonwealth; divers officers of the army joined with them; Desborough, Fleetwood, Sir Henry Vane, Berry, and others, endeavored to lessen Richard's power; and some of them were for altering the government; and Lambert, who had been discontented, closely wrought for that end. Richard advised with the Lord Broghill, Fiennes, Thurloe, Wolsey, Whitelock, and some others, whether it were not then fit to dissolve the present parliament. Most of them were for it; Whitelock doubted the success of it, and wished a little longer permission of their sitting, especially now they had begun to consider of raising money, whereby they would engage the soldiery; but most were for the dissolving of the parliament, in regard of the present great dangers from them, and from the cavaliers, who now flocked to London, and, underhand, fomented the divisions." But, if Whitelock's advice were the best, it is quite certain that Richard Cromwell had not the power of acting upon it: the council of officers had been with him, and had told him that he must dissolve the parliament, or abide the consequences of the open hostility of the army; and, accordingly, this parliament was dissolved on the 22d of April. "This caused much trouble in the minds of many honest men, but the cavaliers and republicans rejoiced at it. Richard and his council sat close to consult what was fit to be done, and among them were many enemies to Richard and his government. . . . . . Lambert and other officers consulted how they might again bring in the old members of the parliament (the Rump). whom themselves had before thrust out." And, on the 6th of May, Fleetwood and Lambert, and the general council of officers, keeping the promises they had made to the republicans, published a declaration, inviting the members of the Long Parliament, who had continued sitting till Oliver's forcible ejectment on the 20th of April, 1653, to return to the exercise and discharge of their trust; averring that the army would be most ready to give their utmost assistance to them, so that they might sit in safety, improve the present opportunity, and settle and secure the peace and freedom of the commonwealth. Losing no time, Lenthall. the old speaker, and many members of the Rump, hastened to Westminster the very next day; and, after some deliberations in the Painted Chamber, went together in a body to the House, Lambert guarding them with soldiers, and there took their seats as a lawful and indisputable parliament.

The first proceeding of the restored Rump was to pass a declaration touching their purpose to secure the property and liberty of the people, both as men and as Christians; and that, too, without any single person, protectorate, kingship, or House of Peers. Richard Cromwell, who seems to have had scarcely more affection than ability for the difficult position in which he had been placed by fortune, retired quietly to Hampton Court, and soon signed his demission in form. On the 9th of May the restored and single House appointed a committee of safety, most of the members of which were soldiers, except Vane and Scot, and they ordered that none should be employed except such as feared God and were faithful to the good old cause. Fleetwood, in the name of the army at London, made a proffer of allegiance to the Rump; and General Monk hastened to write from Scotland, to express the entire concurrence of his army in the new revolution which had been effected. On the 13th of May a council of state was framed, the chief members of it being Fairfax, Lambert, Desborough, Bradshaw, Sir Antony Ashley Cooper, Fleetwood, Hazelrig, Vane, Ludlow, St. John, and Whitelock.[1] But this council was scarcely formed when the republican Scot, accused two members of it (Whitelock and Antony Ashley Cooper) of carrying on a treasonable correspondence with Charles Stuart and Sir Edward Hyde (Clarendon) beyond seas. Whitelock himself says that he moved to know who was his accuser; that that was waived, and he was continued in the council; that Ashley Cooper's expressions were so high that they bred in some the more suspicion of him, though at the time he was believed. On the 22d of June (and not before) letters were received from Henry Cromwell, a much more able or bolder man than his brother, notifying his submission and the submission of his army in Ireland to the present parliament. Pressed by want of money, the Rump proposed selling the three royal palaces of Whitehall, Somerset House, and Hampton Court; but they were interrupted and dismissed before they could carry into effect this new project in finance. On the 4th of July they passed a startling vote—it was, to exempt Richard Cromwell, the late protector, upon whose shoulders they had thrown all the heavy expenses of the public and magnificent funeral of his father in Westminster Abbey, together with other charges of a public nature, from all arrests for debt. But on the 16th of the same month they agreed to the somewhat more decent motion, of an order for a way to pay Richard Cromwell's debts, being in all £29,640; referring it at the same time to a committee to provide a comfortable maintenance for him. At this moment, the Rump, who never mustered more than a hundred members—many of their old colleagues keeping away from the House, though repeatedly summoned to attend—were alarmed by numerous plots and riots raised by the royalists. Sir John Gore was arrested; the Duke of Buckingham was obliged to give bail to be faithful to the government established; Lady Mary Howard, daughter to the Earl of Berkshire, and other persons of rank, were committed on a charge of high treason. These things grew worse and worse: a riot was suppressed in Enfield Chase; but on the 31st of July, when the House was busied on a bill brought in by Whitelock, and approved by General Monk, for the complete union of England and Scotland, the council of state, which sat nearly all night, discovered a new and extensive conspiracy; and on the 3d of August news was received of insurrections having broken out in several parts of the country, the most important being one in Cheshire and Lancashire, headed by Sir George Booth, who was favored by the Presbyterian ministers, and one in Worcestershire. Lambert was detached against Booth, who was expecting to be joined both by Charles II. and his brother the Duke of York, and by royalists from half of the counties of England; for these simultaneous risings had been concerted. But Lambert gave a total rout to Sir George Booth's forces; and in all other quarters the royalists fled before the parliamentarians, and threw down their arms.

[1] In all, this council of state consisted of thirty-one persons.

Charles, who had got every thing ready for his embarkation, deferred his voyage; Booth and the young Earl of Derby, with many others, were arrested and thrown into the Tower; and by the end of August this formidable insurrection was completely subdued. But the Rump, or that portion of it which now sat in the House, and the army which had placed them there, lost no time in beginning to quarrel with each other. The House, asserting their supreme authority, insisted that the officers of the army should take out new commissions from them, and that the whole army should be placed in a proper dependency on the civil power. The officers, on the other hand, elevated by their recent successes, and by their consciousness that the Rump only existed by favor of their swords, demanded that Fleetwood should be declared commander-in-chief, without limitations to his authority; that Lambert should be major-general, as a proper reward for his recent services; and that the government of the country should not be in a single house, but in a house of representatives and another house, as to the precise nature of which it should appear they had not made up their minds. Hazelrig and his party "being jealous that the soldiers might break them," struggled as if for life, and they brought a majority to reject this paper of the army; to dismiss Lambert, Desborough, and seven or eight other principal officers who had subscribed the letter; and to pass an act for putting out Fleetwood from being lieutenant-general of the army, and appointing Ludlow, Monk, Hazelrig, Walton, Morley, and Overton, to be commissioners with him (Fleetwood) to govern all the forces.[1] Hazelrig, who was the chief mover in these bold transactions, and who added harshness and insolence to his boldness, was encouraged by letters from Monk, assuring him that he and the army in Scotland would stand by the parliament, and by the like promises from Ludlow, who had now succeeded Henry Cromwell in the command of the forces in Ireland. But Monk and Ludlow were far away, and the English army was close at hand. "The proceedings of the parliament," says Whitelock, "nettled the officers, especially those who had performed late and good service, and caused them to consider what to do for their own interest; and of these, Lambert, Desborough, Berry, and the rest who had been ousted of their commands, were the chief." On the 13th of October, the very day after the passing of Hazelrig's obnoxious votes, some soldiers, who had pledged themselves to him to declare for the parliament and protect it, were drawn up in Westminster Hall, Palace-yard, and the avenues leading to the House; and Evelyn, who commanded the life-guards of the parliament, marched forth with his troops to do his service, but he was met by Lambert at Scotland-yard gate, who commanded him to dismount, and though Lambert was on foot, and had none with him, yet Evelyn, at the head of his troop, thought it safest to obey, and dismounted at his command, and his troop also obeyed Lambert, who then drew together some other forces, and stationed them along King-street and round about the Abbey church and yard; and when the speaker came by in his coach, they stopped him and made him turn back, and they treated most part of the members in the same way, so that the House did not sit. The council of state sat, and there the hostile parties, the Lamberts and the Hazelrigs, the army men and the Rump men, came into fierce collision. The civilians accused the army of being destroyers of liberty; the officers retorted, saying that the Rump would not have left them any liberty to destroy; and Colonel Sydenham asserted that the army had been obliged to apply this last remedy in compliance with a special commission from divine Providence.[1] But the council of state so managed the business that, at the last, they came to an accommodation to save the effusion of blood, and it was agreed that the parliament should not sit: that the council of officers should provide for the preservation of the peace, "and have a form of government drawn up for a new parliament to be shortly summoned, and to settle all things." On the next day the officers of the army debated about a settlement, and declared Fleetwood to be their commander-in-chief. On the other side, Hazelrig and his friends consulted how they might restore themselves and curb the officers, "and they had some hopes of Monk to be their champion." On the 17th of October the council of officers sent one of their body to Monk, in Scotland, and another to Ludlow, in Ireland, to desire their concurrence; they nominated a committee of safety; they appointed Lambert to be major-general of the forces in England and Scotland (which discontented Monk); and then they kept a day of humiliation in Whitehall Chapel. Vane was admitted into the committee of safety, but was almost immediately accused, by Desborough and some other great officers, "of a design to overthrow magistracy, ministry, and the law."

It was at this critical moment that Monk, who was courted and feared by both parties, began to play his own game; he had been a royalist before he became a parliamentarian, and he was ready to become king's man, or devil's man, or any thing that best promised to promote his own interests. On the 29th of October, sixteen days after the suppression of the Rump, the officers of the army received a letter from him expressive of his dissatisfaction at their late proceedings, and the committee of safety received intelligence through other channels that Monk had secured Berwick for himself, and was looking toward London. Lambert was instantly appointed to command the forces in the north of England; and Whalley and Goff, and Caryl and Barker, ministers of the gospel, were sent to Monk "to persuade him to a right understanding of things, and prevent effusion of blood." Monk, in the mean while, sent to assure the leaders of the Rump that his sole object was to relieve parliament from military oppression; and he called God to witness that he was, above all things, a friend to liberty and the commonwealth. Writing to Hazelrig, whom he duped, he said, "As to a commonwealth, believe me, sir—for I speak it in the presence of God—it is the desire of my soul."[1] But if Monk duped the humiliated and desperate members of the Rump, he certainly never deceived the English officers. On the 8th of November, Desborough, Fleetwood, and the principal men of that body, went to the common council in London, and told them plainly "that the bottom of Monk's design was to bring in the king upon a new civil war." And four days before this—on the 4th of November—some of the officers of the navy addressed a remarkable letter to Monk, begging him to desist. "It is obvious to us," said these plain-speaking sailors, "wherever we come, that few or none take pleasure in your proceedings but the cavaliers, who make their boast of you, and place their confidence in you."[2] Monk, after again calling God to witness that the asserting of a commonwealth was the only intent of his heart, crossed the Tweed in great force, being openly backed by the chief Presbyterians in Scotland. He was faced, on the Tyne, by Lambert, whose promotion to the command of the troops in Scotland is generally supposed to have contributed greatly to make him resume his loyalty to the party in power: but the soldiers of Cromwell, now badly provided, had lost their old enthusiasm and discipline, and Lambert, beside, had orders from the committee of government to avoid a hostile collision; and he therefore lay at Newcastle doing nothing. It was agreed that three commissioners on the part of Monk should be allowed to come up to London to treat with three commissioners on the part of Fleetwood, the nominal commander-in-chief of all the forces. By this delay Monk was enabled to mature his plans and to receive further assistance in men and money from Scotland. Monk's three commissioners pretended to be very confident that he would approve what was agreed upon by Fleetwood's commissioners, namely, that a parliament should be restored and the nation settled again in the ways of peace. The committee of safety proceeded in preparing a form of government; but there was no reconciling their conflicting theories, and views, and interests. "Vane," says Whitelock, "was hard to be satisfied, and did much stick to his own apprehensions." Fresh letters came from Monk to Fleetwood full of compliments and expressions of his earnest desire for a speedy settlement, but stating that what had been agreed upon by his commissioners was not quite enough—that some things remained untreated of and unagreed upon—that he wished for a fresh treaty to put a final end to the business. Some of the committee declared that this was only a delay in Monk to gain time to be the better prepared for his design to bring in the king, and to reduce the English army and party into greater straits for want of money, while he was getting pay for his forces. "And, therefore," continues Whitelock, who had himself a principal share in these deliberations, "they advised to fall upon Monk presently, and bring the matter to an issue before his soldiers were more confirmed, and Fleetwood's party more discouraged; but this advice was not taken, but a new treaty assented to, by commissioners on each part, to be at Newcastle."

This was on the last day of November: on the 4th of December some of the forces about London began to clamor for want of pay, and to favor the proceedings of Monk for restoring the parliament—an enchanting word—"and still," adds Whitelock, "the forces in the north were not well settled." On the next day disturbances took place in London, and when some forces were marched into the city to keep the peace, the soldiers were insulted by the multitude, and killed two of the rabble; and on the same day intelligence was received that the governor and garrison of Portsmouth had declared for the parliament. Still, the general council of officers sat devising forms for a new parliament and schemes of government, republican and impracticable. On the 9th of December they received a petition from the city, "desiring to have such a parliament as was in 1642," which would have been a parliament with an enormous Presbyterian majority. The officers laid aside this petition as a design to bring in the common enemy; and on the next day they voted that a parliament should be called before February next, to sit and act according to such qualifications as should be agreed upon. On the 13th they agreed upon seven articles—1. That there should be no kingship. 2. That there should be no single person as chief magistrate. 3. That the army should be continued. 4. That there should be no imposition upon conscience. 5. No House of Peers. 6. That the legislative and executive powers should be in distinct hands. 7. That parliament should be elected by the people. On the 15th their proclamation for a parliament was solemnly published, and the committee of safety was required to issue out writs for the elections; an attempt was made to surprise the Tower, but failed; and a rising was put down in Sussex. On the 17th Admiral Lawson, who had brought his ships into the Thames, required that the Long Parliament should sit again; whereupon Vane and others were sent to him "to inform him better." Two royalist attempts at insurrection, one at Bristol, the other at Colchester, were prevented. But distraction and confusion grew on all sides; and by degrees the unpaid troops began to join the royalists, whom they were sent to suppress. "No quiet," says Whitelock, "was enjoyed by any party: all were at work, and the king's party very active. And every man was guided by his own fancy or interest. . . . Many wished themselves out of these daily hazards, but knew not how to get free of them."[1]

On the 22d of December, most of the soldiery about London declared that they would have the parliament sit again in honor, freedom, and safety; and those who had recently most favored the Lord-general Fleetwood were now most violent against him. At this critical moment Whitelock—who for some time had been convinced that Monk's design was to bring in the king, and that, too, without terms for the parliament party; that the inclinations of the Presbyterians generally, of the citizens of London, of most of the parliament's old friends, and a great part of the soldiery, tended the same way; and that Monk would easily delude Hazelrig and the rest of the parliament men—suggested to Fleetwood, since the coming in of the king was unavoidable, that it would be more prudent for Fleetwood and his friends to be the instruments for bringing him in than to leave it to Monk; and then he proposed that Fleetwood should immediately send some person of trust to the king at Breda, and invite him to return upon conditions. The arguments used by the lawyer were weighty:—by this means Fleetwood might make terms with the king for the preservation of himself, his friends, and, in a good measure, of the cause in which they had all been engaged; but if it were left to Monk, they, and all that had been done for civil and religious liberty, would be left to the danger of destruction. Fleetwood was convinced, "and seemed fully satisfied to send Whitelock to the king; and desired Whitelock to go and prepare himself forthwith for the journey." But before Whitelock got across the threshold, Vane, Desborough, and Berry came into the room, and, after a private conversation with them, which lasted a quarter of an hour, Fleetwood called Whitelock back, "and in much passion said to him, 'I can not do it, I can not do it.'" Whitelock asked his reasons. "These gentlemen," said the weak but honorable Fleetwood, "have remembered me; and it is true that I am engaged not to do any such thing without my Lord Lambert's consent." Whitelock replied, that Lambert was at too great a distance to have his consent to this business, which must be acted instantly, or not at all. Fleetwood again said, "I can not do it without him." "Then," said Whitelock, "you will ruin yourself and your friends." To which Fleetwood replied, that he could not help it, that his word was pledged; and so they parted.

On the very next day (the 23d), Colonel Ingoldsby and some others advised Whitelock to run away to Breda, with the great seal, as Littleton had run away with it to York; but the very cautious lawyer declined this expedition.

On the same day, some of the members of the old council of state, and the old speaker, Lenthall, seeing that the soldiers were all revolting from Fleetwood, gave orders for a rendezvous in Lincoln's Inn Fields, under Colonel Okey and Colonel Alured, whose affection to the Rump was well known. There was also received intelligence that Hazelrig and the revolted forces of Portsmouth intended speedily to come up to London.

On the morrow, the troops under Okey and Alured halted in Lincoln's Inn, opposite to the house of the speaker, gave him three cheers, saluted him with a volley, and took the word of command from him. Lenthall was now, in effect, commander-in-chief in London; and he lost no time in securing the Tower, and in convincing the common council, the citizens, and the soldiery, that the best thing that could be done was to restore the Rump. And two days after this (on the 26th), the speaker, and the members that were in town, met at Whitehall, and walked altogether to the parliament-house, the soldiers, who not long before had forcibly kept them from sitting, now saluting them and shouting joyfully as they passed.

On the 29th, Hazelrig, who had marched up from Portsmouth, took his seat in the House in his riding-habit, and "was very jocund and high." In fact he and his colleagues were wonderfully elated; and, instead of providing against Monk, they fell upon their opponents of the army: by one vote they dismissed Lambert, Desborough, Ashfield, Berry, and other officers, from their commands, and ordered them to retire to their several houses "farther off from London;" and they also voted that Sir Harry Vane, who had adhered to the council of officers and the army, because he was wise enough to see that there was nothing else to prevent the triumph of Monk and the return of Charles without conditions, should be sequestered from his seat, and confined to his house at Raby, in the county of Durham, during the pleasure of parliament.

A.D. 1660. On the 2d of January the House voted that a bill should be prepared for renouncing anew the title of Charles Stuart, and of all of the line of the late King James; yet on the 6th they received a letter from Monk, promising all obedience and faithfulness to this parliament; and, in their infatuation, they voted Monk a letter of thanks, and desired him to come up to London as soon as he could. At York, Fairfax, the late lord-general, waited upon Monk, and expressed his great willingness to contribute to the restoration of the Stuarts, against whose tyranny he had fought in many a bloody field. By the 26th of January Monk was at Northampton, where he protested that he was but a servant to the parliament in a military capacity. On the 28th he was at St. Albans, where he again expressed all duty and obedience to the parliament. But, after keeping a day of fasting and prayer, he wrote from St. Albans to require that all the soldiers of the English army that were in or about London should be removed, to make room for the godly and right-minded soldiers he was bringing with him from Scotland. The Rump ordered the troops out of town accordingly, and made Monk keeper of St. James's Park, having a few days before sought to please him by recommending Mr. Gamble, his chaplain, to be a fellow of Eton College. But some of the foot-soldiers would not march out to make room for Monk, and, falling into a mutiny, they kept Somerset House as a garrison; but being assured of a month's pay, and cajoled by their colonel, these men were quieted, and marched off; and on the same day Monk marched into London in all state, with his horse and foot; and then the king's party talked very high, saying they were sure the king would be in England very shortly. Although Monk carefully concealed his intention of immediately recalling Charles, he soon opened the eyes of Hazelrig and that party to the monstrous blunder they had committed. "It pleased him," says Whitelock, "that the secluded members of the Long Parliament should sit again; and neither Hazelrig nor Scot, nor any of that party, could prevail with him to the contrary, nor durst any to oppose him; and the spirit of the people generally, especially of the Presbyterians, ran that way, and the cavaliers agreed to it, as the way to bring in the king." Indeed the London apprentices had been up in arms for this object; and Presbyterian petitions had been poured in for the reconstruction of the parliament as it was before Pride's Purge and the king's trial, when they and their brethren were the majority.

On the 21st of February the secluded members took their seats in the House; and from that moment the members of the Rump began to think of providing for their personal safety. Many of them absented themselves, and gave up the field to the Presbyterians without a struggle.[1] This majority voted in rapid succession, that Monk, their patron, should be commander-in-chief of all the forces in England, Scotland, and Ireland; that all the proceedings of parliament since their seclusion should be null and void; that Presbyterianism should be the one and sole religion; and that the league and covenant, without any amendment or toleration, should be posted up in all churches.

[1] Ludlow, Hazelrig, and some others of the republicans, took the alarm when they saw Monk restore the secluded Presbyterians, and Ludlow resolved to make him a visit, in order, he says, "to make a more perfect discovery of his intentions." When this very short-sighted republican urged the duty of fidelity and zeal for the common good, Monk replied, with great unction, "Yea, we must live and die together for a commonwealth." But Monk had taken care to place a stout footman at the door, fearing that Ludlow might deal with him as his conscience told him he deserved. Soon after, Monk, in an interview with Hazelrig, grasping Sir Arthur by the hand, exclaimed, "I do here protest to you, in the presence of these gentlemen, that I will oppose to the utmost the setting up of Charles Stuart, a single person, or a House of Peers." And, after this, expostulating on their suspicions, he said, "What is it that I have done in bringing these members into the House? Are they not the same that brought the king to the block!—though others cut off his head, and that justly."—Ludlow's Memoirs. Ludlow, shifting the blame from himself, charges Hazelrig with being Monk's dupe, and with indulging in unmanly despondence

On the 16th of March they passed an act for dissolving this parliament, with a proviso not to infringe the rights of the House of Peers. Writs were then issued for a new parliament, which was to meet on the 20th of April; and then Monk finished his bargain with Charles the Second—giving advice but imposing no conditions—throwing the fate of the country at the feet of a dissolute and unprincipled man.

On the 24th of April, the day before the meeting of the new parliament, Lambert, who had proved most satisfactorily that he was not a Cromwell, was shut up in the Tower, after an insane attempt at insurrection. When the parliament met, ten peers took their seats in their own House, confirmed the appointments of Monk, and voted a day of fasting to seek God for his blessing upon the approaching settlement of the nation. This was agreed to by the Commons, who no longer challenged their title and rights.

Circular letters were then sent for the other peers, who came up to Westminster by degrees, till the House, which had been so long empty, was nearly full. The distinction between those who had borne arms for the parliament, and those who had borne arms for the king, now seemed obliterated, and Presbyterian peers sat side by side with those who had always adhered to the liturgy and the established church. In the Lower House the Presbyterians formed an overwhelming majority, for the elections had no longer been controlled by the army, which absorbed in itself nearly all the republicanism of the country. Sir Harbottle Grimston was elected speaker, was conducted to the chair by Monk and Hollis, and the House showed the utmost readiness in agreeing with the restored peers. On the 26th of April the two Houses gave orders for a day of thanksgiving to God "for raising up Monk and other instruments of rescuing this nation from thraldom and misery," and voted thanks to Monk "for his eminent and unparalleled services." On the 1st of May, Sir John Granville, who had been employed for some time in the negotiations or bargainings between Charles the Second and the general, arrived again from Breda, and presented himself with royal dispatches at Monk's house. Monk, who continued to wear the mask when it was no longer necessary, would not open the dispatches there, but ordered Granville to present them to him in the midst of the council of state. This was done; and, to carry on the farce, Granville was put under arrest—but, lo! it was proved that the letters were really from the king himself, and that they contained very upright and very satisfactory intentions; and Granville was released from custody, and the letters were sent down to parliament, and there read in the name of the king. One of these epistles was addressed to the House of Lords, another to the Commons, one to Monk, and another to the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of London. The letter to the Commons contained the famous "Declaration of Breda," offering indemnity for the past and liberty of conscience for the future. This document, which will be noticed more at length in the next period of our history, was the only pledge that this parliament thought it necessary to require from a prince who had already proved, in many cases, that his royal word was not worth more than that of his father had been before him. Some time before this the zealous Presbyterians had been reminded that Charles's religion was at best but a devotion to prelacy; that he had been too long under the wing of his mother, too long in France and Flanders, "the most Jesuited place in the world," to have preserved even his Arminianism in a pure state; and that those of the Presbyterian judgment and covenant could expect nothing but certain ruin to their ways and their persons by a clenching and closing with such inconsistent principles; that the Independents, who had grown up under them, had hitherto allowed the men of their party as much freedom as they enjoyed themselves, and had admitted them to an equal participation in that grand privilege, liberty of conscience, which they could never hope to enjoy under the restored Charles; that the royalists would never leave "buzzing in his ear, to quicken his memory," that the interest of the Presbyterian party was in its infancy founded in Scotland upon the ruin of his great-grandmother, continued and improved in England by the perpetual vexation of his grandfather, and at length prosecuted to the decapitating of his father; and that the inevitable consequence of the Restoration would be the loss of all kinds of liberty and the utter ruin of the Presbyterians.[1] But heated and blinded by their loyalty, the Presbyterians, who were all-powerful in the Commons, and far from weak in the Lords, disregarded all these warnings, and they named a committee at once to prepare an answer to the king's letter, expressing their joy, the joyful sense of all the House, of his gracious offers, and their humble thanks for them, with professions of their loyalty and duty to his majesty. As for the Lords, they voted thanks to Sir John Granville for bringing these gracious letters; and declared that, according to the ancient and fundamental laws of the kingdom, the government is and ought to be by King, Lords, and Commons, and that some way should instantly be devised how to make up all breaches, and obtain the king's happy return to his people. The Commons forthwith agreed with the Lords in all this; appointed a committee to erase from their journals whatever acts or orders had been made inconsistent therewith; voted the king, who was penniless, the present supply of £50,000; sent a committee into the city to get that money advanced upon security and interest; agreed to an assessment of £70,000 per month for three months, and sent another committee to join the Lords in drawing up an answer to his majesty's most gracious letters and declaration. And at the end of this busy day there was a wonderful lighting of bonfires, ringing of bells, firing of great guns, and drinking of the king's health. Prynne, who had got back into the House, and who could never forget the former tyranny of prelacy from which he had suffered so severely, made a hopeless effort to sober this intoxication; and that upright judge, Sir Matthew Hale, ventured to recommend that some more definite settlement should be made before the king were brought back; but Monk silenced them by telling them that, as the king would come back without either money or troops, there was nothing to fear from him; and no other voice was raised against accepting the "Declaration of Breda" as a full and sufficient security, nor was a word more said about conditions and limitations. On the 2d of May the speaker, Sir Harbottle Grimston, in returning thanks in the name of the House, and giving £500 to Sir John Granville, said, "I need not tell you with what grateful and thankful hearts the Commons, now assembled in parliament, have received his majesty's gracious letter; res ipsa loquitur. You yourself have been ocularis et auricularis testis de rei veritate. Our bells and our bonfires have already begun the proclamation of the majesty's goodness and our joys. We have told the people that our king, the glory of England, is coming home again; and they have resounded it back again in our ears that they are ready, and their hearts are open to receive him. Both parliament and people have cried aloud to the King of kings in their prayers, 'Long live King Charles the Second.'"

The Commons continued running a race with the Lords in this new loyalty: first, they gave leave to Doctor Clarges, a member of their House, to go to the king from Monk, and then they resolved to send twelve of their members to wait upon his majesty. Nor were the lord mayor and common council of London less loyal than the House of Commons: they gave Granville £300, and named some of their council to wait upon his majesty, making all haste to set up the royal statue in Guildhall, and remove the obnoxious arms of the commonwealth. And divers maids of the city petitioned the lord mayor for leave to meet the king in white clothes. Some doubts were entertained of the seamen in the navy: but General Montague, firing himself the first gun, and crying "God save the king!" got a royal salute from all the ships, the men all shouting lustily, "God bless the king!" And then the general gave two pipes of canary to his men.

On the 8th of May Charles was solemnly proclaimed at Westminster Hall gate, the Lords and Commons standing bareheaded by the heralds, while the proclamation was made.

CHAPTER II.

THE HISTORY OF RELIGION.

HE principal matter that remains for this chapter is the history of those rival forms of Protestantism which, in the course of the present period, first overthrew the ancient English church, and then, after their common victory, falling to contention and a trial of strength among themselves, were, in their turn, successively displaced, or attempted to be displaced, the one by the other. These sects may all be regarded as so many varieties of Puritanism, or as the motley brood of the spirit that in the reigns of Elizabeth and James was usually called by that name, and the origin and early progress of which have been already sketched in the preceding Book. The Puritanism that made its appearance in England after the establishment of the Reformation was, it may be remembered, chiefly derived from Geneva, where the severe theology of Calvin had struck deep root in the congenial soil, and flourished amain in the keen air of republican institutions. Directly from this fountain-head came also the Puritanism of Scotland; for Knox, the great leader of the Reformation in that country, was a disciple of Calvin, and had been for some years the pastor of the English Calvinists at Geneva. The principle of the Calvinistic or

Presbyterian system of ecclesiastical polity was kept wholly out of the scheme of the English reformed church, on its restoration under Elizabeth, by the exclusive selection of its heads and rulers from those of the returned exiles who had belonged to the Lutheran congregation at Frankfort. The friends of the Geneva worship and discipline were thus in England either driven out of the national church altogether, or, if they remained in communion with it (which they generally did), were forced to refrain, to a great extent, for the sake of peace, from propagating or acting upon their peculiar opinions. It is true that, even thus circumstanced, they preserved a strong spirit of Puritanism within the country, and fostered, both among the clergy and among the people, that aversion to the ritual and government of the established church which eventually broke out into open dissent and separation. But in Scotland the ascendency of Knox and his friends made the Reformation thoroughly Puritanical from the beginning, at least in so far as both the clergy and the mass of the people were concerned; and all that the government could do in resistance to the vehement course of the national feeling was to ward off for a time the actual establishment of a purely Presbyterian church, and to endeavor to maintain somewhat of the outward form of an opposite polity in association with the spirit and even many of the usages of the Geneva discipline. The restraint, however, which was thus put upon Presbyterianism in Scotland was so far from being sufficient to subdue its strength or temper, that it was only thereby irritated to a preternatural inflammation and ferocity, which made it the more restless under its bonds, and also the more able to break them asunder, the longer they enthralled it. It became, like a strong river dammed up, ready, whenever it should burst the fast-failing barrier that confined it, to precipitate itself in a raging and all-devouring inundation. But for the prodigious impetuosity with which the tide of Puritanism thus came rushing on from Scotland, it may be very much doubted if the less accumulated force of English dissent would have ever prevailed over the established church, or perhaps even risen with any very formidable violence against it, although, when the two streams joined their waters, the more diffused and sluggish naturally caught the fury of the other, and their united volume rolled along with a doubly tremendous power. Presbyterianism, also, in imitation of what had been previously done by the people of Scotland, was the first shape in which triumphant Puritanism exhibited itself in England after its overthrow of the old establishment; and, notwithstanding both the influence subsequently acquired by independency in the government, and the spread of that and other sects among the people, the national church, and also the national sentiment, continued to be, in the main, Presbyterian until the restoration of Episcopacy. This particular form of Puritanism, therefore, is the first subject we have now to take up; and a retrospect of the history of the Scottish kirk during the reign of James in his native country will most fitly introduce us to the scene of the subsequent contentions between Presbytery and Episcopacy in both kingdoms. Such an inquiry is calculated to throw light upon the whole course of events in the track of time we have been surveying; for, long before the civil war was begun by the Scots in the latter part of the reign of King Charles, the leaders of the opposition to the measures of the court in the English parliament were, it is well ascertained, in intimate confederacy with the ecclesiastical agitators in Scotland, and the movements of each party were generally taken in concert with the other. Yet no part of our history has been so much neglected, and consequently misrepresented, by the generality of our historians.

The Scottish Solomon proved himself to be a person of lax principle, or no principle at all, in too many ways to leave us any excuse for charging him with acts of dissimulation or other obliquity which he never committed. "When the Long Parliament addressed King Charles to set up Presbytery in the room of Episcopacy," says a writer, whose misrepresentations do not commonly assume so bold or passionate a tone, "his majesty objected his coronation oath, in which he had sworn to maintain the clergy in their rights and privileges; but King James had no such scruples of conscience, for, without so much as asking the consent of parliament, general assembly, or people, he entered upon the most effectual measures to subvert the kirk discipline which he had sworn to maintain, with hands lifted up to Heaven, at his coronation, and had afterward solemnly subscribed, with his queen and family, in the year 1581 and 1590."[1] James's coronation took place when he was an infant of thirteen months old; so that his hands, if they had been lifted to Heaven at all upon that occasion, must have been held up by his nurse. But in truth it was not the baby king, but the lords Morton and Home for him, that took the new coronation oath, to maintain and defend the religion then professed.[2] And what was the religion at this time legally established in Scotland? It was not Presbytery. Popery and the mass, indeed, had been abolished by parliament seven years before, and a Protestant confession of faith and doctrine had been solemnly adopted. But Episcopacy had not been put down. Even if Knox's First Book of Discipline, with its twelve Superintendents, is to be regarded as having delineated a scheme of Presbyterian church government, that scheme never had received the sanction of the state. It is true that the general assembly had, from the first evinced a jealousy or dislike of the episcopal office; but that feeling had never been shared by the parliament, and bishops continued to be appointed, upon vacancies, to all the sees as usual. The account in the printed Calderwood omits all notice of the circumstance; but at this very coronation of James, while the sermon was preached by John Knox, the acts of crowning and of anointing were performed by the Bishop of Orkney, assisted by two of the superintendents. The anointing was strongly objected to by Knox and the clergy, as a Jewish ceremony; but it was persisted in notwithstanding.[1] It appears, therefore, that the form of ecclesiastical polity to which James at his coronation did not swear himself, but was sworn by his proxies, was Episcopacy and not Presbytery.

And such, for many years, continued to be the established religion of the kingdom. The importunities of the assembly were urgent and incessant enough; but they were not listened to either by any one of the four successive regents, Murray, Lennox, Mar, and Morton, that governed the country during the king's minority—more or less zealously Protestant as they all were, or professed to be—or by James himself after he took the management of affairs into his own hands. The bulk of the revenues of most of the sees, indeed, was diverted into lay hands, through flagitious arrangements made with the holders by powerful barons or creatures of the court, whom the weakness or profligacy of the government permitted so to make traffic of the appointments; but the order of bishops was perseveringly kept up in the face of all the outcry the general assembly could raise upon the subject. The opposition of that body, indeed, sustained, as it indubitably was, by the general feeling of the country, waxed fiercer and fiercer every year. In the beginning it had been hardly more than a reluctance to acknowledge the episcopal office as subsisting in the national church. The assembly which met at Edinburgh on the 29th of June, 1562, being the third of these councils of the reformed national church, admitted Alexander Gordon, bishop of Galloway, as superintendent of that district, but only upon the petition of the kirks therein situated: from which, as Calderwood remarks, it may be perceived, that his old episcopal office was not held to give him the right of exercising any clerical jurisdiction. "Further," adds the historian, "he is not styled simply bishop, but, as it were by a note of diminution, who is called bishop, to wit, by custom and vulgar speech of the people, calling any man a bishop that possesseth the bishop's benefice."[2] In 1564, the assembly, in the same spirit, petitioned the queen "that no bishopric, abbacy, priory, deanery, provostry, or other benefice having more churches than one annexed thereto, should be disposed in time coming to any one man; but that, the churches thereof being dissolved, the same should be provided to several persons, so as every man having charge may serve at his own church, according to his vocation."[3] In 1566 they addressed a supplication to the nobility and lords of secret council, "professing Christ with them, and who had renounced the Roman antichrist," against a commission lately granted, by which, as they declare, "that conjured enemy of Jesus Christ, and cruel murderer of our dear brethren, who is falsely styled Archbishop of St. Andrew's, is reponed and restored, by signature passed, to his former tyranny; for, not only are his ancient jurisdictions, as they are termed, of the whole bishopric of St. Andrew's granted to him, but also the execution of judgment, confirmation of testaments, and donation of benefices, as more amply in his signature is expressed."[1] But this archbishop—the unfortunate Hamilton, who, a few years afterward, finished his course on the gibbet—was a papist as well as a bishop. The same assembly did not hesitate to send an affectionate letter, drawn up by Knox, "to their brethren, the bishops and pastors of England," requesting them, indeed, to deal gently with those of their number who objected to the use of the canonical habits, but not absolutely denying the lawfulness of the said apparel, and admitting that the question as to whether it was to be accounted among things indifferent appeared to be agitated with greater vehemence by both parties in the English church than they could themselves approve of.[2] A few years after they would not have gone so far in the way of concession either to prelacy or to the "Romish rags" of the surplice, corner-cap, and tippet.

This letter, as we have said, was penned by Knox. Its spirit is decidedly Calvinistic and anti-episcopal; the great Scottish reformer, who had refused a bishopric from Edward VI., lays no restraint upon the expression of his cordial preference for a church divested of all "worldly pomp," and of his scorn for the "vain trifles" which appeared to be held among the essentials of religion by the heads of the English establishment. He even makes bold to characterize the habits that were objected to as "the dregs of that Roman beast"—"the print and mark of that odious beast"—which every Christian man ought "to fear either to take in his hand or forehead;" and he exhorts his English brethren "to deal more wisely than to trouble the godly with such vanities; for all things," he adds, "which seem lawful edify not; . . . all civil authority hath not ever the light of God shining before their eyes in their statutes and commandments, but their affections savor too much, sometimes, of the earth and of worldly wisdom. Therefore, we think that ye ought boldly oppose yourselves, not only to all power that dare extol itself against God, but also against all such as dare burden the consciences of the faithful further than God hath burdened them in his own word." But still we have not here the unqualified and uncompromising condemnation, the vehement intolerance of episcopacy, as almost a kind of antichrist or accursed thing, which came afterward to be the profession of the Scotch national church. On the contrary, Knox and the other members, lay and clerical, of this general assembly, as we have seen, style the bishops of England their brethren, and distinctly recognize their hierarchical establishment as a branch of the same church of Christ to which they themselves belong. And such, it may be asserted, continued to be the state of feeling even among the most zealous of the Scottish clergy so long as Knox lived. Soon after the violent death of Archbishop Hamilton, in 1570, Mr. John Douglas, rector of the University of St. Andrew's, was presented to the see, through the procurement of the Earl of Morton, to whom its temporalities had been granted by the crown. The earl retained the bulk of the revenues, and Douglas was obliged to be satisfied with a small pension in addition to the dignity. Morton, however, was determined that his substitute, though a very poor, should not be a mere nominal archbishop. A parliament having met at Stirling in the end of August, 1571, the superintendent of Fife, Calderwood tells us, inhibited Douglas from voting in name of the kirk under the pain of excommunication; but Morton commanded him to vote, under the pain of treason. Probably it was part of the bargain that the earl should have the archbishop's vote in parliament, as well as the pecuniary profits of the see. This affair eventually led to an important change in the constitution of the national church. Douglas, finding himself opposed in his attempts to levy certain duties belonging to his archbishopric by the collector of the stipends of the clergy, for whose support the parliament had ordered a third of the ancient revenues of the church to be reserved, applied to his patron, Morton, who was, indeed, much more interested in the matter than himself, and through his influence got an order from the Regent Mar, prohibiting, in the mean time, the collection of any dues for the parochial clergy within the diocese of St. Andrew's. A letter, which was written upon this occasion to the regent by John Erskine, the famous laird of Dun, will show the point to which the most attached and resolute champions of the Scottish church as yet carried their hostility to episcopacy. After maintaining that no prince could, by his own authority, set up men in spiritual offices, whether as bishops or pastors—that right being one that belonged to the church alone—Erskine reminded the regent that the continual petition of the kirk had been, that whenever any of the great benefices, having many kirks joined to them, should become vacant, "all the kirks should be divided, and severally disposed to several men, to serve every man at his own kirk; in which mind," he adds, "all that bear office in the kirk continue;" but if such dismembering of great benefices can not be granted at this time, he doubts not, he says, but the kirk will consent that the benefices and offices joined thereto, being conferred with its own concurrence, may have such profits assigned to them "as may be spared above the reasonable sustentation of the ministers of the kirks of such benefices, till further order be taken in these matters." [1] Here is not, it will be perceived, no more than in the letter of the assembly of 1566 to the clergy of England, any absolute protestation against episcopacy in all circumstances. The writer's opinion as to its inexpediency and unprofitableness is clearly enough indicated; but the only thing that he absolutely protests against is the induction of bishops without the concurrence of the church. "I can not," he says in conclusion, "but lament from my very heart a great misorder used in Stirling at the last parliament, in creating bishops, placing them, and giving them vote in parliament as bishops, in despite of the kirk, and high contempt of God, the kirk opposing herself against that misorder." The next general assembly had been appointed to meet at St. Andrew's on the 6th of March, 1572; but, by desire of the regent, the usual number of the ministers, superintendents, and commissioners from towns and kirks convened at Leith, on the 12th of January, for settling the policy of the kirk, and determind in their second sitting that their convention should have the force and strength of a general assembly, and that all things might be treated and concluded therein that used to be treated and concluded in any general assembly. On the 16th of January the regent granted power and commission to the Earl of Morton, chancellor, Lord Ruthven, treasurer, Adam, bishop of Orkney, and other five persons, or any four of the whole number, to treat and come to an arrangement with this convention of the church, or any commissioners whom it should authorize, "anent all matters tending to the ordering and establishing of the policy of the kirk, the sustentation of the ministers, and support of the king's majesty and common affairs of the realm, to continue in such order as shall be agreed upon till his highness' (the king's) perfect age, or till the same be altered and abolished by the three estates in parliament, promitting to hold firm and stable all and whatsomever the said commissioners do and conclude in the premises." Let us see, then, what was the ecclesiastical constitution now agreed upon and established by the concurrence of the church and the state. In the first place, it was resolved that no innovation should be made in the titles of archbishops and bishops, nor in the bounds of dioceses, but that in these respects all things "should stand and continue in time coming as they did before the reformation of religion; at the least till the king's majority, or consent of parliament." Deans and chapters were annexed to all metropolitan and cathedral seats. The only restraint put upon the archbishops and bishops was, that, in the mean time, till further order were taken, they should exercise no other spiritual jurisdiction than the superintendents were accustomed to exercise; and that, generally, they should be subject to the kirk, and the general assembly thereof, in spiritualibus, as they were to the king in temporalibus. Even abbacies, priories, and nunneries were preserved: it was only ordained that, if it were possible, such a portion of the revenues should be assigned to the support of the parochial clergy as should be found reasonable, and should be appointed by the bishop or superintendent within whose province the religious house lay, and such of the king's majesty's council as should be directed to accord with him thereon—a cold and cautious provision, from which very little was to be looked for. "As for the remanent profit and title of the benefice," it was further laid down by the commissioners, "because the possessor must supply the place of one of the ecclesiastical estate in parliament, they think it needful that he who shall have the style, title, and place of abbot, prior, and commendator, be well learned and qualified; and for trial of his qualification, that the king's letters commendatory under the signet shall be directed to the archbishop or bishop of the province wherein the abbacy or priory lieth, to try and examine his learning and ability; and upon testimonial of his ability from the ordinar, he shall compear before the king or his regent, and give his oath in form as the bishop doeth; and then shall the king's letters and provisions under the great seal be expede, directed to the ordinar bishop of the province, or others bruiking [enjoying] the dignities or inferior office in the seat, to give him collation." Persons so admitted as commendators were allowed to be appointed senators of the college of justice, or to be employed by the king in the necessary affairs of the commonwealth. Another clause directed the manner of creating a bishop, which was to be by the dean and chapter formally electing the person nominated in a letter or precept from the king or his regent; the only liberty of objection or hesitation allowed to them being, that, in case the royal nominee should not be found qualified, they might humbly crave and require his majesty, with all convenient expedition, to nominate another. But, to render this liberty of no avail, it does not appear that any provision was made for the nominee being examined by the chapter. So much regard was even had to the rights of all the existing holders of deaneries, canonries, and prebendaries, that although only those of them that had entered the ministry of the reformed church were to continue to exercise their functions, yet the others who still continued papists were not to be displaced, nor successors appointed to them, till they should depart this life. "Here ye see," says the old Presbyterian historian, in concluding his account of the new settlement, "this book for the most part concerneth the provision of the old titles of archbishops, bishops, deans, archdeacons, chancellors, and such like, to ministers; and of abbacies and priories to other qualified persons, to vote in parliament as persons of ecclesiastical estate. Here is a fair show of restoring benefices of cure, great and small, to the kirk; but, in effect, it was to restore only titles, which noblemen perceived could not be given conveniently to themselves; but they gripped to the commodity, in obtaining from the titulars either temporal lands, feued to themselves, or tithes or pensions to their servants or dependers. And, therefore, the bishops admitted according to this new order were called in jest tulchan bishops. A tulchan is a calf's skin filled full of straw to cause the cow to give milk."[1]

This scheme of church government was allowed and approved of by the regent, in the name of the king, on the 1st of February. On the 6th, for which day the chapter had been summoned, Douglas was formally elected archbishop of St. Andrew's, whither his patron, Morton, had taken care to proceed a few days before, that his personal direction and influence might not be wanting in the management of the business. Calderwood says that there was a great debate in the chapter, and that many of the ministers opposed the election of the rector. But the boldest act appears to have been that of Mr. Patrick Adamson, who, upon Friday, the 8th, "discontented," says Calderwood, "because he was not preferred to a bishopric, as he expected, in his sermon divided bishops in three sorts—My Lord Bishop, My Lord's Bishop, and The Lord's Bishop. My Lord Bishop, said he, was in time of papistry; My Lord's Bishop is now, when my lord getteth the fat of the benefice, and the bishop serveth for a portion out of the benefice, to make my lord's right sure; The Lord's Bishop is the true minister of the Gospel." This was a somewhat precipitate jest of Adamson, who, three or four years after, stepped into Douglas's place, and became a My Lord's Bishop himself.

Knox, now fast approaching the end of his career, was at this time resident in St. Andrew's, and there can be no doubt that he was far from approving of the new constitution that had been thus imposed on the church of which he was the great founder. Calderwood says that he preached upon Sunday, the 10th, the day of Douglas's induction; and "the Earl of Morton being present, refused to inaugurate the bishop—yea, in open audience of many then present, he denounced anathema to the giver and anathema to the receiver;" "as I find," adds the historian, "in a certain manuscript." But Knox assuredly did not carry his disapproval so far as either to resist or anathematize the general system of the new polity; on the contrary, there is extant a letter written by him to the next general assembly, which met at Perth in the beginning of August, in which we find him distinctly expressing his acquiescence in, or submission to, the arrangements recently made at Leith, and that even before they had received the sanction of the assembly. He requests the assembly, which he was in too weak a state of health to attend in person, to make suit to the regent, among other things, that "no gift of any bishopric or other benefice be given to any person contrary to the tenor of the acts made in the time of the first regent of good memory (Murray), and they that are given contrar the said acts, or to any unqualified person, may be revoked and made null be an act of secret council; and that all bishoprics so vakand may be presented, and qualified persons nominat thereunto, within a year after the vaking thereof, according to the order taken in Leith be the commissioners of the nobility and of the kirk in the month of January last."[1] These are his own deliberately recorded words, which are not to be explained away either by any loose, unauthenticated hearsays, or by any mere general reasoning.[2] Even from what Calderwood himself afterward relates, it should appear that Knox's main objection to the appointment of Douglas to the primacy was to the individual, and probably, also, to the circumstances of his understood bargain with Morton, rather than to the office. When he learned, we are told, that the assembly had determined to allow Douglas to continue for another year to hold the place of rector of the university along with his archbishopric, "he lamented that so many offices were laid upon the back of an old man, which twenty men of the best gifts were not able to bear, and said he would be disgraced and wracked."[1] The venerable reformer breathed his last at Edinburgh on the 24th of November following. Meanwhile the general assembly had consented to receive the new ecclesiastical constitution as an interim arrangement till further and more perfect order might be obtained at the hands of the regent and nobility; only qualifying their acceptance with the expression of some scruples touching the names of archbishop, dean, archdeacon, &c., which, it is said, "were thought slanderous and offensive to the ears of many of the brethren, appearing to sound to papistry." They proposed that the Chapter should be called the Bishop's Assembly, the Dean the Moderator of the said assembly, &c.; and, also, that the names of abbots and priors should be interchanged into others more agreeable to God's word and the policy of the best reformed kirks.

Such remained the legally established constitution of the Scottish church when King James, in 1578, assumed the government into his own hands. The general assembly, indeed, as has been already observed, had been all the while growing more and more indisposed toward episcopacy, and had both passed many strong resolutions against bishops in general, and led most of the individuals of the order a terrible life by incessant inquisitions into their conduct. In the assembly of 1574 Archbishop Douglas was delated for various offenses—among others, for neither visiting his diocese of Fife, nor preaching in the city of St. Andrew's, where he resided. In excuse, he alledged his infirmity of body; and this seems to have got him off, though, as Calderwood notes, with much relish, "sundry smiled when he said, that, since he took on the same bishopric, he was never well disposed." In the same assembly, Paton, bishop of Dunkeld, having confessed his oversight in not executing the sentence of excommunication against the Earl of Athole and his lady, both papists, was enjoined, by way of penance, to repeat his confession publicly upon a Sabbath-day, in time of divine service, in his own cathedral church. In the next assembly, Gordon, bishop of Galloway, was in like manner ordered to make confession of some misconduct "in presence of the congregation convened in the Abbey Kirk, upon the Lord's Day next to come, without sackcloth." In the assembly which met at Edinburgh in August, 1575, the first approaches were made to a direct attack upon the episcopal office by John Durie, one of the ministers of Edinburgh, who moved for and obtained a committee to consider "whether the bishops, as they are now in Scotland, have their function from the word of God or not; or if the chapters, ordained for the creating of them, ought to be tolerated in this reformed kirk." Spotswood says that Durie was stirred up to propound this question by "Mr. Andrew Melvil, who was lately come from Geneva; a man learned chiefly in the tongues, but hot and eager upon any thing he went about, laboring with a burning desire to bring into this church the Presbyterial discipline of Geneva." There were six bishops present in the assembly; but it does not appear, to quote Spotswood's expressions, "that they did so much as open their mouths in defense of their office and calling." The committee, whose report was sustained by the assembly, deemed it inexpedient at the moment to give a direct answer to the question; but they pretty significantly intimated the complexion of their opinion by declaring the name of a bishop to be "common to every one that hath a particular flock over which he hath a particular charge as well to preach the word as to minister the sacrament;" in other words, they distinctly proclaimed the Presbyterian doctrine, that every clergyman is a bishop, and that that is the only scriptural meaning of the term. In the next assembly, which met in April, 1576, the Archbishop of Glasgow was cited to make answer to one of the most popular charges against his order, that of rarely preaching. With an edifying humility, the archbishop answered, "that preaching is the great gift of God, which is not equally bestowed upon all; and excused himself that he was not so able, nor so liberally doted with understanding, as others;"[1] and he seems to have appeased the court, for the present, by expressing his willingness to do his best for the future. It was now, however, ordered that all those of the bishops who had not yet received the charge of particular congregations should immediately declare "what particular flocks they would accept to take the care of;" and my lords of Glasgow, Ross, and Dunblane deemed it prudent each to make choice of a parish church within his diocese, in conformity with this enactment. Still, however, the government steadily refused its sanction to these proceedings. While the clergy were occupying themselves in devising a new scheme of ecclesiastical polity, which they hoped to force upon the civil authorities, the regent (Morton) "was often required," says Calderwood, "to give his presence to the assemblies for furtherance of the work; but he refused, yea, threatened, some of the most zealous of the ministry. He misliked general assemblies, and would have had the name changed, that he might enervate the force and privilege of them. He could not endure the free and open rebuke of sin in the pulpit. He ever resisted the work of policy which was in hand, because it was not agreeable to his fantasy; he maintained his bishops, and pressed his own injunctions and conformity with England; and had, without question, stayed the work of God, if God had not stirred up a faction of the nobility against him." "Yet," adds this strong party writer (and the testimony in favor of Morton is very weighty and remarkable, coming from such a quarter), "he was a man of deep judgment, stout, courageous, and ever for the cause of religion; but that he was set for the estate of bishops, and against free application of doctrine. His administration of justice was such, that the time of his regiment was esteemed to be as peaceable as ever Scotland saw before."

The weakness of the government, arising out of the contention of parties for some years after the revolution that first effected Morton's temporary overthrow, and then after he had regained his ascendency, took from him both his power and his life, afforded the clergy a favorable opportunity of urging with increased boldness their favorite innovations in the polity of the church, of which they did not fail to avail themselves. The assembly which met in April, 1579, hoping before their next meeting to be able to extort from the government the entire abolition of episcopacy, ordained that all bishops and others bearing ecclesiastical functions should for the future be called by their own names; and prohibited, in the mean time, all ministers and chapters from proceeding in any ways to the election of bishops, under pain of perpetual deprivation. And at the next assembly it was unanimously resolved that "the said act shall be extended to all times to come, aye, and till the corruption of the state of bishops be utterly removed;" and that all bishops already elected should submit themselves immediately to the assembly "concerning the reformation of that estate of bishops in their person," under pain of excommunication. The next assembly, which met at Edinburgh in October, 1578, drew up an enumeration of the special reforms which they demanded in the estate of bishops, to the following effect:—"That they be content to be parsons and ministers of one flock; that they usurp no criminal jurisdiction; that they vote not in parliament in name of the kirk without advice from the assembly; that they lift not up for the maintenance of their ambition and riotousness, the emoluments of the kirk, which may sustain many pastors, the schools, and the poor, but be content with reasonable livings according to their office; that they claim not to themselves the title of temporal lords nor usurp temporal jurisdiction, whereby they may be abstracted from their office; that they empire not above particular elderships, but be subject to the same; that they usurp not the power of presbyteries; that they take no further bounds of visitation than the kirk had committed to them."[1]

But to these demands of the church the government still persisted in turning the same deaf ear as before. and that whichsoever faction might be for the time at the head of affairs. In July, 1579, while he was again in the hands of Morton, the young king wrote what Calderwood calls "a harsh letter" to the assembly, earnestly exhorting them to refrain from disturbing the public peace by agitating innovations in the policy of the kirk in a time "subject to so many difficulties and imperfections;" but to remit all such matters to be reasoned and decided upon by the estates of the kingdom in parliament. In 1580, however, after Morton's second and final expulsion from the government, "the whole assembly, in one voice," as the act recites, "after liberty given to all men to reason the matter, none opposing themselves in defense of the said pretended office," declared the office of bishop, "as it is now used and commonly taken within this realm," to be "unlawful in itself, as having neither foundament, ground, nor warrant in the Word of God;" and ordered "that all such persons as brook [enjoy] or hereafter shall brook the said office be charged simpliciter to demit, quit, and leave off the samine, as an office whereunto they are not called by God;" and even to desist from preaching, or performing any part of the office of pastors, till admitted thereunto anew by the assembly, under pain of excommunication.

In January, 1581, a transaction occurred which has been generally misrepresented by Presbyterian and puritanical writers—James's subscription to the formula called the Second Confession of Faith, or, sometimes, the King's Confession. Because this instrument expressed an abjuration of "the hierarchy of the Roman antichrist," it has been contended that James, in subscribing it, abjured episcopacy, or a hierarchical church government in every form. The history of the Confession, as well as its language, sufficiently confutes this interpretation. It was drawn up at James's own command by his domestic chaplain, Mr. John Craig, for the purpose of allaying the clerical and popular outcry occasioned by the suspicions entertained as to the religion of the new foreign favorite, D'Aubigné, or, as he was by this time styled, the Earl of Lennox. The king—as yet, it is to be remembered, only a boy of thirteen—had, on D'Aubigné's first arrival, taken great pains to quiet the murmurs which the appearance at court of an avowed papist immediately awakened. He "called the ministers to Edinburgh," Spotswood tells us, "and showed them what travail he had taken to convert his cousin, and how he had obtained his consent for taking a minister in his house, which would be to good purpose, and serve both to debar Jesuits from access to the nobleman, and win him by conference to a greater liking of the truth, desiring therefore that one of their number might be appointed for some short space to attend him. Calderwood says that Lennox had before this obtained a dispensation from the king "not to be troubled for religion for a whole year," that he might attend to certain pressing temporal affairs; and that he vexed the church courts of Edinburgh and Lothian with letters from the king, calling their attention to the said dispensation. No doubt Lennox would have been very well content to let the church courts alone, if they would have left him at peace. However, after a short time, he deemed it best to make a profession of conformity to the established religion. In July, 1580, he sent a letter to the assembly, informing them "that it had pleased God to call him to the knowledge of the truth since he came to this country, and that he had made open declaration thereof, first by his own mouth in the kirk of (St. Giles's) Edinburgh, and, secondly, by his own hand-writ at [1] Calderwood, p. 85. Spotswood tells us that now "the small respect carried to bishops in these assemblies of the church made them dishaunt and come no more unto the same."—Hist. p. 303.

Stirling—yet offered to perform what the assembly required further for the accomplishment of the said confession, to procure and advance all other things according to his power, that may serve for the glory of God and weal of the kirk and country." "But," adds Calderwood, "when he subscribed the articles of religion, and communicated, little understood he what he heard. Notwithstanding of his subscription, he brought with him, and had in his company, papists by profession, but indeed atheists, which were entertained with him almost till his departure out of the country." Spotswood informs us that the still unremoved suspicions and jealousies of the people respecting his real faith "were increased by the intercepting of certain dispensations sent from Rome, whereby the Catholics were permitted to promise, swear, subscribe, and do what else should be required of them, so as in mind they continued firm, and did use their diligence to advance in secret the Roman faith." It was in these circumstances, as we have said, that in January following James ordered the new confession to be drawn up, and after subscribing it himself, made all his household append their names to it—that of Lennox, for whose especial behoof the whole proceeding was devised, being placed at the head of the list. About a month after, an order was issued, charging the people of all ranks to subscribe the king's confession. And it may have been subscribed by Presbyterians and Episcopalians with equal willingness; for it was so expressed, that both the one and the other might interpret it in their own sense. The subscriber merely declared his abhorrence and detestation of certain popish doctrines and ceremonies, as they were damned by the word of God and the Scottish church. But what was the Scottish church was left for every man to settle with himself according to his own notion. If the Presbyterian considered it to be the general assembly, the Episcopalian had at least as good a right to regard it as being the system of national religion and ecclesiastical polity set up by act of parliament, and actually maintained by the state. Upon this question, therefore, the confession was really altogether of a negative character; and indeed it came afterward, in the heat of the controversy between episcopacy and presbytery, to be commonly known by the name of the Negative Confession.

In August, 1582, the success of the Raid of Ruthven, overthrowing the power of Lennox and Arran, and consigning James himself to durance in the hands of the opposite faction, intoxicated the clergy as with the arrival of a sudden millennium. Presbytery, long held down by a hostile and oppressive government, seemed now to be on the point of rending its bonds, and scattering forever from the face of the land all obstacles that stood in the way of its undivided ascendency. Its historian narrates with a fervent pen the blessed change this revolution brought with it to the struggling church:—"Since the late enterprise of the Lords Reformers, liberty was renewed to the ministers to preach the word freely, to exercise discipline, and to hold ecclesiastical assemblies. Papists, Jesuits, excommunicated persons, licentious libertines, old enemies to this crown and to the friendship standing between the two realms, either left the country and the court, or stooped in silence with external reverence to the word."[1] Low enough, we may be assured, and with all demureness of aspect, they would be forced to stoop before the frown of such a despotism as had now gotten the upper hand. The general assembly, also, upon a formal account being laid before them of the proceedings of the conspirators, had hastened to pass an act, declaring that "they had done good and acceptable service to God, to their sovereign, and to their native country," and directing every minister to exhort the people from the pulpit to stand by the men who had now obtained possession of the king's person, as the deliverers of the kirk and commonwealth. However, this state of things did not last long. In June following the king made his escape from Falkland, and threw himself into the castle of St. Andrew's, whither his friends of the opposite faction immediately gathered about him in such strength as to set all chance of his recapture at defiance.[2] The Earl of Mar and his associates, the authors of the Raid, had, not in fact, during their ten months' tenure of power, done much more than allow the clergy to hope for the abolition of episcopacy; no steps had actually been taken to bring about that change in the ecclesiastical constitution; but even what of hope and present freedom had cheered them was now taken away. The aspect of the restored government was hostile from the first. The general assembly, having met at Edinburgh in October, drew out a long statement of grievances, which they sent to Stirling to the king; but "the commissioners," says Calderwood, "returned with small contentment." Soon after, John Durie, already mentioned as one of the ministers of Edinburgh, was cited before the council for having in a sermon publicly justified the Raid. At first, according to Spotswood, "he stood to the defense of that he had spoken; yet after advice taken with Mr. James Lawson, his colleague, he was moved to submit himself to the king." He was in the end ordered to remove from Edinburgh to Montrose, "whereunto he yielded," says Calderwood, "after the council of the town and session of the kirk had given him a testimonal approving of his life and doctrine." In the beginning of the next year came on "the greater business" of Mr. Andrew Melvil, who was summoned before the council for words spoken by him in a sermon preached at St. Andrew's. According to his own account of what he said—of the truth of which none who know the character of the man will doubt—there was nothing in it at which offense could be justly taken; but, waiving this defense, the fiery Calvinist at once took his stand upon the principle, that no civil court had any jurisdiction over a clergyman for words spoken by him in the discharge of his ministerial office.[1] The scene that took place in the council when he urged this plea is graphically given by Calderwood:—"After the giving in of the declinature, the king and the Earl of Arran, then chancellor, raged. Mr. Andrew, never a whit dashed, said, in plain terms, that they were too bold, in a constitute Christian kirk, to pass by the pastors, prophets, and doctors, and to take upon them to judge the doctrine and to control the ambassadors and messengers of a greater than was here. That ye may see your own weakness and rashness, in taking upon you that which ye neither ought nor can do (loosing a little Hebrew Bible from his girdle, and laying it down before the king and his chancellor upon the table), there are, said he, my instructions and warrant; see if any of you can control me that I have passed my injunctions. The chancellor, opening the book, passeth it in the king's hand, saying, Sir, he scorneth your majesty and the council. Nay, sayeth he, I scorn not, but am in good earnest." Here we see flaming out the true spirit of presbytery, which, while opposed to any representation of the clergy in parliament, had always sought to erect the church into a power independent of, and, in its own province, superior to the state—an arrangement which would afford an abundant compensation for the denial of political power of the ordinary kind. Melvil, finding himself helpless in the hands of his enemies, escaped imprisonment by flying to England.

[2] Calderwood here tells the following story:—"Mr. Patrick Adamson, called commonly Bishop of St. Andrew's, had keeped his castle, like a fox in a hole, a long time, diseased of a fedity, as he himself called his disease. He sought cure of women suspected of witchcraft, namely of one who was apprehended, tried by the Presbytery, and committed to the castle to be kept to further trial, but suffered by him to escape: yet was she apprehended within three or four years after, and was executed in Edinburgh. He keeped his castle since the assembly holden in April 1582. When the king cometh to St. Andrew's, he becometh a whole man, occupied the pulpit incontinent, declaimed before the king against the ministry and the lords and their proceeding. He professed before that he had not the gift of application; now he applieth, but inspired with another spirit than faithful ministers use to be. In his sermon he affirmed for certain that the Duke of Lennox died a Protestant, having in his hand a scroll, which he called the Duke's Testament. A merchantwoman, sitting before the pulpit, and spying narrowly, affirmed that the scroll was a count of four or five years' old debt, which a few days before she had sent to him."—Hist. p. 141.

After the Raid of Ruthven had been declared by parliament to be treason, some of the clergy ventured to meet at St. Andrew's on the 24th of April, 1584, to hold a general assembly; but their number was very few. "The king sent to them," says Calderwood, "a fiery commissioner, Mr. J. Graham, of Haleyards, Justice Depute." On being required to annul the act approving of the Raid, most of the members left the town; and some of the more obnoxious fled to England, upon which they were proclaimed rebels. On the 22d of May a parliament met, in which Adamson and Montgomery took their seats as archbishops of St. Andrew's and Glasgow, and in which acts were passed making the declining of the jurisdiction of the privy council, the pretending an exemption from the authority of the civil courts, or the attempting to diminish the rights and privileges of any of the three estates of the realm, high treason; and the holding assemblies without the king's permission or appointment, a capital crime. All persons were also prohibited, under pain of capital punishment, from presuming to utter any thing in sermons, or in any other declamations or conferences, public or private, to the dishonor, hurt, or prejudice of the king or his progenitors, or so much as to meddle with affairs of state at all. These acts for the present laid the church bound and helpless at the foot of the throne. In another parliament, held in August following, it was enacted that all ministers should, within forty days, subscribe a declaration of their approval of the acts of the last parliament, and submit themselves to the bishops their ordinaries, under pain of losing their stipends. Upon this all the ministers of Edinburgh abandoned their charges, and, with many others of their brethren, the most eminent for their learning, piety, and popular eloquence, sought an asylum in the sister kingdom.

Nor did the revolution which happened in the end of the following year, by the return from England of the lords concerned in the Raid, and the final removal of Arran and his faction, bring about any immediate change in the condition of the humbled church. The parliament having met at Linlithgow, in December 1585, "for ratifying the peace, and abolishing the memory of things past," "the ministers" Spotswood tells us, "who returned in company of the lords, did earnestly urge the repealing of the acts concluded the year preceding against their discipline, which the king did utterly refuse." Calderwood says that James threatened, taunted, and reviled the petitioning ministers, calling them "loons (rascals), smakes (pitiful fellows), and seditious knaves." The lords, who had now got the government into their hands, were next applied to, and reminded both of their duty and their former promises and professions. "They answered," says our historian, "they must first be settled in their own places, and then they should work wonders. . . . The Master of Glammis, upon whose wit the rest depended, said, it was not expedient to thraw (extort) out of the king, so much addicted to the government of bishops, any reformation for the present, but to procure it by time with his own consent; and that the ministers should see a redress in another parliament. So they were careful every one for their own peculiar estate, more than for the kirk of God." In answer to a representation of the clergy, James set to work in his cabinet, and spent "the space of twenty-four hours" in penning a Declaration, in the conclusion of which he said, "I mind not to cut away any liberty granted by God to his kirk. I acclaim not to myself to be judge of doctrine in religion, salvation, heresies, or true interpretation of Scripture. I allow not a bishop according to the traditions of men, or inventions of the pope, but only according to God's word." He insisted, however, upon a bishop having the right of voting in parliament and council, and enjoying "some prelation and dignity above his brethren, as was in the primitive kirk;" and in reply to the appeal of the clergy to Scripture upon this matter, he did not omit to twit them with the want of any scriptural authority for their own proposed scheme of having certain ministers elected by the rest as commissioners to vote in parliament. "Well," said the royal declaimer, "God purge your spirits from ambition, and other indecent affections for your calling, and give you grace to preach, in all humility and simplicity, his word and verity." The zealous clergy, however, would not yet be silent; some were called before the council and committed to prison; with others James took a different course. A few weeks after he had put forth his above-mentioned Declaration, the following singular occurrence took place:—"Upon the 2d day of January, 1586, the king rebuked Mr. Walter Balcanquel publicly after sermon in the great kirk, and said he would prove that there should be bishops, and spiritual magistrates endued with authority over ministers; and that he (Balcanquel) had not done his duty in condemning that which he (the king) had done in parliament. Mr. Walter undertook to prove the contrare."[1]

James, however, soon became wearied of this contest, and being, as Spotswood expresses it, "very desirous to be at rest with the church," he called together a general assembly at Edinburgh, in the beginning of May. In this council some concessions were made on both sides. It had been previously agreed, at a conference held between some of the clergy and certain persons commissioned by the king and the council, that bishops should be continued as a distinct order in the church, and that their election should be by presentation directed by his majesty to the general assembly, by which body they should thereupon receive admission; and this arrangement was now assented to by the assembly, with only a few qualifications, reserving a certain authority in spiritual matters to the synods and presbyteries, but not touching either the civil functions and preëminence of the bishops, or their appointment by the uncontrolled nomination of the crown. In order, at the same time, to put the best possible face upon the proceeding, it was voted, "after reasoning," that the name of a bishop hath a special charge annexed to it by the word of God, the same that the ordinary pastor hath—that it was lawful to the general assembly to admit a pastor, bishop, or minister having a benefice, presented by the king's majesty to the same—and that by the name bishop was to be understood only such a bishop as was described by St. Paul. The reader will observe the dexterity with which these propositions were framed, so as to have the semblance of meaning something while they actually meant nothing.

Still, such as they were, they were the propositions or resolutions of the assembly merely, and were yet unsanctioned by any act of the legislature. The legally established religion of the country was still episcopacy, without even any admixture of presbytery; and in this state the matter remained for some years. A heavy blow, however, was in 1587 struck at the order of bishops, by an act of parliament wrung from James's pecuniary necessities, by which the temporalities of benefices and all the church lands that remained unalienated were annexed to the crown, the tithes alone being reserved for the maintenance of the persons serving the cures. This act was confessedly urged by the leading nobility, at once from the most selfish motives and upon the most hypocritical pretexts. While the king was made to believe that he would find an ample revenue in the patrimony of the church, and the people were told that such a resource would for the future enable the crown almost to dispense with the ordinary taxes, the real object kept in view by the instigators of the annexation was the transference of the property in question into their own hands. The design was sufficiently indicated even on the face of the statute, one of the clauses of which contained a general confirmation of all past grants of church lands to individual noblemen and others, most of such grants having been till now understood to be held by a very precarious tenure. And it was not long before nearly all the new property that now came into the possession of the crown was in like manner begged from it, and alienated in perpetuity to the great families and hungry courtiers—to the very men who had in the first instance counseled its seizure under pretense of the public good. Afterward, James himself, when he had seen this and other consequences of the annexation, denounced it, in his "Basilicon Doron," as "a vile and pernicious act." It was such an act, however, as, once passed, it was almost impossible to repeal. Of its publicly-predicted effects, by which, when it was first proposed, its authors secured the popular voice in its favor, there was only one that was actually fulfilled. Calderwood notices that it was thought a great benefit to the kirk, inasmuch as, if it passed, it was conceived the kirk would be no more troubled with bishops. "Privately," says Spotswood, "to such of the ministry as sought the subversion of episcopal government, it was whispered that this was the only way to undo the prelacy; for there being no livings to maintain them (as in this case there would be little or nothing remaining, most of the bishoprics being founded on temporal lands, and having but churches annexed), none would be found to accept those places, which also proved true." The act of annexation reduced the power and the very institution of bishops from a substance to a shadow—from a real thing to a mere name.

In name and form, however, episcopacy was still the church government established by law. Thus, although the people were generally Presbyterians, we find no recognition of presbytery in what was called the "General Band," which was subscribed by the king, the council, and all classes, the following year, on the approach of the Spanish Armada. This national bond, a solemn compact of the same kind with the more famous covenant of fifty years later date, contained only the same abjuration of popery, and vow, in general terms, to maintain "the true and Christian religion, presently professed within this our realm," which had formed the matter of the king's confession of faith of the year 1581. The failure of the great Spanish enterprise was followed in Scotland by a succession of plots and disturbances on the part of the popish faction within the country, the leaders of which were proved to be in confederacy with persons of their own religion abroad; and James excited some popular dissatisfaction and murmuring by the lenity which he showed in repressing and punishing these attempts. He took considerable pains in various ways to dissipate these suspicions of his Protestantism, and particularly after his return from Denmark, in 1590, with his newly-wooed, won, and wedded queen—very vain of the unusual spirit he had shown in that affair, and also in unusual good humor with the clergy for the successful exertions some of their leaders had made in preserving the public tranquillity during his absence—he presented himself in the general assembly, which met at Edinburgh in August, and there delivered himself of the speech in laudation of the purity of the Scottish kirk, which has been already given in our preceding chapter.[1] Although the episcopal historian Spotswood, in his report of the king's speech on this occasion, has nothing of the rhapsodical effusion preserved by Calderwood, it is probable that something like it was actually spoken by James, who already, as we have seen, had set up for a great theologian, and was all his life the most irretentive of talkers. His address was also, no doubt, intended to produce upon the assembly an impression of his favorable disposition, at least toward the doctrines and ritual of the kirk—"to please the assembly," as Calderwood expressly notes: and it had that effect; for, after he had finished, "there was nothing heard for a quarter of an hour," says Calderwood, "but praising God and praying for the king." There was nothing, however, either in this speech or in any thing else that James now said or did, from which it could have been warrantably inferred that he had abandoned his old predilection for episcopacy, and become a Presbyterian on the point of church government. Even while going as far as he could in the way of complaisance and acquiescence, he altogether, as we see, avoids this ground. He declares himself for Calvinism in the matter of doctrine, and he also gratifies his auditory by a fling at the English Prayer Book; but it is not pretended that, even in the highest flow of his eloquence, he said a word against the bishops. In this very assembly Calderwood admits that the answers he made to certain propositions about ratifying the liberties of the kirk, &c., "did little content the assembly." Upon that head, in fact, he would promise nothing. And only a few months before he had sufficiently shown how little he was inclined to go along with the kirk in its notions either as to bishops or as to ceremonies, by the order he insisted upon being observed at the coronation of the queen, which was celebrated in the Abbey Church, on the 17th of May. "The particulars," says Calderwood, "because accustomed, I pass by." But they are, nevertheless, worth noticing. The same dispute that happened at James's own coronation again arose, and terminated in the same way. The clergy at first vehemently objected to the ceremony of anointing, but James insisted that it should not be omitted, and threatened that, if they would not allow one of their own number to perform it, he would send for one of the bishops to officiate. In the end her majesty was solemnly crowned, with all the accustomed rites, the anointing included, by Mr. Robert Bruce, one of the ministers of Edinburgh.[1]

It was not possible, however, that, in the condition to which things had now been brought—with the fabric of the episcopal government wholly undermined by the abstraction of the temporalities of the bishops—the triumph of Presbyterianism could be much longer deferred. Accordingly, in June, 1592, in a very disturbed state of public affairs, James was reluctantly induced to give his assent to an act of parliament, abrogating and annulling the acts touching the government and discipline of the church made in the year 1584, and giving for the first time a legal establishment to the system of general assemblies, synods, or provincial assemblies, presbyteries, and kirk sessions. Yet, although this statute established presbytery, it did not in fact abolish episcopacy. On the contrary, a petition of the general assembly, "that abbots, priors, and other prelates, pretending the title of the kirk, and voting for the same without their power or commission, be not suffered in time coming to vote for the same, either in parliament or any other convention," met with no attention.[2] Most of the ecclesiastical powers hitherto lodged by law in the bishops were transferred to the presbyteries and other church courts; but their temporal or civil status was left untouched. Nor were the liberties granted to the Presbyterian church by any means such as to place it in that position of entire independence of the state which would have satisfied the notions of the clergy as to the rights of "the true kirk." While the full power of collection to benefices, for example, was given to presbyteries, they were "bound and astricted to receive and admit whatsomever qualified minister presented by his majesty or laick patrons." And upon the great point of the meeting of the supreme ecclesiastical court, which the church had always contended for the right of calling together when and as often as it pleased, it was merely enacted that "it shall be lawful to the kirk and ministers, every year at the least, and oftener, pro re nata, as occasion and necessity shall require, to hold and keep general assemblies, providing that the king's majesty, or his commissioner appointed by his highness to be present at ilk general assembly, before the dissolving thereof, nominate and appoint time and place when and where the next general assembly shall be holden." This, it may be observed in passing, is still the law under which the assemblies of the Scottish church are convened; but the old Presbyterian principle also continues to this hour to be asserted, in words at least, by the church, whose officer, the moderator or presiding clergyman, as soon as his Grace the Lord Commissioner has declared the assembly to be dissolved and appointed it to meet again on a certain day in the following year in the name of the sovereign, always rises and convokes it for the same day in the name of Jesus Christ.

Both in religion and in politics it generally happens that a principle or a sect, which has long been struggling for legal recognition and establishment, assumes altogether a new character after the achievement of that object—the fiery impetuosity of its former innovating and overturning propensities now giving place to the stationary, repressive, and cautious instincts of conservatism. But whether it was something in the circumstances of the time, or some peculiar obstinacy and untameableness inherent in the nature of presbytery, it is certain that the Scottish kirk, after having been thus taken under the protection of the state, only assumed a more rampant attitude than ever. The course pursued by the clergy for the next three or four years was one continued effort, not only to throw off all authority of the civil power in whatever they chose to call a matter appertaining to religion—under which description they comprehended whatever should be said or done by any one of themselves in the performance of his spiritual office—but even to mount upon the back of the state, and to exercise a general control over the conduct of public affairs. Indeed, the latter attempt was the necessary consequence of the former; for there can not really be two sovereignties in the same state, and therefore the only way in which the spiritual can be independent of the temporal power is by acquiring the mastery over it. James had been forced to consent to a qualified establishment of presbytery; but he himself neither became, nor professed to become, a Presbyterian any more than he was before; and the struggle between the crown and the parliament on the one side, and the church courts and the clergy on the other, only grew more violent and acrimonious than ever.

One chief ground of dissatisfaction which the church had with the king was the lenity of his treatment of the earls of Huntley, Angus, Errol, and other popish lords, whose practices still continued to disturb the government and the country. James, conceiving that much of his chance of succeeding to the English crown depended upon the support of the Catholic party, which was naturally attached to him as the representative of his mother, shrunk from doing any thing which might lose him their favor, and was, on that account, anxious rather to come to terms with Huntley and his associates, and to win them over by forgiveness to be good subjects, than to exterminate or severely punish them. But this policy the kirk looked upon with abhorrence. The provincial synod of Fife, which Calderwood calls "the most vigilant synod within the kingdom in these dangerous times," having met at St. Andrew's, in September, 1593, after drawing up, by way of preface, a long representation of public grievances, directed certain of their members, with all convenient diligence, to repair to the king, "to tell plainly to his majesty that which all his true subjects think touching his too much bearing with, favoring, and countenancing of papistical traitors; his negligence in repressing of idolatry, and establishing of the kingdom of Christ within this realm; and to declare freely to his majesty the mind and resolution of all his godly and faithful subjects within this province, that they are ready to give their lives rather than suffer the same to be polluted with idolatry and overrun with bloody papists." This death's-head and cross-bones defiance of the government was accompanied by another proceeding still more extraordinary—the excommunication of the three popish earls and other two gentlemen of their party, which was solemnly pronounced, in the name of the synod, by their moderator, Mr. James Melvin, or Melvile.[1] The principal grounds on which this provincial and subordinate court asserted its right to pass such an act were, that the three earls had in their youth studied at the university of St. Andrew's, and had afterward been married in Fife! James, as Calderwood tells us, was highly offended with the sentence of excommunication; but it was ratified, nevertheless, by the general assembly which met at Edinburgh in May following, and all pastors throughout the realm were ordered to intimate it from their pulpits, that none might pretend ignorance. For the present, the popular feeling of rage against popery, which was the strength of the clergy, ran so high that James was forced to yield, or to appear to yield, to the tide. But at this very moment he openly showed that his own religion continued to be, not presbytery, but episcopacy, by the order that was taken for the baptism of his son, the infant Prince Henry, which was celebrated in the Chapel Royal, at Stirling, on the 30th of August this year. "The solemnities used in the time of baptism, and at the banquet, I omit," says Calderwood, after his customary fashion. But, in fact, the ceremony was performed, not by a Presbyterian clergyman, but by Cunningham, bishop of Aberdeen. The child was then committed to the care of the Lady Livingstone, who was so far from being a good Presbyterian, that she was not even a Protestant.[2]

The clergy, however, although the opposition of the court somewhat restrained the high hand with which they would have controlled the whole course of public affairs, met with no serious check till the year 1596. "The kirk," says her historian, "was now come to the greatest purity that ever it attained unto; so that her beauty was admirable to foreign kirks. But the devil, envying the happiness and laudable proceedings of the ministry and assemblies of the kirk, stirred up both papists and politicians to disturb her peace." In point of fact, the disturbance may be much more justly said to have come from the side of the kirk herself. Calderwood admits, or rather boasts, that "the papists perceived there was no rest for them in Scotland, if the authority of the kirk continued." And, as for politicians, the country certainly contained none so restless as the clergy themselves.

[2] There has been some controversy about the manner in which James's other children were baptized. Neither Calderwood nor Spotswood mention who officiated in the case of Charles, who was baptized at Dunfermline, in 1600; but, according to a statement, said to be drawn up by John Blinsele, Ilay herald, and to be preserved in the Lyon's Office at Edinburgh, the rite was performed by David Lindsay, bishop of Ross. This statement was first printed in a work called "The Royal Martyr a True Christian," by Henry Cantrel, London, 1716; and was afterward referred to as an authentic document by Caste. Harris, in his life of Charles I. (p. 3, note), denounces it as "an arrant forgery;" but some circumstances have since been adduced which are rather corroborative of its authenticity. See D'Israeli's Commentaries on the Life and Reign of Charles I., London, 1828, i. 11. It is most probable, at any rate, from James's position in reference to the Presbyterian clergy at the time, that both Charles and his eldest sister, the Princess Elizabeth, were baptized by episcopal hands.

But before coming to the change in the fortunes of the church which the historian laments, we meet with a very curious exposition of some of the features of that "purity and beauty" he had just before been celebrating in a statement of "the corruptions and enormities of the ministry" which was published by the general assembly of 1596. In this paper are noticed, among a variety of other crying evils, the intrusion into the church of many ministers forced upon congregations by presentation, who afterward manifested that they were not called by God (for remedy of which it is ingeniously recommended that a law be passed prohibiting any from seeking presentation to benefices without the advice of the presbytery within the bounds of which the benefice lieth); and the existence in the bosom of the establishment of some clergymen not given to their book, in their sermons obscure and too scholastic, cold, and wanting zeal, flatterers, dissembling at public sins, and especially of great persons within their congregation, for flattery or for fear; of others "light and wanton in behavior, as in gorgeous and light apparel, in speeches, and in using light and profane company, unlawful gaming, as dancing, carding, dicing, and such like;" of others described as "swearers or banners, profaners of the Sabbath, drunkards, fighters, &c.;" of others "given to unlawful and incompetent trades and occupations for filthy gain, as holding of hostelries (inns), taking of usury beside conscience and good laws, bearing worldly offices in noblemen's and gentlemen's houses, merchandise, buying of victuals and keeping to dearth, &c." A scene singularly illustrative of the enthusiasm of the times took place in the assembly on the day when this confession was read and adopted. The members met in the Little Kirk at nine o'clock in the morning, to the number of four hundred persons, "all ministers or choice professors," when so powerful an exhortation was delivered to them by Mr. John Davison, who had drawn up the paper, that the whole assemblage was thrown into an agony of penitential sorrow. "For the space of a quarter of an hour," says Calderwood, "there were such sighs and sobs, with shedding of tears, among the most part, every one provoking another by their example, and the teacher himself by his own, that the kirk resounded. So that the place might worthily have been called Bochim; for the like of that day had not been seen in Scotland since the Reformation, as every one that was present confessed. There have been many days of humiliation for present judgments, or imminent dangers; but the like for sin and defection was never seen since the Reformation." A few days after, a continuation of the statement of corruptions was read and approved of, the first head of which consisted of an enumeration of certain habitual offenses of James and his queen, about which it was at the same time directed that several of the members should be dispatched to confer with their majesties. The blunt plain-speaking of this exposition is inimitable. "First," it said, "as strangers and other good subjects, repairing to the court, have been comforted to see Christian religion religiously exercised, so now they are somewhat troubled, seeing the exercises of the reading of the word at table, and reverent saying of the grace before and after meat, diverse times omitted. That, on the week day, the repairing to hear the word is more rare than before; and that his majesty be admonished to forbear hearing of speeches, in time of sermon, of them that desire to commune with his majesty. Privy meditations in spirit and conscience with God earnestly to be recommended to him. His majesty is blotted with banning and swearing, which is common to courtiers also. . . . . The queen's majesty to be reformed; her company, her not repairing to the word and sacraments, night-waking, balling. And such like concerning her gentlewomen." But to this was tacked another chapter, entitled "The Common Corruptions of all Estates;" the charges contained in which throw those made both against the clergy and the king far into the shade. The first thing bewailed is "an universal coldness and decay of zeal in all estates, joined with ignorance and contempt of the word, ministry, and sacraments;" "and where there is knowledge," it is added, "no sense nor feeling; which showeth itself manifestly by this, that they want religious exercises in their families, as of prayer and of reading of the word, or the same for the most part abused and profaned by cooks, stewards, jackmen, and such like, the masters of the families being ashamed to use these exercises of godliness in their own persons; and no conference at their tables, but of profane, wanton, and worldly matters. Superstition and idolatry," the paper goes on, "is entertained, which appeareth in keeping of festival days, bonfires, pilgrimages, singing of carols at Yule (Christmas)." Other counts of the strange indictment are, "Great blasphemy of the holy name of God among persons of all estates, with horrible banning and cursing in all their speeches; profanation of the Sabbath, and especially in seed-time and harvest, and common journeying on the Sabbath, trysting (making appointments) on worldly matters, exercise of all kind of wanton games, keeping of markets, drinking, and the like." In a subsequent paragraph, along with the familiar charge of "garnelling (or hoarding) of victual, and withholding of the same from the markets," is classed the less intelligible delinquency of "not threshing the corn out in due time." But, in truth, in this part of his performance, Mr. Davison's pen quite runs riot in stringing together its reproaches and invectives. The catalogue ends with the mention of "a great number of idle persons without lawful calling, as pipers, fiddlers, songsters, sorners, pleasants, strong beggars living in harlotry, and having their children unbaptized, and no ways repairing to the word." Then follows a short concluding enumeration of "offenses in the courts and judgment-seats." Here the paper boldly affirms, in the most unqualified terms, that the country groans under the curse of "a universal neglect of justice both in the civil and criminal causes;" that the judges are, "for the most part, unmeet either in respect of want of knowledge, or of conscience, or of both;" and that "when any office vaiketh, the worst men are advanced, both to high and inferior rooms." The Court of Session is openly charged with "buying of places, delaying of justice, and bribery." And there is one other clause worth noting—that which complains of sacrilegious persons, as abbots, priors, dumb bishops, voting in parliament in name of the kirk." The persons here alluded to were most of them laymen, upon whom the titles and temporalities of these offices had been bestowed; but some of the episcopal sees still continued to be occupied by clergymen, and, although others were at present vacant, none of them had been abolished. Presbyterian writers are in general anxious to make it appear that there were no bishops at this time in Scotland.

In September Andrew and James Melvil, and two other clergymen, being the individuals appointed by the general assembly to admonish the king, repaired to him at Falkland, and having been admitted into the royal cabinet, proceeded to discharge their mission. First, Mr. James Melvil spoke a few words, and upon being interrupted by his majesty, "began," says Calderwood, "to reply after his mild manner. But Mr. Andrew taketh the speech from him, and, howbeit the king was in anger, yet he uttered their commission as from the mighty God—called the king God's silly vassal—and, taking him by the sleeve, said this in effect: Sir, we will humbly reverence your majesty always, namely in public, but we have this occasion to be with your majesty in private, and you are brought in extreme danger, both of your life and your own crown, and with you the country and kirk of God is like to be wrecked, for not telling you the truth and giving you a faithful counsel." He then went on to inform James that, although he was indeed a king in a certain sense, yet of Christ's kingdom, which, in the notion of Mr. Andrew, was only another name for the Presbyterian kirk, he was neither "a king, nor a head, nor a lord, but a member; and they," added the arrogant churchman, "whom Christ hath called and commanded to watch over the kirk, and govern his spiritual kingdom, have sufficient authority and power from him so to do, which no Christian king nor prince should control nor discharge, but fortify and assist, otherwise they are not faithful subjects to Christ. Sir, when you were in your swaddling-clouts, Christ reigned freely in this land in spite of all his enemies." James's plan of employing Protestant and papist indifferently in the public service, the fiery presbyter told him in plain terms, was "devilish and pernicious. Because," he exclaimed, with infinite scorn, "the ministers and Protestants in Scotland are too strong, and control the king, they must be weakened and brought low by stirring up a party against them, and the king being equal and indifferent, both shall be fain to flee to him, so shall he be well settled!" This, he declared, was mere and mad folly, and the curse of God could not but light upon it; "so that in seeking both," said he, "you shall lose both." James Melvil, upon whose report Calderwood has narrated this conference, tells us that the king, though at first very angry, "at last settled and dismissed them pleasantly;" no doubt he was very glad to be rid of them; but we may judge if they left him more in love with presbytery than before, or less anxious to shake off such an intolerable tyranny as that of the kirk was now become.

A few weeks after, on the 9th of November, James had another call from Melvil and his three brethren. Among other "griefs" of which they now came to complain, one was, that "the king's common talk was invectives against ministers and their doctrine." To this James replied, "that the ministers themselves gave him occasion to speak of them, never ceasing in their sermons to provoke him, and to disgrace him before the people." The four ministers had come this time as a deputation from a body of clergymen which had been appointed by the commission of the last general assembly to sit permanently in Edinburgh under the name of the Standing Council of the Church, for the purpose of watching the progress of events. On receiving the report of the interview with his majesty, "the brethren of the council," says Calderwood, "perceived clearly that the overthrow of the liberty of Christ's kingdom was intended, and were glad that the king had uttered his meaning so plainly."

It was immediately after this that Mr. David Black, one of the ministers of St. Andrew's, was summoned to appear before the privy council to answer for certain expressions he had been using in his late prayers and sermons. He was charged with having affirmed that the king, in recalling the popish lords, or permitting their return, had discovered the treachery of his heart; that all kings were the devil's bairns (or children), and that the devil was in the court and in the guiders of it; with having said, in praying for the queen, we must pray for her for the fashion, but we have no cause—she will never do us good; with having called the Queen of England an atheist; the lords of session miscreants and bribers; the nobility in the mass degenerated, godless, dissemblers, and enemies to the church; and the members of the king's council holliglasses,[1] cormorants, and men of no religion. This preacher's actions, too, were as energetic as his words, if it was true, as was likewise charged against him, "that he had convocated divers noblemen, barons, and others within St. Andrew's, in the month of June, 1594, and caused them to take arms and divide themselves in troops of horse and foot, and had thereby usurped the power of the king and civil magistrate."[1] Neither Black himself nor his brethren attempted to deny the truth of these charges; but the council of the church resolved that he should decline the judicatory of the civil courts, on the ground that all judgment of doctrine pertained, at least in the first instance, to the pastors of the kirk. The effect of this was to make the matter assume an infinitely greater importance than had at first attached to it—to raise it from being an inquiry into the conduct of an individual to be a contest for the supreme power between the church and the state. With a full sense of the momentousness of the crisis, the clerical council instantly set themselves to bring up all the force of the kirk to fight the great battle. At once, before they could have consulted any of the rest of the clergy, they resolved that Black's "declinature of the king and council's judicature in matters spiritual" should be headed as "given in his own name and in the name of his whole brethren of the ministry." Both in this paper and in others of the same tenor by which it was followed, they claimed exemption from the jurisdiction of the civil courts as a right secured to them by the laws; but they were never able to name any act of parliament to that effect; they took their stand, therefore, in reality upon the high theological argument that the clergy, as the ambassadors and representatives of the Deity, were, by the very reason of the thing, emancipated in regard to whatever they should do in the exercise of their spiritual function from the superintendence or control of any temporal power—an argument the same in substance with that upon which the Hildebrands and the Beckets of popery had founded their similar pretensions. "In the discharge of this commission (of the ministry)," said Black, "I can not fall in reverence of any civil law of man but in so far as I shall be found to have passed the compass of my instructions, which can not be judged, according to the order established by that God of order, but by the prophets (that is, the clergy), whose lips he hath appointed to be the keepers of his heavenly wisdom, and to whom he has subjected the spirits of the prophets." It is plain from this, and from the language of all their other declarations, that what the clergy laid claim to was not merely the right of being first tried in their own courts before the case should be brought by appeal before a civil judicature—a privilege of comparatively little value—but that, by declining the jurisdiction of the temporal magistrate in the first instance as to any thing done by them in the exercise of their ministerial functions, they meant that the ecclesiastical tribunal must first decide that they had "passed the compass of their instructions" before they could in any such case be brought before a civil court at all. If the church should declare that the accused clergyman had done or said nothing but what was warranted by his divine commission, their doctrine clearly was that there was an end of the case—that there could be no appeal. This is a point of very great importance, which has been generally overlooked.

The prosecution of this grand crusade by the clergy did not wholly withdraw them from the other important affairs which they had on hand at the time. It is noted, that "upon the 19th of November, Messrs. Robert Bruce, Andrew Melvin, and John Davidson, were directed by the council of the brethren to deal with the queen: first, touching her religion; next, for dealing for the enemies of the truth—namely, for Huntley; for want of religious exercise and virtuous occupation among her maids; and to move her to hear now and then instruction of godly and discreet men." However, the reverend gentlemen made nothing of this pious attempt; "they went down," adds the account, "but were deferred to another time; because she was then at dancing."[1] Meanwhile Black's declinature was sent to all the presbyteries, and in a very short time was subscribed by between three and four hundred ministers. On the other hand the government proceeded to take the most energetic measures. On the 27th of November an order was issued commanding the chief members of the council of the church to depart from the town within twenty-four hours to their parishes and congregations, and to keep no such unlawful conventions any where as they had done of late, under the pain of rebellion and being put to the horn. Instead of obeying this order, the ministers immediately "convened," says Calderwood, "and laid the letters open before the Lord; and, finding that the general assembly was made, as it were, a judicatory inferior and subaltern to the secret council and session, by discharging of the acts of the assembly and commissioners of the same, therefore ordained the ministers of Edinburgh, and such others as were to occupy the pulpits, to deal mightily with the power of the word against the said charge." On the following day, accordingly, which was Sunday, and also for several days more. "the doctrine," as our historian expresses it, "sounded mightily from all the pulpits." In the excitement of the popular mind thus produced, the resolution of the government seems to have at one time nearly given way. On Wednesday, the 3d of December, after a conference of five hours with the deputies of the clergy, James proposed that the final settlement of the matter should be deferred till the following morning; and "in the meantime he craved that the ministers would forbear sharpness in application, which he feared now because of the fast. This being reported to the commissioners and brethren, they agreed to forbear sharpness in application." But when the king's answer to their propositions was recorded it gave no satisfaction; on the contrary, "the brethren perceiving that there was nothing but driving of time, and thereby the motion of the spirit was abated in the brethren," resolved that there should be no further communing, but that a grave admonition should be addressed to his majesty, which they concluded by protesting before God that they were free of his majesty's blood, and of whatsoever should ensue and come upon the realm in the righteous judgment of God, and that they durst not abstain any longer from fighting against such proceedings with that spiritual armor given to them, potent in God for overthrowing of those bulwarks and mounts erected and set up for the oppugning and sacking of the Lord's Jerusalem." Soon after this, however, the tide of the popular feeling, which had hitherto been with the clergy, began to turn, and their cause received a heavy blow from a tumult that broke out on the 17th. in which the life of the king himself at one time appeared to be in danger, and which was, not without some truth, represented as the consequence of their seditious proceedings: nay, it was even alledged that some of the brethren had been seen actively engaged in the riot. The next day the king retired to Linlithgow; and, a new proclamation being read commanding the ministers to leave Edinburgh under pain of treason, they now deemed it prudent to take their departure. One of them, Mr. Robert Bruce, published a very prolix apology for himself and his brethren on this occasion, in which he vindicated their flight by many reasons drawn both from the Scriptures and the classics; among others by the Greek proverb, He that fleeth will fight again, which, he observed, "requireth a wise foresight in men, and forbids foolhardiness."[1] The pulpits of the capital, however, were not left unoccupied. One dauntless preacher, Mr. John Welsh, is particularly recorded to have mounted that of the High Church, and there thundered forth his maledictions against the king, who, he said, had formerly been possessed with one devil, but that having been put out of him, seven worse were entered in its place; adding that the subjects might lawfully rise and take the sword out of his hand, on the same principle that a father falling into a phrensy might be seized by his children and servants, and tied hand and foot to prevent him from doing mischief; which doctrine, we are told, "was taken by many of the hearers as a sound and free application."[2]

In the end, however, the king obtained a complete victory. Having convened a general assembly at Perth in the end of February, 1597, James there propounded a formidable list of fifty-five questions, in which he went over the whole subject of the respective rights of the clergy and the civil magistrate. These, however, were eventually reduced to thirteen propositions, upon which matters were so managed that a deliverance was obtained from the assembly favorable upon the whole to the king's views; although of nineteen presbyteries of which the house was composed, eight protested even against the meeting being held to be a general assembly at all. According to Calderwood, the votes were carried by an inundation of ministers from the north, who, besides being popishly or episcopally inclined, were practiced upon by agents of the court. It was ordained, among other things, that no minister should take upon him to reprove any of his majesty's statutes or ordinances, until he had first, by advice of his presbytery or other superior church-court, complained and sought remedy of the same from his majesty, and received his majesty's answer; that no man should be publicly rebuked by name in the pulpit, except after trial and conviction for some crime, or when he had fled from the law; that presbyteries should take diligent account that pastors in their preaching kept themselves within the bounds of the word; that, except the customary meetings of sessions, presbyteries, and synods, no convention of the clergy should be held without his majesty's knowledge and consent; and that in all the principal towns the consent of his majesty, as well as that of the congregation, should be necessary in the choice of ministers.[1] "This assembly, and consequently all that flowed from it, or followed thereupon," says Calderwood, "was esteemed by the sincere sort to be null in itself, and of no force nor effect." Only a very few ministers, however, were found bold enough to meet at St. Andrew's on the 27th of April, the day which had been appointed in the usual manner for the holding of the ordinary assembly; and they did nothing except agree that all business should be made over to another assembly, which was to be held at Dundee in the month following, although that also was what Calderwood calls "an assembly of the new fashion," and equally irregular with the late meeting at Perth, by which, indeed, it had been convoked at the king's desire. In this assembly, held at Dundee, the excommunicated lords were absolved;[2] the lawfulness of the late Perth assembly was acknowledged, and its resolutions were all ratified, some additional restrictions being even laid upon the clergy and the church-courts. And before it broke up, a committee of ministers was appointed to confer with the king as often as he should send for them, under color, says Calderwood, "to keep concord between the king and the kirk, and to treat upon all matters serving to that use; but in effect to put to execution the articles already yielded unto by the greater number, to the grief of the better sort." The historian adds, "In a manner the whole power of the general assembly was weakened by this commission; for the commissioners, having access to the king when they pleased, and commission to sit and consult with him, began soon to change their manners. They would rule all, both in and out of general assemblies, as the king pleased. A fit wedge taken out of the kirk to rent (rend) her with her own, and the very needle which drew in the thread of episcopacy."

And, in fact, many months did not elapse before episcopacy was fully restored both in the state and in the church. The parliament met at Edinburgh in December, when, in conformity with a proposition or article presented by the commissioners of the church, an act was passed providing that such pastors and ministers as at any time his majesty should please to nominate to the office, place, title, and dignity of a bishop, abbot, or other prelate,

should hereafter have vote in parliament, "such-like and as freely as any other ecclesiastical prelate had at any time by-gone." As soon as this act was obtained, the commissioners, in the exercise of their authority, summoned a general assembly to meet at Dundee in March following. Here James, presenting himself in person, "had an harangue, wherein he declared what great care he had to adorn and accommodate the kirk, to remove all controversies, to establish the discipline, and to restore the patrimony." "To effectuate this," he said, "it was needful that ministers should have vote in parliament, without which the kirk could not be vindicate from poverty and contempt." Calderwood makes James to have added, "I mind not to bring in papistical or Anglican bishops, but only to have the best and wisest of the ministry, appointed by the general assembly, to have place in council and parliament, to sit upon their own affairs, and not to stand always at the door, like poor supplicants, despised and nothing regarded." "This his intention," says the historian, "he uttered with protestations; and some of the commissioners, especially the same that were aspiring to bishoprics, did the like." But it is impossible to believe, upon the statement of this credulous and inflamed writer, that any such words as these were really uttered by the king; or that, if they were spoken, they could have deceived or been heeded by any one who heard them, after the passing by the parliament of the act that has just been quoted. Something may have been said about the English and popish bishops; but that James could have pretended that he meant to give the nomination of the clergymen who were to vote in parliament to the general assembly, is plainly incredible. It is sufficiently refuted, indeed, by the sequel of Calderwood's own narrative, from which it is evident that in this very assembly the king openly resisted the claim of the church to a voice in the nomination of the proposed parliamentary representatives of the spiritual estate. The act or resolution of the assembly approving of the king's project was carried only by a majority of ten voices, and after a keen debate. "But to what use served reasoning," exclaims our historian, "where men were either won or dashed? Mr. Gilbert Bodie, a drunken Orkney ass, was first called on, and led the ring, when the matter was put to voting, and a great number of the North followed, all for the body, with small regard to the spirit." It was next resolved that the new parliamentary clergy should be fifty-one in number, that having been the number of the bishops, abbots, and priors who had voted in parliament in the time of popery. With regard to the manner of their appointment, all that was concluded was, "after reasoning," that it "ought to be of a mixed nature, and appertain partly to his majesty and partly to the kirk." This is a sufficient proof that James never had, as Calderwood asserts, intimated that the sole appointment should be in the general assembly.[1]

The next assembly was appointed, by royal proclamation, to be held at Montrose in the end of March, 1600, having been prorogued to that date from the day originally fixed in July of the preceding year. In the mean while various signs of the times showed themselves. Calderwood notes, that toward the close of the year 1598 the Bishop of Galloway, who had been a fugitive out of the country ever since the reformation of religion, that is, since 1592, was restored to his honors, rank, and dignities; and that, in the beginning of 1599, even Beatoun, the popish archbishop of Glasgow, was not only restored to his benefice, but sent by the king as his ambassador to the French court. About the same time a proclamation was made at the cross of Edinburgh for liberty of May games. James also expressed, in the most unqualified terms, his abhorrence of Puritanism and his preference for the episcopal form of church government, both in his "True Law of Free Monarchies," published in September, 1598, and in his "Basilicon Doron," printed in the following year. The latter, indeed, although only a few copies of it were in the first instance privately distributed, was brought before the synod of Fife by a clergyman into whose hands it had fallen, and was made the subject of a libel, or formal indictment, as an attack upon the constitution of the church. The reverend court, however, seems to have desisted from prosecuting the matter, when the member who was understood to have brought it forward was summoned to answer for his

[1] Calderwood introduces his account of this "corrupt" assembly with the following curious notice:—"Upon Saturday, the 25th of February, began a fearful eclipse, about nine hours in the morning, which continued about two hours; the whole face of the sun seemed to be covered and darkened about half a quarter of an hour, so that none could read upon a book. The sea and air were still. Fowl flocking together mourned in their kind; the frogs made an hideous noise; people were astonished as if it had been the day of judgment. The like fearful eclipse of the sun, and appearance of falling stars from heaven, were seen in France, when men of chief note were enticed by flattering gifts to agree upon a midst (a compromise) betwixt papists and Protestants: which had been effectuate if God had not cut them off after a strange manner, as Mr. James Melvin observeth in his Memorials." A circumstance recorded by the episcopal annalist, however, is much more fitted to excite the horror of a reader of the present day, and will also be thought to show better than the blackest eclipse how much men's minds were distempered, and the times out of joint. "This summer (1597) there was a great business for the trial of witches. Amongst others, one Margaret Atkin, being apprehended upon suspicion, and threatened with torture, did confess herself guilty. Being examined touching her associates in that trade, she named a few, and, perceiving her delations find credit, made offer to detect the whole of that sort, and to purge the country of them, so she might have her life granted. For the reason of her knowledge, she said, that they had a secret mark, all of that sort, in their eyes, whereby she could surely tell, how soon she looked upon any, whether they were witches or not; and in this she was so far believed, that for the space of three or four months she was carried from town to town to make discoveries in that kind. Many were brought in question by her delations, especially at Glasgow, where divers innocent women, through the credulity of the minister, Mr. John Cowper, were condemned and put to death. In the end she was found to be a mere deceiver—for the same persons that the one day she had declared guilty, the next day being presented in another habit she cleansed—and sent back to Fife, where first she was apprehended. At her trial she affirmed all to be false that she had confessed, and persisted in this to her death; which made many forthink their too great forwardness that way, and moved the king to recall the commissions given out against such persons, discharging all proceedings against them, except in case of voluntary confession, till a solid order should be taken by the estates touching the form that should be kept in their trial."—Spotswood, Hist. p. 448. It deserves to be noted that this same year James had published, at Edinburgh, his Dialogue entitled "Dæmonologie"—moved, as he states, by "the fearful abounding at this time, in this country, of these detestable slaves of the devil, the witches or enchanters."

audacity before the privy council, and, upon being reported to have fled, was proclaimed a rebel. James immediately reprinted the book; "which being come abroad and carried to England," says Archbishop Spotswood, "it can not be said how well the same was accepted, and what an admiration it raised in all men's hearts of him, and of his piety and wisdom."

At the assembly held at Montrose, his majesty again took care to be present in person; and Calderwood says, that, from his rising at an early hour in the morning till he went late to bed at night, he was so busy with ministers, that the courtiers complained they could get no access to him. At last, after a great deal of debate, an act was passed, providing that the parliamentary clergy should be appointed by the king choosing for every place to be filled one person out of a list of six nominated by the general assembly, with liberty to his majesty to reject them all, and to call for a second list, "upon a just reason of insufficiency;" that the person so appointed should at no time presume to propound in parliament, council, or convention, in the name of the kirk, any thing without express warrant from the kirk, under pain of deposition; that he should every year give an account of the discharge of his commission to the assembly; that he should continue the pastor of a particular congregation, upon which he should attend faithfully, and be subject to his presbytery and synod, like any other pastor; and that, if he should be deposed from the ministry by sentence of the assembly, or any other church court, he should lose his vote in parliament, and his benefice should become vacant. It was also ordered, touching his name, that he should be called not a bishop, but a commissioner, if the parliament might be induced to acknowledge that name; if not, the point should be determined by a future general assembly. And the important question of whether he should hold his office for life, or only for a year or some other fixed period, was affected to be settled by the ambiguous enactment, that he should every year lay down his commission at the feet of the assembly, "to be continued or altered by his majesty and the assembly, as the assembly, with consent of his majesty, shall think most expedient for the weal of the kirk"—a regulation which evidently left the matter in the hands of the king, and, with the air of giving a great deal of power to the church, really gave none whatever.

But even these precautionary and restrictive provisions, such as they were, with which the church attempted to defend the Presbyterian polity against the destructive tendency of the late act of parliament, were disregarded as soon as they were enacted. Spotswood, indeed, says with great frankness, "It was neither the king's intention, nor the mind of the wiser sort, to have those cautions stand in force; but, to have matters peaceably ended, and the reformation of the policy made without any noise, the king gave way to these conceits, knowing that with time the utility of the government which he proposed to have established would appear, and trusting that they whom he should place in those rooms would, by their care of the church, and their wise and good behavior, purchase to themselves the authority which appertained."[1] And after noticing the conclusions come to by the assembly at Montrose, he observes, with the same coolness, that "now there rested no more but to nominate persons to the bishoprics that were void." There was, however, one serious difficulty in the way of the said nominations—the want of funds from which to provide incomes for the new bishops. Of the thirteen Scottish sees only two, at this time, Aberdeen and Argyle, were in the hands of clergymen; there were also titular bishops of Dunkeld, Brechin, and Dunblane, but they were laymen; the revenues of the two archiepiscopal sees of St. Andrew's and Glasgow were held by the Duke of Lennox; those of Orkney by the Earl of Orkney; those of Murray by the Lord Spinie. Galloway and the Isles, Spotswood says, were so dilapidated, that there was scarcely any remembrance of their having existed. In Ross and Caithness alone there remained some part of the ancient patrimony unalienated; and these two sees accordingly were the only ones that were filled up in the first instance: Mr. David Lindsay, minister of Leith, being presented to the former, and Mr. George Gladstanes, one of the ministers of St. Andrew's, to the latter. According to Spotswood, these nominations were made with the consent of the church; but the only consent really obtained, or asked, was that of the council of commissioners, already mentioned, which had been renewed by the late general assembly, and which now, as Calderwood observes, "overruled all the affairs of the kirk." The new bishops, according to this last-mentioned writer, "were appointed to vote at the next parliament, in name of the kirk, without any regard had to the caveats and conclusions agreed upon, and without warrant of a general assembly."[2] "But any color," he adds, "was thought sufficient where authority did countenance." The mysterious affair, known by the name of the Gowrie Conspiracy, had just taken place when these appointments were made; and another violent quarrel between James and some of the Edinburgh clergy had arisen out of the uncourtly refusal of the latter to receive with implicit credulity his majesty's own account of his adventures on that occasion.[3] He was consequently, at this particular moment, in the worst possible humor with the kirk.

From this date, however, the opposition of the church-courts to prelacy was for the present silenced at least, if not subdued. King James, so long as he remained in Scotland, contrived to keep the general assembly in wonderful order by various arts of management. His proceedings, indeed, might be considered as indicating not indistinctly an intention of suppressing that body altogether as soon as possible. Instead of a particular time and place being named, at the dissolution of each assembly, for the meeting of the next, it was now the custom, as Calderwood states, "that the king appointed, by proclamations at the market-crosses, assemblies to be holden when and where he pleased." In this way, by summoning the clergy suddenly and unexpectedly, or at inconvenient seasons, he probably aimed both at preventing the attendance of some of those most opposed to the measures of the court, and even gradually loosening the attachment of the country to a system of church government so irregularly and capriciously administered. By close personal attention, also, to ecclesiastical affairs, and by keeping on the best terms with the commission, which had now become the real governing body in the church, already almost superseding the assembly, which it led and controlled, while it was itself, to adopt Calderwood's expression, nothing but the led horse of the king, he succeeded, with little difficulty, in carrying the points upon which he had most set his heart. At first, both the assembly and the other church courts affected the greatest horror at the name of bishop, even after they had been brought to tolerate the thing: in the synod of Fife, for instance, which met at St. Andrew's in February, 1601, Gladstanes, who had been raised to the see of Caithness, was called to account for sitting and voting in parliament under that name, and was fain to make his peace with the court by affirming that he did so against his heart, and only because they would not admit him otherwise; and both he and the other bishops continued to be designated by their common names, as simple pastors, in any acts of the assembly in which they were mentioned. Nor for some time do we find any allusion whatever in these official documents to the episcopacy to which the church had now bent its neck. Even the most zealous denouncers of grievances now scarcely ventured to glance at this master grievance, about which, before it had actually come, they had so long made the land ring with their vehement alarms. Meanwhile, however, the church was by no means without occupation in the grievance line; and the court was probably not averse to its taking its full swing in other directions for a time, in the view of thereby the better securing its forbearance in regard to the matter deemed for the present of main delicacy and importance. Some of its proceedings were abundantly illustrative of the intolerant and inquisitorial spirit which marks so strongly the whole of the early history of presbytery. The assembly, for instance, which met at Burntisland in July, 1601, having taken into consideration the "causes of the defection from the purity, zeal, and practice of true religion, in all estates of the country," ordained, among many other things, that, for discovery of the adversaries of true religion lurking within the country, every presbytery should, immediately after the rising of the assembly, take up the names of all the non-communicants within their bounds, and send them to his majesty's ministers (that is, his chaplains) with all expedition; and that the same thing should in future be done at the meeting of every provincial synod. This same assembly also petitioned the king and council, that all such noblemen and others as sent their sons to be educated out of the country, should send along with them no other pedagogue, or tutor, except one "known godly and of good religion, learned, and instructed in the same, and approved in his religion by the testimonial of his presbytery;" that they should only take up their residence in places where religion (that is, the Protestant religion) was professed, or at the least where the power of the inquisition did not extend; and that "during the time of their absence they should not haunt any idolatrous exercises of religion." In case the son, while abroad, should go to any place in which the profession of the true religion was restrained, it was proposed that the father should be obliged to give security that he would not entertain or support him; and if he should embrace any other religion than that presently professed within the realm of Scotland, that in that case he should not be able to enjoy "moyen, heritage, honors, or offices" within the realm. But the most singular proceeding of this assembly was that adopted in the case of the popish, or alledged popish, lords, Huntley, Errol, Angus, Hume, and Herries; with each of whom one or two clergymen were appointed to reside for a quarter or half a year, in order that by their labors the said noblemen "and their families might be confirmed in the truth, and the enemies debarred from their companies." In the next assembly, which met in the Chapel Royal at Holyrood House, in November, 1602, no very satisfactory report was made by these reverend spies when they were called upon "to give an account of their diligence;" whereupon the assembly thought good to try the experiment again with more care and upon an extended scale. To the lords thus placed under superintendence the last year were now added the Lord Maxwell, the Lord Sempil, and the Earl of Sutherland; and Sempil, if the account given by Calderwood be correct, was to have constantly residing with him, for the three months, the whole presbytery of Irvine and Paisley! Sutherland was also committed to the general surveillance of the presbytery of Edinburgh, but it does not appear that they were all to take up their abode in his house. Certain instructions were, moreover, now drawn up for the direction of the clergymen commissioned to this duty, which prove sufficiently that it was no merely formal superintendence they were to exercise, but an inquisition and watchfulness the most prying, comprehensive, and incessant. "Ye shall address yourselves," this curious paper begins, "with all convenient diligence, and necessary furniture, to enter in their company and families, there to remain with them for the space of three months continually; during which time your principal care shall be, by public doctrine, by reading and interpretation of the Scriptures, ordinarily at their tables, and by conference on all meet occasions, to instruct them in the whole grounds of true religion and godliness, especially in the heads controverted, and confirm them therein." They are afterward directed to take pains to catechise the family every day once or twice at the least, or so often as may bring them to some reasonable measure of knowledge and feeling of religion before the expiring of the three months, beginning and ending the task with prayer; to urge the noblemen to dismiss from their houses all persons of evil life, especially such as are of suspected religion; to persuade them to exert their authority and influence in seeing the discipline of the kirk properly executed, and to have the benefices on their estates supplied with qualified ministers and sufficient provision of stipends; and, finally, to report from time to time how they have profited, and what disposition they are of. The charms of Presbyterianism must have been believed to be irresistible, indeed, if they were thought likely to make any impression in company with the torment of such a persecution as this.

[1] Hist. p. 453. This is said of the caveats, as originally agreed upon in a convention of commissioners from all the synods of the church, held at Falkland in July, 1598; but the articles especially objected to by Spotswood as absurd were retained in the scheme finally adopted by the assembly of 1600.

[2] Hist. p. 446. Calderwood appears to be in error in mentioning the nomination of Mr. Peter Blackburn to the bishopric of Aberdeen as one of the appointments that were now made. Blackburn's elevation does not seem to have taken place till 1603, on the death of Bishop Cunningham, who had occupied the see since 1577.—Alexander Douglas, also, whom he states to have voted as Bishop of Murray in the parliament of 1600, was not appointed, according to other accounts, till 1606.

In this assembly of 1602 we at last find episcopacy distinctly recognized as part and parcel of the national ecclesiastical system. A "plat," as it was called, or scheme for the settlement of the church, was now adopted, which proposed that the great benefices, that is, the bishoprics, priories, and abbacies, should be bestowed upon clergymen, "on condition that all the kirks of the prelacies be planted with sufficient ministers, and be provided with competent livings;" and a list of names was made out, from which his majesty should select incumbents for such of the said great benefices as were still vacant.[1] A few more of the episcopal sees were soon after this filled up by the king; in particular, the archbishopric of Glasgow, which was given by James to Mr. John Spotswood (the author of the "History of the Scottish Church,") on being advertised, at Burleigh House, near Stamford, on his way to London, of the death, at Paris, of the restored Catholic archbishop, James Bethune. Some years afterward Spotswood was translated to the metropolitan see of St. Andrew's.

It thus appears that the church which, upon succeeding to the throne of England, James left established in his native country, was then, and always had been, an episcopal church, as well as that established in England. The clergy, indeed, or a powerful faction of their body, had all along strenuously cried out for the abolition of bishops; and being supported by the popular voice, had at last forced upon the legislature a sort of compromise between, or combination of, the two systems of episcopacy and presbytery, with the effect for a short time of partially all but submerging or annihilating the former; but episcopacy had never been abolished by the state, which, on the contrary, met every demand of the clergy to that effect with a steady refusal, and did its utmost to sustain the ancient constitution of the church, even in the highest strength and fury of the adverse principle. Above all, James himself had been an open supporter of episcopacy and opponent of presbytery from the first moment he took any part in public affairs; upon that point he had constantly held the same language both with his tongue and with his pen: his whole reign, in so far as regarded the church, had been a continued effort, sometimes by force, sometimes by policy, to restrain the advancing tide of Puritanism, and as far as possible to hold up the hierarchy, which it would have overborne. Sometimes circumstances were so unfavorable to the pursuit of this object, that he was obliged for the moment almost to relinquish it, as when, in 1587, the pecuniary necessities of the government, and the united importunities of the clergy and the nobility, although with the most opposite views, clamoring in concert for the moment, compelled him to give his assent to the act of annexation: at other times he sought to attain his end, not by pushing right forward to it through whatever impediments lay in his way, but by the roundabout course of concession and temporary compromise. As far as possible, also, to disarm opposition, he naturally presented his designs in the least alarming shape, and took pains to show that, in professing one object, he was not at the same time covertly seeking another often confounded with it: as, for instance, when, in 1590, he made his famous speech to the general assembly, in which, while even Calderwood does not pretend that he made any recantation of his known and uniformly expressed opinions in favor of episcopacy, he is said to have expressed so much satisfaction with the doctrine held by the Scottish church, and to have so greatly gladdened the hearts of the brethren with his disparagement of the English liturgy; on which head there is no reason to think that he spoke any thing that he did not honestly feel at the moment, although he may have afterward come to feel differently. But, at any rate, on the point of his strong attachment to the episcopal form of church government, and his determination to do his best for its retention in the Scottish establishment, he certainly never was guilty either of false profession or of concealment of his real opinions and views. In the uniform tenor of his actions, as well as of his speeches and writings, he avowed himself the irreconcilable enemy of Puritanism and of Presbytery. The terms, indeed, in which he expressed himself upon this subject were usually sufficiently strong and explicit. We need only refer to the passages that have been already quoted from the Basilicon Doron in the preceding Chapter.[1] This work, it will be remembered, was published some years before James left Scotland.[2]

[1] Such is the account given by Calderwood, p. 467. Spotswood says that, although this scheme and others were proposed, nothing was then concluded, and the subject was remitted to a more deep consideration, p. 468. The want of the consent of the church, however, if that assent was withheld, did not prevent the king from proceeding to fill up the episcopal sees.

[2] Harris, the smallest-minded, but not for that the most honest, of historical writers, has a long preaching note about James's alledged dissimulation in the matter of religion, some things in which merit notice as curiosities in the way of quiet, cautious misrepresentation. One portion of the note, for example, being designed to expose the unreasonable violence of James's prejudices against the Puritans, the passage given in the text is brought forward among others for that purpose;

Our sketch of the genius and history of Presbyterianism, in this the earliest stage of its hot and turbulent youth, may receive a few additional touches from the proceedings of the Scottish kirk in regard to various matters standing apart from its contest with episcopacy and the government. The importance that was attached to the canonical habits, both by the Romanists and the Episcopalians, very early made it a badge of genuine Presbyterianism to affect a peculiar disregard for all such points of mere external appearance; but it soon came, nevertheless, to be found that the want of all rule and order as to the attire of the clergy had its inconveniences as well as the opposite system. Certain of the brethren appear to have taken advantage of the liberty in which they were left upon this head, to indulge a taste for a gayety of apparel which was deemed somewhat unclerical. The subject was brought before the general assembly which met at Edinburgh in March, 1575, and produced a solemn ordinance, which, after premising that "it becometh the true messengers of the word of salvation not only to bear in their consciences a good testimony of unfeigned humility and simplicity of heart, but also in external habit and behavior to represent the humility and sobriety of their minds, that the mouths of this godless generation, which are opened to blaspheme the godly calling of the ministry, may be shut up from just occasion of slander," proceeded to enact, "that all that serve within the kirk apparel themselves in a comely and decent manner, as becometh the gravity of their vocation, and that they conform their wives and families thereto, that no slander nor offense arise to the kirk of God thereby." And, further, that it might be distinctly known by all what especial fashions, colors, or decorations were to be eschewed, a committee, to be presided over by John Erskine, of Dun, superintendent of Mearns and Angus, was appointed to advise thereupon, and to report to the next assembly. At the next assembly, accordingly, which took place in August of the same year, the following curious act was passed:—"Forasmuch as comely and decent apparel is requisite in all, namely [especially] in ministers and such as bear function in the kirk, we think, all kind of broidering unseemly; all begairies [stripes] of velvet in gown, hose, or coat; all superfluous and vain cutting out; all kind of costly sewing on of pasments [borders of lace], or sumptuous and large steeking [stitching] with silks; all kind of costly sewing or various hues in shirts; all kind of light and variant hues of clothing, as red, blue, yellow, and such like, which declare the lightness of the mind; all wearing of rings, bracelets, buttons of silver or gold or other fine metal; all kind of superfluity of cloth in making of hose; all using of plaids in the kirks by readers or ministers, namely in time of their ministry and using of their office; all kind of gowning, coating, doubleting, or breeches of velvet, satin, taffety, or such like stuff; costly gilding of whingers [hangers] and knives; silk hats of divers and light colors. But we think their whole habit should be of grave color; as black, russet, sad-grey, sad-brown, or serges, worset, camlet, grogram, Lisle worset, or such like: to be short, such as thereby the word of God be not slandered through their lightness or gorgeousness. And that the wives of ministers be subject to the same order."[1] The history of the national costume at least is under obligations to the venerable assembly for this elaborate exposition of the Scottish dandyism of the sixteenth century. There were many other things, however, in the life and conversation of the clergy of those days that gave the kirk much to do in the way of prohibition and correction. In the assembly held in October, 1576, for instance, one of the questions brought forward was, whether a minister or reader might tap ale, beer, or wine, and keep an open tavern? All the deliverance of the house upon this occasion was, that the said clerical Bonifaces should "be exhorted to keep decorum." In 1580 we find a complaint made that, through a great part of the country, especially in uplandish parts, the afternoon's exercise and doctrine upon Sabbath-days was neglected, and no sufficient instruction, therefore, was given to the people in the catechism and rudiments of religion. In 1583, "the question being moved concerning the censure of ministers but as another object of the note is to make it appear that these antipuritanical sentiments were carefully concealed by James till he had fairly made his escape from Scotland and the Presbyterian kirk, all mention of the "Basilicon Doron" is in this instance suppressed, and, contrary to the reverend biographer's usual practice, the words are merely quoted as from a particular page in "King James's Works." Again, in winding up his enumeration of James's professions of attachment to the doctrine and discipline of the Presbyterian church, after noticing his speech to the assembly (which by the by is called a speech to the parliament) in 1598, about his having no mind to bring in papistical or Anglican bishops, "and in 1602," continues Harris, "he assured the general assembly that he would stand for the church and be an advocate for the ministry." "A man," proceeds the note, "would think by this that James had a very great regard for his clergy, and an high esteem of them; and doubtless he himself intended they should think so too. But this was mere artifice and dissimulation," &c. The artifice here is really all the historian's own. The words quoted from James's speech in 1602 are not mentioned by Calderwood, zealous as he is in collecting and obtruding every utterance of the king calculated to give a color to the favorite imputation of his apostasy; and when he found them only in the equally zealous Episcopalian Spotswood, Harris, even if he looked no farther, must have known very well that they could not have been intended to bear the sense he has found it convenient to put upon them. In truth, James no more on this occasion affected to make any profession of attachment to Presbyterianism than to Mohammedanism. The words were spoken in answer to a request made by the assembly through their moderator or president, Mr. Patrick Galloway, that the king would use his authority in compelling the nobility and others who had obtained grants of the old church lands, "if not to restore all, at least to grant a competent allowance to ministers forth of the tithes they possessed." This mere money question was the single matter to which the king's answer referred. "The king," continues Spotswood, "accepting the petition graciously, said, that it should not be well with the church so long as ministers were drawn from their charges to attend the yearly modification of stipends, and that he held it fittest at once to condescend upon a competent provision for every church, and deal with those that possessed the tithes to bestow a part thereof to the foresaid uses; and, seeing that business would require a longer time than they could well continue together, that they should do well to make some overtures to those who had the commission for stipends, promising for himself that he should stand for the church, and be an advocate for the ministers." —(Hist. p. 468.) It was at this very assembly, as we have already seen, that the clergy were for the first time induced to acquiesce in the reëstablishment of prelacy, partly by the management, partly by the threats and bullying of the king, according to Calderwood, who denounces the assembly as one held in thralldom, in which "if any zealous minister was to utter his mind, the king would boast or taunt, or his minister, Mr. Patrick, moderator, an arrogant ignavo, would imperiously command silence."—(Hist. p. 469.)

that bear with the people repairing in pilgrimages to wells, hard beside their own houses, without reproof—yea, rather entertaining them with meat and drink in their houses, and distributing the communion to their own flocks, and yet not communicating with them for the space of seven or eight years, it was answered that they deserve deprivation."[1] In an act of the assembly which met in August, 1588, it is affirmed that, "through the whole realm, there is no religion nor discipline among the poor, but the most part live in filthy adultery, incest, fornication; their bairns lie unbaptized; and they themselves never resort to the kirk, nor participate of the sacrament." By the poor here, apparently, must be meant actual paupers and beggars. The general neglect of divine worship, however, in certain parts of the country continued to be the subject of complaint long after this date. Thus, an act of the Holyrood House Assembly of 1602 declares that the conventions of the people for religious service, especially on the Sabbath-day, were "very rare in many places, by reason of the distraction through labor, not only in harvest and seed time, but also every Sabbath-day, by fishing both of white fish and salmon fish, and going of mills." Another of many ineffectual attempts was thereupon made to put down the said violations of the day of rest. But the kirk at this early period by no means confined its threats, and anathemas, and other prohibitory interferences to offenses, such as this, of a more or less purely spiritual character. The general assembly and the other church-courts constituted to a great extent the practical judicature of the country: it was customary for criminals and delinquents of all sorts to be brought before the presbyteries and synods, and, although these bodies could not of their own authority adjudge to any temporal punishment, the civil magistrate probably seldom dared to withhold the blow which they called upon him to strike; while even their own mere ecclesiastical sentence of excommunication or suspension from church privileges was, from the state of public opinion, an infliction attended with sufficiently terrible consequences. Such encroachments upon the province of the civil power, however, were carried much farther at a later period.

At the date of the accession of James to the throne of England the great body of the Puritans of that country had by no means adopted either the Presbyterian principle of church government, or even, in their full extent, the notions of the Scottish Puritans in regard to rites and ceremonies and the forms of public worship. Neither did they as yet constitute more than a very small minority of the population. No open profession of sectarianism was tolerated by the law, and nearly all the English Puritans, accordingly, were still in outward profession members of the established church. The famous Millenary petition,[2] which was presented to the new king while on his progress from Scotland, in April, 1603, declared at once their objects and sentiments, and their numerical strength. It was signed by eight hundred ministers, or considerably less than a tenth part of the whole clergy; and these were confined to twenty-five counties: throughout the other half of the kingdom there were probably next to no Puritans at all. The subscribers to the Millenary petition began by expressly disavowing all wish for "a popular parity in the church;" and they limited their proposals of reformation to certain points of mere internal regulation, none of them affecting either the general framework of the establishment, or any material part of the mode of public worship. In their own words they pray: 1. in regard to the church-service, "that the cross in baptism, the interrogatories to infants, baptism by women, and confirmation, may be taken away; that the cup and surplice may not be urged; that examination may go before the communion; that the ring in marriage may be dispensed with; that the service may be abridged, and church songs and music moderated to better edification; that the Lord's Day may not be profaned, nor the observation of other holydays strictly enjoined; that ministers may not be charged to teach their people to bow at the name of Jesus; and that none but canonical Scriptures be read in the church:" 2. concerning ministers, "that none may be admitted but able men; that they be obliged to preach on the Lord's Day; that such as are not capable of preaching may be removed, or obliged to maintain preachers; that non-residency be not permitted; that King Edward's statute for the lawfulness of the marriage of the clergy be revived; and that ministers be not obliged to subscribe, but, according to law, to the articles of religion and the king's supremacy only:" 3. in regard to benefices, "that bishops leave their commendams; that impropriations annexed to bishoprics and colleges be given to preaching incumbents only; and that lay impropriations be charged with a sixth or a seventh part for the maintenance of a preacher:" 4. in the matter of discipline, "that excommunication and censure be not in the name of lay chancellors, &c.; that men be not excommunicated for twelve-penny matters, nor without consent of their pastors; that registrars and others, having jurisdiction, do not put their places out to farm; that sundry popish canons be revised; that the length of suits in ecclesiastical courts may be restrained; that the oath ex officio be more sparingly used, and licenses for marriage without bans be more sparingly granted." Such, according to the most authentic exposition we have of them, were the sentiments and desires, or, at least, the distinctly contemplated objects, of the English Puritans, in the year 1603. There is here no symptom of fraternization with the Presbyterians of Scotland; no demand for the abolition either of episcopacy or of the Book of Common Prayer; no hankering after either the polity or the church-service of Geneva. That some, even of the subscribers to the Millenary petition, and other persons calling themselves Puritans, may have entertained views of ultimate reformation going far beyond those here expressed, is highly probable; but, whatever some modern party-writers may have imagined, the knowledge the English Puritans, one and all, could not but have of the whole course of James's previous conduct in ecclesiastical matters would necessarily prevent them from coming before him with any thing approaching to a petition for an assimilation of the English church to that of the northern part of the island. They knew well that to any such change as that the new king was as little inclined as Elizabeth herself would have been; and being also well aware of what indeed could not be denied or questioned, and of which their very petition was itself a proof and a confession that their party formed as yet but a small fraction of the population of the country, as they had no pretense for asking any thing of the kind, so they could have no ground for expecting that if they had asked it their petition would have been listened to for a moment. In regard, however, to the comparatively trivial alterations which they did propose, there was a fair probability that they might receive a favorable answer; it was by no means certain that James's own opinion was not with them on all or most of these minor points; nay, notwithstanding the aversion he had always shown to presbytery, and the general anti-Puritanism which had of late been growing upon him, it may be affirmed that the Millenary petition really did very nearly express what had been his own views but a few years ago, if they were not still. He always had been, it is to be remembered, and continued to be to his death, a determined Calvinist in the matter of doctrine; and with all his attachment to a hierarchical church, on political grounds, his theological bigotry and conceit naturally drew him somewhat, in points not appertaining to the question of church government, toward the Genevan system. It was known, for instance, that he had some years before publicly declared himself against both the observance of holydays and what he called the "evil-said mass" of the English church service; and whatever modification, or revolution, his opinions then expressed might have since undergone, the change had probably not yet been so announced as to place it beyond doubt in the minds of the public. The royal declaimer of former years against the liturgy and the keeping of "pasch and yule," might still be very well suspected of some predilections not quite in accordance with the rubric, which would both a little alarm the bishops and other friends of things as they were, and encourage the hopes of the puritanical and innovating party. Both parties, however, knew very well that the established church in the great principle of its constitution had nothing to fear from James—that of the hierarchical polity, as opposed to the Presbyterian, he was not the enemy, but the zealous friend and supporter. It was in this conviction that the eight hundred puritanical ministers addressed to him what was called their Millenary petition; and in the same perfect assurance was written the answer to that petition soon after presented by the University of Oxford, in which they besought the king not to suffer the peace of the state to be disturbed by allowing these men to begin any alteration in the polity of the church. It is ridiculous to assert, as a modern historical writer has done, that the Oxford doctors, in attacking the way in which the reformation had been carried on in Scotland, fell severely upon that "which his majesty had so publicly commended before he left that kingdom."[1] They knew better what they were about; for James's recent public commendation of Presbyterianism is the mere fiction of this writer's own prejudiced imagination.

