Thinking thus, he went to give food to the animals. Then it was evident to those animals that this king is going to die. Out of the party of animals first a cock says, "His majesty our king is going to be lost. We don't want the food. We shall not receive assistance. Unless his majesty the king perish thus we shall not perish. In submission to me there are many hens. When I have called them the hens come. When I have told them to eat they eat. When I have told them to go they go. The king, having become submissive in that manner to the thing that his wife has said, is going to die."

The king having heard it, laughed at it also.

Then, also, the royal queen asked, "What did you laugh at?"

Thereupon, not saying the [true] word, the king said, "Thinking of constructing a tank, I laughed."

Then the queen said, "Having caused the animals that are in this Lankawa (Ceylon) to be brought, let us build a tank."

Then the king having said, "It is good," caused the animals to be brought. The king having gone with the animals, showed them a place [in which] to build a tank; and telling them to build it came away.

The animals, at the king's command being unable to do anything, all together began to struggle on the mound of earth. Those which can take earth in the mouth take it in the mouth. All work in this manner. The jackal, not doing work, having bounded away remained looking on.

After three or four days, the king having gone [there] trickishly stayed looking on. The king saw that the other animals are all moving about as though working. The jackal, only, having bounded off is looking on.

Having seen it he asked the jackal, "The others are all working. Thou, only, art looking upward. Why?"

Thereupon the jackal said, "No, O lord, I looked into an account."

Then the king asked, "What account art thou looking at?"

The jackal says, "I looked whether in this country the females are in excess or the males are in excess."

The king asked, "By the account which thou knowest, are the females in excess or the males in excess?"

The jackal said, "So far as I can perceive, the females are in excess in this country."

Then the king said that men are in excess. Having said it the king said, "I myself having gone home and looked at the books, if males are in excess I shall give thee a good punishment."

The king having come home and looked at the books, it appeared that the males were in excess. Thereupon the king called the jackal, and said, "Bola, males are in excess."

Then the jackal says, "No, O lord, your majesty, they are not as many as the females. Having also put down to the female account the males who hearken to the things that females say, after they counted them the females would be in excess.”

Then the jackal said, “Are the animals able to build tanks? How shall they carry the earth?”

Thereupon the king having considered it, and having said, “Wild animals, wild animals, you are to go to the midst of the forest,” came home.

At that time, the queen asked, “Is the tank built and finished?”

Then the king, taking a cane, began to beat the queen. Thereupon the queen, having said, “Ané! O lord, your majesty, I will never again say anything, or even ask anything,” began to cry aloud.

The king got to know that the jackal was a wise animal.

SOUTHEAST ASIA

BORNEO

---

THE BEGINNING

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Evans, Ivor H. N. "Folk Stories of the Tempassuk and Tuaran Districts, British North Borneo." The Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 43 (1913): 471–473.

Date: ca. 1910

Original Source: Borneo

National Origin: Malaysia

---

The Southeast Asian region of Borneo, located in the midst of the Indonesian archipelago is the third largest island in the world. In the twenty-first century, it is apportioned among Indonesia, Malaysia, and Brunei. The Dusun, Bajau, and Illanun from whom the following narratives were collected are among the three dozen ethnic groups indigenous to the island. The subsistence bases of the indigenous cultures vary from fishing to agriculture, depending on the region in which each resides. Many groups, such as the Bajau and Illanun, for example, have been profoundly influenced by Islam. Indigenous belief systems are at the core of such narratives as "The Beginning," however. Kenharingan and Munsu-mundok are the primary deities of the Dusuns of Borneo. In the following creation myth, the pair create land and living things as well as introduce death into the universe.

---

At first there was a great stone in the middle of the sea. At that time there was no earth only water. The rock was large and it opened its mouth and out of it came a man and a woman. The man and the woman looked around and there was only water. The woman said to the man, “How can we walk, for there is no land?” They descended from the rock and tried to walk on the surface of the water and found that they could.

They returned to the rock and sat down to think; for a long time they stopped there; then again they walked upon the water and at length they arrived at the house of Bisagit (the spirit of small-pox), for Bisagit had made land though it was very far away. Now the man and his wife were Kenharingan and Munsumundok. They spoke to Bisagit and asked for some of his earth and he gave it to them.

So going home they pounded up the rock and mixed Bisagit’s earth with it and it became land. Then Kenharingan made the Dusun and Munsumundok made the sky. Afterwards Kenharingan and Munsumundok made the sun as it was not good for men to walk about without light. “Then,” said Munsumundok, “there is no light at night, let us make the moon,” and they made the moon and, the seven stars, the blatek and the kukurian [constellations].

Kenharingan and Munsumundok had one son and one daughter. Now Kenharingan’s people wept because there was no food. So Kenharingan and Munsumundok killed their girl child and cut it up, and from the different portions of its body grew all things good to eat: its head gave rise to the coconut, and you can see the marks of its eyes and mouth on the coconut till this day; from its arm-bones arose sugar cane; its fingers became bananas and its blood [rice] padi. All the animals also arose from pieces of the child.

When Kenharingan had made everything he said, “Who is able to cast off his skin? If anyone can do so, he shall not die.” The snake alone heard and said, “I can.” And for this reason, till the present day, the snake does not die unless killed by man. (The Dusun did not hear or they would also have thrown off their skins and there would have been no death.) Kenharingan washed the Dusun in the river, placing them in a basket; one man, however, fell out of the basket and floating away down the river stopped near the coast. This man gave rise to the Bajau who still live near the sea and are skilful at using boats.

When Kenharingan had washed the Dusun in the river he menghadjied [held a ritual for] them in his house, but one man left the house before Kenharingan had menghadjied and went off into the jungle to search for something and when he came back he could not enter the house again for he had become a monkey. This man is the father of the monkeys.

THE THREE RAJAHS

Tradition Bearer: Gergoi

Source: Evans, Ivor H. N. “Folk Stories of the Tempassuk and Tuaran Districts, British North Borneo.” The Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 43 (1913): 463–465.

Date: ca. 1910

Original Source: Borneo

National Origin: Malaysia

---

Myth commonly describes a dividing and ordering process during which the present state of the universe, including ethnic and political systems, is established. In the following narrative, the Dusun of Borneo offer an explanation for the current relationships between themselves, their Islamic neighbors, and the Europeans who colonized Borneo. The custom of taking human heads was common among the Dusun in the relatively recent past. This is especially true at the beginning of the twentieth century when the myth below was performed.

---

Long ago there were no men in this country of the Tempassuk; men's first place was at Naragang Nonok, up country. In this village there were many Nonok trees and men lived in them. When the kampong was over full they called a council and they agreed to divide the country between them. So three men with their wives and children and followers set out at different times from the kampong.

The first man who started at length came to a place where there was a threefold fork in the road; he kept straight on and set a mark on the road by which he had traveled. The second man chose the road to the left hand, and the third took that to the right. So the companions of the first man followed him along the straight road and at last they made a village. The parties of the second and third men, who had gone to the left and right, also made kampongs.

Seven days after the first man had made his kampong a white stag came to the place. The men of the kampong agreed to try and catch the stag, but it always escaped them, although it did not go far away from the village. Now the name of the man who followed the straight road was the Rajah Kapitan and he had seven wives, and he said to them, "I cannot catch this stag; you had better make me some cakes of banana and flour" (linobok). Then the Rajah, taking with him seven cooks to carry his food and baggage, got on his horse and set out to hunt the stag. So he hunted, and at night the Rajah and the stag both stopped.

The next morning, early, as soon as the Rajah had eaten, he again started off after the stag and for three days he chased it, but at last he lost it. Then the Rajah, finding that he did not know where he was, agreed with his men to push on till they should come to some kampong, if there was one. At last they came to a kampong and the Rajah said, "Why, there are other people in this country; I thought that my village was the only one." Then he asked in the village whose it was, and he was told the Rajah Kretan's ["King Shark"] and that the Rajah had seven wives.

“Well,” said the Rajah Kapitan, “if it is true that he has seven wives, he is like me, and I will ask him for betel-nut, telling him, if his wives come to me, to send those that are the most beautiful.” So the Rajah’s two most beautiful wives came to him, one to give him betel-nut and the other to make him rook [cigarettes]. They were lovely, one as a star and the other as the moon. The Rajah Kretan, however, slept in his house. When the two beautiful women had waited upon the Rajah Kapitan he immediately killed them both and cutting off their heads started for home. This he did because he was angry at losing the stag. Then the Rajah Kretan awoke and when he found what had happened he caught his great dog and using it as a horse pursued the Rajah Kapitan. Now the Rajah Kapitan, who was afraid of being attacked because of the heads he had taken, when he had got home made a fort three fathoms in height.