The grievances complained of in the Millenary petition were substantially the same with those brought forward by the Puritan divines at the Hampton Court conference, held in the beginning of the following year, of which an account has already been given.[2] In his speech to the bishops and privy-councilors, on the first day of the conference, James declared himself happier than any of his predecessors, from Henry VIII. inclusive, "in this, because they were fain to alter all things they found established; but he saw yet no cause so much to alter and change any thing as to confirm that which he found well-settled already;" and he thanked God "for bringing him into the promised land, where religion was purely professed, where he sat among grave, learned, and reverend men; not as before elsewhere, a king without state, without honor, without order, where beardless boys would brave him to his face."[3] He had called the assembly, he proceeded to assure his hearers, with no purpose of making or permitting any innovation in the constitution of the church, but merely to examine and endeavor to cure any corruptions that might insensibly have grown up in it, as they might do in the most perfect and absolutely ordered of human arrangements. The matters wherein he himself desired to be satisfied he reduced to three heads: 1. Concerning the Book of Common Prayer and order of divine service, in which he had some scruples touching confirmation, absolution, and private baptism; 2. concerning excommunication, for which he suggested whether another equivalent coercion might not be invented and substituted; and, 3. concerning the providing of fit and able ministers for Ireland. The demands urged by the Puritan disputants, or, as Dr. Barlow calls them, "the agents for the Millenary plaintiffs," went a good deal beyond the line taken by his majesty, but still kept a far way from absolute Presbyterianism, or from touching any of the essential parts of the established system either of church government or worship. They requested that two or three slight alterations might be made in the articles of religion, for the purpose either of making the expression more clear, or removing apparent inconsistencies; that certain high predestinarian and Calvinistic propositions, called the Nine Articles of Lambeth,[4] might be added; that a new

[4] They were drawn up at Lambeth in 1594 in a consultation between Archbishop Whitgift and certain deputies from the University of Cambridge, with the intention of quieting a violent controversy that had raged for some time in that and the other university touching the points to which they relate. They were affirmed by their authors to be only an explanation of the doctrine already professed by the church and established by the laws of the land; but as it would have been in vain to submit them for the sanction of the queen, who, designating herself semper eadem, firmly and proudly kept to the principle of altering catechism might be compiled longer than the one in the Book of Common Prayer; that there might be a new translation of the Bible; that unlawful and seditious books (meaning those in favor of popery) might be suppressed, or at least restrained and imparted only to a few; that learned ministers might be planted in every parish; that subscription to the Book of Common Prayer might be dispensed with; and that the order of divine service might be amended by the abolition of the lessons read from the apocryphal books of the interrogatories propounded to infants in baptism, of the sign of the cross in that rite, of the surplice and other canonical habits, of the expression "With my body I thee worship" in in the celebration of matrimony, and of the churching of women;[1] that lay chancellors should not be permitted to issue ecclesiastical censures; that the clergy might have meetings for prophesying, as it was called, in rural deaneries every three weeks; that what things could not be resolved upon there might be referred to the archdeacon's visitation; and, finally, that all the clergy of each diocese should meet in an episcopal synod, where, the bishop presiding, they should determine all such matters as could not be decided in the subordinate assemblies. This last demand was the nearest approach that was made to proposing any imitation of the Presbyterian system; but it amounted at most only to a demand for such a combination of presbytery and episcopacy as had been already established in Scotland, and was the abomination of the pure Presbyterians there. It was in answer to this daring proposition that James, "somewhat stirred," made his famous speech about presbytery agreeing with monarchy as God with the devil.[2] "Stay," he concluded, in a high flight of his peculiar style of eloquence, "stay, I pray you, for one seven years, before you demand that of me; and if then you find me pursy and fat, and my windpipes stuffed, I will, perhaps, hearken to you; for let that government be once up, I am sure I shall be kept in breath: then shall we all of us have work enough—both our hands full. But, Dr. Reynolds, till you find that I grow lazy, let that alone."[3]

Soon after the conference at Hampton Court two or three expressions in the Book of Common Prayer were ordered to be amended by a royal proclamation, in which James admonished his subjects not to expect any further alterations, for that his resolutions were now absolutely settled; and the chief result of the conference was the new translation of the Bible—the same that is still in use—for the execution of which the king's commission, directed to fifty-four of the most eminent divines of both universities, was issued in 1604, but which was not begun till 1606, when the number of translators had been reduced by the deaths of some of them to forty-seven, and was finished and sent to the press in 1611. This, upon the whole, most admirable version of the Holy Scriptures, which, in addition to its more venerable claims, has long been regarded as one of the chief classics of our language, and a precious "well of English undefiled," was founded upon the immediately preceding translation called Parker's, or the Bishops' Bible, first published in 1568, and brought to its most improved state in 1572. The version of the Psalms still retained in the Book of Common Prayer is that of the Bishops' Bible, and affords a ready means of comparing the two translations, and acquiring a general notion of the improvements made in the last.

The Puritans generally were extremely dissatisfied both with the issue of the conference, and with the manner in which it had been conducted even by their own champions. They went the length indeed of publicly disowning Dr. Reynolds and his associates as their representatives, on the double ground that they had never been invested with that character by any nomination or election on the part of their brethren, and that moreover they actually were not all four of one opinion as to the controverted points. They objected, also, both to the inefficient style in which much of the argument had been propounded by these learned but neither very dexterous nor very courageous theologians, and to the gross indecency and unfairness with which their harangues had been constantly interrupted by their opponents. The conduct of the prelates, they observed, had been so bad, that they were checked for it by the king himself. It would have been more correct, and more honest, if they had laid by far the greater part of the coarse browbeating to which the Puritan advocates were subjected to James's own door.

From this date at least no further doubts could be entertained about James's thorough aversion to Puritanism. In proclamations, in speeches to his parliament, in the whole course of his government, he avowed his determination to enforce a conformity as strict as that maintained by Elizabeth, and his conviction that the Puritans, or novelists, as he called them, were "a sect insufferable in any well-governed commonwealth." In the same speech in which he used the expression—that with which he opened his first parliament—he probably excited against himself a still bitterer feeling by his moderate declarations on the subject of popery. "I acknowledge the Roman church," he said, "to be our mother church, although defiled with some infirmities and corruptions; . . . and as I am none enemy to the life of a sick man because I would have his body purged of ill-humors, no more am I an enemy to their church, because I would have them reform their errors, not wishing the down-throwing of the temple, but that it might be purged and cleansed from corruption."

nothing she had once established either in church or state, they could not be absolutely imposed either upon the universities or the clergy; and accordingly Whitgift, when he sent them down, directed that they should be only used privately and with discretion. James, it should appear from Barlow's narrative, had never heard of them; and when he was informed what they were, he declared against needlessly extending the book of the articles with such superfluous matter.

[1] His majesty was facetious in his knock-down replies to Dr. Reynolds upon these two last points. In regard to the first he said, "Many a man speaks of Robin Hood who never shot in his bow; if you had a good wife yourself, you would think all the hone and worship you could do to her were well bestowed:' on the second he observed, "that women were loth enough of themselves to come to church, and therefore he would have this or any other occasion to draw them thither."

He even added that if they would leave and be ashamed of the said gross corruptions, he would for his own part be contented to meet them in the mid-way: "I could wish from my heart," said he, "that it would please God to make me one of the members of such a general Christian union in religion, as, laying wilfullness aside on both hands, we might meet in the midst, which is the center and perfection of all things." The only points in popery, he declared, against which he absolutely set his face as making those who held and practiced them not deserving of being permitted to remain in the kingdom, were their arrogant and ambitious doctrine of the supremacy of the pope, and their hateful habit of assassinating and murdering kings whom the pope might have excommunicated. He did not, however, impute the holding of these objectionable tenets to the generality of his Roman Catholic subjects, or, at least, he was willing to believe that few would ever think of acting upon them: for he desired them to assure themselves that he was a friend to their persons if they were good subjects, and, while he would always oppose their errors, he would be sorry to be driven by their ill-behavior from the protection and conservation of their bodies and lives. From these declarations of James on his accession to the English throne, and from the inclination of his mind as manifested by the whole course of his previous conduct, it seems probable that if it had not been for the gunpowder-plot, and the suspicion and odium drawn upon their whole body by that conspiracy of a few madmen, the papists would have been allowed to live in comparative quiet during this reign. The popular feeling, it is true, was strong against them at the beginning of the reign, and, having infused itself in large measure into the parliament, would have compelled the government at least to make a show of going along with it for a time: it was the apprehension excited by some of his first acts adopted under this influence that the new king was about to follow up in all its severity the harsh policy of his predecessor, which instigated Catesby and his associates to engage in their insane enterprise; but if the papists had refrained from giving any further provocation, the alarm and hatred of which they had made themselves the objects by their restless intrigues in the late reign would have gradually died away, and they would ere long have reaped the benefit of the favorable disposition of the court. King James had as little real religion of any kind as Elizabeth herself: in the notion of both the one and the other the church was an engine of state and nothing else; and, in this feeling, both were naturally much more inclined toward popery than puritanism—toward the religion of the monarchical than that of the democratic principle. If the Romanists would only have given up the supremacy of the pope, neither James, nor Elizabeth, nor Henry VIII. would probably have been prevented from returning to them by any scruples of conscience, however they might have been by circumstances. No one of these three sovereigns was any thing of a religious bigot, as were Edward VI. on the one side, and his sister Mary on the other. The main difference among them as to this matter was, that while Elizabeth, as a woman, naturally left the whole affair to her bishops, both James and Henry, though not bigots, were conceited pedants, and filled with a vain, flatulent imagination of their theological erudition and orthodoxy. As the prejudices of Henry's training kept him to the end of his life a zealous maintainer of all the merely speculative doctrines of the ancient religion, James's education in the extreme of the opposite system of opinions made him stick to the last in like manner to predestination and the other high points of doctrinal Calvinism, far as he was carried away from the system of the Genevan reformer in every thing except such purely theological dogmas. It is necessary to keep this feature of his character in recollection, in order fully to understand his movements in the matter of religion.

Some proceedings both of James's first parliament, which met on the 19th of March, 1604, and of the convocation, which, as usual, sat at the same time, must be shortly noticed. On the 18th of April a message was brought up to the Lords from the Commons soliciting a conference "concerning a reformation of certain matters and rites of the church, of which some complaints had been made, and for a better correspondence to be held betwixt the clergy and laity for the future"—a proposition betraying in sound and substance the Puritanism, or at least the puritanical inclinations, that lurked in a part of the Lower House. It is not well ascertained what was done in consequence of this overture, further than that the Lords eventually appointed nine of their number, and the Commons twenty, to meet in committee in the council-chamber on the 21st of May to settle the business. Among other articles or instructions to this committee voted by the Commons, one directed that in future no one should be admitted to be a minister in the church unless he were a bachelor of arts, or of a higher degree in the schools, "having testimony from the university, or college, whereof he was, of his ability to preach, and of his good life; or else such as are approved and showed to be sufficient to preach, by some testimonial of six preachers of the county where the party dwelleth." The solicitude here evinced for the exclusion from the church of unlearned or inefficient clergymen, the importance assigned to the gift of preaching, and the weight given to the attestation of the preachers of the district—all this strongly reflects the new light of Puritanism and Presbytery. In the same spirit it was also recommended in subsequent articles that no dispensation or toleration should be allowed to any to have or to retain two or more benefices with cure of souls, or to be non-resident; that no minister should be forced to subscribe otherwise than to the Thirty-nine Articles touching the doctrine of faith as enjoined by the statute of the 13th of Elizabeth; and that such faithful ministers as dutifully carried themselves in their functions and callings might not be deprived, suspended, silenced, or imprisoned for not using the cross in baptism, or the surplice, "which," added the article, "turneth to the punishment of the people." On the 13th of June following a committee that had been appointed to search for precedents touching intermeddling with ecclesiastical matters reported to the House a petition they had drawn up for presentation to the king, in which they humbly recommended to his majesty's godly consideration certain matters of grievance resting in his royal power and princely zeal either to abrogate or moderate, as being a course which they thought more expedient than to take the public discussing of the same unto themselves. "The matters of grievance," continued the petition, "(that we be not troublesome to your majesty) are these: the pressing the use of certain rites and ceremonies in this church—as the cross in baptism, the wearing of the surplice in ordinary parish churches, and the subscription required of the ministers further than is commanded by the laws of the realm; things which, by long experience, have been found to be the occasion of such difference, trouble, and contention in this church, as thereby divers profitable and painful ministers, not in contempt of authority and desire of novelty, as they sincerely profess, and we are verily persuaded, but upon conscience toward God, refusing the same, some of good desert have been deprived, others of good expectation withheld from entering into the ministry, and way given to the ignorant and unable men, to the great prejudice of the free course and fruitful success of the gospel, to the dangerous advantage of the common adversaries of true religion, and to the great grief and discomfort of many of your majesty's most faithful and loyal subjects." No lengthened detail or elaborate description could give a better notion than is conveyed by the language of this petition of the Puritanism of James's first parliament, and, it may be added, of English Puritanism generally at this date—of the extent to which it had gone, and also of the tone in which it was as yet disposed, or found itself able, to urge its pretensions. The petition, after occasioning much sharp debate, is supposed to have been dropped in the end: it probably went too far for the majority even of the Commons; but some acts relating to the church were passed this session which did a little to satisfy the wishes of the more moderate friends of ecclesiastical reform. All future leases or grants of church-lands for a longer term than twenty-one years were made void;[1] and certain statutes of the first year of the reign of Edward VI.—among others, that legitimatizing the marriages of the clergy—which had been repealed by Mary, and had never been suffered to be revived by Elizabeth, were now reënacted.[2] At the same time the new parliament confirmed the statutes made in the preceding reign against "Jesuits, seminary priests, and other such like priests, as also against all manner of recusants."[3]

The principal act of the convocation was the adoption of a new Collection or Book of Canons, being the first which had been substituted by any sort of authority for the old canon law which had been swept away with the Romish religion and ecclesiastical system, of which it formed a principal part. We gave an account in the former Book of the canons drawn up in the time of Edward VI. by Cranmer and his brethern, but which never received the sanction either of the parliament or of the church. The present collection was laid before the convocation by Bancroft, bishop of London, the president, along with the royal license to make canons; and, after it had been revised and passed by both Houses, it was ratified by the king's letters patent under the great seal. Never having been confirmed by act of parliament, it is now well established by decisions of the courts that these canons have no legal force in respect to the laity; but for a long time an opposite doctrine was maintained and acted upon both by the church and the government, and many of them were applied to the coercion and persecution of the dissenters from the establishment, in the same manner as if they had formed part of the law of the land. The existence, indeed, of the courts of Star Chamber and of High Commission had so confused the jurisdictions of the temporal and the spiritual courts, and enabled the latter to encroach to so great an extent and in so many ways upon the former, that such a result could not fail to take place. These canons are 141 in all, but the greater part of them relate merely to the officers and proceedings of the ecclesiastical courts, and the routine of the ordinary duties of ministers, church-wardens, parish-clerks, and other parochial functionaries. Others enjoin the observance of certain of the ceremonial parts of the established worship: as, for example, bowing at the name of Jesus, kneeling at the sacrament, wearing the habits, &c. By canon 30th, however, it is declared that the cross is no part of the substance of the sacrament of baptism, and that the ordinance is perfect without it. Canons 36 and 37 ordain that no person shall be ordained or suffered to preach who has not acknowledged by his subscription that the king is the supreme head of the realm as well in all spiritual and ecclesiastical as in temporal causes; that the Book of Common Prayer contains nothing contrary to the Word of God, and that he will use it and none other; and that the Thirty-nine Articles of 1562 are all and every of them agreeable to the Word of God. The most remarkable feature of the canons, however, is the liberality with which the extreme punishment of excommunication is denounced against a great variety of offenses. This was the weapon of proof—in those days one having a very sharp temporal as well as spiritual edge—by which the Puritans were chiefly attacked and harassed. All persons are declared to be ipso facto excommunicated, and only to be restored by the archbishop, after repentance and public revocation of their wicked errors, who shall affirm the church of England not to be a true and apostolical church, or the Book of Common Prayer to contain any thing repugnant to Scripture, or the Thirty-nine Articles to be in any part superstitious or erroneous, or the rites and ceremonies of the church to be such as good men may not with a good conscience approve, or the government by archbishops, bishops, &c., to be opposed to the Word of God, or the form of consecrating bishops, priests, and deacons to be in any particular unscriptural. All these are in like manner excommunicated who shall separate from the communion of the established church and combine together in any new brotherhood; and all who shall affirm that ministers refusing to subscribe to the formulas of the church and their adherents, may truly take to themselves the name of another church not established by law; or that there are within the realm other congregations of the king's born subjects than such as are established by law, which may rightly challenge to themselves the name of true and lawful churches; or that it is lawful for any sort of persons, whether ministers or laymen, to make rules, orders, and constitutions in matters ecclesiastical, without the authority of the king. These curious ordinances, repugnant as they are in many things to the law of the land as it has now been settled by the course and declared by acts of parliament, still constitute a principal portion of our ecclesiastical law, and are held by the highest authorities to be binding upon all the clergy of the established church. Finally, the Book of Canons excommunicates all who shall affirm the synod in which it was agreed upon not to have been the true church of England by representation; or that all other persons not actually assembled in the said synod, whether clergy or laity, are not subject to the decrees thereof; or that the said sacred synod was a company of such persons as did conspire against godly and religious professors of the gospel, and therefore that they and their proceedings ought to be despised and condemned.

The chief authorship of those canons of the year 1604 is attributed to Bishop Bancroft, who in the end of the year was raised to the primacy, left vacant by the death of the able and prudent Whitgift in the preceding February, about three weeks only before the meeting of that first parliament of the new reign, a haunting apprehension of the unorthordox and innovating spirit of which is said to have shortened his days. Bancroft brought to the government of the church all the high uniformity notions of his predecessor, but little or nothing of his commanding intellect; so that the change was upon the whole not very unlike what the substitution of King James for Queen Elizabeth brought about in the government of the state. The ecclesiastical sovereignty began to be exercised by Bancroft even before he found himself the actual Lord of Lambeth; scarcely was the breath out of the old primate's body when his destined successor assumed all the authority of his future station, and the violence of his temper made itself felt throughout the church as soon as the administration of affairs came into his hands. A passage in a remarkable speech delivered on the 23d of May in the convocation (where Bancroft presided, as if already archbishop) by Rudd, bishop of St. David's, attests both the comparatively moderate and forbearing sway of Whitgift, and the impetuous course the inheritor of his power was already running: "Forasmuch," said Rudd, speaking of the ceremonies and other points complained of by a certain class of the clergy, "forasmuch as in the time of the late Archbishop of Canterbury these things were not so extremely urged, but that many learned preachers enjoyed their liberty conditionally that they did not by word or deed openly disturb the state established, I would know a reason why they should now be so generally and exceeding straitly called upon, especially since there is a greater increase of papists lately than heretofore." This remonstrance was made before the new canons were yet in force; after these severe and comprehensive ordinances were passed they remained no dead letter so long as Bancroft lived. The Puritan writers assert that in the course of his primacy of about six years, three hundred ministers were silenced or deprived; but the fact appears to be that only forty-five of these were actually deprived, the rest being merely prohibited from preaching until they should conform. Some things that are told of Bancroft would go to show, that, although he was of a rough and violent temper, as well as of a narrow and bigoted understanding, he was not a man without kindness of heart; and it has never been questioned that, like other bigots, he believed he was only doing his duty in the harshest and worst of his proceedings. The rules by which he guided himself in his treatment of the non-conforming clergy may be gathered from a circular which he addressed to the rest of the bishops immediately after his elevation to the metropolitan see. Here, while he strictly enjoins that none are in future to be admitted to the ministry without subscribing to every thing laid down in the canons, he observes that of those already placed in the church some promise conformity, although they are unwilling to subscribe a second time, and with regard to these he directs that the bishop may "respite their subscription for some short time." "Others," he continues, "in their obstinacy will yield neither to subscription nor promise of conformity; these are either stipendiary curates or stipendiary lecturers, or men beneficed: the two first are to be silenced, and the third deprived."

But the opposition which all these rigors were intended to put down was now fast becoming formidable in a new shape. The Puritans, worse than disappointed in whatever expectations of relief they had entertained from the new reign, and made to feel, from the result of the Hampton Court conference, from James's public declarations, from the enactment of the new canons, and from the first taste they had of Bancroft's fiery rule, that they were to be more severely repressed than ever, were very generally losing all attachment to the established church, and were in great numbers leaving it altogether. It was not, therefore, with non-conformists only that Bancroft found he had to deal, but with actual dissenters and separatists. Something of separation there had always been from the days of the Reformation—and, indeed, it has not been unknown, as we have seen, even before the overthrow of the old religion; but, strictly prohibited as it was by the law, and therefore necessarily carried on with great caution and secrecy, it never had been more than very insignificant in amount till after the commencement of the present reign. Disgust and despair, together perhaps with some instinctive sense of a weak government having succeeded to a strong one, now emboldened many persons to set at defiance both the terrors of the old laws against conventicles and the additional denunciations of the new Book of Canons on the same head. This newly-awakened opposition from without gave more trouble to Bancroft than even the resistance to his authority which he had to encounter from within the church. Before the accession of James, a considerable number of the more rigid English Puritans had, under the denomination of Brownists, left their native country and established themselves in Holland, where they published a confession of faith in the year 1602. From having thus led the van in the march of open secession from the establishment, the Brownists are sometimes spoken of as the fathers of the English Protestant Dissenters, and more especially of the Independents and the Baptists (properly a branch of the Independents), whose notions upon the subject of church government they seem to have anticipated in most particulars. But in many of their proceedings the Brownists were fanatics of a very wild order; and their principles never were generally adopted by the great religious body, which, under the name of Independents, fills in the latter part of the reign of Charles I., so large a space in our history, and has ever since formed so numerous and important a community. After Bancroft began his severities, many, both of the clergy and the laity, who were not Brownists, followed the example of that sect in flying from England to the Low Countries, where they joined the English congregations, mostly Presbyterian, that had subsisted there under the protection of the government ever since the overthrow of the Spanish dominion. Others tried to find a quiet asylum from the archbishop and his fines and imprisonments in the regions claimed by the British crown on the other side of the Atlantic; but the zealous prelate could not endure that Puritanism should have a chance of taking root and flourishing even in those far-away wilds of the new world; and he put a stop to the emigration of the Puritans to Virginia, by getting the king to issue a proclamation prohibiting any of his subjects from transporting themselves thither without his special license.

One consequence of the state to which matters had now been brought was a difference of opinion for a time among the Puritans themselves, as to the course they ought to take. All were gradually becoming estranged, in their principles as well as in their affections, farther and farther from the establishment; but some had drifted much ahead of others in their opinions and feelings; and while the more ardent urged an immediate separation, and even denounced the continuing in communion with the national church as a great sin, the majority, acted upon by various motives, still shrunk from raising the banner of open revolt. "Most of the Puritans," says Neal, "were for keeping within the pale of the church, apprehending it to be a true church in its doctrines and sacraments, though defective in discipline and corrupt in ceremonies; but being a true church, they thought it not lawful to separate, though they could hardly continue in it with a good conscience. They submitted to suspensions and deprivations; and when they were driven out of one diocese took sanctuary in another, being afraid of incurring the guilt of schism by forming themselves into separate communions. Whereas, the Brownists maintained that the Church of England, in its present constitution, was no true Church of Christ, but a limb of antichrist, or, at best, a mere creature of the state; that their ministers were not rightly called and ordained, nor the sacraments duly administered; or, supposing it to be a true church, yet as it was owned by their adversaries (the conforming Puritans) to be a very corrupt one, it must be as lawful to separate from it, as for the Church of England to separate from Rome." Gradually the force of these latter arguments came to be more and more felt, under the enlightening operation of Bancroft's deprivations and other severities; but in the mean time, about the year 1607, some ministers took a middle course, resigning their charges rather than subscribe the three articles imposed by the canons, but still avowing their adherence to the church as private individuals. These were called brethren of the second separation, by way of distinction from those who had preceded them in a more open and decided dissent; and their principles may be best gathered from their own words, in a published defense of their conduct, in which they say, "We protest before the Almighty God, that we acknowledge the churches of England, as they be established by public authority, to be true, visible churches of Christ; that we desire the continuance of our ministry in them above all earthly things, as that without which our whole life would be wearisome and bitter to us; that we dislike not a set form of prayer to be used in our churches; nor do we write with an evil mind to deprave the Book of Common Prayer, Ordination, or Homilies; but to show our reasons why we can not subscribe to all things contained in them." At the same time, that the foundations of the system afterward called Independency were already fully laid clearly appears from a treatise published in 1607 by the Reverend M. Bradshaw, entitled "English Puritanism, containing the main Opinions of the rigidest Sort of Those that went by that Name in the Realm of England," in which all the leading principles still maintained by the Independent body respecting religion in general—the church—the ministry—the elders, or visiting officers in congregations—church censures—and the rights and duties of the civil magistrate in reference to religion—are set forth with great method and clearness. Under the last head are distinctly laid down those views which chiefly made the difference and opposition between the Independents and the Presbyterians, and were all along fiercely denounced by the latter under the name of Erastianism; namely, that the civil magistrate ought to have supreme power over all the churches within his dominions in all cases whatsoever; and that all ecclesiastical officers are punishable by the civil magistrate for the abuse of their ecclesiastical offices, much more if they intrude upon the rights and prerogatives of the civil authority. It deserves, however, to be noted, that on the great question of toleration the views of these fathers of Independency were still somewhat clouded. It is declared that they hold the pope to be antichrist, because he usurps the supremacy over kings and princes; and therefore all that defend the popish faith, and are for tolerating that religion, to be secret enemies of the king's supremacy. This amounts to a protest, not only against the toleration of popery, but even against the toleration of all who would tolerate that religion.

We have seen that Bancroft's scheme of extirpating dissent embraced the most distant possessions of the crown—that he would have put down all religion but that of the church of England, even in the as yet almost uninhabited English territories that lay in the opposite hemisphere. His busy zeal, also, could take no rest until he had succeeded in depriving the French churches in the Isle of Jersey of their original constitution—a kind of Presbyterianism—which they had enjoyed without molestation during the whole reign of Elizabeth, and the continuance of which had even been guarantied to them by James himself, in a letter under the privy seal, shortly after his accession. He attempted the same thing with the churches in Guernsey, but they appear to have been more successful in preserving their independence. The great object, however, both of the archbishop and the king, after the enforcement of a uniformity of worship in England, was to sweep away whatever yet remained of the Presbyterian discipline in Scotland, and to effect the complete establishment of episcopacy in that country. A course of measures for the suppression of the general assembly—at once the heart, arm, eye, and tongue of the Presbyterian system—or at least for the extinction of every privilege that gave it either authority or influence in the state—had been taken with hardly any disguise, almost from the first hour of the new reign.

We have shortly noticed, in the preceding chapter,[1] the repeated prorogations by the royal authority of the assembly which had been appointed to be held at Aberdeen, in July, 1604, and the events which arose out of the meeting, notwithstanding the king's proclamation, of a few of the most zealous ministers at the time and place originally fixed. Nine presbyteries only, out of fifty, according to Spotswood, sent representatives to the Aberdeen assembly; the entire number of ministers was only twenty-one; Mr. John Forbes, minister of Awford, and Mr. John Welsh, minister at Ayr, being "the chief leaders of this stir." On the interference of the king's commissioner, who ordered letters from the privy council discharging the meeting to be read at the market-cross of the town, the assembled ministers merely chose Forbes their moderator, and then adjourned to the last day of September. In the mean time, however, Forbes and Welsh were brought before the council; and, "standing to the defense of what they had done," were committed to the castle of Blackness; eight more, taking the same course, were afterward committed in like manner to that and other places of custody; the rest, having acknowledged their offense, and besought his majesty's pardon, were permitted to return to their charges. Small, however, as had been found to be the number of the clergy inclined to brave the utmost fury of the court, it appears that these proceedings excited considerable popular dissatisfaction and alarm, which James endeavored to allay by a declaration, denouncing those "malicious spirits, enemies to common tranquillity," who were laboring to possess the minds of the people with an opinion that he did "presently intend a change of the authorized discipline of the church, and by a sudden and unseasonable laying on of the rites, ceremonies, and whole ecclesiastical order" of the English church to overturn the former government received in Scotland. It was, however, only the design of making an immediate change of the sweeping description alluded to that this proclamation denied; the intention of gradually bringing the one church into conformity with the other was almost distinctly avowed. "We can not but judge it convenient," said James, "that two estates so miserably disjoined should be drawn to as great conformity in all things as the good of both may permit; and that no monarchy either in civil or ecclesiastical policy hath yet obtained to that perfection that it needs no reformation, or that infinite occasions may not arise whereupon wise princes will foresee, for the benefit of their estates, just cause of alteration." In the beginning of the following year, 1605, Forbes, Welsh, and four of the other imprisoned ministers, were brought to trial at Linlithgow, and being all found guilty of treason, were, after being detained for some time longer in durance, sentenced to be banished from their native country for life. Meanwhile, in a parliament which assembled at Perth, in July, 1606, notwithstanding the clamorous protestations of many of the clergy, who crowded to the place from all parts of the kingdom to oppose the measure,[1] an act was passed entitled for "the Restoration of the Estate of Bishops," by which the Act of Annexation of the year 1587 was repealed, and the bishops were declared to be restored "to their ancient and accustomed honors, dignities, prerogatives, privileges, livings, lands, tithes, rents, thirds, and estates, as the same was in this reformed kirk most ample and free, at any time before the Act of Annexation."

[1] Spotswood says that they labored "all they could secretly to make some perturbation." But they by no means confined themselves to such secret machinations. "Mr. Andrew Melvin," says Calderwood, "after he had gotten entry into the parliament-house, not without great difficulty, stood up to speak and protest. But how soon he was espied, one was sent to him to command him to depart; which, notwithstanding, he did not till he had made his mind known."

The title of this act, Spotswood observes, "giveth many to mistake the truth of things, and think that before this time the estate of bishops was overthrown and cast down; whereas the same was never so much as intended; only by this act the temporalities of bishoprics, which, by the Act of Annexation, were made to belong to the crown, were restored, in regard it was seen that the bishops were disabled to attend their service in the church and state by the want thereof." "A paction," says Calderwood, "was made betwixt the lords that had the kirk rents and the bishops. So the lords consented to the erection of bishops, and confirmation of their new gifts." He adds, "At this parliament the earls and lords were clothed in red scarlet. It is constantly reported that Dunbar, bishop of Aberdeen, said, at the breaking up of the Reformation, that the red parliament at St. Johnstone[1] should mend all again. . . . . The first day of the parliament ten bishops rode, two and two, betwixt the earls and the lords. But the last day they would not ride, because they got not their own place, that is, before the earls and next to the marquises; but went on foot to the parliament-house. This made the noblemen to take up their presuming humors, and to mislike them as soon as they had set them up, and to fear their own thralldom by time." Another act passed by this parliament, which may also be regarded as planting one of the main pillars of James's darling scheme of assimilating the ecclesiastical condition of the two countries, was that declaring his supremacy over all persons and in all causes, and setting forth an oath to be taken by the subject to that effect. In the preamble to the Act for the Restoration of Bishops, the estates, in accordance with the new law, acknowledged the king to be sovereign monarch, absolute prince, judge, and governor over all estates, persons, and causes, both spiritual and temporal, within the realm of Scotland.

A sketch has already been given in the last chapter[2] of the measures subsequently taken by James to curb and enervate what of the old Presbyterian spirit still remained in the constitution of the Scottish church, and to strengthen the very rickety episcopacy he had thus set up; for it was soon found that it required something more than a few lines in a new act of parliament practically to repeal the Act of Annexation, and to get back for the bishops their ancient lands and revenues out of the grasp of their present possessors. We shall only here briefly recapitulate the principal events, adding, as we go along, a few of the more curious characteristic notices to be found in the pages of the original historians.

Calderwood has detailed, at great length, what passed between the court and the eight ministers who were called up by James to London in September of this year. On the whole, Bancroft appears to have affected a bland and soothing style of demeanor, between which and the reckless impetuosity of Andrew Melvil the contrast is sometimes very ludicrous. The Presbyterian annalist admits that when the brethren were first admitted into the Chamber of Presence on the 22d of September, "they were courteously received by the Bishop of Canterbury." When Melvil was brought before the council for the Latin epigram he had written on the altar and other abhorred ornaments of the royal chapel, the scene that took place is thus described: He "confessed he had made such verses, being much moved with indignation to see such vanity and superstition in a Christian church, under a Christian king, born and brought up in the pure light of the gospel; and specially before idolaters, to confirm them in their idolatry, and to grieve the hearts of true professors. He said he had a purpose to present these verses to his majesty, and withal to have uttered his mind; but wondered how they came in his majesty's hand, seeing as yet he had not given out any copy. When Bancroft, then bishop of Canterbury, began to speak, he charged him with profanation of the Sabbath, imprisoning, silencing, and bearing down of faithful preachers, holding up of anti-Christian hierarchy and popish ceremonies. Shaking the white sleeve of his rochet, he called them Romish rags, and told him that he was the author of the book entitled English Scotizing; he esteemed him the capital enemy of all the reformed kirks in Europe, and would profess himself an enemy to him, in all such proceedings, to the effusion of the last drop of his blood. He said he was grieved at the heart to see such a man have the king's ear, and to sit so high in that honorable council. He painted out likewise Bishop Barlow in his colors, and challenged him for reporting the king to have said, in the conference at Hampton Court, that he was in the kirk of Scotland, but not of it, and other like; and marveled that such an one was suffered to live unpunished exemplarily for making the king to be of no religion. He refuted his sermon preached at Hampton Court briefly, so long as he could get audience. Often was he interrupted, and in the end removed; and, when he was called in again, Lord Egerton (chancellor) admonished him to 'join modesty with his learning and years.'" Calderwood sneers at the chancellor for this attempt to restrain the presbyter's holy zeal. With all their arrogance and intolerance, however, and the other offensive features of their creed and character, these men were far from being without other high qualities besides their piety and religious fervor. The meekest of them, not less than he that was of hotter temper, cherished an honorable pride and spirit of independence even in worldly matters, which kept them erect to a remarkable degree in their general carriage amid all the servility and baseness of the time. There is another passage of the story, as recorded by Calderwood, in which James Melvil and the archbishop appear upon the scene, that displays this highmindedness of the poor Scottish ministers in a touching way, and brings out, also, an agreeable enough aspect of the English prelate. By this time, in March, 1607, Andrew Melvil had been committed to the Tower, and one of the other seven brethren had been permitted to return home, in consequence of the dangerous illness of his wife; the rest were detained, without durance, in the houses of some of the bishops. In these circumstances they had addressed a supplication to the council, in which they complained that, "being free Scottish men, and pastors of a right-reformed and long-renowned kirk," they should be used in a manner which they took to be worse than either imprisonment at home or banishment to foreign parts. "Why should they," they asked, "not as yet accused, much less condemned, make themselves bondmen of masters, and live like loiterers at the tables of strangers, having honest callings, houses, and provisions at home?" The supplication was referred by the council to Bancroft, who sent for two of their number, Mr. James Melvil and Mr. William Scot. "He showed them," continues the narrative, "that it was the king's pleasure that they should not be licensed to return as yet, and in the mean time to be entertained by some of the principal of the clergy. They answered, no injury was worse than compelling courtesy. They would rather attend his majesty's leisure upon their own cost and charges, as they have done some months already, than to trouble such to whom neither could they be pleasant guests nor they pleasant hosts to them. They had honest houses and tables of their own, according to the fashion of the country and condition of their callings, more accustomed to give meat than to take of any. Some of them were aged and diseased, and therefore it is not fit that men of such honor and worship should be troubled with them. Likewise, it is manifest that, where opinions differ, there can not be found agreement in affection. Truly, said Bancroft, ye speak true, and like honest men as ye are. And I think my brethren, the bishops, would have little pleasure of you, except it were to pleasure the king's majesty: for our custom is, after our serious matters, to refresh ourselves an hour or two with cards, or other games, after our meals; but ye are more precise." His grace then turned to the subject of a union of the two churches, which his majesty had so much at heart. "I am sure," he said, "we both hold and keep the ground of true religion, and are brethren in Christ, and so should behave ourselves to other. We only differ in the form of government of the church, and some ceremonies." Even in these matters, too, he went on to say, the Scottish church, he understood, since they had come from home, had been brought to be almost the same with the English—alluding to the act of the Linlithgow assembly of the preceding December, afterward ratified by the parliament, constituting the bishops and certain other clergymen perpetual moderators of the assembly and other church courts.[1] He himself, he said, though holding under the king the highest place in the English church, was yet in nothing above the rest of his brethren, the bishops, save in pains and travail, and was, in fact, merely such a moderator in his diocese as was any one of the Scottish ministers who might hold the said office of constant moderator. The interview ended in a way that goes rather to belie the reputation Bancroft has of having been but a stingy and inhospitable bishop. When Mr. William Scot, in answer to all this civil, conciliatory small-talk, was entering upon what Calderwood calls "a solid discourse," the archbishop, "clapping upon his arm and smiling, said, 'Tush, man, take here a cup of good sack;' and so, filling the cup and holding the napkin himself, he caused him to drink." No doubt his grace thought a more generous diet was much more likely than any logical wrangling to produce a favorable effect upon the prejudices of the poor Presbyterian. However, he also promised, Calderwood tells us, to travail with the king, as far as he could, for their liberty; and it is added, "they were no more urged to go to the bishops' houses after that."

The convention, or conference, which was called together at Linlithgow, in December, 1606, consisted of thirty-three noblemen, gentlemen, and officers of state, with the Earl of Dunbar, as chief manager for the king, at their head, and above 130 clergymen, all, as well as the lay members, nominated by the crown. Nothing, therefore, could be more unlike than this meeting to a regular general assembly of the church, the name and authority of which, nevertheless, it assumed. Carefully as the ministers had been selected, there was still a small minority opposed to the measures of the court; the act for the establishment of permanent moderators obtained the votes of all the noblemen and gentlemen, but only of 126 of the clerical members;[1] and, numerically insignificant as the minority was, they had influence enough—no doubt in consequence of the support with which they were backed out of doors—to tack to the proposition, as originally brought forward, about a dozen cautions, or qualifying regulations, which went considerably to encumber its operation. Great resistance, notwithstanding, was made for a time by many of the church courts to the reception of the constant moderators. Many presbyteries, according to Calderwood, being threatened with the pains of rebellion and being put to the horn, yielded through fear; the synods, especially those of Perth and Fife, made a longer stand: "but all this opposition," says Spotswood, "proved vain, and they, in the end, forced to obey, did find, by experience, this settled course much better than their circular elections."

Meanwhile, other innovations were gradually introduced, all tending in the same direction. By annexations of parish churches, and other expedients, revenues were endeavored to be found for some more of the sees, after which the easier work of providing them with incumbents was not long delayed. Before the close of the year 1608 all the thirteen bishoprics were filled.[2] Calderwood notes

[1] Calderwood, p. 559.—Spotswood says that four members only voted against the act, other four refusing to vote because they had no commission, as they pretended, from their presbyteries, and two answering Non liquet.—p. 502.

[2] Calderwood has preserved some Latin verses circulated at this time, "wherein," says he, "shortly were described the conditions and manners of our new prelates." The description, as may be supposed from its suiting the taste of the worthy historian, is in a high style of Presbyterian scorn and scurrility. "Vina amat Andreas, cum vino that it was in another general assembly, held at Linlithgow, in July, 1608, that the name of archbishop was for the first time attributed to any minister in the acts or other proceedings of the church. "The bishops," he adds, "got sundry advantages in this assembly. They were continued commissioners of the general assembly, and established moderators in the presbyteries where they were instituted." In December, 1609, the practice of conferring high civil employments upon churchmen was begun by the appointment of Spotswood to the place of one of the lords of session, or judges of the supreme court of justice. At the same time, also, by the king's direction, the session rose on the 25th of December, and did not sit again till the 8th of January—which was, says Calderwood, "the first Christmas vacance since the Reformation," and foreshadowed the return of many of the other holydays of the church, besides "pasch and yule," the objects of James's ancient derision. This was immediately followed by the proclamation of directions, in conformity with a recent act of parliament, not only for the wearing of the canonical habits by bishops and doctors of divinity, and of black gowns in the pulpit and black clothes as their ordinary attire by the inferior clergy, but for the official costume of the judges and advocates, the clerks and scribes of the courts of justice, and even the provosts and baillies of burghs—all which orders of men, thus compelled to array themselves in the outward formalities of civilization, had hitherto rejoiced in a liberty nearly perfectly untamed in that respect. Very soon after, the erection of the two Courts of High Commission for the provinces of St. Andrew's and Glasgow—in 1615 united into one court, in which both archbishops had seats—completed the extension of the authority of the crown over the Scottish church in the same manner as over the English, and also the extension of the power of the one church over the same wide bounds as that of the other. "After," says Calderwood, "that the bishops became lords in parliament, council, exchequer, session, lords of temporal lands and regalities, patrons of benefices, moderators of presbyteries, commissioners of the general assembly, commissioners in the King's Court of High Commission, and consequently great and terrible to the ministry and other professors, it was thought fit and a ripe time to convocate a general assembly." An assembly was accordingly convened at Glasgow in June, 1610, the members being again all nominated by the crown, or, at least, a note of tho persons whom the king wished to be elected having been communicated to each presbytery by the bishops, accompanied with an intimation that they would provoke his majesty's severest wrath if their choice should fall upon others. In this convocation various new acts were passed, having the general effect of still further enlarging the spiritual superintendence of the bishops, and contracting the old powers of the presbyteries and other church courts. From this time, indeed, these latter retained little more than a merely formal existence, and even that they held but upon sufferance; a state of things which soon resulted in the general assembly, without which the inferior courts were nothing better than limbs without a head, not being permitted to meet at all. In September of this year, Spotswood, archbishop of Glasgow, taking with him Lamb, bishop of Brechin, and Hamilton, bishop of Galloway, went up to London, by the king's command, where the three received consecration to the episcopal office at the hands of the bishops of London, Ely, and Bath, neither the Archbishop of Canterbury nor the Archbishop of York being allowed "to have hand in the business," in case any clamor should be raised in Scotland that these prelates were renewing their ancient claims of superiority over the northern church. Spotswood tells us that a doubt was started by Dr. Andrews, bishop of Ely, who thought that the Scottish bishops ought, in the first instance, to be ordained as presbyters, since they never had received such ordination from episcopal hands; but Archbishop Bancroft, who was present, answered, and his opinion was acquiesced in by the other bishops and by Andrews himself, "that thereof there was no necessity, seeing, where bishops could not be had, the ordination given by the presbyters must be esteemed lawful; otherwise, that it might be doubted if there were any lawful vocation in most of the reformed churches." The three bishops, returning to Scotland in December, first consecrated Archbishop Gladstanes in the same manner in which they had been consecrated themselves; after which each of their other brethren underwent the ceremony. Calderwood does not pretend that much actual opposition was made among the clergy after this date to the new constitution of the church; he records a few slight outbreaks in one or two synods or presbyteries: but "what opposition was made in other synods by some of the best sort," he adds, "I have not inquired. Howsoever it was, the bishops were become so awful with their grandeur and the king's assistance, that there was little resistance; howbeit great murmuring and malcontentment, so that their possession was violent."

Within a fortnight after the consecration of Spotswood and his two brethren, the death of Archbishop Bancroft left vacant the chief place in the English church. It was filled up, after a few months, by the appointment of Dr. George Abbot, who, within the two preceding years, had occupied first the see of Litchfield and Coventry, and then that of London. Abbot had been indebted for this rapid succession of preferments to the patronage of the Scottish minister, the Earl of Dunbar, into whose family he had been introduced as chaplain in 1608, and whom he had accompanied when the earl came down to Scotland that year to hold the general assembly at Linlithgow, in which the powers of the bishops were confirmed and extended. It is said that Abbot, though not appearing in any public capacity, was privately of great service in forwarding the measures of the court upon this occasion. He had, also, while a member of the University of Oxford, attained considerable reputation for his theological learning, and had especially distinguished himself as the opponent both of Popery and Arminianism, on which latter question the position he took had already begun to involve him in a rivalry and contention with his celebrated cotemporary Laud, which did not cease to place them in opposition to each other so long as they both lived. At this date Abbot's Calvinism probably rather aided Dunbar's recommendation of him to James's favor, and helped to make his majesty overlook other qualities in the mounting bishop which were naturally the least to his liking. "He was," according to Clarendon, "a man of very morose manners and a very sour aspect, which in that time was called gravity," but which certainly was not James's own mode of making profession of orthodoxy. Abbot's lenity to the non-conformists, the consequence of his Calvinistic opinions and of his personal antipathy to Laud, has made him a favorite with Puritan writers, who have extolled his government of the church as the perfection of liberality and wisdom; but his bearing in the Court of High Commission, in every other respect except in the repression of Puritanism, showed at least as much rapacity for power as had been manifested either by Whitgift or by Bancroft, and the sentences he was accustomed to pass upon certain kinds of delinquencies go far to support the testimony of the royalist historian as to the natural harshness and severity of his disposition. Notwithstanding all the ostentation of independence, too, which he assumed after he could hope for no further advancement, Abbot, at the commencement of his career, could tickle James's ears with the most courtly flatterers of the time: some of his effusions of those days have been preserved, in which he does not scruple to extol his majesty as equal in learning, piety, and other virtues, to the greatest characters both in profane and sacred history.

Abbot, though not yet formally appointed, had been already selected by the king for the primacy, when (in the end of January, 1611) death deprived him of his great patron, whom he now no longer needed, the Earl of Dunbar—"a chief instrument employed for the overthrow of the discipline of our kirk," says the zealous Presbyterian chronicler—who, moreover, does not scruple to set down his death, just before he had finished a "sumptuous and glorious palace" he was erecting at Berwick, as a proof that "the curse which was pronounced upon the rebuilders of Jericho was executed upon him." Spotswood characterizes him as "a man of deep wit, few words, and in his majesty's service no less faithful than fortunate:" "the most difficil affairs," adds the archbishop, "he compassed without any noise, and never returned, when he was employed, without the work performed that he was sent to do." His death, which was followed by the rapid rise of Somerset, and by considerable changes in the civil government, made no change in the affairs of the Scottish church, the management of which was now entirely in the hands of the bishops, the new powers conferred upon whom by the assembly at Glasgow were confirmed in still more ample and unqualified terms by a parliament which met at Edinburgh in October, 1612. Even the old popular spirit of hatred to prelacy and the Anglican forms of worship seems to have at this time been nearly wearied out. Calderwood admits, that when, in the spring of 1614, the people were charged by royal proclamation to observe Easter Sunday by all communicating at their parish kirks, "the most part obeyed, howbeit there were acts of the general assembly standing in force against it." The death of Gladstanes, archbishop of St. Andrews, in May, 1615, opened the primacy to Spotswood, who was succeeded as archbishop of Glasgow by Law, bishop of Orkney. "Here it is to be observed," exclaims Calderwood, writing while both these prelates were still at the head of the church, "that Mr. John Spotswood and Mr. James Law, both some time ministers within the presbytery of Linlithgow, two pretty foot-ball men, are now the only two archbishops in Scotland, and have now, as we use to say, the ball at their foot. They were both near the point of suspension in the purer times for the profanation of the Sabbath: now they have power to suspend, deprive, imprison, fine, or confine any minister in Scotland. Out of preposterous pity they were spared then; but now they spare not the best and the most blameless."

In August, 1616, another general assembly was called together at Aberdeen for the purpose of making certain further alterations which were still wanting in order to assimilate the Scottish church to that of England. "A number of lords and barons sat there," says Calderwood, "with their silks and satins, but had not lawful commission to vote." In this assembly, among many other things, it was enacted, that "an uniform order of liturgy, or divine service, be set down to be read in all the kirks, on the ordinary days of prayer, and every Sabbath-day before sermon, to the end the common people may be acquainted therewith, and, by custom, may learn to serve God rightly;" that there should be a uniformity of church discipline throughout all the kirks of the kingdom, and that for that purpose a book of canons should be made and printed, "drawn forth of the books of the former assemblies, and, where the same is defective, that it be supplied by canons of councils and ecclesiastical conventions in former times;" and that registers of baptisms and burials should be kept in every parish. A new confession of faith was also drawn up and published, to be universally received throughout the kingdom, and to which all persons hereafter should be bound to swear and set their hand.[1] James was desirous that certain additional ordinances touching kneeling at the Lord's Supper, the private administration of the sacraments in certain cases, the observance of holydays, and the rite of confirmation, should be adopted; but "the difficulty of admitting these articles," Spotswood tells us, "being represented in an humble letter to his majesty by the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, and a reason given why the same could not be inserted with the canons, as having at no time been mentioned to the church, nor proposed in any of their meetings, he was pleased to forbear pressing of the same for that time, thinking, at his coming into Scotland, which he intended the next summer, to satisfy such as were scrupulous, and to obtain the church's consent."

In January following, accordingly, James wrote to his Scottish council, informing them of his intention to visit his ancient kingdom, an intention proceeding out "of a longing he had to see the place of his breeding, a salmon-like instinct," as he characteristically expressed himself. "Among other directions sent from the king," says Spotswood, "one was for repairing of the chapel (the chapel royal in Holyrood House), and some English carpenters employed, who brought with them the portraits of the Apostles to be set in the pews or stalls. As they were proceeding in their work, a foolish and idle rumor went, that the images were to be set up in the chapel;[1] and, as people are given to speak the worst, it was current among them that the organs came first, now the images, and ere long they should have the mass. The Bishop of Galloway, then dean of the chapel, moved with these speeches, did pen a letter to the king, entreating his majesty, for the offense that was taken, to stay the affixing of these portraits. To this letter he procured the subscriptions of the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, the bishops of Aberdeen and Brechin, and divers of the ministers of Edinburgh. The answer returned by the king was full of anger, objecting ignorance unto them that could not distinguish betwixt pictures intended for ornament and decoration, and images erected for worship and adoration; and resembling them to the constable of Castile, who, being sent to swear the peace concluded with Spain, when he understood the business was to be performed in the chapel, where some anthems were to be sung, desired that, whatsoever was sung, God's name might not be used in it, and, that being forborne, he was contented they should sing what they listed. Just so, said the king, you can endure lions, dragons, and devils to be figured in your churches, but will not allow the like place to the patriarchs and apostles." James, however, having thus discharged himself of his ever-ready and abounding rhetoric, then consulted his equally-unfailing caution and timidity, and concluded his epistle by giving order for stopping the erecting of the portraits—covering, at the same time, the concession which pusillanimity or prudence had extorted from him by professing, with the shallow and transparent trickery he was accustomed to call kingcraft, that he had not yielded "for ease of their hearts, or confirming them in their error, but because the work could not be done so quickly in that kind as was first appointed."

This incident was prophetic of a good deal that followed in the course of James's personal dealing on this occasion, first with the parliament, and then with the assembled representatives of the clergy of his native country, as may be seen by turning to the summary of his proceedings in the first chapter.[1] The church historians have preserved some curious details of what took place in regard to the first point upon which his majesty found it expedient to draw back in the end, after the usual violence and precipitation in entering upon it.

The principal article to which the sanction of the parliament was demanded was drawn up originally in the following terms:—"That whatsoever conclusion was taken by his majesty, with advice of the archbishops and bishops, in matters of external policy, the same should have the power and strength of an ecclesiastical law." This was too strong even for the bishops themselves, who were alarmed at the notion of becoming parties to so abrupt and undisguised an extinction of whatever the church courts still retained of even the name and semblance of their ancient powers; and at the intercession of their lordships, who represented, that in the making of laws in the Scottish church the advice and consent of presbyters had at all times been requisite, James was induced to allow the article to be altered so as to include along with the archbishops and bishops "a competent number of the ministry;" and in this form it was actually passed. Before it had received the royal assent the clergy subscribed their strong protestation against it; but Spotswood asserts, that "as it falleth out in things unadvisedly done, and in the heat of humor, the principals in that business, quickly forethinking that which they had done, came the next morning early to the Archbishop of St. Andrew's (Spotswood himself), entreating him to stop the presenting thereof, which they showed he might easily do by taking the same from Mr. Peter Hewet, in whose hand it was given to present." According to Calderwood, Hewet, or Hewat, was the writer of the protestation. We will let the archbishop tell the rest of the story, which, even in his own version, is not particularly to the credit of his grace. "This man (Hewat)," he says, "being one of the ministers of Edinburgh, had lately before been preferred to the abbacy of Crossragwell, and, having thereby a place in the parliament-house, was held the most fitting to present the protestation, which he willingly undertook, for he loved ever to be meddling, and was always set to make trouble. The parliament was that day to close, and the archbishop, knowing how ill the king would take their doing, went the more timely to the palace, where, meeting with the abbot, he asked him concerning the protestation, desiring to see it, and, having perused a few lines, began to rebuke him for taking in hand such a business. He, making some excuse, and saying it was a protestation only, which could not offend, put forth his hand to take back the paper; but the archbishop holding it fast, the protestation was near rent betwixt them. It happened one of the grooms, called John Levingston, to see them at strife (for they had met in the private gallery near to his majesty's chamber), who, showing the king what he had seen, his majesty came forth, being as yet undressed, and asked what the matter was. The archbishop answered, that a number of ministers, having framed a protestation against the article of his majesty's prerogative, had given it to the man that he had made abbot to present, and that he had undertaken to do the same, for which he (the archbishop) had been chiding him, it being an undutiful part in him, without signifying the matter to his ordinary, to take such a business in hand. The man, falling upon his knees and trembling, said that he supposed the protestation would never offend his majesty, and that he had promised to present the same in parliament, but, now that it appeared to him otherwise, he would no more meddle therewith." The fright, however, into which he was thrown by this fight between the archbishop and the abbot shook James's resolution; he immediately went and commanded the register, or clerk of the parliament, to pass by the article "as a thing no way necessary, the prerogative of his crown bearing him to more than was declared by it;" thus, in his customary way, veiling, or vainly trying to veil, with another false pretense, the real motive of his conduct, and thinking to make his cowardice pass for magnanimity by means of a few big words.

It should appear that the resolution of calling a convention of the clergy of St. Andrew's was taken in consequence of this failure in the parliament. There assembled in the chapel of the archbishop's castle, along with the bishops, according to Spotswood, "the ministers of chief accompt, to the number of thirty-six." Having narrated his two successive attempts to effect the establishment of the additional canons—first, by desiring them to be inserted among the acts of the church, as ordered to be collected by the Aberdeen assembly; secondly, by his proposal in the late parliament for a declaration of his prerogative in the making of ecclesiastical laws—when "certain of your number," said he, "did maliciously assemble themselves, and form a protestation to cross my just desires;" he proceeded: "But I will pass that among many other wrongs I have received at your hands: the errand for which I have now called you is, to hear what your scruples are in these points, and the reasons, if any you can have, why the same ought not to be admitted." With a ludicrous affectation of logic, while in the very act of using the most open and outrageous violence, he further told them that he meant to do nothing against reason; but, on the other hand, his demands being just and religious, they must not think that he would be refused or resisted. "For your approving or disapproving," said he, "deceive not yourselves; I will never regard it, unless you bring me a reason which I can not answer." That, in truth, is what it would be hard enough to do in behalf of any thing whatever, with a very pertinacious disputant—on which account it is fortunate that men's decisions and the course of human affairs are not left to be directed and impelled solely by logomachy or argumentation: with King James, in the present case, the attempt was manifestly not to be thought of. The poor ministers therefore fell on their knees, and besought him that, in lieu of the proposed debate with himself, he would indulge them with a general assembly, "wherein these articles, being proposed, might be with a common consent received." "The king," to follow Spotswood's narrative, "asking what assurance he might have of their consenting, they answered, that they found no reason to the contrary, and knew the assembly would yield to any reasonable thing demanded by his majesty. But if it fall out otherwise, said the king, and that the articles be refused, my difficulty shall be greater; and when I shall use my authority in establishing them, they shall call me a tyrant and persecutor. All crying that none could be so mad as to speak so, yet experience, says the king, tells me it may be so; therefore, unless I be made sure, I will not give way to an assembly. Mr. Patrick Galloway saying that the Bishop of St. Andrew's should answer for them, the bishop refused, for that he had been deceived by them, they having, against their promise in the time of parliament, taken the course which they did." In the end, however, the king agreed to take the assurance of Mr. Patrick Galloway himself for the proper behavior of the ministers, and consented to call a general assembly, which accordingly met at St. Andrew's on the day appointed, the 25th of November, about four months after his majesty's return to England. But here only "a fashion was made," as Spotswood phrases it, of agreeing to one of the five articles—that which directed that the communion in certain circumstances might be given privately, and that whenever it was celebrated the minister, contrary to the Presbyterian practice, should give the bread and wine out of his own hands to each of the communicants.

To the letter of the two archbishops, announcing what had been done, James returned a furious answer:—"We will have you to know," said his majesty, "that we are come to that age as we will not be content to be fed with broth, as one of your coat has wont to speak, and think this your doing a disgrace no less than the protestation itself." "Since your Scottish church," he added, in a postscript, "hath so far contemned my clemency, they shall now find what it is to draw the anger of a king upon them." Meanwhile he commanded both their graces to "keep Christmas Day precisely" themselves, preaching and choosing their texts according to the time, and to urge as many of the other bishops as they could warn in time to do the same. In another epistle, addressed to Spotswood alone, he inveighed in terms of the bitterest contempt against the scruples of the assembly, and what he called the ridiculous manner in which the two penurious concessions they had made were hedged and conceived; and he concluded by intimating that—especially since the point of kneeling at the Lord's Supper had not been yielded, so that either he and the English church must be held to be idolatrous in that particular, or the Scottish clergy reputed rebellious knaves in refusing what was asked of them—it was his pleasure that the regulations that had been passed by the assembly should be altogether suppressed, and that no effect whatever should follow thereupon. A third letter was at the same time sent to the Scottish council, desiring them to withhold the payment of their stipends from all the rebellious ministers until they should produce evidence of their conformity under the hands of their bishops; and this, says Spotswood, "being showed to the ministers of Edinburgh and others that happened to repair to that city for augmentation of stipends, did cast them into a great fear, and, repenting their willfulness, as they had reason, they became requesters to the Archbishop of St. Andrews to preach, as he was commanded, on Christmas Day, at Edinburgh, trusting his majesty should be mitigated by his obedience and intercession for the rest." James, in fact, was prevailed upon to suspend the edict prohibiting the payment of the refractory clergymen, and to convoke another assembly, to be held at Perth, on the 25th of August, 1618. "We were once fully resolved," he wrote in his letter sent to be read at the opening of this new convocation, "never in our time to have called any more assemblies here for ordering things concerning the policy of the church, by reason of the disgrace offered unto us in that late meeting of St. Andrew's, wherein our just and godly desires were not only neglected, but some of the articles concluded in that scornful manner as we wish they had been refused with the rest." He again told the assembled clergy that, although he should be very glad to have their consent to the articles, yet they must not think that he had not authority sufficient to enjoin such things upon the church in spite of any opposition they might make. If any of the other inhabitants of his native kingdom of Scotland, he intimated, had had their minds infected with the same spirit of opposition, he was sure they had been corrupted by the clergy. "What and how many abuses," said he, "were offered us by divers of the ministry there before our happy coming to the crown of England, we can hardly forget, and yet like not much to remember; neither think we that any prince living should have kept himself from falling in utter dislike with the profession itself, considering the many provocations that were given unto us." After the king's letter had been read, the primate, who assumed the place of moderator or president, made a speech, "wherein he protested," writes Calderwood, "that he craved not these novations, and that it was against his will that they were proposed; yet he was persuaded that his majesty would be more glad of the consent of this assembly to these five articles than of all the gold of India. But, in case of their refusal, he assured them that the whole estate and order of our kirk would be overthrown; some ministers would be banished, other some deprived of their stipend and office, and all would be brought under the wrath of authority." The assembly sat only two days, the principal debates being carried on in the secret committee for preparing the business to be brought before the House, then called the conference; and on the second day, Thursday, the 27th, the whole of the five articles, being put to the vote, at once received the suffrages of all the members, except one nobleman, one doctor, and forty-five ministers. All the burgesses, without any exception, voted in their favor. The first enjoined that persons coming to the Lord's Supper should receive the sacrament "meekly and reverently upon their knees;" the second, that the communion might in extreme cases be privately administered, "three or four of good religion and conversation" being present with the sick person to partake of it along with him, according to the order prescribed in the church; the third, that baptism might in cases of great need be in like manner administered in private houses; the fourth, that children, when they arrived at the proper age, should be confirmed by the bishops, or, as it was expressed, that every parish minister having catechised all the children in his parish of eight years of age, and seen that they were able to make rehearsal of the Lord's Prayer, Belief, and Ten Commandments, and to answer the questions of the small Catechism, the bishops should "cause the said children to be presented before them, and bless them with prayer for the increase of their knowledge and the continuance of God's heavenly graces with every one of them; the fifth, that on the days and times universally set apart by the church, the birth, passion, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ, and the sending down of the Holy Ghost, should be commemorated by the performance of divine service, and that on the said days all ministers should "make choice of several and pertinent texts of Scripture, and frame their doctrine and exhortation thereto, and rebuke all superstitious observation and licentious profanation thereof." In the following October obedience to these new ecclesiastical constitutions was enjoined upon all the king's Scottish subjects by a proclamation from the privy council, in which it was particularly commanded that the people should "abstain from all kind of labor and handiwork" upon the five newly-established holydays; and although the acts of the assembly had not yet received any parliamentary ratification, the authorities did not scruple to apply all the ordinary means of enforcing their observance, just as if they were already become in the strictest sense the law of the land. Several persons were from time to time brought before the Court of High Commission for the violation of the holydays; but the point upon which the people stood out most obstinately appears to have been the kneeling at the communion. To gain their compliance here persuasion and stratagem were employed, as well as harsher courses, if we may believe the Presbyterian authorities. The following is Calderwood's account of the celebration of the communion in the capital, on Easter Sunday, the 28th of March, 1619: "To allure many to come to the kirk, the ministers of Edinburgh offered them liberty to sit, stand, or kneel, as they pleased, and dealt with some in particular; but few were moved with the offer—cold and graceless were their communions, and few were the communicants. And those who did communicate, either kneeled not, or, if they kneeled, were of the poorer sort, who lived upon the contribution (the money collected at the church-doors), and kneeled more for awe than for devotion, or were members of the secret council or of the College of Justice. Some were deceived with the offer of liberty made by the ministers; for, when they came, the ministers used all the means they could to cause them to kneel." He adds: "The communion was celebrated the same day in the Abbey Kirk, the West Kirk, and in the kirk on the north side of the bridge of Leith, after the old form, whereunto the inhabitants of Edinburgh resorted in great numbers. In some kirks of the country, where the minister conformed, the people went forth and left the minister alone. Some, when they could not get the sacrament sitting, departed, and besought God to be judge betwixt them and the minister." Many ministers were punished, some by suspension, some by deprivation, some by being put into ward, for non-conformity with the five articles in various ways, or for preaching or speaking against them; and some proceedings were even taken, in April, 1620, to order certain citizens of Edinburgh into confinement, without any regular trial, "for assisting refractory ministers in all their disobedience, and countenancing them in all their public doings." An anxious inquisition was repeatedly made for all books and pamphlets written against the authority of the Perth assembly—especially for one by David Calderwood (the author of "The True History of the Church of Scotland," so largely referred to in the preceding pages), who, after hiding himself for some time, fled, in August, 1619, beyond seas, "with his purse well filled by the wives of Edinburgh," as he has himself told us the other party asserted at the time. But after these methods had been tried, with little effect, for three or four years, the government at last determined to have the five articles of Perth confirmed by the legislature, and a parliament was assembled at Edinburgh, principally for that purpose, in July, 1621. When it was about to meet, a number of zealous ministers (there seems to have been about thirty of them) hastened to that city from different parts of the kingdom, and prepared a supplication or petition against the articles; but the day before the parliament opened they were by an order of council charged to be gone within twenty-four hours, under the pain of rebellion; and to this command they thought it expedient to yield obedience, only first drawing up and leaving behind them certain voluminous reasons and protestations, which, according to Calderwood, "made such impression upon the hearts of many, that few would have consented to the ratification of the five articles, if they had not been wrought upon by the Marquis of Hamilton (the king's commissioner), the secretary, and others that were set on work by them." The confirmation of the acts of the Perth assembly was carried in the committee of the lords of the articles, with the opposition only of four members, of whom the most distinguished was Sir John Hamilton, of Preston, commissioner or representative for the shire of East Lothian, a relation of the marquis. The subject, however, was not brought forward in the House till the last day of the sitting, Saturday, the 4th of August. Between three and four o'clock on the morning of that day a great fire broke out in Edinburgh, which "was taken," says Calderwood, "for a forewarning to the estates to take care what they did." Nor was this all; "Many of the people," the historian adds, "being convened in the outward court of the palace of Holyrood House, observed that when the lords were mounted on their horses a swan did flee over their heads from the north toward the south, flaffing with her wings, and muttering her natural song—the people, shaking their heads, whispered among themselves that they feared a bad conclusion of that parliament." Spotswood affirms that the marquis "did carry himself and the matters committed to his trust with such wisdom and foresight as within a few days he brought them all to the end which he wished without any open contradiction." But from the more detailed account of the Presbyterian chronicler it appears that the act of ratification was not obtained without very considerable opposition and difficulty. Great efforts were made to gain over Sir John Hamilton; but nothing would induce him either to change his vote or even to absent himself. Even of those who did not take the same bold part of directly opposing the measure, several are represented as having assented to it with visible reluctance. "The half of the town of Edinburgh," says the account, "was not gathered to attend upon the lords and other estates when they came riding up the street. When they were in the parliament-house, the noblemen, according to the custom, went into the inner house, and came forth to the outer house, by degrees, to their place. But the earls of Morton, Buchan, and the Viscount of Lauderdale, staid in the inner house till the kirk's part was called, and God's worship through her sides had received a deadly wound; and then came forth to their own places to play their parts in civil matters." Unusual precautions are also asserted to have been taken to prevent the free expression of opinion. Scarcely any debate was allowed, and, as had been done in the assembly, only one vote was taken upon all the articles. If we may trust to Calderwood, the vote even in this form was not fairly taken; the members, he says, "were directed to express their voices by these words—Agree, Disagree. It came to pass that the wide opening of the mouth at the syllable A did eat up the first syllable Dis, specially by those who spoke with a low voice, being threatened and menaced with the menacing eyes and looks of the secretar; and so the negative was noted for the affirmative, Agree for Disagree. . . . When the chancellor desired some, that for fear uttered not their voice distinctly, to speak out freely, the secretar said, Nay, my lord, let them alone; those that will not speak out, let the clerk mark them as consenters; and so were some of them marked indeed." The innovation of voting by proxy, which had been introduced by an act passed in the last parliament, is also objected to as one of the "uncouth" or strange practices to which recourse was had on this occasion. The result appears from Calderwood's lists to have been, that all the bishops who were present, being eleven in number, voted for the measure; that of the nobility and officers of state, thirty-five voted in the affirmative, and fifteen in the negative; of the commissioners for shires, fifteen in the affirmative, and nineteen in the negative; and of the commissioners for burghs, twenty in the affirmative, and twenty-five in the negative. This would give in all eighty-one votes in favor of the ratification, and fifty-nine against it.[1]

The anger of the Almighty, however, was universally believed by the Presbyterians to have been visibly and audibly manifested on occasion of this extinction of the liberties of the "true kirk." "When all the acts were now concluded," writes their fervent historian, "and the ringleaders were insulting over the defenders of ancient orders, and wishing every one to have wings to flee to court with the report, the grand commissioner, rising from the throne to ratify the acts by touch of the scepter, at the same very moment was sent from the heavens, in at the windows of the House, which was dark before by reason of the darkness of the day, an extraordinary great lightning; after the first a second, and after the second a third more fearful. Immediately after the lightnings followed an extraordinary great darkness, which astonished all that were in the House. The lightnings were seconded with three loud claps of thunder. Many within the parliament-house thought them to be shots of cannons out of the Castle. It appeared to all that dwelt within the compass of ten or twelve miles, that the clouds stood right above the town, and overshadowed that part only. The beacon standing in the entry of Leith haven was beaten down with one of the blasts of thunder. After the lightning, darkness and thunder followed a shower of hailstones extraordinary great, and last of all rain in such abundance that it made gutters run like little brooks. The lords were imprisoned about the space of an hour and a half. Servants rode home with foot-mantles, and their masters withdrew themselves, some to their coach, some to their foot. So the five articles were not honored with the carrying of the honors, or riding of the estates in ranks. In the mean time the Castle thundered with their fiery cannons, according to the custom used at other parliaments. This Saturday, the 4th of August, was called by the people Black Saturday. It began with fire from earth in the morning, and ended with fire from heaven in the evening. When the fear was over, then durst atheists scoff and say, that, as the Law was given with fire from Mount Sinai, so did these fires confirm their laws."[2]

[1] A further list, however, is added of peers and commissioners, who, says the historian, "were either absent, or, if present, what were their votes I am uncertain."

[2] Among such atheists the worthy Presbyterian historian would, probably, have reckoned his episcopal rival, whose notice of the storm is as follows:—"At the closing of the parliament, which was the 4th of August, such abundance of rain, with such thunderings and lightnings, did fall, as the noblemen and others of the estates were compelled to leave their horses and betake them to their coaches, which the factious sort did interpret to be a visible sign of God's anger for ratifying the acts of Perth; others, in derision of their folly, said that it was to be taken for an approbation from heaven, likening the same to the thunderings and lightnings at the giving of the law to Moses." —Spotswood, Hist. p. 542. Calderwood records, that on Monday, the 20th of August, when the acts of the late parliament were, according to custom, proclaimed at the market-cross of Edinburgh, "the tempest, rain, thunder, and fire-flaughs were renewed, and continued all the time of the reading of the acts at the Cross."—Hist. p. 781.

The news of the passing of the act of ratification put King James in great spirits; but the bishops and the government in Scotland probably did not share in his majesty's confident self-gratulations that all his troubles with the kirk were now at an end. In an epistle addressed to them on the 12th of August, we find him rating the Archbishop of St. Andrew's and his brethren in round terms for the little joy they had testified at what had been done. "Solomon saith," he begins, "that every thing hath a time; and therefore certainly the last letter which we received from you was written in an unseasonable time, being fraughted with nothing but grieves and expressions of affection, like lamentations of Jeremy, in the very instant when both we and ye had won so great and honorable a victory against the enemies of all religion and good government; considering also the very time, which was the evening of the 5th of August." "The greatest matter," he goes on, "the Puritans had to object against the church government was, that your proceedings were warranted by no law, which now by this last parliament is cutted short. So that hereafter that rebellious, disobedient, and seditious crew must either obey, or resist both God, their natural king, and the law of the country." It remained only therefore for them, the bishops, to take good heart, and to lose no more time in reducing the country to a settled obedience to God and to him, the king. "The sword," continued James, "is now put in your hands: go on, therefore, to use it, and let it rust no longer, till ye have perfected the service trusted to you; or, otherwise, we must use it both against you and them. If any, or all of you be fainthearted, we are able enough, thanks to God, to put others in your places, who both can and will make this possible." They had two sorts of enemies, he tells them, to deal with, papists and Puritans: as papistry was a disease of the mind, so was Puritanism in the brain; and the only remedy and antidote against both was a grave, settled, uniform, and well-ordered church, obedient to God and their king. "We wish you now," proceeds his majesty, "to go forward in the action with all speed, and not to show yourselves counterfeited now when ye had never so little reason. We expect to hear hereafter from time to time what ye have acted, and of your good success, and not to be troubled any more with questions and conceits." And he ends by wishing them stout hearts and happy success, while he bids them farewell.[1] But great difficulty was still found in inducing public functionaries, the clergy, and the people in general, to conform to the innovations. At first the milder methods of admonitions and threats seem to have been followed by the Court of High Commission; but this course being found to be of little avail, suspensions, deprivations, fines, banishments, imprisonments, and consignments to wards, were again resorted to. · Many details of these latter proceedings, from 1622 to 1625, are preserved by Calderwood.

[1] "This letter," says Calderwood, "as many other of that kind, no doubt was procured by the bishops themselves, if not also devised and penned by them and sent up by court to be subscribed." The characteristic style and spirit of the letter sufficiently refute this notion.

One remarkable effect of these severities was the sudden growth of a practice which had hitherto been scarcely known in the history of the struggle respecting religion in Scotland, but which from this time came to be one of its most remarkable features —the meeting of the people in secret assemblies, in which they might enjoy their favorite mode of worship, and the ministrations of their favorite ministers, both now everywhere expelled from the regular churches of the land. In 1624 a royal proclamation was issued denouncing and prohibiting such meetings, the narrative part of which thus describes their nature: "We have of late known," says his majesty, "to our unspeakable grief, that a number of our subjects—some of them misled by the turbulent persuasions of restless ministers, either deprived from their functions, or confined for just causes, or such as leave the due conduct of their own flock to debauch and seduce their neighbors; many affecting hypocritically the glory of purity and zeal above others; and some corrupted by the bad example of the former—have casten off the reverent respect and obedience that they owe to our authority royal and to their pastors, contemned and impugned their doctrine, disobeyed and controlled their ordinary discipline, abstained to hear the word preached and to participate of the sacraments ministered by them in their own parish, and have disorderly strayed to other congregations, and, in the end, numbers of them have assembled themselves in private houses, in Edinburgh and other places, to hear from intruding ministers preachings, exhortations, prayers, and all sort of exercises fitting their unruly fantasies, many times at the very ordinary hours when their own pastors were, according to their lawful callings, preaching in their parish kirks." These seditious conventicles, it is added, had assumed to themselves the name of congregations, and done their utmost to impress the people with a persuasion that the king and government were persecutors of the sincere professors of the true religion, and had corrupted the government of the church. Calderwood, whose old Presbyterianism withheld him from altogether approving of these irregular meetings, would have us believe that this is a very exaggerated representation of the facts. "A number of good Christians," he says, "convened sometimes, when they had occasion of a sound and zealous minister to stir them up in these times of defection, and recommended to God the desolate estate of this poor kirk; for the pulpits of Edinburgh sounded all the contrary way. But that they abstained from hearing the Word preached, that they had private meetings many times at the ordinary hours when their own pastors were preaching in their parish kirks, or that they assumed to their conventions the name of congregation, are mere forgeries."

One thing still remained to be done to complete the uniformity of the English and Scottish churches—the imposition upon the latter of a liturgy and form of common prayer. An order for drawing up such a form had been passed, as already mentioned, by the Aberdeen assembly of 1616; but it does not appear that any thing was actually done in consequence. Calderwood relates that, in January, 1623, Mr. Robert Howie, principal of the New College of St. Andrew's, and two of his brother professors, were directed by a letter from Dr. Young, Dean of Winchester, written by command of the king, to use the English liturgy at the prayers at which all the students in their college were wont to be present every morning and evening; "which," it is added, "was presently put in execution, notwithstanding, they wanted the warrant of any general assembly, or of any continued practice of the form in times by-past since the Reformation." It appears also that, in the beginning of the following year, Archbishop Spotswood sent up a memorial to court, recommending that a form of public worship and administration of the sacraments, &c., similar to that of the English church, should be drawn up for the church of Scotland, and submitted for the approval and sanction of a general assembly of the clergy, which convocation we may suppose care would have been taken so to model as to insure the adoption by it of whatever was desired by the court. But the continued troubles arising out of the enforcement of the articles of Perth are understood to have filled the hands of the bishops and the government for the present, so that this other project was reserved to become the occasion of a new and much greater storm in the next reign.

One thing worthy of notice in the history of the long religious contest that agitated Scotland for nearly a century and a half after the Reformation, is the absence of any controversy about purely theological dogmas between the two great parties that were so fiercely opposed upon the questions of the government and discipline of the church, and the forms of public worship. Down even to the present day, indeed, doctrinal dissent has made little progress in that country: the only considerable bodies of seceders from the established church there all continue to adhere to its standards of faith. In like manner, in the turbulent times we have been reviewing, Presbyterians and Episcopalians in Scotland were equally Calvinists. The new confession of faith enacted by the Aberdeen assembly of 1616, under the domination of the bishops, was as rigidly conformable to the conclusions of the great Genevese reformer as that of 1560, which was drawn up by Knox himself; or as that afterward compiled and published by the assembly of divines at Westminster, which still remains the authorized exposition of the tenets of the Scottish Presbyterian church. It must be admitted, at the same time, that, generally speaking, the Calvinism of the Episcopalians, although expressed in the same words, and accordant in the mere letter with that of the Presbyterian and Puritanical party, was in spirit and temper really another faith. Great strictness of life, a carriage and disposition largely partaking of ascetism and gloom, an enthusiastic spirit of devotion, with all the other natural concomitants, good and bad, of a hot and devouring zeal—its honesty, its earnestness, its restlessness, its inquisitiveness, its rashness, its arrogance, its egotism, its intolerance, its want of charity—these were the products of the doctrines of election and justification by faith alone, as held by the great body of the Presbyterians. In the generality of the Episcopalians the same profession of belief was associated with features of character directly the reverse: they were neither morose nor precise, but took religion easy, accustomed as they were to feel as if the danger was rather lest there should be too much of it in the world than too little. In their notion, too, it was only in part a spiritual and moral law; it was in great part a mere affair of form and fashion; if the one half of it had come down from heaven, the other was but the manufacture of expediency and the civil magistrates. The violent antagonism into which they were thrown tended, of course, to augment the natural divergence of the two parties; and it is probable that the extreme scrupulosity of the Presbyterians provoked a greater freedom and laxity of manners among their opponents than might otherwise have prevailed. Some even of the Scottish bishops themselves, of this period, are not favorably reported of by history in the article of professional decorum. Without heeding the scandalous imputations and anecdotes which abound in the pages of Calderwood, and other furious Presbyterian authorities, we have the testimony of such a writer as Burnet, for example, who in one place says of them, generally, that they did their part very ill—that most of them were haughty, neglected their functions, were often at court, and lost all esteem with the people;[1] and in another, characterises Spotswood, the primate, as "a prudent and mild man, but of no great decency in his course of life; for he was a frequent player of cards, and used to eat often in taverns; beside, that all his livings were constantly offered to sale by his servants."[2] It is probable, also, that, although no attempt had yet been made to modify the doctrinal standards of the Scottish church, any more than of the English, which were almost equally Calvinistic, yet a disposition to recede from the puritanical party in theological creed, as well as in every thing else, had spread to a considerable extent among the adherents of episcopacy in Scotland before the death of James. The proclamation issued in 1624 for the suppression of conventicles, reminded the lieges that in their own age and in that of their fathers "such pernicious seeds of separation, and singularity of blind and feigned zeal," had "brought forth damned sects of Anabaptists, Families of Love, Brownists, Arminians, Illuminates, and many such pests, enemies to religion, authority, and peace." Upon this passage Calderwood has the following remark: "As for the fear of damnable sects of Arminians, Anabaptists, &c., we had an evident proof that day that the government of prelates is a shelter for damnable sects; for Arminian preachers possessed the most eminent places, and were not only tolerated, but also countenanced, because they maintained in public doctrine the power which our prelates had usurped." As long, however, as James lived, a bar was placed in the way of a perfectly open profession of anti-Calvinistic opinions by the clergy, either in Scotland or in England, or at least of any alteration of the established standards of belief and doctrine, by the character and position of that prince, who, coveting no other sort of renown so much as that of a great theologian, and laying claim, moreover, almost to the authority of a Protestant pope in virtue of his title of Defender of the Faith and supreme earthly head of the churches within his dominions, would have felt himself to be insulted in the most tender point by any proposal of remodeling his own and the national creed. His orthodoxy James regarded as the highest test and token of his learning: it was with him the point of honor, upon which he stood as punctiliously as ever woman did upon her chastity, or knight of old romance upon his courage. We have seen, in the preceding chapter, how his zeal took fire and flamed up on occasion of the Arminian Vorstius being appointed, in 1611, by the States of Holland, to the professorship of divinity at Leyden; and how the following year a much more frightful outblaze of it actually consumed at the stake here in England the bodies of two unfortunate Socinians or Arians.[1] When in 1618, also, the Calvinistic party in Holland succeeded in assembling the great Protestant council or synod of Dort for the condemnation of the Arminians and their tenets, James sent four English and one Scotch divine to represent the British churches, and to take part in the assertion of the famous Five Points, as they were called, of absolute predestination, the limitation of the benefits of the death of Christ to the elect only, the necessity of justifying grace, the bondage of the human will, and the perseverance of the saints. After this, the Calvinistic sense even of the more doubtful parts of the Thirty-nine Articles could not, with any decency, be openly called in question either by James himself, or by any of his bishops, so long as he occupied the throne. Nevertheless, with all this persistency in the doctrinal formulæ of Calvinism, various motives operated strongly to separate James from the more zealous professors of that creed in every thing except what we may call their mere verbal theology. If the notions of Calvin as to the mysteries and metaphysics of Christianity were to his taste, the system of the Genevan reformer, both in its political and in its moral spirit, was his abhorrence. He hated its moroseness and asceticism, as well as its democratic and republican tendencies. The Presbyterians in Scotland and the Puritans in England, the two parties with whom he was at strife during his whole reign, were to a man Calvinists. The most ardent friends of monarchy and episcopacy, on the other hand, were many of them well known to be secretly disposed toward Arminianism, however they might find it necessary for the present to cloak their real sentiments. In truth, the hostility into which the two parties were thrown by their differences as to other matters naturally tended to divide them also in their purely speculative theology, and, since the Puritans were all Calvinists, to make the generality of churchmen Arminians. Such, accordingly, was fast coming to be the case toward the close of the present reign. And James himself went as far as he consistently could in the same direction in which the most active supporters of the established church were beginning to lead the way. He did not abjure his old Calvinistic articles of faith, but every thing else of Calvinism he threw off and opposed by every means in his power. A few months before the assembling of the Synod of Dort, he had published his Book of Sports;[1] or "Declaration to encourage Recreations and Sports on the Lord's Day," the object, according to a zealous Episcopalian historian, being to counteract the evils occasioned by the Puritans, who, by raising the Sabbath, had taken occasion to depress the festivals, and had introduced by little and little a general neglect of the weekly fasts, the holy time of Lent, and the embering days. "But this was not all the mischief that ensued," adds this cotemporary authority; "for several preachers and justices of the peace took occasion from hence to forbid all lawful sports on the Lord's Day, by means whereof the priests and Jesuits persuaded the people in the northern counties that the reformed religion was incompatible with that Christian liberty which God and nature had indulged to the sons of men; so that, to preserve the people from popery, his majesty was brought under a necessity to publish the Book of Sports."[2] If his majesty had made public proclamation of his disbelief in Christianity altogether, he could scarcely have more outraged the feelings of the puritanical party than by this declaration, in which it was announced to be his pleasure, "for his good people's recreation," "that after the end of divine service they should not be disturbed, letted, or discouraged from any lawful recreations; such as dancing, either of men or women, archery for men, leaping, vaulting, or any such harmless recreations; nor having of May-poles, Whitsun-ales, or morrice-dances, or setting up of May-poles, or other sports therewith used, so as the same may be done in due and convenient time, without impediment or let of divine service; and that women should have leave to carry rushes to the church for the decoring of it, according to their old customs." This method of driving away popery no doubt seemed to many very like the bringing back of some of its worst enormities. In fact, the anti-puritanism of James and his friends swung them round again toward the old religion in other respects as well as in this; and hence, during this and the next reign, Arminian sentiments in theology came to be generally held as implying inclinations both toward popery in the church and absolute government in the state, although there is certainly no reason for supposing that such tendencies have naturally any closer connection with one side of the controversy about predestination and grace than with the other. And, notwithstanding all his professed Calvinism, James, in his latter years, found himself driven by the force of political considerations into what might almost be called the direct discountenancing and discouragement of that mode of faith, and the patronage of its opposite. Abbot, the Calvinistic archbishop of Canterbury, ceased to have any influence at court, and was eventually disgraced and suspended; while Laud, Neile, Harsnet, Buckeridge, and others, his enemies or rivals, theological, political, and personal, were promoted to the richest bishoprics and other chief dignities in the church. In August, 1622, certain royal injunctions were issued to the clergy, having for their evident and all but avowed purpose the silencing of all such ministers as were most zealous in the inculcation of Calvinistic doctrines. Not only was preaching, the great weapon of the Puritanical and Calvinistic party, restrained and hampered by the order that no preacher, under the rank of a bishop or a dean, should in his sermons fall into any commonplace of divinity not to be found in the Thirty-nine Articles or the Homilies, but it was moreover expressly commanded that no mere parish minister should presume to discourse to any popular auditory on the deep points of predestination, election, reprobation, the universality, efficacy, resistibility, or irresistibility of God's grace —in other words, upon any one of the doctrines peculiar to Calvinism. All persons offending against this regulation, or against another, which prohibited any preacher of any degree whatsoever from henceforth presuming in any auditory to declare, limit, or set bounds to the prerogative, power, or jurisdiction of sovereign princes, or to meddle at all with affairs of state, were made punishable with suspension for a year and a day, till his majesty should prescribe some further penalty with advice of the convocation. This was, if not an actual abjuration of Calvinism on the part of the king and the court party in the church, at the very least a distinct abandonment of all the distinguishing articles of that creed as essential articles of belief, which, in the view of Calvinistic orthodoxy, was quite as damnable a heresy as the absolute rejection or denial of them. On the other hand, the Arminian bishops and clergy were accused of making open advances toward popery fully as fast as they receded from Calvinism. To quote the summary of a modern ecclesiastical historian of Puritan principles, "the new bishops admitted the church of Rome to be a true church, and the pope the first bishop of Christendom. They declared for the lawfulness of images in churches; for the real presence; and that the doctrine of transubstantiation was a school nicety. They pleaded for confession to a priest, for sacerdotal absolution, and the proper merit of good works. They claimed an uninterrupted succession of the episcopal character from the Apostles, through the church of Rome, which obliged them to maintain the validity of her ordinations, when they denied the validity of those of the foreign Protestants. Further, they began to imitate the church of Rome in her gaudy ceremonies, in the rich furniture of their chapels, and the pomp of their worship. They complimented the Roman Catholic priests with their dignitary titles, and spent all their zeal in studying how to compromise matters with Rome, while they turned their backs upon the old Protestant doctrines of the Reformation, and were remarkably negligent in preaching or instructing the people in Christian knowledge,"[1] Dissent of course throve under this neglect; and the more the heads of the church tended to Arminianism, to popery, and to the doctrine of absolutism in politics, the farther and the faster did the people go on receding from all these things, and drifting over to Puritanism, Calvinism, and democracy.

Such was the state to which things had been brought when James died, and his son, Charles, came to reign in his stead. Notwithstanding, however, that the course of events from the beginning of the new reign continued to be in the highest degree favorable to the progress of the movement that had already advanced so far, it required still a space of some years to bring the gradually-rising waters up to the bursting or overflowing point. The rush came at last from the north, and a dark-rolling inundation of Presbytery soon filled the whole length and breadth of the land.

We have seen to what insignificance the general assemblies of the Scottish church had been reduced before the death of James; from the accession of Charles they were no longer suffered to be held at all. And even in the synods and presbyteries the bishops, who were in their own persons or by their nominees perpetual moderators of these subordinate courts, controlled every thing: so that the great body of the clergy, so potent in the former popular constitution of the church, were now brought down to be mere parish priests, with little more to say in a legislative or regulating character than the common soldiery have in an army. The chief administration of ecclesiastical affairs was left in the hands of the primate, Archbishop Spotswood; but, although his power in this department was nearly absolute, it is admitted even by Presbyterian writers that Spotswood's government was not only able, but, upon the whole, as temperate and conciliatory as it well could have been in the circumstances, and that probably the convulsions which eventually broke out might have been prevented if his authority had been permitted to continue unimpaired and uninterfered with. From the very first, however, the archbishop was pressed upon with importunities to advance at a quicker step than he was inclined to take, both by some of his right reverend brethren, and more especially by the king himself, acting under the instigation of the restless and impatient Laud. Where no violent opposition was offered, conformity on the part of the clergy to the late restrictive laws which had been carried in the assembly and the parliament had not at first been very strictly enforced by Spotswood and the Scottish privy council; but within a few weeks after his accession Charles wrote to the archbishop, informing him that he was determined that there should be an end of this laxity; and in July, 1626, he sent down a set of regulations, in which, although it was directed that such ministers as had been admitted before the assembly of 1618, and had previously preached against conformity, should be excused from obeying the five articles or canons of Perth for a little time, till they should be better instructed, and that all those who had been banished, confined, or suspended should be replaced in their charges, on giving security for their future good behavior—indulgences and concessions probably obtained by Spotswood's representations—it was at the same time ordered that conformity to the said five canons should be strictly enforced on all who had been admitted to the ministry since the Perth assembly, and that a bond to that effect should be subscribed by every new entrant into the ministry at his admission.

About the same time, the further to exalt the hierarchy, his majesty hastened to confer upon Spotswood, its head, certain marks of dignity and preëminence which were as distasteful to the aristocracy as to the popular sentiment of the Scottish nation. First he was admitted by the royal command to a new office, that of President of the Court of Exchequer; and soon after, letters came down directing that, as primate and metropolitan, he should take place, as was the custom in England, before the lord chancellor, and of course before all others of the temporal nobility. To this transposition, however, Hay (afterward Earl of Kinnoul), who then held the office of chancellor, "a gallant, stout man," as Sir James Balfour, the annalist, calls him, never would submit. Balfour, who was lord-lyon-king-at-arms, and consequently conversant with such matters, relates an incident which vividly portrays the irritation and scorn excited in the breasts of the fierce and haughty Scottish nobles of that day, by the intrusion of these novel pretensions of the clergy. "I remember," says he, "that King Charles sent me to the lord chancellor (being then Earl of Kinnoul) the day of his coronation, in the morning, in anno 1633, to show him that it was his will and pleasure, but only for that day, that he would cede and give place to the archbishop: but he returned by me to his majesty a very brisk answer, which was, that since his majesty had been pleased to continue him in that office of chancellor, which, by his means, his worthy father of famous memory had bestowed upon him, he was ready in all humility to lay it down at his majesty's feet; but, since it was his royal will he should enjoy it with the known privileges of the same, never a stoned priest in Scotland should set a foot before him so long as his blood was hot. When I had related his answer to the king, he said, Weel, Lyon, let's go to business; I will not meddle further with that old cankered goutish man, at whose hands there is nothing to be gained but sour words."[1] Hay, accordingly, was troubled no more on the subject, till he died, about a year and a half after this (16th December, 1634), when Spotswood was immediately raised to the office of chancellor himself.

It is believed, however, that certain of his brethren had already been for some years at work in undermining the influence of the primate at court. Spotswood himself is said to have made no fewer than fifty journeys to London in the course of his primacy of about twenty-four years; but the opposition of temper between him and Laud made all this diligence of little effect. Excepting at the times of these short periodical visits he had necessarily his hands fully occupied with the affairs of his two high offices, and little leisure either for cultivating court favor, or for watching and counteracting the intrigues of his opponents and rivals. A custom, too, had grown up of having one of the bishops generally resident in London, in order, as is was expressed, to deal with his majesty for the weal of the church, contributions being collected throughout the country for the maintenance of the persons who were successively sent up on this commission, which afforded the best opportunity for the more ambitious members of the bench to insinuate themselves into the good graces of Laud, and to seek to advance their fortunes by siding with him against their own metropolitan. In the pursuit of this object they adopted and made ostentatious profession of Laud's Arminian theology, as well as of his church and state politics; and while the openly avowed design of the measures which they urged forward was to bring the Scottish church, in discipline, in doctrine, and in ceremonies, into perfect conformity with the English, it was universally felt that they also desired to bring both churches nearer than either of them yet was to the original popish model in all these respects.

According to Burnet, Charles had, from the first, set his heart upon carrying through two designs in regard to the church of Scotland, "that his father had set on foot, but had let the prosecution of them fall in the last year of his reign." The first of these was the recovery of the tithes and church-lands; for which end we are told he determined to go on with and complete the project only begun, or rather only announced, by James, of annulling all the grants of property of this description made in the minority of the latter, and also to augment the spiritual lords in parliament to their old number by the restoration of the titular abbots. In this scheme, however, but little progress was made beyond the secret purchase from the two great families of Hamilton and Lennox of the abbey of Arbroath for the see of St. Andrew's, and the lordship of Glasgow for the other archbishopric. "These lords," says Burnet, "made a show of zeal after a good bargain, and surrendered them to the king. He also purchased several estates of less value to the several sees; and all men who pretended to favor at court offered their church-lands to sale at a low rate." But no grants were, as had at first been threatened or intended, actually resumed without compensation. It may be also mentioned, in connection with this matter, that when Charles came down to Scotland to be crowned, in 1633, he erected a new bishopric at Edinburgh; "and," says Burnet, in his gossiping way, "made one Forbes bishop, who was a very learned and pious man: he had a strange faculty of preaching five or six hours at a time: his way of life and devotion was thought monastic, and his learning lay in antiquity; he studied to be a reconciler between Papists and Protestants, leaning rather to the first, as appears by his Considerationes Modestæ: he was a very simple man, and knew little of the world; so he fell into several errors in conduct, but died soon after, suspected of popery, which suspicion was increased by his son's turning papist."[1]

The other grand project to which Charles was instigated by Laud and his partisans among the Scotch bishops was the imposition of a liturgy upon the church of Scotland—a measure which was carried farther, and which ere long set the whole kingdom in flames. To adopt the homely but expressive language of Balfour, writing in the time of the civil wars, this "was that business, the so much advancing whereof since had not only rooted out the bishops, root and branch, but also ruined the king and his haill family. Thir [these] unhappy bishops, they were evil counselors, but worse musicians; for they tempered their strings to such a clef of ambition and superstitious foolery, that, before ever they yielded any sound, they burst all in pieces."[2]

It appears that the first proposal made in the present reign for the introduction of a liturgy into the Scottish church was brought forward in 1630, at a convention of the clergy called by the primate, at the king's command, for the express purpose of considering how the whole order of the church of England might be adopted in Scotland. Laud's representative or emissary upon this occasion was a Mr. John Maxwell, then one of the ministers of Edinburgh, who, a few years afterward, was made Bishop of Ross, and after having been driven out of the country at the general overthrow of episcopacy in Scotland, obtained the bishopric of Killala in Ireland, and died Archbishop of Tuam, in 1646. Although several consultations upon the subject took place in the two following years, nothing was determined upon till Charles came down to Edinburgh to be crowned, in 1633, when, as Clarendon tells us, "he carried with him the resolution to finish that important business in the church at the same time." "And many wise men," adds this historian, "were then, and still are of opinion, that if the king had then proposed the liturgy of the church of England to have been received and practiced by that nation, it would have been submitted to without opposition." This, however, it is said, was opposed by the Scottish bishops, as they professed, in part on the ground that there were some things in the English liturgy which could not be altogether defended, but principally from the apprehension that the popular feeling in Scotland, always jealous of England, might be inflamed by what would be construed as indicating an intention of making every thing in the former country be overridden by the institutions and customs of the latter. The expedient of having a new liturgy prepared for the special use of the Scots "was so passionately and vehemently urged," says Clarendon, "even by the bishops, that, however, they deferred to the minds and humors of other men, it was manifest enough that the exception and device proceeded from the pride of their own hearts." The fact, however, appears to have been, that the opposition to the adoption of the English liturgy came from those of the bishops, namely, Spotswood and his friends, who would have been best pleased to go on as they had been doing, without any appointed form of public worship at all, and that their chief motive for insisting upon the necessity of a new form was probably the hope that the thing might in that way be got rid of altogether. In the end it was determined that a liturgy and a book of canons should be drawn up in Scotland, and then submitted for revisal to Laud, assisted by his brother prelates, Juxon and Wren. Burnet says, expressly, that the books "were never examined in any public assembly of the (Scottish) clergy; all was managed by three or four aspiring bishops—Maxwell, Sydserf, Whitford, and Ballantine, the bishops of Ross, Galloway, Dunblane, and Aberdeen."[1] The Book of Canons, the shorter and easier work, was the first begun, or at least the first finished: it was confirmed by letters-patent under the great seal, dated 23d May, 1635; and a proclamation was at the same time issued by the king for the due observance of the canons within his kingdom of Scotland. "It was a fatal inadvertency," observes Clarendon, "that these canons, neither before nor after they were sent to the king, had been ever seen by the assembly, or any convocation of the clergy, which was so strictly obliged to the observation of them; nor so much as communicated to the lords of the council of that kingdom; it being almost impossible that any new discipline could be introduced into the church which would not much concern the government of the state, and even trench upon or refer to the municipal laws of the kingdom." It was also strange and much to be regretted, he thinks, that the canons should have been published before the liturgy, seeing that several of them, to which the whole body of the clergy were to swear to submit and pay all obedience, expressly enjoined a punctual compliance with the ritual and form of worship which yet remained unsettled, or at least unannounced. It may, indeed, be questioned if any more prudent or dexterous management of the business would have prevented the flame which actually broke out; but, certainly, whether we look to the character and substance of the proposed innovations, or to the manner and circumstances of their introduction, nothing could have been better fitted to provoke the simultaneous aversion and revolt against them of all classes of the Scottish nation—of the aristocracy, as well as the clergy and the general mass of the people. The canons, as Clarendon remarks, in the mere mode in which they were prepared and published, "appeared to be so many new laws imposed upon the whole kingdom by the king's sole authority, and contrived by a few private men, of whom they had no good opinion, and who were strangers to the nation; so that it was thought no other than a subjection to England by receiving laws from thence." Then, he also acknowledges, "they were so far from being confined to the church, and the matters of religion, that they believed there was no part of their civil government uninvaded by them, and no persons, of what quality soever, unconcerned, and, as they thought, unhurt in them." Among other novel extravagances contained in these canons, which filled all men with alarm, were the unlimited extent assigned to the royal power and prerogative, which was expressly declared to be according to the pattern of the kings of Israel; the severe restrictions laid upon ecclesiastical persons, as, for example, that none of them should become surety for any man, and that all of them, from bishops inclusive, who died without children, should be obliged to bequeath a considerable part of their property to the church, and even if they should have children, still to leave something to the church, or for the advancement of learning; that no person should officiate as a teacher, either publicly or privately, without having first obtained a license from the archbishop of the province, or the bishop of the diocese. These and other things of the same kind the great royalist historian oddly thinks might have been "fit to be commended to a regular and orderly people piously disposed;" but he admits that the whole mess was "too strong meat for infants in discipline, and too much nourishment to be administered at once to weak and queasy stomachs, and too much inclined to nauseate what was most wholesome." In doctrine, also, of course, the new canons were all that was most abhorrent to Presbyterian consciences; in some points, indeed, they were thought to go to the very verge of popery, particularly in their assignment of the power of absolution to the bishops, and in the injunction "that no presbyter should reveal anything he should receive in confession, except in such cases where by the law of the land his own life should be forfeited"—the practice of confession, under whatsoever restrictions, being looked upon by most Protestants, to adopt the expression of Clarendon, "as the strongest and most inseparable limb of antichrist." The proper positions of the font, and of the altar or communion-table, in every church, were, moreover, set down with all the punctiliousness which Laud held to be requisite in such matters, but which many other Christians, and especially those of Scotland, were accustomed to look upon as the height of puerility and superstition. In all things, in short, these canons were designed and fitted to bring the Scottish church into as exact conformity as possible with the Arminian, half-popish model which Laud had established in England.

[1] Own Times, i. 26. Burnet's enumeration, however, is somewhat hasty and loose. Maxwell became bishop of Ross in 1633; Sydserf was translated from Brechin to Galloway in 1634; Whitford was promoted to the see, not of Dunblane, but of Brechin, in 1634. Banantine, or rather Ballenden, was translated from Dunblane to Aberdeen in 1634. Wedderburn, who became bishop of Dunblane in 1636, and Lindsay, translated from Brechin to Edinburgh in 1631, are mentioned as two of the bishops of Laud's party who had a chief hand in this business, by other authorities.

It was more than a year after the publication of the Book of Canons before the Liturgy was ready. It is said that the first edition of the latter work, after it was printed off, proved so unsatisfactory to Laud, that it was sold for waste paper. Ultimately, by his alterations, it was brought, as his opponents alledged, to be little better than an English translation of the Roman Missal; and in this form it was at last published, and the use of it enjoined by royal proclamation, in December, 1636. It was at first directed that the new service should begin to be read in all the churches at the following Easter; and the more impatient zeal of Maxwell, Wedderburn, and Whitford, the bishops of Ross, Dunblane, and Brechin, did, in fact, introduce it then in those three dioceses. Spotswood and his party, however, had in the mean time strongly advised that more time should be allowed to prepare the public mind for the change; and, in compliance with their representations, it had been resolved that the great innovation should be put off till the autumn. Finally, it was arranged that the reading should be begun, by way of experiment or example, only in the churches of Edinburgh and the immediate neighborhood, on Sunday, the 23d of July, "to the end that the lords of the session, and others who had any law business, might see the success of it before the rising of the session," on the first of August, and so might report what had been done to all parts of the country on their return home.[1] This determination seems to have been taken with the same precipitancy and want of proper provision and forethought that had marked the management of the business from the first. According to Clarendon, even the privy council, or Scottish government, received no further notice of what was intended to be done than the public announcement made on the preceding Sunday to the whole kingdom, when it was intimated from the pulpits that the liturgy would be read on that day week. But no country, in truth, was ever more strangely circumstanced in respect of the administration and superintendence of public affairs than Scotland was at this most critical moment. In England, as Clarendon observes, "there was so little curiosity, either in the court or the country, to know any thing of Scotland, or what was done there, that, when the whole nation was solicitous to know what passed weekly in Germany, Poland, and all other parts of Europe, no man ever inquired what was doing in Scotland, nor had that kingdom a place or mention in one page of any gazette."[2] Scottish affairs were never mentioned at the English council-board; indeed, as the same historian informs us, "the king himself had been always so jealous of the privilege of that his native kingdom, and that it might not be dishonored by a suspicion of having any dependence upon England, that he never suffered any thing relating to that to be debated, or so much as communicated to his privy council in this, but handled all those affairs himself with two or three Scotsmen, who always attended in the court for the business of that kingdom." Of these Scottish managers at this time resident in London, the chief was the Marquis of Hamilton, whose influence was so predominant, that all matters are said by Clarendon to have been dispatched by his sole advice and direction; but the head of the administration in Scotland was the lord treasurer, the Earl of Traquair, a person whom the favor of Charles had within a few years advanced to that high rank and office from the station of a private gentleman.[1] "He was," says Burnet, "a man of great parts, but of too much craft; he was thought the capablest man for business, and the best speaker in that kingdom." But Traquair, after all, was only the chief of one of the parties in the Scottish government; the whole was a confused scene of faction and intrigue, in which the management of public affairs was little better than a miserable contention of private interests and personal rivalries and animosities. The lord treasurer, it is said, had been made the enemy of Spotswood by the primate having been the means of preventing his marriage with a wealthy heiress, and he had thereupon thrown himself into the interest of Laud, so that, when the affair of the liturgy was in hand, he was, according to Clarendon, "the only counselor or layman relied upon by the Archbishop of Canterbury in that business." But if Traquair was lord treasurer, Spotswood was both lord primate and lord chancellor: his son also held the high office of President of the College of Justice, or supreme court of civil jurisdiction; and, if the three or four bishops who supported Traquair and Laud were the most active and fiery spirits of the hierarchy, Spotswood still drew after him the great majority of the right reverend bench. But the worst of all was, that neither faction in the government possessed any real hold or authority in the country: the politics of Laud and the politics of Spotswood—the views of the more ardent and impetuous, and those of the more timid and temporizing, among the bishops — were nearly equally detested by the general opinion of all classes in the community. Episcopacy had fairly succeeded in acquiring the hatred alike of high and low—of some, indeed, only by its opposition to their prejudices or their interests, but of many others by much in the conduct and demeanor of the bishops that was offensive to their conscience, their reason, and their best feelings. Authorities the least liable to the imputation of any Presbyterian partialities concur in admitting that the bishops mainly drew upon themselves, by their own rashness, arrogance, and grasping ambition, the storm by which they were now assailed. We have seen above in what terms Burnet speaks of the Scottish bishops in the latter part of the reign of James. In the next reign he describes them as having all become "so lifted up with the king's zeal, and so encouraged by Archbishop Laud, that they lost all temper;"[1] he speaks of "the fury of their proceedings," and observes, both of them and of the other persons associated with them in conducting the affairs of the kingdom, that they "had as little of the prudence of the serpent as of the innocence of the dove."[2] Clarendon, after admitting that the bishops of Scotland "had very little interest in the affections of that nation, and less authority over it," disapproves of the expedient adopted by Charles to "redeem them from contempt"—the placing them in high civil offices—as both premature and otherwise injudicious: "it had been better," he says, "that invidious promotion had been suspended till, by their grave and pious deportment, they had wrought upon their clergy to be better disposed to obey them, and upon the people to like order and discipline;" and he adds, "This unreasonable accumulation of so many honors upon them, to which their functions did not entitle them (no bishop having been so much as a privy councilor in very many years), exposed them to the universal envy of the whole nobility, many whereof wished them well as to their ecclesiastical qualifications, but could not endure to see them possessed of those offices and employments which they looked upon as naturally belonging to themselves; and then the number of them was thought too great, so that they overbalanced many debates; and some of them, by want of temper, or want of breeding, did not behave themselves with that decency in their debates toward the greatest men in the kingdom as in discretion they ought to have done, and as the others reasonably expected from them: so that, instead of bringing any advantage to the church, or facilitating the good intentions of the king in settling order and government, it produced a more general prejudice to it."[3] And in a subsequent part of his narrative the noble historian remarks that the quietness of the people for a short time after the chief places in the state were thus bestowed upon churchmen, although it was at first interpreted to proceed from a newly-begotten affection and reverence toward the church and a disposition to submit to the proposed innovations in the mode of worship, yet appeared afterward really "to be from the observation they made of the temper and indiscretion of those bishops in the greatest authority, that they were like to have more advantages administered to them by their ill managery than they could raise by any contrivance of their own."[4] Still more openly are the same and other charges advanced by the cotemporary annalist, Spalding, a Scottish Episcopalian, and a bitter enemy of Presbytery and Puritanism, who enumerates among the provocations that aroused the revolt against the church to which he belonged "the pride and avarice of the prelates, seeking to overrule the haill kingdom;"—"their inbringing of innovations within the church, such as rochets worn by prelates in time of service at divers churches, &c."—and their "intolerable greediness, seeking to reduce noblemen's rights upon slight reasons."[1] He professes, indeed, to state these simply as the grounds on which the "menzie of miscontented Puritans," by whom the first opposition to the liturgy was secretly organized, and among whom he, improbably enough, maintains both Traquair and Hamilton were leagued with Alexander Henderson and his clerical brethren, founded their "clandestine band;" but, at the same time, he evidently admits the facts, however much inclined to condemn the use made of them on that occasion.

[1] "At this time a private gentleman of the name of Stewart was become so considerable that he was raised, by several degrees, to be made Earl of Traquair and lord treasurer, and was in great favor; but suffered afterward such a reverse of fortune, that I saw him so low that he wanted bread, and was forced to beg, and it was believed died of hunger."—Burnet, Own Times, i. 21.

The great scene of the reading of the new service-book in the cathedral church of St. Giles has been already described, along with the rest of the sweeping revolution in church and state, in England as well as in Scotland, which followed that first outbreak of the popular fury.[2] The service-book, the bishops themselves, and every rag and remnant of episcopacy were blown away out of Scotland to the four winds of heaven by the first breath of that tempest. "After this Sunday's work," writes Spalding, "the haill kirk-doors in Edinburgh were locked, and no more preaching heard; the zealous partisans flocked ilk [each] Sunday to hear devotion in Fife, syne [then] returned to their houses, while [till] they got preaching at home." The work of the harvest interrupted that of the new reformation for a few weeks; but the storm only gathered strength from that pause, and when it began to blow again it soon spread itself on all sides till it shook the remotest corners of the kingdom. In the month of November, Spalding records, "Walter Whitford, bishop of Brechin, upon a Sunday, within the kirk of Brechin, using his English service, as he had often done before without impediment in that kirk, the people got up in a mad humor, detesting this sort of worship, and pursued him so sharply, that hardly he escaped out of their hands unslain, and forced for safety of his life to leave his bishopric and flee the kingdom." By the following spring even the most northern parts of the kingdom, which had always been the strongest holds both of episcopacy and popery, were enveloped by the spreading and triumphant revolt. "The Bishop of Ross" (Maxwell), notes the Aberdeen chronicler, "having used the service-book peaceably within the chantry kirk of Ross each Sabbath-day by the space of two years, he, upon the 11th of March, being Sunday, causes, as his custom was, lay down a service-book upon the reader's desk, and upon some other gentlemen's desks besides, who used the same, about the ringing of the first bell to the preaching; but before the last bell was rung certain scholars came in pertly to the kirk, and took up thir haill service-books, and carried them down to the Ness, with a coal of fire, there to have burnt them altogether; but there fell out such a sudden shower, that before they could win to the Ness the coal was drowned out. The scholars, seeing this, they tore them all in pieces, and threw them into the sea; the bishop, hearing of this, miskens [passes over] all wisely, comes to church, and preaches, wanting service-books. He had soon done with sermon, and thereafter hastily goes to horse, and spake with the Bishop of Murray, syne spake with the Marquis of Huntley, and, privately disguised, he rode south, and to the king goes he directly;—a very busy man thought to be in bringing in this service-book, and therefore durst not, for fear of his life, return to Scotland again." A few months later—in August, apparently—the following entries occur in the same record: "The Archbishop of St. Andrew's, an old reverend man, high chancellor of Scotland, is forced, for fear of his life, to flee into England for safety and refuge at the king's hands. The bishops of Ross, Brechin, Galloway, and Dunblane, went all to him also for relief. The king was very sorry at their overthrow, but could not for the present mend it: however, he gives order for their maintenance. The Bishop of Edinburgh goes also; the Archbishop of Glasgow, lying bedfast, might not move; the bishops of Aberdeen, Murray, and the rest, bide at home for a while in rest. The glorious organs of the chapel royal were broken down masterfully [lawlessly], and no service used there, but the haill chaplains, choristers, and musicians are discharged, and the stately organs altogether destroyed and made useless. These uncouth alterations bred horrible fears in the hearts of the country people, not knowing what to do or whom to obey." Some curious datails of the same kind have been preserved by another cotemporary chronicler, the celebrated Robert Baillie, whose letters and journals, or rather some selections from them, were published in the latter part of the last century.[1] As Baillie was a Presbyterian, though at this time one of the most moderate, as he always was one of the most learned and able, of his party, it becomes the more interesting to compare his accounts of events and of the state of the popular mind with those of the Episcopalian commissary clerk at Aberdeen. In one of the earliest of his letters he thus describes the effects of a sermon preached at Glasgow on the last Thursday of August, 1637, by Mr. William Annan, at the command of the archbishop of the diocese: "In the last half of his sermon, from the making of prayers he ran out upon the liturgy, and spake for the defense of it in whole, and sundry most plausible parts of it, as well, in my poor judgment, as any in the isle of Britain could have done, considering all circumstances. . . . Of his sermon, among us in the synod, not a word; but in the town, among the women, a great din. To-morrow, Mr. John Lindsay, at the bishop's command, preached. He is the new moderator of Lanark. At the ingoing of the pulpit it is said that some of the women in his ear assured him, that, if he should touch the service-book in his sermon, he should be rent out of the pulpit. He took the advice, and let that matter alone. At the outgoing of the church about thirty or forty of our honestest women, in one voice, before the bishop and magistrates, fell a-railing, cursing, scolding, with clamors, on Mr. William Annan. Some, too, of the meanest were taken to the Tolbooth. All the day over, up and down the streets where he went, he got threats of sundry in words and looks; but, after supper, while needlessly he will go to visit the bishop, who had taken his leave with him, he is no sooner on the street, at nine o'clock, on a dark night, with three or four ministers with him, but some hundreds of enraged women, of all qualities, are about him, with neaves, staves, and peats, but no stones. They beat him sore; his cloak, ruff, and hat were rent; however, upon his cries, and candles set out from many windows, he escaped all bloody wounds, yet he was in great danger even of killing. This tumult was so great, that it was not thought meet to search either the plotters or actors of it, for numbers of the best quality would have been found guilty. To-morrow poor Mr. William was conveyed with the baillies and sundry ministers to his house; for many women were waiting to affront him more. Always [however] at his on-leaping, his horse unhappily fell above him in a very foul mire, in presence of all the company; of which accident was more speech than of any other."[1] "I think our people," says Baillie, in a letter written soon after this to his friend Spang, minister of the Scotch congregation at Campvere, "possessed with a bloody devil, far above any thing that I could ever have imagined, though the mass in Latin had been presented. The ministers, who have the command of their mind, disavow their unchristian humor, but are noways so zealous against the devil of their fury as they are against the seducing spirit of the bishops. . . . Ye and all your neighbors had much need to pray for us, as we have oft done for you in your dangers. The massacre of Paris, the Catholic league of France, is much before my eyes; but I hope the devil shall never find a Duke of Guise to lead the bands."[2] In another letter to Spang he thus notices the catastrophe of the Bishop of Brechin:—This prelate had been advised, it seems, both by the treasurer and chancellor, as well as by his brother bishops, to forbear the book for a time; "but he, being resolved," says Baillie, "to serve the king in a time when other feeble cowards couched, would not be counseled, but on the Sunday following went to the pulpit with his pistols, his servants, and, as the report goes, his wife, with weapons. He entered early, when there were a few people, closed the doors, and read his service; but when he had done, he could scarce get to his house; all flocked about him, and had he not fled he might have been killed. He durst never try that play over again."[3] In the following spring (under date of 8th April, 1638), our letter-writer, addressing himself to the same correspondent abroad, thus describes the state of Scotland:—"Our country is at the point of breaking loose; our laws this twelve months has been silent; divers misregard their creditors; our highlanders are making ready their arms, and some begin to murder their neighbors. Douglas, Abercorn, and Semple, are openly arming among us; readily, after their example, other noblemen will provide presently their houses with musquets, pikes, powder, and lead."

Meanwhile, the Four Tables had been established, and the "Confession of Faith of the Kirk of Scotland, and General Band for maintenance of the True Religion and the King's Person," afterward known by the name of the Covenant, had been drawn up at Edinburgh, in February, 1638, and had been subscribed and sworn to there, and in all parts of the country, as has been already related.[1] The height to which the hurricane had now risen daunted the stoutest hearts in the Scottish council; and from this time we find even Laud's former confidant and coadjutor, Traquair, strenuously urging forbearance and concession, to the extent even of the complete revocation of the obnoxious service-book—a course which exposed the lord treasurer to the suspicion, on the part of many of the Episcopalians, of having been all along secretly in league with their opponents—indeed, of having been one of the original instigators and contrivers of the insurrection: in which light, as we have seen, he is regarded by Spalding, although his conduct is much more consistently and probably accounted for by the mere revolution of circumstances operating upon a character such as his, which the want of any deep convictions made unstable and pliable to the current of events; and to which, notwithstanding that he was entirely the creature of the royal favor, an eager ambition of popularity is attributed by those who knew him best. He seems, besides, to have been rather a quick and dexterous than an able man in any higher sense, and his discernment of the signs of the times, and talent for temporary expedients would combine with his indifference about the principles that were involved in the contest, to draw him over, as soon as the danger became imminent, to what was, if not the best policy in the largest view, at least the shortest and easiest cut to peace and present deliverance.

The meeting of the famous General Assembly of November, 1638, at Glasgow—the first that had been called since that held at Perth twenty years before, may be regarded, if not as the legal reëstablishment of Presbyterianism in Scotland, at least as its actual restoration to all intents and purposes.[2] From the day on which that convocation opened till the conquest of the country by Cromwell, the kirk rejoiced in a freedom and ascendency such as it had never before known: it may be said, indeed, to have reigned, during these thirteen or fourteen years, uncontrolled and supreme, for there was no power either in the government or in the country all that while that was disposed, or, if disposed that dured, to question its authority, or stand in the way of any of its demands or ordinances. Even in the public affairs of the state, the voice of the clergy, carrying along with it, as it did, the almost undivided force of the popular sentiment, and of whatever then existed that would be now called public opinion, could not but be attended to in any case in which it was strongly and earnestly expressed; and the perfect mechanism of the ecclesiastical system afforded them all facilities for making themselves thus effectively heard whenever they desired to exert their influence. In their pulpits and in their church courts they had at their command an enginery as potent at any time to make all the constituted authorities of the state bend before them, as were the rams' horns of the priests, and the shouts of the people in the camp of Joshua to throw down the walls of Jericho. Over the minds and consciences of men, so far as their sway extended, the papal church itself in the darkest ages never enjoyed a more absolute despotism. It may be doubted if even auricular confession itself has ever in any country conferred upon the Roman priesthood so all-pervading a control over human actions as the Presbyterian clergy of Scotland exercised at this time over the daily walk and conversation of every man, woman, and child composing their flocks. They were by no means scrupulous about interfering even with matters properly coming under the superintendence of the law of the land; but over the whole of that other department of conduct and demeanor which constitutes the dominion of morality, as distinguished from the comparatively insignificant province of mere legal sanctions and regulations, their fiats and frowns were held by the great bulk of the community to be hardly less terrible than those of the Divinity himself. It happened, too, that in this the era of its highest and haughtiest ascendency at home, Scottish Presbyterianism also extended its conquests beyond its native boundaries, and, throwing down prelacy in England, as it had done to the north of the Tweed, stood forth for a time as the established faith of the whole island. This period, accordingly, looked upon by the admirers of the kirk as the brightest in its history, is, at least, the most illustrative of the true spirit and genius of presbytery, and of the operation of that form of ecclesiastical polity when allowed its full swing.

The storm of the national excitement in which the covenant was born and cradled still blew when the clerical and lay representatives of the resuscitated church thronged to meet and soon to set at defiance the king's representative at Glasgow. Baillie, who, decided as he afterward became, was then one of a very few members—not to be designated a party—inclined to more moderate courses than the great body of the clergy, was not a little shocked at the scene of turbulence which the assembly displayed. "On Wednesday, the 21st of November (the first day of meeting), with much ado," he says, "could we throng into our places, an evil which troubled us much the first fourteen days of our sitting. The magistrates with their town-guard, the noblemen with the assistance of the gentry, whiles [sometimes] the commissioner in person, could not get us entry to our rooms, use what force, what policy they could, without such delay of time and thrusting through, as grieved and offended us. Whether this evil be common to all nations at all public conferences, or if it be proper to the rudeness of our nation alone, or whether thir [these] late times and admiration of this new reformation have at all public meetings stirred up a greater than ordinary zeal in the multitude to be present for hearing and seeing, or what is the special cause of this irremediable evil, I do not know; only I know my special offense for it, and wish it remedied above any evil that ever I knew in the service of God among us. As yet no appearance of redress. It is here alone, I think, we might learn from Canterbury—yea, from the pope—yea, from the Turks or Pagans, modesty and manners; at least, their deep reverence in the house they call God's, ceases not till it have led them to the admiration of the timber and stones of the place. We are here so far the other way, that our rascals, without shame, in great numbers, make such din and clamor in the house of the true God, that if they minted [attempted] to use the like behavior in my chamber, I would not be content till they were down the stairs."[1] The occasion, however, it must be admitted, was one that might well excuse all this eager crowding to hear and see.

Baillie has left us a very full and graphic account of the proceedings of this assembly;[2] but we can only here afford to run rapidly over their principal acts.[3] Of these the first of a distinctly revolutionary character was that condemning the six last assemblies, namely, those of Linlithgow in 1606 and 1608, of Glasgow in 1610, of Aberdeen in 1616, of St. Andrew's in 1617, and of Perth in 1618; and declaring all "and every one of them to have been from the beginning unfree, unlawful, and null assemblies, and never to have had nor hereafter to have any ecclesiastical authority, and their conclusions to have been and to be of no force, vigor, nor efficacy." The reasons for this condemnation in the case of each were at the same time carefully set forth and put upon record. This act was passed on the 4th of December, which was the twelfth session of the assembly. On the 5th an act was passed, declaring the oaths and subscriptions that had been exacted by the prelates from the entrants into the ministry to be unlawful and in no way obligatory; and on the 6th another, stated to be adopted by the assembly "all in one voice," rejecting, condemning, and abolishing the use of the service-book, the book of canons, and the book of ordination; and also condemning and disallowing the Court of High Commission, "as unlawful in itself, and prejudicial to the liberties of Christ's kirk and kingdom." This was followed on the 8th by a very long act, which was not agreed to till after a protracted discussion, not only declaring that all episcopacy was to be abjured and removed out of the kirk, but endeavoring to maintain, by an elaborate array of facts and reasonings, that the same general and unqualified abjuration of episcopacy was implied in the confession of faith, commonly called the "King's Confession," of 1580. Baillie informs us that he was one of a minority who objected to this latter proposition, than which, indeed, as we have endeavored to show in a preceding page,[1] nothing could be a greater misrepresentation of the truth. At the next sitting, on the 10th, it was voted, in the same spirit, by "the whole assembly, all in one consent, one only excepted," that the five articles of Perth were, in like manner, abjured by the same confession of 1580, and so ought to be removed out of the kirk; and therefore the court prohibited and discharged all disputing for them, or observing of them, or any of them, in all time coming; and ordained presbyteries to proceed with the censures of the church against all transgressors.

But that which consummated the process of purifying the kirk from its recent corruptions, was a series of acts deposing, and in some instances also excommunicating, all the bishops, and several likewise of the inferior clergy who adhered to episcopacy. One act, directed against Spotswood and Patrick Lindsay, the two "pretended" archbishops. David Lindsay, Sydserf, Maxwell, and Whitford "pretended" bishops, of Edinburgh, Galloway, Ross, and Brechin, declared them guilty of the breach of the cautions agreed upon in the assembly held at Montrose in 1600, for restricting the minister voter in parliament;[2] and for this, and also "for sundry other heinous offenses and enormities, at length expressed and clearly proven in their process, and for their refusal to underlie the trial of the reigning slander of sundry other gross transgressions and crimes laid to their charge," ordained them to be deposed, not only from their office of commissioners to vote in parliament, council, or convention in the name of the kirk, but from all functions whether of pretended episcopal or ministerial calling, declared them infamous, and ordained them to be excommunicated and held by all and every one of the faithful as heathens and publicans. A second act passed exactly the same sentence, on the same grounds, against Ballantine, bishop of Aberdeen, and Wedderburn, bishop of Dunblane. By a third, Guthrie, Graham, Fairly, and Campbell, bishops of Murray, Orkney, Lismore (or Argyle), and the Isles, were deposed, but only ordained to be excommunicated in case they should not acknowledge that assembly, reverence the constitution thereof, obey their sentence, and make their repentance. Graham and Fairly in fact both submitted, and became Presbyterian parish ministers. So did Alexander Lindsay, the bishop of Dunkeld, who was deposed by a fourth act. In the two last-mentioned acts, it is to be observed, the clause imputing sundry proved heinous offenses and enormities was omitted; as it also was in the fifth and last act of the series, which, in like manner, deposed Abernethy, bishop of Caithness, but declared that the assembly would admit him to the ministry of a particular flock if he would acknowledge its authority and make his repentance.

In all the cases, both of the bishops and inferior clergy, the rule seems to have been to be as tender as possible to the characters of any whom it was thought there was a chance of winning over to the new order of things, but to keep no measure in bespattering and blackening those who were likely to stand fast by their old profession. It may be reasonably as well as charitably presumed that, in several instances at least, the real and only proved crime, after all, of the person denounced as guilty of the sundry unspecified enormities, was merely his obstinate attachment to episcopacy, or his being so committed to that side that there was no reason to hope for his accession to the other. A great deal of evidence, however, was actually brought forward of the scandalous lives of some of those against whom sentence of excommunication was passed. Several of the bishops and others were accused of adultery, drunkenness, and other gross immoralities. "But of all our monstrous fellows," says Baillie, "Mr. Thomas Forster, at Melross, was the first, composed of contraries, superstition, and profanity. He was accused of avowing that said service was better than preaching—that preaching was no part of God's essential worship—that all prayer should be read out of books. He made his altar and rails himself, stood within, and reached the elements to those who kneeled without. He avowed Christ's presence there, but whether sacramentally, or by way of consubstantiation, or transubstantiation, he wist not, but thought it a curiosity to dispute it. He maintained Christ's universal redemption, and that all that was in our service-book was good. Yet he used to sit at preaching and prayer; baptize in his own house; made a way through the church for his kine and sheep; made a wagon of the old communion-table to load his peats in; [maintained] that to make the Sabbath a moral precept was to Judaize; that it was lawful to work on it; he caused lead his oxen on it; that our confession of faith was faithless, only an abjuration of better things than those we swore to; he kept no thanksgiving after communion; affirmed our reformers to have brought more damage to the church in one age than the pope and his faction had done in a thousand years. This monster was justly deposed."

Other acts of this Glasgow assembly restored general assemblies and the other church courts to all their former privileges, liberties, powers, and jurisdictions, and laid down other regulations and arrangements necessary for the complete restoration of the Presbyterian polity. By one act the assembly, "most unanimously with one voice, with the hesitation of two alanerly [only]," declared that it was both inexpedient and contrary to the laws of the kirk, "for pastors separate unto the gospel to brook civil places and offices, as to be justices of peace, sit and discern in council, session, or exchequer, to rede or vote in parliament, to be judges or assessors in any civil judicatory." If this act sounds like a stern rejection of some of the most coveted objects of human ambition in their ordinary form, the next fully vindicates the kirk from the suspicion of having intended to cast from it more than the obnoxious outward show of civil power—a show which, in the circumstances of the present case, would have only impaired or destroyed the substance. It must be confessed that we have here a specimen of Presbyterian arrogance and intolerance, such as never was surpassed either by prelacy or popery—"Considering," the act says, "the great prejudice which God's kirk in this land, hath sustained these years by-passed by the unwarranted printing of libels, pamphlets, and polemics . . . . . and remembering the former acts and custom of this kirk, as of all other kirks, made for restraining these and the like abuses; and that nothing be printed concerning the kirk and religion except it be allowed by those whom the kirk intrusts with that charge; the assembly unanimously, by virtue of their ecclesiastical authority, dischargeth and inhibiteth all printers within this kingdom to print any act of the former assemblies, any of the acts or proceedings of this assembly, any confession of faith, any protestations, any reasons, pro or contra, anent the present divisions or controversies of this time, or any other treatise whatsoever, which may concern the kirk of Scotland, or God's cause in hand, without warrant subscribed by Mr. Archibald Johnston, the clerk to the assembly, &c., or to reprint without his warrant any acts or treatises foresaid, which he hath caused any other to print." Here is nothing less than an assumption of the right of controlling all the printing of the kingdom, at least in the departments of theology and ecclesiastical politics; and that too, it may be observed, without any pretense that the claim so put forth is sanctioned by the law of the land, or, indeed, the slightest reference to that law. It is true that the punishment with which presbyteries are directed to visit transgressors is merely the execution against them of ecclesiastical censures; but the church of Rome itself, in its most audacious stretches of power, never went farther than this: its uniform practice was, when it touched life or limb, to hand over its victims to be mutilated or put to death by the fiat of the civil magistrate. And here, too, we have that very principle and mode of procedure indicated and directed: for the assembly conclude their act by declaring themselves to be confident that, to the effective furtherance of its objects, "the honorable judges of this land will contribute their civil authority"—a hint which, as matters stood, was in no danger of being disregarded.

Before quitting the scene of this sudden reëdification of the Presbyterian polity, we may note an instance of the way in which men's minds were stirred and awakened, and their views and opinions rapidly revolutionized, by the great events that had begun to hurry them onward, making them live a whole lifetime of ordinary experience in a few months. "I was lately," says Baillie, writing a few weeks after the rising of the Glasgow assembly, "of the mind that in no imaginable case any prince might have been opposed. I incline now to think otherwise." "In all our questions," he adds, "I confess no change but of this only." He attributes his conversion mainly to Bilson's work, De subjectione; for the more democratic reasonings and conclusions of Parus, Buchanan, and Junius Brutus, he tells us, he yet lothes at. He admits, however, that the turn his mind had taken had been confirmed by a certain paper lately sent abroad from the court with the approval of Archbishop Laud, the extravagance of which seems indeed to have been enough to shock a loyalty or credulity of the very largest swallow. "They will have us believe," says Baillie, "that our whole state, were they to be all killed in one day, or to be led to Turkism, to be spoiled of all liberty, goods, life, religion, all; yet they may make no kind of resistance. The conclusion is horrible, and their proofs so weak, for all their diligence and learning, that I like it much worse than I did." In the rush of extraordinary changes, in the midst of which he was thrown, Baillie soon got rid of his scruples upon various other points as well as upon this.