So the Rajah Kretan came to the fort, and his dog jumped the wall. When he had got inside he asked whose kampong it was, and men answered, “The Rajah Kapitan’s.”

“How many wives has he got?” he asked, and a man answered “Seven.”

“If that is so,” said the Rajah Kretan, “let them bring me roko and pinang [betel-nut].” So the two most beautiful wives of the Rajah Kapitan came out to give him roko and pinang, and when he had been served he immediately cut off their heads, and leaping on his dog called out that he was now avenged on the Rajah Kapitan. The dog took the wall at a leap and in a little time the Rajah Kretan was nearly home. Now the Rajah Kretan was the second man who had started from Naragang Nonok, but the Rajah Kapitan knew nothing of the other men who had followed behind him. When the Rajah Kapitan awoke, for he had been asleep, he asked where his two favorite wives were, and he was told how they had been killed.

So he started out alone on his horse to hunt the Rajah Kretan and overtook him just as he was going to enter his house. Then the Rajah Kretan seeing him, threw the heads on the ground and made off on his dog, and the Rajah Kapitan hunted him on his horse. After they had been going thus for a week, the Rajah Kretan running away, and the Rajah Kapitan pursuing him, they left the Rajah Kretan’s country behind and came out upon a plain. So the Rajah Kretan dismounted from his dog and the Rajah Kapitan from his horse and the two fought, but neither conquered the other. Now while they were still fighting they came into a kampong but did not know it until they struck their backs against the posts of the houses. And the men of the kampong were astonished for they saw that the two men were strangers. Then the Rajah Bassi, who was the Rajah of the village, awoke, and coming out of the house, asked why they were fighting, and the Rajah Kapitan told him how he had hunted the stag and how being angry at losing it he had cut off the heads of the Rajah Kretan’s wives. And the Rajah Kretan told him how he had avenged himself on the Rajah Kapitan, and how the latter had pursued him. Then said the Rajah Bassi, “Do not quarrel any more about your wives, for I have twenty-seven who are all beautiful and you can replace your dead wives from them. This only, I beg, do not fight in my country.” So the Rajah Bassi’s twenty-seven wives came out of the house, and the Rajah Kapitan and the Rajah Kretan each chose two wives like their former wives in appearance.

And the Rajah Bassi said, “I have given you wives and you must fight no more; for we three men all came from Naragang Nonok, but I only know the way back. You, Rajah Kapitan, have become a Dusun, you, Rajah Kretan, have become a Mohammedan, while I have become a white man; and in future time if I have any trouble you must give me your help.”

Then the Rajah Kretan and the Rajah Kapitan thanked him and promised to help him. “For,” said they, “you have become a great Rajah and we will help you; and you shall judge us and our children and shall help us in time of sickness.” So the Rajah Bassi said that their answer was good and that they should help him and that he would judge their peoples and give them help, “And,” said he, “you must pay me a yearly tax on each head (male) of your people.” And so to the present day the Rajah Bassi (the white people) judge the Rajah Kapitan (the Dusun), and the Rajah Kretan (the Mohammedans) and take a tax from them for each man. Further he spoke, saying, “There shall be in this pelompong [island] many people, for that is my wish.”

So we Dusun to the present day are descendants of the Rajah Kapitan and the Bajau of the Rajah Kretan, and as the white people are the descendants of the Rajah Bassi we obey the Government and clean the paths and do other work in which the Government asks our help. For the Rajah Bassi said, “Though you have made me great I am mortal and shall die, but I will tell this story to my grandchildren, and you, Rajah Kapitan, and you, Rajah Kretan, shall tell it to yours and they shall observe it.”

AKI GAHUK, THE FATHER OF THE CROCODILES

Tradition Bearer: Sirinan

Source: Evans, Ivor H. N. “Folk Stories of the Tempassuk and Tuaran Districts, British North Borneo.” The Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 43 (1913): 454–455.

Date: ca. 1910

Original Source: Borneo

National Origin: Malaysia

---

According to the following narrative, the crocodile was the result of filial impiety. In this myth, Grandfather Gahuk’s children neglected him, regretted their actions too late, and brought about the origin of a major predator in their environment.

---

Long ago Aki ["grandfather"] Gahuk was chief of Kampong Tengkurus. He was a very old man and he had seven sons and four daughters. His sons all wished to take wives, and his daughters, husbands, and so they married. At last Aki Gahuk became so, old that he could no longer walk, and his children did not wish to provide for him. Then Aki Gahuk said to them, "Why do you not wish to support me, for I am an old man and can no longer get my living?" But his children answered that they wished he were dead, as he was only an encumbrance to them. So Aki Gahuk wept and said, "If you wish me dead you had better put me into the river, for although you give me food, you give me no clothes and I am naked and ashamed."

Then his children put him into the river, for they did not wish to buy clothes for him; and Aki Gahuk stopped there in the water, and every night and morning they gave him food. There was a large stone in the middle of the stream and when he was cold Aki Gahuk used to climb slowly up on to this and sit there like a toad. Now after he had been in the water for three or four months, Aki Gahuk no longer climbed the big stone and his feet and legs as far as his knees became like those of a crocodile. His children who brought him food saw that his feet had become like a crocodile's and said, "Father, we thought you would die but you are becoming a crocodile." Then all the brothers and sisters came together to look at their father and said to him, "Father, if you are not going to die, let us take you home again to the house and give you clothes, for we do not wish you to become a crocodile."

But Aki Gahuk said, "How can I go home with you, for I have become a crocodile. Before, you had no pity on me and now that you have pity on me I am unable to go home." So his children wept and said that they did not wish him to turn into a crocodile and Aki Gahuk said to them, "You can tell this story to your descendants; perhaps also it is good that I should become a crocodile. On feast days you can call to me, and when there is a flood I will take you across the river on my back." After some days his whole body became like that of a crocodile and his children were afraid that he would eat men, but he could still speak and he told them that he would never eat men though perhaps his descendants might do so. Then after a year Aki Gahuk called to his children and told them that he wished to go seawards, saying that if his children went in that direction they were to call him, "For," said he, "I wish to take a wife."

Said his children, "How will you take a wife for there are no other crocodiles?"

"I will call one to me," said their father, "I will call the Pang (iguana) and she will become my wife." Then Aki Gahuk went seawards and the Pang became his wife and from their offspring arose all the crocodiles.

THE MOSQUITOS' VILLAGE

Tradition Bearer: Si Ungin

Source: Evans, Ivor H. N. "Folk Stories of the Tempassuk and Tuaran Districts, British North Borneo." The Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 43 (1913): 446–447.

Date: ca. 1910

Original Source: Borneo

National Origin: Malaysia

---

The motif of the two siblings, one kind and respectful and the other rude and haughty, appears to be popular in this traditional repertoire. Compare the following tale with "Ligat Liou" (page 315).

---

A long time ago a man was once hunting in the jungle and when it was near nightfall he wished to return home, but having wandered from the path he was unable to find it. While he was still searching for the way he came upon a large house near a kampong. So he went into it and meeting there an old man he told him how he was lost and asked for leave to sleep there. "Yes," said the old man, "you can sleep here, for you cannot find your way home tonight, as it is already dark." After a time, other people, men, women, and children, came to the house, and the old man told them about the stranger, saying, "Let us give him a bed for the night."

Then they brought him food, but instead of water they gave him blood, and for rice they gave him maggots. "Perhaps I am among evil spirits," thought the stranger; so he ate a little of what they had given him.

"Why do you not eat?" said the old man; and the stranger replied that he was troubled about having lost his way home. "If you cannot find your way home," said his host, "tomorrow I will send one of my men with you to show you the path." Then the women of the house said that they would find him a mat to sleep on; but when they brought it, it was only a banana leaf. So the stranger and the people of the house lay down, but the former could not sleep owing to the great number of mosquitoes. Then as he heard none of the other men in the house striking at the mosquitoes, he thought, "Perhaps this is the mosquitoes' kampong," and so he also did not try to kill them but brushed them gently from his body; and when he had done this once they no longer returned to disturb him. However, he did not sleep for he was afraid.

When morning came the old man looked at the stranger's mat and seeing no dead mosquitoes there he said to him, "Well, my son, you wish to go home and you shall have someone to show you the way. This, my younger brother, shall go with you, and you shall become brothers to one another, only do not bring him to your house but let him go when you find your path; for we are all mosquitoes, and that was man's blood you drank last night. You must take this bombing [bamboo box] with you, and when you get home call your father and mother and brothers and sisters to see what it contains, but do not open it before you get to your house."