From this time the general assembly continued to meet every year down to the year 1652 inclusive, the time and place of each meeting being always appointed by the preceding assembly, without the interference of either king's commissioner or any other authority in the state. Its acts, and other published proceedings, are our best authority for the history of the kirk, and the manner in which it exercised its power during this period of its unshackled domination.

In the assembly which met at St. Andrew's in July, 1642, it was resolved, that a supplication should be presented to the council for the due execution of the acts of parliament and council against papists. For this purpose it was at the same time ordered, that every presbytery should "convene at their first meeting all papists in their bounds, and require them to put out of their company all friends and servants who are popish within one month; also within that same space to give their children, sons and daughters, who are above seven years old, to be educate, at their charges, by their Protestant friends, as the presbytery shall appoint, and find sufficient caution for bringing home within three months such of their children who are without the kingdom, to be educate in schools and colleges, at the presbytery's sight; to find caution likewise of their abstinence from mass, and the company of Jesuits and priests." Ever since the Reformation, the laws in Scotland, as well as in England, had altogether prohibited the profession of the Roman Catholic religion, or at least placed it under the severest restrictions; but, much to the grief of the kirk, these laws had never till now been enforced with any strictness. The assembly now issued its commands to the inferior church judicatories, that all, of whatsoever rank or degree, who refused to comply with any one of the above requisitions should be proceeded against without delay. But even those who did consent to recall their children from abroad, and give them up to be educated by those whom they esteemed heretics, and found surety that they would abstain from the actual practice of their own worship, were not for all that to be let alone: they were only to be "dealt with in all meekness," which was explained as meaning "after this manner"—namely, that certain members of the presbytery should be appointed to hold conferences with them for the space of three months—that, if after that time they still remained unwilling to go to church, they should be obliged to remove over to the next adjacent university town, and there reside for five months longer, attending all the diets of conference which the professors and ministers of the bounds should appoint to them; "by which," concludes the ordinance, "if they be not converted, their obstinacy shall be declared in the provincial synods of April, and from thence their process shall go on to the very closure without any further delay." The show of "all meekness," therefore, with which they were to be treated, consisted in keeping them eight months under a rigid surveillance, and on the rack of incessant Presbyterian eloquence exerted in abusing whatever they held dearest and most sacred, before they were put to death, or consigned to perpetual imprisonment, or whatever else was intended to be the ultimate punishment of their obstinacy.

A subject which engaged much of the attention of the venerable assembly in divers years was the "abundance and increase of witchcraft," to quote the words of an act of 1643, "in all the sorts and degrees of it, in this time of reformation." The act referred to gives a minute detail, both of the causes of the prevalence of witches and charmers, and of the means that had been found the most effectual for their suppression. "The occasions thereof," it is set down, "are found to be these especially: extremity of grief, malice, passion, and desire of revenge, pinching poverty, solicitation of other witches and charmers; for in such cases the devil assails them, offers aid, and much prevails." To bring them to a confession and judgment, it is proposed that a standing commission for a certain time be had from the lords of secret council, or justice-general, to some understanding gentlemen and magistrates, within the bounds of such presbyteries as should crave it, giving them power to apprehend, try, and execute justice against all persons guilty of witchcraft within the said bounds. The grounds of apprehending them, it is suggested, "may be a reigning bruit of witchcraft, backed with delations of confessing witches, being confronted with them; for it is found that the delations of two or three confessing witches hath ordinarily proved true." After they are apprehended, a caution is given, that they will be apt to destroy themselves if left alone or not carefully watched. The means recommended in order to prevent the growth of the evil, in addition to great diligence on the part of ministers and elders in searching out the practices of witchcraft and charming—which latter is described to be "a degree of witchcraft, and too ordinary in the land"—are the careful religious instruction of the people, and the active application of the censures of the kirk against profane persons of all sorts. The persecution of the unhappy persons accused of these imaginary crimes, we thus see, was not likely to slacken under the sway of presbytery. Baillie, in an account of the proceedings of this assembly, informs us that the consideration of the subject was taken up "upon the report of the extraordinary multiplying of witches, above thirty being burned in Fife in a few months."[1]

Among the proceedings of the restored Presbyterian church which do it the most honor, are the solicitude which it evinced and the active measures which it adopted for the encouragement and diffusion of learning, both professional and secular. Several acts were passed by the assembly for the regulation and improvement of the national schools and colleges, which in most respects were marked by sufficiently enlightened views. The Scottish church at this period, indeed, contained its full proportion of individuals distinguished for their eminent acquirements as scholars; and under the influences, first communicated by the Knoxes and the Buchanans and the Melvils of the preceding age, it had always stood up for the principle both of a learned priesthood and a well-educated people. At the same time, as might be expected, it strenuously maintained that the entire education of the country should be in the hands of the established clergy; and, accordingly, in all the reforms which were now introduced, the most comprehensive and despotic control over schools and colleges was given or assumed as belonging to the presbyteries and other ecclesiastical courts. In outward exhibition, and certainly also in spirit and temper to a great extent, presbytery and popery may be said to constitute almost the two extreme forms of Christianity; but extremes are proverbially, and, from the nature of the case, apt to meet, and these seem to do so curiously enough in several respects. The bare simplicity of the one, as well as the elaborately ornamental character of the other, is combined with a system of polity admirably contrived, though upon very different principles in the two cases, for maintaining the clerical body in the highest possible state of unity and efficient coöperation. Both churches, opposite as may have been the directions in which they have moved in regard to many other things, have, to a remarkable degree, shown the same disposition to throw off all subjection to the general authority of the state, and to put forward the ecclesiastical power as independent of or superior to the civil. Both have, in their avowed principles, and in their practice, as far as they had the opportunity, been of all churches the most intolerant of dissent, or what they had called schism and heresy. And, what is best worth noting of all, presbytery, with all its popular pretensions, was in its best days scarcely behind popery in the high doctrine it held upon the divine right of the ministers and other ecclesiastical functionaries to be the exclusive managers of the affairs of the church, and in its haughty denial of any right of interference on the part of the people, save merely so much as might have been made over to them in certain cases on grounds of expediency. The assembly of 1641 distinctly explained its views upon this subject in its reply to a letter addressed to it by certain Puritan ministers in England: "Our unanimous judgment," said the Scottish church on this occasion, "and uniform practice is, that, according to the order of the reformed kirks, and the ordinance of God in his word, not only the solemn execution of ecclesiastical power and authority, but the whole acts and exercise thereof, do properly belong unto the officers of the kirk:"—it is added, in very cautious and hesitating phraseology, "yet so that in matters of chiefest importance the tacit consent of the congregation be had before their decrees and sentences receive final execution;"—a qualification by which the force of the original statement is rather intensified than abated. Indeed, this was one of the main points on which presbytery was at issue with independency, the second and more hated, as more formidable, enemy it had to encounter after it had laid its old foe, prelacy, in the dust.

But the kirk, with all its lofty claims, and all the freedom and power it had now acquired, was still, according to the confession of the clergy themselves, far from presenting the aspect of a pure and perfect Sion. In 1646, after the new order of things had been eight years in undisturbed operation, we find the assembly putting forth to the world, under the title of "Enormities and Corruptions observed to be in the Ministry," one of the most singular manifestoes. Of the "enormities" enumerated, the first nine are headed "In our Lives," and the list is well worth transcribing. "1. Much fruitless conversing in company, and complying with the sins of all sorts, not behaving ourselves as becomes the men of God. 2. Great worldliness is to be found among us, minding and speaking most about things of this life, being busied about many things, but forgetting the main. 3. Slighting of God's worship in their families, and therefore no cordial urging of it upon others; yea, altogether a wanting of it in some, if it be credible. 4. Want of gravity in carriage and apparel, dissoluteness in hair, and shaking about the knees [what can this mean?], lightness in the apparel of their wives and children. 5. Tippling and bearing company in untimeous drinking in taverns and ale-houses, or any where else, whereby the ministry is made vile and contemptible. 6. Discountenancing of the godly, speaking ill of them because of some that are unanswerable to their profession. 7. The Sabbath not sanctified after sermons, which maketh people think that the Sabbath is ended with the sermon. 8. There are also to be found among us who use small and minced oaths. 9. Some so great strangers to Scripture, that, except in their public ministry, though they read many things, yet they are little conversant in the Scripture, and in meditation thereof, a duty incumbent to all the preachers thereof." In the next list, entitled "Enormities and Corruptions in our Callings," are enumerated, among other things, "entering into the ministry as to a way of living in the world, and not as to a spiritual calling—silence in the public cause," some, it is affirmed, being "so gross herein, that even in public fasts little or nothing is to be heard from them sounding this way"—idleness, sometimes shown in preaching only once on the Lord's Day, while "others have but fits of pains, not like other tradesmen, continually at their work"—"self-seeking in preaching, and a venting rather of their wit and skill than a showing forth of the wisdom and power of God." In all there are twelve descriptions of enormity or corruption set forth under this head. The two lists are followed by another of sixteen "Remedies," from which, however, there is little to be gathered in illustration of our subject, except that in the second it is declared to be a well-known fact that the private trials in presbyteries of candidates for the ministry "are for the most part perfunctorious," and that in the eleventh ministers are particularly enjoyed to forbear the drinking of healths—"Satan's snare, leading to excess"—and also to reprove the practice in others.

Some acts of the next assembly, that of 1647, curiously attest the minute inquisition into the most private habits of individuals and families, and the watchful eye over the stealthiest beginnings of defection to the right hand or to the left from the straight line of the prescribed method of Christian profession, by which the kirk sought to preserve its exclusive dominion over the popular mind, and also the high hand with which it was accustomed to put down any disobedience to its authority. One act on the subject of "secret and private worship" requires and appoints "ministers and ruling elders to make diligent search and inquiry in the congregations committed to their charge respectively, whether there be among them any family or families which use to neglect this necessary duty; and if any such family be found, the head of that family is to be first admonished privately to amend this fault; and in case of his continuing therein he is to be gravely and sadly reproved by the session." If he still persist in his neglect, he is ordered to be suspended and debarred from the Lord's Supper. But this practice of private devotion was also to be restrained from running into an excess which might lead to the substitution of irregular conventicles for the stated ministrations of the church; and therefore in another act the assembly laid down a set of very particular directions with regard to it, not only, as it is expressed in the title of the act, for cherishing piety, but "for maintaining unity and avoiding schism and division." Here the greatest pains are taken to confine the private devotions of the laity within proper bounds. A portion of the Bible is directed to be ordinarily read, and those present are even recommended thereupon to converse with one another on what has been read and heard "by way of conference;" but these are, at the same time, warned that the "charge and office of interpreting the holy Scriptures is a part of the ministerial calling, which none, howsoever otherwise qualified, should take upon him in any place, but he that is duly called thereunto by God and his kirk." "Let no idler," it is afterward written, "who hath no particular calling, or vagrant person, under a pretense of a calling, be suffered to perform worship in families, to or for the same; seeing persons tainted with errors, or aiming at division, may be ready after that manner to creep into houses and lead captive silly and unstable souls." But, above all things, it is ordered that at family worship a special care be had "that each family keep by themselves; neither requiring, inviting, nor admitting persons from divers families." "Whatsoever," it is added, "hath been the effects and fruits of meetings of persons of divers families in the times of corruption or trouble (in which cases many things are commendable which otherwise are not tolerable), yet, when God hath blessed us with peace and the purity of the Gospel, such meetings of persons of divers families are to be disapproved, as tending to the hinderance of the religious exercise of each family by itself, to the prejudice of the public ministry, to the rending of the families of particular congregations, and, in progress of time, of the whole kirk; beside many offenses which may come thereby, to the hardening of the hearts of carnal men and grief of the godly." And the drift and scope of all the directions is declared in conclusion to be, that, while upon the one part the power and practice of godliness may be advanced, upon the other, "under the name and pretext of religious exercises, no such meetings or practices be allowed as are apt to breed error, scandal, schism, contempt, or misregard of the public ordinances and ministers, or neglect of the duties of particular callings, or such other evils as are the works, not of the spirit, but of the flesh, and are contrary to truth and peace." This act is followed by another, "against such as withdraw themselves from the public worship in their own congregation;" in which the assembly ordains "every member in every congregation to keep their own parish kirk, to communicate there in the word and sacraments;" and directs that "if any person or persons shall hereafter usually absent themselves from their own congregations, except in urgent cases made known to and approven by the presbytery," and if after private admonition by their pastors they do not amend their conduct, "they shall be delated, or informed against, to the session," who shall cite and censure them as "contemners of the comely order of the kirk;" and if the matter be not taken order with there, it is directed to be brought before the presbytery. But the most arrogant and characteristic act of this assembly is one "discharging the importing, venting, or spreading of erroneous books or papers." "The General Assembly," says this act, almost in the tone and style of an authority claiming to be sovereign in things civil as well as ecclesiastical, "considering how the errors of independency or separation have in our neighbor kingdom of England spread as a gangrene and do daily eat as a canker, insomuch that exceeding many errors, heresies, schisms, and blasphemies have issued therefrom, and are sheltered thereby; and how possible it is for the same evils to invade and overspread this kirk and kingdom (lying within the same island), by the spreading of their erroneous books, pamphlets, libels, and letters; . . . do therefore, in the name of God, inhibit and discharge all members of this kirk and kingdom to converse with persons tainted with such errors, or to import, sell, spread, vent, or disperse such erroneous books or papers; . . . requiring all ministers . . . to try carefully from time to time if any such books be brought into this country from England, or from beyond seas (which is especially recommended to ministers on sea-coasts, or towns where any stationers are); and, if any shall be found, to present the same to the presbytery, that some course may be taken to hinder the dispersion thereof. And hereby all presbyteries and synods are ordained to try and process such as shall transgress against the premises or any part of the same. And the assembly doth also seriously recommend to civil magistrates, that they may be pleased to be assisting to ministers and presbyteries, in execution of this act, and to concur with their authority in every thing to that effect."

Two or three other notices may be thrown together into a single paragraph. "It will be a good remedy against Sabbath-breaking by carriers and travelers," says an act of the assembly of 1648, "that the ministers where they dwell cause them to bring testimonials from the place where they rested on those Lord's Days wherein they were from home." "Let all persons," says another clause of the same ordinance, "who flit (remove) from one parish to another have sufficient testimonials. This is to be extended to all gentlemen and persons of quality, and all their followers, who come to reside with their families at Edinburgh or elsewhere; and let the minister from whom they flit advertise the minister to whom they flit, if to his knowledge they be lying under any scandal." "For better keeping of the Sabbath," a third clause directs, "let every elder take notice of such as are within his bounds, how they keep the kirk, and how their time is spent before, betwixt, and after the time of public worship." At its next meeting, in 1649, the assembly, "finding the scandal and abuse that arises through promiscuous dancing, do therefore inhibit and discharge the same, and do refer the censure thereof to the several presbyteries, recommending it to their care and diligence." The old subject of witchcraft, also, again this year engaged the attention of the church, and an act was passed appointing a conference of ministers, lawyers, and physicians to consider the most advisable means of detecting and trying that crime, which it is complained had still continued to increase, notwithstanding all the methods employed against it. Upon this subject Sir James Balfour has preserved some frightful details. The Lady of Pittardo in Fifeshire, he tells us, was in July this year (which was during the sitting of the assembly) apprehended for witchcraft, and imprisoned in the tolbooth of Edinburgh, and there a commission having been appointed by parliament for her trial, she remained till the middle of December, when, having been quite well over night, she was found one morning dead, and all swollen, apparently as if she had been poisoned. "It was thought," said Sir James, "that she either had taken the poison of herself, being guilty of that hellish crime, or that it had been administered to her by the advice of her friends and kindred, whom by her wickedness, if she had been publicly burned, she had blotted, and stained those families she was descended of, of whom were descended many religious, worshipful, and worthy personages." The annalist adds, "Many witches apprehended, commissions given by parliament and council for their trial, and they execute, in the shires of Fife, Perth, Stirling, Linlithgow, Edinburgh, Haddington, Merse, and Peebles, &c. I myself did see, the 20th of July, this year, in one afternoon, commissions severally directed by the parliament for trying and burning of twenty-seven witches, women, and three men and boys; their depositions were publicly read in face of parliament, before the House would vote to the president's subscribing of the act for the clerk issuing of these commissions. Likewise divers commissions were given by the lords of council, in November and December, this same year, for trying and burning of witches: their depositions were read, among the which there was one that confessed that she had been of late at a meeting with the devil, at which there were above five hundred witches present. So far had that wicked enemy of mankind prevailed, by his illusions and practices, over these poor, wretched, miserable souls."[1] Horrible it is indeed to think of the wide devastation committed under the influence of the sanguinary delusion to which these unhappy persons were sacrificed—of the quantity of blood it caused to be shed, and the much greater quantity of terror and torment, of every kind, it must have spread through the land—not to speak of the dark, vindictive passions with which it harassed and poisoned the public mind, thus dropping no small part of its curse upon the inflictors as well as upon the victims of the legal murders and massacres with which it was continually feeding its insatiable fury. Was there any thing really more shocking in the fires lighted up in Scotland and England by the Roman church, in the sixteenth century, for the consumption of heretics, than in these burnings of persons equally guiltless of any real crime which the Presbyterian church in the seventeenth century thus abetted and urged on?

A matter of great importance, in respect both of the practice and the principle involved in it, and which had occasioned much controversy, was at last settled this year. This was the manner of the election and appointment of ministers to vacant charges. The crown had some years before consented, in the case of benefices in its presentation, to limit its choice to a list of three candidates nominated by the presbytery; but the other lay patrons could not generally be induced, in the same manner, to surrender their rights into the hands of the church courts. At length, however, in March, 1649, the legislature was prevailed upon to end the difficulty by a very summary measure. "The parliament," says Sir James Balfour, "passed a most strange act this month, abolishing the patronages of kirks which pertained to laymen since ever Christianity was planted in Scotland. Francis Earl of Buccleugh, and some others, protested against this act as wrangous and altogether derogatory to the just rights of the nobility and gentry of the kingdom of Scotland, and so departed the parliament-house. But current was carried for the presbyteries and church-way, in respect Argyle, the chancellor, and Archibald Johnston, the kirk's minion, durst do no otherwise, lest the leaders of the church should desert them, and leave them to stand on their own feet, which, without the church, none of them could well do." Commenting further upon "this notable prank," as he calls it, the annalist proceeds:—"And this act, to make it the more specious, they colored with the liberty of the people to choice their own ministers; yet the general assembly, holden at Edinburgh in the months of July and August, this same year, made a very sore mint [attempt] to have snatched this shadow from the people; notwithstanding their former pretenses, collationed the sole power on the presbyteries; and out-fooled the people of that right they formerly pretended did only and especially belong to them jure divino; as, according to the new divinity of these times, both the leaders and their creature Johnston pleaded, with all the forcible arguments wrested scripture could produce, to procure their own ends and greatness." The act passed by the assembly, in fact, provided that, when a congregation became vacant, the presbytery should send down certain preachers for the people to hear; that, if the people desired to hear any others, they might apply for that purpose through their elders (that is, the members of the parochial kirk session) to the presbytery, which, however, was not to be bound to grant the application, any more, indeed, than the elders were to make it, unless they chose; that after a competent time, not the people, but the elders or session only, should meet and proceed to the election; that if the people acquiesced, the presbytery, upon finding the person thus elected to be qualified, should admit him to the ministry in the said congregation: "but if it happen," continues the act, "that the major part of the congregation dissent from the person agreed upon by the session, in that case the matter shall be brought unto the presbytery, who shall judge of the same; and, if they do not find their dissent to be grounded on causeless prejudices, they are to appoint a new election in manner above specified." The whole right accorded to the people, therefore, was simply to state their objections; the sole right of deciding upon the reasonableness of the said objections being reserved to the presbytery. Such, in the purest times of the Scottish kirk, was the popular election of the clergy, of which we still sometimes hear so much! The act concludes with a clause which would no doubt be found convenient in many cases: "Where the congregation is disaffected and malignant, in that case the presbytery is to provide them with a minister." It is not clear whether this was intended to cure or to punish their disaffection and malignity.

At the memoroble date of the assembling of the Long Parliament, in November, 1640, English Puritanism had not yet taken the shape of Presbyterianism to any considerable extent. Besides the statement of Clarendon, that, with the exception of Fiennes and the younger Vane, and, as he asserts, at a somewhat later stage, Hampden, there were scarcely any members of that parliament, at its opening, who were opposed to the principle of the constitution of the national church, we have the authority of Richard Baxter, in his account of his own Life, for the fact that, although "the younger and less experienced ministers in the country were against amending the bishops and liturgy, apprehending this was but gilding over their danger;" yet "this was not the sense of the parliament, nor of their principal divines." "The matter of bishops or no bishops," he adds, "was not the main thing, except with the Scots, for thousands that wished for good bishops were on the parliament side." And even of those who were altogether opposed to episcopacy—the Root-and-branch-men, as they were called, to which party Vane, and his friends that have just been mentioned, belonged—very few were at this time Presbyterians; it was independency, not presbytery, which they would have substituted for the government of bishops.

For the present, however, the mere diminution of the episcopal power which was alone derived by the majority of the House of Commons afforded a common object which united all these parties; and the habit they thus acquired of acting in concert, together with the course events took, which naturally tended to heat and exasperate many of those whose feelings and views were at first comparatively moderate, soon enabled the few persons of more extreme opinions to become the leaders of the movement, and to draw the great majority of the others along with them. How the established church fell under this combined attack has been already related.[1] The first blow struck at the bishops, if we except the impeachment and committal to the Tower of Laud, on the 1st of March, 1641, was the bill brought in to take away their votes in parliament. and to leave them out in all commissions that had relation to any temporal affairs, which, after being passed in the House of Commons with little opposition, was sent up to the Lords on the first of May, but thrown out by the Upper House after the second reading. This was followed in the same session by Sir Edward Deering's bill for the utter eradication of bishops, deans, and chapters, with all officers belonging to them, which also, however, took no effect, having, after it had been read a second timo in the House of Commons, been dropped in committee. The first measures that were actually carried against the church were the two bills abolishing the courts of High Commission and Star Chamber, which received the royal assent in the beginning of July. On the last day of that month the Commons appointed their committee for drawing up the charges of impeachment against the thirteen bishops, which were presented at the bar of the House of Lords on the 4th of August following.[2] On the 30th of December ten of the bishops were sent to the Tower, and two more debarred from their places in parliament, on being impeached of high treason by the Commons for their protestation against the legality of the acts passed in their absence.[1] On the 14th of February, 1642, a new bill incapacitating the bishops for voting in parliament was at last passed into a law.[2] From this date the church, though not yet actually pulled down, may be considered as a mere ruin.

Only a few days after the opening of the Long Parliament the Commons had appointed a grand committee, consisting of the whole House, to inquire into the scandalous immoralities of the clergy. But the vast number of cases that came pouring in, upon the general invitation that was given to all sorts of persons to get up all sorts of complaints against their ministers, soon made it necessary that the grand committee should divide itself into four or five committees, which were called White's, Corbet's, Harlow's, Deering's committees, after the chairman of each. It is said that, in a short time, about two thousand petitions were brought before them, of which Corbet's committee, which it appears was the favorite tribunal, had for its share no fewer than nine hundred. About two years after, another committee was appointed to consider of "the fittest way," as it was expressed, "for the relief of such godly and well-affected ministers as have been plundered, and what malignant clergymen have benefices in and about the town, which benefices being sequestered, may be supplied by others who may receive their profits;" and in July, 1643, the scandalous committee and this other (nicknamed by the royalists the plundering committee) were empowered to carry on their proceedings in concert. By means of their united powers, and the aid of a succession of ordinances passed by the House to facilitate their operations, these bodies, in course of time, cleared the church pretty effectually both of immoral clergymen and also of those who were not of their own way of thinking. Many of the royalist clergy were besides still more summarily ejected by the parliament soldiers. "Multitudes of them," to quote the account of the historian of the Puritans, "left their cures and took sanctuary in the king's armies or garrisons, having disposed of their goods and chattels in the best manner they could. Others, who had rendered themselves obnoxious by their sermons, or declarations for the king, were put under confinement in Lambeth, Winchester, Ely, and most of the bishop's houses about London; and, for want of room, about twenty, according to Dr. Walker, were imprisoned on board of ships in the river Thames, and shut down under decks, no friend being allowed to come near them."[1] It is said that one hundred and ten of the clergy of the diocese of London alone were turned out of their livings in the years 1642 and 1643, and that as many more fled to avoid imprisonment. "It is to be lamented," adds Neal, "that several pious and worthy bishops and other clergymen, who withdrew from the world, and were desirous to live peaceably without joining either side, suffered afterward in common with the rest of their brethren; their estates and livings being sequestered, their houses and goods plundered by ungovernable soldiers, and themselves reduced to live upon the fifths, or a small pension from the parliament, either because they could not take the covenant or comply with the new directory for public worship. Among these we may reckon the most reverend Archbishop Usher, bishops Morton and Hall, and many others. When the bishops' lands were seized for the service of the war, which was called Bellum Episcopale, or the bishops' war, it was not possible to show favor to any under that character; and though the two Houses voted very considerable pensions to some of the bishops, in lieu of their lands that were sequestered, due care was not taken of the payment; nor would several of their lordships so far countenance the votes of the Houses as to apply for it." To the names of the eminent sufferers here mentioned may be added one of the most illustrious in English literature, that of Jeremy Taylor, who, being driven from his living at Uppingham, which was sequestered, retired into Wales, and, while supporting himself and his family by teaching a school, there composed some of the greatest of his immortal works.

For a space of some two years the country might be said to be without any established form of worship. The clergy were left to read the liturgy or not, as they pleased, and to take their own way, in like manner in all other points: thus, we are told, while some of them continued to wear the canonical habits, others gratified their taste by preaching in a cloak, after the fashion of the Protestant ministers of Geneva and France. The cathedral worship was also everywhere put down; and many of the sacred edifices themselves were lamentably defaced and injured, principally in the process of executing an ordinance passed by the parliament in the summer of 1643, by which it was directed, that, before the first of November ensuing all altars and tables of stone in churches should be utterly taken away and abolished; all communion tables removed from the east end of the church; all rails about them pulled down; all candlesticks, tapers, and basins standing upon them taken away; and that all crucifixes, crosses, images, and pictures of any one or more persons of the Trinity, or of the Virgin Mary, and all other images and pictures of saints, and all superstitious inscriptions, whether in the church or church-yard, should be obliterated or otherwise destroyed. In the beginning of the preceding May, also, the two Houses, in the fury of their zeal against monuments of superstition, had passed a resolution for the destruction of all crosses throughout the kingdom; and, by their order, Sir Robert Harlow actually superintended the leveling to the ground of St. Paul's cross, Charing cross, and that in Cheapside, London. The Puritans themselves had been accustomed to crowd around St. Paul's cross, to hear their favorite preachers declaim from the same pulpit from which Ridley, and Latimer, and Cranmer had addressed their forefathers in the first days of the Reformation.

The building up of a new ecclesiastical polity was made the work of the Assembly of Divines, which was called together by an order of the two Houses, dated 12th June, 1643, and met at Westminster on the 1st of July thereafter. The members of the assembly, selected as they had been by the puritanical parliament, were generally agreed in holding the doctrinal theology of Calvin; but upon the question of church government they were more divided in opinion. A few of them were attached to episcopacy as it had lately existed in the national church; but, these, finding themselves in a hopeless minority, soon retired. Of those that remained the great majority appear to have been at first inclined toward a modified episcopacy, or rather some such combination of episcopacy and presbytery as had been established by the original reformers of the Scottish church, in which bishops, without any secular rank or authority, like the district superintendents instituted by Knox, should be associated with a system of diocesan and provincial church courts. This party, however, coalescing with the commissioners from Scotland, and swayed by the great influence which circumstances at the time gave to the church of that country, ultimately became thoroughly Presbyterian, some of them even going the length of adopting the principle of the divine right of presbytery. From them proceeded all the successive creeds and compendiums published in the name of the assembly—the Directory for Public Worship; the Confession of Faith; and the Larger and Shorter Catechisms. All these expositions are thoroughly both Calvinistic and Presbyterian—they constitute, indeed, the authorized formularies of the church of Scotland at the present day.

But the Presbyterians were to the last vigorously opposed in the Westminster Assembly by a minority consisting of two sections, which, although they generally acted in concert against the common foe, were also sufficiently distinguishable from each other. These were the Independents, and those called Erastians, from their adoption of the tenets of Erastus, a German divine of the preceding century, who reduced the questions of church government, and also of the connection between the church and the state, to the simplest possible form, by maintaining that the church, or the clergy as such, possessed no inherent legislative power of any kind, and that the national church in its form and discipline was in all respects the mere subject and creature of the civil magistrate. That, however, which in both the Erastians and the Independents more than any thing else enraged and alarmed the Presbyterian party was, their advocacy of the principle of general toleration—a doctrine which presbytery, as we have seen, had always held in especial abhorrence. As yet, the Independents appear to have generally held this great principle with some limitation; being inclined, for instance, though rather on political than theological grounds, to exclude the adherents of popery from the full liberty which they would have granted to all other Christian sects. But the views of the Erastians were of the most comprehensive amplitude. Baillie, who was one of the commissioners to the assembly from the church of Scotland, repeatedly notices in his letters the assertion in various quarters of a toleration which should be without any limits whatever. Thus, in one place he speaks of a letter that was given in to their clerk, inveighing against the covenant, and exhorting the assembly to give a full liberty of conscience to all sects. "Here," he says, "rose a quick enough debate; Goodwin, Nye, and their party (the Independents), by all means pressing the neglect, contempt, and suppressing of all such fantastic papers; others were as vehement for the taking notice of them, that the parliament might be acquaint therewith, to see to the remedy of these dangerous sects."[1] The person mentioned in this passage is Thomas Goodwin: he afterward speaks of a John Goodwin, of Coleman-street, not a member of the assembly, who, he says, "is a bitter enemy to presbytery, and is openly for a full liberty of conscience to all sects, even Turks, Jews, Papists." "This way," he adds, "is very pleasant to many here."[1] In another place he describes Cromwell and Vane as "both for universal liberty."[2]

Although, also, the majority in the Assembly of Divines remained with the Presbyterians till its dissolution, about three weeks after the king's death (on the 22d of February, 1649), the Independents and other sectaries had long before that date been getting ahead of them both in the parliament and in the army. The Directory of Public worship, which supplanted the liturgy, was established by an ordinance of the parliament, on the 3d of January, 1645; but the Confession of Faith, which laid down a Presbyterian system of ecclesiastical polity, although it was at once received by the Scottish church, was never, in fact, sanctioned by any act of the English legislature. Nor were even the name, style, and dignity of archbishops and bishops formally taken away till the 5th of September, 1646. By an act passed on the 6th of June, 1646, however, the Presbyterian form of church government was partially established, by way of experiment, the preamble of the act declaring "that if upon trial it was not found acceptable, it should be reversed or amended;" and to this law a further effect was afterward given by several additional ordinances of the House of Commons; till at last, in 1649, it was declared, without qualification, by the House, that presbytery should be the established religion. Yet, many difficulties still stood in the way of the actual extension of the new system of ecclesiastical polity over the whole kingdom, and, in point of fact, it never obtained more than a very limited and imperfect establishment.

Accordingly, the national church of England, if it might be so called, in the time of the Commonwealth, although the clergy, and probably also the people, especially in the towns, were for the greater part Presbyterians, was by no means exclusively composed of the members of that persuasion. Some of the benefices were still retained by their old Episcopalian incumbents; a considerable number were held by Independents, and a few were filled even by persons belonging to some of the many minor sects that now swarmed in the sunshine of the Protector's all-but-universal toleration. For some time, indeed, the pulpits appear to have been opened even to any of the laity who were esteemed to possess an edifying gift of utterance. At last, in March 1653, Cromwell, by an ordinance of council, appointed a board of triers, as they were called, in all thirty-eight in number, of whom part were Presbyterians, part Independents, and a few Baptists, to which was given, without any instructions or limitations whatever, the power of examining, and approving or rejecting, all persons that might thereafter be presented, nominated, chosen, or appointed to any living in the church. This was tantamount to dividing the church among these different religious bodies, or so liberalizing and extending it as to make it comprehend them all. Cromwell, however, held forth the measure as one, on the contrary, of a restrictive character—as designed to restrain the excessive liberty that had previously existed, when any one who would might set up as a preacher, and so give himself a chance of obtaining a living in the church. The board of triers continued to sit, and to exercise its functions, at Whitehall, till a short time after the death of Cromwell.

Of the numerous sectaries, as they were called, that sprung up in this age, we shall not now enter into any account, further than to mention that those of chiefest note were the Baptists (generally called by others the Anabaptists), the Quakers, or followers of George Fox, and the Fifth-monarchy men, all of whom will meet us again in the next period.

In Scotland, also, Cromwell and his deputy, Monk, enforced, in spite of the teeth of the Presbyterian clergy, the same general toleration that had been established in England. But it soon became manifest that that system could only be maintained, with any chance of an hour's quiet to the country, by putting a gag upon the church. Accordingly, when, after many heats, the general assembly had met as usual, at Edinburgh, in the summer of 1652, and was about to proceed to business, Lieutenant-colonel Cotterel suddenly came into the church, and, standing up upon one of the benches, informed them that no ecclesiastical judicatories were to sit there but by authority of the parliament of England; and, without giving them leave to reply, commanded them instantly to withdraw themselves, and then conducted the whole of the reverend body out of the city, by one of the gates called the West Port, with a troop of horse and a company of foot. The assembly did not dare to attempt to meet again so long as Cromwell lived.

CHAPTER III.

HISTORY OF THE CONSTITUTION, GOVERNMENT, AND LAWS.

WE have now arrived at a period of so great importance in the constitutional history of England, that it will be necessary to dwell upon it somewhat longer than we have done on any other period: it will be necessary to pause, and cast a look behind us well as around us.

The struggle between the king and the nobility (in other words, between monarchy and aristocracy) had now been going on in England for more than four hundred years. The very fact of its having continued so long proves that victory could not have invariably declared itself either for one side or the other. Consequently each side would have its successes or their consequences to bring forward as precedents in favor of its pretensions. By far the greater number of these precedents were on the side of the king. The earlier Normans and all the Tudors were very nearly, if not altogether, absolute monarchs; though it was a sort of absolutism differing considerably from that of the Roman emperor or Turkish sultans, inasmuch as, in the community over which the English monarchs ruled there existed elements of opposition to their power, which had native vigor enough, and only wanted time and circumstances to become exceedingly formidable, while the other communities referred to were sunk in a hopeless, irrecoverable torpor. At the same time, the granting of Magna Charta, and the numerous confirmations of it between the thirteenth and seventeenth centuries (in one reign alone, that of Edward III., there were no fewer than fifteen, and there were thirty-two[1] in all), together with the new statutes made to support and develop it, prove incontestably that the other side had precedents in their favor also. The existence of these precedents on both sides accounts for the strangely different views taken of the subject by writers of opposite parties, who, as the manner of partisans is, fix their eyes intently on one object, or one class of objects, and shut them resolutely against all others. The writers of the one party look to one set of precedents, those of the other to the opposite set. For example, the historians David Hume and Mr. Brodie fix their attention on different sets of precedents. And while we must admit, with Hume, that the English government, before the time of the first two Stuarts, can not be considered as a government in which the liberty of the subject was uniformly and systematically protected in practice, whatever it might have been in theory, and even in the solemn language of the legislature, we are equally ready to concede to Mr. Brodie that the condition of the bulk of the English people was better than the condition of the bulk of the French.

Notwithstanding the circumstances in the situation of England—especially the great power of the earliest Norman kings, obliging the great barons to band together and to call in the aid of the smaller barons, and even of the people at large, to oppose it—which led to the granting and confirming of Magna Charta, the Commons of England, up to the period at which we have arrived, could hardly be said to have obtained any share of the sovereign power. The Commons, however, certainly gained some very important steps under Richard II. and the three succeeding kings of the House of Lancaster, if not toward an actual share of the sovereignty, at least toward a power of checking the king's exercise of it. The civil wars of York and Lancaster then intervened, and ended by leaving a cunning, mean-souled Welshman on the throne of the Plantagenets. The civil wars, however, had shivered to pieces the power of the Anglo-Norman barons, once so formidable; so that the cool, cunning, little Welshman, and his hot-headed, blustering bully of a son, did what the mightiest and most victorious of the Plantagenets could not do. They effectually crushed the nobility; and they prevented the Commons from making any further advances, if they did not rather drive them back from some of their more advanced posts. In fact, as we have seen in the preceding book, Henry VIII., at least, was as nearly as possible absolute. There is an important corroboration of this view of the subject by no mean authority. When Sir Edward Coke was fighting the battles of the Commons against the crown in the House of Commons, under Charles I., it is observable that all his precedents cited are from the Plantagenet reigns. If any had been to be had to serve his purpose from the Tudor times, Sir Edward was not the man to overlook or neglect them.

But along with these circumstances, favorable to the power of the prince, and unfavorable to the liberty of the subject, there were also some circumstances of a contrary description, which arose from causes set in motion by Henry VII. and his son, with the intention of producing effects very different from those that were produced. The principal of these circumstances were the power of, or at least the additional facilities to, the alienation or sale, and consequent subdivision, of the fiefs or large landed estates of the nobility;[1] and the reformation in religion. By the former, Henry VII. probably thought that he would only weaken the power of the great nobility, overlooking the fact of the great increase that would be produced in the number of landholders. In the latter, Henry VIII. only saw an instrument for the immediate gratification of his own brutal appetites and passions, overlooking likewise the similar fact, as in the other case, of the still further increase of the holders of land that would arise out of the division of the church property, and being unable to penetrate to the momentous moral and political consequences of the reformation.

By this subdivision of the large fiefs, or estates, was formed, or at least greatly increased, that numerous and when banded together, powerful class, placed between the higher nobility and the citizens or burgesses (for the mass of the people is hardly yet to be taken into the account), known in England by the denomination of "gentry." As we have remarked before, this class, with some of the ancient lineage, the territorial wealth, and the military character, inherited also a large portion of the high, proud, indomitable spirit of that old Norman aristocracy that had once filled Europe and Asia with their victories and their renown. To this class belonged most, if not all, of the parliamentary leaders during the eventful period upon which we are now employed—men who presented a strange compound of qualities which had probably never before been seen together, being at once cool, sagacious politicians—brave, high-spirited soldiers—and enthusiastic, devout, and somewhat ascetic theologians. So that, amid that band, in many a breast, beneath an exterior plain, cold, puritanical, there burned, along with the high, fierce, determined spirit of a republican soldier, the concentrated pride of a nobility of twenty generations.

It was a peculiarity in the destiny of England that this class, sitting in the same chamber with the citizens and burgesses, who, with whatever firmness they defended the narrow, local interests of their respective townships, were remarkable for a humble and even timid deportment in their transactions with the king and nobility, communicated to them a portion of their own high spirit; so that we shall find the "poor Commons," who before scarcely dared to lift their eyes from the ground in the presence of royalty and nobility, now transformed into the "Commons of England," who deposed lords, bishops, and kings, and bade defiance to the world.[1]

In this progress of events the Reformation, or revolution in religion, referred to above, played an important part. We agree with M. Guizot in thinking that the fundamental character of the Reformation was not a mere struggle for the redress of ecclesiastical grievances, but a grand insurrection of human intelligence against spiritual domination. This insurrection, then, having been successful—this rebellion having become a revolution—a singular phenomenon presents itself throughout Europe: liberty in spiritual matters and subjection in temporal, free examination and pure monarchy standing face to face. The battle was first joined, the mighty and eventful conflict began in England.

As we have said, the kingly power received a very considerable accession in the reign of the first Tudor. It reached a degree of energy and concentration it had not before known. Not that, as M. Guizot has remarked, the despotism of the Tudors was more violent, more oppressive, than that of their predecessors. There might have been as many or more acts of injustice, of tyranny, perpetrated by the Plantagenets than by the Tudors. But, under the latter, the kingly power became systematic; royalty held a language it had not held before in England. It may be added that a somewhat similar movement, as regarded royalty, was then going on over the greater part of Europe.

The Reformation, though Henry VIII. probably little suspected so, gave a mighty impulse in the other direction. The minds of men, freed in part from the spiritual thralldom which had so long bound them, began to question other things beside matters of religious belief. In England, moreover, the religious revolution had been brought about by the higher orders of the state, the king and the nobles; not, as in Germany, by the people themselves. Consequently it bore the stamp of its authors. It was a monarchical and aristocratical revolution; royalty, episcopacy, and nobility divided among them the rich spoil of their papal predecessor; and consequently, too, it left many, if not all, of the popular wants unsatisfied. Thence arose a sect, which constantly went on increasing, of dissentients from the form of religion prescribed by the state. In proportion to the difficulties which their dissent threw in their way, and the dangers to which it exposed them, were, as might be expected, these men's enthusiasm, perseverance, energy, and courage. Calm, austere, laborious, temperate, hoping all things, enduring all things, they learned in time to dare all things for that which the very sufferings they underwent for the sake of it taught them implicitly to believe was of paramount importance to themselves and to all men. Such were the English Puritans, who were destined to be the main instruments in bringing about perhaps the most important revolution that has yet been recorded in the annals of human kind.

The fire that burned thus fiercely in the breasts of a large portion of the people of England continued to burn silently and unseen during the reign of Elizabeth, kept under, though it could not be extinguished, by the wise and firm policy of that illustrious woman. All restraint was relaxed in the next reign, as if the government had fallen into the hands of a rabble of half-drunken dotards. In every relation of human life in which he is viewed, whether uttering driveling absurdities to his parliaments, and at the same time likening himself to King Solomon in wisdom, or blustering about his courage and power at the very moment when he was giving unequivocal signs of the last degree of cowardice and weakness, or enlivening the privacy of his royal retirement by the amusement of looking at his court fools jousting against each other, mounted upon the shoulders of other fools, or pouring forth the effusions of his obscene, groveling nature to his worthy minion Buckingham, James is equally an object of aversion or contempt. And yet, of the death of this man, Archbishop Laud says, in his Diary, that "he breathed forth his blessed soul most religiously."[1] Contempt, disgust, and the bitter feelings engendered by the persecutions they underwent, converted the Puritans generally, before the close of this reign, into zealots for a reformation in the state as well as in the church.

James died, and was succeeded by his son—a man who, as compared with his father, might be considered as possessing the tastes and habits of a gentleman, though wanting altogether in those higher characteristics of an English gentleman—a firm, a religious observance of his word—an unswerving fidelity to duty and to truth; and, viewed as the ruler of a great nation, absolutely incapable, from ignorance and narrowness of understanding, and from weakness both intellectual and moral. Having, however, very high notions of his power and prerogative, and sufficient courage to act upon those notions, though not sufficient ability, to act efficiently, he hurried on the contest, to which we have alluded above, between liberty of conscience and civil subjection—between the absolute dominion of the One, or the Few, and the insurgent spirit of the Many. This conflict, from the deep and far-spreading character of its effects, will forever be intensely interesting, not only to Englishmen, but to every nation and tribe of civilized men.

James had carried at least the pretensions of royalty farther than any of his predecessors. What the strongest of the Tudors had left vague and fluctuating in theory, whatever might have been their practice, he endeavored to render clear and incontrovertible as the revealed laws of the Deity. He attempted to prove from the Holy Scriptures (though the passages he quoted had been long before used by a much abler logician, Sir William Fortescue, to prove the exact converse of the kingly proposition) that kings held their power immediately from God, and to him only were accountable for its exercise; and that monarchy, or the sovereignty of One, was the form of government for which, above all others, God himself had expressed a decided preference.[1] Charles was not likely to be wanting in respect to the judgment of his father on this point. He had traveled, too, with his father's minion, Buckingham, as a traveling tutor. He had beheld, in Spain, royalty treated with honors little short of divine. And from France, along with his queen, he received impressions which were all in favor of the supremacy of kings. If he had had somewhat more ability and a better fortune, perhaps Strafford might have done for him what Richelieu did for his royal relative. And yet there were peculiarities in the case of England that might have rendered that impossible even to the firmness and capacity of Strafford. These we have already touched slightly, but they deserve to be more fully examined.

[1] For a full development of this see M. Guizot's admirable "Histoire Génerale de la Civilisation en Europe, depuis la Chute de l'Empire Romain jusqu' à la Révolution Française." Paris, 1828-1832.—That the more reflecting minds of that age were not insensible to the real changes that had taken place in the constitution of society, is proved by such passages as the following, in Raleigh's Prerogative of Parliament:—"The force by which our kings in former times were troubled is vanished away. But the necessities remain. The people, therefore, in these later ages, are no less to be pleased than the peers before; for, as the latter are become less, so, by reason of the training through England, the Commons have all the weapons in their hands."

Hobbes[2] does well, as it appears to us, to place among the very first and chief causes of (as he terms it) the people's being corrupted or seduced from their allegiance to their king, the allowing them the free use of the Scriptures, as was done by the Reformation. If an absolute monarchy, such as absolute monarchies then were, was to be established, the best way to go about it was not to set every man to work to read the Scriptures in his mother tongue, and put his own interpretation upon them. It might be expected that men who were accustomed to attempt to penetrate all the mysteries of their religion, to discuss freely the nature and powers of God and his angels,[3] would not stop short there, and abstain altogether from touching upon the nature of earthly potentates. King James might command them to abstain from such speculations, as too high and weighty for their weak and narrow capacities. But, like Canute dictating to the waves, he commanded in vain. He did not know that the human mind was obeying the action of laws as fixed and irresistible as those that made the waves of the ocean deaf to the command of Canute.

The different effect produced at the time by this use of the Scriptures upon different minds is a curious instance of the degree to which men's conclusions are governed by their interests. The king, the high nobility, and the high clergy, being the principal gainers, were satisfied with the Reformation as it was. They sought to go no farther. They were convinced that every thing was pretty much as it should be. "The kingdom," they said, "abounded with wealth, plenty, and all kinds of elegance, more than ever—they did nothing but applaud the happiness of England, and called those ungrateful and factious spirits who complained of the breach of laws and liberties."[1] On the other hand, the rest of the community, including gentry, burgesses, and people, saw that the Reformation had left them many things still to desire. It had, in truth, made them aware of many wants before unfelt. And they were not slow in finding in Holy Writ abundance of evidence to support their views and prove the reasonableness of their wishes. An instance of the application of the same text of Scripture, to prove two things the exact opposite of each other, will strikingly illustrate the above remarks. "Kings," says Heylyn, the churchman, "are God's deputies on earth, and, like him, love a cheerful giver."[2] "Forced consecrations," says Milton, the republican, "out of another man's estate, are no better than forced vows—hateful to God, who loves a cheerful giver."[3]

Akin to the preceding is another cause, which is noticed by Lord Bacon as one of the diseases with which learning was afflicted in his time.[4] This was the fervor and rhetorical vehemence of language, both in writing and speaking, but especially in preaching, which sprung up (says Bacon) about the time of Luther, and was employed to excite the passions of the people, taking place of the somewhat uncouth but far more accurate and logical diction of the schoolmen. Though Bacon only viewed this phenomenon as it affected literature and science, it was a sign and forerunner of the greatest social and political changes; for it was the first symptom in modern times that the mass of the community were to be appealed to. And though, when the mass is sunk in ignorance, the appeal is necessarily made to their passions rather than their reason, even this was a point gained; for it was a step that behooved to be made before society could advance beyond, and a step of such importance that, to gain it, we should even be willing that, for a time, the loose, wordy, empty declamation of popular rhetoricians should take the place of the concise, close, apt, and precise language of the Aristotelian logicians, or schoolmen. This would naturally lead to the diligent study and imitation of the ancient orators; and, along with the admiration of their style, there would be apt to arise an admiration of their sentiments. So that the Reformation would here act in two ways. It would produce a disposition to question constituted authorities—first, on religious grounds; and, secondly, "because (in the words of Hobbes) there were an exceeding great number of men of the better sort that had been so educated as that, in their youth, having read the

[3] The innumerable tracts and pamphlets that have come down to us from those times show the nature of many of these inquiries. The younger Sir Henry Vane appears to have been one of the wildest as well as the subtlest of those "seekers." Among his subjects of discussion were "The creation, nature, and ministry of angels," "The thousand years' reign of Christ," and the like. See his work entitled "The Retired Man's Meditations; or the Mysterie and Power of Godliness shining forth in the Living Word, to the unmasking the Mysterie of Iniquity in the most refined and purest Forms. books written by famous men of the ancient Grecian and Roman commonwealth, concerning their polity and great actions, in which books the popular government was extolled by that glorious name of liberty, and monarchy disgraced by the name of tyranny, they became thereby in love with their forms of government; and out of these men were chosen the greatest part of the House of Commons, or, if they were not the greatest part, yet, by advantage of their eloquence, were always able to sway the rest."[1]

But it may be said that these causes of disaffection, with the addition of another—namely, the increase and diffusion of wealth in consequence of the rising prosperity of the city of London, and other great towns of trade—were not peculiar to England, but common to her with other countries, such as Holland and Germany. As we have already remarked, however, there were circumstances peculiar to England, which made the above causes efficient there before they were so in any other part of the world. "When we regard," says M. Guizot, "the state of the free institutions of England at the end of the sixteenth century, this is what we find:—1. Maxims: principles of liberty which had been written, which the country and the legislature had never lost sight of. 2. Precedents: examples of liberty, very much mixed up, it is true, with contrary examples and precedents, but sufficient to legitimatize and support the remonstrances. 3. Institutions, special and local, fruitful in germs of liberty: the jury, the right of assembling, of being armed, the independence of municipal administrations and jurisdictions. 4. Lastly, the parliament and its power, of which royalty had more need than ever, for it had dilapidated the greater part of its independent revenues, and could not avoid having recourse, for its subsistence, to the vote of the country."[2]

Now, the circumstances which were peculiar to England—and among the very most important of these must be classed that already mentioned, of a portion of the aristocracy being amalgamated with the burgesses by sitting together in the same chamber—joined to those above specified, which were common to her with other European countries, had, about the commencement of this period of our history, added much boldness not only to the thoughts, but to the bearing of the Commons of England. For we may here remark, in passing, that for a long time after the English Commons had assumed considerable boldness of ideas and firmness of purpose, their demeanor was characterized by an extreme deference and timidity. The bearing, again, of the high aristocracy who sat in the Upper House was marked by a corresponding haughtiness. The following extract from the Commons' Journals exhibits, in a curious and striking manner, the state of the case as regarded the former humility and increasing pretensions of the Commons, and the proportionate pride and insolence of the Lords, so late as the accession of James I. to the throne.

The insolence of the servant may generally be taken as the measure, to a certain degree of accuracy, of that of the master: "Lunæ Martii 19, 1603. Complaint was made by Sir Herbert Croft, of Bryan Tassh, a yeoman of his majesty's guard, who, keeping one of the doors in the Upper House, and Sir Herbert himself and some others of the Commons offering to come in, he repulsed them, and shut the door upon them with these uncivil and contemptuous terms—Goodman burgess, you come not here."[1] When such was the insolence of the door-keeper, the insolence of those within may be assumed to have been considerable. Mr. Yeoman Tassh, however, even then did not escape without a reprimand from the Commons at the bar of their House. A few years later such insolence might have procured him suspension by the neck.

There is one leading trait in the aspect of this age that we must notice before we quit this part of our subject. We have already alluded to the probable effect of putting the Bible into the hands of the body of the people. They were commanded to be, they professed to be, Christians. They diligently read, and much pondered on, the precepts of the Christian morality. In being ordered to be Christians, they were ordered to take these as their rule of life. They did so take them, to the best (that is to say) of their comprehension and knowledge of them. They then turned their eyes to those who were their worldly superiors—whose power and wealth made them be looked up to as the great ones of the earth. They looked, as far as they were permitted, into the palaces of their princes and the halls of their nobles; and they beheld many things there which were hard to reconcile with the commands of that book, which, they believed, was no respecter of persons, but which was intended alike for the rich and the poor—for the prince in his palace and the peasant in his hut. They were convinced that a court which acted in a manner so contrary to the precepts of their cherished religion, and a church which was the tool of that court, must be bad, and ought to be put down. And they went about the work of putting them down with a mixture of enthusiasm and coolness, of ability, energy, and courage, which has never yet been displayed in an equal degree by any body of men in any age and any country. Yet, for all this, the revolution which we are about to trace must not be regarded merely as a religious one. It was also a political revolution, but accomplished in the midst of a religious people, in a religious age. We have already said that it was the commencement in Europe of the struggle between free examination in spiritual matters, as established by the Reformation, and pure monarchy. This is M. Guizot's statement of the question, but it is not strictly accurate; for in England monarchy was not quite pure, nor examination quite free. There was, however, enough of freedom of examination to produce a desire for more, and not enough of pure monarchy to render that desire unattainable. During the whole struggle, then, religious and political ideas, passions, and interests mingled, and constantly influenced, and supported each other.[1]

When Charles I. succeeded to the throne of England, being supposed to possess many more good qualities than his father, the nation, tired of the government of a pedant, an imbecile, and a coward, hailed his succession with unfeigned delight; for they had not forgotten that they had once been governed by men, or by a woman who possessed some of the noblest qualities of manhood. Their joy, however, was not destined to be of long continuance; nor had they reason to expect that it would, if they considered attentively what had been the education which the king who was now to rule over them had received.

Among the many vices of the court of James I., if there were others more lothsome, there was none more universal, more habitual in it, than insincerity. Insincerity is, indeed, the characteristic of all barbarous and semi-barbarous nations, and preëminently of all barbarous and semi-barbarous courts. Thus we meet with it in the court of Elizabeth as well as in that of James. But, nevertheless, we are less likely to meet with it in abundance at the court of a virtuous and manly prince than of a vicious and effeminate one. At the court of James, from the king on his throne to the court jester, all had alike discarded truth and sincerity as qualities they had no use and no regard for. He who could not lie, and look in the face of him to whom he lied as if he were speaking the truth, was unfit to breathe in such an atmosphere. But in that atmosphere Charles Stuart first drew the breath of life—in that atmosphere he passed his boyhood and his youth—in that atmosphere he attained to manhood, at least to all of manhood he ever knew. Knowing, then, what his father was, and knowing what were the instructors of the son, the English people do not seem to have had much ground for entertaining any high expectations from that son. But drowning men, says the proverb, are glad to catch at a straw.

Such was the state of the national mind when Charles called together his first parliament. Even of that the proceedings soon showed that, if pure monarchy could at this time be said to exist in England, its seat was over an awakening volcano. It manifested, from first to last, a spirit of distrust and even of resistance; and, after sitting somewhat less than two months, was dissolved by the king in a fit of spleen at what he considered its contumacy.

In about six months a new parliament was called, and the Commons do not appear to have grown in the interval a whit more compliant with the king's wishes. They almost commenced their proceedings with an inquiry into the conduct of the Duke of Buckingham. This man had enjoyed the extraordinary fortune of being the favorite and prime minister of two successive kings, James I. and his son Charles. His recommendation to this high office was simply beauty of person. Of the qualities belonging to a statesman he possessed not one. It would be, then, only what the laws of human nature would lead us to expect if his administration was one uninterrupted series of failures and disasters. In his negotiations he was constantly outwitted by men who, though they might be as great knaves, were not quite so great fools as himself; and his military enterprises rendered the name of Englishman the laughing-stock of Europe,[1] till it was redeemed by the capacity and valor of Cromwell and Blake. His private life, too, was profligate to the last degree; and he offended all with whom he came in contact by the insolence of his demeanor. In the full enjoyment of almost every object of human desire—power only short of absolute—unbounded wealth—pleasure in every material form in which it is known to mortals, without having expended one particle of the labor, the courage, and the skill which the lot of man upon earth has ordained to be the price of such things, and naturally of a frivolous character, he was necessarily ignorant of all which, as prime minister of England, it was at once his interest and his duty to know. To all this must be superadded the circumstance of his not being born to this high and prosperous fortune, which he thus acquired without desert or exertion, and consequently feeling less easy in his position, and therefore exhibiting, in addition to all his other bad qualities, those of a parvenu. If we can conceive a creature to the last degree weak, ignorant, vicious—knowing no higher impulse than the low, sordid passions of a savage or a brute—intrusted with all that concerns the happiness of millions of beings, of whom the lowest are considerably above it in the scale of existence—we shall obtain some idea of the administration and the statesmanship of Buckingham. A fitter instrument than such a minister the wit of man could hardly have devised to accelerate the fate of a falling dynasty.

As might have been expected, the impeachment of the Duke of Buckingham was ineffective. "His majesty's poor Commons" were not yet a match for the favorite of his majesty. But the fact of the impeachment at least showed the spirit of discontent that had arisen and the spirit of resistance that was rising among the Commons of England.

The king, finding the Commons more disposed to attack his favorite than to grant him supplies of money, dissolved his refractory parliament after it had sat only four months. After an interval of a year and nine months, a third parliament was

[1] M. Guizot thinks that the English Revolution was essentially political, though religious ideas and passions served as instruments to it. Civilis. en Europe, Leçon 13. May (History of the Parliament, lib. i. p. 115) goes farther, and says that mixing up religion in the dispute about laws and liberties rather injured the cause of the parliament. However, in this we think him wrong, and the result proved it; for the parliament forces were beaten till Cromwell adopted the plan of having plenty of religious fanatics among his soldiers; and then they were invincible.

[1] At Paris, Madrid, and the Hague, the English ambassadors were repeatedly insulted. One case, mentioned in Howell's Letters. p. 210 (8vo. London, 1678), will serve as a specimen. When Sir Thomas Edmunds went as ambassador to France, the Frenchman sent to meet him at St. Denis pretended to excuse the smallness of the attendance on the ambassador by saying that "his excellency should not think it strange that he had so few French gentlemen to attend in this service and to accompany him to the court, in regard there were so many killed at the Isle of Rhé."

called. Soon after its meeting a debate took place upon public grievances, in which Sir John Elliot, Sir Thomas Wentworth, and Sir Edward Coke joined.[1] Wentworth, after vehemently complaining of the illegal acts committed, said, "This hath not been done by the king, but by projectors; these have extended the prerogative of the king beyond its just limits." He concluded with moving two resolutions; the "1st, for our persons, the freedom of them from imprisonment, and from employment abroad against our own consents, contrary to the ancient customs of this kingdom. The 2d, for our goods, that no levies may be made but by parliament; and no billeting of soldiers."[2] But this parliament is chiefly memorable for preparing the petition to the king, founded upon Magna Charta and other statutes, for ascertaining what is called in England the rights and liberties of the subject, which afterward received the name of the "Petition of Right."[3] To this petition it was the object of the Commons to obtain the king's assent in parliament, that it might have the force of a special enactment, and, as such, be enrolled among the statutes.[4] In one of the debates on this subject Pym made an observation which shows that he was aware of the ambiguity and confusion produced by applying the term "sovereign" to the king of England. "I know," he said, "how to add sovereign to the king's person, but not to his power; and we can not leave to him a 'sovereign power,' for we were never possessed of it."[5] Charles at first attempted to evade answering this petition in the usual form, in the mode to which precedent had given the stamp of legality, by the subterfuge of appearing to assent to it in vague, general terms. But finding that this would not satisfy the Commons, he at length gave them an answer in the technical words, "Soit droit fait comme il est désiré."[6] But, this notwithstanding, the Commons having presented a remonstrance to the king on the subject of tunnage and poundage, Charles prorogued the parliament in disgust, after a session of little more than three months.[7]

During the prorogation a circumstance occurred which shows that Charles was beginning to suspect that something like a crisis in his affairs had arrived, which, for its management, demanded abilities of a somewhat different order from those possessed by the minion Buckingham. Sir Thomas Wentworth obtained title and place, being created a baron and privy counselor; and, in Michaelmas following, he was made a viscount, and lord president of the council of the north. The assassination of Buckingham, which also took place during this prorogation, made way for Wentworth and Laud to be the king's principal advisers.

Yet it is to be remarked that this was the usual mode of the king's giving his assent to a private bill, that to a public bill being "le roy le veut." Did Charles seek for a subterfuge to his tender conscience in this?—Commons' Journals, vol. i. p. 1057; Blackstone, Comm. On the reassembling of parliament in January, 1629, the first inquiry of the Commons regarded the infringment of the Petition of Right since the end of the preceding session.[1] Religious grievances also occupied a good deal of their attention, and many long-winded and vehement harangues were delivered, in which each speaker seemed to imagine that he had peculiar means of fathoming the designs and will of the Deity, and, to borrow the words of one of the most eloquent of those long-winded men, Sir John Elliot, of "laying down what was truth."[2] It was on these matters, as has been noticed in a former chapter,[3] that Oliver Cromwell first appeared as a speaker. And certainly it must be said for Oliver, that when he first made his appearance in public life, so far from evincing any seditious designs upon the crown of these realms, he appeared to be much more occupied with the world to come than with this. Meanwhile the breach between the king and the House of Commons was every day becoming wider; and, after a debate of unusual violence on the great question of tunnage and poundage, this third parliament also was hastily dissolved, like its two predecessors, on the 10th of March, 1629, Elliot, Hollis, Selden, and the other principal members of the opposition, being at the same time thrown into the Tower.[4] Henceforth Charles resolved to try what could be done without parliaments.

For some time things went on smoothly enough; and to a superficial observer, such as Charles's foreign wife and her frivolous and foolish courtiers, or to a short-sighted bigot such as Laud, Charles's principal adviser next to the queen, the smooth surface of society which they beheld gave no indications of the tornado that was gathering around and the earthquake that was sleeping below.

The wife of Charles, Henrietta Maria, a daughter of Henry IV. of France, had not been long in England before she discovered that her husband was a weak man; and, though herself a more than ordinarily weak and shallow woman, she felt herself in duty bound at least to make the attempt to govern him, and, through him, the kingdom of England. She wished to know and regulate every thing; and if she was not consulted upon every occasion, she treated her royal consort as a spoiled child does those who have submitted to the yoke of its weak, capricious tyranny. She was surrounded on the one hand by Roman Catholic priests, on the other by frivolous, intriguing young courtiers, and by one or two women, such as the Countess of Carlisle, who, like their royal mistress, fancied that they had talents for empire as well as gallantry. To this coterie the termination of parliaments seemed the commencement of an Elysium upon earth.

We may well question whether this section of Charles's council would amalgamate well with the Guizot (Hist. de la Rev. d'Angleterre, i. 57) has given of the exclamation of Finch, the speaker, in the debate of the 2d of March, "I will not say I will not, but I dare not,"—which he turns into "Je ne veux pas, je ne puis pas, je n'ose pas."

other directed by two such men as Laud and Wentworth.

The son of a country tradesman, to whatever cause William Laud owed his high place in the church and state, he did not owe it to his birth, any more than Wolsey and most of his brethren, for, in fact, it was in Laud's time, and mainly through his instrumentality, that the church of England commenced its close alliance with the aristocracy. Up to the age of fifty Laud had lived secluded in a college in Oxford, distinguished, however, for a busy, meddling spirit, and the sort of learning and acuteness which was at that time in demand at the Universities.[1] First, Bishop of St. David's, then of Bath and Wells, afterward of London, and, lastly, Archbishop of Canterbury, and, in truth, prime minister of England (for though he himself held no ostensible political office except his seat at the council-board, at the great committee of Trade and of the king's revenue, and as one of the commissioners of the Treasury during the time the lord high treasurership was in commission, a lord high treasurer, a clerk of the closet, and one of the principal secretaries of state were appointed on his recommendation), he carried into these high functions the petty, meddling, squabbling spirit of a university proctor. His rise was mainly owing to those low and base arts to which spirits at once servile and insolent are so prone, and to which so many men in all ages and countries, laymen as well as churchmen, have owed their rise. No sooner had he attained a certain elevation than he kicked down those who had helped him up; and while, like the pampered dog or menial of a great man's household, he was obsequious and fawning to his master and his master's minion, Buckingham, he was unmannerly and overbearing to all besides. At the same time laborious, austere, headstrong, choleric, uncourteous even to harshness toward all but those he considered his superiors,[2] he was as little likely to render himself agreeable to a circle of gay, frivolous, and licentious courtiers, as toward the austere, grim Puritans whom he persecuted with such unrelenting cruelty. The church was the one idea of Laud's mind, and its aggrandizement the one object of his existence; and he developed that idea and pursued that object, not indeed with the genius of a philosopher and the spirit of a statesman, but with the microscopic and perverted acuteness of a theological schoolman, the unrelaxing energy of a zealot, and the stern, inflexible courage of a martyr.

Wentworth was sprung from that class to which we have already alluded, as known by the name of gentry, being the eldest son of Sir William Wentworth, a gentleman of large estate and ancient family in the county of York, holding a manor which had descended to him from the time of the Conquest, and claiming consanguinity with a long list of ancient and noble families, that, in those days of respect to high birth and long descent, might comport well with his son's aspiring fortunes.[1] It has been usual to consider Wentworth as an apostate from the principles of his youth; and, indeed, he was so designated by Pym in the speech in which he introduced the motion for his impeachment at the commencement of the Long Parliament. But, without quarreling about the meaning of a word, it may be sufficient here to observe that we have evidence from Wentworth's own pen that he was, from the first, solicitous of royal favor; and he appears to have been driven into opposition to the court rather from disgust at the reception his advances had met with from the king, or, to speak more correctly, from the Duke of Buckingham, than from a thorough conviction of the badness of the government, and a sincere desire to amend it.[2] However that may be, he rendered himself sufficiently formidable, by his energy and eloquence, as an enemy, to make the court think it worth while to have him for a friend. But, in the capacity of Charles's minister, he found that the cup which he had coveted was not one of unmixed sweetness. Both nature and fortune had contributed to render Wentworth imperious and haughty; and his bold and aspiring spirit might be expected to rebel against so weak and contemptible a dictation as that of Charles and his miserable wife. His views were too large, and his pride was too lofty, to permit him to mix himself up with the domestic intrigues, or give way before the convenience, of the palace. And yet it is curious, in reading the letters and dispatches of Strafford, to observe how his vigorous administration, and comprehensive, coherent, and, pro tanto, statesmanlike views, were thwarted by whims and follies worthy of a spoiled child, or a weak, violent, capricious woman. The good or bad humor of the queen, the etiquet of the court, the prerogatives of the officers of the household, appeared to Charles considerations almost if not altogether of equal importance with the mightiest interests of the empire. There is a passage in one of his letters

[2] Clarendon, though the apologist of Laud, relates a striking instance of this; and to show that it was not an isolated instance, he adds, "and this kind of behavior of his was the discourse of all companies of persons of quality, every man continuing any such story with another like it, very much to his disadvantage."—Clarendon's Life, vol. i. p 62. By Sir George Radcliffe: forming Appendix No. I. of Strafforde's Letters and Dispatches. 2 vols. folio, London, 1739.—Also Biog. Brit., art. Wentworth; the compilers of which article, however, it ought to be observed, although they have added from other sources some new matter, have in some instances unwarrantably departed from the account of Radcliffe, who, as Strafford's confidential friend, was likely to be, and was, well informed. For instance, in regard to the time of his first marriage, where the account of Radcliffe is proved by a letter in page 1, vol. i. of the Letters and Dispatches, and of his first entering parliament, where Radcliffe's date is confirmed by Browne Willis's Notitia Parliamentaria, vol. iii. p. 169. Since writing the above we have been gratified to find that the accuracy of Radcliffe has also been noticed by Mr. Forster in his interesting and graphic, and at the same time elaborate, Life of Strafford, published in Dr. Lardner's Cabinet Cyclopædia.

[2] See particularly his Letters and Dispatches, vol. i. pp. 34, 35. But there is evidence to the same effect scattered all through those papers, which, besides furnishing materials for forming a judgment of the character of Strafford, such as are seldom possessed for estimating public men, afford a more complete picture than can be found elsewhere of the social as well as political condition of England during the early part of the seventeenth century. Hume, probably well aware how much it would tell against his views, has scarcely alluded to these papers, perhaps the most valuable record that has come down to us of that momentous time so characteristic of the man and his position, that we shall give it in his own words:—"I am none," he writes to the lord treasurer, "of those soft-tempered spirits; but I can not endure to be mistaken, or suffer my purer and more entire affections to be soiled or in the least degree prejudiced with the lothsome and odious attributes of covetousness and ambitious falsehood. Do me but right in this; judge my watches to issue (as in faith they do) from those clearer cisterns; I lay my hand under your foot; I despise danger, I laugh at labor. Command me in all difficulties, in all confidence, in all readiness."[1] Of the difficulties of Wentworth's situation it was not one of the least that he had to spend a large portion of his time in writing an explanation and defense of almost every one of his measures to a pack of ignorant incapables, such as composed the English court at that time. It is astonishing what labor he must have gone through in this way. Besides the two large folio volumes of his Dispatches, that were published about a century ago, there exists at Wentworth House, in the possession of Earl Fitzwilliam, an immense mass of papers, in his own handwriting, still unpublished.

But, notwithstanding all these difficulties with which he had to contend, Wentworth had not been long in his government of Ireland before the good effects of his vigorous administration began to be felt. The debts of the crown were discharged; the revenue, before unequal to the expenditure, was raised above it; the army, which he found feeble and ill disciplined, was recruited, well disciplined, and well paid; and, though Wentworth tyrannized over all, he would permit no other tyrants but himself: consequently the religious and aristocratical factions were kept in check, and the poor were protected from the oppression of the rich and powerful, which, in Ireland, except when checked by an iron hand like that of Wentworth and Cromwell, has at all times ground them down to the very dust.[2] The consequence was, that commerce prospered, manufactures were established, agriculture made some progress: in a word, Ireland was under an arbitrary and iron rule, indeed, but less a prey than, perhaps, it has ever been before or since, to the wasting domination of a selfish and ignorant oligarchy.

In England, Laud, possessed of less ability as well as invested with less ample power than Wentworth exercised in Ireland, though he could not go quite so far or quite so fast as his friend, yet went as fast as he was able in the same path. He set to work with his characteristic violence. He put down all liberty of speaking and writing; and he would fain have put down all liberty of thinking in the same manner; but that was not quite so easy.[3] He imprisoned, he fined, he cut off ears, he slit noses, he scourged, he set in the pillory, he branded with red-hot iron; and, to render the thing complete, those who sought to escape from this intolerable tyranny to the wilds of America were stopped. Such were the means that Laud employed to the professed end of propagating the true religion.

But, whether or not by such measures Laud advanced true religion, it is certain that, at least for a time, he advanced something which was probably much nearer the real end he had in view, and that was the church of England. Never was that church in a more palmy state. In 1635 the star of the church of England might be said to be in its zenith. Laud, archbishop of Canterbury, was prime minister of England; Juxon, bishop of London, was lord high treasurer, the first churchman who had been so since the time of Henry VII.[1] Wren, bishop of Norwich, and Bancroft, bishop of Oxford, were talked of among the young clergy, who "swarmed mightily about the court," and, after the joining of the "white sleeves with the white staff," seemed to think every thing their own, as secretary of state and chancellor of the exchequer.[2] Moreover, by enforcing conformity in the English regiments and factories beyond seas, and by sending bishops to the colonies and "backing them with forces," it was hoped that the church of England might be rendered "as diffused and catholic as the church of Rome."[3] So that Laud might well exclaim, after so much exertion, "And, now, if the church will not hold up themselves under God, I can do no more."[4]

The characteristic of the English church, as distinguishing it from most other aristocratical hierarchies, was its strict subordination to the state, while at the same time it had distinctly separate ministers and functions. In the latter quality it differed from the hierarchy of aristocratical, or, as it is commonly called, republican Rome, of which the ministers were at the same time statesmen and soldiers—the ministers, in short, of the ruling oligarchy; in the former from the papal hierarhcy, which owned subordination to none, but claimed dominion over all. The English church, moreover, like the reformed churches of Germany, Holland, Switzerland, and Scotland, owed its origin solely to the individual will of the temporal sovereign, and by that lost all independence. It had, indeed, early felt the irksomeness of this yoke, and desired to shake it off; but the perils which beset it at once from the Catholics and Nonconformists, and the formidable hand of Henry VIII. and Elizabeth, rendered that desire a vain one. When the Stuarts came to the throne the clergy became bolder, soon finding out, as well as the people, that they had got a very different sort of master to deal with. Every time the king paraded his prerogative, and talked of his divine right, the clergy bowed respectfully; but, by-and-by, they began to slip in a word or two at times of their divine right also. By way of excuse, however, for these pretensions with the king, they became vehement against the people, calling them "the rude, rascal commons," "rascal rioters," "rascal rabble," "that underfoot of people," and the like;[1] apparently forgetting that they had souls to be saved; much more, that they were formed "after the image of their Maker," as well as their betters. When Charles I. got embroiled with his parliament, and was looking about him for the means of governing without parliaments, the English clergy thought that the time for asserting their independence had arrived. In so thinking, however, they were mistaken.

The monopoly by the clergy of the confidence of the king and of the high offices of the state, to which we have adverted, naturally excited the jealousy and disgust of the higher aristocracy, who were accustomed to consider that confidence and those offices as their birthright. But, as if they were not a sufficiently formidable adversary, Laud contrived to add to theirs the enmity of another powerful order of men—the lawyers. He complains bitterly, in some of his letters to his confidant and coadjutor, Wentworth, of the obstacles opposed to the aggrandizement of the church by the "forms of the common law." "The church of England," he writes on one occasion, "is so bound up in the forms of the common law, that it is not possible for me or for any man to do that good which he would, or is bound to do. For your lordship sees, no man clearer, that they which have gotten so much power in and over the church, will not let go their hold; they have, indeed, fangs with a witness, whatsoever I was once said in passion to have."[2] We will quote an extract on this subject from his History of his Troubles and Trial, as a curious contrast to the preceding, and as showing the great value of the Strafford Papers in unmasking the statesmen of those times:—"Ever since I had the honor to sit at the council-table, I kept myself as much to the law as I could, and followed the judgment of those great lawyers which then sat at the board. And upon all references which came from his majesty, if I were one, I left those freely to the law, who were not willing to have their business ended any other way. And this the lord keeper, the lord privy seal, and the counsel learned, which attended their clients' causes, can plentifully witness."[3] Now, there is one case which, from its importance and the misrepresentation it has received from historians, we shall give here, in which one of the "counsel learned" does not witness much in favor of the archbishop, but, on the contrary, bears as strong witness to the meddling, irritating, intolerable character of his tyranny, as some of his most atrocious acts of persecution and cruelty.

Bagshaw, a barrister of the Middle Temple, of some standing and considerable reputation in his profession, having been chosen reader for the Lent vacation, began his readings February 24th, 1639, selecting for his subject the statute pro Clero, 25 Edw. III. c. 7. Before we enter further into this subject it may be well to give, in Bagshaw's own words, his account of his real sentiments with regard to episcopacy; and that the more on this account, that those sentiments may be considered as exhibiting some view of the opinions entertained on the same subject by several of the most influential and remarkable men of that time, such as Lord Falkland, Clarendon, Culpeper: M. Guizot even thinks that some of the popular leaders, for example, Hampden and Hollis, would have preferred, to a Presbyterian organization of the church, a moderate episcopacy, with functions purely ecclesiastical, and more liberty of conscience than Laud and his friends approved of.

"I was then," says Bagshaw, in the Vindication of himself, which he afterward published, "and am still of opinion, that the crown of England, being a monarchy bound up by such apt laws, for the benefit and peace of prince and people, is so apted for the order and jurisdiction of bishops, that I hold it the fittest for this nation of any in the Christian world. And I think I am able, within my sphere and profession, to maintain it against any adversary: et cedo mihi quemvis arbitrum. And here I have just occasion to profess to all the world, as in truth I do, that I was so far from the very thoughts of destroying bishops, that, observing at the time of my reading, and divers years before, the great invasions that were made by them upon the common law of England, and the courts of Westminster Hall, and the scorn and contempt at that time cast abroad upon professors and the very profession of the law,[1] I knew no other way how to hold them (the bishops) up in their functions and just jurisdictions, and in esteem and honor among the people (which once they had), as by reading upon that law which gave them their just bounds and limits, which, if once they should break down, I ever feared their ruin and destruction."[2] That Bagshaw was sincere in these sentiments his subsequent conduct fully proved. For, observing that the members of the Long Parliament were going beyond the bounds of what he considered temperate reformation, he joined the king at Oxford,[1] and sat in the parliament called there. Having been taken prisoner and sent to London, he was committed by the House of Commons to the King's Bench, and he afterward suffered in his estate in Northamptonshire. The opinion of such men as Bagshaw, Falkland, and many others equally moderate, speaks volumes with respect to episcopacy as modeled by Laud.

[1] The following passage, in a letter from Whitgift to Burleigh, conveys a good idea of the light in which the lawyers were viewed by the proud churchmen of former days:—"The temporal lawyer, whose learning is no learning anywhere but here at home, being born to nothing, doth by his labor and travail in that barbarous knowledge purchase to himself and his heirs forever a thousand pounds per annum, and oftentimes much more, whereof there are at this day many examples." (Strype's Whitgift, p. 215.) It was natural for men to talk thus whose learning and whose law, though they were but corruptions, were yet corruptions of a noble and classic original—that learning, moreover, and that law, being almost universal; at least if an extent nearly equal to that of the Roman empire might be so called.

[2] A Just Vindication of the Questioned Part of the reading of Edward Bagshaw, Esq., had in the Middle Temple Hall, February 24th, 1639, upon the Statute of 25 Edw. III., called Statutum pro Clero. With a True Narrative of the Cause of Silencing the Reader by the then Archbishop of Canterbury, &c. London, 1660.

Bagshaw having shown that a relation published of these proceedings during his lifetime, and from which Heylyn appears to have taken his account, contains several mistakes, we shall follow his own statement in the Vindication above quoted. After having expounded the whole statute, he made ten divisions of it, according, he says, to the then manner of readers. Upon every division he put ten cases. His first case upon his first division consisted of fourteen points, the first of which was this: "Whether an act of parliament may pass and be good by the assent of the king, his temporal lords and commons (all the spiritual being absent, or, if present, wholly dissenting)?" And he held that it might. Another point of his first case upon the first division was this: "Whether a beneficed clerk may by that statute exercise civil jurisdiction, and be a justice of peace?" "In the argument of which point," he says, "I did not at all speak against their being justices of peace, so that they might be so by law, by virtue of the king's commission. Only by way of caution, in that they might refuse, in respect of their orders; and I only declared how the law of the land and the law of the church stood heretofore in that point." The fourth point of his third case upon the third division was this: "Whether a clerk that is an heretic may, at this day, be convicted and condemned for heresy by his own ordinary alone?" "And," he says, "I thought he could not."

Bagshaw read three lectures on three several days, the 25th, 27th, and 29th of March, without any interruption. But, on the 30th, the Lord Keeper Finch sent to speak with him, and in a friendly manner told him what reports were abroad touching the above-mentioned points. Bagshaw replied that he would give him the arguments of those points, and attest them under his hand. Finch, having read these arguments, said: "Mr. Reader, I see you have been misreported, and have had wrong; and seeing you have dealt so freely and fairly with me, I will do you right to the king and council." Finch accordingly showed the council the notes, which were examined by them and approved. Whereupon Bagshaw prepared to read on Monday following upon the fifth case of his fourth division.

This case was likewise carried to the archbishop, in which there was this point: "That a beneficed clerk imprisoned, deprived, and excommunicated, by the high commission, for enormous offenses (not naming the particular offense), that this clerk, notwithstanding, was such a possessor of a church, as might plead, counter-plead, and defend his right within my law." Upon this, Laud made it his most earnest suit to the king that Bagshaw might be suspended from reading. He was accordingly told by the lord keeper, the same day, to desist; Finch advising him, at the same time, as from himself, to go to the archbishop and give him satisfaction.

Heylyn and other historians having made some gross misstatements in their relation of Bagshaw's interview with Laud, we shall give an account of that interview in the formers own words, which are well calculated to call up a scene that carries us back full two centuries: "On Tuesday, the 4th of March (the natural course of my reading not ending till Friday following), I sent two of my men to the archbishop to know his pleasure when I should wait on him: he sent me word by Mr. Dell, his secretary, on Thursday, the 6th of March; that he did appoint eight o'clock in the morning; according to which hour I took Mr. Rog. Pepys (late chief justice in Ireland), the next summer reader, and other my cubbard-men,[1] with my servants, and went with them in a barge to Lambeth. And so far was the archbishop from making me dance attendance, that, as soon as the archbishop had notice I was come, he presently came out of his chamber, with his hat off, and met me in the great chamber there, and walked with me in that posture from thence almost to Lambeth stairs. The first question he asked me was this: Quest. Mr. Reader, had you nothing else to do but read against the clergy? I answered, My lord, my statute was pro Clero, and I read not at all against them, but for them. Well, saith the archbishop, you shall answer it in the High Commission Court. My answer was this: That I knew the utmost power and jurisdiction of that court by law, and that I had neither spake or done any thing that that court had jurisdiction to punish. But had you no other time, saith he, to do it but in such a time? Ans. My reading was made long before the troubles in Scotland, and was not made for them, but for England; and I was confident there was nothing in it that could have offended him, if his lordship had been rightly informed. After this speech he was very silent, and walked with me without speaking a word until he came near Lambeth stairs, and then I spake thus to him: My lord, if you have any thing else to say to me, I am ready to give you satisfaction, for I was sent to you by some of my honorable friends for that purpose. His answer to me was this: Farewell, Mr. Reader; and much good do it you with your honorable friends. And so we parted, and never spake together afterward; he taking water in his barge to Whitehall, and I in mine to the Middle Temple."

We do not know that any of Bagshaw's positions would be disputed at the present day; but, at any rate, if Laud imagined that the reader meant to call in question the bishops' right to their seats in parliament, he altogether misunderstood him; the object of Bagshaw's argument being to show that "the bishops sit in parliament, not as they are spiritual men, but by reason of their temporal baronies annexed to their dignities; and, therefore, that if the voices of the greater number of temporal lords exceed theirs, the act shall pass as the act of the whole Lords' House, and their voices shall be involved in the greater number of the temporal lords; and so shall be the act of all the lords, as well temporal as spiritual."[1] If Laud, from the evidence that was before him, was unable to comprehend Bagshaw's meaning, it evinced an obtuseness of understanding that proved him unfit for his station; and if, comprehending him, he acted as he did, his conduct proved him equally unfit on other grounds.[2]

There was one lawyer, however, whose viginti annorum lucubrationes found favor in the sight of Laud and his royal master. This was William Noy, who had the honor of exhuming from the accumulated dust of centuries the tax of ship-money, which was designed as an inexhaustible supply of what the king then most wanted—money. In 1634, Noy, then attorney-general—his, it is said, sudden and unexpected appointment to which office, a few years before, had at once converted him from a strenuous opponent of the measures of the court into a headlong zealot of the prerogative—first hit upon this brilliant idea, so worthy of the precedent-haunted brain of a lawyer, from which it sprung. A writ was drawn in form of law, and directed to the sheriff of every county in England, "to provide a ship of war for the king's service, and to send it, amply stored and fitted up, by such a day, to such a place." And with the writ were sent instructions to each sheriff, "that, instead of a ship, he should levy upon his county such a sum of money, and return the same to the treasurer of the navy, for his majesty's use;" with direction in what manner he should proceed against such as refused.[3] Noy, looking abroad upon the world with the microscopic, purblind vision of a mere lawyer, imagined that, to do any thing he listed, he had only to show a form of law for it, although the public opinion of his age, if not the legislature, had repealed that law, and had rendered a writ proceeding upon it worth little more than the parchment on which it was written. If, instead of such a definition of a law as he could have found in Bracton and Fleta, he had known that a law is "the command of him or them that HAVE THE SOVEREIGN POWER, given to those that be his or their subjects,"[4] he would have known, too, that that law which was a substantial reality in the hands of a Henry Plantagenet was a shadow, less than nothing, in those of a Charles Stuart. But, in truth, even the precedents hunted up by Noy did not go the length of supporting the claim now put forward on the part of the crown. The tax of ship-money, as attempted to be levied and used by Charles, was an open and flagrant usurpation—an impost unknown to the constitution in any previous age.

However, this device for raising money succeeded for three or four years, although with so little effect in regard to its avowed object—to wit, providing ships of war for the king's service; therein, of course, including the protection of his subjects in their commerce by sea, much more in their persons and property on shore—that the English flag was insulted by every maritime power of Europe—and that the Barbary corsairs not only scoured the English and St. George's Channel, but even disembarked, pillaged the villages, and carried the inhabitants into slavery, to the number of several thousands.[1] That these outrages occurred after the raising of ship-money is acknowledged by Laud himself, in one of his letters to Wentworth, during the year 1636. "The mischief," he says, "which the most Christian Turks did about Plymouth is most true; and I pray God it do no mischief about our shipping business this ensuing year."[2]

Besides the tax of ship-money, various obsolete laws, with a view to raise money, were revived and rigorously executed; for example, the ancient law of knighthood and the old forest laws. This last burden fell mostly on the higher aristocracy, who, considering themselves exempt from ordinary oppressions, felt proportionately aggrieved thereby.[3] At the same time, the vast distance between the commonalty and the high aristocracy was marked by preposterous fines imposed by the Star Chamber for any thing that could be construed into a mark of disrespect, however slight, for the latter.

Wentworth declared the opinion procured from the judges by promises and threats on the subject of ship-money—namely, "that in case of necessity the king might impose this tax, and that he was the sole judge of the necessity"—to be the greatest service that profession had done the crown in his time.[4] "But," adds he, "unless his majesty hath the like power declared to raise a land army upon the same exigent of state, the crown seems to me to stand but upon one leg at home—to be considerable but by halves to foreign princes abroad; yet since this, methinks, convinces a power for the sovereign to raise payments for land forces, and consequently submits to his wisdom and ordinance the transporting of the money or men into foreign states, so to carry, by way of prevention, the fire from ourselves into the dwellings of our enemies (an art which Edward III. and Henry V. full well understood); and if, by degrees, Scotland and Ireland be drawn to contribute their proportions to [1] Vindication, p. 19.

[2] The following passage from a letter of the Rev. G. Garrard to Wentworth throws further light on the designs of Laud with respect to depressing the common law, and rendering the ecclesiastical jurisdiction supreme in England. "Also, I hear," says Wentworth's correspondent, "that the Archbishop of Canterbury, for the good of scholars professing the civil law, hath obtained of his majesty that the Masters of Requests for the future shall be all doctors of the civil law, as also that eight Masters of the Chancery shall be always of that profession." (Strafford's Lett. and Disp., vol. i. p. 176.) And yet all this time the lawyers were going to enormous expense to entertain the court in the ostentatious and childish fashion of the time. Thus we have the following passage in the letter just quoted:—"There are two masques at hand: the first of the Inns of Court, which is to be presented on Candlemas-day; the other, the king presents the queen with on Shrove Tuesday at night. High expenses; they speak of £20,000 that it will cost the men of the law." (Ibid. p. 177.)

these levies for the public, omne tulit punctum." What follows affords a direct refutation of the assertion that Charles and his ministers merely aimed at retaining the ancient prerogative of the crown, and goes far to show that Strafford contemplated doing for the crown of England what Richelieu was at that very time doing for that of France. "Seeing, then, that this piece, well fortified, forever vindicates the royalty at home from under the conditions and restraints of subjects, renders us also abroad, even to the greatest kings, the most considerable monarchy in Christendom, ... I beseech you, what piety to alliances is there that should divert a great and wise king forth of a path which leads so manifestly, so directly to the establishing his own throne, and the secure and independent seating of himself and posterity in wealth, strength, and glory, FAR ABOVE ANY THEIR PROGENITORS?"[1]

But of the designs of Wentworth and his masters we have still further proof in the manner in which he speaks of the common law and of parliaments. Some passages of his dispatches relating to these subjects are so curious and characteristic that we shall here extract them. In a letter to Laud, of December, 1633, he says:—"I know no reason, then, but you may as well rule the common lawyers in England, as I, poor beagle, do here; and yet that I do, and will do, in all that concerns my master's service, upon the peril of my head. I am confident that the king, being pleased to set himself in the business, is able, by his wisdom and ministers, to carry any just and honorable action through all imaginary opposition, for real there can be none; that to start aside for such panic fears, phantastic apparitions as a Prynne or an Eliot shall set up, were the meanest folly in the whole world; that, the debts of the crown taken off, you may govern as you please; and most resolute I am that work may be done, without borrowing any help forth of the king's lodgings; and that is as downright a Peccatum ex te, Israel, as ever was, if all this be not effected with speed and ease."[2]

The two following extracts respecting the Irish parliament, from a dispatch of the 18th of August, 1634, to Mr. Secretary Coke, are very significant both in regard to the arts of despotism and the means of guarding against them. "The rest of this session we have entertained, and spun them out in discourses, but kept them nevertheless from concluding any thing."[3] Again—"There fell a breach betwixt the two Houses, which kept them asunder all this session: the Commons would not confer with the Lords unless they might sit and be covered as well as their lordships, which the other would by no means admit: for my part, I did not lay it very near my heart to agree them, as having heretofore seen the effects which follow when they are in strict understanding, or at difference among themselves. Besides, I saw plainly that, keeping them at a distance, I did avoid their joining in a petition for the graces, which infallibly they would have done; which now comes only singly from the Commons. I conceive it will be very easy, the next sessions either to agree or keep them still asunder; I desire there may be a thought bestowed upon it at some leisure, and let me have my directions, which I shall readily conform myself unto either way."[1]

From all this, and much more to the same effect, it appears how confident were Charles and his ministers that they could with ease establish a despotism in England, and with what sovereign contempt they viewed any obstacles that their adversaries—such adversaries "as a Prynne and an Eliot"—could oppose to their progress toward their object. We have now to take a view of the other side of the picture, on which are portrayed, in characters that are indelible, the firm, stern features of a Prynne and an Eliot, a Pym and a Hampden.

The first occasion on which a resistance to the king's encroachments was made, sufficient to rouse the nation from its lethargy, was the stand made by John Hampden against the payment of the tax of ship-money.[2] This tax might have been levied with impunity by some of the earlier and more powerful of the Plantagenets. But even they were liable to be interrupted in such an exercise of their prerogative by some powerful and daring baron starting up and bluntly refusing to comply, as Roger Bigod did to Edward I. The times had greatly changed since then. The king's prerogative had been curtailed by solemn and repeated statutes, to the enacting of which the kings themselves had been principal parties. But, as we have had occasion to remark more than once before, the kings were not very scrupulous about the observance of statutes which were against themselves, provided they could break them with impunity. Many English kings had done this before Charles Stuart; but few or none had done it with so bad a calculation of the chances of success which their position afforded them. Charles or his ministers seemed to imagine that if they could obtain the sanction of timid or servile judges—at least judges who were not sufficiently their own masters to give an impartial, an unbiassed opinion—they might do any thing. They knew that the English people had an habitual respect for the laws, and for the judges who were the administrators of the laws; and, as is evident from the language of Strafford just quoted, they thought that, under the color of law, they might perpetrate acts however oppressive, however tyrannical, however illegal. But they were egregiously out in their reckoning; for the very cause which they fancied led the most surely to the end they had in view was that which led in the very opposite direction. The time, as we have said, was passed when a mail-clad baron could brave the king to his face; but the time was arrived when any Englishman who was rich enough to bear the costs of a trial in an English court, and resolute enough to brave the consequences, might oppose a more effectual opposition to tyranny than the armed defiance of a Bigod or a

De Bohun. John Hampden was such an Englishman. He refused to pay the sum at which his land was assessed under this tax, and he resolved to stand a prosecution for it. He employed the most eminent counsel. The case was argued during twelve days in the Exchequer Chamber, before the twelve judges. As may be anticipated, judgment was given for the crown. Five of the judges—Brampston, Hutton, Davenport, Croke, and Denham—dissented from their brethren.[1]

It is somewhat singular that Mr. Justice Hutton was a correspondent of Wentworth, and gives him the following summary of his argument, which we extract because it contains the law of the case in a very short compass. He says, "The substance of my argument was, that this power of raising ship-money, and such charge or taxes, was taken away by the statute of 25 Edw. I. and the statute of Tallagio non concedendo,[2] and the statute of 14 Edw. III. cap. 1, and 1 Rich. III. c. 42, and by the statute 3 Car. I.—the Petition of Right. And, secondly, that prerogatives of like nature, inherent to the crown, had, by statutes proceeding from the king's bounty, been granted to his subjects from all times, as I showed by many statutes of old and latter time, as you may see, among others, by the statutes made 21 Jac. c. 2, and by another statute the same year, c. 14. I insisted that there was not matter in the writ to manifest that there was a danger of the whole realm, but of pirates and hinderance of coming in of merchants and trading."[3] Although Strafford, as we have seen in a letter to Laud, expresses his wish that Hampden, and others like him, were "well whipt into their right senses,"[4] he does not pretend to despise (as he does most men's) Hampden's abilities. He says—"As well as I think of Mr. Hampden's abilities, I take his will and peevishness to be full as great."[5]

The effect of the sentence in favor of ship-money, which was given in the Exchequer Chamber, 12th June, 1638, upon the minds not merely of the more violent opponents of the court, but of the nation at large, may be learned from the following passage of Clarendon, who can hardly be considered a partial witness on the popular side. Men submitted to the imposition before, "pleasing themselves," he says, "with doing somewhat for the king's service, as a testimony of their affection, which they were not bound to do; many really believing the necessity, and therefore thinking the burden reasonable; others observing that the advantage to the king was of importance, when the damage to them was not considerable; and all assuring themselves that, when they should be weary or unwilling to continue the payment, they might resort to the law for relief, and find it. But when they heard this demanded in a court of law as a right, and found it, by sworn judges of the law, adjudged so, upon such grounds and reasons as every stander-by was able to swear was not law—by a logic that left no man any thing which he might call his own—they no longer looked upon it as the case of one man, but as the case of the kingdom, which they thought themselves bound in public justice not to submit to."[1]

Notwithstanding this judgment in favor of ship-money, so far was the money from being applied effectually to its professed end, that the Algerines took many English vessels, one of them valued at £260,000, and carried off between four and five thousand British subjects into captivity; the Dutch resumed their fishing without a license, and captured with impunity two East Indiamen, valued at more than £300,000. France, Spain, and Holland violated the neutrality, and insulted the English flag; and even the high admiral complained that such was the mismanagement of the fleet that he could neither do service to the state, gain honor to himself, nor do courtesies to his friends.[2] And, with all this, the exchequer was so completely exhausted that the servants of government could not obtain their wages; and Laud, Hamilton, and Wentworth, the ministers for England, Scotland, and Ireland, respectively, at length advised the king to summon a parliament. Their advice was approved of by the whole council, and the writs were issued accordingly. On the 13th of April, 1640, the parliament was opened by Charles in person, but was dissolved, in the circumstances that have been already related,[3] after it had sat about twenty days. Charles now conceived the idea of convoking, at York, the great council of peers of the realm—the old feudal magnum concilium—an assembly whose power was as much a phantom of the past of his own prerogative in the matter of levying ship-money—probably with some vague notion that it might be possible for this council to vote the supplies without the aid of the Commons. But having received two petitions, one from the city of London, the other from twelve peers, praying him to call a parliament, he announced to the council of peers, when they assembled, that he was about to call a parliament, and that he only asked their counsels to treat with the Scots, who were in open rebellion. The elections proceeded accordingly, and the court candidates were everywhere defeated in them.

[1] State Trials, vol. iii.—Whitelock says, "All of them (except Hutton and Croke) argued and gave their judgments for the king."—p. 25, Lond. fol. 1732. Mr. Hallam thus explains the apparent incongruity:—"Brampston, chief justice of the King's Bench, and Davenport, chief baron of the Exchequer, pronounced for Hampden, but on technical reasons, and adhering to the majority on the principal question. Denham, another judge of the same court, being extremely ill, gave a short written judgment in favor of Hampden. But justices Croke and Hutton, men of considerable reputation and experience, displayed a praiseworthy intrepidity in denying, without the smallest qualification, the alledged prerogative of the crown, and the lawfulness of the writ for ship-money."—Constit. History, i. 476, 4to.

[2] We ought to observe that Blackstone, in reference to this opinion of the judges in the cause of ship-money respecting the Statutum de Tallagio non concedendo—namely, that it was a separate act of parliament, principally because it was recited as such, about nine years before, in the preamble to the Petition of Right—gives it as his opinion (Tracts, p. 344, Oxf., 4to. 1771) that, "upon the whole, there is great reason to question the authority of this dubious act of parliament otherwise than as a cotemporary Latin abstract of the two French charters (of Edw. I.), intended (however imperfectly executed) to express the self-same meaning in another language." However, that does not affect Judge Hutton's argument. He quotes statutes enough without it.

The Long Parliament met on the 3d of November, 1640. And here we may stop to take a view of the state of the popular party.

M. Guizot, in one of his Lectures on European Civilization, which he devotes to the subject of the English Revolution, says that three great parties successively appeared on the stage. The first of these he calls the party of Legal Reform; the second, the party of Political Revolution; the third, the party of Social Revolution. It is necessary always to bear in mind that each of these parties had a double aspect—a political and a religious. To borrow the words of M. Guizot—"Three principal parties manifest themselves in this mighty crisis; three revolutions are in some sort contained in it, and appear in succession on the scene. In each part, in each revolution, two parties are united and march together—a political and a religious party; the first in the van, the second in the rear, but necessary to one another; so that the double character of the event is imprinted on all its phases." It has been sometimes doubted whether the character of this revolution was more religious or political. But we agree with M. Guizot in thinking that it was essentially political. It was accomplished, indeed, in the midst of a religious people and age; religious ideas and passions served as instruments to it; but its first intention and its definitive end were political. That intention, that end, was liberty—the abolition of all absolute power.

Of the first party M. Guizot names as the principal chiefs, Clarendon, Culpeper, Lord Capel, Lord Falkland. This party disapproved of and wished to prevent illegal raising of money, arbitrary imprisonment, and the like; but they believed that the ancient laws and customs of the country contained the means of remedying all abuses. At the same time they were at bottom devout worshipers of the divinity of kingship; and though they would perhaps rather have avoided the subject, from a secret instinct that there was something false and dangerous in the position, yet, when pressed, they maintained that there was in royalty a power superior alike to human origin and human control.

Behind this advanced a second party, which M. Guizot calls the political revolution party. This party maintained that the ancient legal barriers for protecting the nation against the king had been proved to be insufficient; that, therefore, a great change must be made, though not in the form of government, in the substance; that it was necessary to withdraw from the king and his council the independence of their power, and place the political preponderance in the House of Commons; that the sovereignty, properly so called, ought to belong to that assembly and its leaders. To this party were closely united the Presbyterians, who desired to effect a revolution in the church analogous to that which their allies meditated in the state, only more complete in this respect, that their church was to be republican in form as well as substance, while the government of those with whom they were allied was to be monarchical in form though republican in substance. The leaders of the political party, however, were not all in favor of the Presbyterian organization of the church. Several of them, as Hampden and Hollis, would seem, as has been already observed, to have preferred a moderate episcopacy, with functions purely ecclesiastical, and more liberty of conscience.

From this party M. Guizot endeavors to distinguish a third party, which demanded much more, maintaining that it was necessary to change, not only the substance, but the form of the government. Like the others, this party was composed of a political and a religious section. In the political M. Guizot classes the republicans, properly so called, such as Ludlow, Harrington, Milton, &c.; and along with them those whom he terms republicans by circumstance, by interest—the principal chiefs of the army—Cromwell, Ireton, Lambert, who, he thinks, were more or less sincere at first, but were soon turned aside by personal views and the necessities of their position. The religious section of this third party, or division, consisted of the wild, religious enthusiasts who abounded in that age, particularly the sect denominated Fifth-Monarchy men, one of the greatest lights of which was Sir Henry Vane, the wildness of whose religious speculations strangely contrasted with his coolness, clear-headedness, and penetration in the ordinary routine of parliamentary and political business. To these M. Guizot adds a considerable body of what he calls "libertins subalternes et rêveurs fantastiques;" who, according to M. Guizot, promised themselves, the first, universal license; and the others, community of goods and universal suffrage. We think the accuracy of this last part of M. Guizot's classification is very questionable. In the English revolution there was very little, if any, of that spirit of universal license, of that hope to profit by a general scramble, which constituted so prominent a feature in the French revolution; the English revolution being, in fact, an armed insurrection by those who had some property and some rights, both civil and religious, to defend, in defense of those rights; not a jacquerie, or rising of beings as blind, reckless, and ferocious as unfed wild beasts. This character was stamped on it throughout, from the first stage to the last. "The judges had gone their circuits, passing with flags of truce through the districts held by opposite armies, and holding their courts with sheriffs, who, at other times, headed the levies of their respective counties in the field. And it is remarkable and memorable to all posterity, and glorious to the character of our country, that, throughout this great struggle, from first to last, there is no instance on record of private assassination or popular massacre; nor of plunder, except under the orders of war. Non internecinum inter cives fuisse bellum: de dignitate atque imperio certasse. . . . . . The instances of sanguinary cruelty which find their place among the stories of these wars were of acts done in military execution: no secret murder; no bands of freebooters assembling for spoil between the quarters of the armies, or among the villages deserted by their fighting men; no savage outbreak of a licentious rabble, disfigured the grave severity of this mighty conflict. An honorable memorial of the comportment of the English people in those unhappy times."[1] There is, moreover, an objection to M. Guizot's theory, inasmuch as it would be more correct to consider the two latter branches of his tripartite division as the same party in different stages of its progress, than as two perfectly distinct parties. For there is no evidence that Cromwell went further than Hampden and Pym did at the time they were removed from the struggle by death. And, on the other hand, there is evidence—the testimony of Clarendon himself[2]—that those whom M. Guizot would make out to be a sort of English Long Parliament juste milieu men, were prepared, almost from the first, to carry out their opinions to their utmost consequences. However the same party, in different stages of its progress, may alter its professed views so much under the force of circumstances, as to bear the appearance of forming, not one party, but two parties. And, undoubtedly, there is no evidence, in any published speech or writing of Pym or Hampden, that they had ever entertained an idea of an English republic.

At the opening of the Long Parliament the most prominent person, at once from his eloquence and his knowledge of the rules and orders of the House (the latter quality being the more rare, from the long intermission of parliaments), was John Pym. Pym was vehement and unremitting in his exposure of the grievances which had been inflicted on the nation since the dissolution of the last parliament. The first great constitutional question brought forward by Pym was the impeachment of the Earl of Strafford.

The articles of impeachment against Strafford were twenty-eight in number; and they may be, when brought together, all summed up in this charge—an endeavor to subvert the fundamental laws of the kingdom. In the enumeration of treasons contained in the Statute of Treasons, the 25 Edw. III. st. 5, c. 2 (which then constituted the English law of treason, those of Henry VIII. having, as we have seen, been repealed by 1 Mary, cap. 1),[3] there is no mention of such a treason as this; nor is it to be expected that there should be any. The laws against treason in England were made to protect the king, not the subject. And it were, therefore, idle to suppose that any law could be found to include under its provisions that of which Strafford was undoubtedly guilty—an attempt to increase the power of the king, and to depress that of the subject. Pym said on the trial, with more eloquence than either law or logic—"The forfeitures inflicted for treason by our law, are of life, honor, and estate—even all that can be forfeited; and this prisoner, having committed so many treasons, although he should pay all those forfeitures, will be still a debtor to the commonwealth: nothing can be more equal than that he should perish by the justice of that law which he would have subverted. Neither will this be a new way of blood. There are marks enough to trace this law to the very original of this kingdom: and if it hath not been put in execution, as he alledgeth, these two hundred and forty years, it was not for want of law, but that all that time hath not been bred a man bold enough to commit such crimes as these; which is a circumstance much aggravating his offense, and making him no whit less liable to punishment, because he is the only man that in so long a time hath ventured upon such a treason as this."[1]

Strafford had said, in his defense, "It is now full two hundred and forty years since treason was defined" (alluding, no doubt, to the statute of Edw. III., though, if he had said two hundred and ninety, he would have been nearer the truth), and he averred, truly, that in that definition of treason nothing which he had done was contained. If the sovereignty of England were in the people at large, or even in the House of Commons, and if for the word "king," in the Statute of Treasons, we read "sovereign," and give to it that meaning, Strafford might have been justly charged with treason. But at that time none pretended to give such an interpretation to the statute; and that being the case, it was a manifest absurdity to attempt to fix the charge of treason upon Strafford, as is done in the above-quoted speech of Pym. We do not say that the Commons of England were wrong in attempting, by the most strenuous efforts, to destroy Strafford. On the contrary, we think that the first of all laws, and which is above all other human laws—the law of self-preservation—imperatively directed them at least effectually to disable him from doing further mischief. But, to do this—still more, to put him to death—by legal form, was, for the reason stated above, impossible. And their attempting to destroy him under the form of law was quite as palpable a fraud upon the laws of England as Charles's attempt to levy ship-money under the color of law. If Charles had done that by the Star Chamber, and not by the sworn judges of the land, whatever other name the proceeding might have merited, it would have been at least a bold, and, pro tanto, honest proceeding. Similarly, if the Commons had said, "Here is a man who has used every effort in his power to make our king absolute, and to make us all slaves, us and our children's children, to all generations. There is no law in England to punish a man for such deeds. But we are resolved not to let this man escape with impunity for his design against us and our children. Therefore, we will make a law for the occasion. Ex post facto laws are, generally speaking, bad, and to be avoided. But there must be exceptions to this general rule, otherwise we could never, we will not say punish, that being a term correlative to law, and here there is no law, but protect ourselves and our children against such a delinquent as this." If the Commons, we say, had said this, their enemies, whatever other vices they might have charged them with, could not have laid to their charge chicanery and subterfuge. This view of the subject the Commons at length adopted, changing the impeachment of Strafford into a bill of attainder—in other words, an ex post facto law for his destruction. Some time after they proceeded in a similar manner against Archbishop Laud; for when his judges gave it to be understood, notwithstanding the degree of intimidation under which they acted, that the charges against the archbishop contained no legal treason,[1] the Commons changed the impeachment into an ordinance for his execution, to which the Lords, in a very thin House, added their assent.[2] There can be little doubt, and indeed it is proved by the correspondence between him and Strafford, that Laud's designs against the "fundamental liberties" of England went as far—were, to use his own favorite word in his correspondence with Strafford, as "thorough" as Strafford's; but the only argument which can be used to justify such acts at all—the argument of their being necessary to self-preservation—was not so strong in Laud's case as in Strafford's. Laud was an infirm old man, who was not very likely to be any longer formidable to them, and might have been left with, it would seem, perfect safety to live out quietly the remains of his peevish, "cankered" existence. But though his capacity and years did not render him so formidable, his bigotry, cruelty, and insolence, in the high place he had occupied, had rendered him not less—if possible, perhaps, even more—odious to his opponents than Strafford: and that was not a time in which a spirit of very remarkable forbearance and moderation could be expected to predominate in the councils of the parliament of England. For every successive month, instead of repairing, was widening the breach between the king and the parliament; one main cause, perhaps, of which was, that every new negotiation they entered into with Charles only afforded them fresh evidence of the king's insincerity, and of his secret designs to resort to violence against them, and to be satisfied with nothing short of their utter destruction.

And here it is necessary again to look at the state of parties, to which we have already shortly alluded. The party which has been designated by Guizot the party of legal reform began to get alarmed at the vehement and decided tone assumed in the House by Pym and those who acted with him, or, rather, those who directed him (of which circumstance we shall say a few words presently). The proceedings which led to the execution of Strafford may be considered as having fully effected a separation between that section of the reformers and those who were more determined and thorough-going. It is mentioned by Clarendon,[1] that, although at the first opening of the Long Parliament, Pym seemed of all men to have the greatest influence upon the House of Commons, and was at that time, and for some months after, "the most popular man, and the most able to do hurt, that hath lived in any time," yet "he was much governed in private designing by Mr. Hampden and Mr. St. John." These are Clarendon's words, and there seems little doubt but they exhibit the true state of the case. It is seldom that men who are powerful as popular speakers are also gifted with the deeper and more solid qualities of statesmen. Cromwell was, notoriously, at the least a very indifferent speaker. Hampden was an apt and "weighty speaker," but not a full and fluent one. The man who thinks deeply and clearly is naturally averse to that flood, to that waste of words, to that long stringing together of sentences, to those periphrastic involutions of what meaning they have, which form the weapons of the professed speaker, of the rhetorical declaimer. On the contrary, he who, like Hampden, lays his "designs the deepest," will be like him, as he is described by one who had no intention to paint a favorable portrait of him :[2] he will be not a man of many words, and will rarely begin the discourse, or make the first entrance upon any business that is taken up; but he will be a "very weighty speaker;" and after he has heard a first debate, and observed how the House is like to be inclined, will take up the argument, and shortly, and clearly, and skillfully so state it, that he will commonly conduct it to the conclusion he desires; and if he find he can not do that, he will strive to divert the debate to another time, and to prevent the determining any thing in the negative which might prove inconvenient in the future. When to the above qualities, which Clarendon ascribes to Hampden, are added that rare affability and temper in debate, and that seeming humility and submission of judgment, as if he brought no opinion with him, but a desire of information and instruction, and yet so subtil a way of interrogating, and, under the notion of doubt, insinuating his objections, that he left his opinions with those from whom he pretended to learn and receive them—and an industry and vigilance not to be tired out by the most laborious, and parts not to be imposed on by the most subtil or sharp, and a personal courage equal to his best parts, and, withal, the most absolute spirit of popularity—that is, the most absolute faculties to govern the people—we have a man with qualifications for a ruler which have rarely indeed met in the same individual. Had this man lived, the ultimate course of events might probably have been different. At all events, he seems to have been the only man fitted to dispute the first place with Cromwell—to have come in competition with that daring soldier and profound and sagacious statesman for the staff of empire. His eulogists and his detractors, his friends and his enemies, have, as usual, gone to the opposite extremes, in assigning to him inten- tions. But when engaged in such a struggle as that in which Hampden and his party were engaged, it is difficult, perhaps it is impossible, for any man, however pure and single his intentions, and however firm and inflexible his will, to shape his own course. He is drifted along by the irresistible tide of the circumstances around him; and though, by the vigilant and unremitting exertion of courage and of mind, he may save himself and many others from being overwhelmed by it, he must nevertheless yield to its force as the stern law of fate and necessity.

[1] Laud says that Pym, before his death, had thrown up the management of his impeachment because he considered it an impracticable business.

[2] It appears (Lords' Journals, 4th January, 1644) that there were twenty peers present at the time of prayers; but that does not prove that they all voted in passing the ordinance. Some of the twenty may have left the House, and others entered it, as appears to have been the fact, by comparing the names given by Heylyn with those in Laud's Journal. Heylyn says—"They wrought so far on some weak spirits, the rest withdrawing themselves (as formerly, in the case of the Earl of Strafford), that, in a thin and slender House, not above six or seven in number, it was passed at last." (Life of Laud, p. 527.) Heylyn's veracity is far from unimpeachable, but there appears no particular reason to call it in question here.

Hampden and Pym both died early in the struggle—the former in June, 1643, the latter in December of the same year.

We now come to those who were both witnesses and actors in the later stages of the struggle, and who may be said to have passed the Rubicon of modern political daring. For there is no evidence in any speech or writing, authenticated as theirs, of either Pym or Hampden having ever thought a thought, or seen a vision, or even so much as dreamed a dream, of an English republic. On the contrary, both seem to have cherished to the last hopes of a reconciliation between the king and the parliament.[1] How they would have acted, had they lived, has been matter of much and fruitless speculation. But of this we are certain, that of their friends who survived them, while some had devout imaginations, and saw beatific visions of kingless commonwealths, others not only thought the thought of, but enacted to the life the sublime drama of supreme, though unhereditary empire. To the former class belonged Vane and Hazelrig; to the latter, Cromwell.

There are three men who stand out preëminent from among the rest of mankind for the vast political power to which they raised themselves by their abilities—men who, in the words which a modern poet has applied to one of them, might be said, almost without the aid of metaphor, to have, "though born no kings, made monarchs draw their car;" men who, though not born kings, exercised a dominion more than kingly—a sway more absolute than all the magic of forty generations of royalty could ever confer upon the representative of a line of kings. These men were Caius Julius Cæsar, Napoleon Bonaparte, and Oliver Cromwell. The first belonged to one of the noblest families of the most powerful aristocracy which the world has ever beheld. His path to the absolute power which he acquired was, therefore, in some degree at least, prepared for him. One of the ruling body of the state to which he belonged, and, besides the more solid and profound attributes of his character, which escaped common and superficial observers, endowed with all the lighter and more graceful qualities that, on common occasions, stand men in more stead than the former—and, from the circumstances of his life, early called into action and the paths of ambition—he was from his boyhood familiar with the idea of empire; and when, still young, he wept over what he viewed as his wasted youth, he did so with the resolution to signalize his early manhood by deeds which other men would have considered more than sufficient to fill up the circle of a long and glorious life. But Oliver Cromwell had none of these advantages to help him in mounting the first steps, proverbially so difficult, of the arduous ascent to empire. Though by birth a gentleman, in a country where that distinction was not without its value and importance, he could not be said to belong to the higher class of gentry—the aristocracy, properly so called. In early life, too, he is represented as being somewhat of a clown and a sloven in manners and dress; and his monarchical and aristocratic enemies, who naturally hated, with no ordinary rancor, the man who had so often vanquished them in battle and baffled them in policy, while they attempted to prove his birth mean, have also, no doubt, exaggerated his want of attention to the cultivation of personal graces in early life; at which time Oliver appears to have been far too much absorbed in inward and spiritual to attend much to outward and personal grace. The harsh, untunable voice; the careless, ungraceful mien; the neglected apparel; the unornamented sword-hilt; the coat made by an "ill country tailor"—all these were objects of scorn and derision to the gay and gorgeous courtiers of Charles and his foreign queen. But whatever Oliver Cromwell might have been in youth and early life, when he first made his appearance as a member of parliament—when we look at him again, a few years after, as he appears in the portrait by Walker, now in the British Museum[1]—we discern no signs of the person they describe. All traces of the sloven and the clown have passed away. We behold a countenance to which a well-opened, hard eye; a not very symmetrical, but boldly cut, sagacious-looking nose; and the resolution and thought depicted in the full, broad forehead; and the firm, strongly-marked lines of the mouth, give a noble, intellectual, and even refined expression. There is diffused over the whole figure an air of quiet, natural, self-collected majesty, which you might look for in vain among the portraitures of a hundred born-kings. Whatever, as to mere outward form, aspect, and bearing, Oliver Cromwell might have been in youth, such was he in the maturity of a manhood such as is seldom witnessed in this world of men.

In ordinary times Oliver Cromwell might have passed through manhood, as he had done through youth, into old age, and onward to the grave, unnoticed and unknown: or, among the fine gentlemen and fine speakers of the House of Commons, noticed only as a bad speaker, and somewhat uncouth and rustic gentleman—perhaps one of those whom Mrs. Hutchinson somewhat petulantly terms the "worsted-stocking" members. But for Oliver Cromwell was reserved a far other doom. For he had fallen upon times in which work was to be done

Beneath that unprepossessing exterior his cousin Hampden is said to have discerned, and pointed out to others, the elements of that character which was destined to cut his way to victory and empire.

His genius first began to develop itself in military affairs. As a member of parliament he had been nothing. But, though he was forty-three years of age when he first took up the military profession, such was his genius, that he soon not only far outstripped the old soldiers (men who had been trained to that profession from their boyhood), but changed the whole aspect of affairs; for the forces of the parliament were at first hardly a match for those of the king, and were repeatedly, if not invariably defeated. Cromwell saw this, and, with that clear, practical instinct of his, he also saw the cause of it. "Your troops," said he to Hampden, "are, most of them, old, decayed serving-men and tapsters, and such kind of fellows: the king's forces are composed of gentlemen's younger sons and persons of good quality; and do you think that the mean spirits of such base and low fellows as ours will ever be able to encounter gentlemen, that have honor, and courage, and resolution in them? You must get men of spirit; and take it not ill that I say, of a spirit that is likely to go as far as gentlemen will go, or else I am sure you will still be beaten, as you have hitherto been, in every encounter." This was, in fact, the rationale of the whole matter; and on this Oliver acted. He began with a troop of horse, enlisting the sons of farmers and freeholders, and incorporating among these all the most zealous fanatics he could find. And yet so admirably did he combine the encouragement of the fanaticism which he considered necessary with the discipline which was an essential of victory, that he would not allow his soldiers to perplex their heads with the subtilties that might lead them away from the purpose he had in hand—such as fighting, by the king's authority, against his person; telling them, plainly, that, if he met the king in battle, he would fire a pistol in his face as readily as against any other man. He soon augmented his troop of horse to a regiment; and he spared no pains to increase to the highest pitch the fervor of their enthusiasm, the natural bent of his own character combining with his policy in the work. "He preached, he prayed, he fought, he punished, he rewarded. The wild enthusiasm, together with valor and discipline, still propagated itself; and all men cast their eyes on so pious and so successful a leader."[1] Thus was formed that iron band whom we have seen charging with such resistless fury at Marston and Naseby, at Dunbar and Worcester; "that unconquered and unconquerable soldiery, for discipline and self-government as yet unrivaled upon earth, to whom, though absolutely free from all the brutal vices that usually disgrace successful soldiers—religious, sober, temperate—'the dust of the most desperate battle was as the breath of life,' and before whom their fiercest and proudest enemies were scattered like chaff before the wind."[1]

Such was Oliver Cromwell, and such the men he led. In order to understand fully the nature of the event that occurred in the sequel, it is necessary always to bear in mind that Cromwell had fifty thousand of these invincible veteran soldiers at his back, and completely subservient to his will—bound to him by the devotion they felt for a commander whom they had followed during ten years of unclouded success—through field after field of uninterrupted victory.

The next great constitutional question that occurs for consideration is the trial of King Charles—a transaction, to borrow the words of Hume, of which the pomp and dignity "corresponded to the greatest conception that is suggested in the annals of human kind—the delegates of a great people sitting in judgment upon their supreme magistrate, and trying him for his misgovernment and breach of trust."

On the 1st of January, 1648–9, it was adjudged by the Commons that, by the fundamental laws of the land, it is treason in the king of England, for the time being, to levy war against the parliament and kingdom. On the 4th of the same month an ordinance was passed for erecting a high court of justice for the trial of the king. The commissioners appointed for the trial elected Sergeant Bradshaw, a lawyer of eminence in his profession, and of a courageous and independent mind, their president. The reasoning which we have made use of in the case of the trial of the Earl of Strafford applies à fortiori, to the case before us. If there was no law of the land under which Strafford could be convicted on the charge of high treason, still less was there one by which the king could be condemned. Yet the principle upon which the Commons of England acted deserves consideration. They desired that the thing they were about to do should not, as Harrison, one of the judges, afterward said on his trial, be "done in a corner." They felt that the eyes of the world were on them, and they were determined to proceed at least boldly and openly—to destroy their enemy like manly and avowed foes, in the face of day—not to poniard him in the dark, like secret and midnight assassins.

The Commons of England now ruled by precisely the same power by which the king of England had ruled before, and by which every government, whether of one or a number, has ever ruled. As a government, therefore, independent and supreme, they had the same right to try Charles, which Charles, as an independent sovereign, had to try them. It is true their vote, purporting that they did so by the fundamental laws of the kingdom was nonsense as well as falsehood—the consequence partly of their position, partly of their ignorance of political science. Seeing that the English government, from the Conquest to the time of their vote, had been always in form, and for the most part in substance, strictly monarchical, or a government of one man called king, and that the laws were made by the sovereign, and necessarily for the protection of the maker of them, it was clearly impossible that there could be any such law in England as they spoke of. On the contrary, the English laws of treason were, and necessarily so, all made to protect the sovereign—that is, the king; not the subject—that is, all but the king. The parliament, however, being sovereign, and having the former sovereign in their power, had a right (the right, namely, created by the first of all human laws—self-preservation) to treat him as a man has a right to treat an enemy whom he has subdued; that is, to take such measures regarding him as, according to the best of their judgment, their own safety demanded. Men who act otherwise are convicted of the most undoubted folly by their own act, and, along with their own destruction, bring upon themselves not the respect, but the universal scorn of mankind. The court which tried Charles Stuart seem to have been aware that this was the true ground on which the question was to be tried. Ludlow tells us, that to Charles's repeated assertion that he was responsible only to God, Bradshaw answered that, "seeing God had, by his providence, overruled that plea, the court was determined to do so likewise." This, we apprehend, was the true way of dealing with the question. While Charles was the sovereign, it would have been a contradiction in terms to say that he could be tried by his subjects. But the God of battles—the same God by whose fiat Charles's ancestors had received their sovereignty—had decided that Charles was no longer sovereign.

The field was now open (the king being removed, and the House of Lords having been soon after voted useless and dangerous, and therefore to be abolished) for the thorough-going republicans to make their experiment in. Now was the time for the schemes to work—whether of the fanatical Fifth-monarchy men, who were "to destroy and pull down Babylon, and bind kings in chains and nobles in fetters of iron;" or of the more subtil and profound politicians like St. John and Vane, who might lay their plot so deep as to think to circumvent God, perhaps; or, finally, of the more sober and practical, such as the brave, blunt, honest soldier, Ludlow, or the no less stout, sturdy, honest lawyer, Bradshaw, who stood firm to the last, and died, as they had lived, true to the faith and the hope of their beloved, though futile, republic. But all was in vain. They spoke and voted, and voted and spoke. They made long, dreary, tedious speeches, and still longer and darker prayers, and squabbled between whiles among themselves, and got suspicious of one another, and still more suspicious (at last, when it was too late) of the army, through which they had done those mighty deeds that rung from sea to sea and from shore to shore, and filled Europe with wonder and with awe, and were to make their names immortal. And then, that strange, bold, wary, inscrutable man—the veteran general who had achieved so much in their name—stepped in; and, as if by a mere wafture of his conquering right hand, dispelled them as it were into annihilation, and to-day concentrated in his single person all those powers of sovereignty which yesterday had been theirs.

"There happened to Cromwell," says M. Guizot, "what perhaps never happened to any other man of his sort. He was sufficient for all the phases of the revolution; he was the man of the first and of the last times: at first the leader of the insurrection, the abettor of anarchy, the most violent revolutionist in England; afterward the man of the anti-revolutionary reaction, the man of the reëstablishment of order, of social reorganization—thus, himself alone playing all the parts, that, in the course of revolutions, the greatest actors divide among them. It can not be said that Cromwell was Mirabeau: he wanted eloquence, and did not obtain any distinction in the first years of the Long Parliament. But he was successively Danton and Bonaparte."[1] "And yet," M. Guizot continues, "he never reigned over the hearts of his subjects—his government was never more than a pis aller—a necessity of the moment. The protector, the absolute master of England, was all his life obliged to employ force in order to retain his power; no party could govern like him, but none liked him; he was constantly attacked by all at once."[2]

The case of Bradshaw affords an example of the manner in which Cromwell was regarded by the party with which he had once acted. When Cromwell seized the government, Bradshaw offered all the opposition in his power, and continued boldly and sturdily to do so to the last. When Cromwell insisted upon every one taking out a commission from him, if they chose to retain their places under his government, Bradshaw absolutely refused, alledging that he had received his commission as chief justice of Chester, to continue quamdiu se bene gesserit, and that he should retain it without any other, unless he could be proved to have justly forfeited it by want or integrity; and that, if there were any doubts about the matter, he should submit it to trial by twelve Englishmen. He soon after set out on his circuit, without waiting further orders; nor did Cromwell deem it prudent to prevent or recall him, as he declared nothing but force would make him desist from his duty. Cromwell again attempted to oppose Bradshaw's election for Cheshire; and though Bradshaw was returned by the sheriff, as another was returned by those in the interest of Cromwell, neither sat, it having been so decided in the case of double returns. Bradshaw was, however, at last deprived of his office of chief justice of Chester. "The two former friends watched each other with the vigilance of two crouching tigers, each waiting for the exact moment to make the decisive spring that was to destroy the other. And we may give some credit to the observation of certain of the royalist writers, that Bradshaw would have had no objection to perform for Oliver, the un-hereditary tyrant, the same office he had performed for Charles, the hereditary one; and that he would not have been sorry to have had an opportunity to convince the world that he was no respecter of persons."[1]

And yet, for all this, Cromwell possessed some of the finest points of the English character. Notwithstanding the deep, and even dark and somewhat oblique policy by which he pursued some of his ends, there was about the man much of the bluff, bold, hearty character, set off with a dash of the rough, rather coarse humor, which has long been characteristic of John Bull. And though he knew how, as Hume has well observed, to employ, when he judged it necessary, the most profound dissimulation, the most oblique and refined artifice, his natural temper was prone to nothing paltry, mean, or truckling—seemed to delight in no vulgar ostentation, but rather led him to magnanimity, to simplicity, and to an imperious and domineering policy. This signally appeared in his relation with foreign states. Never had England been so feared and so respected over the world as when the scepter which swayed it was the leading truncheon of Oliver Cromwell.

The legislative views of Cromwell undoubtedly were neither so profound nor so comprehensive as they might have been expected to be had he been a man of a better education and a more philosophical and cultivated intellect. Yet, with the sagacity which was natural to him, he saw and sought to reform much that was vicious or defective in the laws of the country, both civil and criminal. And though it was the fashion of the monarchical lawyers of the succeeding times to depreciate or disown any good done by such a hand, yet, even by their own confession, some of the greatest legal reforms which were made in the succeeding period of our history (such as the establishment of new trials, the abolition of feudal tenures, and some others[2]) were adopted from what they termed the "crude and abortive legislation of the commonwealth."

The following passage of Ludlow is strongly characteristic of Cromwell in this line, displaying him at once in his weakness and his strength—as a wild fanatic and a rational reformer:—"He professed to desire nothing more than that the government of the nation might be settled in a free and equal commonwealth, acknowledging that there was no other probable means to keep out the old family and government from returning upon us; declaring that he looked upon the design of the Lord in this day to be the freeing of his people from every burden, and that he was now accomplishing what was prophesied in the 110th Psalm; from the consideration of which he was often encouraged to attend the affecting those ends, spending at least an hour in the exposition of that Psalm: adding to this, that it was his intention to contribute the utmost of his endeavors to make a thorough reformation of the clergy and law: but, said he, the sons of Zeruiah are yet too strong for us; and we can not mention the reformation of the law, but they presently cry out, we design to destroy propriety; whereas the law, as it is now constituted, serves only to maintain the lawyers, and to encourage the rich to oppress the poor."[1]

We are indebted to the kindness of a learned friend for the following short account of certain law reforms, instituted during the protectorate, in Ireland:—

The administration of Ireton was distinguished by an important legal reform, which produced the establishment of the local courts in Ireland, known by the name of the civil bill courts. He was aided in this by the ability of John Cook, the chief justice of Munster, who had acted as solicitor-general for the commonwealth upon the trial of Charles I., a person of considerable talent and eloquence. The provincial courts, which sat but rarely, were changed into county courts, and suits were permitted to relate to matters either of law or of equity. "My Lord Deputy," says Cook,[2] "who is a blessed instrument, and indefatigable in the work of holiness and righteousness, for the ease and safety of the people, hath altered the provincial courts into county courts; and whereas the people traveled forty or fifty miles, now their differences are ended at home. . . . . It is a mixed court, and the bill may contain both law and equity, whereby half the suits in the province are ended or prevented. The cause is ended as soon as it is ripe for hearing. . . . . Precipitancy, indeed, is the step-mother of justice, and must be carefully avoided as falling from a rock; but that is to hear and to determine before both parties are ready, or have had time to be so; otherwise, when the cause is ripe, why should not the court put in the sickle? A speedy trial is the plaintiff's joy, and just judgment delayed may prove worse than an unrighteous sentence speedily pronounced." Upon the Restoration these courts ceased to sit. They were reëstablished[3] at the beginning of the last century; and so great have been their utility and advantage, that they have mitigated, to a great extent, many political evils. Their jurisdiction has from time to time been much enlarged, and they are the only courts in the three divisions of the United Kingdom which have been established with the object of amending the ancient processes of courts of justice, and of erecting a general system of local judicature.

Oliver Cromwell died, and his son Richard quietly succeeded him, and reigned in his stead; and, if he had possessed any considerable portion of his father's force and energy of character, possibly at this day the blood of Oliver Cromwell might have been the blood-royal of England. But the son of Oliver Cromwell was a meek, unambitious man, to whom the heavy scepter which even his father's iron hand had found it no light task to wield, was a burden insupportable. He resigned it, and retired to live and to die in obscurity and peace; and the republicans had once more the field open for their darling projects. At the death of Oliver Cromwell, "the republicans alone," observes M. Guizot, "were in a condition to lay hands on power; they did so, and succeeded no better than they had done before. It was not for want of confidence—at least in the fanatics of the party. A pamphlet of Milton's, published at this time, and full of talent and spirit, is entitled 'The Ready and Easy Way to establish a Free Commonwealth.' You see what was the in-infatuation of these men. They soon relapsed into that impossibility of governing (impossibilité de gouverner) which they had before labored under. Monk took the management of the event which all England looked for—the Restoration was accomplished."[1]

The contrivance of appointing trustees to preserve contingent remainders, in whom there is vested an estate in remainder for the life of the tenant for life, to commence when his estate determines otherwise than by his death, is said to have been invented by Sir Orlando Bridgman, Sir Geoffrey Palmer, and other eminent counsel, who betook themselves to conveyancing during the time of the civil wars, in order thereby to secure, in family settlements, a provision for the future children of an intended marriage, who before were usually left at the mercy of the particular tenant for life. When, after the Restoration, these lawyers came to fill the first judicial offices, they supported this invention within reasonable bounds, and introduced it into general use.[2]

We may here likewise mention a species of conveyance founded on the Statute of Uses, which by this time had come into general use, and is now the most common of any, namely, Lease and Release. This conveyance is said by Fabian Philips to have been first contrived by Sergeant Moore, at the request of Lord Norris, to the end that some of his kindred should not know, by any search of public records, what settlement he should make of his estate. The validity of it was formerly doubted. Mr. Noy, attorney-general to Charles I., thought that it could not be supported without an actual entry by the bargainee. But it was resolved in 18 Jas. I., by the Chief Justices Montague and Howard, and Chief Baron Tanfield, that upon a deed of bargain and sale for years of land, though the bargainee never entered, if afterward the bargainor makes a grant of the reversion, reciting the lease to divers uses, it was a good conveyance of the reversion.[1]

To the Great Rebellion, as it has been called, we are indebted for some great improvements in the administration of the criminal law, of which the most remarkable and important is the discontinuance of the application of torture. A late investigation of this subject by Mr. Jardine has not only cleared away the doubts that had perplexed all previous inquirers as to the state both of the law and of the fact in relation to it, but has brought to light a principle of our ancient constitution, the operation of which had never before been understood, nor indeed its existence as a recognized principle of the constitution suspected.[2] The fact, in the first place, stands thus:—The highest legal authorities, from Sir John Fortescue down to Lord Coke, declare unanimously and in the most distinct terms that the application of torture was not allowed by the common law of England; and yet, on the other hand, an unbroken series of instances exist, from the earliest date at which the registers of the privy council begin to record such acts down to the commencement of the Civil War, of orders issued by the king in council to torture prisoners for the purpose of extracting evidence from them against themselves or others, many of them accompanied by the most satisfactory proof that they were actually carried into execution.