So the stranger went home, the old man's younger brother accompanying till he found the path. When he got to his house he told his relations what had happened to him and how the old man had given him the bamboo box and had ordered him to open it in the presence of his father and mother; speaking thus, he opened the box and from it he brought out gold ornaments, rings and bracelets, and fine clothes.

Now when the stranger's elder brother saw the gold and the fine clothes he said, "I also will go to the kampong and tell the people that I am your brother." So he started and after a time he too 'lost his way in the jungle. When it was near night he came to the kampong of the mosquitoes and asked the old man to let him sleep there; and he told the old man how his brother had lost his way in the jungle before and how he had come upon a house when he was lost and that the people of the house had given him gold and fine clothing. "But," said he, "I do not know if this is the house." Then the old man ordered them to bring food for the elder brother, and for water they brought him blood, and for rice, maggots. "What sort of food is this you give me?" said the elder brother. "Blood and maggots! I cannot eat it." When the time for sleep came they brought him a banana leaf instead of a mat; and he said again, "What is this you have brought me? This is a house not the jungle. I want to sleep on a mat, not on a banana leaf." Said the old man, "These are our mats; sleep on it if you will, but if not, what can I do, only do not say I have no respect for you." So the elder brother slept, but before long he awoke and found that he was being bitten by swarms of mosquitoes. Then he started slapping away at them right and left, and in the morning when he wished to go home there was no blood left in his body.

In the morning the old man told him that he must return and gave him a bamboo, telling him not to open it till he came to his house. "But," said the elder brother, "how can I go home for I do not know the way!" The old man replied that he must find the way for himself. So setting out he at length came upon the path and reached home safely. Then he called together all his relations and friends and said, "I also have got a bamboo and I think there must be gold and fine clothes in it too." But his younger brother asked him, "Did a man guide you home?" and the elder brother said "No." So the elder brother opened the box and from it came out scorpions and centipedes and other poisonous animals and stung him to death, but no one else in the house was touched by them. Thus the elder brother fell down and died; and the younger said, "My brother must have offended the people of the kampong."

LIGAT LIOU

Tradition Bearer: Sirinan

Source: Evans, Ivor H. N. "Folk Stories of the Tempassuk and Tuaran Districts, British North Borneo." The Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 43 (1913): 439–442.

Date: ca. 1910

Original Source: Borneo

National Origin: Malaysia

---

The following tale is reminiscent of the ordinary folktale "The Kind and the Unkind Girls" (AT 480) in which two girls set out on the same path. The first is rewarded for acts of kindness, while the second is punished for refusing to perform the same acts for a supernaturally powerful stranger. Compare this tale to the Caribbean tale "The Witch at Bosen Corner" (Volume 4, page 434).

---

There was once a man named Tamburan. One day he took his parang [machete] and spear and his bareit [basket] and went off to look for vegetables in the jungle, for he was poor and had no food. He searched and searched but could find nothing; at last, however, he came to an old kabun [garden] and seeing a sulap [hut] near it he went to look if there were any people in it, for he thought that the kabun was still being used as there were many gourds there. Putting down his bareit and spear he climbed up into the hut, and there he saw a woman lying down. Now she was unable to sit up because her head was very large while her neck was only as thick as my little finger. The woman, whose name was Ligat Liou ["little neck"], spoke to him and said, "Tamburan, why have you come here?"

"I have come looking for vegetables," answered Tamburan, "for I have nothing to eat and nothing with which I can buy padi."

"If you are hungry," said Ligat Liou, "there is some rice ready cooked there on the saleian [shelf above the fire], which you can eat and you will find fish there too."

"How does she manage to pound her rice," thought Tamburan, "for she cannot even sit up." Then he said, "I do not like to eat alone."

"I have eaten just now," said Ligat Liou, "do not be ashamed to eat" So Tamburan took the rice and ate and when he had finished Ligat Liou asked him to come and search for lice in her hair; so he went to search, but instead of lice he found in her hair scorpions and little snakes and centipedes and all other sorts of poisonous animals. Then he killed them all till there were none left and Ligat Liou thanked him, saying that none of the women who came there would search for lice in her hair. "But now," said she, "I shall be able to stand up, for my head is light since I am free of all these lice."

So she stood up and said to Tamburan, "Take seven gourds from this kabun." So Tamburan took the gourds and brought them into the sulap. Then said Ligat Liou, "Take this first gourd as soon as you get home and cut it in two; the second one cut open when you get into your room; the third you must open in your store room; the fourth on the padi shelf, the fifth on the verandah, the sixth below the steps, and the seventh below the house."

Then Tamburan went home and on reaching his house he did as Ligat Liou had instructed him, for his children were crying for food. When he cut open the first gourd he found rice and all other kinds of food ready cooked in it, together with plates and drinking cups. So they ate and when they had finished he cut open the second gourd in his sleeping room and in it were mats for sleeping on and all the furnishings for a bedroom. The third gourd he opened in his store room and from it came gongs of all kinds and other goods besides. The fourth gourd he opened on the padi shelf and from it came great quantities of padi. The fifth he opened on the verandah and in it were many hens. The sixth he opened below the steps and out of it came great numbers of pigs. The seventh held many kerbaws [carabaos]; this also he cut open, as he had been ordered, within the fence below the house.

Now when the gourds were cut open there was a man in the house named Sikinding, who lived in another room. This man was also poor and he came to Tamburan and said, "Brother (Pori San), where did you get all these goods from?"

Said Tamburan, "I was astonished at getting them myself, for I dreamed I was rich and when I woke up I found it was true."

"Ah," said Sikinding, "I always dream at night but I have never become rich from it," for he did not believe Tamburan's words. "It is true," said Tamburan, "for you know well that yesterday I was as poor as you and went with the rest of the men to look for vegetables in the jungle." But Sikinding still did not believe him and said, "Perhaps you got them from someone."

"I spoke truth," said Tamburan, "and this is my dream, I dreamed that I came to an old kabun and that I went into a hut there, and that I got the goods from the person who lived in the hut."

"Well," said Sikinding, "I will try and find this kabun and the person you dreamed of."

"Just as you like," said Tamburan, "for as I told you I only dreamed of the place."

"I shall start tomorrow," said Sikinding.

"Well, I am not ordering you," replied Tamburan, "you are going to please yourself." So the next day Sikinding set out to look for the kabun, but having searched for two days and not finding it he went back and told Tamburan that he thought he was a liar, saying that he had searched for the kabun for two days and not found it. "For," said he, "I think you really went to the kabun and not that you dreamed about it" But Tamburan again replied that it had been a dream. "Ah," said Sikinding, "I don't believe you, how many times have men dreamed in this kampong and never yet got rich from it."

"Well, try once more to find the place," said Tamburan, "and perhaps you will succeed."

So on the next day Sikinding set out again and not finding it returned after he had searched for four days. Thought Sikinding, "Perhaps Tamburan is trying to kill me by sending me into the jungle, this time I will take my spear and parang when I ask him, and if he will not tell me, I will kill him." Then Sikinding went to Tamburan's door and said, "I still do not believe your story though I have hunted for the kabun for four days. If you do not tell me the truth this time I will kill you, for if my luck had been bad in the jungle I should have died there." But Tamburan still declared it was a dream, and Sikinding getting angry snatched the sheath from his spear and Tamburan ran away. Then Tamburan cried out that he would tell the truth, for he was afraid that Sikinding would kill him; so Sikinding stopped chasing him and Tamburan told him how he had gone to the kabun and how he had marked the trees with his parang, so as to know the way back. "Well," said Sikinding, "I will not kill you if you will show me the way."

"But, perhaps," said Tamburan, "you will not be brave enough to hunt for the lice in her hair."

"Oh," said Sikinding, "however brave you are, I am braver."

"Well, when you come to the kabun," said Tamburan, "if anybody asks you to search for lice, you must not be afraid, for many men have been there, but I only was brave enough."

"Oh, I shall not be afraid," said Sikinding. So the next day he set out and followed the marks which Tamburan had made on the trees, and at length he came to the kabun. When he was still some way from the hut he began calling out to know if there was anyone inside; but no answer came. So when he had come to the hut he put down his bareit, and going in saw Ligat Lion there and she said to him, "What do you come for?"

"Oh," said Sikinding. "I have no padi and I have come to look for vegetables; I am very hungry; where is your rice?"

"How should I have rice?" said Ligat Liou, "for I cannot get up to pound it."

"Oh! That's not true," said Sikinding, "for how can you live if you have no rice?"

"Well, it is true," said Ligat Liou, "for as you see yourself I cannot get up." So Sikinding went to get her rice from the shelf over the fireplace, but on taking down the plate he found nothing but earth in it.

"Ah," he said, "you people in this kampong are no good; you eat earth."