Coke says that "there is no law to warrant tortures in this land," and declares the practice to be expressly prohibited by the 29th chapter of Magna Charta. Sir Thomas Smith, a most eminent lawyer of the time of Elizabeth, says, "Torment, or question, which is used by the order of the civil law, and custom of other countries, to put a malefactor to excessive pain to make him confess of himself or of his fellows or complices, is not used in England. It is taken for servile." Further, we are told by Rushworth that, in the case of Felton, who stabbed the Duke of Buckingham, in 1628, the twelve judges, upon the question being proposed to them by the king, "Whether by the law he (Felton) might not be racked? and whether there were any law against it?" unanimously answered that "he ought not by the law to be tortured by the rack, for no such punishment is known or allowed by our law." "Here, then," says Mr. Jardine, after quoting these and other testimonies, "is a practice repugnant to reason, justice, and humanity—censured and condemned upon principle by philosophers and statesmen—denounced by the most eminent authorities on municipal law—and finally declared by the twelve judges, not only to be illegal, but to be altogether unknown as a punishment to the law of England. As far as authority goes, therefore, the crimes of murder and robbery are not more distinctly forbidden by our criminal code than the application of the torture to witnesses or accused persons is condemned by the oracles of the common law. And yet it is an historical fact that, anterior to the commonwealth, torture was always used as a matter of course in all grave accusations, at the mere discretion of the king and the privy council, and uncontrolled by any law besides the prerogative of the sovereign."

Mr. Jardine's proofs of this last position consist of a series of royal warrants for the application of torture, extracted from the council books, and extending from the beginning of the reign of Edward VI. to the commencement of the Civil War. He has printed fifty-five of these warrants, including several issued by each of the five sovereigns who reigned in the period gone over—Edward VI., Mary, Elizabeth, James I., and Charles I. Some of them are very curious, in reference to their bearing upon the point which Mr. Jardine's researches are directed to elucidate, the apparent contradiction between the actual practice as to this matter and the law as laid down by the most eminent authorities. One, for example, issued by Elizabeth, in 1571, ordering the torture to be applied to two servants of the Duke of Norfolk in the case of the treasonable conspiracy of the duke respecting the Queen of Scots, is directed to, and was actually executed under the personal superintendence of, the same Sir Thomas Smith, whose distinct assertion that torture was not in use in England has just been quoted. Others, in the reigns both of Elizabeth and James, are directed, among other persons, to Sir Edward Coke, while he held the office of attorney-general; and there is conclusive evidence that this great lawyer also personally conducted several examinations by that method of torture which he has nevertheless declared so emphatically to be directly contrary at once to an express provision of Magna Charta and to the whole tenor of the common law. One warrant, issued the 19th of February, 1620, ordering the lord chief justice and others to examine Samuel Peacock, committed to the Tower upon vehement suspicion of high treason, and "to put him, as there shall be cause, for the better manifestation of the truth, to the torture either of the manacles or the rack," is signed, among other members of the council, both by Coke, attorney-general, and Bacon, then holding the office of lord chancellor. This warrant is further remarkable as being one of only two on record directed to a common law judge. Down to the end of the reign of Elizabeth torture seems to have been thus applied, by royal warrant, in the investigation of all kinds of offenses; the instances that have been discovered include cases of murder, embezzlement, horse-stealing, and various other felonies; afterward it seems to have been confined chiefly, if not entirely, to state offenses. The last instance of the application of torture in England, of which Mr. Jardine has found any trace, occurred in the year 1640. On the 21st of May, in that year, a warrant was issued under the king's signet, directing the Lieutenant of the Tower and two of the king's sergeants to examine one John Archer, who was charged with having been concerned in the tumultuous attack upon Archbishop Laud's palace at Lambeth;[1] and "if upon sight of the rack he does not make a clear answer, then they are to cause him to be racked as in their discretions shall be thought fit." "This," says Mr. Jardine, "is the last recorded instance of the infliction of torture in England; and, as far as I have been able to discover, the last instance of its occurrence. It is not probable that, during the troubles of the eight remaining years of his life and reign, Charles I. had ever again recourse to it: there is not a trace of it during the commonwealth; and in the reigns of Charles II. and James II., when the revival of high prerogative doctrines and the profligacy of the judges might have led us to expect it, there is not a single authentic instance of the application of the torture." This, it may be added, is the more remarkable inasmuch as, in Scotland, torture still continued in common use.

The continuity of the practice, as thus traced through five successive reigns, Mr. Jardine justly thinks, sufficiently refutes the common notion that the instances of the application of torture usually adduced are merely so many exceptions and irregularities, and that the general practice was consistent with what is contended to have been the general rule, namely, the absolute illegality of torture at all periods of the English law. "It appears to me, I confess," he says, "that the facts I have enumerated clearly establish an uniform practice the other way. They seem to me to show, not the casual, capricious, or unjust acts of particular kings or councilors, but a practice handed down and justified by a constant course of precedents as an unquestionable prerogative of the crown, though directly opposed to the fundamental principles of reason and law, and condemned and denounced by the opinions of the wisest statesmen and lawyers at the very time they were compelled to act upon it. No doubt the assertion of the illegality of torture is in one sense strictly true. It was not lawful by the common law; it was contrary to Magna Charta and many statutes, and therefore the judges could not inflict it as a punishment in the ordinary course of administering justice. But it was lawful as an act of prerogative—as an act of that power to which, according to the doctrines of those days, the laws belonged as a kind of property—a power which was superior to the laws, and was able to suspend the laws—and which was the only and uncontrolled tribunal to judge of the necessity of such suspension."

This distinction between prerogative and law, strange as it sounds to us at the present day, Mr. Jardine does not doubt, was sufficiently plain and familiar to all lawyers and others conversant with the constitution two centuries ago. It is very distinctly indicated in an expression used, according to Rushworth, by Charles I., in stating the case of Felton to the judges: he observed that if the rack might be applied to the prisoner by law, "he would not use his prerogative in this point." The judges resolved that he could not be tortured by the law; but "that torture was known and allowed as an act of prerogative, the judges," as Mr. Jardine remarks, "must have been fully aware; for, besides the notoriety of the practice, several of the individuals who joined in this resolution, before they were raised to the bench, were not unfrequently employed in examinations by the rack."

The notion which thus appears to have been generally prevalent, and in particular to have possessed Charles himself, of the subjection of the law, both common and statute, to the prerogative, probably extended much farther than to the single point Mr. Jardine has here taken up. Within what limitations, if any, the doctrine was held would be an interesting inquiry. The conduct pursued, and the pretensions put forward, by Charles I., and not less, indeed, by James I. and by Elizabeth, would seem to be in some respects explicable only on the supposition that all these sovereigns held it to be a principle of the constitution that the prerogative was universally, and without qualification, supreme over the law. The puzzle is to understand what, with this creed, they thought the law to be as distinct from the prerogative, or what use they thought there was in having any such thing as law at all.

Mr. Jardine, in conclusion, alludes generally to other ways in which, in former times, the practical operation of the prerogative interfered injuriously with the administration of criminal justice, and observes that by far the greater part of these evils were abolished during the commonwealth. "How and by whom," he says, "and at what precise point of time this great reform was effected, is a question of extremely difficult solution; but there is no doubt that the practice of questioning juries for their verdicts, the exclusion of oral testimony, and the use of the torture—all of which continued to disfigure the proceedings of courts of justice immediately before the death of Charles I.—were wholly swept away during the ten years which succeeded that event, and were never afterward revived. Just and rational principles of evidence, sound views of the object of penal laws, and of the proper means of enforcing them, first sprung up during the early years of the commonwealth; and I confess I think that the merits of those great men whom Cromwell found it his interest to raise to the judicial station have never been sufficiently appreciated by their posterity. Under the wise and moderate superintendence of such minds as Hales, Whitelock, Windham, and Rolle, our judicial institutions underwent a total revision and reform. The law then for the first time became a protection to the subject against the power of the crown; and so well considered and substantial were the improvements then introduced that they continued after the Restoration and through the tumultuous and sanguinary reign which succeeded it." In regard, however, to the discontinuance of the practice of torture, that is hardly to be considered as one of the reforms for which we are indebted to the judges, but rather as a consequence of the spirit of freedom that was now awakened, and of the prostration of the prerogative in all its parts before the might of the popular rights.

Mr. Jardine has collected some curious particulars respecting the principal modes and instruments of torture that were in use in England in former times. The nature of the most common and most ancient engine of all, the rack, will be best understood from the delineation of it that has been given in a former page.[1] The rack, or break, as it was otherwise called, is traditionally said to have been introduced in the reign of Henry VI., by John Holland, duke of Exeter, then Constable of the Tower, whence it was known by the name of The Duke of Exeter's Daughter. Besides the exquisite pain it inflicted at the moment, this torture frequently left its victim permanently disabled. The Jesuit Campion, who was racked in 1581, is said to have had the joints and muscles of his arm so injured that some months after, on his trial, when he was called upon to hold up his hand at his arraignment, he was incapable of doing so; and one of the priests, who stood near him, raised it for him. Tanner, in his History of the Jesuits, asserts that the rack sometimes produced laceration of the entrails, and that Campion's natural stature was actually lengthened more than a hand-breadth by the violent stretching to which he was subjected. We have in a former chapter had occasion to describe the opposite torture of compression as effected by the instrument called Skevington's Daughter, or Skevington's Irons, or Gives, or, by corruption, the Scavenger's Daughter.[2] This was accounted a comparatively mild torture. One of Mr. Jardine's cases is that of Thomas Myagh, an Irishman, charged with treason, with respect to whom the report of the persons appointed to examine him, dated 10th of March, 1581, states that they had forborne to put him in Skevington's Irons, because they had been charged to examine him with secrecy, "which in that sort they could not do, that manner of dealing requiring the presence and aid of one of the jailers all the time that he should be in those irons," and also because they "found the man so resolute as, in their opinion, little would be wrung out of him but by some sharper torture." Myagh was afterward subjected both to the irons and the rack; and he has left a record of his sufferings in some rude verses which may still be read on the wall of his dungeon.[3] Another torture, first mentioned in 1588, and often afterward, is that of the manacles. This instrument, which after its introduction became the most usual kind of torture, "seems," says Mr. Jardine, "to have been kept at Bridewell until about the year 1598, after which time it is mentioned in warrants as one of the kinds of torture used at the Tower. I can not discover from any credible authority of what it consisted. It is, perhaps, worthy of remark that, at the present day, a variety of instruments of torture are shown in the Tower, and visitors are assured that they were taken in the Spanish Armada, in 1588, the precise period at which the manacles were introduced at Bridewell." Mr. Jardine suggests that one of these engines now at the Tower, which compressed the neck of the sufferer down toward his feet, might be the manacles; and, if so, that Shakspeare probably alludes to it when he makes Prospero say, in the Tempest, ——"He is a traitor!

I'll manacle thy neck and feet together."

Other forms of torture were also sometimes employed besides these mechanical instruments. A seminary priest, Alexander Briant, who was apprehended and thrown into the Tower, in 1581, on a charge of high treason, in addition to the ordinary torture, is stated by Anthony Wood to have been "specially punished for two whole days and nights by famine, by which he was reduced to such extremities that he ate the clay out of the walls of his prison, and drank the droppings of the roof." There were two dungeons in particular in the Tower, incarceration in which was a frightful aggravation of the pains even of the rack or the manacles: that called Little Ease and that called the Rats' Dungeon. Of the former we have a description in the report of a committee of the House of Commons, appointed to inquire into its state, in 1604. The committee reported that "they found in Little Ease, in the Tower, an engine of torture, devised by Mr. Skevington, sometime lieutenant of the Tower, called Skevington's Daughters; and that the place itself was very lothsome and unclean, and not used for a long time either for a prison or other cleanly purpose." The Rats' Dungeon, or "Dungeon among the Rats," is often mentioned by the Catholic writers who have related the sufferings of persons of their religion in the reign of Elizabeth. "It is described," says Mr. Jardine, "as a cell below high-water mark and totally dark; and, as the tide flowed, innumerable rats, which infest the muddy banks of the Thames, were driven through the orifices of the walls into the dungeon. The alarm excited by the irruption of these lothsome creatures in the dark was the least part of the torture which these unfortunate captives had to undergo; instances are related which humanity would gladly believe to be the exaggerations of Catholic partisans, where the flesh has been torn from the arms and legs of prisoners during sleep by the well-known voracity of these animals."

From such detestable barbarities as these there is little cause to wonder that prisoners sometimes attempted to make their escape even at the cost of life itself. Mr. Jardine relates one well-authenticated case of an unhappy man having destroyed himself in a peculiarly revolting way, but the only one at his command, to avoid the more horrible agonies of the rack. This was Nicholas Owen, who had been for several years a confidential servant of Garnet, the Jesuit, and who was taken up when Garnet was accused of being one of the contrivers of the gunpowder plot. The man obstinately refused to give evidence against his old master, and was at first tried by one of "the gentler tortures," namely, by having his thumbs tied together, and suspended by them from a beam. But as this was found to extract nothing from him of any importance, he was informed that, on the morrow, he must expect the severer discipline of the rack. "The next day he complained of illness to his keeper, who humanely carried him a chair to use at his dinner, and with his food a blunt-pointed knife was as usual brought for the purpose of cutting his meat. Owen pretended to find fault with the coolness of his broth, and besought the keeper to put it on the fire for him in an adjoining apartment; and as soon as the man had left the cell for this purpose, he seized the opportunity of ripping up his belly in a frightful manner with the knife. The keeper, on his return, observing the pale and ghastly countenance of the prisoner, and perceiving blood sprinkled on the floor, threw off the straw which the unfortunate man had drawn over him, and discovered what had happened. He then ran to inform the lieutenant, who immediately hastened to the cell with several guests who happened to be at dinner with him. In answer to their questions the dying man declared that he had committed the act of self-destruction entirely from the apprehension of severer torture than he had suffered the day before. He expired soon afterward, and, an inquest being held upon his body in the Tower, a verdict of felo de se was returned." This is the circumstantial statement made by Dr. Robert Abbott, one of the king's chaplains, and afterward bishop of Salisbury, in a book which he wrote to prove Garnet's connection with the plot, and to refute what he calls "the calumnies of the Jesuits" as to the mode of Owen's death, who was said to have expired in the actual endurance of some dreadful species of torture. Our readers will agree with Mr. Jardine, "that there is no great difference in reason or morality between the guilt of homicide by actual torture, and that of driving a man to self-destruction by the threat of bodily agony from which the sufferer sees no refuge but in death.

If the victory obtained by the parliament over the king in the seventeenth century had done nothing more than doom the rack, and the gives, and the manacles to go to rest and rust, and torment no more forever—converting these once terrible engines of cruelty into the curiosities of a museum—it would have well repaid all the blood and confusion it cost. Nor let us be sure that the practice of torture would have speedily fallen into disuse among us at any rate, in the ordinary, undisturbed advance of political amelioration, or general civilization, humanity, and knowledge. Torture ceased in England in 1641; but, even with the aid of that example, it was not abolished in Scotland till 1708, nor in France till 1789, nor in Russia till 1801, nor in Bavaria and Wurtemburg till 1806, nor in the kingdom of Hanover till 1822, nor in the grand duchy of Baden till 1831![1]

Of the habits and course of education of the lawyers of this period we have an account in one of the most singular and characteristic pieces of biography existing in any language — The Life of the Lord Keeper Guilford, by his younger brother, the Hon. Roger North.[1]

The Lord Keeper Guilford was the second son of Dudley Lord North: yet his allowance was but £60 a-year. His brother gives the following account of it, which is characteristic of the times in more ways than one:—"The exhibition allowed his lordship by his father was, at first, £60 per annum. But the family being hard pinched for supplies toward educating and disposing of many younger children, and his parents observing him to pick up some pence by court-keeping,[2] besides an allowance of £20 per annum from his grandfather, and a little by practice, they thought fit to reduce him to £50. This sat hard upon his spirits, and produced divers notable-penned letters, post after post, complaining upon all the topics of an hard case that could be thought of. He never pleaded so earnestly for the best fee that ever he had. At length there comes a letter from his father, which he opened with precipitous haste, in hopes of a favorable answer, and there he found—'Frank, I suppose, by this time, having vented all your discontent, you are satisfied with what I have done,' &c. There sunk all his hopes upon that point. But, to do right to his good father, he paid him that £50 a-year as long as he lived, saying he would not discourage industry by rewarding it, when successful, with loss."[3]

The following passage is so characteristic of the times, that, though not particularly applicable to the lawyers, we quote it:—"His lordship was very young when he was first put to school, and then had but indifferent tutorage, for his first master was one Mr. Willis, that kept a school at Isleworth. That man was a rigid Presbyterian, and his wife a furious Independent. These two sects, at that time, contended for preëminence in tyranny; reaping the fruits of a too-successful rebellion, which conjured up a spirit of opposition betwixt them, so that they hated each other more than either the bishops or even papists themselves."[4]

Along with the law, Mr. North studied arts and languages (he had previously been at St. John's College, Cambridge). "I have heard him say," observes his brother, "that if he had not enabled himself by these studies, and particularly his practice of music upon his base, or lyra viol (which he used to touch lute-fashion, upon his knees), to divert himself alone, he had never been a lawyer. Without acquiring a capacity of making a solitary life agreeable, let no man pretend to success in the law. I have heard his lordship often remember a lesson the citizens used to their apprentices—Keep your shop, and your shop will keep you—as being no less true of a lawyer with respect to his chamber."[1]

Mr. North used commons and putting cases. "He used constantly the commons in the Hall (he was a member of the Inner Temple) at noons and nights, and fell into the way of putting cases (as they call it), which much improved him; and he was very good at it, being of a ready apprehension, a nice distinguisher, and prompt speaker. He used to say that no man could be a good lawyer that was not a put-case. Reading goes off with some cloud, but discourse makes all notions limpid and just; for, in speaking, a man is his own auditor (if he had no others at hand) to correct himself. Besides, there are diversities of opinion, and contentions in reasoning, which excite thoughts that otherwise would never have risen. And mistakes, almost incredible to the mistaker, being observed, cause a recurrence, for surety, to the authorities, where an inspection convinceth, and, withal, corrects the faulty assurance some will have in a mere memory."[2]

Of commonplacing, in the study of the law, he says:—"It was his lordship's constant practice to commonplace as he read. He had no bad memory, but was diffident, and would not trust it. He acquired a very small, but legible hand; for, where contracting is the main business, it is not well to write, as the fashion now is, uncial and semi-uncial letters, to look like pigs' ribs. His writing in his commonplaces was not by way of index, but epitome; because, as he used to say, the looking over the commonplace-book on any occasion, gave him a sort of survey of what he had read about matters not then inquisited, which refreshed them somewhat in his memory: and that had not been obtained in a way of mere what and where, as the style of most indexes run. When this manner of writing is comprehensive or pregnant, it is called abridgment, of which there are divers large ones of the common law in print—as Fitzherbert, Brook, &c.; and are like those the civilians call summists, which, with them, are not allowed as authority. Certainly it is an error for a student to peruse such, it being like reading over a dictionary, which never teacheth a language.[3] . . . He used to say that the advantage of his commonplace was not, as a parson's concordance, to help him to cases, but, when he remembered he had read of a case, to help him

[1] It is to be observed that though the greater portion of this memoir relates to the period after the Restoration, the part of it which concerns Lord Keeper Guilford's life as a student relates to the period preceding; for Francis North was admitted at St. John's College, Cambridge, 8th June, 1653 (Life, &c., p. 12), and, "after two or three years spent at the University, removed to the Middle Temple." (Ibid. p. 13.) We shall give some of Roger North's most graphic and characteristic portraits of lawyers—such as Hale, Jefferies, Saunders, &c.—in the period to which they belong, viz., the reigns of kings Charles II. and James II.

[3] "And for that reason," he adds, we think with great truth, "Coke's comment upon Littelton ought not to be read by students, to whom it is, at least, unprofitable; for it is but a commonplace, and much more obscure than the bare text without it. And, to say truth, that text needs it not; for it is so plain of itself that a comment, properly so called, doth but obscure it." The original MS. of Coke's Comment on Littelton, which is now in the British Museum (Harl. MSS. No. 6687), proves that Roger North is quite correct in the above remarks. Coke seems to have taken a 12mo. copy of Littelton's Tenures—one of those which are still to be met with in old book shops, with a very broad margin, and interleaved—and made notes on the margin and blank leaves in a very small hand. He then seems to have added a great many blank leaves at the beginning and end, and written on them in the same small, crowded, rather illegible character. The whole now forms four thick 12mo. vols.

to find it; and then his little note, there, brought into his mind the agitation of the matter at large in the book; and, for this reason, the commonplace-book is of little use to any but to him that made it. For the law is inculcated by reading the long arguments to be found in the books, where reasons are given pro and con, and not by any extracts. however curiously made. And the great art of commonplacing lying in the judicious, but very contracted, note of the matter, a stranger may pass it by, and not know whether it concerns his inquiry or not."[1]

Of the employment of discourse he says:—"And he was most sensible of the benefit of discourse, which I mentioned before; for I have observed him often say that, after his day's reading at his night's congress with his friends, either at commons or over a chop, whatever the subject was, he made it the subject of his discourse in the company; for, said he, I read many things which I am sensible I forgot, but I found withal, that, if I had once talked over what I had read, I never forgot that. This agrees with a direction to a student, said to have come from the Earl of Nottingham, that he should study all the morning, and talk all the afternoon; because a ready speech (if it be not Nature's gift) is acquirable only by practice, and is very necessary for a bar practicer." He then relates an anecdote which throws light on the habits of the law students of that time:—"I remember that, after the fire of the Temple, it was considered whether the old cloister walks should be rebuilt, or rather improved into chambers; which latter had been for the benefit of the Middle Temple. But in regard it could not be done without the consent of the Inner House, the master of the Middle House waited upon the then Mr. Attorney Finch, to desire the concurrence of his society, upon a proposition of some benefit to be thrown in on that side. But Mr. Attorney would by no means give way to it, and reproved the Middle Templers very wittily and eloquently upon the subject of students walking in the evenings there and putting cases, which, he said, was done in his time, as mean and low as the buildings were then, however it comes, said he, that such a benefit to students is now made so little account of; and, therefore, the cloisters, by the order and disposition of Sir Christopher Wren, were built as they now stand. And, agreeable to this, Sergeant Maynard, the best old-book lawyer of his time, used to say that the law was ars bablativa, which, humorsomely enough, declares the advantage that discoursing brings to the students of the law."[2]

Soon after Mr. North being called to the bar, "he began," says his brother, "to feel himself in business; and, as a fresh young man of good character, had the favor of diverse persons that, out of a good-will, went to him, and some near relations." We believe "fresh young men of good character," at the bar, are apt at all times, by the favor of near relations, as well as diverse other persons, to "feel themselves" in more business than fees. They should all follow the Lord Keeper North's plan, who, being once asked if he took fees of such, naïvely and wittily replied:—Yes, they come to do me a kindness; and what kindness have I if I refuse their money?"[1]

[1] Coke upon Littelton, i 20.

[2] Ibid. i. 25.

At that time it does not seem to have been the practice for eminent counsel to take pupils, as it is now. But the sages of the law used sometimes to take upon them voluntarily the instruction of the young lawyer. Thus, in the case of Lord Keeper North, "his admission," says his brother, "into the conversation of Mr. Attorney-general Palmer proved of great use to him in the direction of his reading. For Mr. Attorney's good-nature and affability were such, that a young gentleman might demand any thing of him that tended to the advancement of his studies; and he would answer fully and friendly to it."[2] And Roger North informs us, also, that while he himself was yet a student, the lord keeper, who was then rapidly rising into notice, "caused his clerk to put into his hands all his draughts, such as he himself had corrected, and after which conveyances had been engrossed, that, by a perusal of them, he might put some light into the formal skill of conveyancing. And that young gentleman instantly went to work, and first numbered the draughts, and then made an index of all the clauses, referring to that number and folio: so that, in this strict perusal and digestion of the various matters, he acquired not only a formal style, but also apt precedents, and a competent notion of instruments of all kinds."[3]

We shall conclude with two very amusing and characteristic anecdotes of his lordship's adventures on the circuit. The first relates to Sergeant Earl, who then had much of the business of the Norfolk circuit. "He (North) was exceeding careful," says Roger, "to keep fair with the cocks of the circuit, and particularly Sergeant Earl, who had almost a monopoly. The sergeant was a very covetous man, and, when none would starve with him in journeys, this young gentleman kept him company. Once, at Cambridge, the sergeant's man brought his lordship a cake, telling him he would want it, for he knew his master would not draw bit till he came to Norwich. And it proved so. They jogged on, and at Barton Mills his lordship asked the sergeant if he would not take a mouthful there? No, boy, said he, we'll 'light at every ten miles' end, and get to Norwich as soon as we can. And there was no remedy. Once he asked the sergeant in what method he kept his accounts; for you have, said he, lands, securities, and great comings-in of all kinds? Accounts, boy, said he; I get as much as I can, and I spend as little as I can; and there is all the account I keep."[4]

The other anecdote relates to some of the circuit habits of that time, and is thus told by Roger North, in his quaint, racy manner:—"Before I mention the further steps of his lordship's rising, I must get rid of a scurvy downfall he had, which had well-nigh cost him his life. That he was what was called a sober person was well known; but, withal, that he loved a merry glass with a friend. But once, in the circuit, being invited, with the rest of the counsel, to dine at Colchester with the recorder, Sir John Shaw, who was well known to be one of the greatest kill-cows at drinking in the nation, he, with the rest of his brethren, by methods too well known, got very drunk. They were obliged to go on, and in that condition mounted, but some dropped, and others proceeded. His lordship had a clerk, one Lucas, a very drunken fellow, but at that time not far gone. He thought it his duty to have a tender care of his master, who, having had one fall (contrary to the sound advice of his experienced clerk) would needs get up again, calling him all to naught for his pains. His lordship was got upon a very sprightly nag, that trotted on very hard, and Lucas came near to persuade him not to go so fast; but that put the horse upon the run, and away he went with his master full speed, so as none could follow him. The horse, when he found himself clear of pursuers, stopped his course by degrees, and went with his rider (fast asleep upon his back) into a pond to drink; and there sat his lordship upon the sally. But, before he fell, Mr. Andrew Card, now an eminent practicer of conveyancing in Gray's Inn, and then Mr. Coleman's clerk, came up time enough to get the horse out of the pond before he fell off, else he had been lost; for which service his lordship ever had a value for Mr. Card. They took him into a public-house nigh at hand, and left him to the care of his man, but so dead drunk that he knew nothing that happened to him. He was put into a bed, and the rest of the company went on for fear of losing their market. Next morning, when his lordship awaked, he found he was in a strange place, and that, at a fireside in that room, there were some women talking softly (for talk they must); he sent out all his senses to spy, if he could, what the matter was. He could just perceive they talked of him. Then he called for Lucas, and bid all go out of the room but him; and, then, Lucas, said he, where am I? He was glad the danger (of which Lucas gave him a sensible account) was over, and got him up to go after his fellows. I remember, when his lordship told this story of himself, he said the image he had, when his horse first trotted, and so faster and faster, was as if his head knocked against a large sheet of lead, as a ceiling over him; and, after that, he remembered nothing at all of what happened till he awoke."[1]

The amount of the national revenue was very considerably augmented in the course of the present period, partly from certain new modes of taxation being brought into action, partly from the greater productiveness of several of the old sources, although of these some also began to yield less plentiful supplies than formerly, and others were altogether abandoned.

At the accession of James, the most ancient revenue of the crown, that arising from its landed estates, amounted only to £32,000 a-year; but before the end of the reign it rose to about £80,000; and that notwithstanding sales by which was realized no less a sum than £775,000. The annoying and oppressive feudal prerogatives of purveyance, wardship, &c., also still continued to be regularly exercised; and their ordinary produce may be estimated from the offer of the parliament in 1609 to compound with the king for the whole by a yearly allowance of £200,000. In 1609 James raised £21,800 by a tax of 20*s*. on every knight's fee, and on every £20 of annual rent from lands held immediately of the crown, on the occasion of his eldest son, Prince Henry, being made a knight; and in 1612 he obtained, in like manner, £20,500 on the marriage of his daughter Elizabeth to the Elector Palatine—the occasions in question being the last on which these extraordinary aids were ever levied. At the commencement of the reign the customs of tunnage and poundage were as usual granted for the king's life; and, not satisfied with this act of bounty and confidence, James, a few years afterward, proceeded to raise the rates of these duties by his own authority—an exertion of the prerogative, which, although not altogether unprecedented—for both Mary and Elizabeth had done the same thing—occasioned at the time much alarm and outcry, and may be regarded as having had a main share in awakening those feelings of suspicion and alienation which, on the accession of James's son, manifested themselves in the refusal of the parliament to grant the tunnage and poundage for more than a year, and ultimately drove on the two parties from a war of words to a war of swords. When James came to the throne the customs yielded a revenue of £127,000 a-year; in 1613 they produced about £148,000; and at the close of the reign about £190,000. All the parliamentary supplies granted during this reign were nine subsidies and ten fifteenths, a subsidy yielding about £70,000, and a fifteenth about £36,500, so that from this source James scarcely derived, on the whole, £1,100,000, or not quite £50,000 a-year. Eleven subsidies from the clergy at the rate of 4*s*., and one at the rate of 6*s*. in the pound, produced him in all about £250,000 more. Other schemes to which he had recourse for raising a revenue may be classed under the head of irregular, if not illegal, expedients. Titles of nobility were sold for certain specific sums: that of a baron for £10,000, that of a viscount for £20,000, that of an earl for £30,000. About £225,000 in all was obtained by the sale of patents of the new dignity of baronet, instituted in 1611, each baronet paying £1095, under the name of maintenance for thirty foot-soldiers, at the rate of 8*d*. a-day, to assist in the reduction of the province of Ulster in Ireland, and the entire number of creations before the end of the reign being 205. James also made a great deal of money by the sale of patents for monopolies, till the abuse, after having repeatedly excited the indignation of parliament and the public, at last produced the decisive proceedings in 1621 against Sir Giles Mompesson and Sir Thomas Mitchell,[1] and the statute of 1623 (21 Jas. I., c. 3), which declared all monopolies to be contrary to the laws of the realm, and enacted that they should henceforth be utterly void and of none effect. Considerable sums were exacted from the subjects at different times in the course of this reign, under the old false names of loans and benevolences, the so-called lending and voluntary contribution being both alike compulsory. The heavy fines which it was the custom for the Star Chamber and other courts to impose upon delinquents, also yielded something—though not a great deal, if it be true, as is asserted, that fines nominally amounting to £184,000 were actually compounded for about £16,000. To this sum may be added about £4,000, realized from fines for the violation of the several proclamations against additional buildings in and about London. James, finally, received back from France £60,000 of the debt which Henry IV. had incurred to Elizabeth; and he got £250,000 from the Dutch on surrendering to them the cautionary towns of Flushing, Brille, and Ramekins, besides a tribute which they afterward consented to pay for the liberty of fishing on the coasts of Britain. On the whole, according to a published official account, going over the first fourteen years of this reign,[1] James's ordinary income for that period had averaged about £450,000; besides which he had received in the course of the fourteen years about £2,000,000 in extraordinary or occasional payments, making the entire annual revenue of the crown somewhat under £600,000. The expenditure, however, exceeded this sum at first by about £80,000, afterward by between £30,000 and £40,000 a-year; so that by the year 1610 James is said to have incurred a debt of £300,000.

[1] Coke upon Littelton, i. 88

All the supplies granted by the House of Commons to Charles I. in the fifteen years of his reign that elapsed before the meeting of the Long Parliament are calculated to have amounted to no more than about £372,000, to which is to be added about £160,000 from the clergy. The revenue derived from the crown lands, however, probably continued to improve; and it is known that some money was obtained from compositions entered into with holders of parts of the ancient royal domain whose titles were defective. The customs of tunnage and poundage, also, though not sanctioned by parliament, continued to be exacted by Charles as usual; and it is affirmed that the increase of commerce had raised their annual produce, before the breaking out of the civil wars, to £500,000.[2] A sum of 400,000 crowns was obtained from France as the marriage-portion of Henrietta Maria. The ship-money tax, during the four years it was raised after 1635, is calculated to have produced £200,000 a-year; and, besides this, a fleet had been previously raised in 1626, by the exaction of a certain number of ships from each maritime town in the kingdom. Along with the proceeds of the ship-money tax, too, may be reckoned a sum of £30,000, which, by means of the naval armament thus fitted out, the Dutch were for one year compelled to pay for the liberty of fishing in the British seas. But ship-money was only one of many illegal or unconstitutional ways of supplying his exchequer to which Charles had recourse. He derived a regular revenue from compositions for dispensing with the penal laws against the profession of popery. Notwithstanding the late act against monopolies, he kept up the old grievance by issuing numerous exclusive patents under the color of the exception that had been made in the act in favor of new inventions. To such an extent had this practice been carried, that, as already mentioned,[1] he had above thirty patents to recall when he found it necessary to make a show of redressing the grievances of his English subjects on the breaking out of the war with Scotland in 1639. Yet, if we may believe Lord Clarendon, of £200,000 paid for these illegal grants, scarcely £1500 actually reached the royal coffers—a filtration, certainly, thirsty and absorbent beyond any other example in the annals of finance. About £200,000 were raised in 1626, by forced loans; and after the sudden dissolution of the second parliament of the reign in that same year, a supply of four subsidies and three fifteenths, which had been voted by the Commons, but the bill for granting which had never passed into a law, was extorted from the country, under the name of a loan, by every method of oppressive violence. About £100,000 was exacted by reviving and bringing again into action the obsolete law by which all persons having an income of £40 were obliged to receive the expensive honor of knighthood—a law wholly unsuited to the state of society that had now grown up, and only remaining unrepealed because, from having been long allowed to sleep, it had been all but forgotten. The following summary of Charles's other arbitrary measures employed to extort money from his subjects is given by a modern historian of the public revenue: "Large fees were annexed to new-invented offices. Every county was obliged to maintain a muster-master, appointed by the crown for exercising the militia. The vintners were driven, by the terrors of fines and prosecutions, to submit to an illegal imposition upon all the wine they retailed. An ancient duty for furnishing the soldiery with coat-and-conduct money, which had long been abolished, was revived. It was intended to coin base money, and to circulate it by proclamation. Heavy fines were imposed in the Star Chamber and High Commission courts. Sir David Fowles was fined £5000 for dissuading a friend from compounding with the commissioners of knighthood. Thirty thousand pounds were exacted from those who had trespassed upon an obsolete law against converting arable lands into pasture. Encroachments on the king's forests were punished in a similar manner. Proclamations were issued commanding the nobility and gentry to retire to their country seats, and not to spend their time idly in London: if convicted of transgressing this arbitrary regulation, they were severely mulcted by the Star Chamber. It was contended that proclamations had equal authority with laws; and such as ventured to disobey them were heavily fined, and in some instances condemned to the pillory. In short, more tyrannical steps would hardly be taken by the greatest despot on earth."[1] It was calculated that, from 1637 to 1641 inclusive, Charles's entire annual revenue had amounted, on an average, to not less than £895,000, of which about £210,000 arose from ship-money and other illegal exactions.

After the dispute between the king and the parliament came to a contest of arms, both parties of course sought to raise money for carrying on the war by any means that could be made available. Besides what he received from the private contributions of his adherents, and from pawning the jewels of the crown, Charles made use of his military power in levying assessments in those parts of the country where his authority was established. The financial operations on the other side, however, were on a much more extensive scale. The Long Parliament began by voting supplies of six subsidies and a poll-tax (estimated as equivalent, in all, to twelve subsidies, or about £600,000), the produce of which, though nominally granted, after the usual form, to the crown, was paid into the hands of a board of parliamentary commissioners, by whom it was actually in great part expended in the support of the war against the royal cause. Large sums were also obtained from the voluntary contributions of the people, who eagerly brought in both money and plate, and every article, down to the thimbles and bodkins of the women, that could be melted and turned into coin.[2] All persons, indeed, were called upon to furnish what aid they could in money, in men, in horses, in arms, in victuals, and other warlike stores, to the public necessities, on a pledge that the value should be repaid to them on the restoration of peace, and that the debt should in the mean time bear an interest of eight per cent. These first voluntary contributions, and those that were some time after raised for the relief of the Irish Protestants, are estimated to have amounted to about £480,000. Recourse, however, was soon had, when it became evident that the war would not be brought to an end in a single campaign, to a regular system of taxation, which, under the name of monthly assessment for the maintenance of the army, produced alone a much larger revenue than had ever before been collected in the kingdom from all other sources together. This assessment varied from about £35,000 to £120,000 per week in the first year of the war; it was continued under the name of a land-tax throughout the protectorate, and its entire produce in the nineteen years from November, 1640, to November, 1659, is stated to have been not less than £32,172,321. Another new species of tax, first imposed in 1643, under the name of the excise, being originally a duty upon beer, ale, wine, tobacco, raisins, sugar, and a few other articles of luxury, to which, however, were afterward added bread, meat, salt, and other necessaries, is calculated to have produced £500,000 a-year. The tunnage and poundage duties, together with other customs upon the export and import of commodities, yielded probably nearly as much. A tax of 4*s.* a chaldron upon all coals that left the port of Newcastle brought in about £50,000 a-year. From the post-office, first established in 1635, about £10,000 a-year was derived. A singular impost, called the weekly meal, being the price of a meal a-week, which every person was commanded to pay into the treasury, produced £608,400 in the six years during which it was exacted. The profits, also, of wardship and all the other feudal prerogatives of the crown, with the exception only of purveyance, which was given up, continued to be rigorously exacted until the courts of wards and liveries were abolished by the Rump Parliament, in 1656. To these and a few other regular sources of revenue are to be added various occasional supplies, of which the principal were £1,850,000 from the sale of the crown lands, houses, and forests; about £3,500,000 from the sequestration for four years of the revenues of the bishops, deans, and inferior clergy; above £10,000,000, it is said, but surely with much exaggeration, from the subsequent sale of church-lands; £850.000 from the incomes of offices sequestered for the public service; above £4,500,000 from sequestrations of, or compositions for, the estates of private individuals in England; £1,000,000 from compositions with delinquents in Ireland; about £3,500,000 from the sale of forfeited estates in England and Ireland; beside other large sums derived from compulsory loans, the decimation tax, or tenth penny, exacted from all malignants, as they were called, by Cromwell's major-generals, and the military plunder of the royalists. In all these various ways the parliament is asserted, but the account is drawn up by the opposite party, and may be strongly suspected of great exaggeration, to have, in the course of the nineteen years, drawn from the people the vast amount, for that time, of above £83,000,000, being at the rate of nearly £4.400,000 per annum.[1] Of this, however, only a part went to defray the proper expenses of the state. Cromwell's income is stated to have been about £1,500,000 from England, £143,000 from Scotland, and £208,000 from Ireland, making in all an annual revenue of nearly £1,900,000. An extraordinary expenditure was, of course, incurred so long as the war lasted; but neither the cost nor the waste of that state of things is supposed to have swallowed up the larger portion of the large sums that came into the hands of the government. If we may believe the representations both of the royalists and of the Presbyterians, the parliament itself was the great deep into which the ever-flowing stream of confiscation and plunder chiefly poured itself. There may be some tendency to overstatement in these allegations of partisans bitterly hostile to those whom they accuse, and themselves excluded by circumstances from all share in the good fortune which they affirm their enemies to have enjoyed; but what they say is very probably, to a considerable extent, true. When the parliament became the dominant, or rather sole, authority in the state, the members voted wages to themselves, at the rate of £4 a-week for each, to be paid out of the public revenue; and it is affirmed that they afterward came to distribute among themselves about £300,000 a-year under this name. Large sums of money, lucrative offices, and valuable estates were also bestowed upon many of the leading members. According to Walker, the Presbyterian historian, Lenthall, the speaker, held offices which yielded him between £7000 and £8000 a-year; Bradshaw had the royal palace of Eltham and an estate worth £1000 a-year for the part he took in the trial of the king; and a sum of very nearly £800,000 was publicly expended in other free gifts to the saints.[1] There can be no doubt, also, that much peculation was practiced by many members of the various parliamentary committees, which, with scarcely any real responsibility, were appointed to manage the different branches of the public revenue; and, indeed, in a time of such confusion and dislocation of the whole frame of government it was impossible that advantage should not often have been taken by private individuals of the public calamities.

CHAPTER IV.

HISTORY OF THE NATIONAL INDUSTRY.

THE most authentic and comprehensive account we have of the foreign commerce of England at the commencement of the present period is contained in a discourse or essay, drawn up by Sir Walter Raleigh, and originally presented by him, in manuscript, to James I. soon after his accession.[1] The main object of this small treatise is to point out the circumstances to which the Dutch owed their commercial superiority, and to urge upon the English government the adoption of the same methods; but in pursuing this argument the author takes occasion to give a very full and minute delineation of the trade carried on by each country in all its branches. Some little allowance is perhaps to be made here and there for the bias of a mind occupied with and pleading for a particular object; but in general there is no reason to suppose that Raleigh's statements, the substance of which, in so far as they relate to his own country, we shall now proceed to extract and condense, are, to any material extent, overcharged.

[1] Observations concerning the Trade and Commerce of England with the Dutch and other Foreign Nations.

The ordinary trade carried on at this time by the Dutch with England employed not fewer than five or six hundred Dutch ships, but not a tenth of that number of English. But, besides, whenever there was in England a dearth of wine, fish, or corn, it was the custom of the Dutch immediately to load fifty or a hundred vessels with the particular commodity in request, and to dispatch them to all the ports of this kingdom, to reap the harvest of the high prices. In a recent dearth of corn Raleigh affirms that the merchants of Embden, Hamburgh, and Holland had in this way carried away, in a year and a half, from the ports of Southampton, Exeter, and Bristol alone, nearly £200,000: and he thinks that, from the whole of the kingdom, they could not have obtained less than ten times that sum. The practice of these thoroughly commercial states was to monopolize, as far as they could, the transport of the produce of all other countries—of Turkey and the East and West Indies, as well as of France, Spain, Portugal, and Italy; and, carrying this merchandise to Denmark, Sweden, Poland, and other northern parts, to bring back thence corn and other bulky commodities, which they stored up to supply the wants of England and the rest of the world. Amsterdam was never without a store of 700,000 quarters of corn, none of it of home growth; and it was remarked that a dearth of one year in England, France, Spain, Portugal, or Italy sufficed to enrich Holland for seven years after. Raleigh contends, nevertheless, that, if the proper methods were taken, England was much better situated than Holland for a general storehouse.

He next proceeds to compare the trade in fish of the Low Countries and the adjacent petty states with that carried on by England. The most productive fisheries in the world were upon the coasts of the British islands; yet at this time, while the Hollanders sent to the four great towns on the Baltic, Koningsberg, Elbing, Stettin, and Dantzic, £620,000 worth of herrings every year, England exported to those places none at all; nor any to Denmark, Norway, Sweden, and the ports of Riga, Revel, Narva, and other parts of Livonia, to which the Dutch sent yearly to the value of £170,000; and scarcely £500 worth to Russia, to which the Dutch sent £27,000 worth; and none at all to Staden, Hamburgh, Bremen, and Embden, to which the Dutch sent, of herrings and other fish, to the annual value of £100,000; nor any up the Rhine to Germany, the people of which bought, every year, £440,000 worth of herrings and other fish from the Dutch; nor any up the Meuse to Maestricht, Liege, &c., to which places the Dutch sold herrings every year to the value of £140,000; nor any to Guelderland, Flanders, and up the Scheldt, all over the dominions of the Archduke of Austria, in which direction the Dutch sent annually £162,000 worth; and not £2000 worth to France, which took £100,000 worth from the Dutch. In short, while, according to this account, the trade of the Dutch in fish brought them in annually not much under £2,000,000, the English could hardly be said to have any trade in that article at all—except only, Raleigh omits to notice, to the countries washed by the Mediterranean—the great Catholic and fish-eating countries of Spain and Italy; but thither, also, the Dutch, he tells us, sent large quantities, although he does not specify to what exact amount.

In other important branches of trade the case was nearly the same. The Dutch sent nearly a thousand ships every year to the countries in the northeast of Europe with wine and salt, both chiefly obtained from France and Spain; England, with equal natural advantages, had not one ship employed in that trade. The timber trade of the Dutch, whose own country grew no wood, employed five or six hundred great ships; the English, with the same access as they had to the forests within the Baltic, neither exported nor imported a single cargo. Even the wool, cloth, lead, tin, and other native products of England were far from being turned to so much account as they might have been. As yet all the woolen cloth that went abroad was exported both undressed and undyed. About 80,000 pieces of woolen cloth were annually sent to foreign countries in that state, the dyeing and dressing of which, as Raleigh calculates, was a yearly gain to the foreigner of £400,000, besides about 150,000 northern and Devonshire kerseys and bayes (baize), the coloring of which would come to £100,000 a-year more. These latter were dressed and dyed at Amsterdam, and then shipped for Spain, Portugal, and other countries, where they were sold under the name of Flemish bayes. Nor were our exports of all descriptions of native produce of any considerable amount in comparison with those of the Dutch. To Prussia and the other countries in the northeast of Europe, for example, the Dutch sent every year nearly three thousand ships, which found their way into every port town: we sent out in the same direction only about a hundred, the merchandise carried by which was chiefly disposed of in the three towns of Elbing, Koningsberg, and Dantzic. No English ships carried any of the commodities of those countries to France, Spain, Portugal, or Italy, which two thousand Dutch merchantmen were constantly employed in supplying with them. In general the foreign trade of England for some years past had been decaying rather than extending. For seventy years a very considerable trade had been carried on with Russia: down to about the year 1590, store of goodly ships were wont to sail annually to that country; but, in 1600, only four had been sent out, and in 1602 only two or three; whereas the Russian trade of the Dutch had now come to employ from thirty to forty ships, each as large as two of the English, and all chiefly laden with English cloth, herrings taken in the British seas, English lead, and pewter made of English tin. To the isle of Wardhuus, on the coast of Finmark, eight or nine great ships used constantly to go to the fishing from England; in this year, 1603, only one had gone. Those native commodities, besides, that were sent from England to foreign countries were in by far the greater part exported in foreign bottoms.

Raleigh's essay probably attracted very little regard from James or his ministers at this time; but some attempts seem to have been made a few years afterward to carry certain of his recommendations into effect. Nevertheless English commerce continued in a languishing state during the whole of this reign; no really important measures were taken for its revival and encouragement; on the contrary, the very evil which Raleigh had most deprecated—the burdensome amount of the customs—was, in the penury and short-sightedness of the government, augmented instead of being alleviated. One or two new trading companies were, however, incorporated; and the colonization of different parts of America, which was more or less successfully proceeded with by the enterprise of private individuals, if it produced scarcely any results for the present, was laying an ample foundation of commercial as of all other greatness for a future age.

Captain James Lancaster, who had sailed from England in April, 1601, in charge of the first adventure of the newly-established East India Company,[1] made his reappearance in the Downs, with the two largest of his four ships full laden with pepper, on the 11th of September, 1603, having previously sent home the other two with cargoes composed partly of pepper, cloves, and cinnamon, partly of calicoes and other Indian manufactures taken out of a Portuguese carrack which Lancaster had fallen in with and captured. The admiral, as he was called, had been well received by the King of Acheen, in Sumatra, who had concluded a commercial treaty with him, and granted all the privileges that were asked; but the great length of time, nearly two years and a half, that the adventure had occupied, and still more the obstructions of various sorts which kept the goods from being all disposed of, and the accounts finally wound up, for about six years longer, prevented the company from deriving either much ultimate profit or any immediate encouragement from this first attempt. Additional capital, however, having been, though with difficulty, raised, the same four ships were again sent out in March, 1604, under the command of Sir Henry Middleton, who did not return till May, 1606, and then only with three of his ships, laden with pepper, cloves, mace, and nutmegs, the fourth having been lost on the homeward voyage. In the mean time a license in direct violation of the company's charter had been granted by the king to Sir Edward Michelborne and others, allowing them to send out ships to trade with Cathaya, China, Japan, Corea, Cambaya, and any other countries in the same quarter of the globe not already frequented by the English; and Michelborne had actually sailed for China in December, 1604, and, although he did not succeed in reaching that country, had made his way as far as to the Oriental Archipelago, whence he returned to England in July, 1606, bringing with him little else than the plunder of some small Indian and Chinese vessels, which he had attacked with no more regard either to the right of other nations or the character of his own than if he had been a common pirate. Disgusted by this ill usage on the part of the government, in addition to the disappointment of their hopes of large and speedy returns from the subscriptions they had already risked, and influenced also somewhat by the popular outcry that was raised about the impolitic and destructive nature of the new trade, which, it was affirmed, besides occasioning an unusual mortality of the seamen, would, if persisted in, prove a wasteful drain both upon the treasure and the marine of the country, most of the members of the company were now inclined to put up with their losses and to have nothing more to do with the business. The spirit of others, however, still clung to the hope of better success; and a new subscription having been opened, three more ships were sent out in March and April, 1607, and two more in March the following year. Neither of these attempt was very fortunate: the two vessels that sailed last, indeed, were both lost at sea, although the crews and a small part of the cargo of one of them were saved; but a single ship, the Expedition, which sailed in April, 1609, under the command of Captain David Middleton, brought home, about two years after, so valuable a cargo of nutmegs and mace as to produce a dividend of 211 per cent. Meanwhile a new charter, dated May 31, 1609, had been obtained by the company, by which their privilege of exclusive trade, originally granted for fifteen years, was made perpetual, a power, however, being reserved by the government of dissolving them at any time on three years' notice. They now built the largest ship that had ever been constructed in England for the merchant service, some accounts making her burden to have been a thousand, others eleven or twelve hundred tuns; and after the king, with a numerous attendance of the nobility, had witnessed the lanch of this portly argosy, which his majesty named the Trade's Increase, and been entertained on board with a magnificent banquet served in dishes of China ware, then quite new in England, it was put, along with two other vessels, under the command of Sir Henry Middleton, who set sail with his little fleet for the Red Sea in the spring of 1610. Neither Middleton nor his good ship, the Increase, ever saw England again; the ship was lost in Bantam Road, in 1603, and Sir Henry soon after died of grief; but the other two vessels, which returned home toward the end of the following year brought such productive cargoes as afforded the partners a dividend of above 121 per cent. Another adventure in a single ship, which sailed from Gravesend in January, 1611, and returned to England in the summer of 1615, produced the still larger profit of 218 per cent. upon the capital invested; and another with three ships, which were sent out in April, 1611, and returned in September, 1614, was very nearly as successful. Another voyage, reckoned the ninth, brought a profit of 160 per cent. after three years and a half; a tenth, in about two years and a half, 148 per cent.; an eleventh, in twenty months, about 340 per cent.; and a twelfth about 134 per cent., in a year and a half. Each of these adventures, it is to be observed, had, in so far as regarded the pecuniary results, been the separate concern of the individual members who chose to engage in it; but the commanders in general appear, nevertheless, to have considered themselves in all other respects as the representatives of the company in its corporate capacity, or even in some sort of the nation, and, as such, to have freely, whenever occasion or opportunity offered, both entered into treaties with the native powers, and employed arms, defensively or offensively, against the Dutch, the Portuguese, the Turks, or whatever other foreigners the rivalries of trade brought them into collision with. Both the Portuguese, who had been long established in India, and the Dutch, who had more recently entered into the trade, early began to employ force as well as intrigue against the new-comers; but hitherto with little effect. In spite of all their endeavors, Captain Best, who conducted what is called the tenth voyage, succeeded in 1613, in obtaining a firman, or charter, from the Great Mogul, allowing the company to establish a factory at Surat, granting them the privilege of introducing their merchandise at a certain fixed rate of duties, and engaging to protect both their trade and the persons and property of those engaged in it from the hostility of the Portuguese and all others. And the same year Captain Saris, who had gone out with the eighth adventure, obtained from the Emperor of Japan equally ample privileges for his dominions. It was now resolved that all future voyages should be on account of the company as one united body. The first fleet, accordingly, fitted out upon this new scheme, sailed under the command of Captain Downton, in March, 1614: it consisted only of four ships; but with this small force Downton was fortunate enough to repel a formidable attack of the Portuguese, with whom, on his arrival in the country, he found the Mogul at war, a victory which proved of the greatest service, not only in attaching that monarch to the interests of the company, but in exalting the English name and character in the opinion of the people of all northern and central India. The favorable impression thus made was judiciously followed up by the dispatch in January, 1615, along with another small fleet, of Sir Thomas Roe in the quality of ambassador to the Indian emperor from the King of England, and by the successful exertions of that envoy, who continued to reside at the Mogul's court till the year 1619, and was enabled to obtain various important extensions of the privileges formerly granted to the company. The company now possessed factories, not only at Acheen, Zambee, and Tecoa, in Sumatra; at Surat, Amadavad, Agra, Azmere, or Agimere, and Burampore, in the dominions of the Mogul; and at Firando in Japan; but also at Bantam, Jacatra (the present Batavia), and Japara, in Java; at Benjarmassing and Socodania in Borneo, at Banda in the Banda Islands, at Patan in Malacca, at Macassar in the Isle of Celebes, at Siam in the kingdom of that name, at Masulipatam and Petapoli on the Coromandel coast, and at Calicut on the coast of Malabar. In so prosperous a state, also, were their concerns believed to be about this time that, in 1617, their stock was currently sold at 203 per cent. The disputes with the Dutch, however, now grew to such a height as greatly to embarrass the trade. Commissioners were actually appointed by the governments of the two countries to endeavor to bring about an amicable arrangement; and the Dutch proposed that the English East India Company and theirs should carry on the trade as a joint concern, a plan which, it was urged, would enable them effectually to subdue their common enemy the Portuguese, and to exclude all other nations from getting any footing in India; but this idea came to nothing. At length, in July, 1619, a treaty was concluded at London by eighteen English commissioners and ten deputies from the States-General, by which it was agreed that the two companies should continue to carry on the trade separately, but upon the principle of each sharing in the different branches of it in certain specified proportions, under the superintendence of what was called a Council of Defense, to be composed of four of the principal servants of each company resident in the country. This agreement was to continue in force for twenty years; but did not last half as many months. The intelligence that it had been concluded was received with great rejoicings in India, in April, 1620; and, in December of that same year, the Dutch governor-general suddenly attacked and took possession of the islands of Lantore and Pulo Roon, the dominion of which was claimed by the English, thus recommencing hostilities by the most decided act of aggression that had yet been committed on either side. This was followed, in February, 1623, by the much more atrocious affair of the massacre at Amboyna, and the subsequent expulsion of the English company's people by their late associates, but now declared enemies, out of all the other Spice Islands.[1] A long course of hostilities, into the detail of which we can not enter, took place between the two nations, the effects of which were so disastrous to the interests of the English company, that, notwithstanding a valuable establishment they had gained, in 1622, in the Persian Gulf, by the capture, in conjunction with the forces of the Shah of Persia, of the Island of Ormus from the Portuguese, they found themselves, two or three years later, in debt to the amount of £200,000, and, about the close of the reign of James, were seriously thinking of disposing of whatever they possessed in India, and relinquishing the trade. They had, before this, abandoned their factory in Japan, notwithstanding the concession to them, by the emperor, in 1616, of a second and still more liberal charter; and they had also withdrawn from a field of enterprise upon which they had somewhat strangely entered a few years before —the Greenland whale fishery—after attempting it first by themselves, and then, with no better success, in conjunction with the Russian Company. They had, in 1616, in the height of their reputed prosperity, raised a new stock of £1,629,040, which was eagerly subscribed by nine hundred and fifty four individuals, including fifteen dukes and earls, thirteen countesses and other titled ladies, eighty-two knights, judges, and privy councilors, eighteen widows and maiden ladies, and twenty-six clergymen and physicians, besides mercantile men and others. Now, when a further subscription was proposed, it was found that the money could not be obtained; and the stock, which in 1617, sold at 203 per cent., had now fallen to considerably less than the half of that price.[2]

The operations of the other incorporated trading companies in this reign demand little notice. In 1605 James granted a perpetual charter to a new company, that of "the Merchants of England trading to the Levant Seas," which still subsists, and is popularly known under the name of the Levant or Turkey Company. By means of this company, the plan of which was that every member should trade on his own account, but according to regulations settled by the general court, considerable quantities of English woolen manufactures, and, at a later date, of watches, jewelry, and other descriptions of merchandise, were exported to Constantinople and the adjacent parts of the East, the supply of which with European commodities used formerly to be entirely in the hands of the Venetians. It is said that the ordinary returns of the Levant Company were at first three to one upon the investments. The year after the incorporation of the Levant Company an English minister was, for the first time, appointed to reside in the dominions of the Grand Seignior, and authority was given to him to nominate consuls for the superintendence of the trade and the good government of the English merchants in the several ports. For some time the Turkish trade seems to have been one of the most flourishing branches of our foreign commerce. In a treatise published in 1621 it is asserted that, of all Europe, England then drove the most profitable trade to Turkey by reason of the vast quantities of broadcloth, tin, &c., which were exported thither. The profitableness of the English trade with Turkey, however, in this writer's notion, lay mainly in the circumstance that our exports were sufficient to pay for our imports—the latter consisting chiefly of "three hundred great bales of Persian silk yearly"—"whereas," he adds, "a balance in money is paid by the other nations trading thither. Marseilles sends yearly to Aleppo and Alexandria at least £500,000, and little or no wares. Venice sends about £400,000 yearly in money, and a great value in wares besides. The Low Countries send about £50,000, and but little wares; and Messina £25,000 in ready money. Besides great quantities of gold and dollars from Germany, Poland, Hungary, &c. And all these nations take of the Turks, in return, great quantities of camblets, grograms, raw silk, cotton wool and yarn, galls, flax, hemp, rice, hides, sheep's wool, wax, corn, &c."[1] If those other nations, however, got their money's worth for their money, which no doubt they did, they were quite as well off as the English, who of course got no more than the worth of their produce or manufactures. It might be as great an accommodation to the Venetians, Hollanders, &c., to have the Turks to take off their gold and silver as it was to the English to have the Turks to take off their broadcloths and tin. Of all superfluities a superfluity of the precious metals would be about the most useless; produce, manufactures, goods of any other kind that could not be disposed of abroad, might be turned to some account at home; gold and silver would not be so valuable as iron, or lead, or clay, if they could not be employed for purposes of exchange. The English, therefore, in sending to the Turks their broadcloths and tin, gave away that which if kept at home would have had a value in all circumstances, even if all commercial intercourse between nations had come to a stand-still: the money with which the Dutch, and Venetians, and Germans paid for their silks and other Turkish merchandise would not in that case have been worth the cost of warehousing it. And, in any circumstances, these nations must have found it more convenient to pay for what they got from the Turks in gold and silver than in other exports, else they would not have done so; the Turks would have taken their cloths and other descriptions of manufactures or produce as willingly as they took those of the English. But they found it more profitable to carry on their dealings of that kind with other customers—to exchange their goods for the money of the English, and then, with that money in their hands, to go to make their purchases from the [1] Munn's Discourse of Trade from England to East India, p. 17. Munn, who has developed his views more at large in his work entitled "England's Treasure by Foreign Trade," was one of the ablest as well as earliest systematic defenders of what has since been called the Mercantile Theory of Trade.

Turks. What would they have made by keeping the money and exporting goods to Turkey instead? On the other hand, if the English had had money wherewith to make their purchases from the Turks, it is unquestionable that they would have found that the most profitable way of dealing. Whatever the theorists of the mercantile system may say, the last thing, we may be sure, that any nation will really keep at home, when it has an opportunity of sending it abroad, is its gold and silver. Money is at once the most effective and economical instrument of exchange, and the most useless of all things when not so employed. The mercantile system rests upon the notion that a country never can have too much money; whereas the truth is, money is almost the only thing of which more than a certain quantity permanently confined within a country would really be of no use. If a country has as much of every thing else as it wants, it will always have as much money as it wants; its stock of money, or representative wealth, will always be proportioned to its stock of other and more real wealth; and no mode of carrying on trade with another country, or with all other countries—in other words, no state, favorable or unfavorable, to use the established expressions of what is called the balance of trade—can in the least affect the matter. In fact, this same balance of trade, about which so much anxious calculation has been expended, is in every view the most purely insignificant thing in the whole world; it is of no more consequence than the balance between the numbers of the light-colored and dark-colored ships that may have been employed in any particular trade, or of the light-complexioned and dark-complexioned sailors by which they may have been manned. It is evident that no country can have its general balance of trade permanently or for any long course of years either favorable or unfavorable; either supposition implies that which is impossible. The result of a permanently favorable balance would be such a constant accumulation of the precious metals in the country as would be only burdensome if it could take place, but, at the same time, really could no more happen than a constant accumulation of water upon a particular spot in a plain. A permanently or long-continued unfavorable state of the balances, again, is only another expression for the case of a country which should be continually exporting more gold and silver than it imported, a thing possible only for a country of which the precious metals were among the native products. The wealth of a country, indeed, may increase or may diminish; but its stock of money and its stock of other wealth will increase or will diminish together; and the growth or decline of both will not at all depend upon, or be indicated by, any thing like what has been called the balance of trade—that is, the proportion in which the goods obtained from other countries are paid for by money or by other goods—but will be occasioned solely by the increasing or diminishing productiveness, as circumstances may vary, of its natural resources and advantages, and of the labor and ingenuity of its inhabitants. The balance of trade may in all cases, with perfect safety, be left to regulate itself; whatever may happen with other things, that can never be wrong.

In 1604, and again in 1617, the Company of Merchant Adventurers obtained new charters from James, confirming all their former exclusive privileges of exporting the woolen manufactures of England to the Netherlands and Germany, with the reservation only of the right of trading within the same limits to the mayor, constables, and fellowship of the Merchants of the Staple—an exception which is said to have soon proved wholly illusory, under the extending influence of the more recent association, who gradually compelled all persons engaged in this trade to submit to their regulations. In fact, the Company of Merchant Adventurers came to comprehend the whole body of English merchants trading to the Low Countries and Germany, a body which, in the latter part of the reign of James, is stated to have comprehended about 4000 individuals. There appear, also, to have been local companies of merchant adventurers established in some of the great towns. Thus an act of parliament of the year 1606 confirms a charter that had been granted nearly half a century before by Elizabeth, giving to a company of that name, of the city of Exeter, the exclusive privilege, in reference to their fellow-citizens, of trading with the dominions of the King of France. Another statute of the same session created a still more comprehensive monopoly in favor of the corporation of the town of Southampton, which was empowered to exclude all persons except its own freemen, and the barons and freemen of the Cinque Ports, from buying or selling any thing whatever as merchants within that town. Such restrictions were still generally thought to be necessary or serviceable to the interests of trade, and not injurious to those of the public.

Much more pernicious, however, in their effects, as well as more illegal, or at least unconstitutional, in their origin, than these local and statutory grants, were many patents for the exclusive sale or manufacture of particular commodities, which James took upon him to issue, by his mere prerogative, to persons who purchased from him such licenses to pillage the rest of his subjects. The number of these monopolies, it may be remembered, had been made matter of strong complaint by the House of Commons, toward the close of the preceding reign, and Elizabeth had thereupon issued a proclamation annulling all those then existing.[1] But James was not to be restrained by this concession of his predecessor from the exercise of what he held to be an undoubted part of his prerogative; he soon created so many new monopolies that the public clamor became louder than ever, till at last, in 1609, he deemed it prudent to follow Elizabeth's example by again proclaiming a general revocation.

Nevertheless, after the suspension of parliamentary government in 1614, this evil, with many others, soon grew up again in all its old rankness; so that when circumstances at length compelled the calling of a parliament once more in 1621, the oppression of monopolies, as we have seen,[1] formed a principal head in the catalogue of the national grievances which the Commons immediately proceeded to redress. At a conference with the Lords, they offered to prove, Rushworth tells us, "that the patents of gold and silver thread, of inns and alehouses and of power to compound for obsolete laws, of the price of horse-meat, starch, cords, tobacco-pipes, salt, train-oil, and the rest, were all illegal; howbeit they touched not the tender point of prerogative, but, in restoring the subjects' liberty, were careful to preserve the king's honor."[2] James, it should appear, on this occasion professed to have been entirely ignorant, until informed by his faithful Commons, of the abuses alledged to have taken place; and it was contrived that the whole blame as well as punishment should fall upon the patentees, on the pretense that they had exceeded their privileges, and on certain of the officers of state concerned in the granting of the patents, on the somewhat contradictory pretense that they had not been sufficiently careful in limiting the terms of these grants so as to guard them against being abused. "I do assure you," said his majesty, in a speech which he came down and made to the Lords while the inquiry was going on, "I do assure you, in the heart of an honest man, and by the faith of a Christian king, which both ye and all the world know me to be, had these things been complained of to me before the parliament I would have done the office of a just king, and out of parliament have punished them as severely, and peradventure more, than ye now intend to do. But now that they are discovered to me in parliament, I shall be as ready in this way as I should have been in the other; for I confess I am ashamed, these things proving so as they are generally reported to be, that it was not my good fortune to be the only author of the reformation and punishment of them by some ordinary course of justice." "Three patents at this time," he went on to say, "have been complained of and thought great grievances: 1. That of the inns and hostelries. 2. That of ale-houses. 3. That of gold and silver thread. My purpose is to strike them all dead; and, that time may not be lost, I will have it done presently. That concerning ale-houses I would have to be left to the managing of justices of the peace as before. That of gold and silver thread was most vilely executed, both for wrong done to men's persons, as also for abuse of the stuff, for it was a kind of false coin. I have already freed the persons that were in prison; I will now also damn the patent, and this may seem instead of a pardon. All these three I will have recalled by proclamation, and wish you to advise of the fittest form to that purpose."[3] In the course of the debates upon the subject in the Commons, Mr. (afterward Sergeant) Noy explained the manner in which these patents were applied for and obtained. "Before any patent is passed," said the learned member, "there is first a petition to his majesty, showing what good will accrue to the commonwealth by granting of the same, and what increase of benefit to the king, and what abuses for want of such a remedy as they propound do abound; whereon the king ever referreth the petition to some whom his majesty thinketh fittest to consider of the petition, both for matter of law, convenience, and good of the state and commonwealth; and thereupon the referees are to certify his majesty the truth of what they think of the petition; and, as they certify for the lawfulness and conveniency and good both of his majesty and his estate, and the particular good of the commonwealth, his majesty accordingly granteth it."[1] With all this show, however, of regard for the public good, no doubt can be entertained for a moment, from the character of these old monopolies, that the only thing that was really looked to in the bargain between the crown and the applicant was the amount of the sum of money the latter was inclined to offer for the patent; if that was sufficiently large, the recommendation of the referees, we may safely presume, was in general a matter of course. It is highly probable, indeed, that they expected and received, in all cases, a bribe for themselves as well as for their royal master. Nobody at this time, however, went the length of maintaining that the right of granting such patents, if properly exercised, was not, at least within certain limits, a prerogative of the crown. Those of the existing monopolies that were attacked were objected to principally on the ground that they were prejudicial to the public interest, either in their very nature or because the patentee had abused the powers intrusted to him by the royal grant. "There are some patents," Noy proceeded to observe, "that in themselves are good and lawful, but abused by the patentees in the execution of them, who perform not the trust reposed in them by his majesty; and of such a kind is the patent for inns; but those that have the execution abuse it by setting up inns in forests and and by-villages, only to harbor rogues and thieves, and such as the justices of peace of the shire, who best know where inns are fittest to be, and who best deserve to have licenses for them, have suppressed from keeping of ale-houses; for none is now refused that will make a good composition. There are also some who have gotten a power to dispense with the statute of vagabonds, rogues, &c., and so make themselves dispensers of the royalties only proper for the king himself. The like patent is granted for tolls, leets, warrens, markets, &c., and they set up bills of it on posts, like new physicians that are new come to town, making merchandises of it." Even Sir Edward Coke, who declared that monopolies were now grown like hydras' heads—they grew up as fast as they were cut off—admitted, that while some patents were against the law, and others neither good in law nor execution, others were good in law and only ill in execution. The patent for inns, in particular, he allowed to be good in law. "He showed," says the report of his speech, in conclusion, "that all the kings, from Edward III. to this king, have granted monopolies; and even in

Queen Elizabeth's time there were some granted. Sir Richard Mompesson (perhaps the father of Sir Giles Mompesson, whose conduct as one of the patentees of inns and of gold and silver thread was now in question) and one Robert Alexander procured of Queen Elizabeth a patent for the sole transporting of anise-seed. Monopolies have been granted heretofore de vento et sole; that in Devonshire and Cornwall a patent was granted that none should dry pilchards but those patentees."[1] Another member, Mr. Alford, described the way in which the monopoly of inns operated. "Every poor man," said he, "that taketh in but a horse on a market-day, is presently sent for up to Westminster and sued, unless he compound with these patentees; and all ancient inn-keepers, if they will not compound, are presently sued at Westminster for enlargement of their house, if they but set up a new post or a little hovel more than of ancient was there. And instead of reformation of abuses, this patent doth but raise reckonings on the poor traveler; and instead of restraining the number of inn-keepers, at Bath, where there were wont to be but six, and the town desired Sir Giles Mompesson there might not be more, yet he increased them gradatim from six to twenty inn-keepers." When he found that the storm could not be resisted, James himself was as ready with his virtuous indignation against all these abuses as any one else: in his speech to the Lords, to which we have already referred, he told them that nothing would be a greater ease to him, and to all about him at court, than some measure that would put an end forever to the annoyance and pest of applications for the said patents. Even the stir that had already been made, he intimated, had materially contributed to his and their repose; "for I remember," said his majesty, "that, since the beginning of this parliament, Buckingham hath told me he never found such quiet and rest as in this time of parliament from projectors and informers, who at other times miserably vexed him at all hours." And then he lanched out in the following characteristic strain:—"And now I confess that when I looked before upon the face of the government, I thought, as every man would have done, that the people were never so happy as in my time. For, even as at divers times I have looked upon many of my coppices, riding about them, and they appeared on the outside very thick and well grown unto me; but when I turned unto the midst of them, I found them all bitter within, and full of plains and bare spots—like an apple or pear, fair and smooth without, but when you cleave it asunder, you find it rotten at the heart. Even so, this kingdom, the external government being as good as ever it was, and, I am sure, as learned judges as ever it had, and, I hope, as honest administering justice within it, and for peace both at home and abroad, I may truly say, more settled and longer lasting than ever any before, together with as great plenty as ever; so it was to be thought that every man might sit in safety under his own vine and fig-tree. Yet I am ashamed, and it makes my hair stand upright, to consider how in this time my people have been vexed and polled by the vile execution of projects, patents, bills of conformity, and such like, which, besides the trouble of my people, have more exhausted their purses than subsidies would have done." The sudden dissolution of this parliament, however, prevented any thing being done to put an effectual stop to the evil; and it was not till three years afterward, by which time several new patents of an equally objectionable kind with those here so warmly condemned had been extorted from his majesty's necessities or good-nature, that the act was passed declaring all monopolies, and all commissions, grants, &c., to any person or persons for the sole buying, selling, making, working, or using of any thing within the realm, except in the case of new inventions, to be altogether contrary to the laws of the realm, and so to be utterly void and of none effect, and in nowise to be put in use or execution.[1] Tacked to this general enactment, however, were provisoes barring its operation in the case of various existing patents and of any others that might be afterward granted of the same kind, namely, patents concerning printing, the digging or compounding of saltpeter or gunpowder, the casting or making of ordnance or shot, the compounding or making of alum, the licensing of taverns and retailing of wines. Four existing patents, for making of glass, for the exportation of calves' skins, for the making of smalt, and for the melting of iron ore, were also specially excepted from the operation of the act.

We will now add a few notices respecting the state of some particular branches of trade in this reign. One of the fields of enterprise that attracted most attention was that of the northern fisheries. Besides whales, the frequenters of the Greenland coasts now began to kill morses, or sea-horses, whose teeth were then esteemed more valuable than ivory. The fishery was at first prosecuted by individual adventurers; but at length the Russia Company having entered into the business, obtained, in 1613, a charter from James, excluding all other persons from sailing to Spitzbergen; acting upon which, they that year fitted out seven armed ships, with which they drove away from those seas four English fishing-vessels, and fifteen sail of Dutch, French, and Biscayans, and forced some other French ships, which they permitted to remain, to pay them tribute for their forbearance. The next year the company sent out thirteen ships; but the Dutch now had taken care to be provided for them, and, appearing with eighteen vessels, four of which were men-of-war, set them at defiance, and remained and fished at their ease, as usual. In 1615 a new claim to the dominion of Spitzbergen and the surrounding waters was preferred by the Danes, who made their appearance with three ships of war, being the first Danish vessels that had ever been seen in that quarter, and demanded tribute or toll both from the Dutch and the English, who were, however, too strong for them to succeed in enforcing their claim. We have already mentioned the junction of the Russia and East India companies for the prosecution of the Greenland fishery. It is said to be in 1617 that the earliest mention is found of fins or whalebone being brought home along with the blubber. The dispute between the English and Dutch, about the right of fishing, still continued to be waged with great animosity and occasional violence; meanwhile, "the manner of managing the whale-fishing of both nations," says Anderson, in a summary of the details given by the voyagers of the time, "was then quite different from what it is in our days. The whales, in those early times, having never been disturbed, resorted to the bays near the shore, so that their blubber was easily landed at Spitzbergen, where they erected cookeries (that is, coppers, &c.) for boiling their oil; which cookeries they left standing from year to year, and only brought home the purified oil and the whalebone. The English, having been first in that fishery, kept possession of the best bays. The Hollanders, coming late, were obliged to find bays farther north: yet the Danes, who came later into this trade than the Dutch, got in between the English and the Dutch. The Hamburghers came after the Danes; and after them came the French, and also the Biscayners, who, though they were older whalefishers than any in Europe, except the Norwegians, had not, however, practiced this method but by the example of the English and the rest, and who were forced to set up their cookeries still farther off. But, since those times, the whales are less frequent in the bays, and are most commonly among the openings of the ice at a greater distance from land, which obliges the ships to follow them thither. So that the blubber is now cut from the whales which are taken in small pieces at the ships' sides, and then casks filled therewith, and thus brought home to be boiled and purified, and the whale-fins also to be cleaned. This latter method, however, of fishing, being often found dangerous and hazardous to shipping, it discouraged our English adventurers, who then traded in a company, so that they soon after relinquished that fishery; and so it remained till the reign of King Charles II."[1]

We have a proof, notwithstanding the complaints of the decay of the national trade and industry, which, as we have seen, were not wanting now any more than in every other period of our history, that the country still continued, on the whole, to advance in wealth and prosperity, though at a slacker pace than for some time before, in the fact that both the mercantile and the royal navies were considerably increased in the course of the present reign. It is said that, in the fleet fitted out in 1588 against the Spanish Armada, Elizabeth had forty ships of her own;[2] but, according to other accounts, what properly formed the royal navy consisted at her death of only thirteen ships, while at the death of James it consisted of twenty-four.[3] While the largest of Elizabeth's ships, also, was only of the burden of 1000 tuns, and carried forty cannon, her successor, in 1609, built a man-of-war, called the Prince, of the burden of 1400 tuns, and carrying sixty-four guns. At James's accession, it is stated by Sir William Monson, that there were not above four hundred ships in England of four hundred tuns burden.[1] An anonymous, but apparently well-informed writer, the author of a tract entitled "The Trade's Increase," published in 1615, has given us an account of the English shipping at that date, which, although the object of the writer is not to draw a flattering picture, seems to indicate that its quantity was then very considerably greater than it would appear to have been twelve years before, either from Monson's statement, or from that of Raleigh respecting the general trade of the kingdom, to which we have adverted in a preceding page. According to the author of "The Trade's Increase," there were, when he wrote, twenty English ships, chiefly laden with herrings, employed in the trade to Naples, Genoa, Leghorn, Marseilles, Malaga, and the other ports of the Mediterranean; together with thirty from Ireland, laden with pipe-staves—an article that has now long ceased to be found among the exports from that country. To Portugal and Andalusia twenty ships were sent for wines, sugar, fruits, and West India drugs; to Bourdeaux, sixty ships and barks for wines; to Hamburgh and Middleburgh, thirty-five vessels, all belonging to the Company of Merchant Adventurers; to Dantzic, Koningsberg, &c., about thirty, namely, six from London, six from Ipswich, and the rest from Hull, Lynn, and Newcastle; to Norway, five. The Greenland whale-fishery employed fourteen ships; the Iceland fishery, one hundred and twenty ships and barks. Only one hundred and twenty small ships were engaged, according to this writer, in the Newfoundland fishery; but another authority states that this very year there were at Newfoundland two hundred and fifty English ships, the burden of which, in all, amounted to 15,000 tuns.[2] The Newcastle coal-trade employed alone four hundred vessels; namely, two hundred for the supply of London, and as many more for the rest of England. "And besides our own ships," says our author, "hither, even to the mine's mouth, come all our neighboring nations with their ships continually, employing their own shipping and mariners. . . . . The French sail hither in whole fleets of fifty sail together; serving all their ports of Picardy, Normandy, Bretagne, &c., even as far as Rochelle and Bourdeaux. And the ships of Bremen, Embden, Holland, and Zealand supply those of Flanders, &c., whose shipping is not great, with our coals." Besides all these, there were the ships belonging to the East India Company, which, if they were not as yet very numerous, were some of them the largest merchantmen of the kingdom. Sir Dudley Digges, in a treatise, entitled "The Defense of Trade," published this same year, in reply to the author of "The Trade's Increase," who had attacked the company, gives a list of all the ships they had employed from their first establishment, which he makes to have been twenty-four in number; of which one was of 1293 tuns burden, one of 1100, one of 1060, one of 900, one of 800, and the rest of from 600 to 150.

According to a return made to an order of the privy council, in 1614, the entire value of the exports from England to all parts of the world, for the preceding year, was £2,090,640 11*s.* 8*d.*; and that of the imports, £2,141,283 17*s.* 10*d.* In order, however, to make it appear that the balance of trade was at this time favorable, the account adds to the value of the exports £86,794 16*s.* 2*d.* for custom on the goods; £10,000 for the import paid outward on woolen goods, tin, lead, and pewter; and £300,000 for the merchants' gains, freight, and other petty charges: in this way making out an apparent balance of the exports over the imports, or, as it is phrased, "a balance gained this year to the nation" of £346,283 17*s.* 10*d.* In 1622, according to another account which has been preserved, the total amount of exportations, including therein the custom at five per cent. on such goods as paid poundage, the imports on bays, tin, lead, and pewter, and the merchants' profit of fifteen per cent., together with freight and petty charges, was £5,320,436 12*s.* 10*d.*; while the total value of the imports, including £91,059 11*s.* 7*d.* of customs dues, and £100,000 for fine-run goods, &c., was £2,619,315.[1] This state of matters, according to the universally prevalent notion of the time, indicated a balance lost to the country that year by its foreign commerce of £298,878 7*s.* 2*d.* But, in truth, a comparison of the two accounts, supposing them to be tolerably correct, only proves that the trade of the country, on the whole, had rather increased than diminished in the course of the nine years which they embrace. It appears that in 1613 the exports and imports, taken together, amounted in value to £4,628,486; and in 1622 to £4,939,751. The highest of these sums may be about the twentieth part of the united value of our present exports and imports.

The great staple of the kingdom still continued to be the trade in wool and in woolen cloths. But although the English wool was finer, and held in higher estimation than that of any other country, the imperfect manner in which the processes of dressing and dyeing the cloth were performed had long been matter of regret with all who took an interest in the prosperity of our commerce and manufactures. We have already noticed Raleigh's representations upon that subject. At length an effort was made to remedy the evil, which, if strong measures were always the most successful in such cases, could hardly have failed to accomplish its professed purpose. In 1608 James issued a proclamation absolutely prohibiting any undyed cloths to be sent beyond seas even by the Company of Merchant-Adventurers, whose charter expressly empowered them to export such cloths, of which, indeed, their trade in all probability mostly consisted. At the same time he granted to Alderman Cockayne a patent giving him the exclusive right of dyeing and dressing all woolen cloths. But the States of Holland and the German cities immediately met these proceedings by prohibiting the importation of all English dyed cloths. "Thus," says Anderson, "was commerce thrown into confusion, Cockayne being disabled from selling his cloth anywhere but at home; besides that his cloths were worse done, and yet were dearer, than those finished in Holland. There was a very great clamor, therefore, raised against this new project by the weavers now employed, &c., so that the king was obliged to permit the exportation of a limited quantity of white cloths; and a few years after, in the year 1615, for quieting the people, he found himself under the necessity of annulling Cockayne's patent, and restoring that of the Merchant Adventurers." The prohibition by the Dutch and Germans, however, of the importation of English woolens dyed in the cloth had, in the mean time, set the clothiers of England upon the new method of dyeing the wool before weaving it, and thus producing the kind of fabric called medley-cloth, formed from threads of different colors. This discovery is assigned to the year 1613. Either from the effects of the derangement occasioned by Cockayne's patent, or from other causes, the woolen trade a few years after this date appears to have fallen into a declining state. In 1622 a commission was issued by the king to a number of noblemen and gentlemen, directing them to inquire into the causes of the decay, and the best means of effecting the revival both of this and other branches of the national commerce and industry; in which his majesty declares that both the complaints of his subjects at home, and the information he received from his ministers abroad, had assured him that the cloth of the kingdom had of late years wanted that estimation and vent in foreign parts which it formerly had; that the wools of the kingdom were fallen much from their wonted values; and that trade in general was so far out of frame that the merchants and clothiers were greatly discouraged; so that great numbers of people employed by and dependent on them wanted work, farmers wanted the usual means of paying their rents, landlords failed to receive their former incomes, and the crown also suffered by the diminution of the customs and other duties. The remainder of the paper enumerates the points to be more particularly inquired into, and suggests some remedies that might, it was thought, deserve consideration. The commissioners were directed, among other things, to endeavor to find out what had occasioned the fall in the price of wool; what would be the most effective course to take in order to prevent the exportation of wool and woolen-yarn, fuller's-earth, and wood-ashes; how to remedy the present unusual scarcity of money, &c. They were also to consider if it might not be behooveful to put in execution the laws still in force which obliged merchant-strangers to lay out the proceeds of the merchandise imported by them on the native commodities of the realm. The commission goes on to complain that the merchants trading into the Eastland countries (that is, the countries lying along the south shores of the Baltic) had neglected of late to bring back corn as they had been formerly wont; and also that, instead of loading their ships, as formerly, with great quantities of undressed hemp and flax, which set great numbers of the people of this kingdom to work in dressing the same and converting it into linen-cloth, they now imported hemp and flax ready dressed, and that for the most part by strangers. Much treasure, it is afterward affirmed, was yearly spent for linen-cloth imported from abroad at a high price. It is certain that, before the close of this reign, the Dutch had begun successfully to compete with the English weavers in the manufacture of the finer kinds of woolen-cloth, a branch in which this country had till now stood unrivaled. In 1624 a statement was given in to the parliament, by which it appeared that 25,000 pieces of fine woolens had been that year manufactured in Holland; whereupon the House of Commons resolved, first, "That the Merchant Adventurers' Company setting imposts upon our cloths is a grievance, and ought not to be continued; and that all other merchants promiscuously, as well as that company, may transport everywhere northern and western dozens, kerseys, and new draperies:" secondly, "That other merchants besides the Merchant Adventurers' Company may freely trade with dyed and dressed cloths, and all sorts of colored cloths, into Germany and the Low Countries." This was certainly the true way of restoring the trade, and of securing to the English weavers something better than even that exclusive possession of the manufacture of the finer fabrics, which was now irrecoverably lost.

According to the author of "The Trade's Increase," the commerce of England with Spain and Portugal had fallen to so low a state, in consequence of the long wars with those countries in Elizabeth's time, that when he published his work, in 1615, it scarcely employed five hundred seamen. An attempt was made in 1618 to revive the trade to the coast of Guinea by the chartering of a company with the exclusive privilege of carrying it on; but the only result was, that the company and the private adventurers, whose former freedom was invaded by the charter, became involved in such disputes as soon ruined both; so that the trade was for some years abandoned altogether. Considerable annoyance was experienced by our commerce in the south of Europe, in the course of this reign, from the pirates of the Barbary coast. About the year 1616 the fleet of these corsairs is stated to have consisted of forty sail of tall ships, that carrying the admiral being of 500 tuns burden; with this force they struck terror all along the Spanish coasts, dividing it into two squadrons, with one of which they blocked up the port of Malaga, while with the other they cruised between Lisbon and Seville. In 1620 the king commissioned Sir Robert Maunsell, vice-admiral of England, to lead a fleet, composed partly of some royal ships, partly of others belonging to private individuals, against the pirates; but nothing appears to have been done in consequence. The next year, however, Maunsell actually proceeded to Algiers, with an armament consisting of eight ships, four of them carrying forty cannon each, besides twelve armed merchantmen, the whole having on board a force of nearly 2700 men. But, after making an attempt to burn the ships in the Mole, which did not succeed, it was deemed prudent to return home, under the conviction that nothing further could be done. It is said that the corsairs, as soon as Maunsell had turned his back, picked up nearly forty good English ships, and infested the Spanish coasts with greater fury than ever. Two years after we find complaints made both by foreign powers and by English merchants, that sundry subjects of England were in the habit of supplying the rovers of Algiers and Tunis with ammunition, military weapons, and provisions, whereby they were enabled to disturb our own commerce as well as that of other Christian nations; on which James issued a proclamation strictly prohibiting all his subjects from offending for the future in that sort.

We have sketched in the preceding Book the history of the several attempts which were made in the latter part of the reign of Elizabeth, to effect settlements in the newly-discovered world of North America, principally by Sir Walter Raleigh and his relations, Sir Humphrey Gilbert and Sir Richard Grenville, and which all terminated so unsuccessfully or disastrously.[1] A considerable intercourse had, however, been kept up with the Indians on the coasts of Virginia and the more northern part of the American continent by the merchants both of London and Bristol, who found it very profitable to purchase their furs and skins with beads, knives, combs, and other such trinkets or articles of little value, ever since a Captain Gosnold, in the year 1602, had for the first time made the voyage to those parts by a direct course, without sailing round about to the West Indies and through the Gulf of Florida, as had always been done by preceding navigators. At length, in 1606, James chartered two companies, the first called that of the London Adventurers, or South Virginia Company, who were authorized to plant all the American coast comprehended between the 34th and 41st degrees of north latitude, or the country which afterward formed the provinces of Maryland, Virginia, and North and South Carolina; the second, called the Company of Plymouth Adventurers, to whom was assigned all the territory to the north of this as far as to the 45th degree of latitude, including the modern Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, and the New England States. The London Company that same year sent out a hundred settlers in two ships, who founded, about three miles from the mouth of the Powhatan (now called James River), the present town, still known by its original name of James Town, in Virginia. In 1610 this company obtained a second charter, incorporating them anew by the name of the Treasurer and Company of Adventurers and Planters of the City of London for the First Colony of Virginia, and empowering them to grant lands to the adventurers and planters, to appoint a resident council, to place and displace officers, &c.—in short, granting them all the powers of self-government. In 1612 a settlement was formed on the Bermuda, or Somers

Isles, by a company of persons, to whom the king granted a charter after they had purchased the islands from the Virginia Company, who claimed the dominion of them in consequence of their having been discovered, as was supposed, by two of their captains, Sir George Somers and Sir Thomas Gates, who were shipwrecked on one of them, in the course of a voyage to Virginia, in 1609, and lived there for nine months, though they had been really visited a hundred years before by Bermuda, a Spanish navigator. In 1616, Sir Walter Raleigh, released from his long confinement in the Tower, received from James his commission to undertake the voyage to Guiana, in South America, which the gallant adventurer entered upon in the spring of the following year, and the fatal issue of which has already been related.[1] Meanwhile, although the colony in Virginia went on increasing, and began, after many disappointments, to promise some return to the outlay of the adventurers, they had enough to do in defending their possessions against enemies and rival claimants on all sides of them. Besides the contests in which they were involved with the aboriginal inhabitants, they found themselves called upon to take measures for driving away both a number of Frenchmen who had crossed the St. Lawrence and settled in Acadia (the present Nova Scotia), and in the country now forming the New England States; and also a body of Dutch colonists who had built the town of New Amsterdam (the present New York) and the port of Orange (now Albany), in what they called the country of New Netherlands; for as yet all the eastern coast of the American continent, from the 34th to the 45th parallels of latitude, was considered as belonging either to southern or northern Virginia, and as, therefore, included in the grants to the two companies. Both the French and the Dutch were dislodged in 1618 by the English governor, Sir Samuel Argal; but the latter soon returned, and eventually made good their position. Many attempts had been made to establish English settlements in the northern parts of this territory; but it was not till the year 1620 that the first plantation was made which actually took root and became permanent, at a place called Plymouth, the country around which soon after received the name of New England from the Prince of Wales (afterward Charles I.). About the same time, also, a grant of the Island of Barbadoes, which had been taken possession of for the King of England by an English ship returning from Guinea in 1605, was obtained from James by his lord treasurer, Lord Leigh, afterward Earl of Marlborough, for himself and his heirs in perpetuity; and, under his sanction, a settlement was made upon it, and the town of James Town founded, in 1624, by a colony sent out at the expense of Sir William Courteen, an opulent and spirited merchant of London. Various schemes had also been entertained, and some of them in part carried into effect, though they all failed in the end, for establishing English colonies in the island of Newfoundland, and on the eastern coast of South America. But even at the close of this reign, the parent colony of Virginia was still far from being in a satisfactory state, or holding out a complete assurance of stability and ultimate success. One of the last acts of James's government was to commission a number of noblemen and gentlemen to make inquiry into the condition of that colony; the courses taken for settling which, his majesty declares, had not had the good effect intended—a previous commission having reported that most of the persons sent thither had either died by sickness and famine, or been massacred by the natives; and that such as still survived were in lamentable necessity and want; notwithstanding all which, however, the commissioners conceived the country to be both fruitful and healthful, and that, if industry were used, it would produce many good staple commodities, though, by the neglect of the governors and managers, it had as yet produced few or none.

[1] See ante, pp. 70, &c.

There was one commodity now beginning to be raised in Virginia, their cultivation of which would hardly contribute to recommend the settlers to James's favor. A portion of his literary fame rested upon his singular treatise entitled "A Counterblast to Tobacco," in which he assails the use of that herb with every form of pedantic invective. Not satisfied with this grand display of declamatory pyrotechnics, he issued, besides, in the course of his reign, a succession of royal proclamations in denunciation of tobacco, some of which are almost as tempestuous as his book. In 1604, while as yet all the tobacco imported came from the Spanish West Indies, he took it upon him, without the consent of parliament, to raise the duty upon it from twopence to six shillings and tenpence a pound, with the professed object of preventing the enormous inconveniences proceeding, as he declared, from the great quantity of the article daily brought into the realm. "Tobacco," says the commission directed upon this occasion to the lord treasurer, "being a drug of late years found out, and brought from foreign parts in small quantities, was taken and used by the better sort, both then and now, only as physic to preserve health; but it is now at this day, through evil custom and the toleration thereof, excessively taken by a number of riotous and disorderly persons of mean and base condition, who do spend most of their time in that idle vanity, to the evil example and corrupting of others, and also do consume the wages which many of them get by their labor, not caring at what price they buy that drug; by which the health of a great number of our people is impaired, and their bodies weakened and made unfit for labor." In his "Counterblast" he affirms that some gentlemen bestowed three, some four hundred pounds a-year "upon this precious stink;" an estimate in which the royal pen must surely be understood to be running on in poetic numbers. When the Virginian colonists began to cultivate tobacco, James complained that they made so much as to overstock the market; and in 1619 he issued a proclamation commanding that the production of it should not exceed the rate of a hundredweight for each individual planter. In this regulation, however, his majesty appears to have had an eye to the interests of the royal revenue as well as to the health of his people; for he at the same time confines the right of importing the commodity to such persons as he should license for that purpose; in other words, he takes the monopoly of it into his own hands, and avows it to be his object to raise its price. In a proclamation of the next year, enforcing this restriction upon the cultivation of the plant, which had not been strictly attended to, he again inveighs against the use of tobacco as "tending to a general and new corruption of men's bodies and manners," Nevertheless he holds it, "of the two, more tolerable that the same should be imported, among many other vanities and superfluities which come from beyond seas, than to be permitted to be planted here within this realm, thereby to abuse and misemploy the soil of this fruitful kingdom." At length, in the last year of his reign, on the petition of the House of Commons, James consented to prohibit the importation of all tobacco except such as should be of the growth of the English plantations; but this he professed to do without any abatement of his old and well-known aversion to the useless and pernicious weed, and solely because he had been often and earnestly importuned to that effect by many of his loving subjects, planters and adventurers in Virginia and the Somers Isles, on the ground that those colonies were but yet in their infancy, and could not be brought to maturity unless he should be pleased for a time to tolerate their planting and vending of tobacco. The proclamation also strictly prohibited the introduction of any tobacco from Scotland or Ireland; but it appears from many more proclamations that were issued in the course of the next reign, absolutely forbidding the cultivation of the herb in any of the home dominions of the crown, that it continued to be raised in large quantities for a long time after this in England itself, as well as in both those countries.

The march both of colonization and of commerce appears to have been considerably accelerated during the space that elapsed from the accession of Charles I. to the breaking out of the war between the king and parliament. In the first year of his reign, Charles, on the ground that such a colony was not best managed by an incorporated company, "consisting of a multitude of persons of various dispositions, among whom affairs of the greatest moment are ruled by a majority of votes," ordained by a proclamation that the government of Virginia should henceforth depend immediately on himself, and be administered by a governor and resident council appointed by the crown and acting in subordination to the privy council at home. In making this change, Charles treated the charter of the Virginia Company as having been annulled by his father; and James, indeed, in his proclamation of the preceding year, already quoted, declares that, having by the advice of his privy council resolved to alter the charters of the said company as to points of government, and the treasurer and company not submitting thereto, "the said charters are now avoided by a quo warranto." Charles, however, in his proclamation, does not rest the right of the crown altogether upon this revocation; he broadly advances the principle that these colonies and, by implication, all others founded or occupied by English subjects, were essentially a portion of the dominion of the mother country; "considering, also," are his words, "that we hold those territories of Virginia and the Somers Isles, as also that of New England, lately planted, with the limits thereof, to be a part of our royal empire." It is said that by this time the Virginian companies had expended a capital of not less than £200,000, from which they had as yet derived but a very inadequate return, so that many of the original adventurers, thoroughly weary of the speculation, had sold their shares for what they would bring. The failure of their expectations, however, did not check other attempts of the same kind. Almost all the West India islands not previously settled upon were taken possession of and colonized within a few years from this date. In 1627 an English and a French company divided the island of St. Christophers between them; and the next year the English added to the territory in their occupation the neighboring small isle of Nevis, and also sent off a detachment of their body to Barbuda, as they likewise did others in subsequent years to Montserrat and Antigua. Meanwhile, in 1629, Charles confirmed a former grant to James Hay, earl of Carlisle, and to his heirs forever, of all the Caribbee Islands, as they were called, including both those that have just been mentioned and also Barbadoes, with regard to which an arrangement had been made with the former grantee, the Earl of Marlborough. That same year he granted in perpetuity to Sir Robert Heath and his heirs all the Bahama or Lucaya Isles, together with what was then called the province of Carolina, on the continent of North America, being the immense region now forming the states of North and South Carolina, Georgia, Tennessee, and the southern part of Louisiana. This vast territory was afterward conveyed to Heath by the Earl of Arundel, who had planted some parts of it before the civil wars at home interrupted his operations. The Bahama Islands are also believed to have been begun to be planted about this time. In 1632 a part of what had till now been considered as the territory of Virginia was granted by Charles to be held in free and common soccage by Lord Baltimore, his majesty at the same time giving it the name of Maryland, in honor of the queen. Lord Baltimore was a Roman Catholic; and Maryland, which began to be colonized within two years from the date of the charter, afterward formed the main refuge of the persons of that religion who were driven by the severity of the penal laws from England, greatly to the perturbation and rage of their Puritan neighbors in Virginia, who made several attempts to drive the idolaters from a soil which, besides its having been thus desecrated, they regarded as rightfully belonging to their own colony. And in 1641, after the failure of a similar attempt made some years before, an English colony was settled, at the expense of Lord Willoughby, in Surinam, on the southern continent of America—the Guiana, the dream of whose gold mines lured on Raleigh to his fatal expedition.

The course of the growth and extension of the foreign commerce of the country during this interval is marked by few incidents requiring to be specially recorded; but the general results show that the progress made must have been considerable. An account of the height to which the trade of England had arrived, in 1638, is given by Lewes Roberts, in his work entitled "The Merchant's Map of Commerce," published at London in that year; and a summary of what is most material in his statements, with a few additional notices from other sources, will be sufficient for our present purpose. Roberts, a native of the principality, is almost as eloquent in some passages as his countryman Fluellin; but even his flourishes have their value as expressing something of the high tone and bearing which English merchants now assumed. He enters upon his description all but overwhelmed by the magnitude to which the commerce of his country had attained, scarcely allowing himself to hope that it can long continue of the same extent, and almost afraid to advert to any thing apparently so extravagant, and merely within the limits of possibility, as the notion that it should ever become greater than it was. "When I survey," he exclaims, "every kingdom and great city of the world, and every petty port and creek of the same, and find in each of these some English prying after the trade and commerce thereof, . . . I am easily brought to imagine that either this great traffic of England is at its full perfection, or that it aims higher than can hitherto by my weak sight be either seen or discerned. I must confess England breeds in its own womb the principal supporters of its present splendor, and nourisheth with its own milk the commodities that give both luster and life to the continuance of this trade, which I pray may neither ever decay, nor yet have the least diminution. But England being naturally seated in another corner of the world, and herein bending under the weight of too ponderous a burden, can not possibly always and forever find a vent for all those commodities that are seen to be daily imported and brought within the compass of so narrow a circuit, unless there can be, by the policy and government of the state, a mean found out to make this island either the common emporium and staple of all Europe, or at leastwise of all these our neighboring northern regions."[1] He then proceeds to observe that English commerce was formerly confined to the export of the staple merchandise of the country, "such as are cloths, lead, tin, some new late draperies, and other English real and royal commodities," and to the import from foreign parts of mere supplies for ourselves; but that "the late great traffic of this island hath been such that it hath not only proved a bountiful mother to the inhabitants, but also a courteous nurse to the adjoining neighbors;" so that whatever trade they had lost we had gained, and they now obtained a large portion of what they consumed of the produce of distant parts of the world through the medium of England.[2] Thus England, he proceeds, had fallen into the traffic with India, Arabia, and Persia, which was formerly enjoyed by Venice, and now furnished that very city plenteously with the rich commodities of these eastern countries. London also supplied the place of Venice to the rest of Italy. To France England still brought the excellent commodities of Constantinople, Alexandria, Aleppo, and the rest of the Turkish dominions, the French having almost lost their own trade with those parts. Nay, to the Turks themselves England now conveyed the precious spices of India, after their own merchants had ceased to carry on that trade. "Will you," continues our author, "view Muscovia, survey Sweden, look upon Denmark, peruse the East Country, and those other colder regions; there shall you find the English to have been; the inhabitants, from the prince to the peasant, wear English woolen livery, feed in English pewter, sauce with English Indian spices, and send to their enemies sad English leaden messengers of death. Will you behold the Netherlands, whose eyes and hearts envy England's traffic, yet they must per force confess that, for all their great boasts, they are indebted to London for most of their Syria commodities, besides what of other wares else they have of English growth. Will you see France, and travel it from Marselia to Calais, though they stand least in need of us, yet they can not last long without our commodities. And for Spain, if you pry therein from the prince's palace to the poor man's cottage, he will voto à Dios (vow to God) there is no clothing comparable to the English bay, nor pheasant excelling a seasonable English red herring!" So ambitious a burst of rhetoric might have had a more imposing close; but the red herring serves not ill to introduce the more calm and prosaic statement of particulars to which Mr. Roberts now descends from these extensive general views.

In a letter written to King James, in support of the complaints of the Merchant Adventurers against the patent or charter granted, as mentioned in a former page, to Alderman Cockayne, the great Bacon says, "I confess I did ever think that trading in companies is most agreeable to the English nature, which wanteth that same general view of a republic which runneth in the Dutch, and serves them instead of a company." And this appears to have been the common notion of the times; whatever trade was carried on by private individuals was as yet considered to be of very secondary importance. In this feeling our author begins his enumeration with the East India Company, who, he says, trading to Persia, India, and Arabia, export to these countries our English commodities, and bring back thence "pepper, cloves, maces, nutmegs, cottons, rice, calicoes of sundry sorts, bezoar stones, aloes, borax, calamus, cassia, mirabolans, myrrh, opium, rhubarb, cinnamon, sanders, spikenard, musk, civet, tamarinds, precious stones of all sorts, as diamonds, pearls, carbuncles, emeralds, jacynths, sapphires, spinals, turques, topazes, indigo, and silks, raw and wrought into sundry fabrics, benjamin, camphire, sandal-wood, and infinite other commodities. And though in India and these parts," he adds, "their trade equalizeth not neither the Portugals nor the Dutch, yet in candid, fair, and merchant-like dealing, these Pagans, Mohammedans, and Gentiles hold them in esteem far above them, and [they] deservedly have here the epithet of far more current and square dealers. And although for the present this trade and company do suffer under some adverse clouds, and groan under some unkind losses by the falsehood of the Netherlanders, and sad accidents at sea, yet their adventures and acts are praiseworthy, and their fair endeavors for England's honor in point of trade meriteth due commendations and just applause." The affairs of the company, in truth, had been all this reign in a very depressed state. In May, 1628, their stock had fallen to eighty per cent., or to less than two fifths of the price at which it had sold eleven years before. At length, in 1631, a new stock of £420,000 was raised with great difficulty. But while they were still struggling with inadequate means and with the hostility of the Dutch and Portuguese abroad, they were suddenly involved in still more serious embarrassments by a flagrant violation of their charter on the part of the king, who, in December, 1635, granted a new charter to Sir William Courten and others to trade for five years to Goa, Malabar, China, and Japan. Under this authority Courten and his associates the next year fitted out and dispatched some ships on an adventure, in the course of which they became embroiled first with the Mogul, and then with the Chinese, the former of whom made reprisals upon the property of the original company, while the latter declared the English, with whom they were now brought into contact for the first time, to be the enemies of the empire, and as such to be forever excluded from its ports. By these and other proceedings, it was estimated that this new company, whose charter was confirmed and extended by the king in 1637, had injured the old company to the amount of fully £100,000 before it was dissolved in 1646, by which time it had also, according to their own account, occasioned a loss to Courten and his associates of above £150,000.

The Turkey Company is the next that Roberts notices. Of this body he says, "Not yearly, but monthly, nay, almost weekly, their ships are observed to go to and fro, exporting hence the cloths of Suffolk, Gloucester, Worcester, and Coventry, dyed and dressed; kerseys of Hampshire and York; lead, tin, and a great quantity of the abovesaid India spices, indigo, and calicoes; and in return thereof import from Turkey the raw silks of Persia, Damasco, Tripoly, &c.; galls of Mosolo and Toccat; chamlets, grograms, and mohairs of Angora; cottons and cotton-yarn of Cyprus and Smyrna, and sometimes the gems of India, and drugs of Egypt and Arabia; the muscadins of Candia, the corance [currants] and oils of Zante, Cephalonia, and Morea, with sundry others." The mention of cotton by Roberts in these accounts of the exports of the East India and Turkey companies appears to have been generally overlooked; the earliest notice either of the English cotton manufacture or of the import of the raw material being commonly stated to be that found in his subsequent work, "The Treasure of Trafic," published in 1641, where it is said, "The town of Manchester, in Lancashire, must be also herein remembered, and worthily for their encouragement commended, who buy the yarn of the Irish in great quantity, and, weaving it, return the same again into Ireland to sell. Neither doth their industry rest here, for they buy cotton-wool in London, that comes first from Cyprus and Smyrna, and at home work the same, and perfect it into fustians, vermilions, dimities, and other such stuffs, and then return it to London, where the same is vented and sold, and not seldom sent into foreign parts, who have means at far easier terms to provide themselves of the said first materials." This account implies that the cotton manufacture had already reached a point of considerable advancement, so that it must have been established for some years at the time when the "Treasure of Trafic" was written. Various old acts of parliament and other authorities, it may be observed, make mention of Manchester cottons and cotton-velvets before the seventeenth century; but it is certain that the fabrics so denominated were all really composed of sheep's wool. The manufacture of cottons, properly so called, in England can not be traced farther back than to the period with which we are now engaged, the early part of the reign of Charles I.

The Ancient Company of the Merchant Adventurers is the third in Roberts's list. They are described as furnishing the cities of Hamburgh, Rotterdam, and others in the Netherlands with English cloth of sundry shires, and some other commodities, monthly, and as bringing back thence to England tapestries, diaper, cambrics, Hollands, lawns, hops, mather [madder], steel, Rhenish wines, and many other manufactures, as blades, stuffs, soap, latten, wire, plates, &c. In 1634 the Company of Merchant Adventurers, whose exclusive privileges we have seen denounced by the House of Commons ten years before, had found means to induce Charles to issue a proclamation which restored their monopoly by strictly prohibiting the exportation of "any white cloths, colored cloths, cloths dressed and dyed out of the whites, Spanish cloths, baizes, kerseys, perpetuanos, stockings, or any other English woolen commodities" to any part either of Germany, or the Netherlands, except to the marts or staple towns of the company. It was alledged by their enemies that both now and on former occasions the company were indebted for the favor shown them to the new-years' gifts with which they bribed the courtiers or officers of state. It is asserted, for instance, that, in the year 1623, the lord treasurer was presented by them with two hundred broad pieces of gold, besides a piece of plate; and that other presents were also then made to the Duke of Buckingham, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the lord keeper, the lord president, the secretaries of state, &c.[1]

best commodity, as also tin, lead, with some spices of India, and other southern commodities, and to bring home ashes, clapboard, copper, deals, firs, rich furs, masts, pipe-staves, rye, timber, wainscot, wheat, fustians, iron, latten, linen, mathers, quicksilver, flax, hemp, steel, caviare, cordage, hides, honey, tar, ropes, tallow, pitch, wax, rosin, and sundry others." The exports of the French Company were cloths, kerseys, and bays of English manufacture, with galls, silks, and cottons from Turkey; their imports, buckrams, canvas, cards, glass, grain, linens, salt, claret, and white wines, woad, oils, almonds, pepper, with some silk stuffs and some other petty manufactures. England and France, however, were at this time, as they have continued to be, with little interruption, down almost to the present day, jealous rivals, when they were not open enemies, in trade as in every thing else, and the commercial intercourse between them was extremely insignificant. Although Roberts here speaks of the French Company, it does not appear that the English merchants trading to France were really incorporated. The merchants trading to Spain, he proceeds to inform us, carried to that country bays, says, serges, perpetuanoes, lead, tin, herrings, pilchards, salmon, Newland (Newfoundland) fish, calfskins, with many other commodities; and brought back wines of Xeres, Malaga, Bastard, Candado, and Alicant, rosins (or resins), olives, oils, sugars, soaps, anise-seeds, licorice, soda barilla, pate (?), and sundry West India commodities. This account embraces also the trade with Portugal, for the present united under the same sovereignty with Spain; although in 1640, two years after the publication of Roberts's book, the great revolution which placed the Duke of Braganza on the Portuguese throne again separated the two countries forever—an event which, by depriving Spain of the Portuguese possessions in the East Indies, compelled her to depend upon the English and Dutch for her supplies of the produce of that part of the world, and thereby opened a new and valuable field to the trade of both these nations. "The merchants of England trading into Naples, Sicilia, Genoa, Leghorn, and Venice, &c., which I term Italy, are not," says our author, "observed to have any joint society or company;" but, trading separately, they export to Italy, he tells us, "bays, says, serges, perpetuanoes, kerseys, lead, tin, cloth, and many other native commodities, besides pepper, indigo, cloves, and other Indian commodities in great abundance; and for returns thence have cloths of gold and silver, satins, velvets, taffetas, plushes, tabins (?), damasks, alum, oils, glass, aniseseeds, rice, Venice gold and silver, great quantity of raw silks of sundry sorts, and divers other commodities. And here, likewise," he adds, repeating nearly the same formula with which he has wound up every preceding paragraph, "all other foreign nations give willingly place to the English, as the prime and principal merchants that either abide among them, or negotiate with them." Of some other branches of our commerce he gives merely a naked enumeration, thinking it unnecessary "to insist upon the reliques of that famous Barbary trade," or to mention "the petty adventures of the English to Guinea and Benny (or Benin);" "neither," says he in conclusion, "need I nominate the home-land commerce of this kingdom to Scotland and Ireland; neither go about to particularize the large traffic of this island to their late plantations of Newfoundland, Somers Islands, Virginia, Barbadoes, and New England, and to other places which rightly challenge an interest in the present trade and traffic of this kingdom."

The comparative activity and prosperity of the national industry at this time is also indicated by various improvements that were now introduced. Hackney-coaches are said to have made their first appearance in London in the year 1625. They were then only twenty in number for the whole of the capital and contiguous parts, and they did not ply in the streets, but were sent for by those who wanted them to the stables of certain inns, where they stood. Ten years later, however, we find the king publishing a proclamation, in which he declares that the great numbers of hackney-coaches of late time seen and kept in London, Westminster, and their suburbs, and the general and promiscuous use of coaches there, were not only a great disturbance to his majesty, his dearest consort the queen, the nobility, and others of place and degree, in their passage through the streets; but the streets themselves were so pestered, and the pavements so broken up, that the common passages were hindered and made dangerous, and besides the prices of hay and provender made exceeding dear. "Wherefore," concludes the proclamation, "we expressly command and forbid that no hackney or hired coaches be used or suffered in London, Westminster, or the suburbs thereof, except they be to travel at least three miles out of the same. And also that no person shall go in a coach in the said streets, except the owner of the coach shall constantly keep up four able horses for our service when required." Such an edict as this, so insolent in its tone, so arbitrary and absurd in its exactions, enables us to measure the distance between the sixteenth and the nineteenth century, between English freedom as it existed before the civil wars and as it now exists. Two years later the first mention of the licensing of hackney-coaches occurs, in a commission directed to the Marquis of Hamilton, the master of the horse, in which his majesty admits that he finds it very requisite for his nobility and gentry, as well as for foreign ambassadors, strangers, and others, that there should be a competent number of such vehicles allowed for their use; and empowers the marquis to license fifty hackney-coachmen for London and Westminster, each to keep no more than twelve horses a-piece, and so many in other cities and towns of the kingdom as in his wisdom he should think to be necessary, all other persons being prohibited to keep any hackney-coach to let or hire, either in London or elsewhere. In 1634, also, sedan-chairs had been brought into use by Sir Sanders Duncomb, to whom the king granted the sole privilege of letting them to hire for fourteen years, the patent declaring that the streets of London and Westminster and their suburbs had been of late so much encumbered with the unnecessary multitude of coaches, that many of his majesty's subjects were thereby exposed to great danger, and the necessary use of carts and carriages for provisions was much hindered; whereas Sir Sanders had represented that in many parts beyond sea people were much carried about in covered chairs, whereby few coaches were used among them. If the inditer of this description of the terrors of the London streets from the crowd of coaches in the year 1634 could be brought back out of his grave, it would be amusing to see how he would look when he found himself in the midst of the torrent and tumult of Regent-street or Piccadilly in the present day. Another of the patents of the same year deserves notice — that granting to John Day, citizen and sworn broker of London, the sole privilege of vending, for fourteen years, a certain weekly bill of the several rates or prices of all commodities in the principal cities of Christendom, which it seems he had printed and published for the three preceding years. The patent recites that this practice of publishing a price-current for the use of the commercial world had "never yet been brought here to that perfection answerable to other parts beyond sea;" "by which neglect," adds his majesty, "within our city of London (being one of the mother cities for trade in all Christendom) our said city is much disgraced, and our merchants hindered in their commerce and correspondence." The next year produced a more important novelty — the first establishment of a regular, though limited system of internal posts. James I. had originally established a post-office for the conveyance of letters to and from foreign parts; and the control and profits of this foreign post-office, which is described as for the accommodation of the English merchants, had been confirmed and continued to William Frizell and Thomas Witherings, by Charles, in 1632. But the origin of the home post-office dates only from 1635. Up to this time, his majesty observes in a proclamation on the subject, there had been no certain intercourse between the kingdoms of England and Scotland; wherefore he now commands his postmaster of England for foreign parts to settle a running post or two, to run night and day between Edinburgh and London, to go thither and come back again in six days; and to take with them all such letters as shall be directed to any post-town in or near that road. By-posts are, at the same time, ordered to be connected with several places on the main line to bring and carry out the letters from and to Lincoln, Hull, and other towns. A similar post to Chester and Holyhead, and another to Exeter and Plymouth, are at the same time ordered to be established; and it is promised that as soon as possible the like conveyances should be settled for the Oxford and Bristol road, and also for that leading through Colchester and Norwich. The rates of postage are fixed at twopence the single letter for any distance under eighty miles; fourpence up to a hundred and forty miles; sixpence for any longer distance; eightpence to any place in Scotland. It is ordered that no other messengers nor foot-posts shall carry any letters, but those alone which shall be employed by the king's postmaster-general, unless to places to which the king's posts do not go, with the exception of common known carriers, or messengers particularly sent on purpose, or persons carrying a letter for a friend. The mode of conveyance contemplated in this scheme was by persons riding on horseback, which indeed continued to be the general system of our post-office down to within the last fifty years: the proclamation directs that twopence-halfpenny per mile shall be paid on the roads to the several postmasters for every single horse carrying the letters. We may observe that if this post established by Charles I. actually made out the distance between London and Edinburgh in three days, it was a quicker conveyance than the public were possessed of a century later. "The conveyance of post letters," says Giles Jacob, in the second edition of his Law Dictionary, published in 1732, "extends to every considerable market-town, and is so expeditious that every twenty-four hours the post goes six score miles." But at the rate appointed in Charles's proclamation the post between Edinburgh and London must have gone fully seven score miles in the twenty-four hours. It is believed, however, that the project was not fully carried into effect. Witherings, who was now inland as well as foreign postmaster, was superseded in 1640 for abuses in the execution of both his offices; and they were sequestered into the hands of Philip Burlamachy, to be exercised henceforth under the care and oversight of the king's principal secretary of state. From that date, therefore, the post-office may be considered as a public establishment.

The continued growth of London affords another proof of the advancing condition of the national commerce, industry, and wealth. Repeated proclamations were published both by James and Charles, as they had been by Elizabeth, with the view of checking the further increase of the capital, which all forcibly attest how irresistibly the evil, as they imagined it to be, made head against their most strenuous efforts. One proclamation of Charles, in 1630, forbade the erecting of any houses or new foundations in London, Westminster, or within three miles of any of the gates of London or of the palace of Westminster; and also the entertaining of additional inmates in houses already existing, "which," says his majesty, "would multiply the inhabitants to such an excessive number that they could neither be governed nor fed." Another measure, repeatedly adopted by these kings, was to order all mere visitors to the capital to leave it and go back to their homes in the country. In 1617, a proclamation by King James strictly commanded all noblemen, knights, and gentlemen, who had mansion-houses in the country, to depart within twenty days, with their wives and families, out of the city and suburbs of London, and to return to their several habitations in the country, there to continue and abide until the end of the summer vacation, "to perform the duties and charge of their several places and service; and likewise, by housekeeping, to be a comfort unto their neighbors, in order to renew and revive the laudable custom of hospitality in their respective counties." None were to be allowed to remain, except those having urgent business, to be signified to, and approved by the privy council. Again, in 1622, in one proclamation he commanded all noblemen and gentlemen, having seats in the country, forthwith to go home to celebrate the feast of Christmas, and to keep hospitality in their several counties—"which," said he, "is now the more needful, as this is a time of scarcity and dearth;" and in a second, he enjoined the persons thus relegated to the country to remain there till his further pleasure should be known, adding, that the order should be held to include widows of distinction, and that all such lords and gentlemen as had law business to bring them up to London should leave their wives and children in the country.

Of many proclamations of the same kind issued by Charles we shall notice only one, of the year 1632, in which his majesty argues that, by the nobility and gentry residing in London with their families, a great part of their money and substance was drawn away from the several counties whence it arose, "and spent in the city on excess of apparel, provided from foreign parts, to the enriching of other nations, and the unnecessary consumption of a great part of the treasure of this realm, and in other vain delights and expenses, even to the wasting of their estates." The practice, it is added, also drew great numbers of loose and idle people to London and Westminster, which thereby were not so easily governed as formerly; besides that the poor-rates were increased, and the price of provisions enhanced. Much of all this wisdom of our ancestors is sufficiently absurd; but in regard to the point last touched upon here, it is but fair to remember, that, from the difficulties of conveyance between one part of the country and another, any extraordinary accumulation of people upon one spot was in those days reasonably regarded with more alarm, for the pressure it might occasion upon the local provision-market, than it would be now, when the whole kingdom is in a manner but one market. Still, no doubt, the right way to treat the inconvenience was, as with all such mere economic tendencies, to leave it to correct itself.

Howel, in his Londinopolis, published in 1657, observes that the union of the two crowns of England and Scotland, by the accession of James in 1603, conduced not a little to unite also the two cities of London and Westminster, which were once above a mile asunder;" "for," says he, "the Scots, greatly multiplying here, nestled themselves about the court; so that the Strand, from the mud walls and thatched cottages, acquired that perfection of buildings it now possesses." Some years after James's accession, however, we find St. Giles-in-the-Fields still spoken of, in an act of parliament for paving it, as a town separate from the capital: it and the lane called Drury Lane, leading from it to the Strand, are described in the act as "of late years, by occasion of the continual road there, and often carriages, become deep, foul, and dangerous to all that pass those ways."[1] But before the beginning of the civil wars St. Giles's, too, had been completely united to the body of the great congeries upon the outskirts of which it formerly hung apart, and a large portion of what was now known as the capital, including Clare Market, Long Acre, Bedfordbury, and the adjoining ranges of streets, stood upon the soil of the parish of St. Giles-in-the-Fields. "The very names of the older streets about Convent Garden," observes a writer about the middle of the last century, in a passage which furnishes a curious and comprehensive retrospect of these, and also of some subsequent changes, "are taken from the royal family at this time (some, indeed, in the reign of King Charles II., as Catherine-street, Duke-street, York-street, &c.), such as James-street, King-street, Charles-street, Henrietta-street, &c., all laid out by the great architect, Inigo Jones, as was also the fine piazza there; although that part where stood the house and gardens of the Duke of Bedford is of a much later date, namely, in the reigns of King William and Queen Anne. Bloomsbury and the streets at the Seven Dials were built up somewhat later, as also Leicester Fields, namely, since the restoration of King Charles II., as were also almost all St. James's and St. Anne's parishes, and a great part of St. Martin's and St. Giles's. I have met with several old persons in my younger days who remembered that there was but one single house (a cake-house) between the Mews Gate at Charing Cross, and St. James's Palace Gate, where now stand the stately piles of St. James's Square, Pall Mall, and other fine streets. They also remembered the west side of St. Martin's Lane to have been a quickset hedge. Yet High Holborn and Drury Lane were filled with noblemen's and gentlemen's houses almost one hundred and fifty years ago. Those fine streets on the south side of the Strand, running down to the River Thames, have all been built since the beginning of the seventeenth century, upon the sites of noblemen's houses and gardens who removed farther westward, as their names denote. Even some parts within the bars of the city of London remained unbuilt within about one hundred and fifty years past, particularly all the ground between Shoe Lane and Fewter's (now Fetter) Lane, 'so called,' says Howel, in his Londinopolis, 'of Fewters (an old appellation of idle people) loitering there, as in a way leading to gardens;' which in King Charles I.'s reign, and even some of them since, have been built up into streets, lanes, &c. Several other parts of the city, it is well known, have been rendered more populous by the removal of the nobility, &c., to Westminster liberties; on the sites of whose former spacious houses and gardens whole streets, lanes, and courts have been added to the city since the death of Queen Elizabeth."[1] In 1609, it may here be mentioned, what is called the New River, by which the greater part of the metropolis is still supplied with water, was, after three years' labor, brought into the reservoir at Clerkenwell, by the enterprising and public-spirited projector, Mr. Hugh Middleton, citizen and goldsmith of London, who was thereupon knighted by King James. One of the patents granted by King Charles, in 1630, was for the conveying of certain springs of water into London and Westminster from within a mile and a half of Hodsdon in Hertfordshire, after the plan of a projector named Michael Parker. This scheme, however, does not appear to have taken effect, and it only deserves notice from the circumstance that, to defray their expenses, a considerable item of which was to be a payment of £4000 a-year into the king's exchequer—the royal grant gave the undertakers "a special license to erect and publish a lottery or lotteries," "according," it is added, "to the course of other lotteries heretofore used or practiced." Lotteries had been for more than half a century before this occasionally resorted to by the government for raising money for particular purposes; the earliest on record, it is said, having occurred in the year 1569, when £20,000 was raised for the repair of certain harbors by the sale of 40,000 tickets at ten shillings each, the prizes being articles of plate. Another lottery was drawn under the sanction of public authority in the reign of James I., to defray the expenses attending certain of the early settlements in America.

The commercial history of the remainder of the present period will not detain us long. The trade and industry of the country in all their branches suffered of necessity considerable depression during the continuance of the war; but after the reëstablishment of tranquillity and a settled government, great pains were taken by the parliament and by Cromwell to bring about their revival, and, on the whole, with very considerable success.

We shall first enumerate the few facts requiring notice in the history of the several great chartered companies. In 1643 a number of the proprietors of the East India Company were at length induced to subscribe a new stock, but only to the inadequate amount of £105,000. Great part of this money was soon after lost in various ways; and for some years the trade could scarcely be said to be carried on at all. It is worthy of remark, however, that it was during this period the company acquired two of its most important possessions, the town of Madraspatnam, or Madras, long the seat of their supreme government in India, and still the capital of one of the presidencies, which was ceded to them by the sovereign of the country in 1643; and the island of St. Helena, of which they took possession in 1651, on its abandonment by the Dutch. Meanwhile, in 1649, a subscription for a new stock had been opened; but, although encouraged by the parliament, it proceeded slowly, and by the following year had only produced about £192,000. With a small part of this they soon after engaged in the Guinea trade, a charter to carry on which for five years they obtained from the parliament in 1651. In 1654, on the conclusion of peace with Holland, commissioners from both parties were appointed to settle the claims brought by the English and Dutch companies against each other for depredations and other injuries committed before the war; when the English gave in an account of £2,795,990 19*s.*, which the Dutch met by one of £2,919,861 3*s.* 6*d.*; but, in the end, the commissioners decided that a sum of £85,000 should be paid by the Dutch, besides about £3,600 to the heirs of certain of the sufferers of Amboyna—an award for which the English Company was probably as much indebted to the humbled condition of the United Provinces at the moment as to the clear justice of the case. For some years longer, however, the company's trade could hardly be said to exist. Any private adventurer who chose to fit out a ship for India was connived at by the government in violating their privileges, so that the company, as a body, carried on what little trade they did merely for the sake of preventing their charter from being abrogated on the pretext that they made no use of it, and in the hope of better times. It is said, too, that in the scramble for the Indian trade which now ensued—at once inundating India with the manufactures of England, and England with the produce of India—the interlopers in general made as scanty profits as the company, so that at last most of them joined in urging upon the government the reëstablishment of the old exclusive system. Their so acting, however, is not decisive as to the absolute failure of the experiment of a free trade that had thus been tried, inasmuch as their proposition was avowedly made with the view of becoming themselves members of the company when it should be set up again with a new stock and a new charter. Still it is probable that commercial enterprise was not yet sufficiently advanced in England to have enabled the country to carry on the Indian trade successfully by the mere efforts of individuals against the powerful rivalry of the Dutch and Portuguese monopolies. At last, in October, 1657, a new charter was granted to the company for seven years, after they had actually, in despair of obtaining the protection of the government, put up bills in the [1] Anderson, Hist. of Com. ii. 390.

Royal Exchange in the preceding January, offering their property and their privileges, such as they were, for sale. On this a new stock of about £370,000 was raised, which immediately placed the affairs of the company in a flourishing condition, and enabled it to carry on the trade with a spirit and success which continued without interruption or abatement till the Restoration. A short paragraph from the annalist of our Indian commerce, whom we have chiefly followed in this summary, will explain the state of its establishments abroad at the close of the present period. "In the infancy of the company's commerce, Bantam was the chief factory, to which all the others were subordinate; and so they continued till the year 1638 or 1639, when Surat became the chief establishment, and the factories of Bantam, Fort St. George (or Madras), Hooghly in Bengal, and those in Persia, were made subordinate to it. In the year 1660 the company sent out orders to give up the inland factories of Agra and Amadavad, as also Mocha in the Red Sea, and Bussorah at the head of the Persian Gulf. Their port of Gombroon being of doubtful utility, it was referred to further consideration whether it should be kept up or abandoned. It was determined to retain Carwar, Calavella, Rajapore, and Scindy, as long as the customs in Persia should continue to be paid; and these factories were made subordinate to Surat. The factories on the coast of Coromandel and in the bay of Bengal were put under one agent at Fort St. George (or Madras), who was directed to use his best endeavors to obtain a settlement in Ceylon."[1]

The trade in woolens with the Netherlands and Germany, carried on, as heretofore, by the Company of Merchant Adventurers, continued in a very prosperous condition during all the time of the commonwealth. In 1647 the company removed their comptoir, or foreign residence, from Delft to Dort, and here they remained, notwithstanding repeated invitations from the magistrates of Bruges to return to that city, in which they had originally fixed themselves, till about the year 1651, when they began to remove to Hamburgh, which soon after became the sole staple for the English woolen trade. An ordinance of the Lords and Commons, in 1643, granted a new and more ample charter to the Levant Company, "which," said the ordinance, "besides the building and maintaining of divers great ships, and the venting of kerseys, sayes, perpetuanoes, and several other commodities, hath been found very serviceable to this state, by advancing navigation and transporting into foreign parts, for several years together, above 20,000 broadcloths, besides other commodities, dyed and dressed in their full manufacture." Among the productions of the East, soon after this imported in considerable quantities by the Levant Company, was coffee. It is said that coffee was first introduced into England in 1652 by a Turkey merchant of the name of Edwards, who had brought home with him a Greek servant accustomed to make it, and whom he set up in a coffee-house in St. Michael's Alley, Cornhill, on the spot where the Virginia Coffee-house now stands. The valuable privileges of the Russian Company were taken from them by the czar a short time before King Charles's death, on the pretense that certain members of the company had taken an active part on the side of what the czar considered a rebellion against their lawful sovereign; but it appears that whatever resentment may have been entertained against them on that account was at least very dexterously taken advantage of by the Dutch, who seized the opportunity of bargaining for a share of the Archangel trade on condition of paying a duty of fifteen per cent. on all exports and imports. For some years after this the English trade to Russia seems to have been almost suspended; nor did a sort of embassy, sent to the czar, or emperor as he styled him, by Cromwell in 1654, succeed in obtaining more than some very petty concessions. We shall have to notice some further negotiations which took place upon this subject in the next period.

Till the year 1641 the only produce of the Island of Barbadoes consisted of very bad tobacco and a little cotton and ginger; but in that year some of the planters procured a few sugar-canes from Fernambuc in Brazil, which throve so well, that, after a season or two, a small ingenio, or mill for the manufacture of sugar, was set up in the island. Yet in 1647, when Ligon, the author of the "History of Barbadoes," who gives this account, arrived in the island, although there were then many sugar-works set up, the people were still ignorant of the true manner of planting, the time of cutting the canes, and other particulars in the art of cultivating the plant. All these deficiencies. however, were soon got over; the business of sugar-making was carried on every year to a greater and greater extent; and many large fortunes were amassed by the planters in a wonderfully short time. The author of a pamphlet entitled "Trade Revived," published in 1659, speaks of Barbadoes as "having given to many men of low degree exceeding vast fortunes, equal to noblemen." He adds, that "upward of a hundred sail of ships there yearly find employment, by carrying goods and passengers thither, and bringing thence other commodities; whereby seamen are bred and custom increased, our commodities vended, and many thousands employed therein, and in refining sugar therefrom, which we formerly had from other countries." Till this extended cultivation of sugar in Barbadoes, all of that article consumed in England had been obtained from the Portuguese territory of Brazil. Nor were the English in Barbadoes long in imitating their Portuguese rivals on the southern continent of America in another branch of trade which has darkened the history of the rearing of the sugar-cane whereever it has spread over those regions—the importation of negroes from the opposite coast of Africa. The rapid increase, again, of the population of this and our other West Indian settlements thus produced soon created a large demand for necessaries of all kinds from England. While the trade, however, between the mother country and her colonies was still only growing up to this state, an ordinance of the Lords and Commons, in 1646, although acknowledging in the preamble that the several plantations of Virginia, Bermuda, Barbadoes, and other places of America, had been very beneficial to the kingdom by the increase of navigation and of the customs arising from the import of the commodities of their growth, and thereupon continuing for three years longer the exemption from all duties except the new duty of excise which home produce and manufactures carried out to these plantations had hitherto enjoyed, imposed, for the first time, the important restriction that "none in any of the ports of the said plantations do suffer any ship or vessel to lade any goods of the growth of the plantations, and carry them to foreign parts, except in English bottoms, under forfeiture of the before-named exemption from customs." We shall presently find this principle carried out to its full extent in a subsequent much more memorable measure of the Rump Parliament. Meanwhile, during the dissensions that raged at home, and after the triumph of the parliamentary cause, great numbers of the royalists had sought refuge in Virginia, Barbadoes, and the other West India settlements; so that the white population of these dependencies was in general fiercely opposed to the new government, and they might be said to be in a state of rebellion after all the rest of the empire had been reduced to submission and quiet. Barbadoes, indeed, had actually received Lord Willoughby as governor under a commission from Charles II., then in Holland, and had proclaimed Charles as king. It was in these circumstances that the English parliament, in 1651, with the view of punishing at once the people of the colonies, and the Dutch, who had hitherto enjoyed the greater part of the carrying-trade between the West Indies and Europe, passed their famous Navigation Act, declaring that no merchandise either of Asia, Africa, or America, except only such as should be imported directly from the place of its growth or manufacture in Europe, should be imported into England, Ireland, or any of the plantations in any but English-built ships, belonging either to English or English-plantation subjects, navigated by English commanders, and having at least three fourths of the sailors Englishmen. It was also further enacted that no goods of the growth, production, or manufacture of any country in Europe should be imported into Great Britain except in British ships, or in such ships as were the real property of the people of the country or place in which the goods were produced, or from which they could only be, or most usually were, exported. Upon this law, which was reënacted after the Restoration, and which down to our own day has been generally regarded and upheld as the palladium of our commerce, and the maritime Magna Charta of England, we shall only at present observe that one of its first consequences was undoubtedly the war with Holland which broke out the year after it was passed. It is admitted also, we may add, by a writer who ranks among its most zealous eulogists, that it "occasioned at first loud complaints, that though our people had not shipping enough to import from all parts whatever they wanted, they were nevertheless, by this law, debarred receiving due supplies of merchandise from other nations, who only could, and till then did, import them."[1] The Barbadians were at length, not without much difficulty, compelled to surrender their island to the parliamentary forces under Sir George Ayscue, in March, 1652; but, even after this, they continued, notwithstanding the prohibitory act, to keep up a considerable intercourse with the Dutch, which was connived at by the government. The wealth and importance of Barbadoes, however, were considerably reduced by Cromwell's conquest, in 1656, of Jamaica, to which many of the planters soon after removed, induced principally by the greater cheapness of land in that island.

The legal rate of interest on money had continued to be ten per cent., as fixed by the Act of 1571,[2] till, in 1624, it was reduced to eight per cent. by the statute 21 Jac. I. c. 17—which, after authorizing this rate, drolly adds the proviso, "that no words in this law contained shall be construed or expounded to allow the practice of usury in point of religion or conscience!" The rate of interest continued to be eight per cent. till 1651, when it was further reduced by the parliament to six per cent., at which point it remained fixed for the rest of the present period. Some years before this time a regular trade in the lending of money had sprung up, of which Anderson gives the following account from a rare and curious pamphlet, entitled "The Mystery of the Newfashioned Goldsmiths or Bankers discovered," printed in 1676. For some time the usual place in which the London merchants kept their cash had been the royal mint in the Tower. But the despotic act of Charles I. in seizing, a few months before the meeting of the Long Parliament, a sum of £200,000 which was lodged here, under the name of a loan, having destroyed the security of that place of deposit, it then became customary, we are told, though the statement seems a strange one, for merchants and traders to intrust their cash to the keeping of their clerks and apprentices, until the breaking out of the civil war, when the said clerks and apprentices fell into the habit of running away from their masters and going to the army: so that, at last, about the year 1645, commercial men first began to place their cash in the hands of goldsmiths; until which time, it is stated, the business of the goldsmiths of London consisted merely in buying and selling plate and foreign coins of gold and silver, in melting and culling these articles, in coining some at the mint, and in supplying with the rest the refiners, plate-makers, and merchants, according to the variations of the price. "This new banking business," the account proceeds, "soon grew very considerable. It happened in those times of civil commotion, that the parliament, out of the plate, and from the old coin brought into the mint, coined seven millions into half-crowns; and there being no mills then in use at the mint, this new money was of very unequal weight, sometimes twopence and threepence difference in an ounce; and most of it was, it seems, heavier than it ought to have been in proportion to the value in foreign parts. Of this the goldsmiths made, naturally, the advantages usual in such cases, by picking out or culling the heaviest, and melting them down, and exporting them. It happened, also, that our gold coins were too weighty, and of these also they took the like advantage. Moreover, such merchants' servants as still kept their masters' running cash, had fallen into a way of clandestinely lending the same to the goldsmiths, at fourpence per cent. per diem (about six per cent. per annum); who, by these and such like means, were enabled to lend out great quantities of cash to necessitous merchants and others, weekly or monthly, at high interest; and also began to discount the merchants' bills at the like, or a higher rate of interest. Much about the same time they began to receive the rents of gentlemen's estates remitted to town, and to allow them and others who put cash into their hands some interest for it, if it remained but for a single month in their hands, or even a lesser time. This was a great allurement for people to put this money into their hands, which would bear interest till the day they wanted it. And they could also draw it out by one hundred pounds, or fifty pounds, &c., at a time, as they wanted it, with infinitely less trouble than if they had lent it out on either real or personal security. The consequence was, that it quickly brought a great quantity of cash into their hands; so that the chief or greatest of them were now enabled to supply Cromwell with money in advance on the revenues, as his occasions required, upon great advantages of themselves." Here we have all the principal operations of our modern banks, including even some portion of the accommodation given by the Bank of England to the government in our day, described as already in use in the middle of the seventeenth century. No banking establishment, properly so called, however, like those already existing at Amsterdam and in several of the Italian states, was begun in England during the present period, although various projects of the kind were submitted both to the public and the parliament.

In 1652 the postage of letters in England was farmed or let by the state to John Manley, esq., for £10,000 a-year; and four years after the whole establishment of the post-office was subjected to a revision and placed upon a more stable foundation than heretofore. In 1652, the number of hackney-coaches licensed to ply in the streets of London was raised to two hundred, and in 1654, to three hundred, the government and regulation of them being placed in the court of aldermen. The old dread of the over-increase of the capital, however, still continued to haunt the legislature of the commonwealth as much as it had formerly done the court. An edict published in 1656 declares that "the great and excessive number of houses, edifices, outhouses, and cottages erected and new-built in and about the city of London is found to be very mischievous and inconvenient, and a great annoyance and nuisance to the commonwealth." Whereupon a fine of one year's rent is imposed on all houses erected on new foundations within ten miles of the walls of London since 1620, not having four acres of freehold land attached to them; and a fine of £100 on all such as should be erected in future. But from the operation of the act were excepted the buildings belonging to the several city hospitals; the Earl of Clare's new market (now Clare Market), which is described as just then built; the streets about Lincoln's Inn Fields, then in course of being erected; Bangor Court in Shoe Lane, then about to be built upon the site of the Bishop of Bangor's house and garden; and some other recent erections below London Bridge and on the other side of the river. These were no doubt all the chief additions that had been made to the metropolis within the last few years.

Throughout the whole of the present period both the fineness and the weight of the silver coinage continued the same as they had been fixed in the year 1601; that is to say, the pound of mint silver contained eighteen ounces of alloy, and was coined into sixty-two shillings.[1]

Immediately after his accession, James I. directed two coinages of gold—one of pieces of ten shillings, five shillings, and two and sixpence in value—that is, of angels, half-angels, and quarter-angels, from gold of twenty-three carats three and a half grains fine; the other of pieces of twenty shillings and the same inferior current values, that is, of sovereigns, half-sovereigns, crowns, and half-crowns, from gold of only twenty-two carats fine. This throwing into circulation of two gold coinages of different standards must, one would think, have been attended with some inconveniences. At the same time he ordered a silver coinage of crowns, half-crowns, shillings, sixpences, twopences, pence, and halfpence. All the pieces of these first coinages are distinguished from those afterward issued by bearing the words ANG. SCO. (for England and Scotland), instead of those denoting King of Great Britain, which was the title James assumed the following year, and which he directed, by proclamation, to be thenceforth used upon all the coins. In the next coinage, the pound of gold, which had heretofore passed only for thirty-three pounds ten shillings, was ordered to be raised in value to thirty-seven pounds, four shillings, and sixpence, the proclamation to that effect setting forth that the English gold coin had of late been exported in great quantities in consequence of its not bearing a due proportion to the silver, as in other nations. The gold coins were now directed to be, one of the value of twenty shillings, to be called the unity; one of ten shillings, to be called the double crown; one of five shillings, to be called the Britain crown; one of four shillings, to be called the thistle crown; and one of two shillings and sixpence, to be called the half-crown. The next year the value of the pound of gold was raised to forty pounds ten shillings; and at that rate a gold coinage was ordered of rose-rials at thirty shillings each; spur-rials at fifteen shillings; and angels at ten shillings. In 1611, in consequence of the increasing value of gold in relation to silver in the general European market of the precious metals, it was found necessary to raise, by proclamation, the value of the unity to twenty-two shillings, and that of all the other gold pieces then current in the same proportion. The next year the pound of gold coined into rose-rials, spur-rials, and angels was raised to the value of forty-four pounds in tale; and that coined into unities, &c., to forty pounds, eighteen shillings, and fourpence. In 1619 a new gold coinage was issued, consisting of pieces of twenty shillings, ten shillings, and five shillings, which, in consequence of being impressed with the king's head surrounded by a laurel, came to be commonly known by the name of laurels. Both the twenty-shilling laurel and the unity were also popularly called broad-pieces. In this reign likewise appeared the first English copper coinage, consisting of farthings, which were issued in 1613, the private tokens of lead and brass, which shopkeepers and other dealers had long been in the habit of fabricating and using in their payments, being at the same time abolished. It was calculated that there were about three thousand retailers of victuals and small wares in and about London that thus used their own tokens; and the practice was general in all the considerable towns throughout the kingdom.

In the second year of the reign of Charles I., a pound of gold of 23 carats 3½ grains fine was directed to be accounted of the value of forty-four pounds ten shillings; and a pound of 22 carats fine of the value of forty-one pounds. "In the former reign," observes Leake, "the great quantity of silver brought into Europe, upon the opening of the mines of Peru and Mexico, had raised the price of gold, and caused it to be exported, so that for two years hardly any usual payments were made in gold; but the gold, by reason of this advanced price, being brought back, there followed as great a scarcity of silver."[1] It had been the practice, too, of the goldsmiths, for some years, he adds, to cull out the weightiest and best silver money, for which they would give a premium of two and sometimes three shillings on the hundred pounds, and to melt and export it. Above ten millions of pounds sterling in silver were coined from 1630 to 1643; "nevertheless, in 1632," Rushworth tells us, "there was such plenty of gold in the kingdom, and such scarcity of silver, that the drovers and farmers, who brought their cattle, sheep, and swine to be sold in Smithfield, would ordinarily make their bargain to be paid in silver and not in gold. And, besides, in this time people did ordinarily give twopence, and sometimes more, to get twenty shillings in silver for the exchange of a twenty-shilling piece of gold, full weight. And in and about London and Westminster, as well as in other parts, most people carried gold scales in their pockets to weigh gold on all occasions."[2] The coins struck by Charles, in the early part of his reign, were of the same denominations as those issued by his father. Among his schemes for raising money at this time were various projects which were set on foot for coining silver extracted from the lead mines in different parts of England. Of these, however, the only one that turned out in any considerable degree productive was that for coining the silver yielded by the Welsh mines, for which purpose a mint was established, in 1637, at the castle of Aberystwith, in Cardiganshire. These mines ultimately yielded about a hundred pounds of silver a-week; and the mint at Aberyswith proved of considerable service to the king during his war with the parliament. Of several other mines, the ore of which was tried by workmen from Germany, those of Slaithborne, in Lancashire, are said to have yielded four per cent. of silver; those of Barnstable, in Devonshire, and Court-Martin, in Cornwall, ten per cent.; and those at Miggleswicke and Wardel, in the county of Durham, six or eight per cent. In this reign, also, was introduced, by Nicholas Briot, a native of France, the process of fabricating coins by machinery, instead of by the hammer, the only method hitherto employed. Briot, driven from France, where he had been graver-general of the coin, by the intrigues of persons whose interests were opposed to his ingenious improvements, appears to have come over to England about the year 1628, and in 1633 was constituted chief engraver of coins for the mint in the Tower of London. He remained in this country till he was recalled to France by the Chancellor Seguier, about the year 1640. While he presided over the cutting of the dies for the English coinage, it was considered to be the most beautiful then known. Among other pieces of his striking is one in gold, of the weight of 8 pennyweights, 18½ grains, "with the king's head," says Leake, "admirably well done, bareheaded, and the lovelock, as it was called, hanging before, which, it seems, was so disagreeable to the Roundheads (so called from the contrary extreme) that Prynne wrote a book against it, called "The Unloveliness of Lovelocks." This, being dated in 1630, must have been among the earliest of Briot's productions. After the war had begun, and the parliament had seized the Tower, Charles set up mints at Shrewsbury, Oxford, York, and other places, most of the money coined at which has the mint-mark of the Prince of Wales's feathers, as having been struck by the workmen and instruments belonging to the establishment at Aberystwith. The greater part of it appears also to have been made, in the old-fashioned way, by the hammer, the use of the mill having been probably laid aside on Briot's departure. "The unhappy situation of the king's affairs," says Leake, "may be traced by his money, which grew worse and worse in the stamp, till at last they hardly deserve the name of a coin, seeming rather the work of a smith (as perhaps they were) than a graver, and manifest they were coined in the greatest hurry and confusion." Besides money of the common species, various other coins or tokens, which have received the name of obsidional or siege pieces, were issued on different occasions by the royalists in the course of the war. Among these were the pieces stamped at Newark, in 1643 and 1646, which are in the form of a lozenge; those stamped at the siege of Carlisle, in 1645, which are octangular; the Pontefract pieces, some of which are round, some octangular, some lozenge-shaped; and another sort of money, consisting merely of bits of silver-plate about an inch and a half long, with a rude representation of a castle, supposed to be that of Scarborough, stamped upon it.

In the beginning of their quarrel with the king the parliament coined both gold and silver money bearing the usual impressions, and only distinguished from that issued by the king by its having the

They afterward coined gold pieces of twenty shillings, ten shillings, and five shillings, and silver crowns, half-crowns, shillings, and sixpences, having on the obverse an antique shield with St. George's cross, encircled with a palm and a laurel branch, and circumscribed THE COMMONWEALTH OF ENGLAND; on the reverse, two antique shields conjoined, the first with St. George's cross as before, the other with a harp, and circumscribed GOD WITH US. Their silver twopences, pennies, and halfpennies, have only the arms without any legend or inscription. Such coins, with a sun for the mint-mark, are found of the dates 1649, 1650, 1651, 1652, and 1653; and it is supposed that they were occasionally struck even down to the Restoration: Leake says he had seen both a twenty and a ten-shilling piece of 1660. This was all hammered money; but there are likewise half-crowns, shillings, and sixpences of 1651, bearing the same stamp, and grained upon the outer edge; which is the earliest English completely-milled silver coinage, the milled money of Elizabeth and Charles I. being only marked upon the flat edge. One milled half-crown of the same date has inscribed upon the rim the words, IN THE THIRD YEAR OF FREEDOM BY GOD'S BLESSING RESTORED; another has TRUTH AND PEACE. 1651. PETRUS BLONDAEUS INVENTOR FECIT. These appear to be rival productions; the former by the regular moneyers of the Tower, the latter by a French artist, Peter Blondeau, who came over and offered his services to the committee of the council of state for the mint, in 1649, but never was employed further than to give this specimen of his skill, although he appears to have remained in the country about three years, and was probably not well used by the government. Some copper farthings, of various impressions, were likewise coined by the parliament.

The earliest money bearing the effigies of Oliver Cromwell has the date of 1656, though it was not till the following year that he formally took upon him the royal authority in conformity with the "Petition and Advice."[1] His coins are twenty-shilling and fifty-shilling pieces of gold; and crowns, half-crowns, shillings, and sixpences of silver. "They are," says Leake, "an excellent die, done by the masterly hand of Symonds (or Simon), exceeding any thing of that kind that had been done since the Romans; and in like manner he appears thereon, his bust Cæsar-like, laureate, looking to the right, with whiskers, and a small tuft upon the under lip." The circumscription around the head of the Protector is OLIVER. D.G.R.P. ANG. SCO. HIB. &c. PRO. On the reverse, under a royal crown, is a shield, bearing in the first and fourth quarters St. George's cross, in the second St. Andrew's cross, and in the third a harp; with the Protector's paternal arms, namely, a lion rampant on an escutcheon in the center; and the circumscription PAX QUARITUR BELLO, with the date 1656, or 1658. There is also a copper farthing of Cromwell's, with a somewhat different device on the reverse.

To this period likewise belong a few of the Pontefract coins, or tokens, which were issued after the king's death, in the name of Charles II.

For Scotland, James I. coined sovereigns of gold, crowns, half-crowns, shillings, and sixpences of silver, and also farthings of copper. All these Scottish coins, however, bore names indicating a value twelve times greater than that of the corresponding English coin : thus the Scottish half-crown was called a thirty-shilling piece, the farthing a threepenny piece, &c. He also coined both silver and copper money for Ireland, of the intrinsic value of about three quarters of the English ; and called in the mixed or base money which had been issued in the time of the rebellion by Elizabeth. Among the Scotch coins of Charles I. is a sovereign or unity of gold, which is very neatly finished, and is supposed to be the production of Nicholas Briot, the mintmark being a small B. Charles's other Scottish money consists of double-crowns, crowns, and half-crowns of gold; half-crowns, shillings, sixpences, nobles or half-marks, forty-penny pieces or quarter marks, two-shilling pieces, and twenty-penny pieces of silver; and farthings, and bothwells, or bodles, of the value of the sixth part of a penny English, of copper. His only Irish coins are some of silver, issued after 1641, by appointment of the lord lieutenant, the Duke of Ormond, and hence known as Ormond money. There are also some Irish halfpence and farthings of copper, of this time, bearing the figure of a king kneeling and playing on a harp, which are supposed to have been struck by the papists during their insurrection in 1642. The coins of Scotland and Ireland in the time of the commonwealth were the same with those of England.

From the reign of Elizabeth, when, in the language of writers of the period under notice, "ingenuities began to flourish in England," to the accession of Charles II., few improvements of much moment took place in the common arts of life. In agriculture, gardening, and manufactures England was surpassed by several other countries, particularly by Holland and the Netherlands. These were the most industrious countries in Europe, and their population had been longer trained in those habits of order which are essential to commercial and manufacturing preëminence. Our writers complain, on the contrary, of the working population of England as "idle, stubborn, and surly," and it would appear that they disliked habits of continuous labor. Hence they were less skillful and ingenious than the artisans of other countries; and our manufactures were neither so well finished nor in many instances so cheap as theirs, although at this period provisions were as low, or perhaps lower, in price here than on the continent. A paper published in 1651, on the "State and Condition of Things between the English and Dutch Nations," says :—"The price of labor depending much upon the price of victuals, house-rent, and other things necessary, it is certain (especially to any that know both countries) that all this is much cheaper with us than with our neighbors, and is like so to be." Great encouragement was given to aliens who brought "new and profitable trades into use," or who instructed Englishmen therein. In the act for doing away with monopolies, passed in 1624, the right of granting patents for fourteen years was, as already mentioned, reserved to the crown for those who discovered "new invented arts or manufactures never practiced before ;" but most of the monopolies that were actually granted had a powerful effect in repressing invention and ingenuity.

In agriculture we were indebted for some improvements to our Dutch and Flemish neighbors, particularly in draining the fens, and in rescuing land from the sea ; and also for various practices in husbandry and the introduction of new seeds. But these improvements made but slow progress, and were often confined for a long period to the spot where they had been originally practiced. Few tried experiments, most cultivators being content to follow the system which had been pursued by their forefathers. Both implements and usages varied in every county, and, as one agricultural writer of the day asserts, almost in every parish. But although the amount of improvement actually effected during this period was inconsiderable, the foundations of a better agricultural system were fairly laid. Several works on husbandry were published containing sound principles and excellent practical recommendations. The advantage of growing clover for cattle was first pointed out by Bligh, in his "Improver Improved," printed in 1652; and Sir Richard Weston soon after published an account of the cultivation of turnips in Flanders, by which cattle and sheep might be fattened in winter.

The art of gardening was cultivated with more spirit, and made greater progress. The gardens of a country mansion, which had been little more than courts with trim walks ornamented by shrubs cut into fantastic forms, were now enlivened by the introduction of plants and flowers which had not previously been cultivated in England. This improvement began in the reign of Elizabeth, and now gradually extended itself. Vegetables for the table, which had been planted in England for the first time at the commencement of the present period were, however, still scarce at its close. Samuel Hartlib, the author of various works on agriculture, who wrote about 1650, states that some old men recollected "the first gardener who came into Surrey to plant cabbages, cauliflowers, and to sow turnips, carrots, and parsnips, to sow early ripe pease, all which at that time were great wonders, we having few or none in England but what came from Holland and Flanders." Twenty years before, he tells us, that so near London as Gravesend, "there was not so much as a mess of pease but what came from London," but now they were abundant; but he adds, "I could instance divers other places in the north and west of England where the name of gardening and hoeing is scarcely known." By the middle of the century, liquorice, saffron, cherries, apples, pears, hops, and cabbages were cultivated in sufficient abundance to render the importation of those articles unnecessary; but our gardens, it is said, were still deficient in onions. The progress of improvement was rendered slow by the want of nurseries of apples, pears, cherries, vines, and chestnuts; and persons who lived in the country, and wished to introduce new varieties of fruits into their gardens, were, says Hartlib, often compelled to send nearly a hundred miles for them. Tobacco would soon have been extensively grown, had the cultivation of it not been put down, as we have seen, on account of its injury to the revenue. Cromwell, who encouraged the two great rural arts, allowed Hartlib a pension.

The woolen manufacture was still the most important branch of non-agricultural industry, being, as a writer of the time observes, "like the water to the wheel that driveth round all other things," and undoubtedly it gave employment to a very considerable proportion of the population; but an exaggerated notion existed of its importance when it was believed that about the accession of Charles II. a million of persons were engaged in the manufacture. Some clothiers employed five hundred persons, who were not all collected in a factory, many of them carrying on their particular process of the manufacture under their own roofs. The weaver received materials from the clothier, and when he brought back his cloth, it was given to workmen engaged in another branch; and thus it passed through various hands until it was completed, the clothier being the capitalist who bought the raw material and sold the manufactured commodity. We have already noticed the attempts that were made to introduce the arts of dyeing and dressing woolen cloths, and the prohibition that was resorted to for their encouragement of the exportation of woolen cloths in the white state. After the failure of this experiment, several other improvements, besides the manufacture of medley-cloth already mentioned, were made under the stimulus of the free competition of other countries. In 1643 a Dutchman established himself at Bow, and taught the English the method of producing the fine scarlet dye for which foreign cloths were so much celebrated. By an act of Elizabeth, the use of logwood as a dye had been forever prohibited; but in 1660 this act was repealed, and in the preamble to the new act it is remarked, that "the ingenious industry of these times hath taught the dyers of England the art of fixing the colors made of logwood, so as that by experience they are found as lasting and serviceable as the colors made with any other sort of wood." In this way improvement proceeded step by step, until eventually, but not in this period, English cloths were equal in point of excellence to those of other countries. Another mode resorted to for promoting the prosperity of the woolen manufacture was to prohibit the export of wool, fuller's earth, and live sheep, and to compel the use of woolen stuffs in the burial of the dead.

Broad cloth had been the great commodity of the woolen manufacture formerly; but many new descriptions of woolen stuffs were now made, as bays, perpetuanoes, sayes, stockings, &c., which were called the "new drapery." In an act passed in 1661, for regulating the manufactures of Norwich and Norfolk, it is remarked in the preamble, that lately "a great variety of new sorts of stuffs have been invented." Many new sorts of cloths and stuffs were now also brought from India, which occasioned in time some changes in the materials employed for wearing-apparel, and also led to attempts to manufacture similar articles in England.

The silk manufacture attracted great attention during the present period, and active exertions were made for establishing it firmly in England. In 1608 James I. issued a proclamation concerning the planting of mulberry-trees, in which it was asserted that "the making of silk may be as well effected here as in the kingdom of France;" and persons of influence in the different counties in England were called upon to promote the object of the proclamation, and above ten thousand plants were sent to each county for sale at an almost nominal value. It is supposed that most of the old mulberry-trees now or till lately existing in England, including Shakspeare's famous mulberry in his garden at Stratford, were planted in consequence of this proclamation. Instructions for breeding and rearing silkworms were at the same time issued. The increasing quantities of raw silk brought from India, and the perfection which the silk manufacture had obtained in France, from which country silk stuffs were extensively exported to England, contributed to render the plan of naturalizing the production of silk abortive; but undoubtedly the manufacture made considerable progress. Silk throwsters, silk weavers, and silk dyers were invited from other countries, and fixed their residence in London, to which place the manufacture was as yet confined. In 1629 the silk throwsters were incorporated; and in an act for the regulation of their trade, passed in 1661, it is stated that "the said company of silk throwsters employ above forty thousand men, women, and children."

The manufacture of linens still continued, in a great measure, a domestic employment. A sufficient quantity of linen was spun and wove for household purposes, but it had not become an article of extensive commerce, and the attempts made in former periods to force the cultivation of flax and hemp had not been very successful in rendering the manufacture a national staple like the woolen trade. In 1622 hemp and flax were brought into England ready dressed, and linens were imported from Germany.

Among the exceptions in the act passed in 1624 for putting an end to monopolies, was, as has been noticed above, a patent granted to the Earl of Digby for the important process of smelting iron with coal, and several patents were granted during this period for inventions for drawing water out of mines. The prejudices against the use of coal for domestic purposes continued to be very strong; but coal, notwithstanding, began to be applied more extensively in the arts. In 1637 the Earl of Berkshire obtained a patent for a newly-invented malt-kiln in which coal could be used. In 1637 the right of buying all coal exported from Newcastle and the adjoining parts was farmed by a company on condition of paying to the king a shilling per chaldron. Alum was made in England for the first time, either just at the close of Elizabeth's reign or at the beginning of the present period. In 1608 foreign alum was prohibited.

England had been for some time famous for its manufacture of ordnance; and, in 1629, Charles I. had 610 pieces cast in the forest of Dean for the States-General of Holland. The manufacture of glass had become naturalized, and foreign glass was prohibited, though some of the more costly articles of glass could only be obtained at Venice. In 1658, watches for the pocket were made for the first time in England. The East India Company set an example of improvement in the art of ship-building. Formerly most merchant-ships did not exceed 150 tuns burden; but, in 1610, as has been already noticed, a vessel of 1100 tuns was built for the trade with India, and about the same time a ship of war was lanched of 1400 tuns burden.

CHAPTER V.

THE HISTORY OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND THE FINE ARTS.

EVERSING the order we have observed in the preceding Books, we will approach the great subject of the literature of the present period by first taking a survey of the progress of the Fine Arts, beginning with Music, of which we have to detail the history from the commencement of the reign of Henry VII.[1]

Though it is a generally received, and not unfounded, opinion, that from about the commencement of the eighteenth century the English have been far behind the Italians and Germans in secular music, yet at the dawn of the science—or, in other words, shortly before the period of the Reformation, and long after—our composers were not only superior to those of Germany, but equal to those of a country whose climate is thought so favorable to the fine arts, and also on a level with their brethren in the Netherlands, who are by all allowed to have been eminent for their skill in florid counterpoint while in its early state. Indeed, Giovanni Tintore (or Johannes Tinctor), a doctor in civil law, archdeacon of Naples, and Maestro di Cappella to Ferdinand I. of Sicily, attributes to our countrymen, John of Dunstable,[1] the actual invention of figurate harmony, that is of music in parts, written freely, and not restrained by the laws of simple counterpoint. As Tinctor, an author of great authority, could have had no motive for his assertion but the promulgation of truth—as his testimony is corroborated by that of others, and as he stands uncontradicted by any but prejudiced witnesses—we may, without rendering ourselves liable to the charge of presumption, venture to take the credit of an improvement which has led to results of such importance to the art—results which may almost be said to have given it a new birth.

But the claim which England has to be ranked among the first and most successful cultivators of harmony is proved, beyond dispute, by comparing the works of her composers in the early part and middle of the sixteenth century with those of foreign cotemporaries. Without going farther back, and parading before the reader a list of names now only known to the musical antiquary, we will be content to first mention Christopher Tye, admitted doctor in music at Oxford, in 1545, whose anthems, particularly one of them in Dr. Boyce's Collection of Cathedral Music, together with his celebrated motet, Laudate nomen Domini, and several compositions in the library of the Madrigal Society, are superior to most and inferior to none of the Italian, Flemish, or French compositions of his time. Tye was music-preceptor to Edward VI., at whose court, as he had been at that of Henry VIII., he continued uninterruptedly in great favor.[1] Cotemporary with him were Thomas Tallis and William Birde, both of them members of the chapel royal, for which they produced many compositions. Those of Tallis have attained a celebrity exceeded by no music of the same period, and deserve the encomiums which have so liberally been bestowed on them. Several are still in use in our cathedrals, particularly a complete Service, the first, Dr. Boyce tells us,[2] that was set in the English language. Sir John Hawkins, however, says that John Marbeck preceded Tallis as composer of the English liturgy, and is right, as regards the Preces and Responses; but Tallis's setting of the Te Deum, &c., is the first that can be considered in the light of a musical composition. Marbeck's Preces and Responses, slightly altered, still continue in use, are consecrated by time, and not likely to fall into desuetude: the author, therefore, is entitled to some notice. He was organist of Windsor, and, together with two other members of that choir, and a tradesman, was condemned to the stake for heresy. Bishop Gardiner obtained his pardon, but his colleagues were all burned for their zeal in religious reformation.[1] Marbeck made the first Concordance of the Bible, "which Gardiner could not but commend as a piece of singular industry; and King Henry VIII., hearing thereof, said that 'he was much better employed than those priests who accused him.'"[2]

In conjunction with Birde, Tallis composed and printed a noble collection of sacred music, with Latin words, under the title of Cantiones Sacræ. This is still highly esteemed by the admirers of ancient music. Birde, however, is better known as the author of a composition which never can fade, much less become obsolete, while a taste for pure and exquisite harmony shall exist in the country of its birth:—the canon, Non nobis, Domini, is alone an answer to those who deny British talent for music, and its excellence is so indisputable, that some few foreigners have been tempted to claim it for their own respective countries—for Italy, for Flanders, for France; but in vain: not a doubt now remains on the subject, in the mind of any candid and competent judge. The composer of this was a pupil of Tallis; he afterward became his colleague as a gentleman of the chapel royal, and subsequently, in 1575, as an organist of the same establishment. He was a voluminous composer, and deservedly held in high estimation. He was thought the finest performer on the virginal[3] of his day; and that his powers were great may be inferred from his contributions to a collection, printed under the title of Parthenia. In the cheque-book of the royal chapel, he is styled the "Father of Music;" and Peacham, in his Complete Gentleman, speaks of his compositions and moral qualities in very warm terms, adding, that he was excelled by none, "even by the judgment of France and Italy, who are very sparing in the commendation of strangers, in regard of that conceit they hold of themselves."

Henry VIII. himself may, without impropriety, be named among the composers of church music of the sixteenth century. Sir John Hawkins has inserted in his history a respectable motet by that monarch; and in Dr. Boyce's collection is a full anthem, "O Lord, the maker of all things," a work of merit, to which the editor, a man of diligent research, unhesitatingly affixes that king's name. Some suspicions always and reasonably are excited by royal productions in the fine arts, but there is no want of credible evidence in favor of Henry's skill in music. Erasmus states that he composed offices for the church, a fact supported by the testimony of Lord Herbert of Cherbury and Bishop Burnet; and Dr. Aldrich, the learned dean of Christchurch,

[1] The estimation in which Dr. Tye's professional merit was held may be gathered from a play by Samuel Rowley, written in 1613. In a dialogue between Prince Edward and his preceptor in music, the former says—

"Doctor, I thank you, and commend your cunning,
I oft have heard my father merrily speak
In your high praise; and thus his highness saith—'England one God, one truth, one doctor hath For musick's art, and that is Dr. Tye, Admired for skill in musick's harmony.'"

Tye was also a poet. "Having been taught to believe," says Warton (Hist. Poet. iv. 16), "that rhyme and edification were closely connected, he projected a translation of the ACTS OF THE APOSTLES into familiar metre." He completed only the first fourteen chapters, which were printed in 1553, with a very quaint title. The doctor became somewhat peevish as he advanced in years. Anthony Wood relates (Ashmolean MS. fol. 189) that Tye, playing more scientifically than agreeably before Queen Elizabeth, on the organ in her chapel, she "sent the verger to tell him that he played out of tune; whereupon he sent word that her ears were out of tune." It was well for the organist that his ears were out of the reach of her majesty's royal right hand.

a man in every way qualified to decide the question, after long and laborious inquiry, determined in favor of the monarch's claim. It may further be said, that as Henry, during the life of his elder brother, was educated with a view to the archiepiscopal chair of Canterbury, and as the clergy were then all well instructed in music,[1] it is not only likely, but nearly certain, that the prudent Henry VII. took care that his son should not be ignorant of a science necessary to his intended profession.[2] "The Defender of the Faith" was not less anxious that his successor should be skillful in an accomplishment by which himself was distinguished, and Edward VI. not only had the best masters that the age afforded, but profited by the instructions he received, as we learn from Cardan, in his character of this prince;[3] and also from Edward's own journal, wherein he mentions a visit from the French ambassador, who, he says, "dined with me, and heard me play on the lute,"[4] a circumstance which so sensible and modest a youth would hardly have recorded had he not felt conscious of some superiority. But, whatever the state of the art, the age was decidedly musical. Sir Thomas More, even when holding his high office of lord chancellor, used to apparel himself in a surplice and sing with the choir in Chelsea church. The Duke of Norfolk reproved him for appearing in the character of a "parish clerk;" but the honest and able chancellor defended himself in the words of David—vilior fiam in oculis meis.[5] That duke's son, the learned, the brave, the high-minded Surrey, to whom our language stands so much indebted, not only excelled on the lute, "then in use by all persons of good education,"[6] but was an elegant composer. The music set to his sonnets by himself is "remarkable for expression, for artless sweetness, and wild simplicity."[7] The earl's friend, Sir Thomas Wyat, the poet, who preserved his virtue, and saved, though by his honesty he endangered, his life, in the midst of a court of which his wit and accomplishments rendered him a brilliant ornament, "sung, and played sweetly on the lute."[8] It is, however, needless to summon many witnesses to a fact hitherto undenied; we shall, therefore, adduce only one other proof of the necessity of music as a part of polite education during the sixteenth century, taken from Morley's work on music, published in 1597.[9] This very clever and still useful treatise is written in the form of a dialogue: the interlocutors are Polymathes, Philomathes, and a Master. Philomathes tells his friend that he is going in haste to get some instructions in music, because, having been the night before at "Master Sophobulus his banquet," and "supper being ended, and music-books, according to the custom, being brought to the table, the mistress of the house," he says, "presented me with a part, earnestly requesting me to sing. But when, after many excuses, I protested unfeignedly that I could not, every one began to wonder. Yea, some whispered to others, demanding how I was brought up: so that upon shame of mine ignorance I go now to seek out mine old friend, Master Quorimus, to make myself his scholar."

The musical establishment of Edward (probably the same as his father's) was upon a magnificent scale, consisting of one hundred and fourteen persons, besides boy-choristers, the annual expense whereof was £2209,[1] a sum equal in value to a much greater amount of our present money.

In the list of Gentlemen of the Chapel to Edward VI. appears Richard Farrant, whose compositions for the church, simple as they seem, are so solemn, so devout, so tender, and affecting, that they may challenge comparison with the sacred music of any age or country.[2] To this period also belongs the once famous Dr. Bull, organist to Queen Elizabeth, and the first professor of music of Gresham college. His powers as a performer, judging from his own Lessons, in Parthenia, must have been great, in so far as regards execution; but his compositions are evidently the result of study, of industry—not of genius—and are now forgotten. His name alone survives.

Though music was in its infancy at the beginning of the sixteenth century, at the close it had made considerable progress toward, if it had not actually arrived at, maturity; and there are many who maintain that the Elizabethan age was the period of perfection, not only of poetry, but of the sister art. They are, perhaps, right, if that species of composition to which the name of madrigal is given be justly considered as the best and highest kind of florid vocal harmony; for some of the greatest geniuses in this style that our country has ever been able to boast, or that Europe has ever produced, flourished during the period at which our history has now arrived. Among these, Thomas Morley (Mus. B., in 1588), one of the gentlemen of Queen Elizabeth's chapel, holds a prominent place. His works are numerous, most of them pleasing, and remarkable for a gayety not very usual in his time. His many madrigals display originality, vigor, and deep musical knowledge, while some few of them certainly betray a familiar acquaintance with the Italian and Flemish masters. His canzonets for two voices are lively, agreeable, and, as well as nearly all that flowed from his pen, are graced by a far more ample share of melody than the productions of his time commonly exhibit. His treatise, before mentioned, was the first that appeared in our language; it long continued in use, and, though in some parts obsolete, yet as a whole, it still affords much useful information.[3] Cotemporary with him, and at the same time admitted to the degree of Mus. Bac., was John Dowland, who, according to Fuller,[1] "was the rarest musician that his age did behold." But the author of the Worthies of England was warm-hearted, and liable to fits of enthusiasm, and we must, therefore, admit his superlatives with caution. Nevertheless, the subject of his panegyric was a very elegant composer; his madrigals, or, more properly, four-part songs—for they have none of those points which constitute the stilo madrigalesco—are exquisitely beautiful. He traveled much in France, Italy, and Germany; hence his fame was European. Christian IV., king of Denmark, when in England, "requested him of King James, who, unwillingly willing, parted with him."[2] Consequently he left London for Copenhagen, where, it is supposed, he died, in 1615. He was a celebrated lutenist, but his merit as a performer would now, in all likelihood, have been forgotten, had it not been immortalized by Shakspeare, in his Passionate Pilgrim, where his skill is thus mentioned:—

> Dowland to thee is dear, whose heavenly touch
> Upon the lute doth ravish human sense.

Of all madrigalists, whether British or foreign (and the age in which we are engaged was more famed for its madrigals than for any other kind of composition), the precedence is due to John Wilbye, of whose history we only know that he was a teacher of music, living in Austin Friars in 1598, in which year he published a set of thirty madrigals, and a second book, "apt both for voyals (viols) and voyces," in 1609. It is not without great regret, however unavailing, that we find ourselves devoid of the means of recording even the bare dates of the birth and decease of the gifted man to whom we owe such compositions as "Flora gave me fairest flowers"—"Sweet honey-sucking bees"—"Lady, when I behold the roses sprouting"[3]—"As fair as morn"—"Stay, Corydon"—and "Down in a valley"—with others which, if not equal to the foregoing, are still, many of them, of a very superior order.

John Bennet, who, we are told by a good musician,[1] was "a gentleman admirable for all sorts of composures, either in art or air, simple or mixed, of what nature soever," published in 1599, a set of madrigals, among which are three, at least, that give him an undoubted right to be noticed here:—"Flow, O my tears;" "Thirsis, sleepest thou?" and "O sleep, fond Fancy." John Milton also, the father of our great poet, though a scrivener by profession, is entitled to be named as one of the composers of this period: his claim is proved by a madrigal in The Triumphs of Oriana,[2] by several Songs for Five Voices, and many good psalm-tunes: the popular one known as York Tune was written by him.[3]

Of what may be called the music of the multitude—of the common people of England—during the sixteenth century, our knowledge is rather scanty; but, judging from the specimens that remain, or have yet been discovered, we do not hesitate in saying, that, inferior as it unquestionably is in pathos to the melodies of Ireland existing at the same period, it is on a par with any cotemporary production of the continent. In a MS. collection known as Queen Elizabeth's Virginal Book, are some English tunes, supposed to have been once popular, with variations by the great masters of the day. These, together with a small number to be found in the British Museum, three or four in The Dancing Master, and a few given by Sir J. Hawkins, in his Appendix, are nearly all that we are able to authenticate. Among those in the Virginal Book is The Carman's Whistle, with elaborate variations by William Birde. The annexed is the air, with Birde's own base:—

did shine as the sun in the firmament of our art, and did first give light to our understanding with his precepts."

[3] This, a translation from the Italian, is so pretty a conceit, that we can not refuse it a place as a note:—

> Lady, when I behold the roses sprouting,
> Which clad in damask mantles deck the arbors,
> And then behold your lips, where sweet love harbors,
> Mine eyes perplex me with a double doubting;
> For, viewing both alike, hardly my mind supposes
> Whether the roses be your lips, or your lips the roses.

[2] This is a collection of twenty-nine madrigals by various composers, all in praise of Queen Elizabeth, who is extolled for her beauty under the name of Oriana. The poetry, if it might be so called, is contemptible, abounding in the most nauseous personal flattery. The music is, except in some few instances, labored, dry, and, though what is called learned, scarcely reaches the point of mediocrity in respect to either invention or taste.

[3] Phillips, nephew of the poet Milton, says that John Milton, the father, composed an In nomine, in forty parts, for which he was rewarded by a Polish prince, to whom he presented it, with a gold medal and chain Lively.

That Elizabeth was not less instructed in music than the other children of a monarch who took a pride in being a composer is to be inferred. Camden says that she played and sung "prettily and sweetly," as "became a princess;" and Sir James Melvil's account is equally favorable. But if the Queen of England were able to execute all that appears in the volume bearing her name (which we much doubt) she must have acquired more practical skill than, probably, half the professed musicians in her empire could boast.

Elizabeth's greatest triumph—the defeat of the Spanish Armada, in 1588—does not seem to have excited in either poet or musician that enthusiasm which might have been expected. The victory of Azincourt[1] produced the first English part-music whereof we have any remains: the battle to which our religion, laws, and liberty are so much indebted, was, for aught we know to the contrary, unsung.

[1] See vol. ii p. 223.

It appears, however, that, in anticipation of a descent on our shores, the following hymn, in a mixed tone of piety and defiance, was produced, the melody of which is so graceful, and susceptible of so harmonious an accompaniment, that it may be received as a proof of the state of what may be considered our grave popular music at the end of the century.[1]

[1] For the melody and words of this we are indebted to the First Part of A Collection of National English Airs, edited by W. Chappell, 1838; a work of research and judgment, and which, if continued as begun, will be a valuable addition to our musical libraries It is given "from a manuscript in the possession of —— Pearsall, esq, bearing the date of 1588."

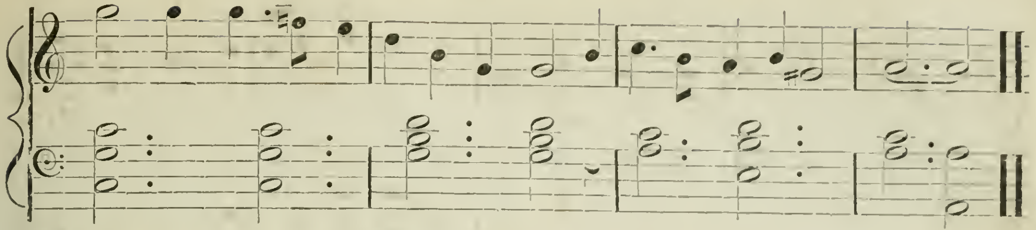
A tolerably correct idea may be formed of the general style of the light and joyous music of the Elizabethan age, from the subjoined air, called Green Sleeves, which was licensed at Stationers' Hall, in 1580, under the title of "A Newe Northenre Dittye, of the Lady Green Sleeves." It is often alluded to by Shakspeare, and is supposed to have been more characterized by humor then delicacy.

We copy the tune from The Dancing Master, 17th edition, where it is named "Green Sleeves and Yellow Lace." It was introduced in The Beggar's Opera, and in various forms still retains some share of its popularity.

Quick.



Elizabeth's love of music did not manifest itself in liberality toward such of its professors as were on her household establishment: they, as well as others, complained, not without reason, of her parsimony. But very shortly after the accession of James, her successor, who had neither taste nor ear for any but the most barbarous of the Scottish tunes, an application for an augmentation of the salaries of the gentlemen of the chapel royal proved successful: the increase was to £40, no inconsiderable sum at that time. And we learn from Dr. Birch's account of the establishment of Henry, James's eldest son, that the musicians of the young prince had also the same stipend. On that establishment was Thomas Ford, composer of some of the sweetest madrigals the art can boast. John Ward, too, author of a set of twenty-eight madrigals, among which is the justly-famous, the unexcelled work, "Die not, fond man;" and also Thomas Weelkes, organist of Winchester College, author of many excellent madrigals and ballets, are to be mentioned among the ornaments of James's reign. But the musical glory of that period was Orlando Gibbons, born at Cambridge, in 1583, and at the early age of twenty-one appointed organist of the chapel royal. In 1622, at the recommendation of his friend Camden, the famous antiquary, the University of Oxford honored him with the degree of doctor-in-music. Gibbons's cathedral music is of the most learned and dignified kind, but not less remarkable for practical effect than for scientific skill; and in no way inferior to his sacred compositions are his numerous madrigals. He was the pride of his own age, and is the admiration of the present.

In 1622, a music-lecture, or professorship, was established and endowed at Oxford by William Heyther, a gentleman of the chapel royal, who in the same year was admitted to the degree of doctor-in-music.[1]

Charles I. was, as well as all the children of James, instructed in music, and is said to have been an able performer on the viol da gamba.[2] Lilly, however, in his character of that prince, gives him only negative praise for his skill in the art; but Playford, who had opportunities of ascertaining the fact, speaks highly of Charles's judgment and ability in it.[3] He certainly evinced his judgment in sacred music by his admiration of the works of Dr. William Child, organist of the royal chapel, a composer who does honor to the English school; but the monarch's taste in secular music may be doubted, from his having appointed one Laniere, an Italian by birth, and a painter by profession, to the then very lucrative office of "Master of our music," a situation for which, judging from what that foreigner has left, he was very indifferently qualified. This was the first check given to English professors. The second Charles still further discouraged his countrymen, by patronizing French musicians; and from his time to the present a large majority of the British nobility and persons of fortune have followed the unpatriotic and baneful example of that heartless prince.

In the service of Charles I. was Henry Lawes, a composer whose best productions seem to have been unknown to our musical historians, though he exhibited more genius for melody. and better judgment in setting words, than any of his predecessors. He was the friend of Milton, who addressed to him his thirteenth sonnet, beginning—

Harry, whose tuneful and well-measured song.

The poet likewise mentions him in his Comus, under the name of Thyrsis. Waller, and also Herrick, are both loud in his praise; and, after a careful examination of his three books of Airs and Dialogues, for one, two, and three Voices, we fully concur in the encomiums bestowed by his friends on his compositions, works which it is to be regretted are now scarcely known, except to the antiquary, or the few who view the art with unprejudiced eyes.

The disputes between Charles and the parliament, the progress of Puritanism, and the attacks on music by Stephen Gosson, in his School of Abuse, and by Prynne, in his Histrio-Mastix, almost banished the art from Great Britain, till the Restoration (which at least subdued fanaticism and unmasked hypocrisy) revived its practice. Music, however, was not wholly reduced to unaccompanied psalm-tunes during the commonwealth. In the private houses of some few of the least intimidated of the nobility and cavaliers, harmony, both of the instrumental and vocal kind, was still to be heard. At Oxford, many members of the university held weekly music-parties.[1] Dr. Busby, master of Westminster School, insisted on keeping and using a denounced organ in his house; and even Cromwell himself, a lover of music, ordered the great organ which had been forcibly taken from Magdalen College, Oxford, "to be carefully conveyed to Hampton Court, where it was placed in the great gallery, and one of his favorite amusements was to be entertained with this instrument at leisure hours."[1] John Hingston was Cromwell's organist, at a salary of £100 per annum. He often had concerts at his house, which the Protector attended.[2] But these instances were exceptions to the rule; music must be considered as having lain dormant in England from the death of Charles I. till his successor mounted the throne.

There is, perhaps, no individual conspicuous in history whose character presents itself in more opposite colors, as it is viewed by the light of his political or some of his private qualities, than that of King Charles I.; and, in considering the favorable side of his character, it displays itself in nothing more highly or purely than in the encouragement he afforded to the fine arts. "Charles I. saw the arts," says the Rev. Mr. Gilpin, "in a very enlarged point of view. The amusements of his court were a model of elegance to all Europe, and his cabinets were the receptacles only of what was exquisite in painting and sculpture; none but men of the first merit found encouragement from him, and those abundantly; Jones was his architect, and Vandyke his painter." "Charles," it is added, in a strain somewhat more emphatic and unreserved than will be universally approved of, "was a scholar, a man of taste, a gentleman, and a Christian; he was every thing but a king. The art of reigning was the only art of which he was ignorant."

The accession of a prince who united to a thorough appreciation of art, as a means of national improvement and glory, an admiration and knowledge of its works which placed him in the first rank of connoisseurs, promised a golden age to the fine arts in Britain. The soil had already been prepared for the rich harvest which sprung up, unhappily, only to be trodden under foot ere it was ripened. Whatever may have been the apathy of Charles's immediate predecessors toward the fine arts, the high tone of education and accomplishment in the courts of Elizabeth and James could not fail to be greatly favorable to their advancement. Deeply read in classical learning, familiar with the literature of Italy, and polished by foreign travel, the British nobility of this period were well qualified to appreciate and cultivate the true principles of taste. The Earl of Arundel—"the father of virtù in England"—began to collect statues and pictures about 1615, and his gallery, which it was his pleasure to share with all who could appreciate its value, first revealed the beauties of ancient art in Great Britain. To accumulate these treasures, and to communicate to his country the advantages they were calculated to produce, were the occupation and amusement of this distinguished nobleman. He lived to see them dispersed by the agency of ignorant political fanatics; but they were preserved to the country, and have formed the nucleus of several valuable collections existing at the present day. The statues and inscribed marbles (the Arundelian Marbles) are at Oxford, the busts principally at Wilton, and the gems are the brightest ornaments of the celebrated Marlborough collection. Prince Henry appears to have had a genuine taste for the arts, and to have entered early into a pursuit which had become fashionable. He began a collection which afterward passed into the hands of his brother. Eighteen bronzes and most of the medals in King Charles's cabinet are described as having been the property of Prince Henry. The magnificent disposition of the Duke of Buckingham, by whom it is most probable the taste of Prince Charles was directed to the study of painting, found a congenial occupation in the formation of a gallery of art, and he tempted Rubens with the sum of ten thousand pounds to relinquish to him his collection of Italian paintings, chiefly of the Venetian school. The Duke of Buckingham's pictures are lost to England. They were sent abroad previously to the sequestration of his son's property by the parliament, in 1649, and most of them are now in the Imperial Gallery at Vienna. The unrivaled collection of works of art with which Charles enriched his country was founded immediately after his accession. That of Henry VIII. had undoubtedly been increased by his successors, and to this were at once added the separate collection begun by Prince Henry, and the cabinet of the Duke of Milan, then reckoned the most valuable in in Europe, which Charles purchased entire for the sum of £18,000. The cartoons of Rafaelle were acquired in Flanders, through the means of Rubens; and continual accessions were brought to the royal gallery either as purchased or as the most acceptable gifts which could be offered to the king. The royal houses were filled with works of art. The palace of Whitehall contained the cream of the collection, consisting of four hundred and sixty pictures, among which were to be reckoned twenty-eight by Titian, eleven by Correggio, sixteen by Julio Romano, nine by Rafaelle, four by Guido, and seven by Parmegiano. So highly did Charles appreciate these treasures, that he preferred holding the great fêtes of the court in temporary buildings to the risk of injuring his pictures by lighting up the apartments in which they were hung.

In living art the connection of England with the Flemish and Dutch schools was still closely maintained. But these had now risen into competition with the great schools of Italy, or rather had succeeded them in their preëminence; and early in the seventeenth century our catalogue of foreign painters affords names with higher claims to attention than merely that of having visited our shores. Among these, Paul Vansomer, Cornelius Jansen, Gerard Honthorst, well known in Italy as Gherardo della Notte, and Daniel Mytens, have achieved lasting reputation in the great republic of art, and have left among us some of their most valuable productions. The works of the last mentioned bear strong evidence of his studies in the school of Rubens, and he deservedly held the highest place in the esteem of Charles and his court until the arrival of Vandyke, the greatest among the pupils of the prince of Flemish painters.

pitious, and he retired in disappointment at not having obtained the patronage of the king. But Charles was made aware of the talent he had overlooked, and Vandyke was recalled through the mediation of Sir Kenelm Digby. The liberality of Charles—and the "Pittore Cavalieresco," as he was called at Rome, being gay and extravagant, drew largely upon it—fixed him in England for life, and he is so identified with English art that it is difficult to consider him as a foreigner. The greater portion of his numerous works and the best efforts of his pencil are English. The noblest and fairest of his age live on his canvas. His works, widely distributed through our baronial halls, have as widely influenced the taste of their owners, and many of those collections of paintings which are the boast of English mansions have gathered round the heir-looms left on their walls by Vandyke.

Vandyke's proper sphere was portrait. To the best qualities of the style of Rubens, improved by the study of the Venetian painters, he added the grace, elegance, and refinement which his illustrious master, powerful in all that leads to the attainment of eminence in the highest class of art, seems to have disdained. As a portrait painter he holds the second place: Titian alone is entitled to precede him.

Although Vandyke can hardly be said to have founded a school in the limited sense of the term, yet the general tone of art in England has undoubtedly been raised by his example, and the preeminence we may justly claim for our native artists in the class of portrait since we could make any pretension to a national school may be fairly attributed to his influence. His works become familiar to us from our earliest contemplation of art; his style is fixed in the mind, and both artists and amateurs involuntarily refer to it as a standard of excellence.

The year 1630 is distinguished in the annals of British art by the arrival of Rubens, not, however, in the character of a painter, but as the envoy of the King of Spain, for the purpose of negotiating a treaty with Charles, in which commission he was successful. The ambassador, however, consented to assume the pencil; and the ceiling of the Banqueting-House at Whitehall remains as a memorial of his visit. For this work, which represents the Apotheosis of James I., he received £3000. It was Charles's intention to decorate the walls of this noble room with paintings of the institution and ceremonies of the Order of the Garter. The increasing troubles of the kingdom prevented this work from being even begun; but the immense price of £80,000, for which the king is said to have agreed with Vandyke, is probably, as Walpole observes, rather a comment on the magnificence of the prince and the genius of the painter than a matter of fact.

Charles understood the national importance of cultivating the arts too well to limit his exertions in their favor to the initiatory steps of collecting foreign pictures and patronizing foreign painters. In the eleventh year of his reign he planned an academy of arts on a very extended scale. Every aid was to be afforded which might ennoble the study of the arts and raise the character of their professors, and the students were to be instructed in the sciences, languages, riding, fortification, antiquities, and the science of medals. But the storm was gathering which was to overthrow all Charles's projects; and the bitter feeling of the fanatical party toward the king, when the catastrophe arrived, was shown in nothing more strongly than in the war which was declared against the fine arts, because they had the misfortune to be patronized at court.

As early as 1645 the parliament began to sell the pictures and statues at Whitehall. On this subject the following votes were passed:

"Ordered, That all such pictures and statues there (at Whitehall) as are without any superstition, shall be forthwith sold for the benefit of Ireland and the North.

"Ordered, That all such pictures there as have the representation of the second person in the Trinity upon them shall be forthwith burnt.

"Ordered, That all such pictures as have the representation of the Virgin Mary upon them shall be forthwith burnt."

Happily these outrages, which would have consigned to destruction some of the noblest fruits of the human intellect, were never perpetrated. The parliamentary leaders showed in other cases, as well as in this, scorn enough of the tools with which they worked out their own designs; and while the zealots within the walls of the parliament-house might be snuffling forth their hallelujahs for the consummation of an act which would have left the deepest of stains forever upon their cause and upon the English name, the objects of their insane proscription were quietly embezzled, and enriched the pockets or the collections of their masters, as avarice or taste might predominate, and of the latter qualification the parliamentary ranks were by no means destitute. Lambert was even an artist, and occupies a place in Walpole's catalogue of painters. Fairfax was an enthusiast in the congenial pursuit of antiquarian studies. Cromwell himself secured the cartoons for the nation at the price of £300; and one of his first acts, when he had the power, was to prevent any further dispersion of the royal pictures, not only by putting a stop to the sales, but by detaining from the purchasers much that had been sold. But much was already lost to the country, and the first galleries of Europe still shine with the spoils of King Charles's collection.[1]

From what has been said in our former chapter on the history of modern painting in England, it will be anticipated that the list of native painters in the present period will neither be extensive nor important. Scotland furnishes us with one of the best native artists of the period, George Jamieson, called the "Scottish Vandyke." His works, which occupy a place among the best collections in Scotland, do, indeed, bear a great resemblance in those of that great master, with whom he studied under

[1] The exquisite Venus and Mercury of Correggio, lately placed in our National Gallery, belonged to Charles I. It was in the Orleans gallery, traveled into Italy on the dispersion of that collection by another horde of barbarians, and is now happily restored to us.

Rubens. Charles, seeing his works, in 1633, sat to him, and complimented him with a diamond ring from his own finger. Jamieson's portrait by himself is in the Florentine gallery of painters: he died in 1644. William Dobson was the most successful of the scholars of Vandyke, who, attracted by the merit of some of his early works, rescued him from poverty, and presented him to the king, to whom he became sergeant-painter on the death of his patron. The decline of the king's affairs was fatal to him. Being of a dissipated turn, he had neglected the opportunity of providing for himself, and he died in indigence at the age of thirty-six, having given promise of great excellence. His works are frequently attributed to Vandyke; but though he has much of his style, yet it would be an injustice to Dobson's real merit to call him merely an imitator of that master. Robert Walker was also a painter of great merit, and had studied the works of Vandyke. He is chiefly remarkable as being the principal portrait-painter employed by Cromwell, who sat to him many times. In miniature the English artists of the period stand preëminent. Peter Oliver followed in the footsteps of his father, Isaac Oliver, and excelled him. John Hoskins was a painter of great merit in the same branch of art; but it is his pupil, Samuel Cooper, who throws upon it its greatest luster. He has been called the Vandyke of miniature, and most justly, for his best works lose nothing in comparison with those of Vandyke, except as they are inferior in size. To magnify them only brings out the vigor and freedom of his handling. Cooper is unrivaled in his peculiar line; his reputation is universal, and his name one of those which do the greatest honor to English art. He was a favorite painter at court after the Restoration, and died in 1672.

The subject of painting may be closed by a slight mention of a few other foreign artists of note, who were attracted to England during the reign of Charles I. Diepenbeck was among the few pupils of Rubens who visited us at this time. Poelemberg was here for a short period. The celebrated John Petitot, who carried the art of enamel to the highest perfection, also came to England, and was knighted by Charles. He remained until the death of the king, and accompanied the exiled family to Paris, where he passed several years in the service of Louis XIV. Gentileschi, a painter of ceilings in Italy, of some reputation, was invited by Vandyke, and worked for the king at Greenwich and for the Duke of Buckingham at York House. He is well known by his picture of Joseph and Potiphar's wife at Hampton Court, which shows him as a fine colorist. He was a native of Pisa. His daughter, Artemisia Gentileschi, was celebrated in Italy as a portrait-painter, and also visited England. Charles sent an invitation to Albano, and the Duke of Buckingham sought to obtain Carlo Maratti, but neither was successful.

In the reign of James I. the line is distinctly drawn between the ancient and modern styles of architecture in England. The history of the former has been pursued to its close in a former chapter,[1] and we may at once pass to the moment when classical architecture broke upon us with a sudden brilliancy, outshining, for a time, that of any cotemporary school of Europe. For this preëminence we are indebted to the talents of one man, who, "if a table of fame were to be formed for men of real and indisputable genius in every country, would save England from the disgrace of not having her representative among the arts. She adopted Holbein and Vandyke; she borrowed Rubens; she produced Inigo Jones. Vitruvius drew up his grammar; Palladio showed him the practice; Rome displayed a theater worthy of his emulation; and King Charles was ready to encourage, employ, and reward his talents. This is the history of Inigo Jones as a genius."[1]

Inigo Jones was born in London, in 1572. His early history and the progress of his education are somewhat obscure, and as his works (the history of which is in fact the history of architecture during this period) are the principal object of remark, we may pass to the year 1605, when we find him at Oxford, employed in the preparation of a masque, on King James's visit to the university, upon which occasion he is mentioned as a "great traveler." This was immediately after his return to his native country from a residence of several years in Italy, where his occupation, as he tells us himself, was to converse with the great masters, and to search out the ruins of ancient buildings, and where he left behind him a strong impression of his genius and talent. The tradition that he designed the grand Piazza at Leghorn, whether well founded or not—and the probabilities are altogether against it—sufficiently proves the high reputation he had acquired in that land of true art. While in Italy he accepted an invitation from Christian, king of Denmark; and his visit to that sovereign, though short, led to his appointment of architect to Prince Henry, which he received immediately on his return to England.

Inigo Jones had visited Italy at a period when architecture had attained its zenith both of good and evil. Classical architecture had been revived only to be corrupted. It had scarcely been carried beyond the timid though graceful advances of Bramante and Giuliano Sangallo, when Michel Angelo arose, and aimed at originality. His favorite maxim was, "that he who follows must ever remain behind." Supported by the authority of a name so mighty, his daring innovations and affectation of novelty became too much admired and too generally followed. The dregs cast off by the workings of his colossal genius became the inheritance of his imitators; and the insane extravagance of Borromini was but a necessary consequence of Michel Angelo.

But all was not corruption in the schools of Italy. In the hands of Antonio Sangallo, Peruzzi, Sanmicheli, Sansovino, Vignola, and, last and greatest, Palladio, classical architecture was reanimated in all its grace and greatness. The study of these great masters in setting up the ancients for their model was not to imitate, but to think like them. They had before them the works of their Roman predecessors, who had successfully adapted the architecture of the Greeks to their own exigencies; and in a similar spirit, and with no less success, they recast the same elements into new combinations, suggested by the civil, religious, and domestic usages of modern life. Of this school of art, and especially of that branch of it with which the name of Andrea Palladio is worthily identified, Inigo Jones became a follower in the best sense of the term—a follower, passibus equis, in the diligence with which he investigated the remains of antiquity, and the discriminating taste with which he applied the knowledge thus acquired.

The introduction of the Palladian style into England was not, however, the immediate result of Inigo Jones's first studies abroad. Until the year 1612, when the death of Prince Henry deprived him of his ostensible employment, he was principally occupied upon the masques and pageants which were the amusement of the court, of which he devised the scenery, machinery, and decorations, and Ben Jonson the poetry. When differences arose between these coadjutors at a later period, "Surley Ben" satirized his former friend, whose prosperity in his worldly affairs would seem to be his principal offense, in the dramatic characters of In-and-in Medley and Lantern Leatherhead; and, coarse as these delineations are, they have their value, as they appear to have preserved to us some traces of the familiar conversation of so great a man.[1]

On the loss of his post he again visited Italy, where he remained until the office of government surveyor was conferred upon him. In this he soon found employment worthy of his talents. James I. determined to rebuild the palace of Whitehall, and Inigo Jones produced the celebrated design which has contributed more perhaps than his existing works to exalt his name wherever true greatness in art is appreciated. Whatever might be James's own share in originating or promoting this design, his adoption of it alone ought to rescue him from the contemptuous judgment passed upon his taste by Walpole.[2]

The palace of Whitehall had been the established residence of the sovereign since the reign of Henry VIII., by whom it had been obtained from the see of York, and who greatly enlarged and improved it. At the present period it consisted of an immense aggregation of irregular buildings, extending from Scotland Yard on the north, to Cannon Row on the south, and east and west from the Thames to St. James's Park, on which side it reached as far as what is now the top of Downing-street. Some of its principal localities are still marked by the names of Whitehall, the Privy Garden, and the Cockpit; and portions of the structure are extant in the Treasury buildings and on the banks of the river. The intention of King James was to replace this heterogeneous mass by a regular building; and to this effect Inigo Jones produced his design, extending 874 feet on the east and west sides, and 1152 on the north and south, the interior being distributed round seven courts; and with a subject so vast he was perfectly competent to grapple. Notwithstanding the celebrity of this design, it is doubtful how far any existing representation of it is authentic. That published in Campbell's Vitruvius Britannicus is an undoubted fabrication, and that generally received as the original, and published in the meager collection of Inigo Jones's designs by Kent, is probably a compilation from his drawings by his son-in-law and disciple, Webb; and to what extent they may have suffered in the hands of the editor is not easily determined. The existing portion of the edifice (the Banqueting-House) and its corresponding compartments are by no means happily fitted into their places in this composition; and a style of detail runs through the remainder, especially a flagrant abuse of rustics, which it is impossible to attribute to Inigo Jones. But there seems no reason to impugn the general design; and, dimly as it is to be seen through the medium of an engraving obscured with errors, enough is still discernible to assure us that, had it been carried into effect, it would have been the sublimest production of modern architecture, whatever may be the claims of the palaces existing in other countries, Caserta, the Escurial, Versailles, or any other on a commensurate scale. To judge it rightly, it must be considered with reference to the single fragment which was executed, and which has happily been preserved to us unscathed by alteration; for Jones was no portfolio architect: his beauties, like those of the great Italian masters in whose footsteps he trod, are fully developed only in execution; and it is from the careful study of the profiles that his works derive those graces which are equivalent to the finer touches in music and painting, imperceptible to the vulgar taste, and unattainable by the vulgar artist. Fragment as it is, the Banqueting-House alone would be a sufficient foundation for the fame of its author. Its dimensions are such as to stamp it with the character of grandeur, while the simple majesty of the general outline, the picturesque combination of the parts, the harmony of the details, and the tasteful distribution of the ornaments, place it in the highest class of art, and render it equally the admiration of the artist, who traces the mind of the author in his work, and of the uninformed spectator, who is pleased he knows not wherefore.[1] Its faults may be left to the animadversion of those who may be disposed to criticise in it the spirit with which Benjamin West is said to have pitied Titian! But Inigo Jones is at least entitled to be criticised rev-erentially, and it may be doubted whether a line could be altered without injuring the effect which it was the intention of the architect to produce. To those who may be disposed to investigate more closely the style of this great master, Lyndsay House, in Lincoln's Inn Fields, may afford an instructive lesson—not as being by any means one of his best works—but as it has had the singular fortune to be coupled at a later period with a duplicate of itself, in which its faults have been corrected and its style purified, and which resembles the original as grains resemble malt. The two buildings, as they exist side by side, forcibly illustrate the difference between genius and pedantry—between the art which is felt and that which is only studied. Perhaps there is no critical balance in which Inigo Jones can be weighed and found wanting. The church of St. Paul, Covent Garden, was the first, and remains the most successful attempt to adapt the pure and unbroken form of an ancient temple to the purposes of a modern church; and whatever merit may attach to adaptations of this sort, requiring no mind and little ingenuity, the palm is still due to Inigo Jones.

[1] "What the Latins call magnificentia and majestas doth not consist alone in the magnitude or massiness of either the material of a building or the whole pile (for then the huge stones lying one on another, called wring-cheeses, in Cornwall, would be a magnificent structure), but in an artificial decorum or agreeable pulchritude conjoined with greatness of bulk, which two qualities, meeting together in any fabric, cause it to present itself to the eye with a certain twofold gracefulness or majesty that instantly raiseth a sort of respect, and where it is rare and excellent, a kind of delightful wonder, also, in the beholders."—Dr. Charleton's Chorea Gigantum. It would perhaps be difficult to describe the effect of first-rate architecture better than in this quaint passage. It seems written expressly for the Banqueting-House.

In 1633 he undertook the restoration of St. Paul's Cathedral, which appears to have been suffering under the vicissitudes and dilapidations of four centuries. The destruction of the spire by conflagration in 1566 had led to a partial repair of the fabric; but in the eighteenth year of King James its neglected state called loudly for attention. Little, however, was done until Laud became bishop of London, when he applied himself to the work with great zeal, and the king contributed the whole expense of erecting that splendid portico, in allusion to which Lord Burlington said of the present edifice, "When the Jews saw the second temple they wept!"

for attaching a classical portico to a Gothic church. But though the solecism be indefeusible, it was not without reason that the architect himself considered this portico as the greatest of his works, and that upon which he depended for the perpetuation of his fame to future ages. Setting aside the sumptuousness of the materials which the ancients had at command, imperial Rome could have boasted of few porticoes by which it was surpassed, and modern Europe has certainly produced none to equal it. It was not, however, for mere idle effect, or from the poverty of imagination which has garnished so many façades with gratuitous porticoes, that this structure was appended to the cathedral. It had its motive, being designed for an ambulatory in place of the nave of the church, which had long formed a place of public resort under the name of Paul's Walk. A dry plan and elevation are the only record by which we can judge of this great work; but when we consider the place occupied by the portico in proportion to the whole front, its bold projection, and the distance to which the point of sight for a general view of it must have been limited (pressed upon as St. Paul's was by the surrounding buildings even after all that had been done to disencumber it), it is not difficult to approach it in imagination, and to view it with the mind's eye casting into the background every discordant object connected with it, and standing forth in single majesty like the pronaos of a Greek temple. Inigo Jones may not, after all, have been so totally devoid of judgment as some of his commentators have assumed, and he perhaps dreamed of a future period when the church would have been better assimilated to his portico.

The foundation of Whitehall may be considered as the point of division between the ancient and modern architecture of England. As the court architect, Inigo became the fashion; and among the mansions of the nobility which continued to rise until the general wreck of the civil war, there are few of any importance upon which he or his scholar Webb were not engaged. His works are numerous and widely scattered, and it is not much to the credit of his country that they have never been collected and illustrated. Kent, the architect, published some of his drawings in a book already referred to; a few of his works are engraved in Ware's Architecture, and others are very indifferently represented in Campbell's Vitruvius Britannicus. Among the best known by these means may be mentioned the gallery of Old Somerset House, Coleshill, in Berkshire, Stoke Park, the Royal House at Greenwich, the additions to Wilton, Cobham, and Castle Ashby;[1] and Gunnersbury and Amesbury, completed from his designs, by Webb. In this particular class of architecture his example has had a leading and lasting influence on English art. He at once obliterated all traces of our national style. Of the very few of his successors who can lay any claim to originality, the talents of Wren were diverted into a totally different channel; and, with the exception of Vanbrugh and his followers, the general character of our innumerable mansions of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries is that of a tame imitation of the Palladian school.

Inigo has, nevertheless, left us a few buildings of a different character, and those not only among his early works. The addition he made to St. John's College at Oxford, begun as late as 1631, is in a semi-Gothic style. But even in this the mind of the master is conspicuous. It is entirely free from the quaint ugliness with which our architecture of this class had been infected by the Dutch school, and there is a harmony in the proportions and distribution of the ornament (in the garden front especially) which, though it might be difficult to analyze, is irresistibly attractive to the eye. In Heriot's Hospital at Edinburgh he has effected a most masterly adaptation of the national architecture.

While on the subject of Inigo Jones, his researches on the origin of Stonehenge are too curious to be passed without notice. The investigation of this singular monument was imposed upon him by King James. "A man who once resolves upon ideal discoveries," says Dr. Johnson, "seldom searches in vain." The accomplished courtier no doubt fulfilled the anticipations of the royal pedant, when he discovered Stonehenge to be a Roman temple dedicated to Cœlus! How far he was a believer in his own discovery may be doubted, since it was suffered to remain between himself and his master, until Webb did him the doubtful service of disclosing it to the public after his death. Whatever his theory may be worth, he displays a boundless store of knowledge and reading in support of it, and his survey and report upon the monument itself are a model for professional documents of the kind. The theory was impugned by Dr. Charleton, and vindicated by Webb, in a folio volume, valuable for the memoirs of his illustrious father-in-law which are scattered through its pages.

Inigo Jones lived to fall upon evil days in his old age. He died in 1652, broken down with grief, leaving behind him a reputation which it is the lot of few to attain, since his claim to a place in the foremost rank of art has never been disputed. In less important works of architecture the change of style was of course more gradual, but it was, nevertheless, in progress; and had not the opportunity been lost in the adverse current of public affairs, the talents of Inigo Jones might probably have placed the style of our ordinary domestic buildings on a more creditable footing than it has ever been destined to attain. The style of Covent Garden is at once striking and economical; but, with the exception of the arcade, scarcely a trace of its original aspect remains. During the reigns of Elizabeth and James I., the danger and inconvenience arising from the almost exclusive use of timber in the streets of the metropolis had engaged the attention of the government, and repeated proclamations were issued on the subject. But as these proclamations were chiefly directed to prevent the erection of new buildings in London and the suburbs, upon such grounds, as that the increase of the city might draw the inhabitants from other cities, or collect more artisans together than could live, or cause a dearth of provisions, or trouble in governing such multitudes, it is not surprising that they were issued in vain, and with them some useful regulations fell to the ground. In 1605 a new proclamation was issued, and repeated in 1607, commanding brick or stone to be used in all street fronts; but like those which had preceded, it produced little effect, in spite of the censures of the Star Chamber, until 1614, when, examples having been set of the new mode of building in some houses of note, vigorous measures were taken to enforce it, and some of the citizens who had erected new houses of timber were compelled to demolish them. Of the earliest modern brick buildings in the metropolis a specimen still remains, in 1839, in Great Queen-street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, which it is impossible to ascribe to any other but Inigo Jones. The spirited and picturesque character of the style, and the admirable execution of the work, equally point to him as its author. The new regulations, however, were soon neglected, and timber houses, often highly ornamented with plaster-work, continued to be erected in London down to the time of the great fire, when the legislature effectually interposed. The annexed specimens are some of the latest buildings of this description, and form an interesting chronological series with those we have given in the former books.[1]

[1] Castle Ashby has just been illustrated in Robinson's new Vitruvius Britannicus, a work in which several of our ancient mansions are represented in detail, and to which we are indebted for the view of the gallery at Hardwicke, engraved in vol. ii. p. 820.

Sculpture makes but little figure during the reign of James I., and even in that of his successor seems scarcely to have met with the encouragement which was bestowed on the sister arts. Few works of sculpture were executed during this period in England, except monuments, and few of those rise above mediocrity. Previously to the reign of Charles I. the sculptor seems hardly to have been considered as an artist. We find several names conjoined in the construction of a monument, among which that of the sculptor of the effigies is in no way distinguished from the rest. Several obscure foreigners are recorded during the early part of this period as being engaged on works of this kind. The first native sculptor of whom we have any account is Epiphanius Evesham, who is mentioned in terms of high commendation by a cotemporary writer; but as it was not the custom of the sculptors of the period to put their names on their works, it is impossible to identify any thing as of his hand: for the same reason the authors of some of the most meritorious works of this date remain unknown. The tomb of Sir Francis Vere in the north transept at Westminster is by no mean sculptor. The design, which represents four knights supporting a slab on which is laid the armor of the deceased, whose effigy lies beneath, is, indeed, borrowed from the monument of Engelbert of Nassau, at Breda, a work of sufficient merit to countenance the tradition which assigns it to Michel Angelo; but the individual figures are original and of great beauty, especially the heads, that is to say, such of them as have escaped the wanton mutilation with which, more Anglicano, they have been assailed. Sir Francis Vere died in 1609. The monument of Lord Norris, in the same locality, is one of those gorgeous canopied mausolea which it was still the fashion to erect. Around it devoutly kneel the warlike figures of his six sons, "a brood of martial-spirited men," all highly distinguished in arms. Some of them also are irreparably mutilated; but those which remain entire are remarkable for their expression: of one in particular it is not too much to pronounce, that the sculptor has attained a perfection which the ancients frequently sought in vain—an expression at once calm and intense, produced by a feeling of which the ancients perhaps had little idea. The fervor of devotion is personified in this unpretending figure—the very hands are eloquent. Lord Norris died in 1601, but this monument was executed some years later.

Nicholas Stone was the sculptor most in vogue. He was master-mason to the king, and was employed at the Banqueting-House under Inigo Jones. He executed a great number of monuments, which are to be identified by an account he has left of them in his own handwriting. His works are by no means above the general level of the period as works of art, though he sometimes takes an ambitious flight, as in the monument of Sir George Hollis, at Westminster, a very humble imitation of the tombs in the Medici Chapel at Florence. They are, however, remarkable for the transition they display from the ancient to the modern style of monumental composition. Sutton's tomb at the Charter House, designed in conjunction with Bernard Jansen, a Dutch architect, in 1615, is of the former class, and may be contrasted with that of Sir Dudley Carleton, Lord Dorchester, at Westminster, executed in 1649, in the style of which he has evidently been influenced by his connection with the great architect, and in which he has generalized the costume by the folds of the baronial robe. Stone's best work is the statue of Sir Francis Hollis, youngest son of the Earl of Clare, also at Westminster, which is so far superior to his own general taste and that of the age, that Walpole supposes the design to have been suggested by the earl himself; but, however this may be, the graceful pose of the figure and the high finish of the work must certainly be due to the artist. This and other statues by Stone are among the earliest examples of the adoption of the Roman costume, which became so grossly abused in the arts at a later period. Stone died in 1647, leaving two sons, who never attained the reputation of their father, though they visited Italy and studied under Bernini.

During the reign of Charles I. several foreign sculptors of reputation came to share the patronage which was so freely dispensed in England to the professors of the arts. François Anguier and Ambroise du Val were natives of France, and were extensively employed in monumental sculpture; but for the reason before mentioned it is difficult to identify their works. Hubert le Sœur was an artist of a much higher grade. He was a pupil of John of Bologna, and the first sculptor we had who successfully practiced in the highest branches of the art. He arrived about 1630, and executed many works in bronze, of which the beautiful equestrian statue of his royal patron at Charing Cross remains to perpetuate his fame in the metropolis. It was, of course, condemned to destruction by the parliament; but the brazier to whom it was sold for the value of the metal, upon the express condition that he should break it up, concealed it until the Restoration, and it was placed in its present situation about 1678. This worthy tradesman (whose name was John Rivet) is said to have reaped a considerable profit by the sale of toys supposed to be manufactured from the materials of this statue, which were readily purchased as relics by the royalists. entine, was also a sculptor in metal, but greatly inferior to Le Sœur.

Charles wished to possess a bust of himself by Bernini, who at this time enjoyed the greatest reputation, both as a sculptor and architect, of any artist in Europe. For this purpose Vandyke painted the well-known picture in which the king is represented in three views.[1] It is said that Bernini, on receiving the picture, was struck with the physiognomy of Charles, which he pronounced to be that of a man doomed to misfortune. The bust was executed, but what became of it is not certainly known.

We must now enter upon the consideration of another department of the fine arts upon which we have not hitherto had occasion to touch, but in which England has confessedly borne away the honors from all Europe—engraving. So little was done in this art in England previously to the seventeenth century that Vertue professedly begins his Catalogue of Engravers from the year 1600; but a few facts, and the names of several artists who engraved both on wood and copper at an earlier date, are worthy of notice in an historical point of view. Indeed we had engraving as early as printing, since the earliest English printers introduced small plates for their devices, and Caxton's Golden Legend, published in 1483, has many cuts dispersed through the body of the work. The first book that appeared with copper-plates was a medical book published by Thomas Raynalde, in 1540; but no engraver's name is affixed to them. The earliest English copper-plate engraver known by name is Thomas Geminus, who executed the plates for another medical book about the end of Henry VIII.'s reign. Before the end of the sixteenth century the English engravers had attained sufficient reputation to be engaged in foreign countries. Some of the plates for Abraham Ortelius's "Theatrum Orbis Terrarum," published at Antwerp in 1570, were executed by Thomas Geminus, and Humfrey Lluyd of Denbighshire. Ortellus himself speaks in high terms of the English engravers, and, besides the above-mentioned, has recorded the names of Antony Jenkinson, who flourished in 1562, and Robert Leeth. "Engraving," observes Walpole, "was in no contemptible condition in England when we had professors worthy of being employed to adorn Flemish editions. Flanders was at that time a capital theater of arts and learning." Ralph Aggas is famous for his plans and views, especially his great plan of London, executed in the reign of Elizabeth; and to Christopher Saxton we are indebted for the first publication of county maps. George Hoefnagle, Theodore de la Brie, and Elstracke are the most celebrated of the foreigners who flourished here during the same period.

Early in the seventeenth century Crispin Pass, of Utrecht, settled in this country and executed numerous plates. There were several artists of this name, and of the same family, who all engraved with great neatness, one of whom, Simon Pass, was the master of John Payne, the first English engraver whose works merit distinction on the score of art; but he appears to have been of an idle disposition, and to have wasted talents which might have placed him at the head of his profession. Though he enjoyed the patronage of King Charles, he neglected his fame and fortune, and died in indigence before he was forty.

The transcendent talents of Vandyke could not fail to call forth artists worthy to multiply his works by the graver. Robert de Voerst and Luke Vostermans established themselves in England, and are both well known by their admirable transcripts of his works. These engravers appear also to have been the first who executed historical works in England; the latter especially did some excellent plates from the collections of the king and the Earl of Arundel.

In the year 1637 England became the adopted country of an engraver who, although he never attained to any great degree of perfection beyond a limited range of art, has yet, by his unwearied industry and the great variety and usefulness of his labors, acquired a distinguished and deserved reputation. This was the indefatigable and ill-used Winceslaus Hollar. He was a native of Prague, and was bred to the law, which he deserted to follow the bent of his genius, and soon distinguished himself by his views of the various cities he visited in his travels. At Cologne he was so fortunate as to meet with the Earl of Arundel, then on his way to the imperial court, who took him into his train, and remained his patron and protector as long as he lived. Shortly before the civil war he was introduced to the service of the royal family, and employed as drawing-master to Prince Charles. It was at this time he engraved several heads after Vandyke, but to the treatment of that master his style was by no means equal.

Hollar's prosperity was greatly affectd by the downfall of the royal cause. The Earl of Arundel was compelled to take refuge abroad, and Hollar, after suffering greatly from the fortune of war, made his escape from a prison and joined his patron at Antwerp. After the death of the earl, in 1646, he remained in obscurity till 1652, when he returned to England, and occupied himself during several years upon plates for various books, among which the illustrations of Dugdale's works are well known; but he was so miserably paid that he could never succeed in raising himself from a state of absolute indigence.[1] Being sent (after the Restoration) to assist in making a survey of the town and fortifications of Tangior, the government treated him no better than the booksellers; and for a year's labor, attended with infinite danger and difficulty, he obtained no more, after long solicitation and loss of time, then £100. His painful and laborious life was extended to the term of seventy years, and ended in misery.

The engravings of Hollar, according to Vertue's catalogue, in which they are arranged in fourteen classes, amount to the incredible number of 2384, many of which, moreover, are from his own drawings. His maps, plans, views, churches, and monuments—a mine of information and delight to the English antiquary and topographer—are no less than 840, and his portraits 355. Some of his views are very large: his great view of London is in seven sheets, and extends two yards and a half in length, and several others are on two sheets. In panoramic views of this kind he excelled; but Hollar had little of the painter's feeling, and praise is chiefly due to him as a draughtsman and antiquary, and for the scrupulous fidelity with which he rendered the objects before him. In minute works he is the finished artist. His engraving of muffs has never been equalled as a representation of fur; and his shells from the Arundel collection are no less perfect. Hollar had several scholars, among whom Gaywood is his closest imitator.

The history of engraving may be concluded for the present with the mention of Peter Lombart, a native of Paris, and a very excellent artist. He came to England before 1654, and remained until after the Restoration. He engraved after Vandyke with great success, and is well known by the set of female half-lengths from that master, called "The Lombart Beauties." It is related of this artist that he erased the face from his plate of Charles I. on horseback, in order to insert that of Cromwell, and replaced the king's at the Restoration.

It is remarkable that the period of the commonwealth, so unfavorable to the arts in general, should be illustrated by the most exquisite coinage which has appeared in modern times. This, as already mentioned, was the work of an Englishman, the celebrated Thomas Simon. He was a pupil of Nicolas Briot, a native of Lorraine, engraver to the mint in the time of Charles I., and succeeded him in his office in 1646. His first known work, the Admiralty seal, dates ten years earlier. In 1648 he executed the parliament seal, and, remaining in his post after the death of the king, has transmitted the features of Oliver Cromwell to posterity on the obverse of the commonwealth money in a style which has never been excelled in modern art, unless by some of the best in the series of papal medals. He was employed to execute the Restoration medals, but was superseded at the mint in 1662. Being thus thrown out of occupation, he presented a petition to the king, accompanied by a crown piece, which he had executed for the purpose of proving his superiority over the Roetiers, who filled his place, and which is undoubtedly one of the finest specimens of the art of medalling ever produced. Simon is believed to have died of the plague in 1665, nothing being known of him after that time. His elder brother, Abraham Simon, was also a good artist.

Excluding from view the productions of the last fifty years, as not yet ripe for the verdict of history, we may affirm that our National literature, properly so called, that is, whatever of our literature by right of its poetic shape or spirit is to be held as peculiarly belonging to the language and the country, had its noon-day in the space comprehended within the last quarter of the sixteenth and the first of the seventeenth centuries. A splendid afternoon flush also succeeded this meridian blaze, which lasted for a third of a century longer, or down to the Restoration. Paradise Lost, indeed, did not appear till some years after that event; but the poetry of the old age of Milton really did not belong to the time in which it was produced—the "evil days" of frivolity and imitation on which the poet had fallen: he was of the race of the old giants, and apprehended rightly that he had come "an age too late." The same thing may be said of the prose poetry of Jeremy Taylor, although of those of his writings that were not given to the world till after the Restoration the greatest were actually the produce of the preceding age. Milton, and Taylor, and Sir Thomas Browne, and Cudworth, and Henry More, and Cowley, the most eminent of our English writers in the period from the Restoration to the Revolution (if we except Dryden, the founder of a new school, and Barrow, whose writings, full as they are of thought, have not much of the poetical or untranslatable), were all of them, it is worthy of observation, born before the close of the reign of James I., or within the age which has been just described as the noon-day of our literature. The light of that golden time did not utterly depart so long as any of them lived. A boyhood or youth passed in the days of Shakspeare and Bacon, and a manhood in those of the Great Rebellion, formed a training which could not fail to rear high powers to their highest reach of achievement.

[1] "It has been stated to me," says Vertue, speaking of Hollar's view of Greenwich, one of his long prints in two sheets, "that Stent, the printseller, paid him no more than thirty shillings for the drawing and engraving, which two plates might be worth five times as much, taking advantage of the poor man's necessity in the sickness time, 1665, which put a stop to all works of the kind; and the fire of London happening the year after stagnated all affairs of prints and books, and reduced him to such difficulties as he could never overcome." What would a modern engraver say even to Vertue's estimate?

We will now proceed to follow the history of our dramatic literature from the point to which we sketched its rise and progress in the last Book. Both Moral plays, and even the more ancient Miracle plays, continued to be occasionally performed down to the very end of the sixteenth century. One of the last dramatic representations at which Elizabeth was present was a Moral play, entitled "The Contention between Liberality and Prodigality," which was performed before her majesty, in 1600 or 1601. This production was printed in 1602, and was probably written not long before that time: it has been attributed to Robert Greene, who died in 1592. The only three manuscripts of the Chester Miracle plays now extant were written in 1600, 1604, and 1607, most probably while the plays still continued to be acted. There is evidence that the ancient annual Miracle plays were acted at Tewkesbury at least till 1585, at Coventry till 1591, at Newcastle till 1598, and at Kendal down even to the year 1603.

As has been observed, however, by Mr. Collier, the latest and best historian of the English drama, the Moral plays were enabled to keep possession of the stage so long as they did, partly by means of the approaches they had for some time been making to a more improved species of composition, "and partly because, under the form of allegorical fiction and abstract character, the writers introduced matter which covertly touched upon public events, popular prejudices, and temporary opinions."[1] He mentions, in particular, the Moral, entitled "The Three Ladies of London," printed in 1584, and its continuation, "The Three Lords and Three Ladies of London," which appeared in 1590 (both R. W.), as belonging to this class.

Meanwhile, long before the earliest of these dates, the ancient drama had, in other hands, assumed wholly a new form. Mr. Collier appears to consider the Interludes of John Heywood, the earliest of which must have been written before 1521, as first exhibiting the Moral play in a state of transition to the regular tragedy and comedy. "John Heywood's dramatic productions," he says, "almost form a class by themselves: they are neither Miracle plays nor Moral plays, but what may be properly and strictly called Interludes, a species of writing of which he has a claim to be considered the inventor, although the term interlude was applied generally to theatrical productions in the reign of Edward IV." A notion of the nature of these compositions may be collected from the plot of one of them—"A Mery Play betwene the Pardoner and the Frere, the Curate and neighbour Pratte," printed in 1533, of which Mr. Collier gives the following account:—"A pardoner and a friar have each obtained leave of the curate to use his church—the one for the exhibition of his relics, and the other for the delivery of a sermon, the object of both being the same, that of procuring money. The friar arrives first, and is about to commence his discourse when the pardoner enters and disturbs him: each is desirous of being heard, and, after many vain attempts by force of lungs, they proceed to force of arms, kicking and cuffing each other unmercifully. The curate, galled by the disturbance in his church, endeavors, without avail, to part the combatants; he therefore calls in neighbor Pratte to his assistance, and, while the curate seizes the friar, Pratte undertakes to dea. with the pardoner, in order that they may set them in the stocks. It turns out that both the friar and the pardoner are too much for their assailants; and the latter, after a sound drubbing, are glad to come to a composition, by which the former are allowed quietly to depart."[2] Here, then, we have a dramatic fable, or incident at least, conducted, not by allegorical personifications, but by characters of real life, which is the essential difference that distinguishes the tragedy or comedy from the mere moral. Heywood's Interludes, however, of which there are two or three more of the same description with this (besides others partaking more of the allegorical character), are only single acts, or, more properly, scenes, and exhibit, therefore, nothing more than the mere rudiments or embryo of the regular comedy.

The earliest English comedy, properly so called, that has yet been discovered, is that of Ralph Roister Doister, the production of Nicholas Udall, an eminent classical scholar in the earlier part of the sixteenth century, and one of the masters, first at Eton and afterward at Westminster. Its existence was unknown till a copy was discovered in 1818, which was perhaps not printed earlier than 1566 (for the title-page was gone); but the play is mentioned in Thomas Wilson's "Rule of Reason," first printed in 1551, and other considerations make it probable that it may have been written some fifteen or twenty years before.[1] This hypothesis would carry it back to about the same date with the earliest of Heywood's Interludes; and it certainly was produced while that writer was still alive and in the height of his popularity. It may be observed that Wilson calls Udall's play an interlude, which would therefore seem to have been at this time the common name for any dramatical composition, as indeed it appears to have been for nearly a century preceding. The author himself, however, in his prologue, announces it as a "Comedy, or Interlude," and as an imitation of the classical models of Plautus and Terence.

And, in truth, both in character and in plot, Ralph Roister Doister has every right to be regarded as a true comedy. showing, indeed, in its execution, the rudeness of the age, but in its plan, and in reference to the principle upon which it is constructed, as regular and as complete as any comedy in the language. It is divided into acts and scenes, which very few of the Moral plays are; and, according to Mr. Collier's estimate, the performance could not have been concluded in less time than about two hours and a half, while few of the Morals would require more than about an hour for their representation.[2] The dramatis personæ are thirteen in all, nine male and four female; and the two principal ones at least, Ralph himself, a a vain, thoughtless, blustering fellow, whose ultimately baffled pursuit of the gay and rich widow Custance forms the action of the piece, and his servant, Matthew Merrygreek, a kind of flesh-and-blood representative of the Vice of the old Moral plays, are strongly discriminated, and drawn altogether with much force and spirit. The story is not very ingeniously involved; but it moves forward through its gradual development, and onward to the catastrophe, in a sufficiently bustling, lively manner; and some of the situations, though the humor is rather farcical than comic, are very cleverly conceived and managed. The language also may be said to be, on the whole, racy and characteristic, if not very polished. A few lines from a speech of one of the widow's handmaidens, Tibet Talkapace, in a conversation with her fellow-servants on the approaching marriage of their masters, may be quoted as a specimen :—

"I heard our nourse speake of an husband to-day
Ready for our mistresse, a rich man and a gay:
And we shall go in our Frenche hoodes every day,
In our silke cassocks (I warrant you) freshe and gay;
In our tricke ferdigews and billiments of golde,
Brave in our sutes of chaunge seven double folde.
Then shall ye see Tibet, sirs, treade the mosse so trimme;
Nay, why sayd I treade? ye shall see her glide and swimme,
Not lumperdee, clumperdee, like our Spaniel Rig."

Ralph Roister Doister is in every way a very superior production to Gammer Gurton's Needle, which, before the discovery of Udall's piece, had the credit of being the first regular English comedy. At the same time it must be admitted that the superior antiquity assigned to Ralph Roister Doister is not very conclusively made out. All that we know with certainty with regard to the date of the play is, that it was in existence in 1551. The oldest edition of Gammer Gurton's Needle is dated 1575; but how long the play may have been composed before that year is uncertain. The title-page of the 1575 edition describes it as "played on the stage not long ago in Christ's College in Cambridge;" and Warton, on the authority of what he calls "MSS. Oldys," meaning, apparently, some manuscripts left by Oldys, the eminent antiquary, says that it was written and first printed in 1551.[1] Wright also, in his Historia Histrionica, first printed in 1699, states it as his opinion that it was written in the reign of Edward VI. In refutation of all this it is alledged that "it could not have been produced so early, because John Still (afterward bishop of Bath and Wells), the author of it, was not born until 1543; and, consequently, in 1552, taking Warton's latest date, would only have been nine years old."[2] But the evidence that Bishop Still was the author of Gammer Gurton's Needle is really exceedingly slight. The play is merely stated on the title-page to have been "made by Mr. S., Master of Arts;" but even if there was, as is asserted, no other master of arts of Christ's College whose name began with S. at the time when this title-page was printed, the author of the play is not stated to have been of that college, nor, if he were, is it necessary to assume that he was living in 1575. On the whole, therefore, while there is no proof that Ralph Roister Doister is older than the year 1551, it is by no means certain that Gammer Gurton's Needle was not written in that same year.

This "right pithy, pleasant, and merie comedie," as it is designated on the title-page, is, like Udall's play, regularly divided into acts and scenes, and, like it, too, is written in rhyme—the language and versification being, on the whole, perhaps rather more easy and flowing — a circumstance which, more than any external evidence that has been produced, would incline us to assign to it a somewhat later date. But it is in all respects a very tame and poor performance—the plot, if so it can be called, meager to insipidity and silliness, the characters only a few slightly distinguished varieties of the lowest life, and the dialogue in general as feeble and undramatic as the merest monotony can make it. Its merriment is of the coarsest and most boisterous description, even where it is not

[1] History of English Poetry, iv. 32. He adds, that it was "soon afterward acted at Christ's College in Cambridge." And elsewhere (iii. 205) he says that it was acted in that society about the year 1552. We do not understand how Mr. Collier (ii. 444) collects from a comparison of these two passages that "Warton states in one place that Gammer Gurton's Needle was printed in 1551, and in another that it was not written till 1552." Mr. Collier, it may be perceived, is also mistaken in adding, that Warton seems to have had no other evidence for these assertions than the opinion of Wright, the author of the Historia Histrionica.

otherwise offensive; but the principal ornament wherewith the author endeavors to enliven his style is a brutal filth and grossness of expression, which is the more astounding when we consider that the piece was the production, in all probability, of a clergyman, at least, if not of one who afterward became a bishop, and that it was certainly represented before a learned and grave university. There is nothing of the same high seasoning in Ralph Roister Doister, though that play seems to have been intended only for the amusement of a common London audience. The second act of Gammer Gurton's Needle is introduced by a song,

> "I can not eat but little meat,
> My stomach is not good," &c.

which is the best thing in the whole play, and which is well known from having been quoted by Warton, who describes it as the earliest chanson à boire, or drinking ballad, of any merit in the language; and observes that "it has a vein of ease and humor which we should not expect to have been inspired by the simple beverage of those times." Instead of this, however, we shall give, as a specimen of the language of Gammer Gurton's Needle, the following introductory speech to the First Act, which is put into the mouth of a character called Diccon the Bedlam—that is, one of those mendicants who affected a sort of half-madness, and were known by the name of Bedlam Beggars:[1]

> "Many a myle have I walked, divers and sundry waies,
> And many a good man's house have I been at in my dais:
> Many a gossip's cup in my tyme have I tasted,
> And many a broche and spyt have I both turned and basted.
> Many a peece of bacon have I had out of thir balkes,
> In ronnyng over the countrey with long and were walkes;
> Yet came my foote never within those doore cheekes,
> To seek flesh or fysh, garlyke, onyons or leekes,
> That ever I saw a sorte in such a plyght,
> As here within this house appereth to my syght.
> There is howlynge and schowling, all cast in a dumpe,
> With whewling and pewling, as though they had lost a trump.
> Syghing and sobbing, they weepe and they wayle!
> I marvel in my mynd what the devil they ayle.
> The olde trot syts groning, with alas, and alas,
> And Tib wringes her hands, and takes on in worse case;
> With poore Cocke, theyr boye, they be dryven in such fyts
> I feare mee the folkes be not well in theyr wyts.
> Aske them what they ayle, or who brought them in this staye?
> They aunswer not at all, but alacke and welaway!
> When I saw it booted not, out at doores I hyed mee,
> And caught a slyp of bacon, when I saw none spyed mee,
> Which I intend not far hence, unles my purpose fayle, > Shall serve for a shoing horne to draw on two pots of ale."

Probably of earlier date than Gammer Gurton's Needle is another example of the regular drama, which, like Ralph Roister Doister, has been but lately recovered, a play entitled Misogonus, the only copy of which is in manuscript, and is dated 1577. An allusion, however, in the course of the dialogue would seem to prove that the play must have been composed about the year 1560. To the prologue is appended the name of Thomas Rychardes, who has therefore been assumed to be the author. The play, as contained in the manuscript, consists only of the unusual number of four acts, but the story, nevertheless, appears to be completed. For a further account of Misogonus, however, we must refer the reader to Mr. Collier's very elaborate analysis;[1] only remarking that the piece is written throughout in rhyming quatrains, not couplets, and that the language would indicate it to be of about the same date with Gammer Gurton's Needle. It contains a song, which for fluency and spirit may very well bear to be compared with the drinking song in that drama. Neither in the contrivance and conduct of the plot, however, nor in the force with which the characters are exhibited, does it evince the same free and skillful hand with Ralph Roister Doister, although it is interesting for some of the illustrations which it affords of the manners of the time. One of the dramatis personæ, in particular, who is seldom absent from the stage, Cacurgus, the buffoon or fool kept by the family whose fortunes form the subject of the piece, must, as Mr. Collier remarks, "have been a very amusing character in his double capacity of rustic simpleton and artful mischief-maker." "There are few pieces," Mr. Collier adds, "in the whole range of our ancient drama which display the important character of the domestic fool in any thing like so full and clear a light."

If the regular drama thus made its first appearance among us in the form of comedy, the tragic muse was at least not far behind. There is some ground for supposing, indeed, that one species of the graver drama of real life may have begun to emerge rather sooner than comedy out of the shadowy world of the old allegorical representations; that, namely, which was long distinguished from both comedy and tragedy by the name of History, or Chronicle History, consisting, to quote Mr. Collier's definition, "of certain passages or events detailed by annalists put into a dramatic form, often without regard to the course in which they happened; the author sacrificing chronology, situation, and circumstance to the superior object of producing an attractive play."[2] Of what may be called at least the transition from the moral play to the history, we have an example in Bale's lately-recovered drama of "Kynge Johan,"[3] written in all probability some years before the middle of the sixteenth century, in which, while many of the characters are still allegorical abstractions, others are real personages; King John himself, Pope Innocent, Cardinal Pandulphus, Stephen Langton, and other historical figures, moving about in odd intermixture with such mere notional specters as the Widowed Britannia, Imperial Majesty, Nobility, Clergy, Civil Order, Treason, Verity, and Sedition. The play is accordingly described by Mr. Collier, the editor, as occupying an intermediate place between moralities and historical plays; and "it is," he adds, "the only known existing specimen of that species of compo-

[1] Diccon is the ancient abbreviation of Richard. It may be noticed that there is an entry in the Stationers' Books of a play entitled Diccon of Bedlam under the year 1563, which is in all probability the same piece we are now considering. If so, this fact affords an additional presumption that Gammer Gurton's Needle was printed, or at least written, some years before the date of the earliest edition of it now extant.

sition of so early a date." The other productions that are extant of the same mixed character are all of the latter half of the century; such as that entitled Tom Tiler and his Wife, supposed to have been first printed about 1578, although the oldest known edition is a reprint dated 1661; The Conflict of Conscience (called a comedy), by Nathaniel Woodes, minister of Norwich, 1581; &c.[1]

But the era of genuine tragedies and historical plays had already commenced some years before these last-mentioned pieces saw the light. On the 18th of January, 1562, was "shown before the Queen's most Excellent Majesty," as the title-page of the printed play informs us, "in her Highness's court of Whitehall, by the Gentlemen of the Inner Temple," the Tragedy of Gorboduc, otherwise entitled the Tragedy of Ferrex and Porrex, the production of Thomas Sackville, afterward Lord Buckhurst and Earl of Dorset, the same who has been already mentioned as one of the writers of the collection of historical legends, in verse, entitled The Mirror for Magistrates, and of Thomas Norton, who is said to have been a Puritan clergyman, and who had already acquired a poetic reputation, though in a different province of the land of song, as one of the coadjutors of Sternhold and Hopkins, in their metrical version of the Psalms. On the title-page of the first edition, printed in 1565, which, however, was surreptitious, it is stated that the three first acts were written by Norton, and the two last by Sackville; and although this announcement was afterward withdrawn, it was never expressly contradicted, and it is not improbable that it may have a general foundation of truth. It must be confessed, however, that no change of style gives any indication which it is easy to detect of a succession of hands; and that, judging by this criterion, we should rather be led to infer that, in whatever way the two writers contrived to combine their labors, whether by the one retouching and improving what the other had rough-sketched, or by the one taking the quieter and humbler, and the other the more impassioned, scenes or portions of the dialogue, they pursued the same method throughout the piece. Charles Lamb expresses himself "willing to believe that Lord Buckhurst supplied the more vital parts."[2] At the same time he observes that "the style of this old play is stiff and cumbersome, like the dresses of its times;" and that though there may be flesh and blood underneath, we can not get at it. In truth, Gorboduc is a drama only in form. In spirit and manner it is wholly undramatic. The story has no dramatic capabilities, no evolution either of action or of character, although it affords some opportunities for description and eloquent declamation; and neither was there aught of dramatic power about the genius of Sackville (to whom we may safely attribute whatever is most meritorious in the composition), any more than there was about that of his follower, Spenser, illustrious as the latter stands in the front line of the poets of his country and of the world. Gorboduc, accordingly, is a most unaffecting and uninteresting tragedy; as would also be the noblest book of the Fairy Queen, or of Paradise Lost—the portion of either poem that soars the highest—if it were to be attempted to be transformed into a drama, by merely being divided into acts and scenes, and cut up into the outward semblance of dialogue. In whatever abundance all else of poetry might be outpoured, the spirit of dialogue and of dramatic action would not be there. Gorboduc, though a dull play, is in some other respects a remarkable production for the time. The language is not dramatic, but it is throughout singularly correct, flowing, and perspicuous; in many parts it is even elevated and poetical; and there are some passages of strong painting not unworthy of the hand to which we owe the Induction to the Legend of the Duke of Buckingham, in the Mirror for Magistrates. The piece has accordingly won much applause in quarters where there was little feeling of the true spirit of dramatic writing, as the exposition of passion in action, and where the chief thing demanded in a tragedy was a certain orderly pomp of expression and monotonous respectability of sentiment, to fill the ear, and tranquilize rather than excite and disturb the mind. Sir Philip Sidney, while he finds fault with Gorboduc for its violation of the unities of time and place, declares it to be "full of stately speeches and well-sounding phrases, climbing to the height of Seneca in his style, and as full of notable morality, which it doth most delightfully teach, and so obtain the very end of poesy." It grieves him, he adds, that it is so "very defectuous in the circumstances"—that is, the unities—because that must prevent it from remaining forever "as an exact model of all tragedies."[1] Rymer terms it "a fable better turned for tragedy than any on this side the Alps;" and affirms that it might have been a better direction to Shakspeare and Ben Jonson than any guide they have had the luck to follow."[2] Pope has delivered his opinion to the like effect, telling us that "the writers of the succeeding age might have improved by copying from this drama a propriety in the sentiments and dignity in the sentences, and an unaffected perspicuity of style, which are essential to tragedy." One peculiarity of the more ancient national drama retained in Gorboduc is the introduction, before every act, of a piece of machinery called the Dumb Show, in which was shadowed forth, by a sort of allegorical exhibition, the part of the story that was immediately to follow. This custom survived on the English stage down to a considerably later date: the reader may remember that Shakspeare, though he rejected it in his own dramas, has introduced the play acted before the king and queen in Hamlet by such a prefigurative dumb show.

[1] See an account of these and other pieces of the same kind in Collier, Hist. Dram. Poet. ii. 353, &c. In assigning the first publication of Tom Tiler and his Wife to the year 1578, Mr. Collier professes to follow Ritson (Ancient Songs, ii. 31, edit. 1829), who, he observes was no doubt as correct as usual. But, whatever may have been Ritson's correctness in matters of mere transcription, it is proper to note that in the present case he merely offers a conjecture; so that we are left to depend, not upon his correctness, but upon his sagacity. That very little dependence is to be placed upon that they will feel most who know Ritson best.

[2] Short View of Tragedy, p. 84.

Another expedient which Shakspeare has also on two occasions made use of, namely, the assistance of a chorus, is also adopted in Gorboduc; but rather by way of mere decoration, and to keep the stage from being at any time empty, as in the old Greek drama, than to carry forward or even to explain the action, as in Henry the Fifth and Pericles. It consists, to quote the description given by Wharton, "of Four Ancient and Sage Men of Britain, who regularly close every act, the last excepted, with an ode in long-lined stanzas, drawing back the attention of the audience to the substance of what has just passed, and illustrating it by recapitulatory moral reflections and poetical or historical allusions."[1] These effusions of the chorus are all in rhyme, as being intended to be of the same lyrical character with those in the Greek plays; but the dialogue in the rest of the piece is in blank verse, of the employment of which in dramatic composition it affords the earliest instance in the language. The first experiment in this "strange meter," as it was then called, had been made only a few years before by Lord Surrey, in his translation of the Second and Fourth Books of the Æneid, which was published in 1557, but must have been written more than ten years before, Surrey having been put to death in January, 1547. In the mean time the new species of verse had been cultivated in several original compositions by Nicholas Grimoald, from whom, in the opinion of Wharton, the rude model exhibited by Surrey received "new strength, elegance, and modulation."[2] Grimoald's pieces in blank verse were first printed in 1557, along with Surrey's translation, in Tollett's "Songs and Sonnets of Uncertain Authors;" and we are not aware that there was any more English blank verse written or given to the world till the production of Gorboduc. In that case Sackville would stand as our third writer in this species of verse; in the use of which, also, he may be admitted to have surpassed Grimoald fully as much as the latter improved upon Surrey. Indeed, it may be said to have been Gorboduc that really established blank verse in the language; for its employment from the time of the appearance of that tragedy became common in dramatic composition, while in other kinds of poetry, notwithstanding two or three early attempts, such as Gascoigne's "Steel Glass," in 1576, Aske's "Elizabetha Triumphans," in 1588, and Vallans's "Tales of Two Swans," in 1590, it never made head against rhyme, nor acquired any popularity till it was brought into repute by the Paradise Lost, published a full century after Sackville's play. It is remarkable that blank verse is never mentioned or alluded to by Sir Philip Sidney in his Defense of Poetry, which could not have been written more than a few years before 1586, the date of Sidney's death, at the age of thirty-two. Yet he was acquainted with Gorboduc, as it appears; and in one part of his tract he treats expressly on the subject of versification, of which he says, "there are two sorts—the one ancient, the other modern: the ancient marked the quantity of each syllable, and, according to that, framed his verse; the modern observing only number, with some regard to the accent, the chief life of it standeth in that like sounding of the words, which we call rhyme."[1] Even in dramatic composition the use of blank verse appears to have been for some time confined to pieces not intended for popular representation. Gorboduc as we have seen, was brought out before the queen, at Whitehall; and although, after that example, Mr. Collier observes, "blank verse was not unfrequently employed in performances written expressly for the court and for representation before select audiences, many years elapsed before this heroic measure without rhyme was adopted on the public stages of London."[2]

[1] Hist. Eng. Poet. iv. 181. [2] Ibid. iii. 346.

Within a fortnight after the first performance of Gorboduc, it is recorded that another historical play entitled Julius Cæsar, was acted at court; but of this piece—affording "the earliest instance on record," Mr. Collier apprehends, "in which events from the Roman history were dramatized in English"[3]—nothing is known beyond the name. To about the same time, or it may be even a year or two earlier, is probably to be assigned another early drama, founded on the story of Romeo and Juliet, as is inferred from the assertion of Arthur Brooke, in an advertisement prefixed to his poem upon that subject, printed in 1562, that he had seen "the same argument lately set forth on the stage." But whether this was a regular tragedy, or only a moral play, we have no data for conjecturing. "From about this date," says Mr. Collier, "until shortly after the year 1570, the field, as far as we have the means of judging, seems to have been pretty equally divided between the later morals and the earlier attempts in tragedy, comedy, and history. In some pieces of this date (as well as subsequently) we see endeavors made to reconcile or combine the two different modes of writing; but morals afterward generally gave way, and yielded the victory to a more popular and more intelligible species of performance. The license to James Burbage and others in 1574 mentions comedies, tragedies, interludes, and stage plays; and in the act of common council against their performance in the city, in the following year, theatrical performances are designated as interludes, tragedies, comedies, and shows: including much more than the old miracle plays, or more recent moral plays, which would be embraced by the words interludes, shows, and even stage plays, but to which the terms tragedies and comedies, found in both instruments, could not be so properly applicable."[4] We may add, in order to finish

[2] Hist. Dram. Poet. ii. 485. [3] Ibid. 415.

[4] Hist. ii. 417. Mr. Collier adds in a note, as an instance of how the names designating the different kinds of plays were still misapplied, or what vague notions were as yet attached to them, that so late as in 1578, Thomas Lupton called his moral of All for Money both a tragedy and a comedy. He calls it in the title "a moral and pitiful comedy;" and in the prologue "a pleasant tragedy;" but he seems, nevertheless, to use the words in their common acceptation—meaning by these quaint phrases that the piece is a mixture of tragedy and comedy. The catastrophe is sufficiently tragical; Judas, in the last scene, coming in, says the stage direction, "like a damned soul in black, painted with flames of fire and with a fearful vizard," followed by Dives, "with such like apparel as Judas hath;" while Damnation (another of the dramatis personæ) pursuing them, drives them before the subject here, that in the license granted by James I., in 1603, to Burbage, Shakspeare, and their associates, they are authorized to play "comedies, tragedies, histories, interludes, morals, pastorals, stage plays, and such other like;" and that exactly the same enumeration is found in the patent granted to the Prince Palatine's players in 1612; in a new patent granted to Burbage's company in 1620;[1] and also in Charles I.'s patent to Hemings and Condell in 1625. Morals, properly so called, however, had disappeared from the stage long before this last date, though something of their peculiar character still survived in the pageant or masque. It may be observed that there is no mention of morals, any more than of miracle plays, in the catalogue of the several species of dramatic entertainments which Shakspeare has put into the mouth of Polonius in Hamlet, and in which he seems to glance slyly at the almost equally extended string of distinctions in the royal patents.

Of the greater number of the plays that are recorded to have been produced in the first twenty years after the appearance of Gorboduc, only the names have been preserved, from which it can not in all cases be certainly determined to what class the piece belonged. From the lists, extracted from the accounts of the Master of the Revels, of those represented before the court between 1568 and 1580, and which no doubt were mostly the same that were exhibited in the common playhouses, it appears probable that, out of fifty-two, about eighteen were founded upon subjects of ancient history or fable, twenty-one upon modern history, romances, and stories of a more general kind; and that of the remainder, seven were comedies and six morals.[2] "Of these fifty-two dramatic productions," Mr. Collier observes, "not one can be said to have survived, although there may be reason to believe that some of them formed the foundation of plays acted at a later period." Among the very few original plays of this period that have come down to us is one entitled Damon and Pytheas, which was acted before the queen at Christ church, Oxford, in September, 1566, and was the production of Richard Edwards, who, in the general estimation of his cotemporaries, seems to have been accounted the greatest dramatic genius of his day, at least in the comic style. His Damon and Pytheas does not justify their laudation to a modern taste; it is a mixture of comedy and tragedy, between which it would be hard to decide whether the grave writing or the gay is the rudest and dullest. The play is in rhyme, but some variety is produced by the measure or length of the line being occasionally changed. Mr. Collier thinks that the notoriety Edwards attained may probably have been in great part owing to the novelty of his subjects, Damon and Pytheas being one of the earliest attempts to bring stories from profane history upon the English stage. Edwards, however, besides his plays, wrote many other things in verse, some of which have an ease and even an elegance that neither Surrey himself nor any other writer of that age has excelled. Most of these shorter compositions are contained in the miscellany called the Paradise of Dainty Devices, which, indeed, is stated on the title-page to have been "devised and written for the most part" by Edwards, who had, however, been dead ten years when the first edition appeared in 1576. Among them are the very beautiful and tender lines, which have been often reprinted, in illustration of Terence's apophthegm—or, as it is here rendered in the burden of each stanza—

"Amantium iræ amoris redintegratio est;"

"The falling out of faithful friends renewing is of love."

Edwards, who, toward the end of his life, was appointed one of the gentlemen of the chapel royal and master of the queen's singing boys, "united," says Warton, "all those arts and accomplishments which minister to popular pleasantry: he was the first fiddle, the most fashionable sonnetteer, the readiest rhymer, and the most facetious mimic of the court."[1] Another surviving play produced during this interval is the tragedy of Tancred and Gismund, founded upon Boccaccio's well-known story, which was presented before Elizabeth at the Inner Temple in 1568, the five acts of which it consists being severally written by five gentlemen of the society, of whom one, the author of act third, was Christopher Hatton, afterward the celebrated dancing lord chancellor. The play, however, was not printed till 1592, when Robert Wilmot, the writer of the fifth act, gave it to the world, as the title-page declares, "newly revived, and polished according to the decorum of these days." The meaning of this announcement Mr. Collier conceives to be, that the piece was in the first instance composed in rhyme; but rhymed plays having by the year 1592 gone out of fashion even on the public stage, Wilmot's reviving and polishing consisted chiefly in cutting off many of the "tags to the lines," or turning them differently. The tragedy of Tancred and Gismund, which, like Gorboduc, has a dumb show at the commencement and a chorus at the close of every act, is, he observes, "the earliest English play extant, the plot of which is known to be derived from an Italian novel."[2] To this earliest stage in the history of the regular drama belong, finally, some plays translated or adapted from the ancient and from foreign languages, which doubtless also contributed to excite and give an impulse to the national taste him, and they pass away, "making a pitiful noise," into perdition. A few years before, in like manner, Thomas Preston had called his play of Cambyses, King of Persia, which is a mixture of moral and history, "a lamentable tragedy full of pleasant mirth" on the title-page, and in the running title "A Comedie of King Cambises." Another play of about the same date, and of similar character, that of Appius and Virginia, by R. B., is styled "a tragical comedy." At a still earlier period, both in our own and in other languages, the terms tragedy and comedy were applied to other narrative compositions as well as to those in a dramatic form. The most illustrious instance of such a use of the term comedy is its employment by Dante for the title of his great poem, because—as he has himself expressly told us in his dedication of the Paradise to Canedelle Scala, Prince of Verona—the story, although it began sadly, ended prosperously. Even the narratives in the Mirror for Magistrates, published, as we have seen, in the latter part of the sixteenth century, were still called tragedies.

and genius in this department. There is extant an old English printed version, in rhyme, of the Andria of Terence, which, although without date, is believed to have been published before 1530; and the moral, or interlude, called Jack Juggler, which is founded upon the Amphitruo of Plautus, appears from internal evidence to have been written in the reign of Edward VI. or Mary, though not printed till after the accession of Elizabeth. These early and very rude attempts were followed by a series of translations of the tragedies of Seneca, all likewise in rhyme, the first of which, the Troas, by Jasper Heywood, son of the celebrated John Heywood, was published in 1559; the second, the Thyestes, also by Heywood, in 1560; the third, the Hercules Furens, by the same hand, in 1561; the fourth, the Œdipus, by Alexander Nevyle, in 1563; the fifth and sixth, the Medea and the Agamemnon, by John Studley, in 1566. The Octavia, by Thomas Nuce, was entered on the Stationers' Books in the same year, but no copy of that date is now known to exist. Versions of the Hippolytus and the Hercules Oetaeus by Studley, and of the Thebais by Thomas Newton, were added, when the whole were republished together, in 1581, under the title of "Seneca, his Ten Tragedies translated into English." Of the authors of these translations, Heywood and Studley in particular "have some claim," as Mr. Collier remarks, "to be viewed in the light of original dramatic poets; they added whole scenes and choruses wherever they thought them necessary." But Heywood and his coadjutors in this undertaking do not appear to have had any view of bringing Seneca upon the English stage; nor is it probable that any of their translated dramas were ever acted. In 1566, however, "The Supposes," a prose translation by George Gascoigne from Gli Suppositi of Ariosto, and another play, in blank verse, entitled "Jocasta," taken from the Phœnissæ of Euripides, by Gascoigne and Francis Kinwelmarsh, were both represented at Gray's Inn. The Jocasta was, therefore, the second English play written in blank verse. "It is," says Warton, "partly a paraphrase and partly an abridgment of the Greek tragedy. There are many omissions, retrenchments, and transpositions. The chorus, the characters, and the substance of the story are entirely retained, and the tenor of the dialogue is often preserved through whole scenes. Some of the beautiful odes of the Greek chorus are neglected, and others substituted in their places, newly written by the translators."[1] These substitutions, however, sometimes display considerable poetic power; and the versification throughout the piece, both in the old metre (in which the choral passages are written) and in the new, flows with a facility and smoothness, which, as contrasted with any English verse written twenty years before, marks a rate of progress during that space, in the subsidence of the language into comparative regularity of grammatical and syntactical forms, which is very surprising. Warton remarks, as a proof of the rapidity with which the work of refinement or change went on in the language at this time, that "in the second edition of this play, printed again with Gascoigne's poems in 1587, it was thought necessary to affix marginal explanations of many words, not long before in common use, but now become obsolete and unintelligible." In the present instance this was done, as the author tells us, at the request of a lady, who did not understand "poetical words or terms." But it was a practice occasionally followed down to a much later date. To all the quarto editions, for example, of Joshua Sylvester's metrical translation of Du Bartas (1605, 1608, 1613) there is appended "A brief index, explaining most of the hardest words scattered through this whole work, for ease of such as are least exercised in those kind of readings." It consists of thirty double-columned pages, and may contain about six hundred words.[1]

It thus appears that numerous pieces, entitled by their form to be accounted as belonging to the regular drama, had been produced before the year 1580; but nevertheless, no dramatic work had yet been written which can be said to have taken its place in our literature, or to have almost any interest for succeeding generations on account of its intrinsic merits and apart from its mere antiquity. The next ten years disclose a new scene. Within that space a crowd of dramatists arose whose writings still form a portion of our living poetry, and present the regular drama, no longer only painfully struggling into the outward shape proper to that species of composition, but having the breath of life breathed into it, and beginning to throb and stir with the pulsations of genuine passion. We can only here shortly notice some of the chief names in this numerous company of our early dramatists, properly so called. One to whom much attention has been recently directed is George Peele, the first of whose dramatic productions, "The Arraignment of Paris," a sort of masque or pageant which had been represented before the queen, was printed anonymously in 1584. But Peele's most celebrated drama is his "Love of King David and Fair Beth-

[1] Most of these are proper names; many others are scientific terms Among the explanations are the following:—Annals, Histories from year to year.—Anchises' pheere, Venus (pheere itself is not explained, and may therefore be supposed to have been still in common use).—Bacchanalian frows, Women-priests of Bacchus, the God of Cups.—Bar-geese and Barnacles, a kind of fowls that grow of rotten trees and broken ships.—Demain, possessions of inheritance, time out of mind continued in the possession of the lord.—Duel, single combat.—Metaphysical, supernatural.—Poetasters, base, counterfeit, unlearned, witless, and wanton poets, that pester the world either with idle vanities or odious villainies.—Patagons, Indian cannibals, such as eat man's flesh.—Scaliger, Josephus, now living, a Frenchman admirable in all languages for all manner of learning (so in edition of 1613, though Jos. Scaliger died in 1609). These explanatory vocabularies are sometimes, also, found appended to prose works of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Mr. Hallam, in a note to his Introduction to the Literature of Europe, vol. iii. p. 653, has observed that, in Pratt's edition of Bishop Hall's works, we have a glossary of obsolete or unusual words employed by him, which amount to more than 1100, some of which are Gallicisms, but the greater part of Latin or Greek origin. This book was published after the Restoration. By that time we see the difficulty ordinary readers had was, to understand the old words that were going out of fashion; whereas, that of their ancestors, in the days of Elizabeth and James, was to understand the new words that were flowing so fast into their mother-tongue. This little circumstance is so curiously significant not only of the opposite directions in which the language was moving at the two periods, but of the difference, also, in other respects, between an age of advancement and hope and one of weariness, retrogression, and decrepitude.

sabe," first published in 1599, two or three years after the author's death. This play Mr. Campbell has called "the earliest fountain of pathos and harmony that can be traced in our dramatic poetry;" and he adds, "there is no such sweetness of versification and imagery to be found in our blank verse anterior to Shakspeare."[1] David and Bethsabe was, in all probability, written not anterior to Shakspeare, but after he had been at least six or seven years a writer for the stage, and had produced perhaps ten or twelve of his plays, including some of those in which, to pass over all other and higher things, the music of the verse has ever been accounted the most perfect and delicious. We know at least that the Midsummer Night's Dream, Romeo and Juliet, the Merchant of Venice, Richard II., King John, and Richard III. were all written and acted at least, if not all printed, before Peele's play was given to the world.[2] But, independently of this consideration, it must be admitted that the best of Peele's blank verse, though smooth and flowing, and sometimes tastefully decorated with the embellishments of a learned and imitative fancy, is alike deficient in richness or even variety of modulation, and without any pretensions to the force and fire of original poetic genius. It may be true, nevertheless, as is conceded by Mr. Collier, one of the modern critics with whom Peele has not found so much favor as with Mr. Campbell and his late editor, Mr. Dyce, that "he had an elegance of fancy, a gracefulness of expression, and a melody of versification which, in the earlier part of his career, was scarcely approached."[3] Another of Peele's pieces, entitled "The Old Wives' Tale, a Pleasant conceited Comedy," printed in 1595, has excited some curiosity from a resemblance it bears in the story, though in little or nothing else, to Milton's Masque of Comus.[4] Cotemporary with Peele was Robert Greene, most notorious as the writer of a multitude of prose tales and other pamphlets, chiefly controversial, or rather satirical, in which torrents of scurrility are poured out with considerable fluency and liveliness, but also the author of five plays, besides one written in conjunction with a friend. Greene died in 1592, and he appears only to have begun to write for the stage about 1587. Mr. Collier thinks that, in facility of expression, and in the flow of his blank verse, he is not to be placed below Peele. But Greene's most characteristic attribute is his turn for merriment, of which Peele in his dramatic productions shows little or nothing. His comedy, or farce rather, is no doubt usually coarse enough, but the turbid stream flows at least freely and abundantly. Among his plays is a curious one on the subject of the History of Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay, which is supposed to have been written in 1588 or 1589, though first published in 1594. This, however, is not so much a story of diablerie as of mere legerdemain, mixed, like all the rest of Greene's pieces, with a good deal of farcical incident and dialogue; even the catastrophe, in which one of the characters is carried off to hell, being so managed as to impart no supernatural interest to the drama.

Of a different and far higher order of poetical and dramatic character is another play of this date upon a similar subject, The Tragical History of the Life and Death of Doctor Faustus, by Christopher Marlow. Marlow died at an early age in 1593, the year after Greene, and three or four years before Peele. He had been a writer for the stage at least since 1586, in which year, or before, was brought out the play of Tamburlaine the Great, his claim to the authorship of which has been conclusively established by Mr. Collier, who has further shown that this was the first play written in blank verse that was exhibited on the public stage.[1] "Marlow's mighty line" has been celebrated by Ben Jonson in his famous verses on Shakspeare; but Drayton, the author of the Polyolbion, has extolled him in the most glowing description, in words the most worthy of the theme:

> Next Marlow, bathed in the Thespian springs,
> Had in him those brave translunary things > That the first poets had: his raptures were
> All air and fire, which made his verses clear;
> For that fine madness still he did retain
> Which rightly should possess a poet's brain.[2]

Marlow is, by nearly universal admission, our greatest dramatic writer before Shakspeare. He is frequently, indeed, turgid and bombastic, especially in his earliest play, Tamburlaine the Great, which has just been mentioned, where his fire, it must be confessed, sometimes blazes out of all bounds and becomes a mere wasting conflagration—sometimes only raves in a furious storm of sound, filling the ear without any other effect. But in his fits of truer inspiration, all the magic of terror, pathos, and beauty flashes from him in streams. The gradual accumulation of the agonies of Faustus, in the concluding scene of that play, as the moment of his awful fate comes nearer and nearer, powerfully drawn as it is, is far from being one of those coarse pictures of wretchedness that merely oppress us with horror: the most admirable skill is applied throughout in balancing that emotion by sympathy and even respect for the sufferer—

> —— for he was a scholar once admired
> For wondrous knowledge in our German schools—and yet without disturbing our acquiescence in the

[2] This is established by the often quoted passage in Meres's Wit's Treasury, published in 1598, in which these and others of Shakspeare's plays are enumerated.

[3] Mr. Hallam's estimate is, perhaps, not quite so high: "Peele has some command of imagery, but in every other quality it seems to me that he has scarce any claim to honor; and I doubt if there are three lines together in any of his plays that could be mistaken for Shakspeare's. . . . The versification of Peele is much inferior to that of Marlowe; and though sometimes poetical, he seems rarely dramatic."—Lit. of Eur. ii. 378.

[4] This was first pointed out by Isaac Reed in the appendix to his edition of Baker's Biographia Dramatica, 1782, vol. ii. p. 441. The subject has been examined at length by Warton in his edition of the Minor Poems of Milton, pp. 135, 136; and again, pp. 575–577. (2d edit. Lon. 1791.) He observes, "That Milton had an eye on this ancient drama, which might have been the favorite of his early youth, perhaps may be at least affirmed with as much credibility as that he conceived the Paradise Lost from seeing a mystery at Florence, written by Andreini, a Florentine, in 1617, entitled Adamo."

justice of his doom; till we close the book, saddened, indeed, but not dissatisfied, with the pitying but still tributary and almost consoling words of the Chorus on our hearts—

> Cut is the branch that might have grown full straight,
> And burned is Apollo's laurel-bough
> That sometime grew within this learned man.

Still finer, perhaps, is the conclusion of another of Marlow's dramas — his tragedy of Edward II. "The reluctant pangs of abdicating royalty in Edward," says Charles Lamb, "furnished hints which Shakspeare scarce improved in his Richard II.; and the death-scene of Marlow's king moves pity and terror beyond any scene, ancient or modern, with which I am acquainted."[1] Much splendor of poetry, also, is expended upon the delineation of Barabas, in the Rich Jew of Malta; but "Marlow's Jew," as Lamb has observed, "does not approach so near to Shakspeare's (in the Merchant of Venice) as his Edward II." We are more reminded of some of Barabas's speeches by the magnificent declamation of Mammon in Jonson's Alchymist.

Marlow, Greene, and Peele are the most noted names among those of our dramatists who belong exclusively to the age of Elizabeth; but some others that have less modern celebrity may perhaps be placed at least on the same line with the two latter. John Lyly, the Euphuist, as he is called, has been already mentioned in the preceding Book in connection with the prose literature of the period.[2] As a poet he is, in his happiest efforts, elegant and fanciful; but his genius was better suited for the lighter kinds of lyric poetry than for the drama. He is the author of nine dramatic pieces; but of these seven are in prose, and only one in rhyme and one in blank verse. All of them according to Mr. Collier, "seem to have been written for court entertainments, although they were also performed at theaters, most usually by the children of St. Paul's and the Revels." They were fitter, it might be added, for beguiling the listlessness of courts than for the entertainment of a popular audience, athirst for action and passion, and very indifferent to mere ingenuities of style. All poetical readers, however, remember some songs and other short pieces of verse with which some of them are interspersed, particularly a delicate little anacreontic in that entitled Alexander and Campaspe, beginning—

> "Cupid and my Campaspe played > At cards for kisses," &c.