"I told you I had no rice," said Ligat Liou, "but you can take a gourd from the kabun." Then Sikinding went and took a gourd, and going up again into the but he asked Ligat Liou how he was to eat it. “You must cut it open,” said she, “and eat what is inside it.” So he cut it open and found a little rice and one fish in it, and from this he made his meal. When he had finished eating the rice and fish he said to Ligat Liou, “That is not enough; I’ll go and take another gourd and that will be sufficient.”

“You can take another,” said she, “but only one.” So he brought another gourd, and cutting it open found inside it only rice in the husk and uncooked fish.

“I’ve not had enough to eat,” said he, “where can I get it from?”

“You can cook the food here,” said Ligat Liou.

“No, I won’t do that,” said Sikinding, “I will take it home and cook it; but I want seven gourds to take home with me.”

“I will give them to you,” said Ligat Liou, “but first come and look for lice in my hair.” So Sikinding went to look for lice but when he saw the scorpions and snakes and other poisonous things he cried out and was not brave enough to kill them and he let Ligat Liou’s head fall first to one side and then to the other. “Well,” said Ligat Liou, “if you are afraid to kill my lice you had better go home. But take one gourd with you; you may take a large one, but do not take more than one.” Then Sikinding took the gourd and Ligat Liou said to him, “When you get home and wish to open this gourd, get into your tankob [large storage vessel] and make your wife and children get into it as well; but shut up the top of the tankob well so that nothing can get out.” So Sikinding ran home and calling his wife and children, they all got into the tankob with the exception of one small child, for whom there was no room. Then Sikinding opened the gourd and from it came out snakes and scorpions, which bit Sikinding and his wife and children until they died. The only person who remained alive was the small child for whom there had been no room in the tankob.

GINAS AND THE RAJAH

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Evans, Ivor H. N. “Folk Stories of the Tempassuk and Tuaran Districts, British North Borneo.” The Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 43 (1913): 468–469.

Date: ca. 1910

Original Source: Borneo

National Origin: Malaysia

---

The extraordinary nature of Ginas, the protagonist of the following tale, is revealed at conception, if the possible translation of his mother’s name (“virgin”) is correct. He is precocious physically and intellectually, but he refuses to be fettered by the rules of proper behavior or even by the rajah's dictates. Ginas demonstrates his cleverness in a contest of wits involving a series of tests imposed upon him by the ruler. He trumps the rajah's ploys in handy fashion, in one case with a task of his own ("Making a Rope of Sand," AT 1174). The narrative demonstrates the affection the Dusun of Borneo have for the trickster.

---

A long time ago there was a man and his wife whose names were Rakian and Sumundok. On the day when they married many others also had married and each couple had at least two children, but Rakian and Sumundok had none, though Sumundok was expecting a child.

Rakian fell ill, and he said to his wife, "Perhaps I shall die before I see my child, but you must bring him up well, for we are not wanting in possessions."

Then Rakian died and after a time Sumundok gave birth to a male child, and she said to it, "I will give you a name; your name is Ginas, but I will not bring you up, I will put you in a box." So Sumundok put the child into a box, and after two or three months she went to look at it and found that it had grown and could walk. When the child had come out of the box it spent its time in hunting the pigs and its mother did not forbid it, "For," thought she, "if it should kill a pig, I can replace it." But the people of the kampong became angry because Sumundok's child was always chasing their pigs.

One day Ginas went to the Rajah's house, and for two days he hunted the pigs there below the house. Then the Rajah said to one of his men, "Go to Ginas's house and tell his relations that he must not hunt pigs any more, for I have had no sleep from it for two nights. If he does not follow my orders I will make him my slave." So three men went to Ginas's house and told him that if he chased the Rajah's pigs any more he would make him a slave. But Ginas paid no heed to the Rajah's words, and going to the Rajah's house he again hunted the pigs. Then said the Rajah, "All men follow my orders, this Ginas only, who is still small, does not obey me." So the Rajah sent to Ginas saying, "For three nights I have not been able to sleep for the noise of the waves in the sea. Go and chase them and see if you can stop them." When the Rajah's men came to the house of Ginas they said to him that the Rajah wished him to stop the waves, and Ginas said, "You must stop here tonight and eat with me." The three men stopped there; and when it was night Ginas went down to the sea-shore, and, taking sand, wrapped it in his handkerchief.