Mr. Collier observes that Malone must have spoken from a very superficial acquaintance with Lyly's works when he contends that his plays are comparatively free from those affected conceits and remote allusions that characterize most of his other productions. Thomas Kyd, the author of the two plays of Jeronimo and the Spanish Tragedy (which is a continuation of the former), besides a translation of another piece from the French, appears to be called "Sporting Kyd" by Jonson, in his verses on Shakspeare, in allusion merely to his name. There is, at least, nothing particularly sportive in the little that has come down to us from his pen. Kyd was a considerable master of language; but his rank as a dramatist is not very easily settled, seeing that there is much doubt as to his claims to the authorship of by far the most striking passages in the Spanish Tragedy, the best of his two plays. Lamb, quoting the scenes in question, describes them as "the very salt of the old play, which, without them," he adds, "is but a caput mortuum." It has been generally assumed that they were added by Ben Jonson, who certainly was employed to make some additions to this play; and Mr. Collier attributes them to him as if the point did not admit of a doubt—admitting, however, that they represent Jonson in a new light, and that "certainly there is nothing in his own entire plays equaling in pathetic beauty some of his contributions to The Spanish Tragedy." Nevertheless, it does not seem to be perfectly clear that the supposed contributions by another hand might not have been the work of Kyd himself. Lamb says, "There is nothing in the undoubted plays of Jonson which would authorize us to suppose that he could have supplied the scenes in question. I should suspect the agency of some 'more potent spirit.' Webster might have furnished them. They are full of that wild, solemn, preternatural cast of grief which bewilders us in the Duchess of Malfy." The last of these early dramatists we shall notice, Thomas Lodge, who was born about 1556, and began to write for the stage about 1580, is placed by Mr. Collier "in a rank superior to Greene, but in some respects inferior to Kyd." His principal dramatic work is entitled "The Wounds of Civil War, lively set forth in the true Tragedies of Marius and Sylla," and is written in blank verse with a mixture of rhyme. It shows him, Mr. Collier thinks, to have unquestionably the advantage over Kyd as a drawer of character, though not equaling that writer in general vigor and boldness of poetic conception. His blank verse is also much more monotonous than that of Kyd. Another strange drama in rhyme, written by Lodge in conjuction with Greene, is entitled "A Looking-glass for London and England," and has for its object to put down the puritanical outcry against the immorality of the stage, which it attempts to accomplish by a grotesque application to the city of London of the scriptural story of Nineveh. The whole performance, in Mr. Collier's opinion, "is wearisomely dull, although the authors have endeavored to lighten the weight by the introduction of scenes of drunken buffoonery between 'a clown and his crew of ruffians,' and between the same clown and a person disguised as the devil, in order to frighten him, but who is detected and well beaten." Mr. Hallam, however, pronounces that there is great talent shown in this play, "though upon a very strange canvas."[1] Lodge, who was an eminent physician, has left a considerable quantity of other poetry besides his plays, partly in the form of novels or tales, partly in shorter pieces, many of which may be found in the miscellany called England's Helicon, from which a few of them have been extracted by Mr. Ellis, in his Specimens. They are, perhaps, on the whole, more creditable to his poetical powers than his dramatic performances. One of his tales, first printed in 1590, under the title of "Rosalynde: Euphues's Golden Legacie, found in his cell at Silextra" (for Lodge was one of Lyly's imitators), is famous at the source from which Shakspeare appears to have taken the story of his As You Like It. "Of this production it may be said," observes Mr. Collier, "that our admiration of many portions of it will not be diminished by a comparison with the work of our great dramatist."[1]

It is worthy of remark, that all these founders and first builders-up of the regular drama in England were, nearly if not absolutely without an exception, classical scholars and men who had received a university education. Nicholas Udal was of Corpus Christi College, Oxford; John Still (if he is to be considered the author of Gammer Gurton's Needle) was of Christ's College, Cambridge; Sackville was educated at both universities; so was Gascoigne; Richard Edwards was of Corpus Christi, Oxford; Marlow was of Benet College, Cambridge; Greene, of St. John's, Cambridge; Peele, of Christ Church, Oxford; Lyly, of Magdalen College; and Lodge, of Trinity College, in the same university. Kyd was also probably a university man, though we know nothing of his private history. To the training received by these writers the drama that arose among us after the middle of the sixteenth century may be considered to owe not only its form, but in part also its spirit, which had a learned and classical tinge from the first, that never entirely wore out. The diction of the works of all these dramatists betrays their scholarship; and they have left upon the language of our higher drama, and indeed of our blank verse in general, of which they were the main creators, an impress of Latinity, which, it can scarcely be doubted, our vigorous but still homely and unsonorous Saxon speech needed to fit it for the requirements of that species of composition. Fortunately, however, the greatest and most influential of them were not mere men of books and readers of Greek and Latin. Greene, and Peele, and Marlow, all spent the noon of their days (none of them saw any afternoon) in the busiest haunts of social life, sounding in their reckless course all the depths of human experience, and drinking the cup of passion and suffering to the dregs. And of their greater successors, those who carried the drama to its height among us in the next age, while some were also accomplished scholars, all were men of the world—men who knew their brother-men by an actual and intimate intercourse with them in their most natural and open-hearted moods, and over a remarkably extended range of conditions. We know, from even the scanty fragments of their history that have come down to us, that Shakspeare, and Jonson, and Beaumont, and Fletcher, all lived much in the open air of society, and mingled with all ranks from the highest to the lowest; some of them, indeed, having known what it was actually to belong to classes very far removed from each other at different periods of their lives. But we should have gathered, though no other record or tradition had told us, that they must have been men of this genuine and manifold experience from their drama alone—various, and rich, and glowing as that is, even as life itself.

[1] Hist. of Dram. Poet. iii. 213.

William Shakspeare, born in 1564, is enumerated as one of the proprietors of the Blackfriars Theater, in 1589; is sneered at by Robert Greene, in 1592, in terms which seem to imply that he had already acquired a considerable reputation as a dramatist and a writer in blank verse, though the satirist insinuates that he was enabled to make the show he did chiefly by the plunder of his predecessors;[1] and in 1598 is spoken of by a critic of the day as indisputably the greatest of English dramatists, both in tragedy and comedy, and as having already produced his Two Gentlemen of Verona, Comedy of Errors, Love's Labors Lost, Love's Labors Won (that is, All's Well that Ends Well), Midsummer Night's Dream, Merchant of Venice, Richard II., Richard III., Henry IV., King John, Titus Andronicus, and Romeo and Juliet.[2] There is no ground, however, for feeling assured, and indeed it is rather improbable, that we have here a complete catalogue of the plays written by Shakspeare up to this date; nor is the authority of so evidently loose a statement, embodying, it is to be supposed, the mere report of the town, sufficient even to establish absolutely the authenticity of every one of the plays enumerated. It is very possible, for example, that Meres may be mistaken in assigning Titus Andronicus to Shakspeare; and, on the other hand, he may be the author of Pericles, and may have already written that play and some others, although Meres does not mention them. The only other direct information we possess on this subject is, that Titus Andronicus (if we may suppose it to be Shakspeare's) was first published in 1594; Richard II., Richard III., and Romeo and Juliet, in 1597; Love's Labors Lost and the First Part of Henry IV., in 1598 (the latter, however, having been entered at Stationers' Hall the preceding year); a "corrected and augmented" edition of Romeo and Juliet, in 1599; the Second Part of Henry IV., Henry V., the Midsummer Night's Dream, Much Ado about Nothing, and the Merchant of Venice, in 1600 (the last having been entered at Stationers' Hall in 1598); the Second and Third Parts of Henry VI. (if they are by Shakspeare) the same year (but entered at Stationers' Hall in 1594); the Merry Wives of Windsor, in 1602 (but entered at Stationers' Hall the year before); Hamlet, 1603 (entered likewise the year before); a second and greatly enlarged edition of Hamlet, in 1604; Lear, in 1608, and Troilus and Cressida, and Pericles, in 1609

(each being entered the preceding year); Othello, not till 1622, six years after the author's death; and all the other plays, namely, The Two Gentlemen of Verona, The Winter's Tale, The Comedy of Errors, King John, All's Well that Ends Well, As You Like It, King Henry VIII., Measure for Measure, Cymbeline, Macbeth, The Taming of the Shrew, Julius Cæsar, Antony and Cleopatra, Coriolanus, Timon of Athens, The Tempest, and Twelfth Night, not till they appeared together, and along with those formerly printed, in the first folio, in 1623. That collection also contained the First Part of Henry VI., of which it may be confidently affirmed Shakspeare never wrote a line.

Such is the sum of the treasure that Shakspeare has left us; but the revolution which his genius wrought upon our national drama is placed in the clearest light by comparing his earliest plays with the best which the language possessed before his time. He has made all his predecessors obsolete. While his Merchant of Venice, and his Midsummer Night's Dream, and his Romeo and Juliet, and his King John, and his Richard II., and his Henry IV., and his Richard III., all certainly produced, as we have seen, before the year 1598, are still the most universally familiar compositions in our literature, no other dramatic work that had then been written is now popularly read, or familiar to any body except to a few professed investigators of the antiquities of our poetry. Where are now the best productions of even such writers as Greene, and Peele, and Marlow, and Decker, and Marston, and Webster, and Thomas Heywood, and Middleton? They are to be found among our "Select Collections of Old Plays"—publications intended rather for the mere preservation of the pieces contained in them than for their diffusion among a multitude of readers. Or, if the entire works of a few of these elder dramatists have recently been collected and republished, this has still been done only to meet the demand of a comparatively very small number of curious students, anxious to possess and examine for themselves whatever relics are still recoverable of the old world of our literature. Popularly known and read the works of these writers never again will be; there is no more prospect or probability of this than there is that the plays of Shakspeare will ever lose their popularity among his countrymen. In that sense, everlasting oblivion is their portion, as everlasting life is his. In one form only have they any chance of again attracting some measure of the general attention—namely, in the form of such partial and very limited exhibition as Lamb has given us an example of in his "Specimens." And herein we see the first great difference between the plays of Shakspeare and those of his predecessors, and one of the most immediately conspicuous of the improvements which he introduced into dramatic writing. He did not create our regular drama, but he regenerated and wholly transformed it, as if by breathing into it a new soul. We possess no dramatic production anterior to his appearance that is at once a work of high genius and of any thing like equably-sustained power throughout. Wonderful bursts of poetry there are in many of the pieces of our earlier dramatists; but the higher they soar in one scene, the lower they generally seem to think it expedient to sink in the next. Their great efforts are made only by fits and starts: for the most part it must be confessed that the best of them are either merely extravagant and absurd, or do nothing but trifle or doze away over their task with the expenditure of hardly any kind of faculty at all. This may have arisen in part from their own want of judgment or want of painstaking, in part from a very rude condition of the popular taste; but the effect is to invest all that they have bequeathed to us with an air of barbarism, and to tempt us to take their finest displays of successful daring for mere capricious inspirations, resembling the sudden impulses of fury by which the listless and indolent man of the woods will sometimes be roused on the instant from his habitual laziness and passiveness to an exhibition of superhuman strength and activity. From this savage or savage-looking state, our drama was first redeemed by Shakspeare. Even Milton has spoken of his "wood-notes wild;" and Thomson, more unceremoniously, has baptized him "wild Shakspeare"[1]—as if a sort of half-insane irregularity of genius were the quality that chiefly distinguished him from other great writers. If he be a "wild" writer, it is in comparison with some dramatists and poets of succeeding times, who, it must be admitted, are sufficiently tame: compared with the dramatists of his own age and of the age immediately preceding—with the general throng of the writers from among whom he emerged, and the coruscations of whose feebler and more desultory genius he has made pale—he is distinguished from them by nothing which is more visible at the first glance than by the superior regularity and elaboration that mark his productions. Marlow, and Green, and Kyd, may be called wild, and wayward, and careless; but the epithets are inapplicable to Shakspeare, by whom, in truth, it was that the rudeness of our early drama was first refined, and a spirit of high art put into it, which gave it order and symmetry as well as elevation. It was the union of the most consummate judgment with the highest creative power that made Shakspeare the miracle that he was—if, indeed, we ought not rather to say that such an endowment as his of "the vision and the faculty divine" necessarily implied the clearest and truest discernment as well as the utmost productive energy—even as the most intense heat must illuminate as well as warm. But, undoubtedly, his dramas are distinguished from those of his predecessors by much more than merely this superiority in the general principles upon which they are constructed. Such rare passages of exquisite poetry, and scenes of sublimity or true passion, as sometimes brighten the dreary waste of their productions, are equaled or exceled in almost every page of his; "the highest heaven of invention," to which they ascend only in far distant flights, and where their strength of pinion never sustains them long, is the familiar home of his genius. Other qualities, again, which charm us in his plays, are nearly unknown in theirs. He first informed our drama with true wit and humor. Of boisterous, uproarious, blackguard merriment and buffoonery, there is no want in our earlier dramatists, nor of mere jibing and jeering and vulgar personal satire; but of true airy wit there is little or none. In the comedies of Shakspeare the wit plays and dazzles like dancing light. This seems to have been the excellence, indeed, for which he was most admired by his cotemporaries; for quickness and felicity of repartee they placed him above all other play-writers. But his humor was still more his own than his wit. In that rich but delicate and subtil spirit of drollery, moistening and softening whatever it touches like a gentle oil, and penetrating through all infoldings and rigorous incrustments into the kernel of the ludicrous that is in every thing, which mainly created Malvolio, and Shallow, and Slender, and Dogberry, and Verges, and Bottom, and Lancelot, and Launce, and Costard, and Touchstone, and a score of other clowns, fools, and simpletons, and which, gloriously overflowing in Falstaff, makes his wit exhilarate like wine, Shakspeare had almost as few successors as he had predecessors. Sterne is, of modern English authors, the one who has come nearest to him in this quality. It is often said that the drama should be a faithful picture or representation of real life; or, if this doctrine be given up in regard to the tragic or more impassioned drama, because even kings and queens in the actual world never do declaim in the pomp of blank verse, as they do on the stage, still it is insisted that in comedy no character is admissible that is not a transcript—a little embellished perhaps, but still substantially a transcript from some genuine flesh-and-blood original. But Shakspeare has shown that it belongs to such an imagination as his to create in comedy, as well as in tragedy or in poetry of any other kind. Most of the characters that have just been mentioned are as purely the mere creations of the poet's brain as are Ariel, or Caliban, or the witches in Macbeth. If any modern critic will have it that Shakspeare must have actually seen Malvolio, and Launce, and Touchstone, before he could or at least would have drawn them, we would ask the said critic if he himself has ever seen such characters in real life; and if he acknowledge, as he needs must, that he never has, we would then put it to him to tell us why the cotemporaries of the great dramatist might not have enjoyed them in his plays without ever having seen them elsewhere, just as we do; or, in other words, why such delineations might not have perfectly fulfilled their dramatic purpose then as well as now, when they certainly do not represent any thing that is to be seen upon earth, any more than do Don Quixote and Sancho Panza. There might have been professional clowns and fools in the age of Shakspeare, such as are no longer extant; but at no time did there ever actually exist such fools and clowns as his. These and other similar personages of the Shaksperian drama are as much mere poetical phantasmata as are the creations of the kindred humor of Cervantes. But are they the less amusing or interesting on that account?—do we the less sympathize with them?—nay, do we feel that they are less naturally drawn?—that they have for us less of a truth and life than the most faithful copies from the men and women of the real world? But in these, too, there is no other drama so rich as that of Shakspeare. He has exhausted the old world of our actual experience as well as imagined for us new worlds of his own.[1] What other anatomist of the human heart has ever searched its hidden core, and laid bare all the strength and weakness of our mysterious nature, as he has done in the gushing tenderness of Juliet, and the "fine frenzy" of the discrowned Lear, and the sublime melancholy of Hamlet, and the wrath of the perplexed and tempest-torn Othello, and the eloquent misanthropy of Timon, and the fixed hate of Shylock? What other poetry has given shape to any thing half so terrific as Lady Macbeth, or so winning as Rosalind, or so full of gentlest womanhood as Desdemona? In what other drama do we behold so living a humanity as in his? Who has given us a scene either so crowded with diversities of character, or so stirred with the heat and hurry of actual existence? The men and the manners of all countries and of all ages are there: the lovers and warriors, the priests and prophetesses of the old heroic and kingly times of Greece—the Athenians of the days of Alcibiades and Pericles—the proud patricians and turbulent commonalty of the earliest period of republican Rome—Cæsar, and Brutus, and Cassius, and Antony, and Cleopatra, and the other splendid figures of that later Roman scene—the kings and queens, and princes and courtiers of barbaric Denmark, and Roman Britain, and Britain before the Romans—those of Scotland in the time of the English Heptarchy—those of England and France at the era of Magna Charta—all ranks of the people of almost every reign of our subsequent history from the end of the fourteenth to the middle of the sixteenth century—not to speak of Venice, and Verona, and Mantua, and Padua, and Illyria, and Navarre, and the Forest of Arden, and all the other towns and lands which he has peopled for us with their most real inhabitants. But Shakspeare is not a mere dramatist. Apart altogether from his dramatic power, he is the greatest poet that ever lived. His sympathy is the most universal, his imagination the most plastic, his diction the most expressive ever given to any writer. His poetry has in itself the power and varied excellences of all other poetry. While in grandeur, and beauty, and passsion, and sweetest music, and all the other higher gifts of song, he may be ranked with the greatest—with Spenser, and Chaucer, and Milton, and Dante, and Homer—he is at the same time more nervous than Dryden, and more sententious than Pope, and almost more sparkling and of more abounding conceit, when he chooses, than Donne, or Cowley, or Butler. In whose handling was language ever such a flame of fire as it is in his? His wonderful potency in the use of this instrument would alone set him above all other writers. Language has been called the costume of thought: it is such a costume as leaves are to the tree or blossoms to the flower, and grows out of what it adorns. Every great and original writer accordingly has distinguished, and as it were individualized, himself as much by his diction as by even the sentiment which it embodies; and the invention of such a distinguishing style is one of the most unequivocal evidences of genius. But Shakspeare has invented twenty styles. He has a style for every one of his great characters, by which that character is distinguished from every other as much as Pope is distinguished by his style from Dryden, or Milton from Spenser.

Shakspeare died in 1616. The space of a quarter of a century, or more, over which his career as a writer for the stage extends, is illustrated also by the names of a crowd of other dramatists, many of them of very remarkable genius; but Shakspeare is distinguished from the greater number of his cotemporaries nearly as much as he is from his immediate predecessors. With regard to the latter it has been well observed, by a late critic of eminent justness and delicacy of taste, that while they "possessed great power over the passions, had a deep insight into the darkest depths of human nature, and were, moreover, in the highest sense of the word, poets, of that higher power of creation with which Shakspeare was endowed, and by which he was enabled to call up into vivid existence all the various characters of men, and all the events of human life, Marlow and his cotemporaries had no great share, so that their best dramas may be said to represent to us only gleams and shadowings of mind, confused and hurried actions, from which we are rather led to guess at the nature of the persons acting before us, than instantaneously struck with a perfect knowledge of it; and even amid their highest efforts, with them the fictions of the drama are felt to be but faint semblances of reality. If we seek for a poetical image—a burst of passion—a beautiful sentiment—a trait of nature—we seek not in vain in the works of our very oldest dramatists. But none of the predecessors of Shakspeare must be thought of along with him, when he appears before us like Prometheus, molding the figures of men, and breathing into them the animation and all the passions of life."[1] "The same," proceeds this writer, "may be said of almost all his illustrious cotemporaries. Few of them ever have conceived a consistent character, and given a perfect drawing and coloring of it: they have rarely, indeed, inspired us with such belief in the existence of their personages as we often feel toward those of Shakspeare, and which makes us actually unhappy unless we can fully understand every thing about them, so like are they to living men. . . . . The plans of their dramas are irregular and confused, their characters often wildly distorted, and an air of imperfection and incompleteness hangs in general over the whole composition; so that the attention is wearied out—the interest flags—and we rather hurry on, than are hurried, to the horrors of the final catastrophe." In other words, the generality of the dramatic writers who were cotemporary with Shakspeare still belong to the semi-barbarous school which subsisted before he began to write.

George Chapman was born six or seven years before Shakspeare, but did not begin to write for the stage till about the year 1595, after which he produced sixteen plays that have survived, besides one in the composition of which he was assisted by Ben Jonson and Marston, and two others in which he joined Shirley. One anonymous play, The Second Maiden's Tragedy (printed for the first time in 1824), and five others that are lost, have also been attributed to him. All these pieces were probably produced before the year 1620; and he died in 1634. Chapman's best-known, and probably also his best plays, are his tragedy of Bussy d'Ambois, printed in the third volume of Dilk's Old Plays (1814), his comedy of Monsieur d'Olive, in the same collection, and his comedies of All Fools, the Widow's Tears, and Eastward Hoe (the last the piece in which he was assisted by Jonson and Marston), in Dodsley's Collection.[1] "Of all the English play-writers," says Lamb, "Chapman perhaps approaches nearest to Shakspeare in the descriptive and didactic, in passages which are less purely dramatic. Dramatic imitation was not his talent. He could not go out of himself, as Shakspeare could shift at pleasure, to inform and animate other existences, but in himself he had an eye to perceive and a soul to embrace all forms."[2] Besides his dramas, Chapman is the author of various poetical works, of which his translations of the Iliad and the Odyssey are by far the greatest. "He would have made a great epic poet," continues Lamb, "if, indeed, he has not abundantly shown himself to be one; for his Homer is not so properly a translation as the stories of Achilles and Ulysses rewritten. The earnestness and passion which he has put into every part of these poems would be incredible to a reader of mere modern translations. His almost Greek zeal for the honor of his heroes is only paralleled by that fierce spirit of Hebrew bigotry with which Milton, as if personating one of the zealots of the old law, clothed himself when he sat down to paint the acts of Samson against the uncircumcised. The great obstacle to Chapman's translations being read is their unconquerable quaintness. He pours out in the same breath the most just and natural and the most violent and forced expressions. He seems to grasp whatever words come first to hand during the impetus of inspiration, as if all other must be inadequate to the divine meaning. But passion (the all in all in poetry) is everywhere present, raising the low, dignifying the mean, and putting sense into the absurd. He makes his readers glow, weep, tremble, take any affection which he pleases—be moved by words, or in spite of them, be disgusted and overcome that disgust." Chapman's Homer is worthy of this fine tribute. Few writers have been more copiously inspired with the genuine frenzy of poetry—with that "fine madness," which, as Drayton has said in his lines on Marlow, "rightly should possess a poet's brain." Indeed, in the character of his genius, out of the province of the drama, Chapman bears a considerable resemblance to Marlow, whose unfinished translation of Musæus's Hero and Leander he completed. With more judgment and more care he might have given to his native language, in his version of the Iliad, one of the very greatest of the poetical works it possesses. But what, except the most extreme irregularity and inequality—a rough sketch rather than a finished performance, was to be expected from his boast of having translated half the poem—namely, the last twelve books—in fifteen weeks? Yet, rude and negligent upon the whole as it is, Chapman's is by far the most Homeric Iliad we yet possess. The enthusiasm of the translator for his original is uncompromising to a degree of the ludicrous. "Of all books," he exclaims in his preface, "extant in all kinds, Homer is the first and best;" and in the same spirit, in quoting a passage from Pliny's Natural History in another portion of his preliminary matter, he proceeds first to turn it into verse, "that no prose may come near Homer." In spite, however, of all this eccentricity, and of a hurry and impetuosity which betray him into many mistranslations, and, on the whole, have the effect perhaps of giving a somewhat too tumultuous and stormy representation of the Homeric poetry, the English into which Chapman transfuses the meaning of the mighty ancient is often singularly and delicately beautiful. He is the author of nearly all the happiest of the compound epithets which Pope has adopted, and of many others equally musical and expressive. "Far-shooting Phœbus," "the ever-living gods," "the many-headed hill," "the ivory-wristed queen," are a few of the felicitous combinations with which he has enriched his native tongue. Carelessly executed, indeed, as the work for the most part is, there is scarcely a page of it that is not irradiated by gleams of the truest poetic genius. Often in the midst of a long paragraph of the most chaotic versification, the fatigued and distressed ear is surprised by a few lines, or it may be somtimes only a single line, "musical as is Apollo's lute," and sweet and graceful enough to compensate for ten times as much ruggedness. Such, for instance, is the following version of part of the description of the visit paid by Ulysses and his companions to the shrine of Apollo at Chrysa, in the First Book:

—— The youths crowned cups of wine
Drank off, and filled again to all: that day was held divine,
And spent in pæans to the sun; who heard with pleased ear:
When whose bright chariot stooped to sea, and twilight hid the clear
All soundly on their cables slept, even till the night was worn;
And when the Lady of the Light, the rosy-fingered morn,
Rose from the hills, all fresh arose, and to the camp retired, While Phœbus with a fore-right wind their swelling bark inspired.

And here are a few more verses steeped in the same liquid beauty from the catalogue of the ships in the Second Book:

Almost the whole of this Second Book, indeed, is admirably translated: in the harangues, particularly, of Agamemnon and the other generals, in the earlier part of it, all the fire of Homer burns and blazes in English verse.

Webster, Middleton, Decker, Marston, Robert Tailor, Tourneur, and Rowley, may also be reckoned among the dramatic writers of considerable note who were the cotemporaries of Shakspeare, though most, or all, of them survived him, and none of them began to write so early as he did. John Webster is said to have been parish clerk of St. Andrew's, Holborn, and a member of the Merchant Tailors' Company. Of four dramatic pieces of which he is the sole author, besides two comedies which he wrote in conjunction with Rowley, and other two in which he assisted Decker, his tragedies of The White Devil, and the Duchess of Malfy, are the most celebrated. The character of Vittoria Corombona, the White Devil, is drawn with great spirit; and the delineation of the Duchess of Malfy displays not only remarkable power and originality of imagination, but a dramatic skill and judgment which perhaps no one of the other writers we have named along with Webster has anywhere matched. None of them has either so little extravagance, or so much of the true terrific. "To move a horror skillfully," says Lamb—"to touch a soul to the quick—to lay upon fear as much as it can bear—to wean and weary a life till it is ready to drop, and then step in with mortal instruments to take its last forfeit; this only a Webster can do. Writers of an inferior genius may 'upon horror's head horrors accumulate,' but they can not do this."[2] Webster seems to have been a slow writer, which it may be presumed few of his cotemporaries were. In an advertisement prefixed to his White Devil, he says, "To those who report I was a long time in finishing this tragedy, I confess I do not write with a goose-quill winged with two feathers; and, if they will needs make it my fault, I must answer them with that of Euripides to Alcestides, a tragic writer. Alcestides objecting that Euripides had only in three days composed three verses, whereas himself had written three hundred: thou tell'st truth, quoth he; but here's the difference—thine shall only be read for three days, whereas mine shall continue three ages." It will be seen, from this passage, that Webster was not wanting in a due sense of his own merits; he seems also to have had a sufficient contempt for the public taste of his day, or, at least, for that of the ordinary audiences of the theater where his piece had been brought out. "I have noted," he says, "most of the people that come to that play-house resemble those ignorant asses who, visiting stationers' shops, their use in not to inquire for good books, but new books;" and he adds, "Should a man present to such an auditory the most sententious tragedy that ever was written, observing all the critical laws, as height of style and gravity of person—enrich it with the sententious Chorus, and, as it were, enliven death in the passionate and weighty Nuntius; yet, after all this divine rapture, ... the breath that comes from the uncapable multitude is able to poison it." We can not discern in all this the modesty which Mr. Lamb so much praises.[1] Neither does Webster greatly shine as a critic of the performances of others in a subsequent paragraph of his advertisement or preface, in which he gives us his opinion of some of his cotemporaries: "I have ever," he observes, "truly cherished my good opinion of other men's worthy labors, especially of that full and heightened style of Master Chapman; the labored and understanding works of Master Jonson; the no less worthy composures of the most worthily excellent Master Beaumont and Master Fletcher; and lastly, without wrong last to be named, the right happy and copious industry of Master Shakspeare, Master Decker, and Master Heywood." All this may be frank enough, as Lamb calls it, but it is certainly not particularly discriminating. Thomas Middleton is the author, in whole or in part, of between twenty and thirty dramatic pieces, his associates in those which he did not write entirely himself being Decker, Rowley, Jonson, Fletcher, and Massinger. One of his plays, a comedy called The Old Law, which he wrote in conjunction with Rowley (and which was afterward improved by Massinger), appears to have been acted so early as 1599; and another was published in 1602. The greater number of his pieces are comedies, and, compared with most of his cotemporaries, he has a good deal of comic talent; but his most noted dramatic production is his tragi-comedy of The Witch, which remained in manuscript till a small impression of it was printed, in 1778, by Isaac Reed, after it had been suggested by Steevens that it had probably been written before Macbeth, and might have been the source from which Shakspeare borrowed his witches in that play. The commentators would have every thing, in Shakspeare and every body else, to be borrowed or stolen: they have the genius and the zeal of thief-catchers in ferreting out and exposing all transferences among writers, real and imaginary, of thoughts, words, and syllables; and in the present case, as in many others, their professional ardor seems to have made a great deal out of very little. Lamb, in an admirable criticism, has pointed out the essential differences between the witches of Shakspeare and those of Middleton;[1] from whose play, however, Shakspeare appears to have taken a few lines of his incantations; unless, indeed—which we think not improbable—the verses in question were common popular rhymes, preserved among the traditions of the nursery or the country fireside. Middleton's witches have little of the supernatural awfulness of Shakspeare's. "Their names, and some of the properties," as Lamb observes, "which Middleton has given to his hags, excite smiles. The Weird Sisters are serious things. Their presence can not coexist with mirth. But, in a lesser degree, the witches of Middleton are fine creations. Their power, too, is, in some measure, over the mind. They raise jars, jealousies, strifes, like a thick scurf o'er life." Still another and lower species of witch—"the plain, traditional, old woman witch of our ancestors," as Lamb has called her, "poor, deformed, and ignorant; the terror of villages, herself amenable to a justice," is the heroine of the tragi-comedy of the Witch of Edmonton, the joint production of Rowley, Ford, and Decker. Thomas Decker was the author of, or a contributor to, more than thirty plays in all, nearly two thirds of which, however, have perished. He has not much high imagination, but considerable liveliness of fancy. His best pieces are his comedies of Old Fortunatus and The Honest Whore; and his spirited Satiromastix, the principal character in which, Horace Junior, is a humorous caricature of Ben Jonson, who had previously ridiculed Decker upon the stage, in Crispinus, the hero of his satirical comedy of The Poetaster. John Marston is the author of eight plays, and appears to have enjoyed in his own day a great reputation as a dramatist. He is to be classed, however, with Sackville and Chapman, as having more poetical than dramatic genius; although he has given no proof of a creative imagination equal to what is displayed in the early poetry of the former, and the best of Chapman's is instinct with a diviner fire. But he is, nevertheless, a very imposing declaimer in verse. Besides his plays, Marston published two volumes of poetry: the second, by which he is best known, a collection of satires, in three books, entitled "The Scourge of Villainy," a set of very vigorous and animated Juvenalian chants. Of Robert Tailor nothing is known, except that he is the author of one play, a comedy, entitled The Hog hath lost his Pearl, which was acted in 1613, and published the following year. It is reprinted in Dodsley's Collection, and Mr. Lamb has extracted from it the most interesting scenes, which, however, derive their interest rather from the force of the situation (one that has been turned to better account in other hands) than from any thing very impressive in its treatment. The merit of a perspicuous style is nearly all that can be awarded to this writer. Cyril Tourneur is known as the author of two surviving dramas—The Revenger's Tragedy, and The Atheist's Tragedy, besides a tragi-comedy, called The Nobleman, which is lost.[1] The Revenger's Tragedy, in particular, which is reprinted in Dodsley's Collection, both in the development of character and the conduct of the action, evinces a rare dramatic skill, and the dialogue in parts is wonderfully fine—natural and direct as that of real passion, yet ennobled by the breathing thoughts and burning words of a poetic imagination—by images and lines that plow into the memory and the heart. William Rowley, whose co-operation in the Witch of Edmonton with Decker and Ford has been already noticed, owes the greater part of his reputation to his having been taken into partnership, in the composition of some of their pieces, by Middleton, Webster, Massinger, and other writers more eminent than himself; but he has also left us a tragedy and three comedies of his own. He has his share of the cordial and straightforward manner of our old dramatists; but not a great deal more that is of much value. Of the style of his comedy a judgment may be formed from the fact, recorded by Langbaine, that certain of the scenes of one of his pieces, "A Shoemaker's a Gentleman," used to be commonly performed by the strolling actors at Bartholomew and Southward fairs. Though he appears to have begun to write, at least in association with others, some ten years before the death of Shakspeare, Rowley probably survived the middle of the century. So, also, may we suppose, did Thomas Heywood, the most rapid and voluminous of English writers, who appears to have written for the stage as early as 1596, but whose last-published piece, written in conjunction with Rowley, was not printed till 1655.[2] Heywood, according to his own account, in an Address to the Reader prefixed to the tragi-comedy of The English Traveler, published in 1633, had then, as he phrases it, "had either an entire hand, or, at the least, a main finger," in the incredible number of two hundred and twenty dramatic productions! "True it is," he adds, "that my plays are not exposed unto the world in volumes, to bear the title of Works, as others. One reason is that many of them, by shifting and change of companies, have been negligently lost; others of them are still retained in the hands of some actors who think it against their peculiar profit to have them come in print; and a third, that it never was any great ambition in me to be in this kind voluminously read." Besides his plays, too, Heywood, who was an actor, and engaged in the practice of his profession for a great part of his life, wrote numerous other works, several of them large volumes in quarto and folio. Among them are a translation of Sallust; a folio volume, entitled "The Hierarchy of the Blessed Angels;" a "General History of Women;" and another work, entitled "Nine Books of Various History concerning Women," a folio of between four and five hundred pages, which, in a Latin note on the last page, he tells us was all excogitated, written, and printed in seventeen weeks. Of his plays above twenty are still extant—about a tithe of the prodigious litter. Two of them, his tragedy of A Woman Killed with Kindness, and his historical play of The Four 'Prentices of London, are in Dodsley; and three more, his tragi-comedies of The English Traveler, The Royal King and Loyal Subject, and A Challenge for Beauty, are in Dilk's Collection. Lamb has very happily characterized Heywood in a few words; "Heywood is a sort of prose Shakspeare. His scenes are to the full as natural and affecting. But we miss the poet, that which in Shakspeare always appears out and above the surface of the nature." His plays, however, are for the greater part in verse, which at least has ease of flow enough; and he may be styled not only a prose Shakspeare, but a more poetical Richardson. If he has not quite the power of Lillo in what has been called the domestic tragedy, which is the species to which his best pieces belong, he excels that modern dramatist both in facility and variety.[1]

[1] This name is incorrectly accented, but Pope has copied the error. Warton had a copy of Chapman's translation which had belonged to Pope, and in which the latter had noted many of the interpolations of his predecessor, of whom, indeed, as Warton remarks, a diligent observer will easily discern that he was no careless reader.—Hist. Eng. Poet. iv. 272. In the Preface to his own Iliad, Pope has allowed to Chapman "a daring fiery spirit that animates his translation, which is something like what one might imagine Homer himself might have writ before he arrived to years of discretion." Dryden has told us also that Waller used to say he never could read it without incredible transport. In a note upon Warton, by the late Mr. Park, it is stated that "Chapman's own copy of his translation of Homer, corrected by him throughout for a future edition, was purchased for five shillings from the shop of Edwards, by Mr. Steevens, and at the sale of his books, in 1800, was transferred to the invaluable library of Mr. Heber." Chapman's Iliad, in a complete form, was first printed without date, but certainly after the accession of James I., to whose son, Prince Henry, it is dedicated. The Odyssey was published in 1614.

[1] Drake, in his work entitled Shakspeare and his Times (vol. ii. p. 570), speaks of The Nobleman as if he had read it—telling us that it, as well as Tourneur's two tragedies, contains "some very beautiful passages and some entire scenes of great merit." In fact, the play is believed never to have been printed; but a manuscript copy of it was in the collection of Mr. Warburton, the Somerset herald, which was destroyed by his cook.

But the names of the dramatic writers of the present period that hold rank the nearest to Shakspeare still remain to be mentioned. Those of Beaumont and Fletcher must be regarded as indicating one poet rather than two, for it is impossible to make any thing of the contradictory accounts that have been handed down as to their respective shares in the plays published in their conjoint names, and the plays themselves furnish no evidence that is more decisive. The only ascertained facts relating to this point are the following: that John Fletcher was about ten years older than his friend Francis Beaumont, the former having been born in 1576, the latter in 1585; that Beaumont, however, as far as is known, came first before the world as a writer of poetry, his translation of the story of Salmacis and Hermaphroditus, from the Fourth Book of Ovid's Metamorphoses, having been published in 1602, when he was only in his seventeenth year; that the Masque of the Inner Temple and Gray's Inn (consisting of only a few pages), produced in 1612, was written by Beaumont alone; that the pastrol drama of the Faithful Shepherdess is entirely Fletcher's; that the first-published of the pieces which have been ascribed to the two associated together, the comedy of The Woman Hater, appeared in 1607; that Beaumont died in March, 1616; and that, between that date and the death of Fletcher, in 1625, there were brought out, as appears from the note-book of Sir Henry Herbert, deputy master of the Revels, at least eleven of the plays found in the collection of their works, besides two others that were brought out in 1626, and two more that are lost. Deducting the fourteen pieces which thus appear certainly to belong to Fletcher exclusively (except that in one of them, The Maid of the Mill, he is said to have been assisted by Rowley), there still remain thirty-seven or thirty-eight which it is possible they may have written together in the nine or ten years over which their poetical partnership is supposed to have extended.[1] Eighteen of Beaumont and Fletcher's plays, including the Masque by the former and the Pastoral by the latter, were published separately before 1640; thirty-four more were first published together in a folio volume in 1647; and the whole were reprinted, with the addition of a comedy supposed to have been lost (The Wild Goose Chase),[2] making a collection of fifty-three pieces in all, in another folio, in 1679. Beaumont and Fletcher want altogether that white heat of passion by which Shakspeare fuses all things into life and poetry at a touch, often making a single brief utterance flash upon us a full though momentary view of a character, which all that follows deepens and fixes, and makes the more like to actual seeing with the eyes and hearing with the ears. His was a deeper, higher, in every way more extended and capacious, nature than theirs. They want his profound meditative philosophy as much as they do his burning poetry. Neither have they avoided nearly to the same degree that he has done the degradation of their fine gold by the intermixture of baser metal. They have given us all sorts of writing, good, bad, and indifferent, in abundance. Without referring in particular to what we now deem the indecency and licentiousness which pollutes all their plays, but which, strange to say, seems not to have been looked upon in that light by anybody in their own age, simply because it is usually wrapped in very transparent double entendre, they might, if judged by nearly one half of all they have left us, be held to belong to almost the lowest rank of our dramatists instead of the highest. There is scarcely one of their dramas that does not bear marks of haste and carelessness, or of a bright light in some part or other from the play-house tastes or compliances to which they were wont too easily to give themselves up when the louder applause of the day and the town made them thoughtless of their truer fame. But fortunately, on the other hand, in scarcely any of their pieces is the deformity thus occasioned more than partial: the circumstances in which they wrote have somewhat debased the produce of their fine genius, but their genius itself suffered nothing from the unworthy uses it was often put to. It springs up again from the dust and mud as gay a creature of the elements as ever, soaring and singing at heaven's gate, as if it had never touched the ground. Nothing can go beyond the flow and brilliancy of the dialogue of these writers in their happier scenes; it is the richest stream of real conversation, edged with the fire of poetry. For the drama of Beaumont and Fletcher is as essentially poetical and imaginative, though not in so high a style, as that of Shakspeare; and they, too, even if they were not great dramatists, would still be great poets. Much of their verse is among the sweetest in the language; and many of the lyrical passages, in particular, with which their plays are interspersed, have a diviner soul of song in them than almost any other compositions of the same class. As dramatists they are far inferior to Shakspeare, not only, as we have said, in striking development and consistent preservation of character—in other words, in truth and force of conception—but also both in the originality and the variety of their creations in that department; they have confined themselves to a comparatively small number of broadly-distinguished figures, which they delineate in a dashing, scene-painting fashion, bringing out their peculiarities rather by force of situation and contrast with one another, than by the form and aspect with which each individually looks forth and emerges from the canvas. But all the resources of this inferior style of art they avail themselves of with the boldness of conscious power, and with wonderful skill and effect. Their invention of plot and incident is fertile in the highest degree; and in the conduct of a story for the mere purposes of the stage, for keeping the attention of an audience awake and their expectation suspended throughout the whole course of the action, they excel Shakspeare, who, aiming at higher things, and producing his more glowing pictures by fewer strokes, is careless about the mere excitement of curiosity, whereas they are tempted to linger as long as possible over every scene, both for that end, and because their proper method of evolving character and passion is by such delay and repetition of touch upon touch. By reason principally of this difference, the plays of Beaumont and Fletcher, in the great days of the stage, and so long as the state of public manners tolerated their license and grossness, were much greater favorites than those of Shakspeare in our theaters; two of theirs, Dryden tells us, were acted in his time for one of Shakspeare's; their intrigues, their lively and florid but not subtil dialogue, their strongly-marked but somewhat exaggerated representations of character, their exhibitions of passion, apt to run a little into the melodramatic, were more level to the general apprehension, and were found to be more entertaining, than his higher art and grander poetry. Beaumont and Fletcher, as might be inferred from what has already been said, are, upon the whole, greater in comedy than in tragedy; and they seem themselves to have felt that their genius led them more to the former—for, of their plays, only ten are tragedies, while their comedies amount to twenty-four or twenty-five, the rest being what were then called tragi-comedies—in many of which, however, it is true, the interest is, in part at least, of a tragic character, although the story ends happily.[1] But, on the other hand, all their tragedies have also some comic passages; and, in regard to this matter, indeed, their plays may be generally described as consisting, in the words of the prologue to one of them,[2] of

[1] Mr. Hallam (Introd. to Lit. of Eur. iii. 618) states that between forty and fifty plays are ascribed to Heywood; in fact, only twenty-six existing plays have been ascribed to him, and only twenty-three can be decisively said to be his. (See Dodsley, edit. of 1826, vii. 218, et seq.) Mr. Hallam is also not quite correct in elsewhere stating (ii. 382) that Heywood's play of A Woman Killed with Kindness bears the date of 1600, and in speaking of it as certainly his earliest production. The earliest known edition, which is called the third, is dated 1617; and the earliest notice of the play being acted is in 1603. Two other plays, the first and Second parts of The Death of Robert Earl of Huntingdon, otherwise called Robin Hood, which have been ascribed to Heywood, were published in 1601. But there is some doubt as to his claim to these pieces.

[1] One, the comedy of the Coronation, is also attributed to Shirley.

> "Passionate scenes mixed with no vulgar mirth."

Undoubtedly, taking them all in all, they have left us the richest and most magnificant drama we possess after that of Shakspeare—the most instinct and alive both with the true dramatic spirit and with that of general poetic beauty and power—the most brilliantly lighted up with wit and humor—the freshest and most vivid as well as various picture of human manners and passions—the truest mirror, and at the same time the finest embellishment, of nature.

Ben Jonson was born in 1574, or two years before Fletcher, whom he survived twelve years, dying in 1637. He is supposed to have begun to write for the stage so early as 1593; but nothing that he produced attracted any attention till his comedy of Every Man in his Humor was brought out at the Rose Theater in 1596. This play, greatly altered and improved, was published in 1598; and between that date and his death Jonson produced above fifty more dramatic pieces in all, of which ten are comedies, three what he called comical satires, only two tragedies, and all the rest masques, pageants, or other court entertainments. His two tragedies of Sejanus and Catiline are admitted on all hands to be nearly worthless; and his fame rests almost entirely upon his first comedy, his three subsequent comedies of Volpone or The Fox, Epicoene or The Silent Woman, and The Alchemist, his court masques, and a pastoral entitled The Sad Shepherd, which was left unfinished at his death. Ben Jonson's comedies admit of no comparison with those of Shakspeare or of Beaumont and Fletcher: he belongs to another school. His plays are professed attempts to revive, in English, the old classic Roman drama, and aim in their construction at a rigorous adherence to the models afforded by those of Plautus, and Terence, and Seneca. They are admirable for their elaborate art, which is, moreover, informed by a power of strong conception of a decidedly original character; they abound both in wit and eloquence, which in some passages rises to the glow of poetry; the figures of the scene stand out in high relief, every one of them, from the most important to the most insignificant, being finished off at all points with the minutest care; the dialogue carries on the action, and is animated in many parts with the right dramatic reciprocation; and the plot is in general contrived and evolved with the same learned skill, and the same attention to details, that are shown in all other particulars. But the execution, even where it is most brilliant, is hard and angular; nothing seems to flow naturally and freely; the whole has an air of constraint, and effort, and exaggeration; and the effect that is produced by the most arresting passages is the most undramatic that can be—namely, a greater sympathy with the performance as a work of art than as any thing else. It may be added that Jonson's characters, though vigorously delineated, and though not perhaps absolutely false to nature, are most of them rather of the class of her occasional excrescences and eccentricities than samples of any general humanity; they are the oddities and perversions of a particular age or state of manners, and have no universal truth or interest. What is called the humor of Jonson consists entirely in the exhibition of the more ludicrous kinds of these morbid aberrations: like every thing about him, it has force and raciness enough, but will be most relished by those who are most amused by dancing bears and other shows of that class. It seldom or never makes the heart laugh, like the humor of Shakspeare, which is, indeed, a quality of altogether another essence. As a poet, Jonson is greatest in his masques and other court pageants. The airy elegance of these compositions is a perfect contrast to the stern and rugged strength of his other works; the lyrical parts of them in particular have often a grace and sportiveness, a flow as well as a finish, the effect of which is very brilliant. Still, even in these, we want the dewy light and rich-colored irradiation of the poetry of Shakspeare and Fletcher: the luster is pure and bright, but at the same time cold and sharp, like that of crystal. In Jonson's unfinished pastoral of The Sad Shepherd there is some picturesque description and more very harmonious verse, and the best parts of it (much of it is poor enough) are perhaps in a higher style than any thing else he has written; but to compare it, as has sometimes been done, either as a poem or as a drama, with The Faithful Shepherdess of Fletcher, seems to us to evince a deficiency of true feeling for the highest things, equal to what would be shown by preferring, as has also been done by some critics, the humor of Johnson to that of Shakspeare. Fletcher's pastoral, blasted as it is in some parts by fire not from heaven, is still a green and leafy wilderness of poetical beauty; Jonson's, deformed also by some brutality more elaborate than any thing of the same sort in Fletcher, is at the best but a trim garden, and, had it been ever so happily finished, would have been nothing more.

After Shakspeare, Beaumont and Fletcher, and Jonson, the next great name in our drama is that of Philip Massinger, who was born in 1584, and is supposed to have begun to write for the stage soon after 1606, although his first published play, his tragedy of the Virgin Martyr, in which he was assisted by Decker, did not appear till 1622. Of thirty-eight dramatic pieces which he is said to have written, only eighteen have been preserved; eight others were in the collection of Mr. Warburton, which his servant destroyed. Massinger, like Jonson, had received a learned education, and his classic reading has colored his style and manner; but he had scarcely so much originality of genius as Jonson. He is a very eloquent writer, but has little either of high imagination or pathos, and still less wit or comic power. He could rise, however, to a vivid conception of a character moved by some single aim or passion; and he has drawn some of the darker shades of villainy in particular with great force. His Sir Giles Overreach, in a New Way to Pay Old Debts, and his Luke, in The City Madam, are perhaps his most successful delineations in this style. In the conduct of his plots, also, he generally displays much skill. In short, all that can be reached by mere talent and warmth of susceptibility he has achieved; but his province was to appropriate and decorate rather than to create.

John Ford, the author of about a dozen plays that have survived, and one of whose pieces is known to have been acted so early as 1613, has one quality, that of a deep pathos, perhaps more nearly allied to high genius than any Massinger has shown; but the range of the latter in the delineation of action and passion is so much more extensive, that we can hardly refuse to regard him as the greater dramatist. Ford's blank verse is not so imposing as Massinger's; but it has often a delicate beauty, sometimes a warbling wildness and richness, beyond any thing in Massinger's fuller swell.

The only other name that remains to be mentioned to complete our sketch of the great age of the English drama, is that of James Shirley, born about the year 1594, and whose first play, the comedy of The Wedding, was published in 1629. He is the author of about forty dramatic pieces which have come down to us. "Shirley," observes Lamb, "claims a place among the worthies of this period, not so much for any transcendent genius in himself, as that he was the last of a great race, all whom spoke nearly the same language, and had a set of moral feelings and notions in common. A new language and quite a new turn of tragic and comic interest came in with the Restoration."[1] Of this writer we shall avail ourselves of the account that has been given, in a few comprehensive words, by Mr. Hallam:—"Shirley has no originality, no force in conceiving or delineating character, little of pathos, and less, perhaps, of wit; his dramas produce no deep impression in reading, and of course can leave none in the memory. But his mind was poetical: his better characters, especially females, express pure thoughts in pure language; he is never tumid or affected, and seldom obscure; the incidents succeed rapidly; the personages are numerous, and there is a general animation in the scenes, which causes us to read him with some pleasure."[2]

[2] Lit. of Eur. iii., 617

A preface by Shirley is prefixed to the first collection of part of the plays of Beaumont and Fletcher, which, as already mentioned, appeared in 1647. "Now, reader," he says, "in this tragical age, where the theater hath been so much outacted, congratulate thy own happiness that, in this silence of the stage, thou hast a liberty to read these inimitable plays—to dwell and converse in these immortal groves—which were only showed our fathers in a conjuring-glass, as suddenly removed as represented." At this time all theatrical amusements were prohibited; and the publication of these and of other dramatic productions which were their property, or rather the sale of them to the booksellers, was resorted to by the players as a way of making a little money when thus cut of from the regular gains of their profession; the eagerness of the public to possess the said works in print being of course also sharpened by the same cause. Before the commencement of the civil war there appear to have been no fewer than five different companies of public players in London:—1. That called the King's Company (the same that Shakspeare had belonged to), which acted at the Globe, on the Bankside in Southwark, in the summer, and at the Blackfriars Theater in winter. 2. The Queen's Players, who occupied the Cockpit (or the Phœnix, as it was also called), in Drury Lane, the origin of the present theater royal there. 3. The Prince's Players, who played at the Fortune Theater, in Golden or Golding Lane, in the parish of St. Giles, Cripplegate. 4. The Salisbury Court Company. 5. The Children of the Revels, who are supposed to have performed at the theater called the Red Bull, at the upper end of St. John's-street. It had been usual to shut up the theaters when the plague was in London, with the view of preventing such concourses of the people as it was thought might help to spread the disease, and on such occasions the players were wont to go down and act in the provinces; but their absence from town, when protracted beyond a few weeks, was very impatiently borne. In May, 1636, when the plague was raging with great violence, an order was issued by the privy council, forbidding the representation of all "stage-plays, interludes, shows, and spectacles;" and the prohibition was not removed till the end of February in the following year. In the mean time, it appears, the craving of the public for their customary enjoyment in one shape, if not in another, had tempted certain booksellers to print a number of plays, surreptitiously procured, as we learn from an edict of the lord chamberlain addressed to the Stationers' Company, in June, 1637, in which he states that complaints to that effect had been made to him by the players, the legal proprietors of those "books of comedies, tragedies, interludes, histories, and the like, which they had (for the special service of his majesty and for their own use) bought and provided at very dear and high rates." The players added, that, by these unfair publications, "not only they themselves had much prejudice, but the books much corruption, to the injury and disgrace of the authors."[1] At this time the most favorite acting plays were in general carefully withheld from the press by the theatrical companies whose property they were; and the only way in which a perusal of them could be obtained was by paying a considerable sum for a loan of the manuscript or a transcript of it. Humphrey Moseley, the publisher of the collection of Beaumont and Fletcher's plays in 1647, after observing, in his prefatory address, that his charges in bringing out the volume had been very great, seeing that the owners of the manuscripts too well knew their value to make a cheap estimate of any of them, adds, "Heretofore, when gentlemen desired but a copy of any of these plays, the meanest piece here (if any may be called mean where every one is best) cost them more than four times the price you pay for the whole volume." The missing comedy of The Wild Goose Chace had been lost, he tells us, in another passage, by being borrowed from the actors many years before by a person of quality, and, owing to the neglect of a servant, never returned. Sometimes, too, it appears from another of his remarks, an individual actor would write out his part for a private friend, or, probably, for any one who would pay him for it.

The permanent putting down of theatrical entertainments was the act of the Long Parliament. An ordinance of the Lords and Commons passed on the 2d of September, 1642—after setting forth that "public sports do not well agree with public calamities, nor public stage-plays with the seasons of humiliation, this being an exercise of sad and pious solemnity, and the other being spectacles of pleasure, too commonly expressing lascivious mirth and levity"—ordained "that while these sad causes and set times of humiliation do continue, public stage-plays shall cease and be forborne." It has been plausibly conjectured that this measure originated, "not merely in a spirit of religious dislike to dramatic performances, but in a politic caution, lest play-writers and players should avail themselves of their power over the minds of the people to instil notions and opinions hostile to the authority of a puritanical parliament."[2] This ordinance certainly put an end at once to the regular performance of plays; but it is known to have been occasionally infringed; and there is reason to believe that after a few years it began to be pretty frequently and openly disregarded. This would appear to have been the case from a new ordinance of the Lords and Commons published in October, 1647, entitled, "For the better suppression of stage-plays, interludes, and common players," by which the lord mayor, justices of the peace, and sheriffs of the city of London and Westminster, and of the counties of Middlesex and Surrey, were authorized and required to enter into all houses and other places within their jurisdiction where stage-plays were acted, and to seize the players and commit them for trial at the next sessions, "there to be punished as rogues, according to law." On the 22d of January following, however, the House of Commons was informed that many stage-plays were still acted in various places in the city of London and in the county of Middlesex, notwithstanding this ordinance. The subject was then taken up with furious zeal both by Commons and Lords; and, after a great bustle of message-sending, debating, and consulting in committees, an act was agreed upon and published on the 11th of February, 1648, which, after declaring stage-plays, interludes, and common plays to be "condemned by ancient heathens, and much less to be tolerated among professors of the Christian religion," and denouncing them as being "the occasion of many and sundry great vices and disorders, tending to the high provocation of God's wrath and displeasure, which lies heavy upon this kingdom, and to the disturbance of the peace thereof," proceeded to ordain—first, that all players should be taken to be rogues within the meaning of the statutes of the 39th of Elizabeth and 7th of James; secondly, that the authorities of the city of London and counties of Middlesex and Surrey should "pull down and demolish, or cause and procure to be pulled down and demolished, all stage galleries, seats, and boxes, erected or used, or which shall be erected or used, for the acting or playing, or seeing acted or played," any species of theatrical performance within their jurisdictions; thirdly, that convicted players should be punished for the first offense with open and public whipping, and, for the second, should be dealt with according to law as incorrigible rogues; fourthly, that all the money collected from the spectators of any stage plays should be seized for the use of the poor of the parish; and, lastly, that every person present at any such performance should forfeit the sum of five shillings to the use of the poor. Even this severe measure was not perfectly effectual; for, in the following September, we find the House of Commons appointing a provost-marshal, with authority, among other things, "to seize upon all ballad-singers, sellers of malignant pamphlets, and to send them to the several militias, and to suppress stage-plays." And, more than a year after this, namely, in December, 1649, it is noted by Whitelock that "some stage-players in St. John's-street were apprehended by troopers, their clothes taken away, and themselves carried to prison." It appears, also, that in some of the country parts of the kingdom strolling players continued for some years to set the law at defiance, and to be connived at in their disregard of it. At so late a date as February, 1654, it is recorded that plays were performed by a company of strollers at Witney and other places in Oxfordshire.[1] It is, perhaps, more probable, however, that the statute had only in course of time come to be less rigidly enforced, than that it had been thus violated from the first. We are told by the historians of the stage, that, though the public exhibition of stage-plays in London was effectually put down by the act of 1648, yet the players "still kept together, and, by connivance of the commanding officer at Whitehall, sometimes represented privately a few plays at a short distance from town." They also, it is added, were permitted to act at the country-houses of some of the nobility; and even obtained leave at particular festivals to resume their public performances at the Red Bull. Finally, we are told, "amid the gloom of fanaticism, and while the royal cause was considered as desperate, Sir William Davenant, without molestation, exhibited entertainments of declamation and music, after the manner of the ancients, at Rutland House. He began in the year 1656, and two years afterward removed to the Cockpit, Drury Lane, where he performed until the eve of the Restoration."[1] Rutland House was in Charter House Square; and it is said that Davenant's performances there were countenanced by Whitelock, Sir John Maynard, and other persons of influence. At first he called his representations operas: but, at length growing bolder, it is affirmed, he wrote and caused to be acted several regular plays.[2]

Of poets of all other kinds except dramatic the industry of Dr. Drake has collected the names of above two hundred and thirty who flourished in the lifetime of Shakspeare, or in the half century preceding the year 1616.[3] If the catalogue were to be extended to the Restoration, or over another fifty years, it certainly would not be doubled in length—for that half century was not nearly so much an age of song as the preceding—but the number of names might probably be raised to not far from four hundred. And of the whole, perhaps, between two and three hundred might be classed as belonging to the period between the accession of James I. and the restoration of Charles II. Of course, out of so numerous a throng, we can here select for notice only a very few of those of the greatest eminence.

The three authors of the poems of most pretension that appeared within the present period, or only a few years before its commencement, are, Warner, Drayton, and Daniel. William Warner is supposed to have been born about the year 1558; he died in 1609. His only known poetical work is his Albion's England, first published in part, in 1586, but not in a complete form till 1606. This is, in fact, a legendary history of England from the Deluge to the reign of Elizabeth, written in the old verse of fourteen syllables, and comprised in thirteen books. It was one of the most popular poetical works of its day: and its author was by his cotemporaries considered to be as great a poet as Spenser. The form and subject of the poem would account for its popularity, which was perhaps, after all, no greater than that of the Mirror for Magistrates, a work of somewhat the same description, though certainly constructed on a less ambitious plan; but the high admiration that was felt for Warner's poetical powers seems to have been excited principally by his style, which was thought a model of elegance. He is a very unequal writer; but in his happiest passages the expression is certainly wonderfully easy and lucid for that age. Some of his verses, too, without the rudeness, have much of the simplicity and tenderness of the old ballad. On the whole, however, he is but a tame and prosaic writer, and the poetry of the greater part of his work consists chiefly in its rhymes. Michael Drayton, who was born in 1563, and died in 1631, is one of the most voluminous of our old poets, being the author, besides many minor productions, of three works of great length: his Mortimeriados, commonly called his Barons' Wars, on the subject of the civil wars of the reign of Edward II., first printed in 1596; his England's Heroical Epistles, 1598; and his Polyolbion, the first eighteen books of which appeared in 1612, and the whole, consisting of thirty books, and extending to about as many thousand lines, in 1622. This last is the work on which his fame principally rests. It is a most elaborate and minute topographical description of England, written in Alexandrine rhymes, and is a very remarkable work for the varied learning it displays, as well as its poetic merits. The genius of Drayton is neither very imaginative nor very pathetic; but he is an equable and weighty writer, with a sparkling, if not a very warm, fancy. His most graceful poetry, however, is perhaps to be found in some of his shorter pieces —in his Pastorals, his very elegant and lively little poem entitled Nymphidia, or The Court of Fairy, and his verses On Poets and Poesy, in which occur the lines on Marlow that have been quoted above. The great work of Samuel Daniel, who was born in 1562, and died in 1619, is his "Civil Wars between the Two Houses of Lancaster and York," in eight books, the first four published in 1595, the fifth in 1599, the sixth in 1602, and the two last in 1609. He is also the author of various minor poetical productions, of which the principal are a collection of sonnets entitled Delia, a philosophical poem in dialogue entitled Musophilus, and several tragedies and other dramatic pieces, which last are of very small estimation. The language of Daniel has more of a modern air than even that of the best passages of Warner, and he is by much the more equable and generally careful of the two. It must be admitted, too, that, notwithstanding the occasional charm of simple and natural feeling in Warner, Daniel's poetry is altogether of a higher tone and more vigorous animation. The imagination of the one as well as of the other keeps to a very humble flight: but there is often a quiet dignity and easy strength in Daniel's verse to which that of Warner scarcely ever rises. On the whole, of these three cotemporaries, while the first rank decidedly belongs to Drayton, Daniel must be placed next to him, and Warner last in order, though perhaps nearer to Daniel than the latter is to Drayton.[1]

Along with these names, though of somewhat later date, may be mentioned those of the two brothers, Giles and Phineas Fletcher, cousins of the dramatist, and both clergymen. Giles, who died in 1623, is the author of a poem, entitled Christ's Victory and Triumph in Heaven and Earth over and after Death, which was published in a quarto volume in 1610. It is divided into four parts, and is written in stanzas somewhat like those of Spenser, only containing eight lines each instead of nine; both the Fletchers, indeed, were professed disciples and imitators of the great author of the Fairy Queen. Phineas, who survived till 1650, published in 1633, along with a small collection of Piscatory Eclogues and other Poetical Miscellanies, a long allegorical poem, entitled The Purple Island, in twelve books or cantos, written in a stanza of seven lines. The idea upon which this performance is founded is one of the most singular that ever took possession of the brain even of an allegorist: the purple island is nothing else than the human body, and the poem is, in fact, for the greater part, a system of anatomy, nearly as minute in its details as if it were a scientific treatise, but wrapping up every thing in a fantastic guise of double meaning, so as to produce a languid sing-song of laborious riddles, which are mostly unintelligible without the very knowledge they make a pretense of conveying. After he has finished his anatomical course, the author takes up the subject of psychology, which he treats in the same luminous and interesting manner. Such a work as this has no claim to be considered a poem even of the same sort with the Fairy Queen. In Spenser, the allegory, whether historical or moral, is little more than formal: the poem, taken in its natural and obvious import, as a tale of "knights' and ladies' gentle deeds"—a song of their "fierce wars and faithful loves"—has meaning and interest enough, without the allegory at all, which, indeed, except in a very few passages, is so completely concealed behind the direct narrative, that we may well suppose it to have been nearly as much lost sight of and forgotten by the poet himself as it is by his readers: here, the allegory is the soul of every stanza and of every line—that which gives to the whole work whatever meaning, and consequently whatever poetry, it possesses—with which, indeed, it is sometimes hard enough to be understood, but without which it would be absolute inanity and nonsense. The Purple Island is rather a production of the same species with Dr. Darwin's Botanic Garden; but, forced and false enough as Darwin's style is in many respects, it would be doing an injustice to his poem to compare it with Phineas Fletcher's, either in regard to the degree in which nature and propriety are violated in the principle and manner of the composition, or in regard to the spirit and general success of the execution. Of course, there is a good deal of ingenuity shown in Fletcher's poem; and it is not unimpreg-

[1] Some notion of the manner of each of these poets may be obtained from the specimens Percy has inserted in his Reliques, of the pastoral or eclogue of Dowsabel, by Crayton (i. 320), the poem of Ulysses and the Syren, by Daniel (i. 328), and the tales of the Patient Countess (i. 311), and Argentile and Curan (ii. 328), by Warner. The extracts from Warner and Daniel, however, are more favorable specimens than that from Drayton, of whose poetry, in either its variety or its highest range, the eclogue of Dowsabel conveys no impression.

nated by poetic feeling, nor without some passages of considerable merit. But in many other parts it is quite grotesque; and, on the whole, it is fantastic, puerile, and wearisome. Mr. Hallam thinks that Giles Fletcher, in his poem of Christ's Victory and Triumph, has shown more vigor than Phineas,[1] "but less sweetness, less smoothness, and more affectation in his style."[2]

It ought to be added, to the honor of these two writers, that the works of both of them appear to have been studied by Milton, and that imitations of some passages in each are to be traced in his poetry. Milton was undoubtedly a diligent reader of the English poetry of the age preceding his own; and his predecessors of all degrees, Ben Jonson and Fletcher the dramatists, as well as the two cousins of the latter, and, as we have seen above, the earlier dramatic writer, George Peele, had contributed something to the awakening or directing of his feeling for the grand and beautiful, and to the forming of his melodious and lofty note. Another of his favorites among the poets of this date is supposed to have been Joshua Sylvester, the translator of the Divine Weeks and Works of the French poet, Du Bartas.[3] Sylvester, who in one of his publications styles himself a Merchant-Adventurer, seems to have belonged to the Puritan party, which may have had some share in influencing Milton's regard. Nothing can be more uninspired than the general run of Joshua's verse, or more fantastic and absurd than the greater number of its more ambitious passages; for he had no taste or judgment, and, provided the stream of sound and the jingle of the rhyme were kept up, all was right in his notion. His poetry consists chiefly of translations from the French; but he is also the author of some original pieces, the title of one of which, a courtly offering from the poetical Puritan to the prejudices of King James, may be quoted as a lively specimen of his style and genius:—"Tobacco battered, and the pipes shattered, about their ears, that idly idolize so base and barbarous a weed, or at leastwise overlove so lothsome a vanity, by a volley of holy shot thundered from Mount Helicon."[4] But, with all his general flatness and frequent absurdity, Sylvester has an uncommon flow of harmonious words at times, and occasionally even some fine lines and felicitous expressions. His cotemporaries called him the "Silver-tongued Sylvester," for what they considered the sweetness of his versification—and some of his best passages justify the title. Indeed, even when the substance of what he writes approaches nearest to nonsense, the sound is often very graceful, soothing the ear with something like the swing and ring of Dryden's heroics; but, after a few lines, is always sure to come in some ludicrous image or expression which destroys the effect of the whole. The translation of Du Bartas is inscribed to King James in a most adulatory and elaborate dedication, consisting of a string of sonnet-shaped stanzas, ten in all, of which the two first are a very fair sample of the mingled good and bad of Sylvester's poetry:

> "To England's, Scotland's, France, and Ireland's king; > Great Emperor of Europe's greatest isles;
> Monarch of hearts, and arts, and every thing
> Beneath Boötes, many thousand miles;
> Upon whose head honor and fortune smiles;
> About whose brows clusters of crowns do spring;
> Whose faith him Champion of the Faith enstyles;
> Whose wisdom's fame o'er all the world doth ring:
> Mnemosyne and her fair daughters bring
> The Daphnean crown to crown him laureate:
> Whole and sole sovereign of the Thespian spring,
> Prince of Parnassus and Pierian state;
> And with their crown their kingdom's arms they yield,
> Thrice three pens sunlike in a Cynthian field;
> Signed by themselves and their High Treasurer
> Bartas, the Great; engrossed by Sylvester.
>
> "Our sun did set, and yet no night ensued;
> Our woful loss so joyful gain did bring.
> In tears we smile, amid our sighs we sing;
> So suddenly our dying light renewed.
> As when the Arabian only bird doth burn
> Her aged body in sweet flames to death,
> Out of her cinders a new bird hath breath,
> In whom the beauties of the first return;
> From spicy ashes of the sacred urn
> Of our dead Phenix, dear Elizabeth,
> A new true Phenix lively flourisheth,
> Whom greater glories than the first adorn.
> So much, O King, thy sacred worth presume-I-on,
> James, thou just heir of England's joyful un-i-on."

It is not to be denied that there is considerable skill in versification here, and also some ingenious rhetoric; but, not to notice the pervading extravagance of the sentiment, some of the best-sounding of the lines and phrases have next to no meaning; and the close of each stanza, that of the last in particular, is in the manner of a ludicrous travesty. Of the translators of ancient and foreign poetry in this age, besides Sylvester, Chapman has been already mentioned. Another very eminent name in this line is that of Edward Fairfax, whose translation of Tasso's great epic was first published under the title of "Godfrey of Bulloigne, or the Recoverie of Jerusalem," in 1600. This is a work of true genius, full of passages of great beauty; and although by no means a perfectly exact or servile version of the Italian original, is throughout executed with as much care as taste and spirit. Another poetical translator of this period, less celebrated than Fairfax, but in some things still superior to him, is Sir Richard Fanshawe, the author of versions of Camoens's Lusiad, of Guarini's Pastor Fido, of the Fourth Book of the Æneid, of the Odes of Horace, and of the "Querer por Solo Querer" (To love for love's sake), of the Spanish dramatist Mendoza. Some passages from the last-mentioned work, which was published in 1649, may be found in Lamb's Specimens,[1] the ease and flowing gayety of which never have been excelled even in original writing. The Pastor Fido is also rendered with much spirit and elegance. Fanshawe is, besides, the author of a Latin translation of Fletcher's Faithful Shepherdess, and of some original poetry. His genius, however, was sprightly and elegant rather than lofty, and perhaps he does not succeed so well in translating poetry of a more serious style: at least Mickle, the modern translator of Camoens, in the discourse prefixed to his own version, speaks with great contempt of that of his predecessor, affirming not only that it is exceedingly unfaithful, but that Fanshawe had not "the least idea of the dignity of the epic style, or of the true spirit of poetical translation." He seems also to sneer at Fanshawe's Lusiad, because it was "published during the usurpation of Cromwell"—as if even the poets and translators of that time must have been a sort of illegitimates and usurpers in their way. But Fanshawe was all his life a steady royalist, and served both Charles I. and his son in a succession of high employments. Mickle, in truth, was not the man to appreciate either Fanshawe or Cromwell.

One of the most graceful poetical writers of the reign of James I. is William Drummond, of Hawthornden, near Edinburgh; and he is further deserving of notice as the first of his countrymen, at least of any eminence, who aspired to write in English. He has left us a quantity of prose as well as verse; the former very much resembling the style of Sir Philip Sidney in his Arcadia—the latter, in manner and spirit, formed more upon the model of Surrey, or rather upon that of Petrarch and the other Italian poets, whom Surrey and many of his English successors imitated. No English imitator of the Italian poetry, however, has excelled Drummond, either in the sustained melody of his verse, or the chaste fancy that decorates his song, or the rich vein of thoughtful tenderness that modulates its cadences. We will transcribe one of his sonnets as a specimen of the fine moral painting, tinged with the coloring of scholarly recollections, in which he delights to indulge:

Trust not, sweet soul, those curled waves of gold
With gentle tides that on your temples flow,
Nor temples spread with flakes of virgin snow,
Nor snow of cheeks with Tyrian grain enrolled.
Trust not those shining lights which wrought my woe
When first I did their azure rays behold,
Nor voice whose sounds more strange effects do show
Than of the Thracian harper have been told;
Look to this dying lily, fading rose,
Dark hyacinth, of late whose blushing beams
Made all the neighboring herbs and grass rejoice,
And think how little is 'twixt life's extremes:
The cruel tryant that did kill those flowers
Shall once, ay me, not spare that spring of yours.

One of the most remarkable poems of this age, as it may be considered—for it was four or five times reprinted in the reign of James, although first published in 1599—is the "Nosce Teipsum"[1] of Sir John Davies, who was successively James's solicitor and attorney-general, and who had been appointed to the place of chief justice of the King's Bench, when he died, before he could enter upon its duties, in 1626. Davies is also the author of a poem on dancing, entitled "Orchestra," and of some minor pieces, all distinguished by vivacity as well as precision of style; but he is only now remembered for his philosophical poem, the earliest of the kind in the language. It is written in rhyme, in the common heroic ten-syllable verse, but disposed in quatrains, like the early play of Misogonus already mentioned,[1] and other poetry of the same era, or like Sir Thomas Overbury's poem of The Wife, the Gondibert of Sir William Davenant, and the Annus Mirabilis of Dryden, at a later period. No one of these writers has managed this difficult stanza so successfully as Davies: it has the disadvantage of requiring the sense to be in general closed at certain regularly and quickly-recurring turns, which yet are very ill adapted for an effective pause; and even all the skill of Dryden has been unable to free it from a certain air of monotony and languor—a circumstance of which that poet may be supposed to have been himself sensible, since he wholly abandoned it after one or two early attempts. Davies, however, has conquered its difficulties; and, as has been observed, "perhaps no language can produce a poem, extending to so great a length, of more condensation of thought, or in which fewer languid verses will be found."[2] In fact, it is by this condensation and sententious brevity, so carefully filed and elaborated, however, as to involve no sacrifice of perspicuity or fullness of expression, that he has attained his end. Every quatrain is a pointed expression of a separate thought, like one of Rochefoucault's Maxims; each thought being, by great skill and painstaking in the packing, made exactly to fit and to fill the same case. It may be doubted, however, whether Davies would not have produced a still better poem if he had chosen a measure which would have allowed him greater freedom and real variety; unless, indeed, his poetical talent was of a sort that required the suggestive aid and guidance of such artificial restraints as he had to cope with in this, and what would have been a bondage to a more fiery and teeming imagination was rather a support to his. He wrote, among other things, a number of acrostics upon the name of Queen Elizabeth, which, says Ellis, "are probably the best acrostics ever written, and all equally good; but they seem to prove that their author was too fond of struggling with useless difficulties."[3] Perhaps he found the limitations of the acrostic, too, a help rather than a hinderance.

Along with Sir John Davies's poem may be noticed the "Cooper's Hill" of Sir John Denham, first published in 1643. When this poem appeared it was at once hailed as a most remarkable production, and the more so as coming from a young man (Denham was then only twenty-seven) nearly unknown till now as a writer of verse. Waller remarked that he had broken out like the Irish rebellion, threescore thousand strong, when nobody was aware or in the least suspected it. Cooper's Hill has not quite all the concentration of Davies's Nosce Teipsum; but it is equally pointed, correct, and stately, with, partly owing to the subject, a warmer tone of imagination and feeling, and a fuller swell of verse. The spirit of the same classical style pervades both, and they are certainly the two greatest poems in that style which had been produced down to the close of the present period. Denham is the author of a number of other compositions in verse, and especially of some songs and other shorter pieces, several of which are very spirited; but the fame of his principal poem has thrown every thing else he has written into the shade. It is remarkable that many biographical notices of this poet make him to have survived nearly till the Revolution, and relate various stories of the miseries of his protracted old age, when the fact is that he died in 1667, at the age of fifty-two.

The title of the metaphysical school of poetry, which in one sense of the words might have been given to Davies and his imitators, has been conferred by Dryden upon another race of writers whose founder was a cotemporary of Davies—the famous Dr. John Donne, dean of St. Paul's. Donne, who died at the age of fifty-eight, in 1631, is said to have written most of his poetry before the end of the sixteenth century, but none of it was published till late in the reign of James. It consists of lyrical pieces entitled songs and sonnets, epithalamions or marriage songs, funeral and other elegies, satires, epistles, and divine poems. On a superficial inspection, Donne's verses look like so many riddles. They seem to be written upon the principle of making the meaning as difficult to be found out as possible—of using all the resources of language not to express thought, but to conceal it. Nothing is said in a direct, natural manner; conceit follows conceit without intermission; the most remote analogies, the most far-fetched images, the most unexpected turns, one after another, surprise and often puzzle the understanding; while things of the most opposite kinds—the harsh and the harmonious, the graceful and the grotesque, the grave and the gay, the pious and the profane—meet and mingle in the strangest of dances. But, running through all this bewilderment, a deeper insight detects not only a vein of the most exuberant wit, but often the sunniest and most delicate fancy, and the truest tenderness and depth of feeling. Donne, though in the latter part of his life he became a very serious and devout poet as well as man, began by writing amatory lyrics, the strain of which is any thing rather than devout; and in this kind of writing he seems to have formed his poetic style, which for such compositions would, to a mind like his, be the most natural and expressive of any. The species of lunacy which quickens and exalts the imagination of a lover would, in one of so seething a brain as he was, strive to expend itself in all sorts of novel and wayward combinations, just as Shakspeare has made it do in his Romeo and Juliet, whose rich intoxication of spirit he has by nothing else set so livingly before us as by making them thus exhaust all the eccentricities of language in their struggle to give expression to that inexpressible passion which had taken captive the whole heart and being of both. Donne's later poetry, in addition to the same abundance and originality of thought, often running into a wildness and extravagance not so excusable here as in his erotic verses, is famous for the singular movement of the versification, which has been usually described as the extreme degree of the rugged and tuneless. Pope has given us a translation of his four satires into modern language, which he calls "The Satires of Dr. Donne, Versified." Their harshness, as contrasted with the music of his lyrics, has also been referred to as proving that the English language, at the time when Donne wrote, had not been brought to a sufficiently advanced state for the writing of heroic verse in perfection.[1] That this last notion is wholly unfounded numerous examples sufficiently testify: not to speak of the blank verse of the dramatists, the rhymed heroics of Shakspeare, of Fletcher, of Jonson, of Spenser, and of other writers cotemporary with and of earlier date than Donne, are for the most part as perfectly smooth and regular as any that have since been written; at all events, whatever irregularity may be detected in them, if they be tested by Pope's narrow gamut, is clearly not to be imputed to any immaturity in the language. These writers evidently preferred and cultivated, deliberately and on principle, a wider compass, and freer and more varied flow of melody, than Pope had a taste or an ear for. Nor can it be questioned, we think, that the peculiar construction of Donne's verse in his satires and many of his other later poems was also adopted by choice and on system. His lines, though they will not suit the see-saw style of reading verse —to which he probably intended that they should be invincibly impracticable—are not without a deep and subtil music of their own, in which the cadences respond to the sentiment, when enunciated with a true feeling of all that they convey. They are not smooth or luscious verses, certainly; nor is it contended that the endeavor to raise them to as vigorous and impressive a tone as possible, by depriving them of all over-sweetness or liquidity, has not been carried too far; but we can not doubt that whatever harshness they have was designedly given to them, and was conceived to infuse into them an essential part of their relish.

Cowley, the most celebrated follower of Donne, as he has been commonly considered, published some of his poems within the present period; but as he survived the Restoration, and obtained his greatest fame as a poet after that date, we shall reserve our notice of him till we have all that he wrote before us. For the same reasons the poetry of Milton, of Waller, and of Dryden, although all of them had published some of their pieces before the expiration of the present period, will be most conveniently considered in the next Book.

A few more of the minor poets of this age, the most distinguished for the originality, the fancy, or the grace of their poetry, can be only very briefly enumerated. Robert Herrick, who, like Donne, was a clergyman, is the author of a large volume published in 1648, under the title of "Hesperides." It consists, like the poetry of Donne, partly of love-verses, partly of pieces of a devotional character, or, as they are styled in the title-page, "Works Human and Divine." The same singular license which even the most reverend personages and the purest and most religious minds in that age allowed themselves to take in light and amatory poetry is found in Herrick as well as in Donne; a good deal of whose quaintness and fondness for conceit Herrick has also caught. Yet some both of his hymns and of his anacreontics—for of such strange intermixture, in truth, does his poetry consist—are beautifully simple and natural. Herrick survived the Restoration, but it is not known in what year he died. Along with his poetry may be mentioned that of another clergyman, George Herbert, a younger brother of the celebrated Edward Lord Herbert of Cherbury, whose volume, entitled "The Temple," was published immediately after his death, in 1633, and was at least six or seven times reprinted in the course of the present period. His biographer, Izaak Walton, tells us that when he wrote, in the reign of Charles II., twenty thousand copies of it had been sold. Herbert was an intimate friend of Donne, and no doubt a great admirer of his poetry; but his own has been to a great extent preserved from the imitation of Donne's style, into which it might in other circumstances have fallen, in all probability by its having been composed with little effort or elaboration, and chiefly to relieve and amuse his own mind by the melodious expression of his favorite fancies and contemplations. His quaintness lies in his thoughts rather than in their expression, which is in general sufficiently simple and luminous. Herbert has considerable fancy and pathos, and, on the whole, may be considered one of the most poetical of our religious lyrical writers. To a different class belong three other eminently graceful and spirited minor poets of this period—Carew, Suckling, and Lovelace. Thomas Carew, styled "one of the gentlemen of the privy chamber, and sewer in ordinary to his majesty," is the author of a small volume of poetry first printed in 1640, the year after his death. Carew is, perhaps, the earliest of our English lyrical poets whose verses exhibit a perfect polish and evenness of movement combined with a diction, elevated, indeed, in its tone, as it must needs be by the very necessities of verse, above that of mere good conversation, but yet having all the ease, nature, and directness of the language of ordinary life. The art which consists in concealing art had scarcely before been exemplified in our lighter poetry: the songs and other short lyrical compositions of preceding writers, however elegant or beautiful, had usually aimed at attracting attention by some brilliant quaintness or other artifice of thought or style, the more curious and obviously elaborate the more admired. Carew preceded Waller in substituting for all this the truer charm of merely natural thoughts in harmonious numbers: he has, indeed, even fewer conceits than Waller; and, while his verse is equally correct, its music is richer, and the tone of his poetry altogether much warmer and more imaginative. Sir John Suckling, who died in 1641, at the age of thirty-two, has none of the pathos of Carew, but all his fluency and natural elegance, with a sprightliness and buoyancy of his own, in which he has scarcely ever been matched. His famous ballad on the wedding of Lord Broghill and Lady Margaret Howard is the very perfection of poetical gayety, archness, and grace; not without a smack of rough cordiality, which improves its spirit, and of which he has more on other occasions. Another most elegant writer of songs and other short pieces in the reign of Charles I. was Colonel Richard Lovelace, whose poems are to be found in two small volumes, one entitled "Lucasta," published in 1649; the other entitled "Posthume Poems," published by his brother in 1659, the year after his death. Lovelace's songs, which are mostly amatory, and the produce of a genuine passion, are as exquisitely versified as Carew's, with greater liveliness of expression and more variety of fancy; but their distinguishing charm is a spirit of the most chivalrous gentleness and honor, giving to the lightest of them an elevation and pathos beyond the reach of any mere poetic art to bestow. These three last-mentioned writers were all cavaliers; but the cause of Puritanism and the parliament had also its poets as well as that of love and loyalty, and those as sweet singers as any we have yet named. Andrew Marvell, the noble-minded member for Hull in the reign of Charles II., and in that age of brilliant profligacy renowned alike as the first of patriots and of wits, is the author of a number of political satires, in which a rich vein of vigorous though often coarse humor runs through a careless, extemporaneous style, and which did prodigious execution in the party warfare of the day; but some of his earlier poetry is eminent both for the delicate bloom of the sentiment and for grace of form. There are few short poems in the language more tuneful and touchingly beautiful, for example, than his verses beginning—

> Where the remote Bermudas ride
> In the ocean's bosom unespied,
> From a small boat that rowed along > The listening winds received this song;—

and ending—

> Thus sang they, in the English boat,
> A holy and a cheerful note;
> And all the way, to guide the chime,
> They with the falling oars kept time.

This description of the boat-song of the exiles—"a holy and a cheerful note"—very well characterizes the best of Marvell's own strains. But the greatest of the Puritan poets is George Wither, who is one of the most untiring of English writers both in prose and verse; his first publication, his satires entitled "Abuses Stript and Whipt," having appeared so early as 1611, and some of his last pieces only a short time before his death, in 1667. The entire number of his separate publications, as they have been reckoned up by some of his biographers and modern editors, considerably exceeds a hundred. Of so large and multifarious a mass, a great part, produced hastily for temporary purposes, has now lost all interest; much of his verse, like that of Marvell, consists of scourging party satire and invective, in which his genius shows only its force and fertility, without any of its radiance; but his earlier poetry especially abounds in the finest bursts of sunshine—in the richest outpourings both of fancy and of heart. Two songs or short poems of Wither's inserted by Percy in his Reliques[1]—the one beginning > Shall I, wasting in despair,

> Die because a woman's fair?
> Or make pale my cheeks with care
> 'Cause another's rosy are?
> Be she fairer than the day,
> Or the flowery meads in May;
> If she be not so to me,
> What care I how fair she be?

the other entitled "The Stedfast Shepherd" (an exquisitely graceful as well as high-thoughted carol), first recalled attention to this forgotten writer; and further specimens of him were afterward given by Ellis—among the rest the passage of consummate spirit and beauty from his Shepherd's Hunting, published in 1615, while he was confined in the Marshalsea, in which, breaking out into what we may almost call a hymn or pæan of gratitude and affection, he recounts all that poetry and his muse still were and had ever been to him:

> In my former days of bliss
> Her divine skill taught me this—
> That from every thing I saw
> I could some invention draw,
> And raise pleasure to her height
> Through the meanest object's sight.
> By the murmur of a spring,
> Or the least bough's rusteling;
> By a daisy, whose leaves spread > Shut when Titan goes to bed;
> Or a shady bush or tree,
> She could more infuse in me
> Than all Nature's beauties can
> In some other wiser man.
> By her help I also now > Make this churlish place allow > Some things that may sweeten gladness
> In the very gall of sadness.
> The dull loneness, the black shade,
> That these hanging vaults have made;
> The strange music of the waves
> Beating on these hollow caves;
> This black den, which rocks emboss,
> Overgrown with eldest moss;
> The rude portals, that give sight
> More to terror than delight;
> This my chamber of neglect,
> Walled about with disrespect;
> From all these, and this dull air,
> A fit object for despair,
> She hath taught me by her might
> To draw comfort and delight.
> Therefore, thou best earthly bliss,
> I will cherish thee for this—
> Poesy!—thou sweet'st content
> That e'er Heaven to mortals lent,
> Though they as a trifle leave thee
> Whose dull thoughts can not conceive thee;
> Though thou be to them a scorn
> That to naught but earth are born;
> Let my life no longer be
> Than I am in love with thee.
> Though our wise ones call thee madness,
> Let me never taste of gladness
> If I love not thy maddest fits
> More than all their greatest wits.
> And though some too seeming holy,
> Do account thy raptures folly,
> Thou dost teach me to contemn
> What makes knaves and fools of them.[2]

One excellence for which all Wither's writings are eminent, his prose as well as his verse, is their genuine English. His unaffected diction, even now, has scarcely a stain of age upon it, but flows on, ever fresh and transparent, like a pebbled rill.

Even the prose literature of the present period is much of it of so imaginative a character, that it may be considered to be a kind of half-poetry. We have already in the last book noticed the change which English prose-writing underwent in the course of the latter half of the sixteenth century, passing from the familiar but not inelegant simplicity of the style of Sir Thomas More to the more formal and elaborate but still succinct and unencumbered rhetoric of Ascham, from thence to the affectations of Lyly the Euphuist, and his imitators, and finally out of what we may call that sickly and unnatural state of transition to the richly-ornamented eloquence of Sidney and the stately periods of Hooker.[1] On the whole, our prose, as exhibited in the highest examples, had lost something in ease and clearness, and had gained in copiousness, in sonorousness, and in splendor. In its inferior specimens, also, a corresponding change is to be traced, but of a modified character. In these the ancient simplicity and directness had given place only to a long-winded wordiness, and an awkwardness and intricacy, sometimes so excessive as to be nearly unintelligible, produced by piling clause upon clause, and involution upon involution, in the endeavor to crowd into every sentence as much meaning or as many particulars as possible. Here the change was nearly altogether for the worse—the loss in one direction was compensated by hardly any thing that could be called a gain in another. One additional point of difference, chiefly exemplified in the sermons and other writings of divines, was the introduction toward the close of the reign of Elizabeth of what may be described as at once the most artificial and the most puerile mode of composition ever practiced, consisting in an incessant fire of alliteration, punning, and the most jejune verbal conceits, often in a Babylonish dialect, or party-colored tissue of words, made up of nearly as much Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, as native English. This was what had been substituted in popular preaching for the buffoonery of Latimer, whether to the gain or loss of sound religion and theological literature it might be hard to determine.

The authorized translation of the Bible, on the whole so admirable both for correctness and beauty of style, is apt, on the first thought, to be regarded as exhibiting the actual state of the language in the time of James I., when it was first published. It is to be remembered, however, that the new translation was formed, by the special directions of the king, upon the basis of that of Parker's or the Bishop's Bible, which had been made nearly forty years before, and which had itself been founded upon that of Cranmer made in the reign of Henry VIII.[2] The consequence is, as Mr. Hallam has remarked, that whether the style of King James's translation be the perfection of the English language or no, it is not the language of his reign. "It may, in the eyes of many," adds Mr. Hallam, "be a better English, but it is not the English of Daniel, or Raleigh, or Bacon, as any one may easily perceive. It abounds, in fact, especially in the Old Testament, with obsolete phraseology, and with single words long since abandoned, or retained only in provincial use."[1] This is, perhaps, rather strongly put; for although the preceding version served as a general guide to the translators, and was not needlessly deviated from, they have evidently modernized its style, not perhaps quite up to that of their own day, but so far, we apprehend, as to exclude nearly all words and phrases that had then passed out even of common and familiar use. In that theological age, indeed, few forms of expression found in the Bible could well have fallen altogether into desuetude, although some may have come to be less apt and significant than they once were, or than others that might now be substituted for them. But we believe the new translators, in any changes they made, were very careful to avoid the employment of any mere words of yesterday, the glare of whose recent coinage would have contrasted offensively with the general antique color of diction which they desired to retain. If ever their version were to be revised, whether to improve the rendering of some passages by the lights of modern criticism, or to mend some hardness and intricacy of construction in others, it ought to be retouched in the same spirit of affectionate veneration for the genius and essential characteristics of its beautiful style; and a good rule to be laid down might be, that no word should be admitted in the improved renderings which was not in use in the age when the translation was originally made. The language was then abundantly rich enough to furnish all the words that could be wanted for the purpose.

Besides the translation of the Bible, the portion of the English literature of the present period that is theological is very great in point of quantity, and a part of it also possesses distinguished claims to notice in a literary point of view. Religion was the great subject of speculation and controversy in this country throughout the entire space of a century and a half between the Reformation and the Revolution; and the half century preceding the Restoration, which occupied nearly the central portion of that space, witnessed the hottest and thickest of the conflict of opinions upon this subject. Nothing can more strikingly illustrate the universality of the interest that was now taken in theological controversy, than the fact that both the kings whose reigns are comprehended within the present period have left us a considerable quantity of literary manufacture of their own, and that it is almost all theological. King James, whose works were collected and published in a folio volume in 1616, under the care of Dr. Mountague, bishop of Winchester, had published what he called a "Fruitful Meditation" upon part of the Apocalypse, "in form of ane sermon," so early as the year 1588, when he was only a youth of two-and-twenty. Indeed, according to Bishop Mountague's account, this performance was "written by his majesty before he was twenty years of age." Soon after, on the destruction of the Spanish Armada, he produced another "Meditation" on certain verses of one of the chapters of the First Book of Chronicles. Among his subsequent publications are Meditations on the Lord's Prayer and on some verses of the 27th chapter of St. Matthew. And nearly all his other works—his "Dæmonologie," first published in 1597; his "True Law of Free Monarchies," 1598; his "Basilicon Doron," or advice to his son Prince Henry, 1599; his "Apology for the Oath of Allegiance," 1605—are, in fact, in the main, theological treatises. It is scarcely necessary to add that they are of little or no value, either theological or literary, though they are curious as illustrating the intellectual and moral character of James, who was certainly a person of no depth either of learning or of judgment, though of some reading in the single province of theology, and also of some shrewdness and readiness, and an inexhaustible flow of words, which he mistook for eloquence and genius. The writings attributed to Charles I. were first collected and published at the Hague soon after his death, in a folio volume without date, under the title of "Reliquiæ Sacræ Carolinæ," and twice afterward in England, namely in 1660 and 1687, with the title of "ΒΑΣΙΛΙΚΑ: The works of King Charles the Martyr." If we except a number of speeches to the parliament, letters, dispatches, and other political papers, the contents of this collection are all theological, consisting of prayers, arguments, and disquisitions on the controversy about church government, and the famous "Eikon Basiliké, or The Portraiture of his sacred Majesty in his Solitude and Sufferings;" which, having been printed under the care of Dr. Gauden (after the Restoration successively bishop of Exeter and Worcester), had been first published by itself immediately after the king's execution. It is now generally admitted that the Eikon was really written by Gauden, who, after the Restoration, openly claimed it as his own. Mr. Hallam, although he has no doubt of Gauden being the author, admits that it is, nevertheless, superior to his acknowledged writings. "A strain of majestic melancholy," he observes, "is well kept up; but the personated sovereign is rather too theatrical for real nature; the language is too rhetorical and amplified, the periods too artificially elaborated. None but scholars and practiced writers employ such a style as this."[1] It is not improbable, however, that the work may have been submitted to Charles's revisal, and that it may have received both his approval and his corrections. Charles, indeed, was more in the habit of correcting what had been written by others than of writing any thing himself. "Though he was of as slow a pen as of speech," says Sir Philip Warwick, "yet both were very significant; and he had that modest esteem of his own parts, that he would usually say, he would willingly make his own dispatches, but that he found it better to be a cobbler than a shoemaker. I have been in company with very learned men, when I have brought them their own papers back from him with his alterations, who ever confessed his amendments to have been very material. And I once, by his commandment, brought him a paper of my own to read, to see whether it was suitable to his directions, and he disallowed it slightingly: I desired him I might call Dr. Sanderson to aid me, and that the doctor might understand his own meaning from himself; and, with his majesty's leave, I brought him, while he was walking and taking the air; whereupon we two went back, but pleased him as little when we returned it; for, smilingly, he said a man might have as good ware out of a chandler's shop; but afterward he set it down with his own pen very plainly, and suitably to his own intentions." The most important of the literary productions which are admitted to be wholly Charles's own, are his papers in the controversy which he carried on at Newcastle, in June and July, 1646, with Alexander Henderson, the Scotch clergyman, on the question between episcopacy and presbytery, and those on the same subject in his controversy with the parliamentary divines at Newport, in October, 1648. These papers show considerable clearness of thinking and logical or argumentative talent; but it can not be said that they are written with any remarkable force or elegance. It is not easy to understand the meaning of Horace Walpole's judgment on Charles's style—that "it was formed between a certain portion of sense, adversity, dignity, and perhaps a little insincerity."[1] What he says of a copy of verses said to have been written by his majesty during his confinement in Carisbrook Castle, is more to the purpose: "The poetry is most uncouth and inharmonious; but there are strong thoughts in it, some good sense, and a strain of majestic piety." Though not very polished, indeed, or very like the production of a practiced versifier, which goes so far to furnish a presumption of its authenticity, this composition, which is entitled "Majesty in Misery, or an Imploration to the King of Kings," indicates considerable poetic power, and an evident familiarity with the highest models. Here are a few of its more striking verses:

> Nature and law, by thy divine decree
> The only sort of righteous royalty,
> With this dim diadem invested me.
> * * * * *
> The fiercest furies, that do daily tread
> Upon my grief, my gray, discrowned head,
> Are those that owe my bounty for their bread.
> * * * * * *
> The Church of England doth all faction foster,
> The pulpit is usurped by each impostor;
> Extempore excludes the Pater Noster.
>
> The Presbyter and Independent seed
> Springs with broad blades; to make religion bleed > Herod and Pontius Pilate are agreed.
>
> The corner-stone's misplaced by every paviour;
> With such a bloody method and behaviour
> Their ancestors did crucify our Saviour.
> * * * * * *
> With my own power my majesty they wound;
> In the king's name the king himself's uncrowned;
> So doth the dust destroy the diamond.

The mass of the theological literature of this period consists of sermons and controversial tracts, all of which, with a very few exceptions, have now passed into complete oblivion. One of the most eminent preachers, perhaps the most eminent, of the age of Elizabeth and James, was Dr. Lancelot Andrews, who, after having held the sees of Chichester and Ely, died bishop of Winchester in 1626. Bishop Andrews was one of the translators of the Bible, and is the author, among other works, of a folio volume of sermons published by direction of Charles I., soon after his death; of another folio volume of tracts and speeches, which appeared in 1629; of a third volume of lectures on the Ten Commandments, published in 1642; and of a fourth, containing lectures delivered at St. Paul's and at St. Giles's, Cripplegate, published in 1657. He was, perhaps, the most learned of the English theologians of that learned time, and was besides a person of great vigor and acuteness of understanding; so that his death was regarded by scholars, both at home and abroad, as the extinction of the chief light of the English church. Milton, then a youth of seventeen, bewailed the event in a Latin elegy, full of feeling and fancy; and even in a tract written many years afterward, when his opinions had undergone a complete change, he admits that "Bishop Andrews of late years, and in these times the primate of Armagh (Usher), for their learning are reputed the best able to say what may be said" in defense of episcopacy.[1] Both the learning and ability of Andrews, indeed, are conspicuous in every thing he has written; but his eloquence, nevertheless, is to a modern taste of the most grotesque description. In his more ambitious passages he is the very prince of verbal posture-masters—if not the first in date, the first in extravagance, of the artificial, quibbling, syllable-tormenting school of our English pulpit rhetoricians; and he undoubtedly contributed more to spread the disease of that manner of writing than any other individual. Not only did his eminence in this line endear him to the royal tastes of Elizabeth and James—all men admired and strove to copy after him. Fuller declares that he was "an inimitable preacher in his way;" and then he tells us that "pious and pleasant Bishop Felton, his cotemporary and colleague, endeavored in vain, in his sermons, to assimilate his style, and therefore said merrily of himself, 'I had almost marred my own natural trot by endeavoring to imitate his artificial amble.'" Many a "natural trot" Andrews no doubt was the cause of spoiling in his day, and long after it. This bishop is further very notable, in the history of the English church, as the first great asserter of those semi-popish notions touching doctrines, rites, and ecclesiastical government with which Laud afterward blew up the establishment. Andrews, however, was a very different sort of person from Laud—as superior to him in sense and policy as in learning and general strength and comprehensiveness of understanding. A well-known story that is told of him proves his moderation as much as his wit and readiness: when he and Dr. Neal, bishop of Durham, were one day standing behind the king's chair, as he sat at dinner (it was the day on which James dissolved his last parliament, and the anecdote is related on the authority of Waller, the poet, who was present), his majesty, turning round, addressed the two prelates—"My lords, can not I take my subjects' money when I want it, without all this formality in parliament? The Bishop of Durham readily answered, God forbid, sir, but you should; you are the breath of our nostrils. Whereupon the king turned, and said to the Bishop of Winchester, Well, my lord, what say you? Sir, replied the bishop, I have no skill to judge of parliamentary cases. The king answered, No put-offs, my lord, answer me presently. Then, sir, said he, I think it is lawful for you to take my brother Neal's money, for he offers it."[1] Clarendon has expressed his belief that if Archbishop Bancroft had been succeeded in the see of Canterbury by Andrews, instead of Abbot, the infection of the Geneva fire would have been kept out, which could not afterward be so easily expelled.[2]

Donne, the poet, was also a voluminous writer in prose, having left a folio volume of sermons, besides a treatise against Catholicism, entitled "The Pseudo Martyr," another singular performance, entitled "Biathanatos," in confutation of the common notion about the necessary sinfulness of suicide, and some other professional disquisitions. His biographer, Izaak Walton, says that he preached "as an angel, from a cloud, but not in a cloud;" but most modern readers will probably be of opinion that he has not quite made his escape from it.. His manner is fully as quaint in his prose as in his verse, and his way of thinking as subtil and peculiar. His sermons are also, as well as those of Andrews, overlaid with learning, much of which seems to be only a useless and cumbersome show. Doubtless, however, there are deep and beautiful things in Donne, for those that will seek for them, as has, indeed, been testified by those who, in modern times, have made themselves the best acquainted with these neglected theological works of his. Another of the most learned theologians and eloquent preachers of those times was also an eminent poet, Joseph Hall, born in 1524, and successively bishop of Exeter and Norwich, from which latter see having been expelled by the Long Parliament, he died, after protracted sufferings from imprisonment and poverty, in 1656. Hall began his career of authorship by the publication of the first three books of his Satires, in 1597, while he was a student at Cambridge, and only in his twenty-third year. A continuation followed the next year, under the title of "Virgidemiarum the Three last Books;" and the whole were afterward republished together, as "Virgidemiarum Six Books;" that is, six books of gatherings, or harvests of rods. "These satires," says Warton, who has given an elaborate analysis of them, "are marked with a classical precision to which English poetry had yet rarely attained. They are replete with animation of style and sentiment. .... The characters are delineated in strong and lively coloring, and their discriminations are touched with the masterly traces of genuine humor.

The versification is equally energetic and elegant, and the fabric of the couplets approaches to the modern standard."[1] Hall's English prose works, which are very voluminous, consist of sermons, polemical tracts, paraphrases of scripture, casuistical divinity, and some pieces on practical religion, of which his Contemplations, his Art of Divine Meditation, and his Enochismus, or Treatise on the Mode of Walking with God, are the most remarkable. The poetic temperament of Hall reveals itself in his prose as well as in his verse, by the fervor of his piety and the forcible and often picturesque character of his style, in which it has been thought he made Seneca his model. "The writer of the Satires," observes Warton, "is perceptible in some of his gravest polemical or scriptural treatises, which are perpetually interspersed with excursive illustrations, familiar allusions, and observations on life."[2] It will be perceived, from all this, that both in style and in mind Hall and Donne were altogether opposed; neither in his prose nor in his verse has the former the originality of the latter, or the fineness of thought that will often break out in a sudden streak of light from the midst of his dark sayings; but, on the other hand, he is perfectly free from the dominant vices of Donne's manner, his conceits, his quaintness, his remote and fantastic analogies, his obscurity, his harshness, his parade of a useless and encumbering erudition. From each and all of these faults, indeed, Hall is more exempt than perhaps any other eminent theological writer of his age; his eloquence has a much more modern air than that of any at least of the cotemporaries of the earlier part of his life; and, accordingly, he remains the only one of them, any of whose writings are still popularly known and read.

A part which Hall took in his old age in the grand controversy of the time brought him into collision with one with whose name in after ages the world was to resound. John Milton, then in his thirty-third year, and recently returned from his travels in France and Italy, had already, in 1641, lent the aid of his pen to the war of the Puritans against the established church by the publication of his treatise, entitled "Of Reformation," in Two Books. The same year Hall published his "Humble Remonstrance" in favor of episcopacy, which immediately called forth an "Answer by Smectymnuus"—a word formed from the initial letters of the names of five Puritan ministers by whom the tract was written—Stephen Marshall, Edmund Calamy, Thomas Young, Matthew Newcomen, and William (or, as he was on this occasion reduced to designate himself, Uuilliam) Spurstow. The "Answer" produced a "Confutation" by Archbishop Usher; and to this Milton replied in a treatise, entitled "Of Prelatical Episcopacy." Hall then published a "Defense of the Humble Remonstrance;" and Milton wrote "Animadversions" upon that. About the same time he also brought out a performance of much greater pretension, under the title of "The Reason of Church Government urged against Prelacy," in

[1] Hist. Eng. Poet., iv. 338. [2] Ibid., p. 336.

Two Books. This is the work containing the magnificent passage in which he makes the announcement of his intention to attempt something in one of the highest kinds of poetry "in the mother-tongue," long afterward accomplished in his great epic. Meanwhile a "Confutation of the Animadversions" having been published by Bishop Hall, or his son, Milton replied, in 1642, in an "Apology for Smectymnuus," which was the last of his publications in this particular controversy. But nearly all his other prose writings were given to the world within the present period, namely, his "Tractate of Education," addressed to his friend Hartlib, and his noble "Areopagitica, a Speech for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing," in 1644; his "Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce," and his "Judgment of Martin Bucer concerning Divorce," the same year; his "Tetrachordon" and "Colasterion" (both on the same subject), in 1645; his "Tenure of Kings and Magistrates," his "Eikonoclastes," in answer to the Eikon Basiliké, and one or two other tracts of more temporary interest, all, after the execution of the king, in 1649; his "Defense for the People of England," in answer to Salmasius (in Latin), in 1651; his "Second Defense" (also in Latin), in reply to a work by Peter du Moulin, in 1654; two additional Latin tracts in reply to rejoinders of Du Moulin, in 1655; his treatises on "Civil Power in Ecclesiastical Cases," and on "The Means of Removing Hirelings out of the Church," in 1659; his "Letter concerning the Ruptures of the Commonwealth," and "Brief Delineation of a Free Commonwealth," the same year; and, finally, his "Ready and Easy Way to establish a Free Commonwealth," and his "Brief Notes upon a Sermon, preached by Dr. Griffith, called The Fear of God and the King," in the spring of 1660, immediately before the king's return. Passages of great poetic splendor occur in some of these productions, and a fervid and fiery spirit breathes in all of them, though the animation is as apt to take the tone of mere coarse objurgation and abuse as of lofty and dignified scorn or of vigorous argument; but, upon the whole, it can not be said that Milton's English prose is a good style. It is in the first place, not perhaps in vocabulary, but certainly in genius and construction, the most Latinized of English styles; but it does not merit the commendation bestowed by Pope on another style which he conceived to be formed after the model of the Roman elequence, of being "so Latin, yet so English all the while." It is both soul and body Latin, only in an English dress. Owing partly to this principle of composition upon which he deliberately proceeded, or to the adoption of which his education and tastes or habits led him, partly to the character of his mind, fervid, gorgeous, and soaring, but having little involuntary impulsiveness or self-abandonment, rich as his style often is, it never moves with any degree of rapidity or easy grace even in passages where such qualities are most required, but has at all times something of a stiff, cumbrous, oppressive air, as if every thought, the lightest and most evanescent as well as the gravest and stateliest, were attired in brocade and whalebone. There is too little relief from constant straining and striving; too little repose and variety; in short, too little nature. Many things, no doubt, are happily said; there is much strong and also some brilliant expression; but even such imbedded gems do not occur so often as might be looked for from so poetical a mind. In fine, we must admit the truth of what he has himself confessed—that he was not naturally disposed to "this manner of writing;" "wherein," says he, "knowing myself inferior to myself, led by the genial power of nature to another task, I have the use, as I may account it, but of my left hand."[1] With all his quick susceptibility for whatever was beautiful and bright, Milton seems to have needed the soothing influences of the regularity and music of verse fully to bring out his poetry, or to sublimate his imagination to the true poetical state. The passion which is an enlivening flame in his verse half suffocates him with its smoke in his prose.

Two other eminent names of theological controversialists belonging to this troubled age of the English church may be mentioned together—those of John Hales and William Chillingworth. Hales, who was born in 1584, and died in 1656, the same year with Hall and Usher, published in his lifetime a few short tracts, of which the most important is a Discourse on Schism, which was printed in 1642, and is considered to have led the way in that bold revolt against the authority of the fathers, so much cried up by the preceding school of Andrews and Laud, upon which has since been founded what many hold to be the strongest defense of the church of England against that of Rome. All Hales's writings were collected and published after his death, in 1659, in a quarto volume, bearing the title of "Golden Remains of the Ever-Memorable Mr. John Hales"—a designation which has stuck to his name. The main idea of his treatise on Schism was followed up with much greater vigor, and carried much further out, by Chillingworth—the Immortal Chillingworth, as he is styled by his admirers—in his famous work, entitled "The Religion of Protestants a Safe Way to Salvation," published in 1637. This is one of the most closely and keenly argued polemical treatises ever written: the style in which Chillingworth presses his reasoning home is like a charge with the bayonet. He was still only in his early manhood when he produced this remarkably able work; and he died in 1644, at the age of forty-two.

But the greatest name by far among the English divines of the seventeenth century is that of the celebrated Jeremy Taylor. He was born in 1613, and died bishop of Down and Connor, in 1667; but, as most of his works were written, and many of them were also published, before the Restoration, he belongs more properly to this period than to the next. In abundance of thought; in ingenuity of argument; in opulence of imagination; in a soul made alike for the feeling of the sublime, of the beautiful, and of the picturesque: and in a style, answering in its compass, flexibility, and sweetness to the demands of all these powers, Taylor is unrivaled among the masters of English eloquence. He is the Spenser of our prose writers; and his prose is some times almost as musical as Spenser's verse. His Sermons, his Golden Grove, his Holy Living, and, still more, his Holy Dying and his Contemplations on the State of Man, all contain many passages the beauty and splendor of which we should seek in vain to match in any other English prose writer. Another of his most remarkable works, "Theologia Eclectica, a Discourse of the Liberty of Prophesying," first published in 1647, may be placed beside Milton's Areopagitica, published three years before, as doing for liberty of conscience the same service which that did for the liberty of the press. Both remain the most eloquent and comprehensive defenses we yet possess of these two great rights.

Barrow, Henry More, and Cudworth, though they all published some of their works before the Restoration, must be reserved till the next Book. Thomas Fuller is the last of the theological writers we can here notice. He was born in 1604, and died in 1661; and in the course of his not very extended life produced a long series of literary works, of which his "Church History of Britain from the Birth of Jesus Christ until the Year 1648," which appeared in 1655, and his "History of the Worthies of England," which was not published till after his death, in 1662, are the most important. He is a most singular writer, full of verbal quibbling and quaintness of all kinds, but by far the most amusing and engaging of all the rhetoricians of this school, inasmuch as his conceits are rarely mere elaborate feats of ingenuity, but are usually informed either by a strong spirit of very peculiar humor and drollery, or sometimes even by a warmth and depth of feeling, of which, too, strange as it appears, the oddity of the phraseology is often not an ineffective exponent. He has a good deal of fancy as well as mere wit; and his works contain many passages of true eloquence, though never long sustained, and seldom unmarked by the eccentricities of his characteristic manner.

Undoubtedly the principal figure in English prose literature, as well as in philosophy, during the first quarter of the seventeenth century, is Francis Bacon. Bacon, born in 1561, published the first edition of his "Essays" in 1597; his Two Books of the "Advancement of Learning," in 1605; his "Wisdom of the Ancients" (in Latin), in 1610; a third edition of his "Essays," greatly extended, in 1612; his Two Books of the "Novum Organum," or Second Part of the Instauratio Magna, designed to consist of Six Parts (also in Latin), in 1620; his "History of the Reign of Henry VII.," in 1622; his Nine Books "De Augmentis Scientiarum," a Latin translation and extension of his Advancement of Learning, in 1623. He died in 1626.

The originality of the Baconian or Inductive method of philosophy, the actual service it has rendered to science, and even the end which it may be most correctly said to have in view, have all been subjects of dispute since Bacon's time, and still are; but, notwithstanding all differences of opinion upon these points, the acknowledgment that he was intellectually one of the most colossal of the sons of men has been nearly unanimous. They who have not seen his greatness under one form have discovered it in another; there is a discordance among men's ways of looking at him, or their theories respecting him; but the mighty shadow which he projects athwart the two bygone centuries lies there immovable, and still extending as time extends. The very deductions which are made from his merits in regard to particular points thus only heighten the impression of his general eminence—of that something about him not fully understood or discerned, which, spite of all curtailment of his claims in regard to one special kind of eminence or another, still leaves the sense of his eminence as strong as ever. As for his Novum Organum, or so-called new instrument of philosophy, it must be conceded that it was not really new when he announced it as such, either as a process followed in the practice of scientific discovery or as a theory of the right method of discovery. In the latter sense it was at least as old as Aristotle; in the former it was as old as science itself. Neither was Bacon the first writer, in his own or the immediately preceding age, who recalled attention to the inductive method, or who pointed out the barrenness of what was then called philosophy in the schools. Nor was it he that brought the reign of that philosophy to a close: it was falling fast into disrepute before he assailed it, and would probably have passed away quite as soon as it did, although his writings had never appeared. Nor has he either looked at that old philosophy with a very penetrating or comprehensive eye, or even shown a perfect understanding of the inductive method in all its applications and principles. As for his attempts in the actual practice of the inductive method, they were either insignificant or utter failures; and that, too, while some of his cotemporaries, who in no respect acknowledged him as their teacher, were turning it to account in extorting from nature the most brilliant revelations. Nay, can it be doubted that, if Bacon had never lived, or never written, the discoveries and the writings of Galileo, and Kepler, and Pascal, and others who were now extending the empire of science by the very method which he has explained and recommended, but most assuredly without having been instructed in that method by him, would have established the universal recognition of it as the right method of philosophy just as early as such recognition actually took place? That Bacon's Novum Organum has, even down to the present day, affected in any material degree the actual progress of science, may be very reasonably doubted. What great discovery or improvement can be named among all those that have been made since his time, which, from the known facts of its history, we may not fairly presume would have been made at any rate, though the Novum Organum had never been written? What instance can be quoted of the study of that work having made, or even greatly contributed to make, any individual a discoverer in science who would not in all probability have been equally such if he had never seen or heard of it? In point of fact, there is no reason to suppose that very many of those by whom science has been most carried forward since it appeared had either deeply studied Bacon's Novum Organum, or had even acquired any intimate or comprehensive acquaintance with the rules and directions therein laid down from other sources. Nor is it likely that they would have been more successful experimenters or greater discoverers if they had; for there is surely nothing in any part of the method of procedure prescribed by Bacon for the investigation of truth that would not occur of itself to the sagacity and common sense of any person of an inventive genius pursuing such investigation; indeed, every discovery that has been made, except by accident, since science had any being, must have been arrived at by the very processes which he has explained. There can be little doubt that it would be found, on a survey of the whole history of scientific discovery, that its progress has always depended partly upon the remarkable genius of individuals, partly upon the general state of the world and the condition of civilization at different times, and not in any sensible degree upon the mere speculative views as to the right method of philosophy that have at particular eras been taught in schools or books, or otherwise generally diffused. In fact, it is much more reasonable to suppose that such speculative views should have been usually influenced by the actual progress of discovery than it by them; for the recognition of sound principles of procedure, in as far as that is implied in their practical application, though not perhaps the contemplation and exposition of them in a systematic form, is necessarily involved, as has been just observed, in the very act of scientific discovery. All this being considered, we can not attribute to Bacon's Novum Organum any considerable direct share, nor even much indirect influence, in promoting the progress which science has made in certain departments since his time. We think that progress is to be traced to other causes altogether, and that it would have been pretty nearly what it is though the Novum Organum never had been written. Galileo, and not Bacon, is the true father of modern natural philosophy. That, in truth, was not Bacon's province at all; neither his acquirements nor the peculiar character and constitution of his mind fitted him for achieving any thing on that ground. The common mistake regarding him is the same as if it were to be said that not Homer, but Aristotle, was the father of poetry, because he first investigated and explained the principles or philosophy of a part of the art of poetry, although his own mind was one of the most unpoetical that ever existed. Bacon belongs not to mathematical or natural science, but to literature and to moral science in its most extensive acceptation—to the realm of imagination, of wit, of eloquence, of æsthetics, of history, of jurisprudence, of political philosophy, of logic, of metaphysics and the investigation of the powers and operations of the human mind; for this last, in reality, and not the investigation of nature, is the subject of his Novum Organum and his other writings on the advancement of human knowledge. He is in no respect an investigator or expounder of mathematics, or of mechanics, or of astronomy, or of chemistry, or of any other branch of geometrical or physical science (his contributions to natural history are not worth regarding); but he is a most penetrating and comprehensive investigator, and a most magnificent expounder of that higher philosophy, in comparison with which all these things are but a mere intellectual sort of legerdemain. Let the mathematicians, therefore, and the mechanicians, and the naturalists find out for themselves some other head: they have no claim to Bacon. All his works, his essays, his philosophical writings, commonly so called, and what he has done in history, are of one and the same character—reflective and, so to speak, poetical, not simply demonstrative, or elucidatory of mere matters of fact. What, then, is his glory?—in what did his greatness consist? In this, we should say: that an intellect at once one of the most capacious and one of the most profound ever granted to a mortal—in its powers of vision at the same time one of the most penetrating and one of the most far-reaching—was in him united and reconciled with an almost equal endowment of the imaginative faculty; and that he is, therefore, of all philosophical writers, the one in whom are found together, in the largest proportions, depth of thought and splendor of eloquence. His intellectual ambition also—a quality of the imagination—was of the most towering character; and no other philosophic writer has taken up so grand a theme as that on which he has laid out his strength in his greatest works. But with the progress of scientific discovery that has taken place during the last two hundred years, we conceive these works to have had hardly any thing to do. His Advancement of Learning and his Novum Organum appear to us to be poems rather than scientific treatises; and we should almost as soon think of fathering modern physical science upon Paradise Lost as upon them. Perhaps the calmest and clearest examination of Bacon's philosophy that has yet appeared is that given in one of Mr. Hallam's newly-published volumes on the History of European Literature: it forms one of the ablest portions, if not the very ablest, of that great work. Mr. Hallam's estimate of what Bacon has done for science is much higher than ours; but yet the following passage seems to come very near to the admission of, or at least very strongly to corroborate, all that we have just been stating:—"It is evident that he had turned his thoughts to physical philosophy rather for an exercise of his reasoning faculties, and out of his insatiable thirst for knowledge, than from any peculiar aptitude for their subjects, much less any advantage of opportunity for their cultivation. He was more eminently the philosopher of human than of general nature. Hence he is exact as well as profound in all his reflections on civil life and mankind; while his conjectures in natural philosophy, though often very acute, are apt to wander far from the truth in consequence of his defective acquaintance with the phenomena of nature. His Centuries of Natural History give abundant proof of this. He is, in all these inquiries, like one doubtfully, and by degrees, making out a distant prospect, but often deceived by the haze. But if we compare what may be found in the sixth, seventh, and eighth books De Augmentis, in the Essays, the History of Henry VII., and the various short treatises contained in his works, on moral and political wisdom, and on human nature, from experience of which all such wisdom is drawn, with the Rhetoric, Ethics, and Politics of Aristotle, or with the historians most celebrated for their deep insight into civil society and human character—with Thucydides, Tacitus, Philip de Comines, Machiavel, Davila, Hume—we shall, I think, find that one man may almost be compared with all of these together. When Galileo is named as equal to Bacon, it is to be remembered that Galileo was no moral or political philosopher, and in this department Leibnitz certainly falls very short of Bacon. Burke, perhaps, comes, of all modern writers, the nearest to him; but, though Bacon may not be more profound than Burke, he is still more copious and comprehensive."[1]

Hobbes, the famous philosopher of Malmesbury, although some of his publications appeared in the time of Cromwell, rose into so much greater celebrity after the Restoration, that our notice of him may be fitly deferred for the present. And we can merely mention Sir James Harrington's political romance entitled Oceana, which was published in 1656. Harrington's leading principles are, that the natural element of power in states is property; and that of all kinds of property that in land is the most important, possessing, indeed, certain characteristics which distinguish it in its nature and political action from all other property. "In general," observes Mr. Hallam, "it may be said of Harrington that he is prolix, dull, pedantic, yet seldom profound, but sometimes redeems himself by just observations."[2] This is certainly true in so far as respects the style of the Oceana; but a more favorable judgment has sometimes been passed in modern times upon the ingenuity and profoundness of certain of Harrington's views, as well as their originality.

[1] Lit. of Eur., iii. 218. Among many other admirable things thickly scattered over the whole of this section on Bacon (pp. 166–228), Mr. Hallam has taken an opportunity of pointing out an almost universal misapprehension into which the modern expositors of Bacon's Novum Organum have fallen on the subject of his celebrated Idola, which, as is here shown, are not at all what we now call idols, that is, false divinities, but merely, in the Greek sense of the word, images or fallacious appearances of things as opposed to realities (pp. 194–197). The reader may also be referred to another disquisition on Bacon, of great brilliancy, which appeared some time ago in the Edinburgh Review (No. 132, for July, 1837, pp. 1–101). And in addition to the illustrative expositions of the Novum Organum, of a more scientific character, by the late Professor Playfair, in his Dissertation on the Progress of Mathematical and Physical Science prefixed to the Encyclopædia Britannica (pp. 453–474); and by Sir John Herschell, in his Preliminary Discourse on the Objects, Advantages and Pleasures of the Study of Natural Philosophy, in Dr. Lardner's Cabinet Cyclopædia, we would mention, as containing some views of the greatest importance, the Second Section of Mr. Coleridge's Treatise on Method, forming the Introduction to the Encyclopædia Metropolitana (pp. 24–32). Mr. Coleridge, by the by, is one of the very few modern writers who have not fallen into the misconception noticed above about Bacon's Idola. See p. 28.

[2] Lit. of Eur., iv. 367

One of the most original and peculiar writers of this period is Sir Thomas Browne, the celebrated author of the "Religio Medici," published in 1642; the "Pseudodoxia Epidemica, or Inquiries into Vulgar and Common Errors," in 1646; and the "Hydriotaphia, Urn Burial, or a Discourse on the Sepulchral Urns found in Norfolk;" and "The Garden of Cyrus, or the Quincuncial Lozenge, or Network Plantations of the Ancients, Artificially Naturally, Mystically Considered," which appeared together in 1658. Browne died in 1682, at the age of seventy-seven; but he published nothing after the Restoration, though some additional tracts found among his papers were given to the world after his death. The writer of a late spirited review of Browne's literary productions and the characteristics of his singular genius has sketched the history of his successive acts of authorship in a lively and striking passage: "He had no sympathy with the great business of men. In that awful year when Charles I. went in person to seize five members of the Commons' House—when the streets resounded with shouts of "Privilege of parliament," and the king's coach was assailed by the prophetic cry, "To your tents, O Israel"—in that year, in fact, when the civil war first broke out, and when most men of literary power were drawn by the excitement of the crisis into patriotic controversy on either side—appeared the calm and meditative reveries of the Religio Medici. The war raged on. It was a struggle between all the elements of government. England was torn by convulsion, and red with blood. But Browne was tranquilly preparing his Pseudodoxia Epidemica, as if errors about basilisks and griffins were the paramount and fatal epidemic of the time; and it was published in due order in that year when the cause which the author advocated, as far as he could advocate any thing political, lay at its last gasp. The king dies on the scaffold. The protectorate succeeds. Men are again fighting on paper the solemn cause already decided in the field. Drawn from visions more sublime—forsaking studies more intricate and vast than those of the poetical Sage of Norwich—diverging from a career bounded by the most splendid goal—foremost in the ranks shines the flaming sword of Milton; Sir Thomas Browne is lost in the quincunx of the ancient gardens; and the year 1658 beheld the death of Oliver Cromwell, and the publication of the Hydriotaphia."[1] The writings of Sir Thomas Browne, to be relished or rightly appreciated, must of course be read in the spirit suited to the species of literature to which they belong. If we look for matter-of-fact information in a poem, we are likely to be disappointed; and so are we, likewise, if we go for the passionate or pictured style of poetry to an encyclopedia. Browne's works, with all their varied learning, contain very little positive information that can now be accounted of much value; very little even of direct moral or economical counsel by which any person could greatly profit; very little, in short, of any thing that will either put money in a man's pocket, or actual knowledge in his head. Assuredly the interest with which they were perused, and the charm that was found to belong to them, could not at any time have been due, except in very small part indeed, to the estimation in which their readers held such pieces of intelligence as that the phenix is but a fable of the poets, and that the griffin exists only in the zoology of the heralds. It would fare ill with Browne, if the worth of his books were to be tried by the amount of what they contain of this kind of information, or, indeed, of any other kind of what is commonly called useful knowledge; for, in truth, he has done his best to diffuse a good many vulgar errors as monstrous as any he had corrected. For that matter, if his readers were to continue to believe with him in astrology and witchcraft, we shall all agree that it was of very little consequence what faith they might hold touching the phenix and the griffin. Mr. Hallam, we think, has, in a manner which is not usual with him, fallen somewhat into this error of applying a false test in the judgment he has passed upon Browne. It is, no doubt, quite true that the Inquiry into Vulgar Errors "scarcely raises a high notion of Browne himself as a philosopher, or of the state of physical knowledge in England;"[1] that the Religio Medici shows its author to have been "far removed from real philosophy, both by his turn of mind and by the nature of his erudition;" and likewise that "he seldom reasons," that "his thoughts are desultory," that "sometimes he appears skeptical or paradoxical," but that "credulity and deference to authority prevail" in his habits of thinking.[2] Understanding philosophy in the sense in which the term is here used, that is to say, as meaning the sifting and separation of fact from fiction, it may be admitted that there is not much of that in Sir Thomas Browne; his works are all rather marked by a very curious and piquant intermixture of the two. Of course, such being the case, what he writes is not to be considered solely or even principally with reference to its absolute truth or falsehood, but rather with reference to its relative truth and significance as an expression of some feeling, or notion, or other idiosyncracy of the very singular and interesting mind from which it has proceeded. Read in this spirit, the works of Sir Thomas Browne, more especially his "Religio Medici" and his "Urn Burial," will be found among the richest in our literature—full of uncommon thoughts, and trains of meditation leading far away into the dimmest inner chambers of life and death—and also of an eloquence, sometimes fantastic, but always striking, not seldom pathetic, and in its greatest passages gorgeous with the emblazonry of a warm imagination. Out of such a writer the rightly attuned and sympathizing mind will draw many things more precious than any mere facts.

Another remarkable work of this age, which may be considered as belonging to the same class with those of Browne, though occupying an inferior place, is Burton's "Anatomy of Melancholy." Robert Burton, who, on his title-page, takes the name of Democritus Junior, died in 1640, and his book was first published in 1621. It is an extraordinary accumulation of out-of-the-way learning, interspersed somewhat in the manner of Montaigne's Essays, with original matter, but with this, among other differences—that in Montaigne the quotations have the air of being introduced, as we know that in fact they were, to illustrate the original matter, which is the web of the discourse—they but the embroidery; whereas in Burton the learning is rather the web, upon which what he has got to say of his own is worked in by way of forming a sort of decorative figure. Burton is far from having the variety or abundance of Montaigne; but there is considerable point and penetration in his style, and he says many striking things in a sort of half-splenetic, half-jocular humor, which many readers have found wonderfully stimulating. Dr. Johnson, who is supposed to have in some measure formed his style upon that of Sir Thomas Browne, and who was, at any rate, a warm admirer of the author of the Religio Medici, is said to have declared that Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy was the only book that ever drew him out of bed an hour sooner than he would otherwise have got up.

One other great writer of this period still remains to be mentioned—the all-accomplished Sir Walter Raleigh. Raleigh is the author of a few short poems, and of some miscellaneous pieces in prose; but his great work is his "History of the World," composed during his imprisonment in the Tower, and first published in a folio volume in 1614. It is an unfinished work, coming down only to the first Macedonian war; and there is no reason to suppose that any more of it was ever written, although it has been asserted that a second volume was burned by the author. Raleigh's History, as a record of facts, has long been superseded; the interest it possesses at the present day is derived almost entirely from its literary merits, and from a few passages in which the author takes occasion to allude to circumstances that have fallen within his own experience. Much of it is written without any ambition of eloquence; but the style, even where it is most careless, is still living and exciting, from a tone of the actual world which it preserves, and a certain frankness and heartiness coming from Raleigh's profession and his warm, impetuous character. It is not disfigured by any of the petty pedantries to some one or other of which most of the writers of books in that age gave way more or less, and it has altogether a more modern air, perhaps, than the style of any cotemporary work; while in some passages the composition, without losing any thing of its natural grace and cordiality, is wrought up to great rhetorical polish and elevation. A still greater work than Raleigh's, however, at least considered in reference to its historical merits, is Richard Knolles's History of the Turks, published in 1610. Johnson, in one of his Ramblers, has awarded to Knolles the first place among English historians; and Mr. Hallam concurs in thinking that his style and power of narration have not been too highly extolled by that critic. "His descriptions," continues Mr. Hallam, "are vivid and animated; circumstantial, but not to feebleness; his characters are drawn with a strong pencil. . . . . In the style of Knolles there is sometimes, as Johnson has hinted, a slight excess of desire to make every phrase effective; but he is exempt from the usual blemishes of his age; and his command of the language is so extensive that we should not err in placing him among the first of our elder writers."[1] Much of this praise, however, is to be considered as given to the uniformity or regularity of Knolles's style; the chief fault of which, perhaps, is that it is too continuously elaborated and sustained for a long work. Another historical work of this age is Samuel Daniel's History of England from the Conquest to the reign of Edward III., which was published in 1618. It is of little historical value, but is remarkable for the same simple ease and purity of language which are the distinguishing qualities of Daniel's verse. The contribution to this department of literature of all those that the early part of the seventeenth century produced, which is at the same time the most valuable as an original authority and the most masterly in its execution, is undoubtedly Bacon's History of the reign of Henry VII. Next to that, but certainly at a great distance below it, may be placed Thomas May's two able works of later date, his "History of the Parliament of England which began November 3, 1640" (the Long Parliament), folio, 1647, and his "Breviary of the History of the Parliament," 8vo., 1650. Hobbes's Behemoth did not appear till long after the Restoration—indeed, not till after the author's death.

The series of popular national chronicles was continued in the preceding period and in this by the publication of Edward Hall's "Union of the Two Noble and Illustrious Families of York and Lancaster," in 1548; of Richard Grafton's "Chronicle at Large, down to the First Year of Queen Elizabeth," in 1569; of Raphael Holinshed's "Chronicles of England, Scotland, and Ireland," in 1577; and of Sir Richard Baker's "Chronicle of the Kings of England," written while its author was confined for debt in the Fleet Prison, where he died in 1645, and first published in a folio volume in 1641. Baker declares his chronicle to be complied "with so great care and diligence, that, if all others were lost, this only will be sufficient to inform posterity of all passages memorable or worthy to be known." This book was a great favorite with our ancestors for two or three succeeding generations, but has now lost all interest except for a few passages relating to the author's own time. Of much greater value are the various publications of the laborious antiquaries, John Stow and John Speed; namely, Stow's "Summary of the English Chronicles," 1565; his "Annals," 1573; his "Chronicle of England," 1580; his "Flores Historiarum" (an enlarged edition of his Chronicle), 1600; his "Survey of London," 1598; and Speed's "Theater of the Empire of Great Britain," 1606; and his "History of Great Britain," coming down to the accession of James I., 1614. All these works of Stow and Speed rank among the head sources or fountains of our knowledge in the department of national antiquities. Neither Whitelock's Memorials, nor the great collections of documents by Rushworth, Thurloe, and Rhymer, came from the press till after the termination of the present period.

[1] Lit. of Eur., iii. 656

With the first year of the Long Parliament commences the era of English newspapers. The oldest English newspaper that has been discovered is a quarto pamphlet of a few leaves entitled "The Diurnal Occurrences, or Daily Proceedings of Both Houses, in this great and happy parliament, from the 3d of November, 1640, to the 3d of November, 1641: London, printed for William Cooke, and are to be sold at his shop at Furnival's Inn Gate, in Holborn, 1641."[1] More than a hundred newspapers, with different titles, appear to have been published between this date and the death of the king, and upward of eighty others between that event and the Restoration.[2] "When hostilities commenced," says the writer from whom we derive this information, "every event, during a most eventful period, had its own historian, who communicated News from Hull, Truths from York, Warranted Tidings from Ireland, and Special Passages from several places. These were all occasional papers. Impatient, however, as a distracted people were for information, the news were never distributed daily. The various newspapers were published weekly at first; but in the progress of events, and the ardor of curiosity, they were distributed twice or thrice in every week.[3] Such were the French Intelligencer, the Dutch Spy, the Irish Mercury, and the Scots Dove, the Parliament Kite, and the Secret Owl. Mercurius Acheronticus brought them hebdomadal News from Hell; Mercurius Democritus communicated wonderful news from the World in the Moon; the Laughing Mercury gave perfect news from the Antipodes; and Mercurius Mastix faithfully lashed all Scouts, Mercuries, Posts, Spies, and other Intelligencers."[4] Besides the newspapers, also, the great political and religious questions of the time were debated in a prodigious multitude of separate pamphlets, which appear to have been read quite as universally and as eagerly. It has been stated that the number of such pamphlets printed in the twenty years from the meeting of the Long Parliament to the Restoration was not less than thirty thousand, which would give a rate of four or five new ones every day.

With the exception of a magnificent edition of Chrysostom, in eight volumes folio, by Sir Henry Savile, printed at Eton, where Savile was provost of the College, in 1612, scarcely any great work in the department of ancient scholarship appeared in England during this period. "The Greek language, however," observes Mr. Hallam, "was now much studied; the age of James and Charles was truly learned; our writers are prodigal of an abundant erudition, which embraces a far wider range of authors than are now read; the philosophers of every class, the poets, the historians and orators of Greece, to whom few comparatively had paid regard in the days of Elizabeth, seem as familiar to the miscellaneous writers of her next successors as the fathers of the church are to the theologians. A few, like Jeremy Taylor, are equally copious in their libations from both streams. But, though thus deeply read in ancient learning, our old scholars were not very critical in philology."[1] The present period, however, produced a number of works written in Latin by Englishmen, which still retain more or less celebrity; among others, the illustrious Camden's Britannia, first published in 1586, but not enlarged to the form in which its author ultimately left it till the appearance of the sixth edition, in 1607; the same writer's "Annales Rerum Anglicarum regnante Elizabetha," the first part of which was printed in 1615, the sequel not till after Camden's death; John Barclay's two political romances of the "Euphormio," the first part of which was published in 1603, and the more famous "Argenis," 1621; Lord Herbert's treatise "De Veritate," 1624; the "Defensio pro Populo Anglicano," and Defensio Secunda" of Milton, already mentioned; and the "De Primordiis Ecclesiarum Britannicarum" (afterward styled "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates"), 1639, and the "Annales Utriusque Testamenti," 1650 and 1654, of the learned Archbishop Usher.

[3] In December, 1642, however, Spalding, the Aberdeen annalist, in a passage which Mr. Chalmers has quoted, tells us that "now printed papers daily came from London, called Diurnal Occurrences, declaring what is done in parliament."—Vol. i. p. 336.

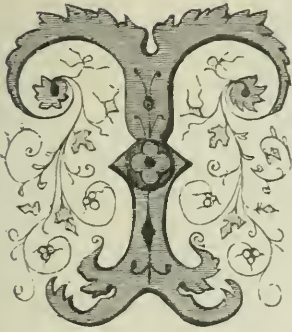
The history of science in England in the reign of James I. is illustrated by the two great discoveries of the method of logarithms by Napier, and the circulation of the blood (as is commonly admitted) by Harvey; but we shall reserve our account of the progress both of the mathematical and the physical sciences throughout this century till the next Book.

CHAPTER VI.

THE HISTORY OF MANNERS AND CUSTOMS.



HE furniture of the palaces and mansions of our princes, nobles, and gentry during the seventeenth century acquired a degree of splendor and comfort scarcely surpassed by that of the present day, and certainly much beyond the miserable attempts at imitation of classical models introduced at the commencement of this century. Many of the houses of our nobility, especially those in the country, contain even now rooms which have remained almost in statu quo from the days of the Jameses and the Charleses; and the elaborate paintings of the Dutch and Flemish artists of that period, who reveled in interiors, enlighten us as to the fittings up of more humble apartments.

In a warrant to the great wardrobe, issued by King James I., in 1613, on the occasion of the marriage of the Princess Elizabeth with the Elector Palatine, there is a copious list of articles of furniture, and a description of the materials of which they were composed. We will give a few extracts, modernizing the spelling:—"Item, to William Brothericke, our embroiderer, for embroidering one whole suit of hangings upon crimson velvet, richly garnished and broidered all over with cloth of gold and cloth of silver, laces of gold, partly with plates, and chain-lace of gold without plates, Venice twists, and gold and silver and colored Naples silk; for embroidering the several parts of a sparver bed of crimson velvet as the head part, ceeler, double valance, and curtains of velvet and satin; a very large cupboard-cloth of crimson velvet, carpet and screen-cloth, chair, stools and cushions, all very richly garnished all over with cloth of gold, cloth of silver, and colored satin, &c., &c. . . . Item, to John Baker, our upholsterer, for making a suit of hangings of crimson velvet, containing five pieces and two window-pieces embroidered, lined with dyed canvas; . . . . for making one cupboard-cloth, one carpet, and one screen-cloth of like crimson velvet, embroidered, all lined with taffeta, and garnished with fringes of gold and silk; for making two large window-curtains of crimson damask, lined with fustian, copper rings, lyer of thread, and other necessaries to them; . . . for one bed, one bolster, and two pillows of Milan fustian filled with down, sewed with silk; three quilts of fustian cased with taffeta, filled with wool and sewed with silk; two pair of blankets of Milan fustian of five breadths and five yards long the piece, sewed with silk; two pair of fine Spanish blankets; . . . two counterpoints of plush, both sides alike, sewed with silk. . . . Item, to Henry Waller, joiner, for one frame for a canopy for a cushion-cloth, with iron-work to it, for the timber-work of one chair, two low stools, and two little tables; . . . for one folding-table of walnut-tree;" &c., &c.[1]

Paper and leather hangings were invented early in the seventeenth century, and the walls of the wealthier classes were now enriched with the magnificent paintings of Rubens, Vandyke, Teniers, Rembrandt, Terburg, &c., in addition to those of Holbein and Jansen; and the chefs d'œuvres of the earlier great masters of Italy were displayed in gorgeous frames, and amid objects of art and virtù worthy of their companionship. Ornaments of china-ware had been brought from Italy in the time of Elizabeth, but, in 1631, they were regular articles of importation by the East India ships. Turkey and Persian carpets are seen in paintings of this period covering the tables of even the middling classes of society, floors being still matted or strewed with rushes, even in palaces, excepting those of throne or bedrooms, where carpets were laid down in front of the throne or by the side of the bed.

The ceilings of state apartments were also adorned with paintings of historical or allegorical subjects by the first artists.

The costume of the latter part of Elizabeth's reign continued in fashion apparently for some time after the accession of James I. The king himself had his clothing made larger, and even his doublets quilted, through fear of assassination, his breeches in great plaits and full stuffed. The frontispiece to a book of hunting, published in this reign, gives us a good specimen of this style of dress as worn by the monarch, his courtiers, and attendants, when pursuing James's favorite amusement—the chase. In Decker's Gull's Horn Book, first printed in 1609, we are told that the noblest gallants, when "they consecrate their hours to their mistresses and to reveling, wear feathers then chiefly in their hats, being of the fairest ensigns of their bravery." But very rich hatbands and jewels were worn without feathers as well as with them. For the shape of the hats of this period the reader may turn to a preceding page in this volume, where Guido Fawkes and his companions are engraved from a print published in 1605 or 1606.[1] John Taylor, the Water Poet censures the extravagance of those who

> Wear a farm in shoe-strings edged with gold,
> And spangled garters worth a copyhold;
> A hose and doublet which a lordship cost;
> A gaudy cloak three manors' price almost;
> A beaver band and feather for the head
> Prized at the church's tithe—the poor man's bread.

The print of the Earl of Somerset, given in a preceding chapter,[2] presents us with all the articles above mentioned. The trunks are of a fashion prevalent toward the middle of James's reign, and such as Prince Henry is represented wearing in the print given below from Drayton's Polyolbion, dated 1613.

Silk and thread stockings were now generally worn by the gentry, those of woolen cloth having become quite unfashionable.

Short jackets or doublets, with hanging or false sleeves, were worn toward the end of James's reign; and the ruff was succeeded by the band and the peccadilloe or piccadilly, from a well-known shop for the sale of which the street so called received its name.[3] When James I. visited Cambridge, in 1615, the vice-chancellor of that university issued an order prohibiting "the fearful enormity and excess of apparel seen in all degrees, as, namely, strange peccadilloes, vast bands, huge cuffs, shoe-roses, tufts, locks and tops of hair, unbeseeming that modesty and carriage of students in so renowned an university." The bands and ruffs were alike stiffened with yellow starch, a fashion brought, it is said, from France, by Mrs. Turner, who was afterward executed for poisoning Sir Thomas Overbury, and who, as mentioned in a former page, caused the extinction of the very fashion she had introduced, by appearing on the scaffold in a ruff of that color. Yellow ruffs and bands are continually alluded to by the dramatists of this period.

For the sumptuous materials of which the dresses of this day were made we must refer our readers to the wardrobe accounts of this reign, the details of which are too elaborate for our columns. The warrant to the great wardrobe on the marriage of the Princess Elizabeth, already quoted, contains a curious list of cloths of gold, brocaded silks, velvets, satins, tissues, &c., &c. "Sugar-loaf buttons," both large and small, are mentioned in it as much employed for the decoration of dresses; and another item is "to John White, shoemaker, for eight pair of pumps for eight pages, with eight pair of roses, edged with copper lace to them." Bugle-lace and bugle-buttons appear also in request, and two-and-twenty pair of silk stockings and four of worsted are ordered for the pages and footmen. Eighteen yards of black wrought velvet are ordered for a gown for the princess's physician; and there are four suits for four pages, described minutely as consisting of "doublets and hose, the doublets of cloth of gold, lined with taffeta, and laced with gold lace, two and two in a seam, with peckadells of white satin, the hose of tawney velvet, laced thick with gold-lace buttons with small furnishings, as canvas-cotton, baise, fustian for pockets, and stiffening for the same," and "four cloaks of tawney velvet, laced with six gold laces round about, lined with shag, and bordered with buckram." The portrait of Anne of Denmark, queen to James I., engraved in Strutt's "Dresses and Habits," and that of the Countess of Somerset, given in our first chapter,[1] afford us specimens of the dress of the female nobility of the period. The enormous fardingale was worn throughout this reign by the higher classes. Grogram gowns, lined throughout with velvet, durance petticoats, and silver bodkins are mentioned in the comedy of "Eastward Hoe," as part of the apparel and ornaments of citizens' wives and daughters at this time, as are French hoods and guarded (i. e., bordered or laced) gowns in the play of the "London Prodigal," printed in 1605.

The costume of the time of Charles I. has been familiarized to us by the numberless prints of that unfortunate monarch and the most distinguished personages of his reign, engraved from the paintings of Vandyke, whose name has indeed been given to the peculiar and elegant habit his pencil has so often portrayed. At the commencement of Charles's reign, however, the later fashions of his father's time held their ground; and we find Ben Jonson, in his comedy of the "New Inn," first acted in 1629, making a beau declare—

> "I would put on
> The Savoy chain about my neck; the ruff,
> The cuffs of Flanders: then the Naples hat
> With the Rome hat-band and the Florentine agate,
> The Milan sword, the cloak of Geneva set
> With Brabant buttons; all my given pieces—
> My gloves the natives of Madrid."

Some of the paintings of Charles also represent him in what Jonson calls "long saussage hose," or "breeches pinned up like pudding-bags," a Dutch fashion, which is to be seen in Holland and in many parts of the continent, particularly Germany and Switzerland, to this day. Another sort of long breeches, which may also have been of Dutch origin, form part of the Vandyke costume before alluded to; but they hang loose below the knee, and are either fringed or adorned with a row of points or ribbons meeting the wide tops of the boots, which were ruffled with lace or lawn. Portraits of this period exhibit a curious clog or false sole to the boots, which appear to be excessively high-heeled They are particularly remarkable in the portrait of the Duke of Lennox, by Vandyke, in the collection of the Earl of Darnley, at Cobham Hall, Kent. The upper part of the Vandyke costume consisted of a short doublet of silk or satin, with slashed sleeves; a falling collar of rich point lace; a short cloak worn carelessly over one shoulder, and a broad-leafed Flemish beaver hat with one or more feathers falling gracefully from it; a very broad and richly embroidered sword-belt, in which usually hung a Spanish rapier. The silk doublet was occasionally exchanged for a buff coat, reaching half way down the thigh, with or without sleeves, and sometimes laced with gold or silver, and the cloak in that case for a scarf or sash of silk or satin worn either round the waist or over the shoulder, and tied in a large bow either behind or on the hip. When over this coat was placed the steel gorget or a breast and back-plate, the wearer was equipped for battle, complete armor being now confined almost entirely to the heavy horse. The intercourse with Spain had in the previous reign changed the name of lancer into cavalier—an appellation which ultimately distinguished the whole royal party from that of the republican, while at the same time the cropped hair of the latter obtained for them the title of Roundheads from their opponents, "the wealthy curled darlings of the isle," who wore their hair in long ringlets upon their shoulders. The mustache and peaked beard were common to both parties. The Cromwellites eschewed silks and satins, wearing cloths and coarser stuffs of black and sober colors, and adhered to the old high-crowned black hat, in preference to the low-crowned Flemish beaver.

Similar distinctions arose at the same period between the females of opposite parties—the ladies of the royalists wearing ringlets and feathers, while those of the Puritans covered the head closely with hood, cap, coif, or high-crowned hat. The pencil of Hollar has fully illustrated this portion of our subject in his fine works, "Ornatus Muliebris Anglicanus," published in 1640, and "Theatrum Mulierum," published in 1644.

Masks were much worn at this period by females of the higher classes, and mufflers by elderly women of humbler conditions. Muffs of fur and elegant fans composed of ostrich-feathers were carried by women of fashion. With the reign of Charles I. we may be said to take leave of armor. His father, King James, had declared it to be an admirable invention, because it prevented the wearer as much from doing harm to others as from receiving injury himself; and the improvement of firearms gradually occasioned the abandonment of it piece by piece, until nothing remained but the back and breastplates, which were made bulletproof, and the open steel headpiece, or iron pot, as the common sort were called; buff coats, long buff gloves or gauntlets, and high boots of jacked leather, thence called jacked or jackboots, defending sufficiently the rest of the person. Troops so armed acquired the name of cuirassiers.

In 1632 the English cavalry was divided into four classes: the Lanciers, the Cuirassiers, the Harquebussiers or Carabiniers, and the Dragons or Dragoons.[1] The first were the fullest armed, wearing a close casque or headpiece, gorget, breast and back-plates (pistol and culiver proof), pauldrons, vambraces, two gauntlets, tassets, culessets, culets or garde-de-reins, and a buff coat with long skirts to wear between their clothes and their armor. Their weapons were a good sword, "stiff-cutting and sharp-pointed," a lance eighteen feet long, one or two pistols of sufficient bore and length, a flask, cartouch-box, and all appurtenances fitting. The Cuirassiers, armed, as we have already stated, with back, breast, and headpiece, only carried swords and pistols. The Harquebussiers, or Carabiniers, were similarly defended, but carried, in addition to sword and pistol, the harquebuss or the carabine, according to their appellation. The Dragoons, first raised in France in 1600, wore only "a buff coat with deep skirts, and an open headpiece with cheeks," and were divided at first into two classes, pikemen and musketeers, so called from the weapons they carried; but in 1645 they changed their muskets for the shorter piece called "the dragon," from which the French troops of this description had originally received their name; and in 1649 the dragon was abandoned for the caliver, or culiver, corrupted from calibre, a firearm of the particular bore ordered by government, and lighter than the usual match or wheel-lock. The modern firelock was invented about 1635. The musket-rest and the swine's feather (the precursor of the bayonet) were abandoned during the civil wars.

The character and tastes of James I. soon banished those mere shadows of the chivalric ages that had still lingered and flitted about the court of Queen Elizabeth. It was at a tournament, indeed, held in one of the first years of his reign,[1] that he found his worthless favorite Carr; but after this we hear no more of his countenancing such antiquated spectacles. His heroic son Henry, it is true, was an enthusiast for military pageants of this nature, and delighted in running at the ring, fighting at barriers, and breaking spears in the tilt-yard; but even the example of the heir-apparent was lost upon the English nobility. Chivalry, even as a harmless game, had gone quite out of fashion only a few years after the commencement of the seventeenth century; and men would as soon have dreamed of following the career of the knight of La Mancha, as wearing harness and mounting war-horses, except at the urgent call of necessity.

While the lance and the battleax were thus laid aside, the rapier and dagger came into more active exercise, and the duello, or modern duel, now became the customary mode of deciding their differences among gentlemen. In these encounters, which, as at present, arose not only out of private and personal quarrels, but also out of the great public questions of the day, it sometimes happened that the parties, though of high rank, belabored each other stoutly with cudgels before proceeding to more knightly extremities; but even in the regular duel it was not unusual for unfair advantages of various kinds to be attempted to be taken by one or both of the parties, till the practice of appointing seconds in all cases was resorted to in order to guard against such treacheries. Combatants also, before they encountered, sometimes searched each other's clothes, or, for better assurance, stripped, and fought in their shirts. Yet, when a duel was a grave and premeditated affair, and between men of nice honor and punctilio, the stately ceremonials of ancient chivalry were carefully observed. If the challenge was delivered orally, it was with hat in hand, prof[illegible] congées, and fervent protestations of respect; and if by letter, the length of the challenger's sword was specified, and the terms of combat prescribed. If the party challenged demurred at the invitation, the bearer gravely stuck the cartel upon the point of his sheathed rapier, and again tendered it; but if it was still refused the weapon was gradually lowered, until the paper fell at the recusant's feet. James, in his favorite character of peacemaker found ample employment in composing the quarrels or preventing the duels of his nobles and courtiers; but in the later part of this period the fashion of duelling was driven out by the circumstances of the time. When the civil war broke out the most pugnacious had fighting enough of a more serious sort; and when peace was restored the practice of private combat was no longer tolerated by the puritanical government that was now established.

Before the commencement of the civil wars the citizens of London were carefully trained in the use of the pike and musket. The general muster of this civic militia was at first once a-year; the training and exercise of individual companies took place four times a-year, and lasted two days each time. These trainings were originally very irksome to weary artisans and thrifty shopkeepers, as, independently of the weight of back and breast-plate, skull-cap, sword, musket, and bandoliers, with which they were obliged to repair to the muster, the military discipline was of such a complex character, that it both imposed much labor and consumed a great deal of time. The ponderous matchlock, or carbine, of those days, had to be put through a long succession of manœuvers before it could be loaded, primed, and discharged. In learning to shoot with it, the soldier-citizen was obliged to gather courage, and accustom himself to the recoil of his piece, by flashing a little powder in the pan; the use of wadding for the ball not being as yet understood, he could only shoot effectually breast-high; and his fire was delivered in the act of advancing, lest he should become himself a mark to the enemy, while taking a standing aim. As for the pike, it was a stout, heavy weapon of pliant ash, about sixteen feet long, and dexterity in the use of it could only be acquired by frequent practice.[1] The Puritans at first regarded these warlike musters in the Artillery Gardens with abhorrence, as an absolute mingling with the profane; but when they were taught from the pulpits that their projected reformation could only be accomplished by carnal weapons, they crowded to the exercise with alacrity.[1] In the mean time the proud cavaliers, who were still blind to the political signs of the times, laughed scornfully at these new displays of cockney chivalry, and were wont to declare that it took a Puritan two years to learn how to discharge a musket without winking.[2] But the laugh was turned against themselves after the civil wars commenced, when the pikes and guns of the civic militia scattered the fiery cavalry of Prince Rupert and bore down all before them. When these Puritans were converted into actual soldiers they "marched to the field in their high-crowned hats, collared bands, great loose coats, long tucks under them, and calves' leather boots: they used to sing a psalm, fall on, and beat all opposition to the devil."[1] It is worthy of remark, too, that the long active service and military renown of these campaigners gave them no disrelish, after the war had ended, for their former peaceful and humble occupations. On the contrary, the soldier resumed his mechanical implements, and the officer returned to his shop or warehouse, while the cavaliers still went about with belts and swords, swearing, swaggering, and breaking into houses, and stealing whatever they could find.

The chief amusements of the court of King James were masques and emblematic pageants; and as these were chiefly the production of Ben Jonson, they were greatly superior to those of the preceding period. Still, however, the pedantry of James, and the frivolity of his queen, required those accommodations on the part of the poet which his own good taste would have rejected. In one of these representations, called the Masque of Blackness, twelve Ethiopian nymphs, taking a voyage to Britain, to have their complexions made white, were represented by the queen and twelve ladies of the court, whose faces and arms were besmeared for the occasion with black paint. At the end of the masque a banquet was set out, and, as the courtiers were hungry, the feast was "so furiously assaulted, that down went tables and tressels before one bit was touched."[1] A more detailed account, however, of a court pageant, exhibited before James and the King of Denmark at Theobalds, gives an astounding view both of the taste and moral character of the English court at this period. "One day," writes Sir John Harrington, in a letter to a friend in the country, during the visit of Christian IV., king of Denmark, in the summer of 1606,[2] "a great feast was held, and after dinner the representation of Solomon his Temple and the coming of the Queen of Sheba was made, or, I may better say, was meant to have been made, before their majesties, by device of the Earl of Salisbury and others. But, alas! as all earthly things do fail to poor mortals in enjoyment, so did prove our presentment hereof. The lady who did play the queen's part, did carry most precious gifts to both their majesties, but, forgetting the steps arising to the canopy, overset her caskets into his Danish majesty's lap, and fell at his feet, though I rather think it was in his face. Much was the hurry and confusion; cloths and napkins were at hand to make all clean. His majesty then got up and would dance with the Queen of Sheba; but he fell down and humbled himself before her, and was carried to an inner chamber, and laid on a bed of state, which was not a little defiled with the presents of the queen which had been bestowed on his garments, such as wine, cream, beverage, cakes, spices, and other good matters. The entertainment and show went forward, and most of the presenters went backward, or fell down; wine did so occupy their upper chambers. Now did appear in rich dress Faith, Hope, and Charity: Hope did essay to speak, but wine rendered her endeavors so feeble that she withdrew, and hoped the king would excuse her brevity; Faith was then alone, for I am certain she was not joined with good works, and left the court in a staggering condition: Charity came to the king's feet, and seemed to cover the multitude of sins her sisters had committed; in some sort she made obeisance, and brought gifts, but said she would return home again, as there was no gift which heaven had not already given to his majesty. She then returned to Faith and Hope, who were both sick . . . . . in the lower hall. Next came Victory in bright armor, and, by a strange medley of versification, did endeavor to make suit to the king. But Victory did not triumph long; for, after much lamentable utterance, she was led away like a silly captive, and laid to sleep in the outer steps of the antechamber. Now Peace did make entry, and strive to get foremost to the king; but I grieve to tell how great wrath she did discover unto those of her attendants, and, much contrary to her semblance, most rudely made war with her olive-branch, and laid on the pates of those who did oppose her coming."[1]

The whole of this description seems so incredible, that many might think the translator of Ariosto had in this instance assumed the license of his Italian original; but the testimony of other cotemporaries will not allow us to suppose that Harrington's account is at all exaggerated.

While the masculine and original character of the national mind was gradually emancipating dramatic poetry equally from the trammels of the classical school and that of the middle ages, the pedantic predilections of James tended to prevent this improvement from fully overtaking the court plays and royal pageants, so that during his whole reign the heathen gods or Christian virtues continued to figure among the leading personages in such exhibitions. Not only the courtiers, however, but grave matter-of-fact citizens, acquiesced in the royal humor; so that in 1610, when Prince Henry repaired to Whitehall, to be created Prince of Wales, he was met at Chelsea by the lord mayor and corporation of London, attended by Neptune riding on a dolphin, and a sea-goddess mounted on a whale, which deities addressed him in complimentary speeches. But with the succeeding reign all this pedantry had so completely disappeared, that a royal masque or pageant was a fair transcript from the world of reality. A description of one of these exhibitions, which was presented before the king, queen, and court at Whitehall, in 1633, by the members of the inns of court, will best illustrate the magnitude of this change. It consisted of a masque and an anti-masque. The first was arrayed and marshaled after the fashion of a Roman triumph, the figures composing which consisted of the comeliest men in England, dressed in the most splendid and becoming costume; the dresses, the chariots, and steeds were covered with ornaments of gold and silver, and blazed in the light of countless torches, while the whole solemn procession moved with measured steps to accompanying bands of music. No puppet or impersonation, whether of the classical, allegorical, or romantic world, intruded to mar the chasteness of the exhibition—all was real, modern, and of the choicest and happiest selection. Something more, however, was still necessary for the gratification of the popular taste; and the anti-masque, which followed, was an avowed but good-humored parody upon the first part of the procession. It was formed of cripples, beggars, and other squalid figures, mounted upon miserable jades, and moving along to the music of keys, tongs, and bones. The whole exhibition was designed originally to express the devotedness of the inns of court to Charles I. and his measures, and their abhorrence of Puritanism, Prynne, and his Histrio-mastrix; but, in the anti-masque, a sly opportunity was also taken of ridiculing the subject of patents, one of the chief political abuses of the day. Thus one man appeared mounted upon a little horse, with a great bit in his mouth, and a head-stall and reins about his ears: this was a projector wanting a patent that none should be allowed to ride their horses except with such bits as they should buy of him. After him came another fellow with a bunch of carrots on his head and a capon upon his fist: he wanted a patent of monopoly as the first inventor of the art of feeding capons with carrots, and that none but himself should have the privilege of the said invention for fourteen years, according to the statute. Other projectors were ridiculed in a similar manner; and this part of the pageant "pleased the spectators the more, because by it an information was covertly given to the king of the unfitness and ridiculousness of those projects against the law." Nor was the hint taken in i part by the court, for the queen was so highly delighted with the procession that she caused it to be repeated. At the close the whole party repaired to the Banqueting-House at Whitehall, where dancing continued till morning, when a sumptuous banquet closed the entertainments. The expense of this rich pageant amounted to £21,000.[1]

In the retinues and domestic attendance of the nobles of this period every thing proclaimed that the era of feudal authority and magnificence had departed. Accordingly, when the civil wars had commenced, no peer, however wealthy or high in rank, could drag after him a regiment, or even a company, of unwilling vassals to the field: on the contrary, the meanest hind was free to choose between king and parliament. Something, however, of the mere pomp of feudalism was still maintained in the domestic establishments of the nobility and the wealthier gentry. The father of John Evelyn, when he was sheriff of the counties of Surrey and Sussex,[2] had a hundred and sixteen servants in liveries of green satin doublets, besides several gentlemen and persons of quality who waited on him, dressed in the same garb. One of the largest, if not the largest, of English establishments at this time, was that of the Lord Treasurer, the Earl of Dorset, the Lord Buckhurst and well-known poet of the court of Elizabeth. It consisted of two hundred and twenty servants, besides workmen attached to the house, and others that were hired occasionally.[1] The chief servants of the nobility (so they were called, but they were rather followers or clients) were still the younger sons of respectable or even noble families, who attached themselves to the fortunes of a powerful patron, and served him either in court or military affairs, for which they were allowed separate retinues of men and horses, with gratuities in money and promises of promotion.[2] The progress of improvement, that had banished minstrels, jugglers, and tumblers from princely households, had naturally introduced the drama in their room; and accordingly we sometimes find a company of actors classed among the servants of the chief noblemen, as well as a family musician, or even a whole band. A steward, distinguished by a velvet jacket and a gold chain about his neck, presided as marshal of the household, and next to him was the clerk of the kitchen.[3] But these cumbrous appendages were daily lessening, as domestic comfort came to be better understood. This improvement, however, had commenced still earlier among those of less rank and pretension. All who had their fortune still to seek in the court or the army, and all who repaired to the metropolis in quest of pleasure, found, so early as the time of Elizabeth that the bustle and the scramble of new and stirring times made a numerous train of attendants an uncomfortable appendage: the gallant and the courtier, therefore, like Sir John Falstaff, studied "French thrift," and contented himself with a single "skirted page," who walked behind him carrying his cloak and rapier. In consequence of the extravagant living introduced during this period, the spendthrift gentleman often sunk into the serving-man, as we may see from the frequent occurrence of such a transformation in the old plays. When servants were out of place, we learn, from the same authentic pictures of the real life of the times, that they sometimes repaired to St. Paul's church-yard, the great place of public lounge, and there stood against the pillars, holding before them a written placard stating their particular qualifications, and their desire of employment.[4]

But whatever retrenchment might be making in household expenditure by a diminished attendance was more than counterbalanced by an extravagance in dress and personal ornament that had now become an absolute frenzy. The caterpillar does not more eagerly burst into a butterfly upon the approach of sunshine than did the clumsy, ungainly figure of James into a gilded coxcomb, as soon as he was transported from the scantily-furnished halls of Holyrood to the plentiful palaces of the south. It is said that he almost daily figured in a new suit, a humor that soon became prevalent among the courtiers. Still more generally influential than James's own example was that of his several handsome favorites, all of whom having been indebted for the royal favor mainly to their personal attractions, as might be expected, spared no pains and cost to give these natural advantages their full effect. When Buckingham was sent ambassador to the court of France to bring the Princess Henrietta to England, he provided for this important mission a suit of white uncut velvet and a cloak, both set all over with diamonds valued at eighty thousand pounds, besides a feather made of great diamonds; his sword, girdle, hat-band, and spurs were also set thick with diamonds. Another suit, which he prepared for the same occasion, was of purple satin embroidered all over with pearls, and valued at twenty thousand pounds. In addition to these he had twenty-five other dresses of great richness. As a throng of nobles and gentlemen attended him, we may conceive how their estates must have been impoverished by the purchase of chains of gold; ropes of pearl, and splendid dresses, befitting the retinue of such an ambassador. Even a court festival of the time of James I. must have made a perilous inroad upon a year's amount of the largest income. Thus, at the marriage of the Princess Elizabeth to the Palatine, Lady Wotton wore a gown profusely ornamented with embroidery that cost fifty pounds a-yard; and Lord Montague spent fifteen hundred pounds on the dresses of his two daughters, that they might be fit to appear at court on the same occasion.[1] Prodigality in feasting and riotous living soon became as conspicuous as extravagance in dress. The ante-suppers of the epicurean Earl of Carlisle have been mentioned on a former occasion. Weldon informs us that this nobleman gave a banquet to the French ambassador at Essex House, where fish of such huge size were served up, which had been brought all the way from Russia, that no dishes in England could hold them, until several were made for the express purpose. The household expenditure of James I. was twice as much as that of his predecessor amounting to a hundred thousand pounds annually.[2]

While such were the habits of the courtiers, the country aristocracy still followed that kind of life so much familiarized to our minds by the descriptions in the old songs and plays of the "golden days of good Queen Bess." The rural knight or squire inhabited a huge building, half house, half castle, crowded with servants in homespun blue coats, many of whom were only serviceable in filling up the blank spaces of the mansion; but, as these men had been born in his worship's service, it was held a matter of course that they should live and die in it. The family rose at daybreak, and first of all assembled to prayers, which were read by the family chaplain. Then came breakfast; after which the master of the household and his sons got into the saddle, and went off to hunt the deer, followed by some score of mounted attendants, while the lady and her daughters superintended the dairy or the buttery, prescribed the day's task for the spinning-wheels, dealt out bread and meat at the gate to the poor, and concocted all manner of simples for the sick and infirm of the village. If leisure still remained, the making of confections and preserves was a never-failing resource, independently of spinning and sewing, or perhaps embroidering some battle or hunting-piece which had been commenced by the housewives of a preceding generation. At noon dinner was served up in the great hall, the walls of which were plentifully adorned with stags' horns, casques, antique brands, and calivers; and the noisy bell, that sent the note of warning over the country, gave also a universal invitation and welcome to the hospitable board; and, after dinner, sack or home-brewed October occupied the time until sunset, when the hour of retiring to rest was at hand. Such was the ordinary history of a day. When the weather prevented out-door recreation or employment, the family library, containing some six or eight large tomes that perhaps had issued from the press of Caxton or Wynkyn de Worde, was in requisition, and, if the members of the family could read, they might while away the hours in perusing these volumes for the twentieth time. In this fashion they derived their knowledge of religion in general from the Bible and the Practice of Piety —their Protestanism and horror of Popery from Fox's Acts and Monuments—their chivalrous lore from Froissart's Chronicle, or perchance, the Merrie Gests of Robin Hood—their historical erudition from Hall or Holinshed—and their morality and sentiment from the Seven Wise Masters, or the Seven Champions of Christendom. In such a state of life the set holydays were glorious eras; the anticipation, the enjoyment, and the remembrances of a single Christmas or birthday furnished matter for a whole month of happiness. On such an occasion the lord of the manor was more than a king; as he proceeded with his family through the crowds of assembled peasants, to witness their games of merriment and feats of agility or strength, his smile inspired the competitor with double swiftness or vigor, and the prize received a tenfold value because it was he who bestowed it. At evening his bounty was expressed by oxen roasted whole, and puncheons of mighty ale, with which he feasted the crowd, while his house was thrown open to the throng of his more immediate acquaintances and dependents. After the feast his hall was cleraed for dancing: three fiddlers and a piper struck up; and as the "mirth and fun grew fast and furious," the strong oaken floor was battered and plowed in all directions by the hobnailed shoes of those who danced with all their might and with all their hearts. Such was the life of an old country gentleman when James succeeded to the crown of England. But these habits, the last relics of the simplicity of the olden times, did not long outlive that event. Tidings of the gay doings at court, and the wonderful good fortune of the royal favorites, reached the ears of the aristocratic rustics, and from that moment rural occupations and village may-poles lost their charm; the young were impatient to repair to the metropolis, and the old were obliged to yield to the prevailing fashion. With all the fierce impetuosity of novices, clod-compelling esquires and well-dowried country widows rushed into the pleasures and excesses of a town life; and thus, with a rapidity hitherto unknown in England, and at which moralists became giddy, ancient manors tumbled to decay, fortunes that had accumulated for generations vanished, the hereditary estates of centuries became the property of men of yesterday, and the time-honored names of the most ancient families disappeared from the scroll of English heraldry, and soon ceased to be remembered.

The following curious letter, addressed to William, the second Lord Compton (afterward Earl of Northampton), by his wife, soon after their marriage, unfolds much of the domestic economy and habits of a family of distinction during the reign of James I., and presents also an amusing sketch of a managing mistress of a household of the higher ranks of that day:—

"My sweet life, now I have declared to you my mind for the settling of your state, I suppose that it were best for me to bethink and consider within myself what allowance were meetest for me. I pray and beseech you to grant to me, your most kind and loving wife, the sum of £2600, quarterly to be paid. Also, I would, besides that allowance, have £600, quarterly to be paid, for the performance of charitable works; and those things I would not, neither will be, accountable for. Also, I will have three horses for my own saddle, that none shall dare to lend or borrow: none lend but I, none borrow but you. Also, I would have two gentlewomen, least one should be sick, or have some other let: also, believe it, it is an undecent thing for a gentlewoman to stand mumping alone, when God hath blessed their lord and lady with a great estate. Also, when I ride a hunting or a hawking, or travel from one house to another, I will have them attending; so for either of these said women, I must and will have for either of them a horse. Also, I will have six or eight gentlemen; and I will have my two coaches, one lined with velvet to myself, with four very fair horses; and a coach for my women, lined with cloth, and laced with gold, otherwise with scarlet, and laced with silver, with four good horses. Also, I will have two coachmen, one for my own coach, the other for my women. Also, at any time when I travel, I will be allowed not only caroches and spare horses for me and my women, but I will have such carriages as shall be fitting for all; orderly, not pestering my things with my women's, nor theirs with either chamber-maid's, nor theirs with wash-maids'. Also, for laundresses, when I travel, I will have them sent away before with the carriages, to see all safe. And the chamber-maids, I will have go before, that the chamber may be ready, sweet, and clean. Also, for that it is undecent to crowd up myself with my gentleman-usher in my coach, I will have him to have a convenient horse, to attend me either in city or country. And I must have two footmen. And my desire is that you defray all the charges for me. And for myself, besides my yearly allowance, I would have twenty gowns of apparel, six of them excellent good ones, eight of them for the country, and six other of them very excellent good ones. Also, I would have to put in my purse £2000 and £200, and so you to pay my debts. Also, I would have £6000 to buy me jewels, and £4000 to buy me a pearl chain. Now, seeing I have been, and am, so reasonable unto you, I pray you do find my children apparel and their schooling, and all my servants, men and women, their wages. Also, I will have all my houses furnished, and my lodging-chambers to be suited with all such furniture as is fit; as beds, stools, chairs, suitable cushions, carpets, silver warming-pans, cupboards of plate, fair hangings, and such like. So, for my drawing-chamber, in all houses, I will have them delicately furnished both with hangings, couch, canopy, glass, carpet, chairs, cushions, and all things thereunto belonging. Also, my desire is. that you would pay your debts, build up Ashley House, and purchase lands; and lend no money, as you love God, to my Lord Chamberlain, who would have all, perhaps your life from you. . . . . . So, now that I have declared to you what I would have, and what it is that I would not have, I pray you, when you be an earl, to allow me £2000 more than I now desire, and double attendance."[1]

In the other departments of courtly and fashionable life we find that the spirit of gambling kept pace with other excesses; so that the dice, "that four-squared sin," as it was quaintly termed, served in many cases to consummate the ruin of those ancient estates which the prodigality of a court life had already greatly impaired; and as gaming naturally produces usurers and pawn-brokers, these classes had now increased to an immense amount. Loaded dice, too, were also common—an iniquity almost coeval with the invention of the die itself; and all the nefarious tricks of foul play seem to have been as thoroughly understood in those days as at present. A good paymaster of "debts of honor" generally even reserved all the light and clipped money that fell into his hands to pass off at cards and dice. As court fortunes were now daily becoming more necessary, the crowds of needy aspirants who sought advancement in this way were obliged to study the humor of the king—and, truly, that of James was not hard to find. They declaimed against Puritans and witches, swore by the Basilicon Doron, and plentifully larded their sayings with Latin quotations; they seemed to be half blinded by the effulgence of that royal majesty, the gracious light of which they so humbly courted; and they constantly lauded the wisdom and learning of the sovereign, his hunting and his horsemanship, but, above all, his roan palfrey and its ornaments. Indeed, without this last act of homage they had better have stayed at home, as appears by the following incident. A nobleman who had tendered a petition without regarding the fair steed or its trappings received no answer: he again petitioned, but still there was no reply. At length the lord treasurer was employed to ascertain the cause of the royal silence. James angrily exclaimed, "Shall a king give heed to a dirty paper, when a beggar noteth not his gilt stirrups?"[1]

To be a successful courtier it was also necessary to excel in those coarse jokes and buffooneries which were so much to the taste of the low-minded James. This king, among his various accomplishments, was a ready inventor of nicknames and an inveterate lover of practical jokes; and happy was the man who could so take these as to furnish the luxury of a royal chuckle. Occasionally, however, the kingly jester would venture beyond bounds with those of more independent spirit, in which case he was sometimes rewarded with a counterbuff not much to his liking. In contemplating the manners of James, and those by whom he was surrounded, it was no wonder that the English nobles of the old school thought of the court of Elizabeth with a sigh. When Charles I. succeeded, the coldness of his character and his decorous habits discountenanced these coarse and profligate excesses: and the courtiers endeavored to conform to something like the rules of external decency. A general sobriety of demeanor succeeded, and even debauchees now talked of Platonic love, the pretense of which at least became for a time quite the fashion at court.[2] But, as the stern, ascetic Puritans grew into power, and advanced to the destruction of the monarchy with prayer and fasting, the court party soon became eager to distinguish themselves by an entirely opposite behavior. All the excesses of the former reign were resumed, and Charles found himself unable to restrain, or even to rebuke, his adherents, who swore, drank, brawled, and intrigued, to show their hatred of the enemy and their devotedness to the royal cause.[3]

The literary education of youth was as yet confined almost wholly to Latin and Greek. The discipline of public and domestic teachers was extremely rigid; and the fame of being a "learned and lashing master" was generally esteemed the highest commendation. To qualify this severity, however, schoolboys, like the ancient Roman slaves, were indulged with certain appointed seasons of saturnalia, in which restraint was exchanged for the wildest glee. The chief of these was what was called the barring-out, when the scholars, before the arrival of the holydays, took possession of the school-room, barred and bolted it against the

[3] So much was swearing identified with loyalty, that Cromwell, after a skirmish with the Scottish horse at Musselburgh, sent word to the parliament that the enemy had English cavaliers in their ranks because he heard one of their wounded exclaiming, with his last breath "D——n me! teacher, and defied him from the windows. In some of the public schools plays were sometimes acted, large audiences gathering to the spectacle. In others there were annual competitions in ancient athletic sports, as at the school of Harrow, where the students tried their skill against each other in archery for the prize of a silver arrow. The Eton Montem, as has been mentioned in a former chapter, probably originated in the festival of the Boy-Bishop, and it was practiced as early as the reign of Elizabeth. In this annual ceremony, as at the present day, the pupils of Eton School elected a captain, who, in turn, chose his several officers; after which the whole party marched in military procession to Salt Hill, shouting, as they went, "Salt! salt!" and receiving contributions in money from the spectators, and bestowing salt in return. The rich dresses used by the captain of the Montem and his officers, on this occasion, were frequently borrowed from the theaters. As salt was a classical as well as theological emblem, and employed to signify learning and wisdom, we find it largely used in the ancient pranks and festivals of our English colleges. This was especially the case in qualifying a freshman. On this important occasion the freshmen were obliged to doff their gowns and bands, and look as much like scoundrels as possible; after which they mounted a form that was placed upon a table, and declaimed to the grinning and shouting students below. In the mean time a huge brazen pot of caudle was bubbling on the fire before them, to refresh such of the orators as had recited their speeches gracefully; but those who had acquitted themselves indifferently had their caudle qualified with salt; while those who declaimed very ill were drenched with salted beer, and subjected to sharp admonishment by pinches on the chin from the thumb-nails of the seniors. All this was harmless enough, although not very classical; but many a heavy complaint was made at this date of the dissoluteness of the Oxford and Cambridge students. Theological and political factions also raged fiercely among the members of these ancient seats of learning, and were only quelled at last when the Puritans obtained the complete ascendency in church and state.[1]

Besides intellectual acquirements, however, education still comprised also various active exercises of a military character; and thus, at the breaking out of the civil wars, most gentlemen were ready at once for military service. These exercises, in which the young aristocracy were carefully trained by skillful preceptors, consisted in fencing, vaulting, shooting with the musket and cannon, and sometimes even yet with the long and cross-bow, and riding the great horse. This last department was somewhat more difficult than the simple horsemanship of the present day, as the pupil, in order to acquire a firm seat and easy carriage, was obliged to practice all those equestrian evolutions that are now confined to the circus. At public schools, also, the pupils were frequently taught to perform all the evolutions and exercises of regular soldiers, arms being purchased for the purpose, and some skillful soldier hired to give the necessary lessons.[1] To give a finish to a complete education, it was thought necessary for the young aristocracy to travel before entering into active life; and the tour of the continent generally succeeded to the labors of the English pedagogue. Much care was taken by the government to interdict these tourists from entering, or at least taking up their abode in, those foreign cities in which popery and the Jesuits predominated; but the taverns of France and Italy had more attractions for the generality of our young travelers than the colleges of the sons of Loyola, and love intrigues were more attended to than arguments in favor of papal supremacy; so that the character of an Englishman abroad was expressed in the following quaint Italian proverb:

"Inglese Italianato
E Diavolo incarnato."[2]

Female education, instead of obeying the powerful impulse it had already received, appears to have materially retrograded during the present period. The character of such a sovereign as Elizabeth, the glorious actions of her reign, and the chivalrous deference of her courtiers, had all tended to inspire the English dames and damosels with that feeling of self-respect which constitutes so fruitful a source of noble efforts; and while they were addressed in that romantic language which attributed to them every kind of excellence, they endeavored, as much as possible, to realize the ideal picture, and become worthy of such homage. But the era of buffoons that immediately followed laughed this high wrought principle out of countenance. Foreigners who visited England at this time were astonished at the gross manners of the court, and of both sexes in the higher classes; and they inform us that, although the English taverns were dens of filth, tobacco-smoke, roaring songs, and roysters, yet women of rank allowed themselves to be entertained in such places, and actually tolerated those freedoms from their admirers which are described with such startling plainness in our old plays.[3] Among other excesses, gaming was now entered into by the ladies with their characteristic ardor, and, it is said, with no very strict regard to the rules of fair play. Another of their resources was trafficking in politics, so that Gondomar found every fair palm ready for a bribe: this wily diplomatist accordingly soon filled them with gold, for which the recipients made their love intrigues subservient to the Spanish interests.[4] The shops of the milliners and perfumers were noted places of assignation; and one famous public haunt for this purpose during the reigns of James I. and Charles I. was Spring Garden, which was at length shut up from public access by command of Cromwell."[5]

The process of dressing a fine lady was now declared to be as complex and tedious as the fitting out of a ship of war; and the different articles of her raiment were carefully kept in "sweet coffers" —that is, coffers perfumed with musk or other rich odors. The dressing of her hair was an equally complicated work, from the quantity of heart-breakers that required to be scented and curled, the artificial ringlets that were incorporated with the true, and the jewelry with which the whole was surmounted. Add to all this the critical process of laying patches upon various parts of the face, and perhaps creating a new complexion with lotions, unguents, and even with paint; and we have half of the every-day history of a fine lady of the period, according to Shirley:—

"We rise, make fine, Sit for our picture—and 'tis time to dine."

Painted visages kept their ground even during the stern administration of Cromwell, and although every Puritan pulpit resounded with the example of Jezebel.[1]

The foppery of the other sex was not less extravagant, and a fine gentleman of this period was the ne plus ultra of odious effeminacy. This perverse fashion was undoubtedly set by Somerset and Buckingham, who, we are told, endeavored to look as much like women as possible.[2] A beau of this period was an animated trinket; from the top of his beaver, that fluttered with gay streamers, to his boot-point, nothing was to be seen but an assemblage of bright colors and a blaze of jewelry. As he languidly waved his handkerchief to and fro, he scented the air with musk; his gloves, which were too fine for use, and which he carried in his hand, were made of perfumed leather; his pockets were stored with orangeade; and, when he addressed a lady, it was not only with honeyed words, but sweet and substantial comfits. But, not even contented with all this, the fops at last proceeded to paint their faces, and thus their resemblance to women became complete. A rougher species of coxcombry was exhibited by those who might be called the military dandies of the day. Besides affecting a soldierly swagger and style of language, and carrying weapons of preposterous size, they wore black patches upon their faces clipped into the forms of stars, half-moons, and lozenges. This fashion originated in the scarred and patched faces of those who returned from the wars of Germany and the Low Countries, and was adopted by the male sex before it descended to women. With some this affectation of the military character became so ridiculous, that, to look still more like heroes, they sometimes walked about with their arm in a sling.

As the mercantile community had now acquired a first-rate importance, the peculiar manners and customs of those who bought and sold are worthy of particular attention. The aristocracy still looked down upon traffickers with disdain, and elbowed them from the wall; and a fashionable comedy was not thought racy enough unless some vulgar flat-cap was introduced, to be robbed of his "daughter and his ducats" by some needy and profligate adventurer. But, in spite of the ridicule of court and theater, the merchants and the shopkeepers went on and prospered. The London shops of the seventeenth century were still little booths or cellars, generally without doors or windows;[1] and in lieu of gilded sign, or tempting show-glass, the master took short turns before his door, crying, "What d'ye lack, sir?" "What d'ye lack, madam?" "What d'ye please to lack?" and then he rehearsed a list of the commodities in which he dealt. This task, when he became weary, was assumed by his 'prentice; and thus a London street was a Babel of strange sounds by which the wayfarer was dinned at every step. The articles of a dealer were often of a very heterogeneous description: these were huddled in bales and heaps within the little shop; and in the midst of them might sometimes be seen the wife or daughters of the master, plying the needle or knitting-wires, and eyeing the passing crowd.[2] In one of the plays of the time a merchant explains to his idle apprentice the way in which he grew rich, in the following words: "Did I gain my wealth by ordinaries? no: by exchanging of gold? no: by keeping of gallants' company? no. I hired me a little shop, fought low, took small gains, kept no debt-book, garnished my shop, for want of plate, with good, wholesome, thrifty sentences, as 'Keep thy shop, and thy shop will keep thee;' 'Light gains make heavy purses;' ''Tis good to be merry and wise.'"[3] But, although the shops and warehouses of London traffickers were of such a humble description, the houses were very different: so that even so early as the reign of James the dwelling of a chief merchant rivaled the palace of a nobleman in the splendor of its furniture, among which cushions and window-pillows of velvet and damask had become common.[4] At the hour of twelve the merchant usually repaired to the Exchange, and again at six in the evening. At nine o'clock the Bow-bell rung, which was a signal for the servants to leave off work, and repair to supper and bed—"a bell," says Fuller, "which the masters thought rung too soon, and the apprentices too late." It is amusing, however, to observe the jealous distinctions that still prevailed among the different classes. Only a great magnifico or royal merchant was worthy to prefix Master, or Mr., to his name; and if he was addressed as the "Worshipful," it was only when a soothing compliment was necessary; but the additions of "Gentleman," or "Esquire," would have thrown the whole court into an uproar. Even in such a trifling matter as a light in the dark streets at night, the same scrupulous distinctions were observed: the courtiers were lighted with torches, merchants and lawyers with links, and mechanics with lanterns.[5] The great mark of mercantile ambition was the mayoralty: the lord mayor's show was more than a Roman triumph in the eyes of a young civic aspirant; and Gog and Magog, that towered over the scene, became the gods of his idolatry. "By this light!" exclaims a young trading citizen, in Greene's "Tu Quoque," "I do not think but to be lord mayor of London before I die, and have three pageants carried before me, besides a ship and a unicorn."

From the merchants and shopkeepers we may descend to the apprentices of this period, and, strange to tell, they seem to have been among the chief civic nuisances of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. These youths, although scattered over the whole metropolis, were formidable, not only from their numbers, but their union; and they seem to have acquired such a reckless ferocity from the consciousness of their strength, that they were always ready to head the minor insurrections and popular riots of the period. In these cases it was in vain for the common city-guard to oppose them; "clubs, bills, and partisans" were swept before the whirlwind of a 'prentice onset; and it was often necessary to call out the military against them. One aggrieved member of the fraternity, too, was enough to throw, with a single warwhoop, the whole ward into an uproar. Whether attacking or attacked, he had only to shout the cry of "'Prentices! clubs!" when every shop, warehouse, and street repeated the warning, and every 'prentice snatched up his hat and rushed to the rescue. The 'prentices also had constituted themselves the arbiters and executioners of popular justice, so that if a bull was to be baited in the ring, or a play on the stage—if a bawd was to be carted through the streets, with a hideous symphony of pans, kettles, and keys—if a scold was to be carried to the cucking-stool and ducked, or a house of bad repute to be stormed and sacked—a throng of apprentices generally both decreed and executed the deed. These turbulent lads had also their feuds against certain other bodies, among which the Templars were distinguished; but all foreigners they especially hated, with even more than an English hatred. When the heyday of apprenticeship had exhaled, many of these youths grew sober, rich, and obese, and were thus qualified for civic offices and dignities; but others acquired such unsettled and profligate habits that their dismissal from shop and warehouse was indispensable. Being thus thrown upon society, they were ready for every desperate deed; and from the host of discarded 'prentices a bravo could easily be hired by any gentleman who was base enough to use the services of a mercenary cudgel.[1]

Such was the audacity of town thieves and robbers in the latter part of the sixteenth century, that on one occasion Elizabeth herself, while taking an airing in her coach, near Islington, was environed by a whole regiment of "rogues and masterless men," and was obliged to dispatch a footman to the mayor and recorder for help. Fleetwood accordingly set his myrmidons in motion, and, by the next morning, seventy-four of the desperadoes were brought before him, some of whom, he says, were "blind, and yet great usurers, and very rich." The worthy magistrate gave them what he calls "substantial payment," and promised them, withal, a double payment if they appeared before him again; and he values himself justly upon never having seen them afterward. This Fleetwood, who was recorder of London, appears to have been the Fielding of his day, and, by his indefatigable exertions, he partially succeeded in weeding London, Westminster, and the suburbs, of these pernicious characters.[1]

Of those persons who were comprehended under the title of coney-catchers (that is, cheats, in opposition to those who used violence), the number in all parts of the kingdom in the time of Elizabeth was estimated at not less than ten thousand.[2] In the country they attended every wake and fair, for the purposes of duping the unwary—plundered out-houses and poultry-yards, and "found linen upon every hedge;" and as they moved about in formidable bands, it was seldom safe for the country constables to apprehend them. But London was their great mart and center of attraction, and the places where they chiefly swarmed were the Savoy and the brick-kilns near Islington. Not less than twenty-two different kinds of coney-catchers are summed up by Holinshed. During the reigns of James and Charles, however, they seem to have not only increased in numbers, but to have carried the principle of the subdivision of labor still further out. They used a cant language for professional communication, resembling that of the gipsies whom they soon supplanted; and in this, as well as in many other particulars, in reading the accounts of the various tricks and stratagems of the rogues of the seventeenth century, we seem to be reading the history of the frauds of London in the nineteenth. In fact, much as we may admire the dexterity of modern thimble-rigging and swindling, scarcely a single stroke of it is of recent origin; every trick was practiced with equal adroitness so early as the good old days of Elizabeth. The cut-purses[3] used instruments of the finest steel, made by the choicest workmen of Italy; and they had numerous schools in London, where the rising generation were regularly trained in every species of fraud. One way in which children were taught to pick a pocket adroitly is said to be still practiced in the metropolis. A pocket or purse was suspended from the ceiling, and hung round with small bells, and the young learner was required to finger and empty it without ringing the slightest alarm. All the common knaveries of the town were the same with which we are still familiar. Rustic squires and blunt-witted franklins, coming on a visit to London, were frequently fleeced, or even worse handled, and sent home to horrify their firesides with tales of metropolitan iniquity. They had gazed at some London marvel, and their purses had vanished the while, as if at the touch of fairy fingers. They had been hailed by city kinsmen of whom they had never heard, and to whom they were persuaded to intrust their property; but these cousins had cozened them, and disappeared with their goods. Rings and gems of price had glittered in their path, and, just as they picked them up, some by-stander claimed a share in the spoil, and was bought off by a considerable sum of money; and then the golden gaud became brass, and the diamond worthless crystal. Kind gentlewomen, pitying their ignorance of the town, had directed them to comfortable lodgings; but, at midnight, the window had softly opened—hooks and pincers had entered—and their clothes had risen and departed. With a blanket wrapped round them, they had stolen at an early hour to the inn at which their horses had been left, intending to mount and flee; but their cousins of yesterday had been before them, and had carried off their cattle by some plausible tale or token.[1]

While the streets of London, and even the inferior towns, were filled with prowling sharpers of this sort, the highways were equally infested with robbers. They scoured the country in bands that mustered from ten to forty men, some armed with chacing-staves, that is, poles twelve or thirteen feet long, shod with a steel spike; and others with bows and arrows, or with guns, and almost all with pistols.[2] It was therefore unsafe for "true men" to travel except in numbers, and well armed; and whoever was about to undertake a journey had to wait until a tolerably strong caravan had mustered for the same route. The robbers were often disguised as well as armed; they concealed their faces with visors; they carried false beards and wigs in their pockets, and even false tails for their horses, and thus, in a twinkling, the appearance of man and steed could be so altered that they confronted the officers of justice without suspicion. Among the chief places of danger from highwaymen were Salisbury Plain and Gadshill in Kent; the latter place having been long of such repute in this way that Shakspeare selected it for the scene of Falstaff's highway achievements.

Another description of miscreants mentioned in the accounts of this period went about the streets of London with figs and raisins in their pockets, with which they allured children to their houses; they then cropped the hair of their victims, and otherwise so altered their appearance that their parents could not recognize them, after which they shipped them off to the plantations, there to be sold for slaves.[3] The civil wars and the discomfiture of the royal cause produced a plentiful harvest of dashing highwaymen, the impoverished followers of the fallen king, who endeavored to retrieve upon the road what they had lost in the field; and many a gentle and well-born cavalier, who had honorably distinguished himself at Marston Moor or Naseby, had his exit at Tyburn. In their new species of campaigning they comforted themselves with the thought that they were only continuing the war upon a different scale, and resuming what had once been their own; in conformity with which notion, while they scrupulously abstained from molesting any of the royal party, they pounced upon a Roundhead with peculiar satisfaction. It is gratifying to add, that the robbers of England, at this time, were distinguished by their superior humanity in comparison with those of other countries, seldom inflicting wounds or death except in cases of desperate resistance.[1]

Among the numerous strange characters of this period who had made themselves obnoxious to the law, and were obliged to show false colors, were the Jesuits, or seminary priests. These men were wont to assume as many shapes as Proteus to escape detection. Sometimes they exhibited the gay attire and fashionable bearing of a gallant; and it would appear that the part was admirably played by these reverend masqueraders. "If about Bloomsbury or Holborn," says an author of this period, "thou meet a good, snug fellow, in a gold-laced suit, a cloak lined thorough with velvet, one that hath good store of coin in his purse, rings on his fingers, a watch in his pocket, which he will value at above twenty pounds, a very broadlaced band, a stiletto by his side, a man at his heels, willing (upon small acquaintance) to intrude himself into thy company, and still desiring further to insinuate with thee, then take heed of a Jesuit of a prouder sort of priests."[2] One great scheme of the Jesuits of this period was to drive the Puritans into all kinds of religious extravagance, in hope that the reaction would produce a national return to the church of Rome; and, in furtherance of this plan, they assumed the dress, grimace, and manners of ultra-puritanism, while they out-canted and out-preached even Hugh Peters himself. A member of the brotherhood lurking about Clerkenwell, in writing to a correspondent, during the earlier part of the reign of Charles I., thus alludes to the insidious proceeding: "I can not but laugh to see how some of our own coat have accoutred themselves: you would scarce know them if you saw them; and 'tis admirable how, in speech and gesture, they act the Puritans."[3]

The increase of learning and the multiplication of books had made authorship a regular profession; but success as yet was only to be won through the favor and countenance of persons of rank, and authors were obliged to address their patrons with the most crawling adulation, as well as to submit to many gross indignities. Literary tricks and knaveries were also common so early as the beginning of this period. One of these was practiced by a set of literary pedlers, who went about the country with some worthless pamphlet, headed by an epistle dedicatory, into which they inserted successively the names of all the principal persons of the county through which they traveled, extracting from each, in return, a present of three or four angels.[4] When the civil wars commenced, and diurnals, as the newspapers were then called, were much in request.

the writers of these not only sold themselves to one or other party, but even to individuals, whose deeds they exclusively trumpeted.[1] A mercenary partisan of this stamp is thus briefly described in Pepy's Diary: "I found Muddiman, a good scholar, an arch rogue, and owns that though he writes new books for the parliament, yet he did declare that he did it only to get money, and did talk very basely of many of them."

The extent and confusion of such a Babel as London had now become, seemed to stun the intellects of King James; and besides the proclamations he was accustomed to issue against the building of additional houses, as Elizabeth had done before him, and as was also done by his son and by the government of the commonwealth, he applied himself in various other ways to reform what he considered a serious political evil. He prohibited the Scots from repairing to London, and threatened the skippers who brought them with fine and confiscation. He tried to persuade the English nobles and landed gentlemen to reside upon their estates, telling them that in the country they were like ships in a river, that showed like something; while, in London, they were like ships at sea, that showed like nothing. But his most sapient scheme to thin the city population was, to plant whole colonies of Londoners upon the waste lands of Scotland—a munificent boon to the English, as he thought, by which the advantages of the union of the two kingdoms would be reciprocated. But all these schemes were useless; the torrent swelled and strengthened every hour, and the London population continued to increase in a ratio that far exceeded all former precedent. As yet, however, this increase was not accompanied with those general improvements so necessary for the comfort of civic life. The greater part of the houses were still sheds of wood, or of wood and brick, the wretchedness of which was only brought into strong relief by the stately buildings that here and there intervened; the streets were crooked and narrow, and generally overshadowed by a perpetual twilight, from the abutments overhead, that rose, story above story, until they almost closed upon each other; and, being unpaved, they were damp and dirty even in dry weather, and, in rainy, were almost knee-deep with mud. These discomforts were peculiarly striking to foreigners, who seemed to have regarded London as the valley of the shadow of death. They complained of the universal coughing that resounded through every place of concourse, and they considered consumption to be a national disease of the English, produced by the wet and dirty streets of their metropolis. The expedients that had been for some time adopted to counteract these nuisances were worthy of Asiatic barbarians. Kites and ravens were cherished on account of their usefulness in devouring the filth of the streets, and bonfires were frequently kindled to avert a visit of the plague.[2]

People of rank and fashion at this time lived in the Strand, Drury Lane, and the neighborhood of Covent Garden, which was as yet only an inclosed field; merchants resided between Temple Bar and the Exchange; bullies, broken spendthrifts, and criminals of every shade, congregated in Whitefriars (Alsatia), which still possessed the right of sanctuary, and the avenues of which were watched by scouts who, on the approach of the messengers of justice, sounded a horn, and raised the cry of "An arrest!" to warn the Alsatians for flight or resistance.[1] The obscure, narrow lanes branching from Cannon-street toward the river were clustered with those secret and proscribed buildings called "the tents of Kedar" by their frequenters, but conventicles by the world in general: Leukner's Lane and its precincts were the favorite haunts of the profligate; and the "devilish Ranters," as honest Bunyan justly terms them, held their satanic orgies in Whitechapel and Charter-house Lane. As for places of lounge and recreation, Hyde Park and Spring Garden afforded pleasant retreats to the citizens from the dirt and din of the streets; but, under the commonwealth, the use of the park was restricted by a tax of one shilling levied upon every coach, at entrance, and sixpence for every horse, while the garden, as already mentioned, was shut up. But the chief place of common resort was the middle aisle of St. Paul's; the hours of public concourse there being from eleven to twelve at noon, and after dinner from three to six in the evening. Here lords, merchants, and men of all professions—the fashionable, the busy, and the idle—were wont to meet and mingle; and he who had no companion might amuse or edify himself with the numerous placards and intimations suspended from the pillars. But the chief of the "Paul's walkers" were the political quidnuncs, who must have found some thing congenial in the gloom of this stately piazza. "These newsmongers, as they called them," says Osborne, in his Letters to his Son, "did not only take the boldness to weigh the public, but most intrinsic actions of the state, which some courtier or other did betray to them."

The elbowing of crowds and the rivers of mud were not the only obstacles to be encountered in the streets of London. If the peaceful pedestrian eschewed a quarrel by universal concession, and gave the wall to every comer, he might still run the risk of being tossed by a half-baited bull, or hugged by a runaway bear. A sudden rush and encountering between the factions of Templars and 'prentices, or of butchers and weavers, might sweep him at unawares into the throng of battle, where, although he espoused neither party, he might get well cudgeled by both. If he sought to avoid all these mischances by the expensive protection of a coach, he might suddenly find himself and his vehicle sprawling in the kennel, through the rude wantonness of the mob. This last pastime had become a favorite with the London rabble, who called coaches hell-carts, and delighted in upsetting them.[2] In the hatred of every thing aristocratic which took possession of the multitude after the commencement of the civil war, noblemen, when they made their appearance in public, were cursed and reviled, and apt to be mobbed; and several who belonged to this once privileged class were obliged to set armed guards over their houses, even though they had espoused the parliamentary cause.

Such was a day in the metropolis; but the night was confusion worse confounded. After the twilight had deepened into darkness, the peaceful citizens been housed, and the throngs of links and torches given place to the solitary twinklings of the watchmen's lanterns, Alsatia disgorged its refugees, and the taverns their inmates; the sons of Belial, "flown with insolence and wine," took possession of the lanes and corners of streets; stray passengers were insulted, wounded, and often killed; and the roofs of rich citizens were untiled for the purpose of plunder. It was unsafe to walk in the streets of London after nine o'clock. A set of midnight ruffians, also, peculiar to this period, went under the names of Roaring Boys, Bonaventors, and Privadors. These—the successors of the Swashbucklers of the sixteenth, and forerunners of the Mohawks of the eighteenth century—are described as "persons prodigal, and of great expense, who, having run themselves into debt, were constrained to run into factions, to defend themselves from danger of the law."[1] In such a state of things the sword of justice required to be something more than a metaphor; and a sheriff's officer, in making a civil arrest, had frequently to be backed by a possé of well-armed followers. The night-watchmen and constables, also, having such a dangerous commission, were very strict in enforcing it, and their partisans were not more than necessary against those midnight roysters who broke the peace with rapier and dagger. Often, indeed, a city gallant was unceremoniously knocked on the head in brawling with the watch, instead of being simply punished with fine or imprisonment. To this circumstance Osborne quaintly alludes, when he admonishes his son to give good words to the city guardians, "many," says he, "being quick in memory, who, out of scorn to be catechised by a constable, have summed up their days at the end of a watchman's bill."

We will now notice some of the popular superstitions of the time. The blank created by the banishment of religion in the earlier part of this period required still to be filled with something spiritual, and jugglers and hobgoblins usurped the vacancy. Men who defied all sacred sanctions could quake at some unexpected but natural phenomenon; and the appearance of a comet, in 1618, actually frightened the English court into a temporary fit of gravity. Such omens as the falling of a portrait from the wall, the croaking of a raven, the crossing of a hare in one's path, the upsetting of salt, the unexpected crowing of a cock, could disturb the most swaggering cavalier. As for the learned of this period, their favorite mode of divination was by what was called the Sortes Virgilianæ, or the opening at hazard of a copy of Virgil's Æneid, and reading a revelation of futurity in the first passage that struck the eye. From this general tendency of all classes, divination became a thriving trade, and almost every street had its cunning man, or cunning woman, who divined for the wise by astrological calculations, and for the ignorant by the oracle of the sieve and sheers. Sometimes, as in the cases of Dr. Forman and Mrs. Turner, the forbidden traffic of fortune-telling was a cover to the worse trades of pandering and poisoning. When the civil wars commenced, and every hour was fraught with some great event, this natural eagerness to anticipate the future became so intense that the stars were more eagerly studied than the diurnals, and Cavaliers and Roundheads thronged to the astrologers to learn the events of the succeeding week.[1] Another favorite superstition of the period was, the exorcising of devils; when the possessed person began to spout Latin and other learned languages of which he was wholly ignorant, the Romish priest took the field against this erudite demon in full pontificals, and armed with holy water and the book of exorcisms. This piece of jugglery was a favorite practice of the popish clergy, and was one of the ways they took to recover their esteem with the multitude; when the unclean spirit refused to be dislodged by any other form of conjuration than that which they employed, the circumstance was adduced as an incontrovertible evidence that the church of Rome was the true church. Such practices, however, were not wholly confined to the Romish clergy: the Puritans took the alarm, and set up for exorcists in turn; and, as nervous diseases were abundant among them, they sometimes crowded round the bed of some crazy hypochondriac who was supposed to be possessed by a devil, and whom they stunned with prayers and adjurations. This popular belief in demon-possession had not even the merit of poetical dignity to apologize for its absurdities; the following names of some of the ejected devils may suffice to show of how prosaic and groveling a character it was in all respects: Lusty Dick and Hob, and Corner Cap and Puff, Purr and Flibberdigibbet, Wilkin and Smolkin, Lusty Jolly Jenkin, Pudding of Thame, Pour Dieu, Bonjour and Maho.[2]

It would have been fortunate for humanity if the credulity of the period had gone no farther; but the belief in witches, after the accession of James, became the master-superstition of the age. James had a personal quarrel against the whole race of witches: during his matrimonial voyage to Denmark they had baptized a cat, by which they had raised a storm that almost wrecked his ship;[3] and, when he became king of England, he was as proud of being Malleus Malificarum, as Defender of the Faith. He wrote, reasoned, and declaimed upon witchcraft; his courtiers and clergy, sufficiently apt for superstition, echoed the alarm, and the judges revived the application of the dormant statutes that had been enacted against sorceries and enchantments. And now commenced the only warfare of the pacific James—his warfare against old women—which was waged with great fury during the whole of his reign, and signalized by abundance of slaughter. The methods, too, of detecting the crime were strikingly characteristic of the age. If the impotent fury of a trembling beldame vented itself in imprecations against her persecutors, and if they afterward sustained any calamity in goods or person, this was proof that the woman was a witch.[1] If she talked and mumbled to herself, under the dotage of old age, she was holding converse with invisible spirits, and therefore she was a witch. If a boy or girl sickened beyond the skill of some presumptuous village quack, he had only to declare that the patient was bewitched, upon which the child was worried for the name of the culprit, until some one was announced at hap-hazard. In all such cases the proof was sufficient for the condemnation and death of the accused. In process of time, professed witch-finders came into fashion—men who could detect the crime, although the cunning of Satan himself tried to hide it. Independently of witch-marks and imp-teats upon the person, they could discover an old woman's familiar spirit in the cat that slumbered by the fire, the mouse that rustled in the wall, or even the bird that chirped at the threshold. But the grand test was that of Hopkins, the prince of witch-finders, by which the suspected person was bound hand and foot and thrown into the water, when, if she sunk, there was of course an end of her, and if she swam, she only escaped the water to be put to death by fire. This miscreant, in the years 1645 and 1646, paraded from county to county like a lord chief justice, and if any magistrate was so humane or hardy as to interfere with his proceedings, he was threatened by Hopkins in the most imperious style. At last the murderer had his reward according to the strictest poetical justice: he was found guilty by his own ordeal, and subjected to the same doom as his victims. The extent to which his atrocities were carried may be learned from the fact, that in one year he hanged sixty witches in the county of Suffolk alone. While these legal massacres were thus in progress in England, the destruction of witches went on with still greater severity in Scotland, where such tortures were inflicted to extort confession from the wretched victims that even the death which followed was a relief. Nor did the death of James cool the zeal which his

[3] We learn from Froissart, Monstrelet, and other old chroniclers, that the devil was best propitiated by some choice piece of profanity; a parody upon the sacraments was therefore the usual way in which the sorcerers of the middle ages invoked his aid. Thus, the Host was sometimes administered to a toad, or other lothsome animal. After the Reformation, witches were supposed to desecrate the sacramental bread, and the rite of baptism, for the same purpose.

"Some call me witch;
And, being ignorant of myself, they go About to teach me how to be one; urging That my bad tongue (by their bad usage made so) Forespeaks their cattle, doth bewitch their corn, Themselves, their servants, and their babes at nurse.
This they enforce upon me; and in part

folly had kindled; on the contrary, the persecution became still more rampant under the Long Parliament, and between three and four thousand persons are said to have been executed for witchcraft between the years 1640 and the Restoration.[1]

As traffic increased and money became more abundant, it was to be expected that the science of good living would be carefully cultivated; cookery, accordingly, was now studied more than ever, but scarcely as yet with any improvements: in fact, the epicurism of the seventeenth century consisted chiefly in extravagant expense and "villainous compounds." The following "receipt to make a herring-pie," extracted from one of the cookery-books of the time, may satisfy the most craving appetite upon this subject: "Take salt herrings, being watered; wash them between your hands, and you shall loose the fish from the skin; take off the skin whole, and lay them in a dish; then have a pound of almond-paste ready; mince the herrings and stamp them with the almond-paste, two of the milts or roes, five or six dates, some grated manchet, sugar, sack, rose-water, and saffron; make the composition somewhat stiff, and fill the skins; put butter in the bottom of your pie, lay on the herring, and on them dates, gooseberries, currants, barberries, and butter; close it up, and bake it; being baked, liquor it with butter, verjuice, and sugar."[2] Sometimes, however, the dishes, though equally fanciful, were of a more refined character: thus we read of "an artificial hen made of puff paste, with her wings displayed, sitting upon eggs of the same materials, where in each of them was inclosed a fat nightingale seasoned with pepper and ambergris."[3] The same artificial taste prevailed in the preparation of the simplest materials of food; butter, cream, and marrow, ambergris, all kinds of spices, sugar, dried fruits, oranges, and lemons, entered largely into the composition of almost every dish. Several articles also appear to have been dressed, that would scarcely find admission into a modern English kitchen—such as snails, which were stewed or fried in a variety of ways with oil, spices, wine, vinegar, and eggs; and the legs of frogs, which were dressed into fricasees.[4] On some occasions, therefore, a coarse and clownish dish was a pleasing variety. In the year 1661, a gathering of marquises, lords, knights, and squires took place at Newcastle, to celebrate a great anniversary, when, on account of the number of guests, each was required to bring his own dish of meat. Of course it was a sort of competition in which each strove for preëminence; but the specimen of Sir George Goring was reckoned a master-piece. It consisted of four huge brawny pigs, piping hot, bitted and harnessed with ropes of sausage, all tied to a monstrous bag-pudding.[5]

In variety of wines, and the copious use of them, the wealthier classes of England of this age were not a whit behind their ancestors; indeed, the arrival of the Danish king and his courtiers, in the reign of James, greatly increased the national thirst, insomuch that it was observed, the Danes had again conquered England.[1] In the succeeding reign the cavaliers were as little famed for temperance as the courtiers of James. The English followed, also, very scrupulously, the Danish custom of drinking healths; and foreigners were astonished to find that, when a company amounted to some twenty or thirty, it was still expected that every guest should drink the health of each in rotation. Such festivals, of course, inflamed the love of quarrel; toasts were given which produced discussion or refusal to drink them, and if the over-heated parties did not immediately come to blows, still duels and bloodshed were the usual consequences. Sometimes, when a lady or an absent patron was toasted, the company pledged the toast upon their knees. Among other disgusting modes of drinking healths at this time, the toper sometimes mingled his own blood with the wine.[2] It was fortunate that, while the aristocracy were thus becoming more vitiated, the common people had become more temperate than formerly, but, adds Stowe to this assertion, "it was not from abstinence, but necessity, ale and beer being small, and wines in price above their reach."

Greater temperance in eating and drinking naturally prevailed during the period of the commonwealth, from the ascendency of Puritan principles, which recommended simplicity and self-denial; and as so many of the leaders of the dominant party had risen from the ranks, the new style of living frequently assumed the character of the old Saxon coarseness. A republican simplicity especially prevailed in the banquets at Whitehall during Cromwell's administration, the plain fare of whose tables was the subject of many a sneer among the luxurious loyalists. An idea of his dinners may be formed from the following specimen of his lady's mode of baking a pig. The carcass was incased in a coating of clay, like one of his own Ironsides in his coat-of-mail, and in this state it was stewed among the hot ashes of the stoke-hole. Scotch collops also formed one of the standing dishes of her cookery. We are also informed that she ate marrow-puddings at breakfast; while her youngest daughter, the Lady Frances, delighted in a sausage made of hog's liver.[3] Cromwell, with the stomach of a soldier, despised French cookery and elaborate dishes, and at his state dinners these were placed upon his table chiefly for show. After a feast of this kind, much boisterous merriment generally prevailed, but it was harmless, and even dignified, compared with the gross outrages of a royal banquet in the reign of James or the festivals of the cavaliers in the time of his son. The London civic feasts during the commonwealth were also of a very decorous character: in one, which was given to Fairfax and Cromwell, the dishes were all of a substantial character, suited to military appetites; no healths were drank, and the only music that enlivened the banquet was that of trumpets and drums.[1]

The popular sports and games, from the gradual change that had taken place in the manner of living, had been always contracting within a narrower circle; and from the reign of Charles I. to the Restoration few persons had either inclination or opportunity for those amusements that had formerly been universal. James, who followed every species of venery, delighted in hawking—a sport, in the costume appropriated to which he was often drawn by the artists of the period; and this royal predilection gave a momentary revival to a recreation that was otherwise on the point of extinction. Tennis was one of the favorite amusements of his son, Prince Henry, as it was of the courtiers in general. The game of pall-mall was as yet a novelty; but when it was played, the competition was so keen, that those who engaged in it frequently stripped to their shirts.[2] Another old game, which was still a favorite, was that of the balloon—a large ball of leather, which was inflated with air by a vent, and then bandied by the players with the hand. Billiards was also one of those fashionable games which were now beginning to supersede the more boisterous sports of the preceding century. In spite of change, however, the pristine, national love of blood-shedding still remained, and the English nobility and gentry still flocked with rapture to the exhibitions of bear-baiting and cock-fighting, and wagered large sums upon the issue. The Puritans, amid their dislike of those sports which they reckoned cruel and sinful, very properly abhorred above all things a bear-baiting; and, therefore, Cromwell, Pride, and Hewson, that they might remove the popular temptation, slew all the bears—an exploit that gave rise to the poem of Hudibras.

We learn from the Book of Sports that the common amusements of the English peasantry of this period were dancing, leaping, vaulting, archery, May-games, May-poles, Whitsun-ales, morice-dances, and the decoration of churches with rushes and branches, which last practice was a favorite recreation of the women. All these pastimes were not only declared to be lawful on Sunday, but they were also enjoined upon all church-going people after divine service. The games prohibited on that day were bear and bull-baiting, interludes, and bowling. The bowling-greens of England excited the admiration of foreigners, being superior to any thing of the kind seen abroad. Such was also the case with the English horse-races, which had now increased in splendor and importance; and, as the breed of horses had been greatly improved by the practice, their mettle was not spared, and furious riding and driving were now among the characteristics of an Englishman.[3] As for the games and recreations of the citizens, these had necessarily to be accommodated to the exigencies of a metropolitan life, and consisted in cock-fighting, bowling, tables, cards, dice, billiards, musical entertainments, dancing, masks, balls, plays, and evening club-meetings. When more active exercise was desirable, they rode into the country, or hunted with the lord mayor's pack of dogs, when the common-hunt (one of the mayor's officers) set out for the purpose. The range for this healthful amusement was sufficiently extensive, as the London citizens had the privilege, by their charter, of hunting in Middlesex, Hertfordshire, the Chilterns, and Kent. While such amusements were characteristic of the respectable merchants and tradesmen, those of the London mob consisted of foot-ball, wrestling, cudgel-playing, nine-pins, shovel-board, cricket, stow-ball, quoits, ringing of bells, pitching-the-bar, bull and bear-baiting, throwing-at-cocks, and lying at ale-houses.[1]

The same degree of improvement that had taken place in England during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries had been by no means realized in Scotland. A factious and selfish aristocracy, intestine feuds, civil commotions, national poverty, a population composed of different races, and generally animated by opposing interests, and, above all, the struggle for centuries which Scotland had maintained with a powerful rival, had impressed certain characteristics of barbarism upon the people that could not be easily or quickly eradicated. In that country, therefore, we still discover, during at least the earlier part of the present period, much of the same rudeness that had been prevalent in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries.

In England, by the beginning of the present period, the middle classes had assumed their proper position in society, and imparted a healthful character to the ranks above and beneath them. But, as yet, this important portion of society was nearly wanting in Scotland. She had no preponderating middle class, answering either to the comfortable, independent yeomanry or the wealthy merchants of England; and the chief distinction we still find in the Scottish population is that between lord and serf, between the rich and the very poor. The Scottish farmers, instead of holding the land upon long leases, by which they might have risen to respectability and influence, rented their farms from year to year. Thus they had no inducement to build comfortable houses, plant trees and hedges, enrich the soil, and devote themselves to agricultural experiments, when they might be ejected at the pleasure of the landlord. Any kind of hovel was sufficient for such a peasantry, and the cheapest kinds of farming were the best. Indeed, the chief cultivation they studied was the cultivation of the favor of the laird; to secure this, they swelled his feudal retinue, and rode about the country at his heels, while plowing and sowing were committed to the management of hinds. It frequently happened, however, that, in spite of all his homage, the peasant was ejected from his barren acres; and the assassination of newly-installed farmers, by those whom they had dispossessed, was an event of as frequent occurrence in Scotland during the sixteenth century as it is in Ireland at the present day.[2]

The lawlessness and violence of a state of barbarism were still constantly breaking out in the conduct of all classes. A bond or obligation is still in existence, signed by the Earl of Cassilis, in 1602, by which he engages, upon his honor, to pay to Hew Kennedy, his younger brother, the sum of twelve hundred marks yearly, besides a maintenance for six horses, provided the said Hew will murder the Laird of Auchindrane.[1] This practice of assassination had become the foulest blot upon the Scottish character during the reign of Queen Mary and the minority of James, so that the country became a by-word on account of it among foreign nations. We may perceive, indeed, how common these atrocities had become, and with what little compunction they were regarded, by the tone of merriment with which such writers as Buchanan and Knox detail such events as the murders of Beatoun and Rizzio. Bloody encounters were also common in the streets of Edinburgh, whenever rival chiefs happened to meet, accompanied by their armed followers, and so far was this ferocious spirit carried, that feuds and homicides broke out among them even on their way to church on the Sabbath. Thus, in country parishes especially, the churchyard, and even the church-porch itself, were often polluted with duels and murders.

So early as the reign of James IV., a law had been passed, requiring all barons and substantial freeholders to put their eldest sons and heirs to school at the age of six, or at the utmost nine years, till they had "a competent foundation and good skill of Latin." After this the pupils were required to study three years in the schools of arts and laws, that they might be qualified for the offices to which their rank entitled them. But these regulations seem to have produced little general diffusion of literary attainments among any class of the community. At the commencement of the Reformation few even of the higher clergy could preach; and, when they attempted discussion with such antagonists as Wishart and Knox, their arguments were so absurd and so indicative of utter ignorance, as to move only laughter and contempt among the auditors.[2]

The rudeness of demeanor that had hitherto characterized the Scotch was commensurate with such a state of ignorance and barbarism. Even in the court of the beautiful Mary, where courtesy might have been most expected, the grim barons elbowed their way in most boisterous fashion, and "would shoulder and shoot Rizzio aside when they entered the queen's chamber, and found him always speaking with her."[3] Hitherto, indeed, the highest examples in Scotland had by no means tended to exalt the standard of court manners. James V., certainly the most accomplished of his race, thus received a solemn deputation of the clergy when they applied for his consent to persecute the reformers:—"Wherefore," he roared in a fury, "gave my predecessors so many lands and rents to the kirk? Was it to maintain hawks, dogs, and whores to a number of idle priests? The King of England burns, the King of Denmark beheads you: I will stick you with this whinger!" and, suiting the action to the word, he unsheathed his dagger and drove them from his presence.[1] The clergy, indeed, could not well complain of such treatment: they dealt in much the same fashion with the laity, and even with each other. A rich specimen was exhibited on one occasion at Glasgow, by Dunbar, the archbishop of that see, and Cardinal Beatoun, each asserting his right to walk first in a procession to the cathedral. After many hot and foul words, the controversy grew so fierce that a battle commenced between the followers of the two dignitaries, even in the church-porch; heads were broken, beards torn out by handfulls, and copes and tippets rent to shreds, while crosses and cross-bearers were thrown to the ground and trampled under foot. Knox, who steps aside from the mournful narrative of the martyrdom of his friend Wishart to describe this "merrie bourde," welcomes it with a triumphant huzza, and only regrets that the men-at-arms did not also buckle to the conflict, and heighten the fun with a little bloodshed.[2] The rules of morality seem to have been as little regarded among the influential classes as those of common courtesy. Previous to the Reformation, the practice of concubinage among the clergy was not only more prevalent in Scotland than it seems ever to have been in England, but was more openly and unblushingly practiced: the royal amours of James IV. and James V. were as gross and vulgar as they were profligate; and the court of Mary, unless it has been greatly belied, only increased the sensuality of the preceding reigns. These examples had their consequent influence upon the people at large; and in the poetical writings of Scotland during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, we find unquestionable evidence of a similar immorality prevailing through the whole community.

In the times when court pageants were matters of such importance, the Scots did their best to vie with their richer and more refined neighbors; and in some of their masques we find that they had an advantage over their national rivals by the introduction of bonâ fide Ethiopians, who personated black queens and empresses. These were slaves from the East Indies, captured from the Portuguese by the Scottish cruisers, in the days of Barton and Wood.[3] The following account is given by an old chronicler of one of these courtly spectacles. When Mary of Guise was about to enter St. Andrew's, on her marriage to James V., "first she was received at the New Abbey gate; upon the east side thereof there was made to her a triumphal arch by Sir David Lindsay, of the Mount, Lion Herald, which caused a great cloud come out of the heavens above the gate, and open instantly; and there appeared a fair lady, most like an angel, having the keys of Scotland in her hands, and delivered them to the queen, in sign and token that all the hearts of Scot land were open to receive her grace; with certain orations and exhortations made by the said Sir David Lindsay to the queen, instructing her to serve her God, obey her husband, and keep her body clean, according to God's will and commandments."[1]

In Scotland, as in other countries, court pageants were often made the vehicles of political satire, on which account offense was sometimes taken when none had been intended. An incident of this kind occurred at the baptism of James VI. A splendid banquet was given, at which the envoys of Elizabeth were distinguished guests; and the dishes were conveyed into the hall upon a large and richly-adorned vehicle that seemed to move of its own accord. But, unfortunately, this quaint device was preceded by a band of satyrs ornamented with long tails, and armed with whips, who, as they ran through the hall, clutched their tails in their hands, and flourished them to and fro. The English guests immediately started up in a rage. The actors were Frenchmen, and it was surmised that they had brandished their caudal appendages in defiance of England; and the envoys, after vowing a dire revenge, retired to the extremity of the hall, that they might no longer witness the obnoxious exhibition.[2]

Although the principles of taste had changed, they had scarcely improved, during a long course of years, in the pageantries of a royal procession, as appears by the reception of Charles I. at Edinburgh, in 1633. He was welcomed on his arrival by the provost and baillies, clad in red robes well furred, and the "eldermen" and counselors in black velvet gowns; these functionaries were seated upon "seats of deal for the purpose, built of three degrees." The provost, after a speech, presented to his majesty a basin of gold, valued at five thousand marks, "wherein was shaken, out of ane embroidered purse, one thousand golden double-angels, as ane token of the town of Edinburgh their love and humble service." At the west end of the Tolbooth, the royal pedigree of the Stuarts, from Fergus I., "delicately painted," was hung out to welcome his descendant. At the market-cross was the god Bacchus, who drank the king's health, all the spouts of the fountain in the mean time flowing with wine. At the Tron was a representation of Mount Parnassus covered with birch-branches, where nine boys represented the nine muses. All this was dull enough; but this dullness must have been prodigiously enhanced by the merciless prosings of the civic dignitaries, for the king was obliged to endure the infliction of seven formal speeches before he got fairly sheltered within the walls of Holyrood. A subsequent exhibition (it was a post-prandial one) in honor of the king was of a more lively description. After a rich banquet, the provost, baillies, and counselors, linked hand-in-hand, and bareheaded, came dancing vigorously down the High-street, accompanied with drums, trumpeting, and all kinds of music.[3]

The common people had their public masqueradings as well as the higher classes, and the pageant of Robin Hood was as great a favorite in Scotland as it was in England. The characters of this dramatic sport seem also to have been faithfully copied from the English. But in the first zeal of the Reformation laws for its suppression were enacted in 1561. This interference with a favorite pastime so incensed the citizens of Edinburgh, that they flew to arms; and, after robbing and maltreating passengers, rescuing a man condemned to death, and breaking the gibbet on which he was to have been executed, they imprisoned the magistrates until they had extorted from them an act of indemnity.[1] Robin Hood and his motley band were thus still enabled to defy the law; and so late as the close of the sixteenth century we find the general assembly complaining heavily of the profanation of the Sabbath, "by the making of Robin Hood." The Abbot of Unreason, the principal figure of another festive sport of the Scots, was a personage somewhat resembling the English Lord of Misrule; and, attended by hobby-horses, morris-dancers, and the never-failing dragon, he commonly celebrated such ecclesiastical events as the anniversary of a saint or the election of a church dignitary. But, as this abbot acted in a sort of clerical capacity, his pranks were more reprehensible than those of a mere secular mime, consisting chiefly of parodies on the church service and religious ordinances in general.[2] On this account, the festival of the Abbot of Unreason bore a close resemblance to the Feast of the Ass, or the Festival of Fools, by which religion was burlesqued upon the continent during the license of the middle ages.

The exhibition of miracle and moral plays had been common in Scotland as well as in England, and the chief author in this species of literature among the Scots was Sir David Lindsay of the Mount. His principal work, entitled The Three Estates, is a moral play, full of sarcastic matter mixed with moral admonition, the personages being a mixture of human beings and allegorical abstractions. This play occupied nine hours in acting; and not only the language, but in many instances the stage directions, are so gross, as to give us a very strange idea of a Scottish audience of the sixteenth century. These plays were commonly acted in the open air; the place set apart for the purpose was called the play-field, and there were few large towns in Scotland without such a provision for the public amusement.[3] At first, the drama did good service in the cause of the Reformation, by exposing the impostures and iniquities of the Romish clergy; but the "high-kilted" muse of the North did not know where to stop, and she ran riot among the profligacies she exposed until she was infected with their spirit, so that the reformers were soon scandalized at the indecorum of their ally. In consequence, they first protested against the licentiousness of the stage; and when their influence increased they put down the acting of plays altogether. In the stirring political events that followed, the absence of the stage seems to have been little felt or regretted; but, when the period of calm succeeded, James VI., who was attached to the drama, applied to Elizabeth for a company of English actors, who were sent to Scotland at his request. This was an unpardonable enormity in the eyes of the Presbyterian clergy, and they preached against the abomination of play-going with great vigor, but little immediate success; for the Edinburgh theater was crowded every night. But, at length, the stern predominance of ecclesiastical discipline over every other authority was more than a match for a poor handful of actors, and the drama in Scotland may be said to have perished in its infancy.

The tournament was greatly patronized by James IV. and James V., themselves redoubted knights, and skilled in all military exercises; and such was the splendor with which the tournaments of the first of these monarchs were held, that knights from every part of Europe flocked to compete at them. These, however, were the last, as they were the brightest, flashes of northern chivalry. Besides these grander exhibitions for knights and nobles, weapon-shaws for the people were appointed by James IV. to be held four times a-year, at which all persons should assemble armed and accoutred according to the amount of their income. The active and military games practiced at public or social meetings were, leaping, running, wrestling, casting the penny-stone or quoit, shooting at the papingo, and the usual trials of archery. In public military trials, James IV. stimulated the candidates by prizes, which generally consisted of silver weapons, such as the winners had excelled in. A great portion of the popularity of James V. was owing to the frankness with which he associated with the people in these sports, so that he was usually called the king of the commons.[1] Hunting and hawking were keenly pursued in Scotland in the sixteenth and early part of the seventeenth century, and to an extent which the improvement of English agriculture had now rendered impossible in the south. Tennis, hand and football, kaylas, and golf, were among the outdoor games of Scotland; and dancing was a common indoor recreation. The sword-dance appears to have been a favorite of the Scots during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The sedentary games, as among the English, were cards, dice, chess, draughts, and backgammon.

The old rudeness of the domestic life of the Scots began, before the close of the sixteenth century, to receive a sprinkling of refinement from imitation of their English neighbors. Handsome dwelling-houses and stately castles began to supersede the uncomfortable donjons that had formerly been the abodes of feudal pomp and beggarly discomfort. At the same time, services of gilt metal, or even of plate, began to be used by the chief nobles, instead of their former cups of pewter and platters of wood; and one of the greatest indignities to which Darnley was subjected by Mary, after he had fallen into disgrace, was the removal of his service of plate, and the substitution of pewter.[1] After the accession of James to the throne of England, the example of the south, and also its gold, which now flowed into Scotland, continued to raise the standard of living, and multiply the sources of domestic comfort. While this improvement pervaded the country in general, the capital in particular began to assume the appearance of a great city, and to be adorned by many stately mansions erected by the nobility and the heads of the church. But there was still the absence of a preponderating middle class, by whom the golden mean of domestic life might have been exhibited, and on that account, setting aside the civic palaces and country castles of the titled few, Scotland, even in the seventeenth century, was still a country of huts and hovels. Even the shops of comfortable tradesmen and substantial merchants in the metropolis were but sorry sheds of wood and thatch huddled up wherever the ground was convenient; and in this way the venerable cathedral of St. Giles was clustered at every corner and "coign of vantage" with these booths,[2] that showed like swallows' nests about the Gothic edifice, while the sacred interior itself was crowded with those who bought and sold. As for the country-houses, those belonging to the farmers were small, unsightly buildings of loose stones, divided only into two apartments, called a butt and a ben, as is still the case among the poorest of the peasantry; and the generality of Scottish beds were a sort of wooden presses built into the wall, such as are still seen in the poorest northern cottages.[3] Even at the end of the present period we find that the beds of the young nobility consisted frequently of nothing but straw.[4] On these they lay down with their weapons within reach, and were ready to start at the slightest signal.

In the article of diet the Scots had been gradually improving with the extension of their commerce, and by the sixteenth century many foreign luxuries were imported into the country. But this change was regarded by the government with a suspicious eye: they thought it a dangerous departure from the ancient simplicity, and severe laws were made to suppress it. Prohibitions were laid upon the use of drugs, confections, and spiceries brought from beyond seas, on the ground that their prices were still so high as to be ruinous to persons of ordinary means. Exceptions were made only in favor of prelates and peers, and such as were able to spend two thousand pounds (Scotch) annually.[5]

In a nobleman's establishment, though all sat down at the same table, the chief dainties were placed at the upper end of the board, for the exclusive use of the master and his more select guests. As for the menials of these noble households, they were dieted chiefly on corn and roots, with a very small allowance of animal food. The poorer knights and barons, though of great feudal importance, were as yet little chargeable with luxury, if we may trust to the following account given by Moryson:—"Myself was at a knight's house who had many servants to attend him, that brought in his meat with their heads covered with blue caps, the table being more than half furnished with great platters of porridge, each having a little piece of sodden meat; and when the table was served the servants did sit down with us; but the upper mess, instead of porridge, had a pullet with some prunes in the broth. And I observed no art of cookery, or furniture of household stuff, but rather rude neglect of both, though myself and my companion, sent from the governor of Berwick about border affairs, were entertained after their best manner."[1] Moryson further informs us that the Scots used great quantities of red colewort and cabbage, but little fresh meat; and that they salted their mutton and geese, but not beef. This salting of geese is still common in the highlands and isles of Scotland. The cabbage and colewort was in all likelihood used, and it is now, in broths; the porridge was hasty-pudding made of oatmeal; and as for the pullet stewed with prunes, this still continues to be a favorite dish in many parts of Scotland. The reign of Mary added several French dishes to this simple fare; and, among other luxuries, she introduced marmalade, which since that period has continued to be the choicest Scottish confection.[2] The occupation of Scotland, after the civil war, by Monk and the English army, undoubtedly improved the style of living in the north, although not altogether to the extent that has been sometimes supposed. The Scottish gentry seem to have relished the accompaniment of music to a dinner; but for this purpose a harper, crowder, or ballad-singer was quite sufficient.[3] The Scots had abundance of wine, and used it to such excess that they were accounted harder drinkers than the English. It would appear, too, from the testimony of Dunbar, as well as later authorities, that not only the men but even the women were frequently addicted to this species of excess: we are told that the latter drank largely of ale and malmsey when they could get it. In drinking wine the Scots did not sweeten it with sugar, like the English, but with comfits, like the French. One custom of Scottish hospitality was, to present to a guest a well-filled bumper on retiring to bed, under the name of a sleeping-cup. The higher classes dined at eleven, and supped at six o'clock.[1]

An idea of the wild hilarity that, in the early part of the sixteenth century, still mingled with the ceremonious observances of the highest occasions among the upper classes may be formed from the details that have been preserved of the boisterous courtship of James IV., when he went to receive his bride. When Margaret (daughter of Henry VII.) had reached Newbattle, her royal lover darted into her apartment "like a hawk on its quarry," and found her playing at cards. Having embraced her, he gave her a taste of his accomplishments by playing upon the lute and claricord; after which he vaulted into his horse's saddle without setting foot in the stirrup, and galloped off at a rate that soon distanced his attendants. At the next interview Margaret exhibited her musical skill in turn, while James gallantly listened on bended knee. When Margaret left Dalkeith for Edinburgh, a gay cavalcade of the king and nobles met her on the way, and a chivalrous pageant was played by Sir Patrick Hamilton, who, in the character of a rude losel, endeavored to snatch a fair lady from a knight; her champion, of course, resisted, and this led to the exhibition of a mock combat. On arriving at the suburbs of Edinburgh, the queen descended from her litter mounted soberly upon a pillion behind the king, and thus entered her future capital in royal state. The marriage ceremonies were concluded with entertainments, shows, and tournaments, in the last of which the king appeared in the character of a salvage knight, and carried off the prize from every competitor.[2]

Among the common people the important concerns of courtship and marriage were conducted with at least as much glee and mirthful tumult; poetry, piping, and feasting, formed the regular climax of wooing and winning; and when the liquor circulated too copiously, a rude skirmish of wit often warmed into a perilous interchange of blows, that only served to enhance the convivial enjoyment of the party. It was the custom, also, for each of the guests to subscribe a sum, nominally to defray the expenses of the marriage feast, but, in reality, to furnish the young couple with something to begin the world. After the Reformation, these penny-weddings, as they were, and still are, technically termed, incurred the hostility of the kirk; but it was found impossible to suppress them, and all that was done was to limit the contributions of the guests to a very moderate sum. Thus, by an act of the Session of Stirling, not more than five shillings Scotch were allowed to be levied upon each attendant at a penny-wedding; and similar restrictions were established in other parishes.[3]

In their funeral customs the Scots were distinguished from the English by a practice common to themselves and the Irish only. As soon as life had

[1] Even James VI. himself, while king of Scotland, had frequently a wretchedly supplied larder for royal entertainments, as appears from the following piteous application which he made to the Laird of Dundas, in 1600, on occasion of the baptism of his son, Prince Charles:—"Right trusty friend, we greet you heartily well. The baptism of our dearest son being appointed at Holyrudehouse upon the 23d day of December instant, whereat some princes of France, strangers, with the specials of our nobility, being invited to be present, necessar it is that great provisions, guid cheer, and sic other things necessary for decorations thereof, be provided, whilks can not be done without the help of some of our loving subjects; whereof accounting you one of the specials, we have thought good to request you effectiously to propyne us with venisons, wild meat, brissel fowls, capons, with sic other provisions as are maist seasonable at that time and errand, to be sent into Holyrudehouse upon the 22d day of the said month of December instant; and herewithal to invite you to be present at that solemnity, to take part of your own guid cheer, as you tender our honor and the honor of our country."

departed, the friends of the deceased prepared to hold his lyke-wake, that is, to sit up with the body all night previous to interment. A cellar of salt was placed on the breast of the corpse, and lighted candles were set at the head and feet; but as the occasion partook more of festivity than sorrow, all the materials of feasting, drinking, and smoking, were plentifully provided for watchers. This practice was at last so much abused that a person's lyke-wake was often as costly as his wedding. When the time of burial arrived, the coffin was carried to the grave on hand-spokes; and if the deceased had been of rank, the interment was frequently accompanied with the ringing of bells and discharges of muskets and artillery.[1]

The particulars we have hitherto mentioned of Scottish manners and customs are only to be understood of the more civilized parts of Scotland. The people of certain portions of the kingdom differed in their way of life from the Saxon population of the Lowlands as much as they did in lineage. The inhabitants of the isles, who were in great measure of Danish and Norwegian origin, being separated by tempestuous seas and an imperfect navigation from the comparative civilization of the mainland, still retained a large portion of those rude characteristics by which their ancestors were distinguished. These islesmen lived chiefly by hunting and fishing. In preparing animal food for eating, they seethed it in the tripe or skin of the beast, which they filled with water. Their drink was the broth of sodden flesh, or whey kept for several years. In the morning they would eat a little oaten or barley bread, and content themselves with this till evening, after a day's hunting. The only beds in their houses were heather laid on the ground, with the tops or flowers uppermost, which was not only as soft as a feather-bed, but very refreshing and restorative after fatigue. Their weapons were an iron bonnet or skull-cap, a habergeon reaching almost to the knees, bows and forked arrows, and axes. Their musical instruments were harps, clarshoes, and bagpipes. The richer people of these isles adorned their harps and clarshoes with silver and precious stones, and the poor with crystal; and the chief amusement of all classes was singing songs, recording the deeds and praises of the brave. Such, finally, was the healthiness of these insular climates, and the remarkable longevity of the inhabitants, that, according to a monkish authority quoted in Monipenny's Chronicle, they generally lived till they were quite weary of life.

The Highlanders, although they lived more in the neighborhood of improvement, and constituted a more important part of the Scottish population, were not superior in knowledge and refinement to the islesmen, while they were much more sanguinary in character. They were governed by the patriarchal system in its worst of forms; their fierce, though paltry, wars of clanship as effectually secluded them from the civilization of the Lowlands as the storms of the northern seas could have done; and when they descended into the plains, it was only by hurried visits, and for hostile purposes. This character became so permanent that the following description which John Eldar, a clergyman and a native of Caithness, gave to Henry VIII. of life in the Highlands, was equally correct nearly two centuries later.[1] Their chief occupation (when they were not cutting each other's throats, or plundering the Lowlands) was hunting; and their principal amusements were running, leaping, swimming, shooting, and throwing darts. The Highlanders were called Rough-footed Scots by the English, and Red-shanks by the Lowlanders, from the shoes they wore, and which were made in a very summary fashion. When the red deer was killed, and the hide flayed warm from the animal, the person wanting a pair of shoes placed his foot on the skin, and cut by that measure a sufficient quantity of hide to cover the foot and the ancle. A few thongs were then pared from the same material to lace up the shoe, and holes were pricked in the sole to let out the water. Even this extemporaneous buskin, however, seems to have been a luxury, and the Celt, unless the weather was very cold, generally went barefoot. As the Highlanders sowed little corn, and despised the unwarlike occupations of husbandry, animal food composed their chief subsistence; and, in addition to the sheep and beeves which they lifted from the Lowland pastures, they had abundance of all kinds of game. When hunting, we are informed, they dressed their venison by pressing the raw flesh between boards, or hazel-rods until the blood was wrung out, after which they devoured it without further cookery.[2]

Besides these Norse and Celtic races, there were the Borderers, an equally distinct community, at least as far as their mode of life marked them out from the bulk of the nation. These people, living upon the edge of the kingdom, and always exposed to the first brunt of an English invasion, resembled more the forlorn hope of an army than a settled population, and not only their habits, but their sports, were imbued with the recklessness and ferocity of such a military position. As they found it useless to build regular houses, which the first onslaught of the enemy would demolish, any temporary wigwam contented them; and as it was equally a waste of time to sow their fields, they reaped with the sword the fields of the neighboring English counties. Sometimes, however, they found the opposite border so well guarded that a sheaf of arrows rather than one of corn was ready to welcome them. In this case the Scottish borderers did not greatly perplex themselves about ways and means; they turned and fell upon the fields and cattle of their own countrymen, and thus supplied their wants at the expense of the inland farmers. This plundering of friend and foe they softened with the gentle name of "a little shifting for their living," and many of the border chiefs found the practice so profitable that they reduced it to a regular system. They gathered troops of needy and dissolute followers.

built strong towers in some situation of difficult approach, and either swept both sides of the border without distinction, or obliged the landholders to compound for immunity by the payment of an annual black-mail. The kings of Scotland were seldom powerful enough to repress these disorders; nor was the bold, adventurous life of the borderers without its use in raising and preserving a hardy militia for the defense of the national outposts. But James IV. and his successor, who saw the permanent evils entailed by such a system, commenced an unsparing warfare against these robber chieftains, and either drove them across the border or hanged them over the gates of their own castles. In their justiciary progresses, which were conducted under the show of a hunt, or party of pleasure, these sovereigns were attended not only by knights, judges, and guards, but also by hunters, falconers, and morris-dancers, and thus the thieves were unaware of the real purpose of the expedition until they were surprised in their dens. On one of these occasions, as James V. was making a progress, John Armstrong of Gilnockie, a celebrated border chief and border freebooter, presuming upon the services he could render to the king, advanced to meet him at the head of a train of forty-eight gentlemen, whose dress and equipments rivaled those of a royal following. James, astonished at the glitter of this approach, imagined that some English or foreign prince was at hand; but when he discovered that it was only an overproud caitiff, whom he had outlawed and vowed to punish, his rage burst forth in the following couplet:

What wants this knave
That a king should have?

and he immediately ordered John and his merry men to be hanged without further ceremony. The Regent Murray was one of the sternest suppressors of the border moss-troopers, whom he caused to be hanged or drowned by dozens; but, after his death, they again became as unruly as ever. James, on his accession to the English crown, ordered that no borderer of England or Scotland should wear any kind of weapon, offensive or defensive, except a knife of no more than a certain length, with which to cut his victuals, and keep no horse, gelding, or mare, above the value of forty shillings. By this act the occupation of a border thief was gone, as he was effectually dismounted and disarmed; and the border itself, in consequence, at last became as peaceable as any other part of the British dominions.[1]

The reformation of religion in Scotland was the commencement of a new era in the manners and customs of the people. The Protestant clergy, in beginning their warfare against the ancient national faith, had no idea of compromise or gradual change, like their brethren of England; instead of this they laid the ax to the root, and, after demolishing churches and monasteries, they waged the same war of extermination against every practice, custom, or ceremony that was in any way identified with the hostile creed. As soon, therefore, as they had proscribed the tenets, and banished the ceremonies, of popery, the victory was followed up by an irresistible attack upon masques, pageants, and plays, merry meetings and festivals, and all kinds of cheerful music and dancing, which last amusements the leader of the Scottish Reformation had contemptuously branded by the names of "fiddling and flinging."[1] The ground being thus cleared, Presbyterianism became paramount, and then every church court and parish session was a sort of inquisition, before which not only greater offenders were cited, but all those who came short of certain qualifications which were thought essential for true professors of the gospel. Thus the anathema of the church was leveled against all who had a crucifix or popish painting in their possession, all who were guilty of excess at a feast, all who spent too much at a wedding, all who held or attended cheerful processions, or mingled in promiscuous dances, as well as against adultery, sacrilege, and murder. But this was not enough. Domestic life was invaded and its privacies explored, while every corner and cranny was rummaged in which sin could be supposed to find shelter. Even non-attendance on church, rashness in speech, an unadvised word, were all matters of ecclesiastical inquest. The kirk-session, also, soon became almost as powerful to punish as they were vigilant to detect. Besides having the sackcloth garment, the pillar of repentance, and the branks[2] under their entire control, as also the power of fining adult and scourging juvenile offenders, they could deliver a culprit to the secular arm with a recommendation (which was tantamount to a positive command) that he should be pilloried, imprisoned, whipped, or banished disgracefully by beat of drum. Gayety and mirth of every kind were soon sobered by this ghostly domination, and the land was pervaded by a general gloom. The political events of the seventeenth century only tended to impress this character more deeply upon the nation. The Scotch, on the transference of their king and court to England, clung the more eagerly to their church: having lost for a time their national politics, theology was adopted to fill up the void. On the subsequent attempts of the court to make episcopacy paramount in Scotland, the people regarded the degradation of their kirk as an attempt to annihilate their national independence, and in that spirit they rallied round the Covenant with tenfold ardor. In the struggle that followed, the Scots, as might have been expected, only became more strictly Calvinistic and Presbyterian than ever, and a stern brow and austere demeanor were cultivated, as evidences not only of sound religion, but of true patriotism.

[2] The branks was an instrument used for the punishment of scolds. It was a sort of headpiece, composed of iron hoops, and furnished with a gag of the same metal; and when the head of the culprit was secured and the tongue made fast, the whole was closed by a padlock, by which a painful silence was inflicted for any given time. Some of these instruments, though long disused, are still preserved in churches. A representation of one of them, which the author was shown at Newcastle, in 1787, is given by Lackington, the bookseller, in his Memoirs of his Life, 8vo. 1791, p. 285.

CHAPTER VII.

HISTORY OF THE CONDITION OF THE PEOPLE.

IT may be said that every second century since the foundation of the monarchy has witnessed the consummation of a great revolution in the political state of England. In the middle of the eleventh century the Norman Conquest overthrew the comparatively free old Saxon constitution, and completed the establishment of feudalism; in the middle of the thirteenth, the insurrection of Simon de Montfort and the barons against Henry III. put an end to the exclusive domination of the crown and the nobility, by introducing into the government the principle of popular representation; in the middle of the fifteenth, the wars of the Roses almost annihilated the power of the aristocracy, and left the crown and the commons to contend together for the supremacy; and finally, in the middle of the seventeenth, the success of the Great Rebellion decided that contest in favor of the commons.

It will thus be found that, for the first two hundred years after the Conquest, the government was a monarchy balanced by an aristocracy, or a system in which, according to the character of the king and other varying circumstances, sometimes the crown had the upper hand, sometimes the barons; that, for the next two centuries, the commons, or rather the middle classes, consisting of the inferior landholders and gentry, and the mercantile and moneyed community, had both a nominal and, also, to a considerable extent, a real share in the government, although still rather as allies and supporters at one time of the crown, at another of the aristocracy, than as an independent force; and that for the third space of about the same length, the power of the nobility as a distinct body in the state being almost wholly destroyed, the government came to be either a simple monarchy, so long as the crown kept the mastery over the commons, or a simple democracy (of the middle classes) after the commons succeeded in their turn in acquiring the mastery over the crown. It can scarcely be said that there was any interval between these two last-mentioned conditions, in which monarchy and democracy, tempering each other, were combined into any system of proper antagonism or mutual check and support.

The succession of these changes may be otherwise stated, thus:—from the middle of the eleventh to the middle of the thirteenth century the government was a contest between the monarchic and the aristocratic principles; from the middle of the thirteenth to the middle of the fifteenth century it was still the same contest, with this difference, that the democratic principle (in the particular modification in which alone it had as yet manifested itself) was called in as an auxiliary by each of the others, and that, having first assisted the aristocracy in restraining the power of the crown, it was afterward employed by the crown to aid the course of circumstances in breaking and eventually destroying the power of the aristocracy; and that, from the middle of the fifteenth to the middle of the seventeenth century, the monarchic and democratic principles were those between which the contest was waged.

If we look more closely at the course of events we shall further find that each of these three eras is divisible into three parts, which may be severally regarded as the successive stages in which first the one of the two contending principles predominated, then the battle wavered, and finally victory declared itself for the other. Thus, in the first era, the monarchic principle maintained the supremacy for the space of about seventy years that elapsed from the Conquest to the death of Henry I.; for the next sixty-five years, extending to the death of Richard I., the crown was obliged to share the supreme power with the nobility and the church (properly a branch of the nobility); and for the remaining space of about the same length, carrying us to the new constitution established by Simon de Montfort, the barons kept the crown in subjection, extorting from it the Great Charter and various other concessions. In the second era, where three elements were in action, the movements of the game are more complicated, and its different phases blend or intermix more with one another; but still we may perceive the crown, notwithstanding the energy of Edward I., to be kept more than afterward in check by the barons, with the aid of the commons, throughout the space of somewhat above sixty years which preceded the accession of Edward III.; then, for about seventy years more, comprising the reigns of that king and his grandson, a suspension of the contest in any violent form, with little change of position in the two principal parties; and, lastly, in the space of between sixty and seventy years filled by the rule of the House of Lancaster, the power of the aristocracy first undermined and visibly shaken by the gradual approximation of the commons to the crown, and then more rapidly crumbling to ruin in the convulsion of the civil war between the two competitors for the throne. In like manner, in the third era, we have first a space of about seventy years, from the accession of Edward IV. to the destruction of the Romish church by Henry VIII., in which the crown was employed, not so much in putting down the active opposition (for of that there was now little or none) as in disencumbering itself of the mere inert rubbish of the old strength of aristocracy and feudalism; then another term of about the same length, to the end of the reign of Elizabeth, in which monarchy and democracy, now the sole occupants of the field, rather made preparation for than actually began to wage their inevitable struggle; and last of all the somewhat shorter space forming the period we are now reviewing, over the whole of which that struggle, in a state of less or more activity, may be considered as extending.

Thus each of these successive political conditions has subsisted for about the ordinary term of an entire human life; or for the space of time in which it is reckoned that two generations are brought into existence, and, of course, as many pass away. Every second generation, therefore, on arriving at middle age, has found itself in a new political condition. In other words, of two successive generations, the one born at the commencement, the other at the middle, of the space over which each particular condition has stretched, only the former has spent the whole of life under that condition; the latter has entered upon or has made for itself a new condition by the time the half of its days has been spent. Perhaps the difference in the original circumstances of the two generations may, in part, account for the one having thus been regularly conservative, the other innovating. The men born at the commencement of the existing order of things have known it in the bright days of its vernal promise, and regard it besides as almost of their own creation, or as something identified with themselves, simply on the score of they and it having grown up together; their sons have seen it only in the dimness and disappointment of its decline, with the gloss of novelty not only all worn off, but probably converted into rust and clogging corruption, and, instead of any attachment to it as a system of their own setting up, or whose growth has been coincident with theirs, they are rather apt to be impatient of it as that which has done its office and has no more business in the world—as a worn-out and obsolete organization with which their habits and feelings jar and jostle at all points. They are young, and it is old; it belongs properly to one age, they to another. Thus it happens that, while the one generation, on arriving at manhood, is naturally inclined to maintain things as they are—to make its present out of the past—the other is as naturally and as strongly impelled, on attaining the age of action, to seek its present in the future—to abandon the certainty of the ancient ways for the chances of a new and untried career. Of course, the greater length of time that the existing order of things has lasted when it comes to their turn to deal with it makes it the easier for them to effect its modification; for change is the law of all things here below, and the longer any system—political or of whatever other kind—has been in operation, the more ready is it for transmutation into something else.

It appears, then, that, although a notion of political freedom of a much wider scope may have always survived from the time of the Saxons in the form of a popular instinct, yet the first alleviation of the absolute power of the crown that was actually realized in England consisted only in the transference of a part of that power into the hands of the nobility. At this time the barons were the only representatives the people either had or desired; no higher idea of good government was entertained by the rest of the nation than that it consisted in a combination of monarchy and aristocracy. To this point only had the national aspirations reached even at the date of the extorting of the Great Charter a century and a half after the Conquest. That instrument, then the full accomplishment of the national demands and wishes, left the constitution, in so far as the people were concerned, the same as it had been left by the Conqueror; the only difference was, that in the time of William the crown kept the barons in subjection, whereas now, under John, the barons had gotten the mastery over the crown. The advantages that fell to the share of the people were only indirect and accidental; they obtained some securities against oppression by the government, but any share in the government they neither obtained nor seem to have thought of putting in a claim for. And even after the principle of popular representation was brought into action, it had various stages of growth to pass through before it became what we now understand it to mean. For a long time the so-called representatives of the people were little more than the subservient auxiliaries at one time of the barons against the crown, at another of the crown against the barons; after which, on the destruction of the power of the aristocracy under the first two Tudors, they were brought down for a season to the still humbler position of the mere slaves or instruments of the crown—the most obedient agents and convenient supporters of its tyranny. This, however, was an accidental and unnatural state of things, which could not last long; for, whatever might be the appearances of the moment, the real and ultimate tendency of the mighty revolutions in church and state which distinguished the earlier part of the sixteenth century, of those of them even to which the royal power chiefly owed its present aggrandizement—the overthrow first of feudalism and then of popery—as well as the growth and extension, produced by various causes, of manufactures, commerce, and wealth, was neither aristocratic nor monarchical, but democratic, or favorable to the development and onward movement of the popular principle in the constitution; and, accordingly, the later half of that century, comprising the whole of the reign of Elizabeth, when an orderly and stable government at length succeeded to the weakness and confusion which the storm of the Reformation had left behind it, may be considered as the age in which the feeling first fairly rooted itself and grew up in men's minds that the Commons' House was a power in the state coördinate with the House of Lords and the crown, and of right wholly independent of either. This feeling, indeed, as has happened with every other great principle that has impelled or agitated the world, remained for the first stage of its existence little more than a mere aspiration or article of faith: it had to diffuse itself and to gain the hearts of men before it could move either their hands or their tongues; and, accordingly, so long as Elizabeth lived, the House of Commons rather, as we have said, made preparation for assuming its due position, or intimated its intention of assuming it on the first favorable opportunity, than decidedly asserted or attempted to exercise its rights. But as soon as the scepter had fallen from the hand of the last and greatest of the Tudors into that of the first and feeblest of the Stuarts—from that of the manly queen into that of the womanly king—the struggle began in good earnest between the commons and the crown—between the principles of monarchy and this earliest kind of democracy. .

First, for a space of about nineteen years, bringing us down to James's hasty dissolution of his third parliament, in January, 1622, and the violent measures by which that act was accompanied, we have the two parties engaged, with little intermission, in an active trial of strength with each other—the king striving to maintain the same system of government, that, namely, of a dominant prerogative and a subservient parliament, which had been hitherto submitted to; the Commons endeavoring to establish in the practice of the constitution what they had long held to be the principle of the constitution—their entire independence of and coordinate authority with the crown. His position gave the king the advantage in this contest so far as to enable him to terminate it for the present in his own favor; but such victories over the spirit of the age and the natural progress and tendency of events are always, in the long run, fatal to the power that achieves them: by damming up the current which it can neither dry up nor divert, it only accumulates a force for its own more sure destruction. For another term of about nineteen years the royal authority remained supreme; a few more endeavors were made to bring back the House of Commons under its old yoke, which failing, parliaments were dispensed with altogether, and the crown, governing alone, seemed to be more powerful than even in the days of Henry VIII. But then, with the opening of the Long Parliament, came down the gathered strength of the democratic principle in a roaring torrent which speedily carried every thing before it; the Commons now demanding no longer mere independence of and equality with the crown, but supremacy over it, and, quickly after, the sole power in the state. And this attitude democracy preserved, in theory at least, and it may also be said in form—for the protectorate itself was only democracy enthroned—throughout another space of about nineteen years.

But the thing which is especially to be noted as distinguishing the portion of the contest between the crown and the commons which fills the present period, is, that it was now for the first time that the idea sprung up of the great body of the people having any political rights. That idea was unknown to the liberalism of the sixteenth century, which, as already observed, looked no farther than to the political emancipation of the middle classes. The age of the Civil War and of the Commonwealth is that of the birth of genuine democracy in England—of the principle that the laboring classes as well as their superiors ought to have a voice in the legislature. The novel doctrine, indeed, remained little more than a mere speculation throughout the present period, for it can not be said to have been practically recognized in any of the constitutions through which the country passed between the destruction and the restoration of the ancient government; and it may be that it has not yet been either so recognized to any considerable extent, or even reduced as a theory to a shape so definite and so generally concurred in, as to make its recognition posssible. But, still, for the last two centuries, the spirit of democracy, understood in this sense, has been a living and active principle of English politics; and the growth of opinion in favor of popular government has been such that no system of government can now be defended on any other professed grounds than that of its tendency, if not to place power in the hands, at least to promote the welfare, of the great mass of the population.

From the present period, therefore, we may date the commencement of the political emancipation of the laboring classes, as of that of the middle classes from the last. And this single fact of the birth of true democracy in the earlier part of the seventeenth century may be taken as a sure indication and evidence that the general social improvement of the country had by this time penetrated down from the middle to the working classes, and that the condition of the latter was now beginning to be elevated by the extension of trade and manufactures in the same manner as that of the former had beeu in the preceding century.

There can be no doubt, indeed, that throughout the first two thirds of the present period, comprising the whole of the reign of James, and the earlier part of that of Charles, the laboring population of England were in the enjoyment of an ampler measure of comfort than had fallen to their lot in any former age. This was primarily the consequence of the wise and successful government of Elizabeth, and of the broad foundations of national prosperity that were then laid; a prosperity which the long continuance of peace that followed under James allowed to deepen and extend itself—that long peace, however, being also in the main a bequest of the preceding reign, in which the country had been raised to so high a pitch of glory that it could afford to stand for many years even the pusillanimous policy of the new king. The union, also, of the two divisions of the island into one kingdom contributed something to the internal quiet of both. And as for the absolute character of the government, that was a grievance which for a long time, however galling to the patriotic feeling of the country, did not press severely upon any of the interests of the national industry; even the occasional acts of oppression which proceeded from the court, or from the unconstitutional tribunals it had set up, fell, of course, only upon individuals, and interfered little with either the gains or the enjoyments of the great mass of the people. The persons who suffered most as a class were the Puritans; but in many parts of the kingdom there were no Puritans, and they formed nowhere more than a mere sprinkling of the population before the commencement of the Civil War, nor were even they ever subjected to any general persecution. Individuals of their number were fined and imprisoned; but what they had chiefly to complain of as a body was merely their exclusion from certain civil rights, and the opposition of some of the existing institutions in church and state to their peculiar notions and tenets—vexations and hardships not of a sort greatly to affect their well-doing in their ordinary worldly callings. Indeed, such a revolution as that which overthrew the English monarchy in the seventeenth century would seem to be the natural offspring rather of public ease and plenty than of the opposite state of things, and to require a considerable amount of national prosperity and accumulated wealth as the condition of its being undertaken. It bore in none of its features the character of a wild outbreak of hunger or any other kind of popular wretchedness; no cry for bread on the part of the people was heard in any stage of it; it was from beginning to end a war of opinions and principles—a contest about right and wrong, not a scramble for food or a quarrel about pounds, shillings, and pence. The only shape in which the question of property came to be agitated was with reference to how the people might best secure the possession of the property they had already acquired, or had in their hands the means of acquiring. If the subject of taxation had a prominent place among the national grievances, it was the mode of it, not the amount of it, that was complained of; the twenty shillings he was charged for ship-money was nothing to Hampden, but his being charged for ship-money at all was in principle, in his estimation and in that of those who sided with him, as much a wrong, and therefore as much to be resisted, as if he had been pillaged by the government of half his estate. But that such a temper should be generally diffused it needed that wealth or the comforts of life also should be generally diffused; for a people will not take up and act upon these superlatively-refined notions of their political rights till after they have become somewhat pampered by ease and prosperity, and been made jealous and sensitive of the first advances of arbitrary government by having much to lose.

The picture which Clarendon has drawn of the economical condition of the kingdom for a considerable time before the breaking out of the war between the king and the parliament, is marked by some strokes which his party feelings have thrown in; but, if we divest it of these, it is probably very little overcharged. "For twelve years before the meeting of the Long Parliament," he observes, "the kingdom enjoyed the greatest calm, and the fullest measure of felicity, that any people in any age, for so long time together, have been blessed with, to the wonder and envy of all the other parts of Christendom." "The happiness of the times I now mention," he continues, "was invidiously set off by this distinction, that every other kingdom, every other state were entangled, and some almost destroyed, by the rage and fury of arms; those who were engaged in an ambitious contention with their neighbors having the view and apprehensions of the miseries and desolation which they saw other states suffer by a civil war; while the kingdoms we now lament were alone looked upon as the garden of the world. Scotland (which was but the wilderness of that garden) in a full, entire, and undisturbed peace, which they had never seen—the rage and barbarism of their private feuds being composed to the reverence and awe of public justice—in a competency, if not in an excess of plenty, which they had never hoped to see, and in a temper (which was the utmost that in those days was desired or hoped for) free from rebellion. Ireland, which had been a sponge to draw, and a gulf to swallow, all that could be spared, and all that could be got, from England, merely to keep the reputation of a kingdom, reduced to that good degree of husbandry and government, that it not only subsisted of itself, and gave this kingdom all that it might have expected from it, but really increased the revenue of the crown forty or fifty thousand pounds a-year, besides a considerable advantage to the people by the traffic and trade from thence—arts and sciences fruitfully planted there; and the whole nation beginning to be so civilized, that it was a jewel of great luster in the royal diadem. When these outworks were thus fortified and adorned, it was no wonder if England was generally thought secure, with the advantages of its own climate—the court in great plenty, or rather (which is the discredit of plenty) excess and luxury—the country rich, and, which is more, fully enjoying the pleasure of its own wealth, and so the easier corrupted with the pride and wantonness of it; . . . . . trade increased to that degree that we were the exchange of Christendom (the revenue from thence to the crown being almost double to what it had been in the best times), and the bullion of neighbor kingdoms brought to receive a stamp from the mint of England; foreign merchants looking upon nothing so much their own as what they had laid up in the warehouses of this kingdom; the royal navy, in number and equipage much above former times, very formidable at sea; and the reputation of the greatness and power of the king much more with foreign princes than any of his progenitors; for those rough courses which made him perhaps less loved at home, made him more feared abroad, by how much the power of kingdoms is more reverenced than their justice by their neighbors; and it may be this consideration might not be the least motive, and may not be the worst excuse, for those counsels."[1]

If we go into details, we shall find that the particular circumstances which influenced the economical

condition of the country during the present period were nearly the same that were in action in the last, and that they continued to operate very much as before, though some of them perhaps with diminished, others with augmented force.[1]

The rate of increase in the numbers of the people —in ordinary circumstances at once the simplest and the most decisive test of the general prosperity —was probably even greater during the first forty years of the seventeenth century than during the last forty of the sixteenth. In 1662 John Grant, in his Observations on the Bills of Mortality, calculated the population of England and Wales at not far from six millions and a half; and Lord Chief Justice Hale, in his Origination of Mankind Considered, written in 1670, assumes that it was then not less than seven millions. The books of the hearth-tax in 1665 are stated to have shown the number of inhabited houses to be 1,230,000, which would give a population of more than six millions and a half, without allowing for omissions, if we suppose the number of inhabitants in each house to be five and two fifths, which appears to be the lowest average that could then be assigned for the whole kingdom.[2] On the whole, we can not set down the population of England at the Restoration at much under six millions and a half, nor at less than six millions at the commencement of the Civil War; so that, if we suppose it to have very little exceeded five millions at the death of Elizabeth,[3] the increase in the intervening forty years had been little less than a million. During the five or six years of intestine disturbance and confusion that followed, it probably retrograded rather than advanced; but, as always happens in such circumstances, it would only for that, when its tide turned, advance the faster, till the vacuum was filled up; so that the rate of increase on the whole eighteen or twenty years extending to the Restoration continuing the same as before, the six millions would, by the end of that time, have become six millions and a half, as we have supposed.

While the general population of the kingdom, however, was thus undoubtedly on the increase, appearances in particular localities continued to indicate the reverse, and to furnish texts for many a plausible lamentation over the depopulation and decay of the country, just as in the preceding period, and, indeed, in every period of the world's history.[4] Trade, as its nature is, constantly developing new energies and finding out new fields of enterprise, of course shifted its haunts according to the exigency of circumstances. Thus it appears that while the growth of manufactures and of intercourse with distant parts of the earth was beginning to give importance to other places that had heretofore been of little note, most of the old sea-ports on the eastern and southern coast, which, so long as our foreign trade was confined to the opposite coasts of France, Holland, and Germany, had been among the busiest and most prosperous towns in the kingdom, were already falling into that declining state in which, with few exceptions, they have continued to the present day. A pamphlet, recommending the encouragement of the herring fishery, published in 1614, particularly mentions Colchester, Harwich, Orford, Aldborough, Dunwich, Warderswich, Southwold, Yarmouth, Blackley, Wells (in Norfolk), Lynne, Boston, and Hull, as reduced to an exceedingly poor and beggarly condition.[1] When a new tax was imposed by the parliament it continued to be the practice to exempt or make remissions to certain towns on account of the poverty and decay into which they had fallen: thus, an act of 1624, granting certain subsidies to his majesty, directs, in nearly the same form of words which had for many years been used in all such grants, that the amount of £6000 should be deducted from each tenth and fifteenth, "in relief, comfort, and discharge of the poor towns, cities, and boroughs of this your said realm, wasted, desolate, or destroyed, or over greatly impoverished, after such rate as was and hath before this time been had and made to every shire, and to be divided in such manner and form as heretofore for one whole fifteen and tenth hath been had and divided."[2] But, notwithstanding a few instances of exception, the evidences of the general advance of population, as well as of wealth, at this time, were visible to all clear and impartial eyes. "The act," to quote the summary of a modern writer, "which in 1623 reduced the interest of money to eight per cent. from ten, shows sufficiently, even against the preamble of it, that complains of decline, how much the nation had prospered, and was then advancing to a higher state of improvement. Such laws can never be safely enacted till all parties, the lenders, as well as the borrowers, are properly prepared to receive them. The cheerfulness of honest Stow led him to see and to represent the state of England during the reign of James as it really was. He says, as Camden had said before him in 1580, that it would in time be incredible, were there not due mention made of it, what great increase there is within these few years of commerce and wealth throughout the kingdom; of the great building of royal and mercantile ships; of the repeopling of cities, towns, and villages; besides the sudden augmentation of fair and costly buildings."[3]

Some idea of the state of the kingdom in different localities, in respect of wealth and population, in the reign of James I., as compared with its state at present, may be gathered from a few notices in Camden's Britannia, the last edition of which, published in the lifetime of the author, appeared in 1607. Plymouth is described as having grown up in the last age from a small fisher-village: the adjoin-

Chalmers (Estimate, p. 43) has represented this as a grant "for the reparation of decaying cities and towns . . . though," he adds, "it is not easy to tell how the money was actually applied." And Anderson and Macpherson seem to have understood the clause in the same sense.—See Macpherson's Annals of Commerce (here transcribed from Anderson), ii. 326. There can be no doubt, we apprehend, that the relief was merely an exemption from a part of the tax allowed to certain towns.

ing town of Devonport, now containing fifty thousand inhabitants, existed, if at all, only as a suburb of Plymouth, which itself is stated to be not very large; indeed, it had only one church till about the year 1640. Lynne, of which the population now amounts to nearly four thousand souls, is described as a little town, scarcely to be called a sea-port, though frequented by fishermen; and Poole, of which the present population is not much under nine thousand, had been in the preceding age merely a sedge-plot with a few fishermen's huts, and was as yet only a small town, though having some fair buildings and a well-frequented market. Portsmouth is described as being very populous in time of war, but not so in time of peace: it had only one church, an ancient building. Brighton, now having between forty and fifty thousand inhabitants, is merely mentioned, by the name of Brighthelmsted, as a station on the coast. Yarmouth had as yet but one church; and Lynne, though only of comparatively recent origin, was, "for the number of merchants, beauty of buildings, and wealth of the citizens, beyond dispute the best town" in Norfolk, with the exception only of Norwich, which, although still a large and populous place, was considerably declined from its ancient greatness, its fifty churches having been reduced to between thirty and forty. Lincoln was still more decayed: "It is incredible," says Camden of this town, "how it hath sunk, by degrees, under the weight of time; for of fifty churches that were remembered in it by our grandfathers, there are now scarce eighteen remaining." Birmingham, called Bremicham, is described as already "swarming with inhabitants, and echoing with the noise of anvils;" but its population was as yet probably not a twentieth part of what it now is. Halifax, with its single parish church, already contained about twelve thousand inhabitants: "so that," continues the account, "the parishioners are wont to say that they can reckon more men in their parish than any kind of animal whatever; whereas, in the most fruitful places of England elsewhere, one shall find thousands of sheep, but so few men in proportion, that one would think they had given place to sheep and oxen, or were devoured by them. The industry of the inhabitants is also admirable, who, notwithstanding an unprofitable, barren soil, not fit to live in, have so flourished by the cloth trade (which within these seventy years they first fell to) that they are very rich, and have gained a reputation for it above their neighbors; which confirms the truth of that old observation, that a barren country is a great whet to the industry of the natives, by which we find that Norinberg in Germany, Venice and Genoa in Italy, and, lastly, Limoges in France (all situated in barren soils) have ever been very flourishing cities." As a proof of "the vast growth and increase of this town," an old account is afterward quoted, by which it appears that, in 1443, there were only thirteen houses in Halifax; and that, in 1566, this small population had increased to "above five hundred and twenty householders that kept fires and answered the vicar." Sheffield is described as "remarkable, among other little towns hereabouts, for blacksmiths. great plenty of iron being dug in these parts;" and this reputation the place had had for centuries before; for Chaucer, in his Canterbury Tales, has armed his Miller of Trompington with a Sheffield knife:

A Shefeld thwitel bare he in his hose.[1]

Bradford, now a town with forty thousand inhabitants, is merely named; Huddersfield, with half as many, is not mentioned at all. Hull, though a place of no great antiquity, "by degrees," says Camden, "has grown to such a figure, that for stately buildings, strong forts, rich fleets, resort of merchants, and plenty of all things, it is the most celebrated mart-town in these parts. All this increase is owing partly to Michael de la Pole, who, upon his advancement to the earldom of Suffolk, by King Richard II.,[2] procured them their privileges, and partly to their trade of Iceland fish dried and hardened, and by them called stock-fish, which has strangely enriched the town." A few years later than this, however, as we have seen above, Hull had begun to be reckoned among the places of declining trade and population. Beverly was also already a very large and populous town: its flourishing condition is attributed to a privilege the inhabitants had of paying no toll or custom in any port or town of England. Sunderland was then an obscure village, and is not even mentioned by Camden. The part of the kingdom lying "beyond the mountains toward the Western Ocean" he seems to regard not only as a foreign, but as hardly a civilized country. "And first," he says, "of the people of Lancashire, whom I approach with a kind of dread: may it forbode no ill. . . . . However, that I may not seem wanting to this county, I will run the hazard of the attempt; hoping that the divine assistance, which hath favored me in the rest, will not fail me in this." Proceeding, accordingly, to his survey, he describes Rochdale as "a market-town of no small resort;" Bury as another no way inferior to it; and Manchester as surpassing "all the towns hereabouts in building, populousness, woolen manufacture, market-place, and church." Liverpool is merely noticed under the name of Litherpoole, commonly shortened into Lirpool, as "the most convenient and usual place for setting sail into Ireland; but not so eminent for antiquity as for neatness and populousness." Of Lancaster it is said, "At present the town is not populous, and the inhabitants thereof are all husbandmen; for the grounds about it are well cultivated, open and fresh, and without any want of wood." Preston is called "a large town, handsome and populous for these parts;" Blackburn is merely mentioned; Ashton, Bolton, Oldham, Salford, and several more places, now containing each from eight or ten to above fifty thousand inhabitants, are not even mentioned, existing, as they did, if at all, merely as obscure and insignificant villages. Kendal is described as "a very populous town," with "two streets crossing each other," and as "very eminent for the woolen manufacture, and for the industry of the inhabitants, who trade throughout England with their woolen cloth." Appleby was already fallen into the same decay in which it still remains: "Nothing," says Camden, "is memorable about it besides its antiquity and situation. . . . . It is so slenderly peopled, and the buildings are so mean, that if antiquity did not make it the chief town of the county, and the assizes were not held in the castle, which is the chief jail for malefactors, it would be but very little above a village." Whitehaven, now containing fifteen thousand inhabitants, is not mentioned. Newcastle is called the glory of all the towns in Northumberland, and is represented as being a very thriving place, and rapidly increasing—carrying on a great trade both with the opposite coasts of the continent, and with other parts of England, especially in sea-coal, of which the surrounding country yielded great abundance. Camden, however, maintains that the condition and manners of the Northumbrians on the Border still continued the same as they had been described by Æneas Sylvius (afterward Pope Pius II.), who passed through this county on his return from Scotland, which he had visited as legate, in the middle of the fifteenth century. "A certain river," says his narrative, "falling from a high mountain, parts the two kingdoms, over which Æneas ferried; and, coming to a large village about sunset, he alighted at a countryman's house, where he supped with the curate of the place and his host. The table was plentifully furnished with pottage, hens, and geese; but nothing of either bread or wine appeared. All the men and women of the town flocked in, as to some strange sight; and as our countrymen use to admire the Æthiopians or Indians, so these people stared at Æneas, asking the curate what countryman he was?—what his errand could be?—and whether he were a Christian or no? But Æneas, being aware of the scarcity he should meet with on this road, had been accommodated by a monastery with a rundlet of red wine and some loaves of bread. When these were brought to the table they were more astonished than before, having never seen either wine or white bread." The account goes on to relate that men and their wives came crowding round the table, and, handling the bread and smelling to the wine, begged with such importunity to taste the unknown fare, that there was nothing for it but to deal the whole among them. At last, at a late hour, all the men, including both the curate and the host, ran off in a body, saying they were going to take refuge in a tower at some distance off, for fear of the Scots, who were accustomed to cross the river at low-water in the night, for the purpose of attacking and plundering them. But although they carried the children with them, they left the women, notwithstanding that several of them, both wives and maids, were very handsome, not thinking, it seems, that they would take much harm from any treatment they were likely to receive at the hands of the Scots. Nor would they by any means be persuaded to take the legate himself along with them, though he very importunately besought them to do so. "Thus," he continues, "Æneas was left alone, with only two servants and a guide, among a hundred women, who, sitting in a ring, with a fire in the middle of them, spent the night sleepless in dressing of hemp and chatting with the interpreter. When the night was well advanced they heard a mighty noise of dogs barking and geese gagling; whereupon the women slipped off several ways, and the guide run away, and all was in such confusion as if the enemy had been upon them. But Æneas thought it his wisest course to keep close in his bedchamber, which was a stable, and there await the issue; lest, running out, and being unacquainted with the country, he should be robbed by the first man he met. Presently, both the women and the guide return, acquainting them that all was well, and that they were friends, and no enemies, who were arrived." This is rather like a description of savage life than of the rudest form of civilization; but the narrative betrays, if not the proverbial exaggeration of a traveler, at least the ignorant wonder of a foreigner; and Æneas, though he may not have materially misstated what he actually saw, has probably mistaken the meaning of many things. Nor is it easy to believe, notwithstanding Camden's assertion, that the borderers had not made a considerable advance in civilization in the space of more than a century and a half that had elapsed since their wild condition and manners had astonished the literary and elegant Italian.

Little precise information is to be recovered respecting the state of the country during the war between the king and the parliament, the historians, as usual, confining their details almost exclusively to parliamentary and military operations; but of course this must have been a time of general pressure and suffering among all classes. As far, however, as can be gathered from the accounts that have come down to us, it does not appear that there was ever, for even the shortest period, any general interruption of the industry of the kingdom, or that the mechanism of society was ever suspended or seriously deranged in any of its ordinary movements. The laws for the punishment of crime continued to be administered, except in so far as the necessities, and no doubt also sometimes the license, of war gave impunity to many acts that, at another time, would have been prevented or visited penally; and the fields were cultivated, and every kind of handicraft plied, as usual, except only in the few localities which were actually at any particular moment the scenes of military operations—the ground on which a battle was fought or a siege was carried on. At one time or other, however, nearly every part of England, Scotland, and Ireland felt the burning plowshare of war in the course of the ten years that followed the raising of the royal standard at Nottingham, in August, 1642; and while some towns and districts were kept in a state of constant commotion or military occupation during a great part of that time, others were in shorter space half ruined by a sharper visitation. Then the extraordinary pecuniary exactions to which the nation was subjected were such as would have been severely felt even in the most flourishing condition of trade and industry, and must have proved doubly oppressive in such a time of general embarrassment and the partial stopping up of most of the channels in which the wealth of the country had been accustomed to flow. Another great evil would be the multitude of persons, who, torn from their usual occupations by the military levies, or thrown loose from them by the shock given to the whole fabric of the national industry, would go to swell the crew of idlers and vagrants living upon beggary and plunder, and to spread the hotbed of dissoluteness and crime. All this could not fail to produce not only much individual suffering, but for a time a feebleness and lethargy of all the forces of the social system, and a retrograde movement both of the wealth and the population of the country.

But the recovery of the country from this temporary fever and languor was followed by a health and strength that speedily carried it forward much farther than it had fallen behind in the career of social advancement. All authorities agree in testifying to the prosperity which England enjoyed from the termination of the war to the death of Cromwell. "When this tyrant or protector (as some call him)," observes the writer of a tract published after the Restoration, "turned out the Long Parliament (in April, 1653), the kingdom was arrived at the highest pitch of trade, wealth, and honor that it in any age ever yet knew. The trade appeared by the great sums offered then for the customs and excise, £900,000 a-year being refused. The riches of the nation showed itself in the high value that land and all our native commodities bore, which are the certain marks of opulency."[1] According to Child, in his Discourse of Trade, the current price of land in England in 1621 was no more than twelve years' purchase: Sir Charles Davenant states that, in 1666, it had risen to from fourteen to sixteen years' purchase.[2] The prices of all descriptions of agricultural produce were generally (for there was still much fluctuation) higher throughout the present period than they had ever been known to be before. It appears, from the Windsor Tables, that the average price of middling wheat, from 1606 to 1625, was about 34*s.* per quarter; but it was sometimes as high as 58*s.*, and sometimes as low as 29*s.* or 30*s.* It continued to rise throughout the early part of the reign of Charles I., never being lower than 44*s.* from 1630 to 1640, and sometimes reaching 56*s.* or 58*s.* In 1631 it was 68*s.* No accounts have been preserved of the year 1642 and the three following years. In 1646, the price was 48*s.*; in 1647, 73*s.* 8*d.*; in 1648, 85*s.*; in 1649, 80*s.*; in 1650, 76*s.* 8*d.*; in 1651, 73*s.* 4*d.* After this it declined for a few years, falling in 1654 so low as to 26*s.*; but its average in the last four years of the protectorate exceeded 45*s.* From the accounts of the purveyors of Prince Henry's household, about 1610, it appears that the price of beef was then about 3⅞*d.*, and of mutton about 3⅝d. the pound.[1] The prices of many articles of provision in London were fixed by a royal proclamation in 1633, the object apparently being to bring them back to the usual rates, which had been considerably advanced by a scarcity in the preceding year. A fat cygnet is directed to be sold for from 7*s.* to 9*s.*, according to the season of the year; a pheasant cock for 6*s.*; a pheasant hen for 5*s.*; a turkey cock of the best sort for 4*s.*; the best turkey hen for 3*s.*; a duck for 8*d.*; the best fat goose in the market for 2*s.*; a capon fat and crammed, of the best sort, for 2*s.* 4*d.*; the best pullet for 1*s.* 6*d.*; the best hen for 1*s.*; a chicken of the best and largest sort for 5*d.*; a rabbit for 7*d.* or 8*d.*; a dozen of tame pigeons for 6*s.*; three eggs for 1*d.*; a pound of the best salt butter for 4½*d.*; of the best fresh for 5*d.* or 6*d.*, according to the season. The prices of some other necessaries are also added, among which are tallow candles, "made of wick," 3½*d.* the pound; "made of cotton," 4*d.*; a sack, containing four bushels, of the best old charcoals, 1*s.* 2*d.*; a sack of the best and largest small coals, 6*d.*; a thousand of the best Kentish billets, 16*s.* This same year an ordinance was issued by the Star Chamber establishing various regulations for keeping down the prices of provisions, which had been raised by the scarcity, in London and Westminster. One of them in consideration of "the exorbitant prices demanded by vintners for dressing and selling provisions," prohibited persons in that business, for the future, from selling any thing but bread and wine, or permitting any flesh, or other sorts of provisions, to be brought into their houses, to be there eaten by any of their guests. Another enjoined that keepers of victualing-houses, who, it is affirmed, had of late greatly enhanced the prices of their ordinaries, should henceforth take no more of each guest for a meal than two shillings, which was to include wine and beer; and from a servant no more than eightpence. Some articles of food that are now plentiful, or comparatively common, were still rare, and consequently dear, in England in the early part of the seventeenth century. Though coffee, as we have seen, was introduced a few years before the Restoration, there is no evidence that tea was; and sugar, though it had been long known, was as yet only imported in small quantities, and bore a high price. In 1619 we find the price of two cauliflowers set down at 3*s.*, and that of sixteen artichokes at 3*s.* 4*d.*; and among the articles provided only a few years before for the household of James's queen are a few potatoes, which are charged at 2*s.* the pound. At this time, and down to a considerably later date, the usual bread-corn of the poorer sort of the people of England was barley, as is distinctly stated in a royal ordinance dated in 1646, which Rymer has printed.[2] At the end of the reign of Elizabeth, as appears from the Household Book of Sir Edward Coke, then attorney-general, the servants of great families commonly ate rye-bread; and large quantities of oatmeal were also consumed.

Above twenty stone of beef, besides other meat, were consumed every week in Sir Edward's family, while in London, at their residence in the Castle Yard, Holborn; and yet at this time, considerably more than a third of the whole year consisted of fish-days, which are believed to have been universally and strictly observed. Coke received numerous presents of bucks, heronshaws, swans, marchpanes (or sweet biscuit), and fruit; but not many garden vegetables seem to have been used, only a few onions, leeks, carrots, and radishes being purchased, apparently to make pottage for the poor. The price of linen at this time, at least of good quality, was very high, if we may judge from Shakspeare's Henry the Fourth, where Dame Quickly affirms that the holland of which she had made Falstaff's shirts had cost her eight shillings the ell. This is confirmed by what Philip Stubbes tells us in his Anatomy of Abuses, of which the second edition was published in 1595, that the meanest shirt cost half-a-crown, and some as much as ten pounds. The price of wool was also very high throughout the reign of James, till a proclamation which he issued in July, 1622, prohibiting its exportation, brought it down from 33*s.* to 18*s.* the tod, or from above 1*s.* 2*d.* to not quite 8*d.* per pound. Some years afterward, however, the price again rose, having been 24*s.* the tod in 1641; 37*s.* 6*d.* in 1648; 40*s.* in 1649; and between 1650 and 1660 ranging from 22*s.* 6*d.* to 60*s.*[1]

Of the wages of the different classes of laborers in the early part of the present period a notion may be gathered from an account, printed in the Archæologia, of the rates as fixed for the county of Rutland by the justices of the peace in 1610, which, as it appears, continued to be observed nearly down to the breaking out of the civil war.[2] The yearly wages of a bailiff of husbandry are here set down at only 52*s.*; of "a man-servant for husbandry, of the best sort, which can eire (plow), sow, mow, thresh, make a rick, thack and hedge the same, and can kill a hog, sheep, and calf," at 50*s.*; of a common servant of husbandry, at 40*s.*; of a mean (middling) servant, at 29*s.*; of a boy under sixteen, at 20*s.*; of "a chief woman-servant, being a cook, and can bake, brew, and make malt, and able to oversee other servants," at 26*s.* 8*d.*; of "a second woman-servant of the best sort, which can not dress meat, nor make malt, but brew," &c., at 23*s.* 4*d.*; of a "woman-servant which can do but outworks and drudgery, at 16*s.*; of a girl under sixteen, at 14*s.*; of a chief miller at 46*s.*; of a common miller, at 31*s.* 8*d.*; of a chief shepherd, at 30*s.*;[3] of a common shepherd, at 25*s.* For harvest-work, a mower is ordered to have by the day 5*d.*, with his meat; a man reaper, haymaker, hedger, or ditcher, 4*d.*; a woman reaper, 3*d.*; a woman haymaker, 2*d.* If no meat was given these sums were to be exactly doubled in each case, except that the woman haymaker was to have 5*d.* instead of 4*d.* Every other kind of laborer at all other times than in harvest was to have, from Easter till Michaelmas, 3*d.* a-day with food, or 7*d.* without; and from Michaelmas to Easter, 2*d.* with food and 6*d.* without. The day's wages of various descriptions of artificers before Michaelmas, when they were highest, were appointed to be, for a master carpenter, 8*d.* with meat, or 1*s.* 2*d.* without; for "a free mason, which can draw his plot, work, and set accordingly, having charge over others," 8*d.* with meat, or 1*s.* without; for a chief joiner, or master sawyer, 6*d.* with meat, or 1*s.* without; for a horse-collar maker 6*d.* with meat, or 10*d.* without; for a plowwright, a rough mason, an expert carpenter, or a tiler or slater, 5*d.* with, or 10*d.* without meat; for a thatcher, hurdle-maker, or bricklayer, 5*d.* with, or 9*d.* without meat. After Michaelmas the rates set down are from two thirds to four fifths of these sums, the greatest proportional deduction being generally made from the highest wages. Throughout the year turners and gardners are allowed 6*d.* with, and 1*s.* without meat; and tailors 4*d.* with meat, and 8*d.* without. "In these rates of wages," observes Sir Frederick Eden, "the justices seem to have calculated that half the day's earnings were equivalent to diet for one day: in modern times, however, a much greater proportion of the daily pay of a laborer is appropriated to the purchase of the single article of bread."[1] This latter assertion is surely more than questionable: Sir Frederick seems to have been thinking of the cost of food, not for the laborerer alone, but for his wife and children as well as himself: if a laborer's own diet at the present day cost him even so much as half his wages, his wife, and perhaps, three, four, or five children would in many cases have to subsist on the other half, and nothing would remain for clothes, rent, and other expenses. Nor, at least in many descriptions of work, would the allowance of diet to a working-man make any thing like a difference of one half upon the amount of his day's wages. Sir Frederick afterward admits that it is not easy to conceive that, while wheat was at 34*s.* the quarter, as it was at this time, "a laborer, whose wages on an average, it is probable, were about 8*d.* a-day, could have been as well provided with the most important necessaries of life as he is at present."[2]

In a tract entitled "Britain's Busse," published in 1615, in recommendation of a project for the fitting out of busses to enable the English to rival the Dutch in the herring-fishery, the author makes an estimate of the expense of dieting the seamen, from which some inferences may be drawn as to the manner of living among the laboring classes at this time. He proposes that every man and boy should be allowed, in the first place, a gallon of beer a-day, which, he says, is the allowance made in the king's ships: the cost of the beer is calculated at a fraction more than 2*d.* a gallon. Then, each was to have (also as in his majesty's ships) a pound of biscuit a-day, costing between five and six farthings; half a pint of oatmeal or pease, costing a farthing and a half; two pounds of bacon a-week, costing 6¼*d.*, besides as much fresh fish as they could catch for themselves; a quarter of a pound of butter a-day, costing about a penny, "to butter their fish, or otherwise to eat as they like;" half a pound of Holland cheese, costing five farthings; together with three pints of vinegar, costing about 2*d.*, and seven Kentish fagots, costing about 6*d.* a-day, for every sixteen. The exact estimated daily cost of victualing for each is seven pence, three farthings, and one twenty-eighth of a farthing. This is rather higher than the allowance that is made in the Rutland table for the highest class of mechanics, even the master carpenter being only allowed sixpence a-day for diet; but the difference was no doubt found necessary in those days to make up for the dangers and disagreeable circumstances of a sailor's life. The wages proposed to be paid to the crew are also high as compared with the earnings of either agricultural or mechanical labor: the masters were to have about 3*s.* 7*d.* a-day; the mates about $10\frac{1}{4}d.$; one half of the men about $8\frac{1}{3}d.$ each; the others about 7*d.*; and the boys about $2\frac{1}{2}d.$ It appears by an ordinance printed in Rymer, that in 1636 seamen in the royal navy were allowed in harbor sevenpence halfpenny a-day for their provisions, and, when at sea, eightpence halfpenny.[1] In a curious tract, entitled "Stanley's Remedy, or the Way how to Reform Wandering Beggars, Thieves, Highway Robbers, and Pickpockets," written in the reign of King James, and printed in 1646, the cost of the diet and maintenance of every one of the idle, thievish, drunken persons that infested the kingdom, living only upon beggary and plunder, is estimated at threepence per day at the least.

Although the legislation respecting pauperism had begun to be separated from that respecting vagrancy and crime some time before the end of the preceding century,[2] the two subjects still continued to be frequently viewed in their old, and, indeed, in some respects, natural and indissoluble connection. Even so early as only a few years after the accession of James I. we find parliament adverting to the inconveniences which had already begun to be experienced from the legal provision that had been established for the poor operating in many cases as a premium and encouragement to idleness. One of the clauses of an act passed in 1609 complains that "many willful people, finding that they, having children, have some hope to have relief from the parish wherein they dwell, and being able to labor, and thereby to relieve themselves and their families, do nevertheless run away out of their parishes, and leave their families upon the parish."[3] It was, therefore, enacted that all such persons should be deemed to be incorrigible rogues, and punished as such. This same act, after noticing that divers good and necessary laws formerly made for the building of houses of correction for the suppressing and punishing of rogues, vagabonds, and other idle, vagrant, and disorderly persons, had not wrought so good effect as was expected, partly because the houses of correction had not been built as was intended, partly that the laws had not in other respects been duly and severely put in execution, directed that such houses should immediately be built or provided for every county, "with mills, turns, cards, and such like necessary implements, to set the said rogues, or such other idle persons, on work." "Lord Coke," says Sir Frederick Eden, "was of opinion that justices of the peace were authorized by this act to commit to the house of correction idle or disorderly persons, although they had lawful means to live by. He conceived that houses of correction were the only possible means of compelling them to labor; and that this excellent work (as he called it) was, without question, feasible; for he says that, upon making of the 39th of Elizabeth (chap. 4), and a good space after, while justices and other officers were diligent and industrious, there was not a rogue to be seen in any part of England; but, when justices became remiss, rogues swarmed again. He adds, that few were committed to the house of correction without coming out better."[1] The poor-law of the 43d of Elizabeth was continued by several statutes passed in the reigns of James and Charles, and a few additions were made to it, relating principally to the binding of poor children apprentices. These acts, however, are affirmed to have been very imperfectly executed; in many places, it is said, no rates were made for twenty, thirty, or forty years after the passing of the act of Elizabeth; and in most cases the sums raised were so inadequate that numbers of persons were still left to perish for want.

The author of a pamphlet, entitled "Grievous Groans for the Poor, by M.S.," published in 1622, writes as follows:—"Though the number of the poor do daily increase, there hath been no collection for them, no, not these seven years, in many parishes of this land, especially in county towns; but many of those parishes turneth forth their poor, yea, and their lusty laborers that will not work, or for any misdemeanor want work, to beg, filch, and steal for their maintenance, so that the country is pitifully pestered with them; yea, and the maimed soldiers, that have ventured their lives and lost their limbs in our behalf, are also thus requited; for when they return home, to live by some labor in their natural country, though they can work well in some kind of labor, every man saith, We will not be troubled with their service, but make other shift for our business: so are they turned forth to travel in idleness (the highway to hell), and seek their meat upon meres (as the proverb goeth), with begging, filching, and stealing for their maintenance, until the law bring them unto the fearful end of hanging." Some information respecting the pauper and disorderly portion of the population a few years after this may be gleaned from a paper of orders for the regulation of certain branches of police, issued by the privy council in 1630.[2] Common offenses and abuses, which stewards to lords and gentlemen are enjoined specially to inquire into in keeping their leets twice a-year, are enumerated as follows: "Of bakers and brewers for breaking of assizes; of forestallers and regrators; against tradesmen of all sorts, for selling with under-weights, or at excessive prices, or things unwholesome, or things made in deceit; of people breakers of houses, common thieves, and their receivers; haunters of taverns or ale-houses; those that go in good clothes and fare well, and none knows whereof they live; those that be night-walkers; builders of cottages and takers-in of inmates; offenses of victualers, artificers, workmen, and laborers." Another regulation directs that "the correction houses in all counties may be made adjoining to the common prisons, and the jailer to be made governor of them, that so he may employ to work prisoners committed for small causes, and so they may learn honesty by labor, and not live idly and miserably long in prison, whereby they are made worse when they come out than they were when they went in; and, where many houses of correction are in one county, one of them at least to be near the jail." It would appear from this that the house of correction system had lost by this time very much of the virtue ascribed to it by Coke in its first operation. Another order, prohibiting all persons from harboring rogues in their barns or out-housings, and authorizing constables and justices of the peace to demand from persons wandering about with women and children where they were married and where their children were christened, adds, "for these people live like salvages, neither marry, nor bury, nor christen; which licentious liberty makes so many delight to be rogues and wanderers." A great increase of beggars had been occasioned about this time by the disbanding of the army in Ireland the preceding year: the consequence was that the soldiers, and probably many others along with them, immediately flocked over in swarms to England; to remedy which evil a proclamation was issued, commanding them to return to Ireland, and ordering them to be conveyed from constable to constable to either Bristol, Minehead, Barnstaple, Chester, Liverpool, Milford, or Workington; if they should be found begging in England afterward, they were to be punished as rogues and vagabonds.[1]

CHAPTER I.

NARRATIVE OF CIVIL AND MILITARY TRANSACTIONS.

Great Seal of Charles II.

N the 25th of May Charles and his two brothers, the dukes of York and Gloucester, landed near Dover, where Monk met them. The king embraced and kissed his restorer, calling him "father," and walked with him to his coach; and the glorified general, to the envy of older and nobler royalists, rode in the same coach with the king and the dukes. On the 28th, the Lords were advertised, by a royal message, that his majesty would be at Whitehall on the morrow; and on the 29th, which was Charles's birthday,[1] he made his solemn entry into London, attended by the members of both Houses, bishops, ministers, knights of the Bath, lord mayor and aldermen, kettle-drums and trumpets. The streets were railed in, the windows and balconies were hung with tapestry, flowers were scattered on his path, and all was joy and jubilee. The first thing he did on arriving at Whitehall was to invest Monk with the Order of the Garter, and make him a member of the privy council. The foreign ambassadors, who had complimented Oliver and Richard Cromwell, and even acknowledged the restored Rump, made great testimony of joy for his happy restoration. And when Charles met the House of Lords, the Earl of Manchester, the Lord Kimbolton of former times, and one of the members whose attempted arrest had hurried on the civil war, hailed him as "Great king," "dread sovereign," "a native king," "a son of the wise," "a son of the ancient kings," and prophesied to him that he would be an example to all kings of piety, justice, prudence, and power, the greatest king that ever bore the name of Charles. Nor were the Commons much behind the Lords: their speaker, Sir Harbottle Grimston, who had formerly been distinguished by a very different species of oratory, told Charles that he was deservedly the "king of hearts;" that he would receive from his people a crown of hearts: that he could not fail of being the happiest and most glorious king of the happiest people. We shall presently see how these predictions were verified.

Even at Dover the restored king was beset by ambitious and impatient cavaliers, who all hoped to be made ministers, members of the privy council, or something great in the government, as the reward of their loyalty and sufferings; and those were the most pressing whose services had been the least valuable to the cause. At Canterbury, Monk, who in some respects was a mere broker for others, who might have opposed him but for the tempting bargains he had offered, put into his majesty's hands "a large paper full of names," telling him "that he could not do him better service than by recommending to him such persons who were most grateful to the people, and in respect of their parts and interests were best able to serve him." Charles put the paper into his pocket without reading it; but, as soon as he could, he took an opportunity of consulting with his chancellor, Clarendon, who had returned with him from a long exile, and who informs us that the paper contained the names of at least threescore and ten persons, who were thought fittest to be made privy councilors; that in this entire number there were only two—the Marquis of Hertford and the Earl of Southampton—who had ever served the king, or been looked upon as zealously affected to his service; that all the rest were either such as had deserted the king by adhering to the parliament, or such as had taken part in the beginning of the late revolution (here called rebellion), and had acted with all fierceness and animosity until the new model, and dismissal of the Earl of Essex: then, indeed, as Cromwell had grown terrible to them, they were disposed to wish the king back again, though they had done nothing but wish. "There were then," adds Clarendon, "the names of the principal persons of the Presbyterian party, to which the general (Monk) was thought to be most inclined, at least to satisfy the foolish and unruly inclinations of his wife. There were likewise the names of some who were most notorious in all the other factions; and of some who, in respect of their mean qualities and meaner qualifications, nobody could imagine how they could come to be named." But the chancellor, who cared a great deal more about the cabinet to be established than did the indolent, pleasure-loving king, and who had made up his mind for a privy council of a very different composition, undertook to settle this matter with the general, through the medium of Mr. Morrice, the most intimate friend of the latter. The wary Monk avoided committing himself in person; but his friend Morrice, after speaking with him in private, returned to the chancellor and told him the trouble the general was in—"that the truth was, he had been obliged to have much communication with men of all humors and inclinations, and so had promised to do them good offices to the king, and could not, therefore, avoid inserting their names in that paper, without any imagination that the king would accept them; that he had done his part, and all that could be expected from him, and left the king to do what he thought best for his own service."[1] In lieu, therefore, of Monk's list, a new one was drawn up by Clarendon, who found himself constrained to admit almost as many Presbyterians as cavaliers and Church-of-England men, but who evidently hoped to be able to displace the former by degrees. The king's two brothers, the dukes of York and Gloucester, the Marquis of Ormond, the Earl of Lindsay, the Earl of Southampton, Lord Say and Sele, Lord Seymour, Sir Frederick Cornwallis, Sir George Carteret, Colonel Charles Howard, General Monk, the Earl of Manchester, the Earl of St. Albans, Lord Culpeper, Mr. Arthur Annesley, Mr. Morrice (Monk's confidential friend, who was also made secretary of state), the Chancellor Clarendon, the Marquis of Dorchester, the Earl of Berkshire, the Earl of Norwich, Lord Wentworth, Mr. Denzil Hollis, Sir Edward Nicholas, Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, the Marquis of Hertford, the Earl of Northumberland, the Earl of Leicester, Lord Roberts, Lord Berkeley, and General Montague, admiral of the fleet, and a few weeks after created Earl of Sandwich,[1] were the members of Charles's first privy council. Monk was continued captain-general of all the forces of the three kingdoms, was made master of the horse, and (on the 7th of July) was further gratified by a long list of titles of nobility, ending in that of Duke of Albemarle; and his coarse, low-bred wife, who had been a milliner, and his mistress before she became his wife, took her place at court as a right noble duchess among the proudest dames of the land. The Duke of York was made lord high admiral of England, lord warden of the Cinque Ports, &c.; Sir Edward Nicholas was joined with Morrice as secretary of state; the Earl of Southampton became lord high treasurer; the Marquis of Ormond, lord steward; the Earl of Manchester, lord chamberlain; and Lord Clarendon, retaining the chancellorship,[2] was intrusted with the chief management of affairs. The Presbyterians were startled by the reproduction of the Thirty-Nine Articles; but they were gratified by a royal proclamation against vice, debauchery, and profaneness, and by seeing Baxter and Calamy, the most eloquent and learned of their preachers, admitted into the number of Charles's chaplains. To keep the lord mayor, the aldermen, sheriffs, and principal officers of the city militia in good humor and loyalty, the honor of knighthood was showered upon them—"an honor," says Clarendon, "the city had been without near eighteen years, and therefore abundantly welcome to the husbands and their wives."[1] And, still further to captivate the fair ones of the city, Charles went soon after, "with as much pomp and splendor as any earthly prince could do, to the great city feast."[2] That none of the old attributes of royalty might remain in the shade, his majesty began to touch for the king's evil, according to custom, sitting under his canopy of state in the Banqueting-House, with the surgeons and chaplains, and stroking the faces of all the sick that were brought to him, one of the chaplains saying at each touching—"He put his hands upon them and he healed them." This disgusting if not blasphemous ceremony was the more irritating to the Puritans, from the open profligacy and debauchery of the prince who thus pretended to an hereditary right of working miracles.

The Lords and Commons, who, under Monk, had recalled the king, were not properly a parliament, but only a convention; and, therefore, one of the first proceedings after his arrival was to pass an act constituting this convention to be a parliament.

[1] According to his friend, or creature, Pepys, this Montague had entertained hopes of bringing in the king himself, and afterward thought it hard that he should have been anticipated by such a vulgar fellow as Monk. See Pepys's Diary.

[1] Clarendon, Life. Oliver Cromwell had knighted many in his way; but, according to Clarendon, the usurper could no more confer that honor in reality than he could cure the king's evil by touching for it!

CHARLES II. From a Picture by Sir Godfrey Kneller.

Their first condition, however, was not lost sight of, and they were ever afterward called the convention parliament. They voted £70,000 a-month to the king for present necessities. The chancellor, Clarendon, told them that the king would in all points make good his declaration from Breda; that he granted a free pardon to all except those whom the parliament should except; and that no man should be disquieted or called in question for differences of opinion in matters of religion.[1]

On the 10th of May, fifteen days before Charles's solemn entry into London, the Lords had caused the Book of Common Prayer to be read before them; and at the same time both they and the Commons had begun to arrest as traitors all such as spoke amiss of his gracious majesty, or of kingly government. They had also seized Clement, one of the late king's judges, and had ordered the seizure of the goods of all that sat as judges upon that memorable trial; thus plainly intimating, even before Charles's arrival, that vengeance was to be taken upon the regicides. And now, while the Lords, who had been so long cast out and humbled, openly proclaimed their thirst for vengeance, the Presbyterian majority of the Commons, led on by the noisy, hot-headed, and vindictive Hollis, voted that neither themselves nor the people of England could be freed from the horrid guilt of the late unnatural rebellion, or from the punishment which that guilt merited, unless they formally availed themselves of his majesty's grace and pardon, as set forth in the declaration of Breda; and, throwing into one deep pit of baseness and shame all the good they had done, together with all the evil—all their recollections of the fact that, if the Independents had cut off the late king's head, they themselves had brought him helpless to the foot of the scaffold and had sharpened the ax—they went in a body to the Banqueting-House, and threw themselves and (as far as such representatives could do it) the people of England in penitence and contrition at the feet of Charles, who recommended them to dispatch what was called a bill of indemnity and oblivion. But, even in the declaration from Breda, there was a clause mentioning exceptions (" excepting only such persons as shall hereafter be excepted by parliament"), and Clarendon had all along counted upon punishing with death all such as had been immediately concerned in the death of the late king. Monk, however, when arranging the Restoration, had advised that not more than four should be excepted; and now he stepped in to check the vindictive fury of the Commons, and prevailed upon them to limit the number of their victims to seven—Scott, Holland, Lisle, Barkstead, Harrison, Say, and Jones—who, it was voted, should lose the benefit of the indemnity both as to life and estate. But this number of seven was presently raised to ten, by the addition of Coke, the active solicitor; Broughton, clerk to the High Court of Justice; and Dendy, who had acted as sergeant-at-arms during the trial. These ten, it was understood, were all to suffer a horrible death. But, without losing time, the Commons proceeded to select a still larger number that were to suffer the minor penalties of imprisonment for life, loss of property, and beggary to their posterity. They voted that a petition should be drawn and presented to the king, begging him to issue a proclamation commanding all those who had been concerned in managing his father's trial, or otherwise forward in promoting his death, to surrender themselves within fourteen days. Charles issued this proclamation accordingly, and nineteen individuals came in to stand their trial, hoping that, as ten had been fixed upon already for execution, their lives, at least, would be spared; while nineteen or twenty of their associates, measuring more accurately the vindictiveness of the Cavaliers and Presbyterians, hid themselves or fled beyond sea. Then the Commons selected twenty more to be excepted out of the general act of oblivion to suffer such penalties and forfeitures, not extending to life, as should be thought fit to be inflicted on them by an act to pass for that purpose.[1] These twenty were Sir Harry Vane, St. John, Hazelrig, Ireton, Desborough, Lambert, Fleetwood, Axtell, Sydenham, Lenthall, Burton, Keble, Packe, Blackwell, Pyne, Dean, Creed, Nye, Goodwin, and Cobbett. Nor did the Commons stop here, going on to except from all benefit of the indemnity such of the late king's judges as had not surrendered upon the proclamation. And in this state the bill of indemnity and oblivion was sent up to the Lords, who found it much too moderate and merciful. Their lordships began with a vote of the most fierce and barbarous kind. " The Lords were inclined to revenge their own order on the persons of some in the High Court of Justice, by whom some of their number had been condemned, and to except one of the judges for every lord they had put to death; the nomination of the person to be excepted being referred to that lord who was most nearly related to the person that had suffered. According to this rule Colonel Croxton was nominated by the next relation to the Earl of Derby, Major Waring by the kinsman of another, and Colonel Titchburn by a third: the Earl of Denbigh, whose sister had been married to the Duke of Hamilton, being desired by the Lords to nominate one to be excepted in satisfaction for the death of his brother-in-law, named a person who had been some time dead, of which some of the House being informed, they called upon him to name another; but he said that, since it had so fallen out, he desired to be excused from naming any more. This action, although seeming to proceed from chance, was generally esteemed to have been voluntary, the Earl of Denbigh being known to be a generous man and a lover of his country."[2] After this return to the spirit of the execrable lex talionis of the most barbarous time, the Lords voted that all who had signed the death-warrant against Charles I., or sat when sentence was pronounced upon him, and six others not in that category—namely, Hacker, Vane, Lambert, Hazelrig, Axtell, and Peters—should be excepted, as capital traitors, from the indemnity. They were going on in making the bill still more severe, but the king was still more eager for money than for revenge, and, after several messages had been sent from Whitehall by the Chancellor Clarendon and others, praying the Lords to dispatch the bill, he himself, regardless of the constitutional rule, which precluded the sovereign from taking any cognizance of a pending bill, sent down a positive order to hasten their proceedings, in order that the Commons might pass to the money-bill. Hereupon the Lords, without noticing the irregularity, returned the bill of indemnity to the Commons with the alterations we have mentioned, and the Commons adopted the bill in that form. They, however, were anxious to save the lives of Sir Harry Vane and General Lambert; and the Lords joined with them in an address to the king, praying that if, after trial, these two should be attainted, execution should be remitted. The Lords also agreed that Lenthall, who had intrigued with the royalists before the Restoration, and had offered the king a bribe of £3000, should be spared both in life and estate. That rash republican, Sir Arthur Hazelrig, who unwittingly had played into the hands of Monk, had a narrow escape; but the astucious general, who had duped him, stepped in considerately and saved his life. Whitelock, that easy-tempered vassal of circumstances, was aimed at by Prynne and the rest of the fanatic Presbyterians, who detested him because he had been active under Oliver Cromwell in promoting toleration; but it was found, on a vote, that he had more friends than enemies, and he, too, escaped. Scrope was at first exempted; but in consequence, it appears, of the betrayal of some private conversation, in which he still justified the trial and execution of Charles I.,[1] his name was again set down in the capital list; and Colonel Hutchinson, notwithstanding his "signal repentance," was finally excepted from the indemnity. As the principle that vengeance should be taken only upon the late king's judges was departed from, it was but natural to expect that they should fall upon him who had been the bosom friend of Cromwell, and who had defended, in the eyes of all Europe, the proceedings of the High Court of Justice. And the immortal John Milton was committed to the custody of the sergeant-at-arms, and threatened with destruction, for having written his "Defense of the English People," and his "Eikonoclastes." His glorious friend, Andrew Marvell, and two other admirers of genius (and no more) raised their voices in the poet's favor. They were told that he had been Latin secretary to Cromwell, and so deserved to be hanged; but in the end, after he had been plundered by the sergeant-at-arms, who called his robberies fees, Milton escaped with no other punishment than a general disqualification for the public service, the public burning of his "Defensio pro Populo Anglicano" and "Eikonoclastes," and the spectacle of the moral decline and political degradation of his country under the misrule of the restored Stuart. Prynne, who had many of the properties of the bloodhound, would have hunted down the weak, inoffensive, and amiable Richard Cromwell; but no one would join him in that chase; and the son of a great man, after traveling some time on the continent, was allowed to live quietly in the pleasant retirement of Cheshunt. In the end, twenty-nine victims were given over to the vengeance rather than to the justice of the courts of law, with a mocking proviso in favor of such as had surrendered, that sentence should not be executed without special act of parliament. Nineteen had saved themselves by timely flight. About twenty enumerated persons, as well as all those who had pronounced sentence of death in any of the late High Courts of Justice, were rendered incapable of any office, civil or military.

[1] Clarendon proposed at the council-board to burn all the memorials of the commonwealth and of the government of Cromwell. The Earl of Southampton opposed this, saying that it was better to leave those papers and records as an example of rebellion, to deter others: but Clarendon had his way, and an enormous mass of historical documents was destroyed.

A number of other bills were hurried through the Houses and presented to the king at the same time with this indemnity bill. The duty of tunnage and poundage, one of the great starting points in the late revolution, was voted to Charles for life; the king's birthday and glorious Restoration—the 29th of May—was made a perpetual anniversary, to be observed with thanksgiving to God for his miraculous deliverance of this poor nation; and another bill enacted that a speedy provision of money should be made to disband the old army and navy. In giving his assent to these bills, which were presented with every possible prostration, Charles told the speaker that he willingly pardoned all such as the parliament had pardoned, but that, for the future, he should be rigorous and severe against all such as testified any dislike of the government; that he hoped the forces would be quietly disbanded, and that he should not hear any complaints of their living at free quarter, which would be imputed to him; and, finally, that he was much in want of money, not having wherewith to keep house at Whitehall. Presently after a committee was appointed to consider of settling a suitable revenue on his sacred majesty. This committee reported that it appeared that the revenue of Charles I., from the year 1637 to 1641, had amounted on an average to about £900,000, of which £200,000 flowed from sources that were either not warranted by law or now no longer available. Calculating the difference in the value of money, and contenting themselves with the vague promises of a faithless prince, the Commons proposed raising the royal income to £1,200,000 per annum; but the means of providing this money were reserved for consideration in another session.

[1] "During these contests," says the republican Ludlow, "between the two Houses, touching the exceptions to be made, Sir John Bouchier, who had been one of the king's judges, and had rendered himself within the time limited by the proclamation, being of a great age and very infirm, was permitted to lodge at a private house belonging to one of his daughters. In this place he was seized with so dangerous a fit of illness that those about him, who were his nearest relations, despairing of his recovery, and presuming that an acknowledgment from him of his sorrow for the part he had in the condemnation of the king might tend to procure some favor to them from those in power, they earnestly pressed him to give them that satisfaction. But he, being highly displeased with their request, rose suddenly from his chair, which for some days he had not been able to do without assistance, and, receiving fresh vigor from the memory of that action, said, 'I tell you it was a just act; God and all good men will own it.' And, having thus expressed himself, he sat down again, and soon after quietly ended his life."—Memoirs.

But there remained something more difficult to settle than indemnity or revenue; and this was the great question of religion. Charles, in the declaration from Breda, had most distinctly promised toleration. The particular clause was to this effect:—"And because the passion and uncharitableness of the times had produced several opinions in religion, by which men are engaged in parties and animosities against each other, which, when they shall hereafter unite in a freedom of conversation, will be composed or better understood, we do declare a liberty to tender consciences; and that no man shall be disquieted or called in question for differences of opinion in matters of religion, which do not disturb the peace of the kingdom; and that we shall be ready to consent to such an act of parliament, as, upon mature deliberation, shall be offered unto us, for the full granting that indulgence." But this "convention parliament" was incapable of any such act; and the nation at large was incapable of a generous toleration, which had only been upheld for a time by the sword of the Independents and the wonderful management of Oliver Cromwell. Charles himself, notwithstanding the recent declaration of Clarendon, that he was the best Protestant in the kingdom, was, if he were any thing in religion, a Catholic, even now; but he was certainly no bigot, and, if he had been left to his own indolence and indifference, he would probably have tolerated all sects alike: but the high-churchmen wanted back all their old preëminence—their property and their old power of persecuting undiminished; and if the Presbyterians, or the trimming portion of them, who had considered themselves the national church under the commonwealth, were disposed to tolerate and coalesce with a modified prelacy, they were resolved not to tolerate any of the sects which had been known under the general denomination of Independents, and which, now that they had lost Cromwell and the power of the sword, were too weak to offer any valid resistance. On the 9th of July there was a stormy debate in a grand committee of the Commons upon the Thirty-Nine Articles; and then Sir Heneage Finch, as a leader of the high-church and court party, declared that the government of the church by bishops had never been legally altered; and that as for liberty for tender consciences, no man knew what it was. After seven hours of very unchristian-like contention, and a blowing out and relighting of candles, it was carried by a slight majority that the settlement of religion should be left to the king, who "should be petitioned to convene a select number of divines to treat concerning the matter."[1] Two bills, the Ministers' Bill, and the Bill of Sales, which latter was "for considering the cases of those who had been purchasers of the king's, queen's, and church's lands during the late times of plunder and devastation," were hotly debated in the Commons, where the court party urged that all that had belonged to royalty or to the church should be restored without any regard to those who had paid their money for them to the government de facto, in the confidence that they were making a legal purchase.[1] It was voted that whatever had belonged to the king and queen, or all the crown lands, should be restored forthwith; but the question of the church lands was left in abeyance for the present. The Ministers' Bill, which aimed at the immediate restoration of all the clergy who had been expelled, and the expulsion of all who had been inducted by the commonwealth-men or by Cromwell, was carried, but with a large proviso—that the intrusive churchmen should not be bound to give back those livings which were legally vacant when they obtained them. But there was another proviso which, however harmless to the mass of the Presbyterians, was fatal to all such Independent ministers as Cromwell had put into the church; for it excluded every incumbent that had not been ordained by an ecclesiastic, or had renounced his ordination, or had petitioned for bringing the late king to trial, or had justified that trial and execution in preaching or in writing, or had committed himself in the vexed question of infant baptism. These bills satisfied no party and no sect. The royalists complained of their being left to suffer the consequences of their forfeitures, sequestrations, and compositions for delinquency under the Long Parliament and Cromwell; and they called the first great bill "a bill of indemnity for the king's enemies, and of oblivion for his friends." "That act," said the royalist or cavalier pamphleteer, L'Estrange, "made the enemies to the constitution masters in effect of the booty of three nations, bating the crown and church lands." And the high-churchmen complained that the Ministers' Bill was a thing of mean subterfuges and compromises, neither sufficiently severe upon rebellious schismatics, nor sufficiently favorable to the loyal orthodox body, who alone could keep the people of England in the ways of humility and obedience, and who were, in themselves, the only true Church of Christ. On the other hand, the Presbyterian divines began to complain that it was a vain attempt to endeavor a reconciliation with such men; that the high-church party were resolved to monopolize the favor of the prince, and all honors and preferments to themselves; that there was no hope that they would ever do any thing for the promoting of strict, serious godliness, or the true church discipline; and that they were watching the moment when they might renew the persecutions of Archbishop Laud.

On the 13th of September Charles made a very short, and Clarendon a very long, speech to the two Houses. The chancellor thought it expedient to speak to the suspicions already entertained of the king's desire of keeping up a strong standing army, and of governing absolutely, and to defend the court against the popular and well-founded charges of profligacy and irreligion.[2] At the same time he intimated that his majesty would take the subject of religion into his own hands, and would shortly set forth a declaration, wherein would be seen his great indulgence to those who could have any warrant from conscience to differ with their brethren. And, at the close of this long speech, parliament adjourned to the 6th of November.

During the recess "the healing question" of religion was discussed, and ten of the regicides were butchered.

The learned Archbishop Usher, who was a Calvinist in doctrinal creed, and whose Episcopalianism was very lukewarm or moderate, had left, as a legacy to the Protestant world, a scheme of union, and a plan of church government (by suffragan bishops and synods or presbyteries conjointly) which he had fondly hoped might reconcile the two great sects. The Presbyterians, in the necessity of the case, and in their hopelessness of obtaining an entire supremacy, professed their willingness to make this scheme the basis of an agreement and concord; and they delivered the paper to the king, with an humble address concerning godly preaching, the strict observance of the Sabbath, ceremonies, &c. They were promised a meeting with some Episcopal divines before the king; but none of that persuasion deigned to attend: and, instead of a meeting, the Presbyterian ministers received a paper written in the old and bitter spirit of controversy, rejecting their proposals; insisting that the Anglican hierarchy was the true, ancient, primitive episcopacy, and that the ancient apostolical bishops had their courts, their prerogatives, their chancellors, officials, proctors, paritors, and powers; declaring that they could not grant that the extent of any diocese should be altered or any thing reformed; and affirming that the laying aside of the Book of Common Prayer was one of the greatest causes of the misfortunes of the nation, &c. But the Presbyterians were told that his majesty would adjust all these differences; and they, together with the Episcopalians, were invited to attend him, on the 22d of October, at the house of the chancellor. There the Presbyterians found assembled his majesty, Monk, duke of Albemarle (who was a Presbyterian through his wife), the Earl of Manchester, Denzil Hollis (the most fiery of Presbyterians), the Duke of Ormond (a high-churchman), and one or two other noblemen of the same persuasion, together with Dr. Sheldon (bishop of London), Dr. Morley (bishop of Worcester), Dr. Henchman (bishop of Salisbury), the famous Dr. Cosens (who had been one of the most active coadjutors of Laud, who had been prosecuted by the Long Parliament, and who was promoted to the bishopric of Durham a few weeks after this meeting), Dr. Gauden (bishop of Exeter), Dr. Hacket (bishop of Litchfield and Coventry), the Episcopalian Dr. Gunning, the Presbyterian Drs. Spurstow and Wallis, and some two or three others. The Presbyterians intrusted their cause to the eloquence and learning of Calamy and Baxter; and the chief speakers on the other side were Dr. Gunning and Bishop Morley. Again was Usher's scheme proposed by the Presbyterians, who now gave up the republican-like principle of equality in the church, agreeing that the government should be in the hands of bishops, but assisted and advised by the presbyteries; and again was the scheme rejected by the Episcopalians, who maintained the divine rights of prelacy as a distinct order independent of all others. The debate could scarcely be otherwise than hot: on both sides the odium theologicum was intense; on both sides there was a conviction that the business had been settled before by irrefragable arguments. The Episcopalian Gunning said that Dr. Hammond had already said enough against the Presbyterians, and was as yet unanswered; the Presbyterian Baxter replied that he had answered the substance of Dr. Hammond's arguments, and had said enough against the diocesan frame of government and in proof of the validity of the ordination of English presbyters, and that these his arguments were indeed unanswered. Dr. Cosens thought that to join advising presbyters with the diocesans would be to unbishop the bishops. The Presbyterians said that the Eikon Basiliké showed that his late majesty had approved of Archbishop Usher's scheme; but the king, who knew very well that his father had not written it, said that all in that book was not gospel. The Chancellor Clarendon produced a paper, being a sort of petition from the Independents and Baptists, and told the controversialists that it was proposed to add the following clause to the declaration for religious liberty: "That others shall also be permitted to meet for religious worship, so be they do it not for the disturbance of the peace, and that no justice of the peace or officer shall disturb them." When Clarendon had finished reading this paper, he desired them all to think on it, and give their advice; but all were silent. The Presbyterians saw at once that, by the proposed clause, there was an intention to include the papists; and Wallis whispered Baxter in the ear: "Say nothing about it, 'tis an odious business; let the bishops speak to it." But the bishops were all mute, nor did any one of the Presbyterians speak, until Baxter, fearing that silence might be misinterpreted, said that Dr. Gunning, the high-churchman, had expressly excepted Papists and Socinians. "As we humbly thank his majesty," continued Baxter, "for his declared indulgence to ourselves, so we distinguish the Tolerable from the Intolerable: for the former we humbly crave just lenity; but for the latter, such as the two sorts mentioned, for our parts we can not make their toleration our request." Here Charles interfered, but he merely said, "There are laws sufficient against papists." "But," rejoined Baxter, "we understand the question to be, whether those laws shall be executed or not." Here the matter ended: the king shrunk before this vehement intolerance toward popery, and dismissed the assembly.

The royal declaration concerning ecclesiastical affairs, commonly called "the healing declaration," to the same court-woman—the infamous Mrs. Palmer; that the Duke of York had got my lord chancellor's daughter with child; that high gambling was becoming common at court; and that people were beginning to open their eyes with astonishment.

was published a few days after, being dated Whitehall, October the 25th, 1660. After expressing great veneration for the church of England, as formerly established, his majesty went on to say—"When we were in Holland we were attended by many grave and learned ministers from hence, who were looked upon as the most able and principal assertors of the Presbyterian opinions, with whom we had as much conference as the multitude of affairs which were then upon us would permit us to have; and, to our great satisfaction and comfort, found them persons full of affection to us, of zeal for the peace of the church and state, and neither enemies (as they have been given out to be) to episcopacy or liturgy, but modestly to desire such alterations in either, as, without shaking foundations, might best allay the present distempers, which the indisposition of the time, and the tenderness of some men's consciences, had contracted." And then, as concessions to these conscientious Protestants, it was declared—I. That the power of godliness should be promoted; the exercises of religion, both public and private, encouraged; that care should be taken to keep holy the Sabbath-day "without unnecessary divertisements;" and that insufficient, negligent, and scandalous ministers should not be permitted. II. That, as some of the dioceses were thought to be too large, a number of suffragan bishops, sufficient for the due performance of the work, should be appointed. III. That no bishop should ordain or employ the censures of the church without the advice and assistance of the presbyters; and that no chancellor, commissary, or official, as such, should exercise any spiritual jurisdiction in cases of excommunication, absolution, or any others wherein any of the ministry were concerned with reference to their pastoral charge. IV. That care should be taken that the preferments of deans and chapters should be given to the most learned and pious presbyters of the diocese; and, moreover, that an equal number (to those of the chapter) of the most learned, pious, and discreet presbyters of the same diocese, annually chosen by the major vote of all the presbyters of that diocese present at such elections, should be always advising and assisting together with those of the chapter in all ordinations, and in every part of jurisdiction which appertains to the censures of the church, and at all other solemn and important actions. V. That care should be taken that confirmation should be rightly and solemnly performed, by the information and with the consent of the local ministers, who should admit none to the Lord's Supper till they had made a credible profession of their faith, and promised obedience to the will of God, as expressed in the rubric before the catechism. VI. That no bishop should exercise any arbitrary power, or do or impose any thing upon the clergy or the people that was not according to the known law of the land. VII. That the king would appoint an equal number of learned divines of both persuasions to revise the liturgy, and make such alterations as should be thought most necessary. The eighth clause—a very important one in the eyes of the Presbyterians—was to this effect: "We shall leave all decisions and determinations of that kind, if they shall be thought necessary for a perfect and entire unity and uniformity throughout the nation, to the advice of a national synod, which shall be duly called, after a little time and a mutual conversation between persons of different persuasions hath mollified those distempers, abated those sharpnesses, and extinguished those jealousies, which make men unfit for those consultations. And, upon such advice, we shall use our best endeavors that such laws may be established as may best provide for the peace of the church and state. Provided, that none shall be denied the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, though they do not use the gesture of kneeling in the act of receiving." In the mean time, the cross in baptism, bowing at the name of Jesus, the use of the surplice (except in the royal chapel, cathedral or collegiate churches, or colleges in the universities), canonical subscriptions, and the oath of canonical obedience, were left indifferent, and none were to be compelled to use them, or suffer for not doing it. These were large concessions, and the Presbyterian leaders accepted them with enthusiastic gratitude, and began to dream of miters and stalls, and the enjoyment of persecuting all other sects, not foreseeing that neither the king nor his ministers would consider themselves bound by this declaration, when the army should be disbanded and the present convention parliament dissolved.

The death of the regicides had been predetermined; but it was expedient to proceed with some caution and with all the forms of law. Only four seats on the bench were at that time filled; and the four judges, Sir Orlando Bridgman, chief baron of the Exchequer, Foster and Hyde, judges of the Common Pleas, and Mallet, judge of the King's Bench, together with Sir Geoffrey Palmer and Sir Heneage Finch, the king's attorney and solicitor-general, and Sir Edward Turner, attorney to the Duke of York, Mr. Wadham Wyndham, of Lincoln's Inn, and Sergeant Keiling, specially appointed counsel for the king, held meetings in Sergeants' Inn, in order to consider some legal questions affecting the proceedings. They resolved that the prisoners should be tried at Newgate by a commission of jail delivery; and writs were issued to the Lieutenant of the Tower, in whose custody they were, to deliver them to the sheriffs of London. They resolved that all the prisoners should be arraigned at once; that the indictment should be for compassing and imagining the death of the late king (the specific treason described by the statute of Edward III.), and that the actual murder of the king, with its special circumstances, should be one of the overt acts to prove the compassing; that overt acts not in the indictment might be given in evidence, and that two witnesses should not be required to prove each particular overt act; and that, as it was not known who had cut off the king's head, it should be laid in the indictment that quidam ignotus (a certain person unknown), with a visor on his face, did the act, and that the other prisoners should be alledged to have been present, aiding and assisting. It appears that proceedings were delayed until the appointment of new sheriffs;[1] but at length the bills were sent up and found against twenty-nine persons—Sir Hardress Waller, Harrison, Carew, Cook, Hugh Peters, Scott, Gregory Clement, Scrope, Jones, Hacker, Axtell, Heveningham, Marten, Millington, Titchburn, Roe, Kilburn, Harvey, Pennington, Smith, Downs, Potter, Garland, Fleetwood, Meyn, J. Temple, P. Temple, Hewlet, and Waite; and on the 9th of October their trial was begun at the Old Bailey, before thirty-four commissioners appointed by the crown. These commissioners were—Sir Thomas Alleyn, lord mayor elect, the Chancellor Clarendon, the Earl of Southampton, lord treasurer, the Duke of Somerset, the Duke of Albemarle (Monk), the Marquis of Ormond, steward of his majesty's household, the Earl of Lindsay, great chamberlain of England, the Earl of Manchester, chamberlain of his majesty's household, the Earl of Dorset, the Earl of Berkshire, the Earl of Sandwich (late Admiral Montague), Viscount Say and Sele, the Lord Roberts, the Lord Finch, Mr. Denzil Hollis, Sir Frederick Cornwallis, treasurer of his majesty's household, Sir Charles Berkeley, controller of his majesty's household, Mr. Secretary Nicholas, Mr. Secretary Morrice, Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, Arthur Annesley, esq., the lord chief baron, Mr. Justice Foster, Mr. Justice Mallet, Mr. Justice Hyde, Mr. Baron Atkins, Mr. Justice Twisden, Mr. Justice Tyrrel, Mr. Baron Turner, Sir Harbottle Grimston, Sir William Wild, recorder of London, Mr. Sergeant Brown, Mr. Sergeant Hale, and Mr. John Howel. The counsel for the crown were Sir Geoffrey Palmer, attorney-general, Sir Heneage Finch, solicitor-general, Sir Edward Turner, attorney to the Duke of York, Sergeant Keiling, and Mr. Wadham Wyndham. All these men, whether humiliated Presbyterians and Long Parliament-men, or old royalists, were deadly and personal enemies to the prisoners, though many of them had been in the van of the late revolution, and had drawn others into courses which no man could calculate the end of. Fifteen of the commissioners who now, notwithstanding all the care taken to draw a line between those that began the civil war and those that ended it, were bound to assent to the proposition, that all war waged against a king, whatever the provocation, was high treason, had actually been engaged for the parliament against Charles I., as members of that parliament, as judges, or as officers of the army; and most if not all of them had enjoyed places of trust and profit under the revolutionary parliament. "Monk," says the republican Ludlow, "being commissionated to be of this number, was not ashamed to sit among them, any more than Mr. Denzil Hollis and the Earl of Manchester, who, having been two of the six members designed by the late king for destruction, before the beginning of the war, and therefore personally concerned in the quarrel, had contributed the utmost of their endeavors to engage divers of the gentlemen (upon whom they were now to sit as judges) on that side, were not contented to abandon them in this change, but assisted in condemning them to die for their fidelity to that cause which they themselves had betrayed. Mr. Arthur Annesley, who had been also a member of the parliament, while they made war against the king, was also one of this number. Finch, who had been accused of high treason twenty years before, by a full parliament, and who, by flying from their justice, had saved his life,[1] was appointed to judge some of those who should have been his judges; and Sir Orlando Bridgman, who, upon his submission to Cromwell, had been permitted to practice the law in a private manner, and, under that color, had served both as spy and agent for his master, was intrusted with the principal management of this tragical scene; and, in his charge to the grand jury, had the assurance to tell them, that no authority, no single person, or community of men, not the people collectively or representatively, had any coercive power over the king of England."[2] The Lord Say and Sele had been among the fiercest movers in the revolution, and had been excepted with Manchester from a general pardon in one of the proclamations of Charles I., who regarded him as one of his worst enemies. Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper (afterward Earl of Shaftesbury) had adhered to the commonwealth to the very last moment compatible with his own interests, and when he was betraying that party, and making his profitable bargain with Charles II., he had, like Monk, sworn most solemnly that none of his old friends should receive the slightest injury; yet there sat this versatile, ambitious, and unprincipled man upon the judgment-seat. As for Clarendon, the Duke of Ormond, the Earl of Berkshire, and the rest of that party, they too openly rejoiced on being now able to pour down vengeance upon the heads of those who had beaten and baffled them.

Before this court, the first on the list of regicides, Sir Hardress Waller, pleaded guilty, and so saved his life. But when Harrison, the second on the list, was brought to the bar there was no sign of penitence or submission. The republican major-general and enthusiastic Fifth-Monarchy man looked calmly on the tribunal, where all were personal enemies to him, and said, "My lords, the matter that hath been offered to you, as it was touched, was not a thing done in a corner. I believe the sound of it hath been in most nations. I believe the hearts of some have felt the terrors of that presence of God, that was with his servants in those days (however it seemeth good to him to suffer this turn to come on us), and are witnesses that the things were not done in a corner. . . . . I do profess that I would not offer, of myself, the least injury to the poorest man or woman that goes upon the earth. That I have humbly to offer is this to your lordships; you know what a contest hath been in these nations for many years: divers of those that sit upon the bench were formerly as active—[Here he was interrupted by the court, which, throughout these proceedings, did all it could to screen the Presbyterians and prevent any allusion to the real beginners of the civil war. But, when the interruption ceased, Harrison continued]—I followed not my own judgment; I did what I did, as out of conscience to the Lord. For when I found those that were as the apple of mine eye[1] to turn aside, I did lothe them, and suffered imprisonment many years rather than to turn, as many did that did put their hands to this plow: I chose rather to be separated from wife and family than to have compliance with them; though it was said 'Sit on my right hand,' and such kind expressions. Thus I have given a little poor testimony that I have not been doing things in a corner or from myself. May be I might be a little mistaken; but I did it all according to the best of my understanding, desiring to make the revealed will of God in his Holy Scriptures as a guide to me. I humbly conceive that what was done was done in the name of the parliament of England, that what was done was done by their power and authority; and I do humbly conceive it is my duty to offer unto you in the beginning, that this court, or any court below the High Court of Parliament, hath no jurisdiction of their actions." When he asserted that all he had done had been done for the service of the Lord, the court again interrupted him, telling him that he must not run into these damnable excursions, or attempt to make God the author of the damnable treason committed. Yet Harrison, who had indulged in all the dreams of the Fifth-Monarchy men, sincerely believed—as many others did—that in putting Charles to death he did that which was not only essential to the well-being of his country, but also acceptable to Heaven; which, according to his heated imagination, had not spared its special inspirations and directions. And yet, at the moment of crisis, the natural tenderness of his heart had struggled hard with his fanaticism; and he had wept as well as prayed before he could bring himself to vote the king's death. Moreover, like the rest of these extraordinary fanatics, Harrison was averse to intolerance, persecution, and cruelty of any kind. But where he now stood mercy was hopeless, and the law clearly against him. He heard the sentence of death for treason, which was now revived in all its monstrosity, without emotion; and he said, as he was withdrawn from the bar, that he had no reason to be ashamed of the cause in which he had been engaged.[2] Colonel Carew, who entertained the same notions both in politics and religion as Harrison, made the same sort of defense, and displayed the same visionary enthusiasm and courage. He exclaimed, "I can say in the presence of the Lord, who is the searcher of all hearts, that what I did was in his fear; and I did it in obedience to his holy and righteous laws." [Here the people present made a loud, humming noise; a sort of interruption which was rather frequent during these trials.] When allowed to proceed he spoke of the beginning and causes of the late troubles, of the invasions upon law and liberty made by the late king, of the perfect accord (for a long time) between both Houses to resist these innovations, of the declarations and remonstrances that had so publicly passed between the king and parliament concerning the beginning of the wars. [And, here, Sir Orlando Bridgman, who sat in the midst of men who had had the greatest hand in these beginnings, and declarations, and remonstrances, interrupted him, and told him that they could not listen to any such discourse.] But, again, Carew returned to parliamentary history and the great remonstrance printed in 1642. [And here, again, he was stopped by Sir Orlando Bridgman, who told him that he must not cast in bones to make dissension and difference.] But Carew was not easily silenced: "I say," he exclaimed, "that the Lords and Commons, by their joint declaration" —["Hold! hold!" cried Mr. Justice Foster, "not so fast. You go to raise up those differences which I hope are asleep, to make new troubles, to revive those things which by the grace of God are extinct..... Did you ever hear of an act of parliament made by the House of Commons alone? You have no precedent"]. To this Carew replied in two or three words, which embraced the whole difficulty of the case: "Neither was there ever such a war or such a precedent." Arthur Annesley,[1] a Presbyterian member of the Long Parliament, who was created Earl of Anglesey soon after these trials, reproached the prisoner with the forcible exclusion of all the Presbyterian members in 1648. "I was a stranger," said Carew, "to many of those things which you charge against me; but this is strange, you give evidence as a witness, though sitting here as a judge!" Like Harrison, Carew most solemnly asserted that he was satisfied in his own conscience that what he had done he had done from the Lord. Bridgman stopped him, exclaiming—"This is not to be endured: it is suffering poison to go about to infect the people." Carew then attempted to address the jury, but he was again interrupted. "I have desired," said he, "to speak the words of truth and soberness, but have been hindered:" and then, with the air of a martyr glorying in his cause, he listened to the hurried verdict and the atrocious sentence.

[1] Ludlow, who had fled and got safely into Switzerland, says, "This important business had been delayed during the time that Mr. Love was to continue sheriff of London, he being no way to be induced, either for fear or hopes, to permit juries to be packed in order to second the designs of the court."

These details may convey a sufficient notion of the court and jury which had met to condemn, and which did condemn with indecent haste, every prisoner brought before it; but there are a few particular circumstances which demand notice. Colonel Scrope, an accomplished and amiable man, who had

[1] That is to say, Oliver Cromwell and his friends, who had all been at one time the bosom friends of Harrison.

[2] Ludlow says—"And that the inhumanity of these men may the better appear, I must not omit that the executioner, in an ugly dress, with a halter in his hand, was placed near the major-general, and continued there during the whole time of his trial; which action I doubt whether it was ever equaled by the most barbarous nations." It had been the custom, however, in cases of treason, to place the headsman with his ax by the side of the prisoner at the bar; and, when sentence was pronounced, the edge of the ax was turned toward the prisoner. For one example see the case of the Duke of Buckingham, in the reign of Henry VIII., vol. ii. page 332.

surrendered under the royal proclamation, and who had been regularly admitted to the king's pardon upon penalty of a year's value of his estate, as a fine to the crown, was condemned through the evidence of the Presbyterian Major-general Browne, now lord mayor of London, who had nothing to reveal but a private conversation which had taken place between him and Scrope in the speaker's chamber, where Scrope had said, or was made by this Browne to have said, that there would still be a difference of opinion among men touching the execution of the late king. Harry Marten, the wit of the House of Commons, and one of the stanchest republicans that ever sat in it, demanded the benefit of the act of oblivion. He was interrupted, and told that he must plead guilty or not guilty; and that, if he demanded the benefit of the act of oblivion, it would be taken as a clear confession of guilt. He attempted to speak as to his conception of that act; but he was again coarsely interrupted, and told that he must plead. "If I plead," said Marten, "I lose the benefit of the act." The court told him that he was totally excepted out of the act. "No," said he, "my name is not in the act." "Show him the act of indemnity," said the solicitor-general. The act was shown. "Here," said the droll, "it is Henry Marten: my name is not so—it is Harry Marten!" The court told him that the difference of the sound was very little. "I humbly conceive," rejoined he, "that all penal statutes ought to be correctly worded." "Are you guilty or not guilty?" cried the clerk. "I am not Henry Marten," was the reply. Then the solicitor-general cited what he said was somewhat parallel to this, in a case formerly of Baxter, where the name was Bagster, and adjudged all one, being the same sound. As he was not admitted to stand on the misnomer, Marten pleaded not guilty. After much vehement talk the counsel for the prosecution was interrupted by the prisoner, who said that he did not decline a confession as to matter of fact, provided the malice were set aside, as he had done nothing maliciously or murderously and traitorously. Here the counsel for the crown laughed in his face; and Bridgman told him that what was alledged in the indictment as maliciously, murderously, and traitorously, was the consequence of law; and if a man met another in the street, and ran him through, though but an ordinary watchman, there would be malice by the law in the fact. The solicitor-general said, sarcastically, "My lord, he does think a man may sit upon the death of the king, sentence him to death, sign a warrant for his execution, meekly, innocently, charitably, and honestly." The ready-witted Marten calmly replied, "I shall not presume to compare my knowledge in the law with that of that learned gentleman, but, according to that poor understanding of the law of England that I am capable of, there is no fact that he can name that is a crime in itself but as it is circumstantiated. Of killing a watchman, as your lordship instanced, a watchman may be killed in not doing his office, and yet no murder." "We shall prove," said the crown counsel, "against the prisoner at the bar—because he would wipe off malice—that he did all very merrily, and was in great sport at the time of signing the warrant for the king's execution." "Then, surely," said Marten, "that does not imply malice." Here a serving-man of the name of Ewer, who had "some time served him," was put into the witness box. After being browbeaten by the counsel, this man said, "My lord, I did see a pen in Mr. Cromwell's hand, and he marked Mr. Marten in the face with it, and Mr. Marten did the like to him; but I did not see any one set his hand, though I did see parchment there with a great many seals on it." [And this is all the evidence we have for a story which is constantly quoted to prove the barbarous and rustic buffoonery of Cromwell.] After this Ewer had spoken to prove "how merry Marten was at the sport." Sir Purbeck Temple spoke to prove "how serious he was at it," and how he had been the first to propose that the late king should be prosecuted in the name of the Commons and parliament assembled, and all the good people of England.

"My lord," said the prisoner, "the original commission went in the name of the Commons assembled in parliament and the good people of England; and what a matter is it for one of the commissioners to say, let it be acted by the good people of England." "You know all good people did abhor it. I am sorry to see you in so little repentance!" exclaimed the solicitor-general. "My lord," rejoined Marten, "if it were possible for that blood to be in the body again, and every drop that was shed in the late wars, I could wish it with all my heart; but, my lord, I hope it is lawful to offer in my own defense that which, when I did it, I thought I might do. My lord, there was the House of Commons, as I understood it: perhaps your lordships think it was not a House of Commons, but it was then the supreme authority of England; it was so reputed both at home and abroad. My lord, I suppose he that gives obedience to the authority in being de facto, whether de jure or no, I think he is of a peaceable disposition, and far from a traitor. My lord, I think there was a statute made in Henry the VII. his time, whereby it was provided that whosoever was in arms for the king de facto, he should be indemnified though that king de facto was not so de jure; and if the supreme officers de facto can justify a war (the most pernicious remedy that was ever adjudged by mankind, be the cause what it will), I presume the supreme authority of England may justify a judicature, though it be but an authority de facto. My lord, if it be said that it was but a third estate, and a small parcel of that, my lord, it was all that was then extant. I have heard lawyers say that, if there be commons appurtenant to a tenement, and that tenement be all burnt down except a small stick, the commons belong to that one small piece, as it did to the tenement when all standing. My lord, I shall humbly offer to consideration whether the king were the king indeed; such a one whose peace, crown, and dignities were concerned in public matters. My lord, he was not in execution of his offices—he was a prisoner. My lord, I will not defer you long, neither would I be offensive. I had then, and I have now, a peaceable inclination—a resolution to submit to the government that God hath set over me. I think his majesty that now is, is king upon the best title under heaven; for he was called in by the representative body of England. I shall, during my life, long or short, pay obedience to him: besides, my lord, I do owe my life to him, though I am not acquitted for this. I do confess I did adhere to the parliament's army heartily: my life is at his mercy: if his grace be pleased to grant it, I have a double obligation to him." The solicitor-general took umbrage at the enunciation of the great constitutional principle. "He hath owned the king," said he, "but thinks his best title is the acknowledgment of the people, and he that hath that, let him be who he will, hath the best title." After a little consultation the jury returned a verdict of guilty; but the near prospect of a horrible death could not abate the courage of the witty Harry Marten, who left the court with a light heart and steady step. The court had resolved to fix the act of beheading the late king upon William Hewlet, against whom a bill of indictment was found on the 12th of October, or three days after the beginning of these trials. The evidence produced in this case was not sufficient to hang a dog. One Nelson swore that, some five or six years since, he had discoursed with Colonel Axtell, on the platform of Dublin Castle, concerning the execution of the late king "of glorious memory." "The colonel," said this Nelson, "was pleased to tell me this:—saith he, The persons that were employed in that service, you know them as well as I do. Truly, sir, not I, said I; I saw them in vizards. Yet, said he, you do know them. It is true, saith he, myself and others were employed in that affair, in order to the execution; but there were several persons came and offered themselves, out of a kind of zeal, to do the thing; but we did not think it proper to employ persons whom we did not know; but we made choice of a couple of stout persons. Pray let me hear their names, said I. Saith he, it was Hewlet and Walker. I desired to know their reward. Truly, saith he, I do not know whether £30 a-piece or between them. I said it was a small reward for a work of that nature. Truly, saith he, that was all." One Richard Gittens, a common soldier, who had belonged to the same regiment, swore that he and about thirty-eight of his comrades were sworn to secrecy by their colonel; who, after he had sworn them, asked which of them would "do the thing" for £100 down and preferment in the army. "We refused," continued this witness, "every one of us, and we thought that Hewlet did refuse; but, after all refused, it seems he did undertake to do the deed. . . . . As far as I can guess, Hewlet was with the king on the scaffold. . . . I thought it was he, by his speech. I said to Atkins I would not do it for all the city of London. No, nor I neither, quoth Atkins, for all the world: but you shall see Hewlet quickly come to preferment. And presently after he was made captain-lieutenant." Then the counsel for the crown put these leading questions:—Did you know his voice? Did you mark the proportions of his body and the disguise he was in?" "Yes," replied this witness, who had sworn to an impossibility, or that he himself was in two places at one and the same time—in Scotland-yard and on the end of the scaffold; "and, for his disguise, he had a pair of frieze trunk breeches, and a visor, with a gray beard; and after that time the colonel, Hewson, called him 'father gray-beard,' and most of the army besides." One Stammers, another common soldier, who had served in Ireland under Hewlet, deposed, in bold defiance of common sense, that the officer betrayed his secret to him the first time they ever met. "He examined me," said this witness, "where I had served. I told him I did formerly belong to the Lord of Inchiquin. He asked me if I was ever in the king's army. With that he walks about the room two or three turns: saith he, I was the man that beheaded King Charles, and, for doing of it, I had an hundred pounds; saying, I was only a sergeant at that time." Captain Toogood deposed that Colonel Hewson had told him that Hewlet was "a very mettled fellow;" that "it was he that did the king's business for him upon the scaffold;" that afterward Colonel Pretty told him (the witness) that Colonel Hewson had told him (Pretty) that Hewlet either cut off the king's head or held it up and said, Behold the head of a traitor!—that he (the witness) "saw the person that did it;" and "thought he did resemble Hewlet:" that he once met Hewlet at the White Horse in Carlow, and asked him "whether he was the man that cut off the king's head or not?"—and that Hewlet said, "What I did I will not be ashamed of—if it were to do again I would do it;" and, lastly, that he had observed in Ireland "that it hath been generally reported that he was either the man that cut off the king's head, or that held it up; and that he heard them sometimes call him grandsire gray-beard." One Davies deposed that Hewlet went with him to a tavern in Dublin to drink wine: "before we had drunk out the last pint of wine, said I to Captain Hewlet, I pray resolve me this one question: it is reported that you took up the king's head, and said, Behold the head of a traitor. Sir, said he, it was a question I never resolved any man, though often demanded; yet, saith he, whosoever said it then, it matters not; I say it now, it was the head of a traitor." The evidence of other witnesses was still more vague and valueless; and, such as it was, its weight was counterbalanced by that of other witnesses produced by the prisoner, who, however, according to the law as it then stood, or at least the practice of the courts, could not be examined upon oath, although, as the Lord Chief Baron intimated, they might say something tending to the information of the jury." A sheriff's officer deposed that one John Rooten told him he was in Rosemary-lane, a little after the execution, drinking with the common hangman, who confessed that he struck off the king's head, and had forty half-crowns for his pains. Abraham Smith, a London waterman, deposed that he had carried the common hangman away from Whitehall in his boat immediately after the blow was struck on the scaffold;[1] and one Coxe said, "When my Lord Capel, Duke Hamilton, and the Earl of Holland were beheaded in the Palace-yard in Westminster, my Lord Capel asked the common hangman, said he, Did you cut off my master's head? Yes, saith he. Where is the instrument that did it? said my lord. He then brought the ax. Is this the same ax?—are you sure? said my lord. Yes, my lord, saith the hangman; I am very sure it is the same. My Lord Capel took the ax and kissed it, and gave him five pieces of gold. I heard him say, sirrah, wert thou not afraid? Saith the hangman, They made me cut it off, and I had thirty pound for my pains." One Abell affirmed that he had heard one Gregory confess that he cut off the king's head; and another witness, that he was with his master when his master asked Brandon, the hangman, whether he cut off the king's head or no, and, in his presence, Brandon confessed he was the man that did it. This evidence for the prisoner was at least as good as that for the prosecution; but Bridgman summed up, and the jury, "after more than an ordinary time of consultation," returned a verdict of guilty against Hewlet. There was, however, some sense of shame left in this restored government; and as people began to talk loudly of the insufficiency of the proofs, Hewlet was not executed.[2]

Garland, another of the selected victims, said that he had come into court with the intention of waiting and submitting to the king's mercy; but that, having heard some fresh scandal cast upon him which he had never heard before, he desired to be put on his trial. The scandal was, that he, on the day of sentence, did spit in the king's face—another story which has been constantly repeated without any attention to its origin or the proof on which it rests. "I am willing to confess this," said the prisoner: "I sat in the high court, and I signed the warrant for execution." "And we will prove," said the solicitor-general that he spit in the king's face." "I pray you," said Garland, earnestly, "let me hear that! But for that false scandal I would not have put you to any trouble at all." Here one Clench, a low and needy person, was produced to swear that he saw Garland spit, and the king put his hand in his left pocket, though whether his majesty wiped it off or not he could not say. "The king wiped it off," said the solicitor-general, pretending to know more than this the sole witness did; "but he will never wipe it off so long as he lives." "I am afraid," said Garland, "that this witness is an indigent person: if I was guilty of this inhumanity, I desire no favor from Almighty God. . . . You can not be satisfied that I did such an inhuman act. I dare appeal to all the gentlemen here, or any others, whether they ever heard of such a thing: nor was I ever accused of it till now." He appealed to all that knew him to say whether he had ever shown any malignity, any disrespect; whether, instead of ever doing any wrong to any of the king's party when in distress, he had not helped them as much as he was able. He was condemned with the rest, but sentence was never executed—a pretty plain proof that the story about the spitting was discredited even then. John Coke, the able lawyer who had conducted the prosecution against the king as solicitor for the commonwealth and people of England, pleaded that he could not be said to have contrived or counseled the death of Charles, because the proclamation for the trial, even by the confession of his accusers, was published the day before he was appointed solicitor to the High Court of Justice; that he who had neither been accuser, witness, jury, judge, or executioner, could not be guilty of treason; that, having acted only as counsel, he was not answerable for the justice or injustice of the cause he had managed: that being placed in that post by a public order, it could not be said he had acted maliciously or with a wicked intention as set forth in the indictment; that to pray and demand justice could not in itself be treason; that when he demanded justice, it might be meant of acquittal as well as of condemnation; that, if it should be accounted treason in counsel to plead against the king, it must also be felony to plead against any man that might be unjustly condemned for felony; that the High Court of Justice, though now called tyrannical and unlawful, was yet a court that had officers attending them, and, as many still thought, authority, there being then no other in the nation than that which gave them their power; and that, if this would not justify a man for acting within his own sphere, it would not be lawful for any one to exercise his profession. But this reasoning was not likely to be of any avail; and it was settled that Coke should be one of the first to suffer. Hugh Peters, the celebrated preacher, who was not so directly implicated in the king's death as many who were allowed to escape, was charged with encouraging the soldiers to cry out for justice—with comparing the king to Barabbas—with preaching upon the texts, "They shall bind their kings in

[1] This deposition is very curious. "My lord," said the boatman, "as soon as that fatal blow was given, I was walking about Whitehall: down came a file of musketeers; the first word they said was this—Where be the bargemen? Answer was made, Here are none: away they directed the hangman into my boat. Going into the boat, he gave one of the soldiers a half-crown: said the soldiers, Waterman, away with him—be gone quickly: but I, fearing this hangman had cut off the king's head, I trembled that he should come into my boat, but dared not to examine him on shore, for fear of the soldiers: so out I lanched, and, having got a little way in the water, said I, Who the devil have I got in my boat?—says my fellow, says he, Why? I directed my speech to him, saying, Are you the hangman that hath cut off the king's head? No, as I am a sinner to God, saith he, not I. He shook every joint of him. I knew not what to do. I rowed away a little farther, and fell to a new examination of him when I had got him a little farther. Tell me true, said I, are you the hangman that hath cut off the king's head? I can not carry you, said I. No, saith he, I was fetched with a troop of horse, and I was kept a close prisoner at Whitehall, and truly I did not do it: I was kept a close prisoner all the while, but they had my instruments. I said I would sink the boat if he would not tell me true; but he denied it with several protestations."—From the account of the trials of the Regicides, published in 1660, by order of government.

chains," "Whosoever sheddeth man's blood by man shall his blood be shed," and the like. He was also accused of saying that the Levites, Lords, and Lawyers (which he designated the three L's, or the Hundred and Fifty, in relation to the numerical value of those letters) must be taken away in order to establish a commonwealth; that the king was a tyrant, and that the office itself was chargeable, useless, and dangerous. Peters, whose fanaticism has been exaggerated, and whose merits have been overlooked, pleaded that he had been living fourteen years out of England; that when he came home he found the civil wars begun; that he had begun no war, nor had been the trumpeter of any; that he had fled from the war into Ireland; that he was neither at Edge Hill nor Naseby; that he had looked after three things—that there might be sound religion, that learning and laws might be maintained, and that the suffering poor might be cared for—and that he had spent most of his time in these things; that, upon his being summoned into England he considered it his duty to side with the parliament for the good of his country, and that in so doing he had acted without malice, avarice, or ambition, being respectful to his majesty and kind and merciful to the royalist sufferers whenever he was able;[1] and that, whatever prejudices or revenge might possess men's minds, there was a God that knew all he said to be true—a God that still had a regard to the people of England. The jury, after very little consultation, returned a verdict of guilty. Colonels Axtell and Hacker, who had assisted at the trial and execution, pleaded that, as military men, they were bound, under pain of death, by martial law, to obey the orders of their superiors; that the Earl of Essex, the Earl of Manchester, Sir Thomas Fairfax, and even Monk, who sat upon the bench as one of their judges, had set them an example; that whatever they had done had been by an authority that was not only owned and obeyed at home, but also acknowledged by princes and states abroad to be the chief authority of the nation; and that the judges of England, who ought to be the eye and guide of the people, had acted under that authority, divers of them publicly declaring that it was lawful to obey it. But the jury returned a hasty verdict of guilty against them.

The first that suffered was Major-general Harrison—Harrison, whose honest, soldier-like appearance and gallant bearing had removed the suspicions and excited the involuntary admiration of the captive Charles.[1] On the 13th of October he was drawn upon a hurdle from Newgate to Charing Cross, within sight of Whitehall, where the late king had suffered. His most sincere enthusiasm, political as well as religious, glowed more warmly than ever at the close approach of torture and death. He told the sheriff that his support was in his conviction that his sufferings were upon the account of Jehovah the Lord of Hosts. His prayers were now clearly answered. "For many a time," said he, "have I begged of the Lord, if he had any hard thing, any reproachful work, or contemptible service to be done by his people, that I should be employed in it." As he was dragged along, his countenance being placid and even cheerful, a low wretch in the crowd, called after him in derision, and said, "Where is your good old cause now?" Harrison, with a smile, clapped his hand on his heart, and said, "Here it is! and I am going to seal it with my blood." And several times on his way he said aloud, "I go to suffer upon the account of the most glorious cause that ever was in the world." He ascended the scaffold under the tall gibbet with an undaunted countenance; and thence he made a speech of some length to the multitude, telling them that they themselves had been witnesses of the finger of God in the deliverance of the people from their oppressors, and in bringing to judgment those that were guilty of blood; that many of the enemies of the Commonwealth were forced to confess that God was with it; that for himself he blessed God for accounting him worthy to be instrumental in so glorious a work; that, though wrongfully charged with murder, he had ever kept a good conscience both toward God and toward man; that he had no guilt upon his conscience, but comfort and consolation, and the glorious hope of peace in heaven. The courtly crew that gained most by the event, that were inconceivably vain of a few insignificant graces they had borrowed from the French during their compulsory travels, made it their boast that the Restoration was the bright dawn of civilization to this gross and benighted island; but in truth the best parts of civilization were darkened and not brightened, and humanity and decency, which had been advancing, were made to retrograde with giant strides. The revolting indecencies, the atrocious cruelties which had been awarded in the dark ages in cases of treason, but from which the commonwealth-men and Cromwell had turned with horror and disgust, were all revived; the sentence was executed upon Harrison to the very letter; and the second Charles, whose vices have been varnished by certain writers till they look almost like virtues, and till he appears in the light of an easy, good-natured, and debonnair prince, a little dissipated and nothing worse, witnessed at a short distance, the detestable scene. Harrison was cut down alive, and saw his own bowels thrown into the fire, and then he was quartered, and his heart, yet palpitat-

[1] In the course of his defense Peters said—"I do not deny but that I was active, but not to stir in a way that was not honorable. I challenge a great part of the nations to manifest my carriage among them; I shall make it good divers ways:—I had so much respect to his majesty, particularly at Windsor, that I propounded to his majesty my thoughts three ways to preserve himself from danger; which were good, as he was pleased to think, though they did not succeed, and the work died: as for malice, I had none in me. It is true there was a difference among us, and an army. I never had a groat or a penny from Oliver Cromwell since I knew this place; I profess I have had no ends for honor or gain since I set foot upon this shore; I challenge any man that belonged to that party whether they had not the same respect from me as my own party; I have not persecuted any with malice. . . . I was so far from malice that I have a certificate, if worth the reading, from one of the eminentest persons in the nation to show I had no malice. It is concerning the Marquis of Worcester, under his lady's hand, beginning with these words:—'I do here testify that, in all the sufferings of my husband, Mr. Peters was my great friend,' &c. I have here a seal (and then produced it) that the Earl of Norwich gave me to keep for his sake, for saving his life, which I will keep as long as I live."

ing, was torn out and shown to the people. The following day was a Sunday, but on the day after, the 15th of October, John Carew suffered the same pains in the like manner, declaring with his last breath that, if it were to be done again, he would do it, and that the blessed cause would not be lost. The day following Coke and Hugh Peters were drawn to the same shambles. In the hurdle which carried Coke was placed the ghastly head of Harrison, with the face uncovered and turned toward Coke, who was, however, animated by the sight with fresh courage, instead of being overpowered with fear and horror. The people expressed their detestation of such usage. On the scaffold Coke declared, among other things, that he had been earnest for the reform of the laws and for the expeditious and cheap administration of justice;[1] and that, as for the part he had borne in the action with which he was charged, he was far from repenting what he had done, and most ready to seal it with his blood. Hugh Peters was made to witness all the horrible details of Coke's execution, sitting within the rails which surrounded the scaffold.[2] While there, a man upbraided him with the king's death, using opprobrious language. "Friend," said Peters, "you do not well to trample upon a dying man; you are greatly mistaken: I had nothing to do in the death of the king." As he was going to his execution, he looked about him and espied a man he knew, to whom he gave a piece of money, having bent it first, and desired him to go to the place where his dear daughter lodged, and carry that piece of gold to her as a token, letting her know that his heart was as full of comfort as it could be; and that before that piece should come to her hands he should be with God in glory. And the old preacher, who had lived in storms and whirlwinds, died with a quiet smile on his countenance. On the next day Scott, Clement, Scrope, and Jones suffered; and, on the day after that, Hacker and Axtell. Scott attempted several times to address the people, but he was always interrupted, as the government now began to dread the effect of such discourses. "Surely," said Scott, it must be a very bad cause which can not suffer the words of a dying man;" and so saying he resigned himself to death with the same courage as the rest. Some of these ten men were oppressed with age and sickness, but there was not one of them that betrayed either fear or repentance. Notwithstanding the great pains taken at different periods to brutalize them, the English people have never been able to tolerate any very prolonged exhibition of this kind. "Though the regicides," says Burnet, "were at that time odious beyond all expression, and the trials and executions of the first that suffered were run to by vast crowds, and all people seemed pleased with the sight, yet the odiousness of the crime grew at last to be so much flattened by the frequent executions, and by most of those who suffered dying with much firmness and show of piety, justifying all they had done, not without a seeming joy for their suffering on that account, that the king was advised not to proceed farther; or, at least, not to have the scene so near the court as Charing Cross."[1] The processes of hanging, drawing, and quartering were therefore suspended for the present, but with the evident intention of renewing them at some future time; and though in the end none of the other nineteen victims now condemned suffered death, other victims did, and the fate of nearly all of the nineteen that were sentenced and spared was as hard as perpetual imprisonment, dungeons, and beggary could make it. Harry Marten lay in prison expecting death, but some of the royalists visited him and advised him to petition parliament. In his petition the witty republican said that he had surrendered in reliance upon the king's declaration of Breda, and that he hoped that he who had never obeyed any royal proclamation before should not be hanged for taking the king's word now. The Commons took no step on the side of mercy, and those members who prided themselves on their gravity and godliness opined that the wit ought to die. But the Lords were more merciful; the Lord Falkland and other peers spoke warmly in his behalf, and, after four months of doubt, Marten got the sentence of death remitted.[2]

About a month before the execution of Harrison the Duke of Gloucester died of the small-pox. He was the most virtuous of the three royal brothers, and by far the most beloved; but, like the other two, he was strongly suspected of papistry. And about a fortnight after the executions, the queen-mother, Henrietta Maria, with the princess royal and a numerous train of French nobles, arrived, and was received with great state and triumph. To prepare the way for the widow of the "glorious martyr," a lying life of her had been published;[3] but the Londoners could not altogether forget facts or overcome their old antipathies, and, in spite of the pageant got up by authority, they showed rather plainly that her coming was not welcome. A few days before her arrival, Lord Chancellor Clarendon's daughter, Anne Hyde, had been delivered of a son, only about six weeks after her marriage to the Duke of York, who, however, was said to have owned a private marriage, or contract of marriage, with her about a year before.[4] The pride of the

[2] According to Ludlow, "When this victim (Coke) was cut down and brought to be quartered, one Colonel Turner called to the sheriff's men to bring Mr. Peters to see what was doing; which, being done, the executioner came to him, and, rubbing his bloody hands together, asked him how he liked that work? He told him he was not at all terrified, and that he might do his worst. And when he was upon the ladder, he said to the sheriff, Sir, you have butchered one of the servants of God before my eyes, and have forced me to see it in order to terrify and discourage me; but God has permitted it for my support and encouragement."

[3] Pepys says, sarcastically, that this "sillily writ" book was "dedicated to that paragon of virtue and beauty, the Duchess of Albemarle" —i.e., Monk's wife.

[4] Pepys, Diary.—Clarendon says that the queen-mother was furious, and that her friend, Sir Charles Berkley, then captain of the duke's queen-mother was greatly irritated by the thought of this "debasing alliance:" and her daughters, the Princess of Orange and the Princess Henrietta, were equally violent against it. The king had also felt, or pretended, very strong objections; but, from various accounts, we are disposed to believe that he was all along jealous of his brother, and not very sorry to see him take a step which would lessen him in the eyes of the world. Clarendon, the father of the stray lady—the model and idol of politicians of a certain class—professed the greatest horror and abhorrence of the mischiefs which such a mésalliance would produce on royalty; and he informs us himself that he told his master, Charles, "that he had much rather his daughter should be the duke's whore than his wife;" that, if the marriage had really taken place, he would give a positive judgment "that the king should immediately cause the woman to be sent to the Tower, and to be cast into a dungeon, under so strict a guard that no person living should be permitted to come to her, and then that an act of parliament should be immediately passed for the cutting off her head, to which he would not only give his consent, but would very willingly be the first man to propose it."[1] But, notwithstanding this mock Virginius*ism*, on the wrong side, the great chancellor is said by others to have labored in secret to promote the marriage, and to have at last removed the queen-mother's strong objections by engaging to get parliament to pay her great debts.[2] And about six weeks after Henrietta Maria's arrival at court the marriage was publicly owned, and the nobility and gentry paid their respects to her highness the Duchess of York, who was still at her father's, in Worcester House, in the Strand, where the marriage had been performed, and all kissed her hand.[3] A few days after, the Princess of Orange, who had come over to salute the king, her brother, died of the small-pox; but these melancholy events scarcely checked for a moment the immorality of Charles's court.[4] A marriage was proposed between the Princess Henrietta and Philip Duke of Orleans, only brother of Louis XIV., which took place soon after.

The convention parliament had met again on the 6th of November. The Commons announced that they had prepared a bill for giving the king's "healing declaration" about religion the force of law; and the Presbyterian ministers presented an address to his majesty, thanking him for that grateful act. But Charles, Clarendon, and the bishops had fully arranged measures for converting this healing declaration into a piece of waste paper. The bill for making it law was lost in the House of Commons by a majority of 183 to 157; and the compromising and duped Presbyterians were whistled down the wind with no trifling loss of reputation. According to a manuscript diary quoted in the old Parliamentary History, Morrice, the creature of Monk, and now secretary of state, and Sir Heneage Finch, solicitor-general, strongly opposed the bill, the latter even saying "that it was not the king's desire that the bill should proceed." Conformity to the church of England was now the law; and the Presbyterians, instead of having part in persecuting the Catholics and sectarians, had a share in their sufferings. Having made this arrangement to please the court, the convention parliament proceeded with other gratifying bills; and on the 8th of December, they attainted Oliver Cromwell, Ireton, and Bradshaw. This vote had another meaning besides that of the forfeiture of the property of the dead, which was too insignificant to excite the cupidity of the wasteful and needy Charles, or the selfish, mean-souled courtiers: on the 30th of January of the following year, the anniversary of the death of Charles I., the solemn recesses of Westminster Abbey were invaded by a brutal crew, acting by authority of the restored king and clergy; the graves were broken open, the coffins of Cromwell, Ireton, and Bradshaw were put upon hurdles and dragged to Tyburn; there, being pulled out of their coffins, the moldering bodies were hanged "at the several angles of that triple tree" till sunset, when they were taken down and beheaded. Their bodies, or, as the court chronicler calls them, "their lothsome carcasses," were thrown into a deep hole under the gallows; their heads were set upon poles on the top of Westminster Hall.[1] With the same decent loyguard, in order to prevent the marriage, solemnly swore that he "had lain with her," i.e., with Anne Hyde. In the chancellor's own words, "He (Sir Charles) had informed the duke that he was bound in conscience to preserve him from taking to wife a woman so wholly unworthy of him; that he himself had lain with her; and that for his sake he would be content to marry her, though he knew well the familiarity the duke had with her. And this evidence, with so solemn oaths presented by a person so much loved and trusted by him, made a wonderful impression on the duke."—Life. Pepys says, "Sir Charles Berkley is swearing that he and others had intrigued with her often, which all believe to be a lie."—Diary. According to Clarendon, when his daughter was in labor, Lady Ormond, the Countess of Sunderland, other "ladies of known honor," and the Bishop of Winchester, were present; and, "in the interval of her greatest pangs," the bishop "asked her whose the child was of which she was in labor?" . . . "Whether she had ever known any other man?" &c. And the young lady averred that the child was the duke's; that she had never had any other lover, and that she considered she was the duke's wife. In the end Berkley ate his words, and said that he had only lied for the good and honor of the royal family. Such a scoundrel was sure of promotion in a court like this: he became privy purse and Earl of Falmouth!

[2] "The queen would fain have undone it; but it seems matters were reconciled on great offers of the chancellor's to befriend the queen, who was much in debt, and was now to have the settlement of her affairs go through his hands."—Evelyn.

[3] "This," continues Evelyn, who had just been performing the ceremony, "was a strange change;—can it succeed well?"

[4] "At court," says Pepys, "things are in very ill condition, there being so much emulation, poverty, and the vices of drinking, swearing, and loose amours, that I know not what will be the end of it but confusion; and the clergy so high, that all people that I meet with do protest against their practice."

[1] Gesta Britannorum, at the end of Wharton's Almanac, as quoted in Harris's Life of Cromwell.—It appears that ladies went to see this precious specimen of Gesta Britannorum. That pleasant rogue Pepys, who had been a great Roundhead and Cromwellian, and who, in his youth, had proposed that the proper text for a funeral sermon upon Charles I. would be—"The memory of the wicked shall rot," mentions, with seeming complaisancy, that his pretty wife had been abroad with my Lady Batton, "seeing of Cromwell, Ireton, and Bradshaw hanged and buried at Tyburn." It was just three days before these brutalities that a proclamation was read in all churches for the keeping forever the 30th of January as a solemn fast for the martyrdom of Charles I. Evelyn, who had a little more morality and decency than Pepys, though he is scarcely entitled to have the epithets of good and gentle so lavished upon him, makes this exulting entry in his diary:—"Jan. 30.—This day were the carcasses of those arch rebels, Cromwell, Bradshaw (the judge who condemned his majesty), and Ireton (son-in-law to the usurper), dragged out of their superb tombs in West-

alty the dean and chapter of Westminster, acting under his majesty's warrant and their own zeal, afterward exhumed the bodies of all who had been buried in the Abbey since the beginning of the civil wars, and threw them in a heap into a deep pit dug in St. Margaret's church-yard. Among others, the inoffensive remains of Oliver Cromwell's mother and daughter, who had both been models of female domestic virtue; of Dorislaus, one of the lawyers employed on the trial of the late king, who had been basely murdered in Holland by the retainers of the present king; of May, the accomplished translator of the Pharsalia and historian of the Long Parliament, whose mild and comprehensive language we have so frequently quoted; of Pym, that great and learned champion of English liberty; and of Blake, the renowned and honest-hearted, the first of naval heroes, were torn from the sacred asylum of the tomb, and cast like dogs into that foul pit.

Notwithstanding its base compliances, Charles was anxious to be rid of the convention parliament, of the legality of whose first assembling and constitution some doubts were entertained by lawyers. His ministers hastened the progress of the money-bills, and agreed to accept half of the revenue derived from the excise, in lieu of the profits formerly drawn from the Court of Wards, which the commonwealth-men had abolished; and the chancellor told them that King Charles, whose time was notoriously spent with mistresses and profligates in theaters and midnight revels, was, like another Constantine, constantly employing himself in conferences with learned men for the settlement of the "languishing church."[1]

Clarendon assured them, moreover, that a desperate plot had been discovered to rescue the condemned regicides, seize the Tower, Whitehall, and Windsor Castle, and, by means of an insurrection in the counties, headed by General Ludlow, to restore the commonwealth; that several suspected persons had been clapped up and examined personally by his majesty, whose eloquence had wrought upon some of them to confess their guilt. General Ludlow was at this moment as far off as Switzerland, trembling for his own life, which was threatened many times by royalist assassins; and it appears either that there was no plot at all or one of a very insignificant kind; and that Clarendon's talk about a general and desperate insurrection was a mere bugbear purposely devised.[2] It is true that there was an insane riot in London a few days after the delivery of the chancellor's speech in parliament; but the number of the rioters was so insignificant, and the whole thing so unconcerted and hopeless, that it could not have been either foreseen or dreaded when it actually occurred. On the night of the 6th of January Venner, a wine-cooper and Fifth-Monarchy man, who had been in trouble for similar outbreaks in Cromwell's time, and who was decidedly mad, inflamed some fifty or sixty visionaries by vehement preaching; and these men rushed from his conventicle in the city, and proclaimed "King Jesus!" They broke the heads of some incredulous watchmen and city-guards, but fled before the lord mayor and the people who took up arms. They concealed themselves for two days in Caen Wood, between the villages of Highgate and Hampstead, during which time the lord mayor pulled down their meeting-house in the city. On the 9th of January they returned, in the belief that neither bullets nor sharp steel could hurt them—broke through the city-gates—routed all the train-bands they met—put the king's life-guards to the run; "and all this in the day-time, when all the city was in arms, and they not in all above thirty-one!"[1] At last they were hemmed in, but they cut their way into a house, which they defended for some time against thousands. They all refused quarter, but about sixteen were taken by force, and kept alive for a worse death: the rest fell with arms in their hands, "shouting that Christ was coming presently to reign on earth." Among the prisoners, who were all tried and executed, was the mad wine-cooper himself. In dissolving the army care had been taken to keep on foot Monk's regiment and a regiment of cavalry; and now, under color of necessity and of apprehension of the great insurrection announced by Clarendon, some new troops were raised and many more officers of the old army put under arrest. The Earl of Southampton, who is generally considered as the most virtuous of Charles's ministers, took alarm at a scheme which was then seriously entertained of raising such a standing army as should put down all opposition to the royal will; and he waited upon the chancellor to expostulate. He said they had felt the effects of a military government, though the men were sober and religious, in Cromwell's time; that he believed vicious and dissolute troops would be much worse; that the king would grow fond of them; that they would become insolent and ungovernable; and that then ministers must be converted into mere tools: he said that he would not look on, and see the ruin of his country begun, and be silent– a white staff should not bribe him. Clarendon admitted that he was in the right, and promised to divert the king minster among the kings, to Tyburn, and hanged on the gallows there from nine in the morning till six at night, and then buried under that fatal and ignominious monument in a deep pit, thousands who had seen them in all their pride being spectators. Look back at November 22, 1658 [Oliver's funeral], and be astonished! and fear God and honor the king, and meddle not with them who are given to change!"

[1] Clarendon told them at the same time that his majesty was not wholly successful—that some men would still preach and write improperly—but that these should soon be reduced by law to obedience.

[2] Under date of the 16th of December, Pepys notes—"In the afternoon I went to Whitehall, where I was surprised with the news of a plot against the king's person and my Lord Monk's; and that since last night there are about forty taken up on suspicion; and, among others, it was my lot to meet with Simon Beale, the trumpeter, who took me and Tom Doling into the guard in Scotland-yard, and showed us Major-general Overton. Here I heard him deny that he is guilty of any such things; but that, whereas it is said that he is found to have brought many arms to town, he says it is only to sell them, as he will prove by oath." And this minute diarist never says a word more about the conspirators. Many of the parliament officers had been arrested previously to the disbanding of the army: and, now that that measure was accomplished, many more were seized out of caution.

[1] Pepys's Diary.—"We did believe them," adds Pepys, "because they were seen up and down in every place in the city, and had been in Highgate two or three days, and in several other places, to be at least five hundred: a thing that never was heard of, that so few men should dare and do so much mischief. Their word was, The King Jesus, and their heads upon the gates!"

from any other force than what might be proper to make a show with and capable of dispersing unruly multitudes. Southampton said that if the standing army went no farther than that, he could bear it; but that it would not be easy to fix such a number as would please the princes and not give jealousy to the people. Clarendon, however, went to the king, and his representations (but no doubt still more the poverty of the court) set aside the grand project for the present.[1] The guards and the new troops that were raised were made up of men recommended by Monk.

"Every one," says a bitter writer, "was now everywhere putting in for the merit of restoration, for no other reason, certainly, but that they might have the reward."[2] The Protestants in Ireland, whether High-Church or Presbyterian, laid claim to Charles's gratitude for having been the first of all his subjects to invite him back, which they had done in a convention, almost immediately after the expulsion of Henry Cromwell. But, on the other side, the Irish papists claimed a reward for their old loyalty and long sufferings under "the late usurpers;" and they humbly prayed for relief as to their forfeited estates, their religion, and liberties. But these papists, notwithstanding their immense superiority in point of number, were the weaker party; to restore their lands would not only make deadly enemies of the Protestant soldiers and adventurers that had got possession of them, but also of powerful companies and individuals of note in England, connected by family or other interests with the occupants: to grant liberty of conscience to the Catholics would be to raise a general Protestant storm throughout all England and Scotland: and Charles was not the prince to run into these dangers either out of gratitude for services rendered to his father, or for the sake of the religion which he secretly preferred. The

Pepys says, a little later—"The lord chancellor, it seems, taking occasion from this late plot to raise fears in the people, did project the raising of an army forthwith, besides the constant militia, thinking to make the Duke of York general thereof. But the House did, in very open terms, say they were grown too wise to be fooled again into another army; and said they had found how that man that hath the command of an army is not beholden to any body to make him king."

Protestants were, therefore, confirmed in possession of all they had got during the Commonwealth; the Catholics were discountenanced; and a strictly high-church government was established in Ireland under the Earl of Orrery, who called a parliament, and passed an "act of settlement," which was held to give legal investment in the forfeited estates to the officers and soldiers who had them for their arrears, to the merchant adventurers who had advanced money to put down the great insurrection, and to those who had become purchasers at a later date. To still the clamors of the papists a court of claims was established to examine into the cases of such as pretended that their property had been illegally confiscated: and in this court Charles sometimes interfered for those whom he was willing to favor. The Protestants were furious at every concession made to the papists, and at the same time the papists complained of this court as denying them justice. The one were resolute to hold what they had gained, the other to recover what they had lost. There was no possibility of reconciling the two interests; and, again, the question of property in this world set men more against each other than their difference of opinion as to the means of attaining to the enjoyment of the next.

In Scotland, the Presbyterians, who composed nearly the entire nation, flattered themselves that they had peculiar claims upon the restored king's gratitude. They had repeatedly taken up arms for monarchy; and, though they had been reduced to a quiescent state by the vigor of Cromwell, they had begun to move again as soon as death had relieved them from the domination of that wonderful man. And was it not from Scotland that Monk, the restorer, had proceeded to execute the great plan? The king, too, had been among them; had taken their covenant; had solemnly sworn to defend their kirk; and he had granted an "act of approbation" to indemnify all of them for earlier occurrences. But Charles, who had no scruples of conscience whatever, held that these oaths and engagements had been made under compulsion; that the Covenanters, while he was among them, had treated him with harshness and indignity; and, if he had any one strong feeling about religions or sects, it was hatred of the strict and formal kirk of Scotland.[1] The Marquis of Argyle, the great chief of the Covenanters, was not without his misgivings, and, on the return of Charles to England, he retired for a time to the Highlands; but his son, the Lord Lorn, who claimed the merit of a constant opposition to the commonwealth-men and Cromwell, hastened to court to congratulate the sovereign; and the marquis himself wrote to the king to ask leave to come and wait upon him. To seize this victim among his mountains and the clans devoted to him would have been a work of difficulty, and therefore Charles replied in a seeming friendly manner. Upon that Argyle posted up to Whitehall, where, being denied admittance, he was seized and sent to the Tower as a traitor and regicide, it being asserted that he had encouraged the commonwealth-men to put the late king to death. The Earl of Glencairn, a leader of the Scottish cavalier party, was sent to Edinburgh to restore the Committee of Estates as it existed in 1650, when Charles was in the country, which Oliver Cromwell had not as yet reduced to a dependency of the English commonwealth. General Middleton, who had made some very unsuccessful attempts at shaking off Cromwell's yoke, was elevated to the Scottish peerage (by the title of Earl of Middleton), and appointed general of the forces and king's commissioner for holding the parliament; but Glencairn was made chancellor, the Earl of Crawford treasurer, the Earl of Rothes president of the council, and the Earl of Lauderdale secretary of state. The chief power was divided for a time between Middleton and Lauderdale, who were fiercely jealous of each other, and each constantly engaged in intrigues to ruin his rival. These selfish, unprincipled, and violent men, partly with the consent of the Scottish parliament, and partly in spite of that disjointed and always ill-constructed legislature, soon erected one of the worst tyrannies that ever cursed a country. The Marquis of Argyle was sent down to be tried by the men that were thirsting for his blood and hungering for his estates. He was charged, in thirty articles, with all possible treasons and crimes—the charges beginning with the rising of the Covenanters, in 1638, and ending with his sitting in Richard Cromwell's parliament in 1659. The delivering of Charles I. to the English at Newcastle—the blood of Montrose and his followers—and all the cruelties that had been committed in the course of the long and fierce conflict in Scotland were heaped upon him with every possible exaggeration. The old marquis, who was assisted by the notoriety of the facts, made an admirable defense. He urged that, during the late unhappy wars, he was but one among a great many, and that he had always acted by authority of parliament; that, as to all things done before the year 1641, the late king had buried them in an act of oblivion then passed, as the present king had done with all things up to the year 1651, so that he could not be bound to answer to any particular before the latter date; that he was absent in England when most of the barbarities set forth against him were committed, without his orders and without his being able to prevent them; that many of these stories were mere inventions, or aggravated much beyond the truth; that Montrose and the fierce clans that followed him had begun the atrocities by burning and blood-shedding; and that the retaliation was natural and inevitable in the heat of the times and the temper of the people; that, as for his compliance with the usurpation, he had not complied till the nation was quite conquered, when he was justified, both by divines and lawyers, in submitting to an inevitable necessity; that this submission was the epidemical sin of the whole nation; and that his compliance with Cromwell might well be excused, seeing that a man so eminent in the law as his majesty's advocate (now his prosecutor) had taken the engagement to the usurper. Here Fletcher, the lord advocate, was so inflamed that he called him an impudent villain! Argyle gravely said that he had learned in his affliction to bear reproaches; but if the parliament saw no cause to condemn him he should not be concerned at the king's advocate's railing. Fletcher afterward inserted an additional article, charging him with accession to the late king's death, offering, as his only evidence, a bold presumption.[1] While the trial was in progress, the Lord Lorn obtained a letter from the king, ordering that the lord advocate should not insist upon any offenses committed previously to 1651, when the present king had given his indemnity, which of course included every thing relating to his father's trial. In the same letter Charles also required that, when the trial was ended, the whole process should be submitted to him before the parliament gave sentence. But the king's commissioner, Middleton, who doubted whether an attainder could be procured if the occurrences of 1648 were passed over—who expected to be enriched by Argyle's

[1] According to Burnet, he was accustomed to say that the Presbyterian was a religion quite unfit for a gentleman!

[1] Cromwell, while he was in Scotland, in 1648, had many long conferences with Argyle, and immediately upon his return to London the treaty with the king in the Isle of Wight was broken off, and the king was brought to trial. Hence Fletcher maintained that it was clear that Cromwell and Argyle had concerted that matter together.

forfeiture—and who, no doubt, had good encouragement in his seeming opposition to the royal will, represented that the staying of sentence till the proceedings were submitted to the king would look "like a distrust of the justice of the parliament;" that it would "much discourage this loyal and affectionate parliament;" and at his instance Charles recalled that part of his letter, and allowed the commissioner to disregard the other part of it, which limited the offenses to the year 1651. Middleton then made a search for precedents of men who had been condemned upon presumptive evidence, and argued the matter in person, hoping that the weight of his authority would bear down all opposition. But Gilmore, though recently promoted to be president of the Court of Session, had the honesty to say, that to attaint Argyle upon such evidence would be more unjust than the much-decried attainder of the Earl of Strafford; and after a fierce debate, in which Middleton stormed and swore, Gilmore carried a majority, and the prisoner was acquitted on that count. Argyle now thought that he was safe; but Middleton resolved to make his compliance with Cromwell high treason. Even here the lord commissioner would have been defeated had it not been for the villainous offices of his friend the Duke of Albemarle. Monk, the restorer—a servant worthy of the prince he had restored—searched among his papers and found some private letters which Argyle had written to him when he (Monk) was the sworn friend of Cromwell and the general of the Commonwealth, and in which the marquis expressed his zeal for the maintenance of that system of government. These private letters Monk sent down to Scotland by an express; and Middleton ordered them to be read in parliament after the production of further evidence was strictly illegal. The effect was instantaneous and fatal: all the friends of the marquis ran out as if a bomb had fallen among them; the rest agreed that these letters proved that the prisoner's compliance with the usurper was not feigned and compulsory, but sincere and voluntary, and they condemned him as guilty of treason. At first they designed that he should be hanged as Montrose had been; but in the end it was carried that he should be beheaded, that his head should be set up over the jail—where the Covenanters had set the head of Montrose—and that this should be done within two days. Argyle begged for ten days' respite, in order that the king's pleasure might be known; but when this was refused he understood the intention of the court, and exclaimed, "I placed the crown upon his head, and this is my reward."[1] No time was lost in showing what feeling the restored government entertained toward the free-spoken ministers of the kirk. Twelve eminent preachers, who came to Edinburgh with a "warm paper," were seized by order of the Earl of Glencairn, the chancellor, together with their remonstrance.[1] After suffering imprisonment, insults, Market-Cross of Edinburgh.—Execution of Argyle. From a Drawing of the time.

[1] When Charles was crowned at Scone, in 1651, Argyle placed the crown upon his head, and at that time it was generally believed that he would soon be the king's father-in-law.

[1] "In it, after some cold compliment to the king upon his restoration, they put him in mind of the covenant which he had so solemnly sworn while among them: they lamented that, instead of pursuing the ends of it in England, as he had sworn to do, he had set up the common prayer in his chapel, and the order of bishops; upon which they

and deadly threats, all these ministers were dismissed except Guthry, who was the author of the paper, and who, ten years before, "had let fly at the king in his sermons." "This personal affront," says Burnet, "had irritated the king more against him than against any other of the party; and it was resolved to strike a terror into them all by making an example of him." The reader will understand that in such a case justice and law were wholly disregarded; and, besides, Middleton, the king's commissioner, had a personal animosity against the preacher, who, in the late times, had excommunicated him. All people were disgusted at Middleton's bloodhound eagerness in the prosecution; but the Earl of Tweeddale was the only one that had courage to urge that death was too severe a punishment—that banishment had been hitherto the severest penalty that had been laid on preachers for any expression of their opinions. Guthry was condemned to die, and he was hanged a few days after the execution of Argyle. With him was hanged one Gowan, who had deserted to Cromwell while the king was in Scotland. "The man," says Burnet, "was inconsiderable till they made him more considered by putting him to death on such an account at so great a distance of time." The fourth victim was Bishop Burnet's own uncle, Johnstone of Warriston, one of the greatest and most eloquent asserters of the covenant, who had done as much as any man in Scotland against episcopacy and the tyranny of Charles I. This old man fled to the continent; but, some time after, the French government gave him up to Charles, and he was sent back to Scotland, and tried and hanged. It had been assumed as a principle that the destroyers of Montrose, the idol of the cavalier party, should feel the full weight of retaliation; and yet Macleod of Assin, who had so infamously betrayed Montrose to his enemies, "was let go without any censure." Burnet attributes this impunity to habits of debauchery in Macleod which were largely sympathized with by the now dominant faction; but probably Macleod's purse and estates told another story. Swinton, who had been attainted for deserting, and who had been the man of all Scotland most trusted and employed by Cromwell, was admitted to mercy, because Middleton, in hatred to Lauderdale, who had got the gift of his estate, recommended him to the king. Many others suffered in liberty and estate; but, as open bribery was a rule of government, and as money bought pardons, no more executions took place at present.

The royal commissioner, Middleton, who treated all state affairs after the fashion of the cavalier camp, and had no patience for details, and no respect for slow constitutional courses, proposed and carried, as the better and shorter way, "a general act rescissory," that is, an act annulling all the proceedings of all the parliaments, conventions, synods, and committees, all the acts of indemnity, &c., that had been held or passed since the year 1633. "This act," says Burnet, "was a most extravagant act, and only fit to be concluded after a drunken bout.[1] It shook all possible security for the future, and laid down a most pernicious precedent." Lauderdale, in his secret, underhand way, was against it, not out of any love for his country, but out of hatred to Middleton. He thought it would be a good handle to a court intrigue whereby to ruin his rival: and he told the king that Middleton was ignorant of the first principles of government, and that he would cut off all hopes of peace and submission in Scotland. Middleton, in his turn, as soon as he had heard of these insinuations, accused Lauderdale of misrepresenting the proceedings of parliament, and of belying the king's good subjects—an offense called in Scottish law lesing-making—and he went so far as to propose that Lauderdale should be impeached. But Clarendon told him that impeachments were dangerous things—that "the assaulting of a minister, as long as he had an interest in the king, was a practice that never could be approved: it was one of the uneasy things that a House of Commons of England sometimes ventured on, which was ungrateful to the court." Thus the matter dropped; and the two rivals, reconciled in appearance, went on in amiable unison to ride rough-shod over the kirk and the laws and liberties of Scotland. "This," says Burnet, who was living in the midst of it, "was a mad, roaring time, full of extravagance; and no wonder it was so when the men of affairs were almost perpetually drunk." They passed an act making the 29th of May a perpetual holyday, since on that happy day the king had been restored and an end put to three-and-twenty years of rebellion. The Presbyterian ministers saw that by observing this act they should condemn all their former proceedings as rebellious and hypocritical; and it was a tenet of the kirk, which had rubbed out all the old rubric, that no human authority could make a day holy—that no day was holy save the Sabbath. But they had not courage to offer a decided resistance, and it was enacted in their presbyteries that they should observe that day as a day of thanksgiving. In spite of the alarming warning held out by the past, and by the fate of the first Charles, it was resolved to set up episcopacy; and Sharp, a minister who was to the Kirk of Scotland what Monk had been to the Commonwealth, pressed Middleton to take advantage of the present general consternation and establish bishops. At the same time he duped his brethren with professions of an ardent zeal for the kirk, and persuaded them to send him up to court as their delegate, assuring them that he would labor to procure the settlement of presbytery on a new and undisputed basis. Sharp, accordingly, went to London, and soon returned Archbishop of St. Andrew's! Other men "were sought out to be bishops," only one of the Scottish prelates of Laud's making being now alive; and these men, after receiving consecration made terrible denunciations of heavy judgments from God on him if he did not stand to the covenant, which they called the oath of God."—Burnet.

1 Burnet says that Sir Archibald Primrose, "the subtilest of all Lord Middleton's creatures," first suggested, "half in jest," this precious act, which was not resolved upon till the conclave "had drunk higher," when, in drunken boldness, it was determined to venture it.

from the Archbishop of Canterbury, hurried down to Scotland, "all in one coach," to take possession of their sees. In the first session of parliament after their arrival, Middleton proposed that, although the act rescissory having annulled all enactments since the year 1633, the old laws in favor of episcopacy were revived, and the bishops had, accordingly, a right to come and take their places in parliament, yet it would be a piece of respect to send a deputation to invite them to resume their seats. This was readily agreed to; and so the bishops again appeared among the lords of parliament. The power in the church of this restored hierarchy was made very absolute, and all meetings of the synods and presbyteries were forbidden in a royal proclamation, under pain of treason. Some of the Presbyterian preachers were summoned before parliament to answer for reflections made in their sermons against episcopacy; and presently all men were required to take the oath of allegiance and supremacy, acknowledging the right of the king to settle religion and the church. In the midst of a general subservience in parliament, two men, the Earl of Cassilis and Dr. Robert Leighton, who had somewhat reluctantly been induced to accept the bishopric of Dunblane,[1] had the courage to resist. Cassilis offered to take the oath, provided he might join his explanation to it; and Leighton said that the land mourned already by reason of the many oaths that had been taken—that this oath was capable of a double meaning—that it ought to be explained and made clear, and that otherwise the imposing of it would look like laying snares for people. To this Sharp, who had so recently worn the Genevan gown himself, replied, with great bitterness and insolence, that it was beneath the dignity of government to make acts to satisfy the weak scruples of peevish men—that it ill became those who had forcibly imposed their covenant on all people without any explanation to expect now such extraordinary favors to themselves. But the enlightened Leighton insisted that the indulgence ought to be granted for that very reason, that all people might see a difference between the mild proceedings of the government now and the proceedings of the Covenanters then; and that it ill became the very same persons who had complained of that rigor to practice it themselves, for thus it would be said that the world goes mad by turns. Middleton, who wanted the oath as a trap for scrupulous consciences, was furious at this philosophical reasoning, which, however, had no effect, and the odious act was made as sharp as Archbishop Sharp and the king's commissioner desired. But, not satisfied with this, they proposed another oath, abjuring formally both the league and covenant and the national covenant; and between these two oaths they drove the Presbyterians from all offices in the church, the state, or magistracy, and not a few of them into perpetual banishment. It is an astounding fact, that, in the country which, a quarter of a century before, had risen like one man against much less than this, not a sword leaped from its scabbard, not a blow was struck for the league and covenant; but the people were stupefied by the suddenness of these proceedings, and they were abandoned and betrayed by the majority of the selfish and time-serving aristocracy.[1]

A.D. 1661. The new English parliament met on the 8th of May. The elections had gone greatly in favor of the royalists and the cavaliers, and the sons of cavaliers predominated; for the great families, the old gentry and the episcopal clergy had recovered and practiced their ancient influence over elections, while the Presbyterians were scared into inactivity—the cavaliers everywhere proclaiming them enemies to monarchy. Not more than fifty or sixty of the Presbyterian party found their way into the House of Commons; all the rest of the members entertained, or were ready to embrace upon advantageous conditions, the most extravagant notions touching the prerogative of the king and the rights of the church. This parliament—for the disgrace of the country—lasted much longer than that which is distinguished in history by the name of the Long Parliament; but a distinctive epithet was not wanting—it was called the Pension Parliament. The House of Commons began with voting that all their members should receive the sacrament by a certain day, according to the rites of the church of England, under pain of exclusion. Alderman Love, who at first stood out, was actually suspended; but, as he afterward sat in the House as an active member of the opposition, he must have conformed like the rest of his brethren, only a little later. Then, in concert with the Lords, the Commons condemned "that great instrument of mischief, the Solemn League and Covenant," to be burned by the common hangman. The acts establishing the Commonwealth, and the chief ordinances of the Long Parliament, were treated in the same manner. They then passed a number of bills, which all had for their object the strengthening of the monarchical government. They declared that there was no legislative power in either or both Houses of parliament without the king—that the sole supreme command of the militia, and of all forces by sea and land, was, and ever had been, by the laws of England, in the crown—that neither House could pretend to it, nor lawfully take up arms against the king in any case whatever—and that an oath should be taken to that effect.[2] They restored the bishops to their seats in the House of Peers; they increased the rigor of the law of treason; they declared it to be a high misdemeanor to call the king a papist; and they materially curtailed one of the most important of the popular rights, the right of petitioning the king or parliament, by enacting that no

[2] The form of the oath was:—"I, A. B., do declare and believe that it is not lawful, upon any pretense whatsoever, to take arms against the king; and that I do abhor that traitorous position of taking arms by his authority against his person, or against those who are commissioned by him: so help me God." And this oath, commonly called the corporation oath, was to be taken by all magistrates and persons bearing offices of trust in corporations. The bill enforcing the oath was not passed till the next session.

petition should have more than twenty signatures, unless by permission of three justices of the peace, or the majority of the grand jury. The cavaliers would also gladly have struck at the Bill of Indemnity, in order to wrench from the adherents of the Commonwealth all the property they had acquired; but Clarendon felt that any invasion of that act would be too dangerous, and the cavaliers were obliged to content themselves with a vote of £60,000 to be distributed among the sufferers of their class, and to confirm the Indemnity Act. At the same time they passed a Bill of Supply for the king; and then (on the 30th of July) this parliament adjourned to the 28th of November.

When they reassembled there was no visible diminution of their loyalty or orthodoxy; and Clarendon excited their zeal by disclosures of a pretended conspiracy, which was said to extend all over the country. The king confirmed the awful disclosures made by the chancellor; but perhaps, at that moment, Charles may have been made to believe that the airy conspiracy really existed. The Commons, in a paroxysm of rage and terror, called for more blood—for the execution of such of the condemned regicides as had hitherto been spared—and demanded the trial of Sir Harry Vane and General Lambert, who had both been excepted from the Act of Oblivion, but recommended by the Convention Parliament to the king, who had promised to spare their lives. But Charles, who never respected a promise, lent a ready ear to the recommendation of the Pension Parliament, and it was arranged that Vane and Lambert should suffer during the next recess. In the mean time, to stay the appetite for vengeance, three distinguished commonwealth-men, the Lord Monson, Sir Henry Mildmay, and Sir Robert Wallop, were drawn upon sledges, with ropes round their necks, from the Tower to the gallows at Tyburn, and then back to the Tower, there to remain prisoners for life. In this session a Conformity Bill, recommended, if not actually drawn up by Clarendon, was debated and passed in all its intolerant rigor, the Lords having vainly attempted to soften some of its clauses. It enacted that every parson, vicar, or other minister, should publicly declare before his congregation his unfeigned assent and consent to every thing contained and prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer; and that every preacher that had not received ordination from the hands of a bishop must submit to that process before the next feast of St. Bartholomew. A few new collects added by the bishops to the prayer-book did not tend to make this act more palatable. In one of these collects a new epithet was added to the title of the openly profane and immoral Charles, he being styled "our most religious king;" and the dissenters "could not down with" the story of Bel and the Dragon, introduced from the Apocrypha; nor with the new holydays, such as St. Barnabas, the Conversion of St. Paul, and the 30th of January, now dedicated to King Charles the Martyr. When the Commons had done with this Conformity Bill, they voted the king a subsidy of £1,200,000, and a hearth or chimney-tax forever:[1] and the parliament was prorogued on the 19th of May with a flattering speech from Charles, who promised to take better care both of his money and his morals.

It was high time, for he was on the eve of marriage. Nearly all the courts of Europe had struggled for the honor of giving a wife to this dissolute, heartless man, for the morals of princes are never nicely weighed in these arrangements; and whatever contempt Charles had excited on the continent as an exiled, errant king de jure, he became one of the most important of crowned heads as de facto king of England. Charles held himself at auction, and Portugal became the highest bidder, offering, with the Princess Catherine, Tangiers, Bombay, the advantages of a free trade, and half a million sterling; and it was resolved that the offer should be accepted, notwithstanding the religion of the princess and the opposition of Spain, which still claimed the Portuguese kingdom, and treated the House of Braganza as rebels and usurpers. The orthodox Clarendon decided Charles in this resolution, in spite of the representations of many of his own party, who rationally feared that the king, already suspected of popery, would be still more mistrusted when he should have a Catholic wife and a mass-chapel in his own house. After some necessary delays that were irksome to the king, not because he longed for the royal bride, but because he was greatly in need of the dower, the treaty was concluded, and Lord Sandwich was dispatched with a small fleet to take possession of Tangiers and bring home the bride and the money. Catherine of Braganza arrived at Portsmouth on the 20th of May, and was there met by her husband, who conducted her in state to Hampton Court. At this time Charles's mistress, en titre, was "one of the race of the Villiers," married to Mr. Palmer, who, on her account, and for his base connivance, was taken into the diplomatic service and raised to the Irish peerage as Earl of Castlemaine. People expected that he would now break with the mistress, or at least manage his intercourse with her as privately as possible. But he was not prepared to make any, the least, sacrifice, either to duty or decency: he dined and supped with my Lady Castlemaine every day and night of the week that preceded the queen's arrival; he was there on the night that bonfires were lighted in the street for that event;[2] he left her to go to his bride; and, when Catherine was established at Hampton Court, he not only presented her himself, but also insisted that she should be one of the queen's ladies of the bedchamber.[3] Clarendon, who

[3] "He (Charles) led her into her chamber and presented her to the queen, who received her with the same grace as she had done the rest, there being many lords and other ladies at the same time there. But whether her majesty, in the instant, knew who she was, or, upon recollection, found it afterward, she was no sooner sat in her chair but her color changed and tears gushed out of her eyes, and her nose bled, and she fainted; so that she was forthwith removed into another room, and all the company retired out of that where she was before. And this falling out so notoriously when so many persons were present, the king looked upon it with wonderful indignation, and as an earnest of defiance for the decision of the supremacy, and who should govern, upon which point he was the most jealous and the most resolute of any worshiped the proprieties and outward appearances, according to his own account, spoke with great boldness to the king on the subject of this scandalous appointment, telling him "of the hard-heartedness and cruelty in laying such a command upon the queen, which flesh and blood could not comply with. The king," says he, "heard him with patience enough, yet with those little interruptions which were natural to him, especially to that part where he had leveled the mistresses of kings and princes with other lewd women, at which he expressed some indignation, being an argument often debated before him by those who would have them looked upon above any other men's wives." But, according to the historian's own account, the moral conversation ended by the king's "requiring him to use all those arguments to the queen which were necessary to induce her to a full compliance with what the king desired." And the lord high chancellor of England —the model Clarendon—who is still styled, by some, one of the most illustrious of Englishmen, one that through all circumstances maintained the innate dignity of his character—the upright minister, the true patriot, and the honest man—undertook the office, and waited several times on the forlorn young queen to prove to her the suitableness of submission and resignation "to whatsoever his majesty should desire of her," and to insinuate (his own words!) "what would be acceptable with reference to the lady." Catherine, who had told this hoary-headed mediator for royal profligacy that she had to struggle with more difficulties than ever woman of her condition had known—that at times she was forced "to give vent to that passion that was ready to break her heart"—now assured him "that the king's insisting upon that particular could proceed from no other ground but his hatred of her person, and to expose her to the contempt of the world, who would think her worthy of such an affront if she submitted to it, which before she would do she would put herself on board any little vessel, and so be transported to Lisbon." The chancellor upon this reminded her "that she had not the disposal of her own person, nor could go out of the house where she was without the king's leave;" and therefore advised her "not to speak any more of Portugal, where there were enough who would wish her to be." The chancellor then made haste to inform his employer of all that had passed, and to request, not that he would give up his design of fixing his mistress constantly in court as the servant of his wife, but that he would forbear pressing the queen in that matter for a day or two till he had once more waited upon her. But, according to his narrative, the king listened to other counselors, and resolved to make his wife submit at once. "The fire flamed that night higher than ever: the king reproached the queen with stubbornness and want of duty, and she him with tyranny and want of affection: he used threats and menaces which he never intended to put in execution, and she talked loudly how ill she was treated, and that she would return again to Portugal.

man; and the answer he received from the queen, which kept up the obstinacy, displeased him more."—Clarendon, Life