Then going back to the house, he woke the Rajah's men and said to them, "Give this sand to the Rajah and tell him to have a rope made from it and when the rope is made I will use it to catch the waves with." So the men went home and the Rajah asked them what Ginas had said to his order to stop the waves. Then the Rajah's men told him that Ginas had said that he would catch the waves, only that as he was short of rope he was sending some sand to the Rajah of which to make a cord, and that when the cord was made he would catch the waves with it. And the Rajah had to admit that he was beaten, and threw the sand away.

Then the Rajah had seven jars of Tapai made, and killed three cattle; then he sent three men to call Ginas to drink. The three men came to Ginas and he replied that he would come on the next day. On the morrow, Ginas brought out clothes all covered with gold, and, putting them on, set out. When he got to the Rajah's house the Rajah asked him to sit down on his mattress, and all kinds of food and drink were brought to them, and there was a bowl there for washing the hands, seven punkals [hand spans] in circumference. After they had eaten, the Rajah said to Ginas, "Ginas, you shall wash your hands on my mattress, and if the mattress is not wetted you shall replace me as Rajah, and shall have all my property and my daughter for your wife; but if you wet the mattress you shall become my slave."

So when Ginas was washing out his mouth he was afraid to spit the water out on to the mattress, so he sent it into the Rajah's face instead, saying, "I was afraid to put it anywhere else, but your face does not matter, since you are blind in one eye, and thus your face is damaged. Take this looking-glass and look." So the Rajah took the glass, and, seeing that one of his eyes was damaged, and that no one else had so ugly a face, was ashamed and ran away from the country, taking with him only one of his wives. As for Ginas, he took his place and became Rajah.

RAKIAN

Tradition Bearer: Sirinan

Source: Evans, Ivor H. N. "Folk Stories of the Tempassuk and Tuaran Districts, British North Borneo." The Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 43 (1913): 457–459.

Date: ca. 1910

Original Source: Borneo

National Origin: Malaysia

---

The motif of the spouse who changes from animal to human and back again is widely distributed. The plot of "Rakian" is typical: discovery of the animal wife who causes her husband to prosper, followed by his violation of the oath of secrecy about her animal nature, which leads to her abandoning him.

---

Once there was a mangis tree in which there were large bees' nests, and when there was sufficient honey in the nests a man named Rakian went to the tree and began to drive bamboo pegs into it so that he could climb up. It was getting towards evening when he began to work. Now there were many bees' nests in the tree and Rakian, seeing that the bees of the nest right at the top of the tree were white, decided to take it, "For," thought he, "I have never yet seen white bees." Then he climbed up the steps he had made in the tree to take the bees' nest and when he was close he drew his parang to cut it down.

But the bees did not swarm out from the nest and while he was sawing away at the branch from which it hung he heard the bees say "That hurts." Then Rakian, wondering, sheathed his parang and the bees said to him, "If you wish to take the nest take it gently and do not cut it down." So he took the nest with the bees in it and putting it into his bareit [basket] he descended the tree and went home. When he came to his house he put the bareit with the bees in it into his room.

Early the next morning Rakian went to his kabun and did not return until near dark when, on coming back to his house, he found rice and fish ready cooked on his shelf above the fire. "Then," thought Rakian, "who can have cooked for me for I am the only man who lives in this house: this fish is not mine though the rice is. The rice is cold and must have been cooked for a long time. Perhaps somebody has come here and cooked and taken away my bees' nest." So he went to his bareit and found the bees' nest still there. Then Rakian sat down to eat. "Well," he thought, "if, someone is going to cook for me, so much the better."

In the morning he ate the remains of the rice from the day before, and again went to his kabun. As on the previous day he came home before nightfall and again there was food prepared for him. "Who is this," thought Rakian, "who comes to my house and cooks?" and once more he went to see if his bees' nest had been stolen; and thus it happened that there was always food ready for him when he came home. One day he determined to return early and see who was cooking his food for him.

So early in the morning he set out as if for his kabun, but when he had gone a little way he went straight home again and hid himself near the house. For a long time he waited and nothing happened, but at last the door of his house creaked and a beautiful woman came out of his room and taking his bamboo water vessel went out of the house to the river to get water. Then when she had gone down to the river Rakian entered his room without the woman seeing him and went to look at his bees. But when he opened his bareit he found that there were no bees in it, but only the nest. So he took the nest from the bareit and hid it and concealed himself in the house.

After a time the woman came back from the river and went to the bareit to look for the bees' nest. "Oh," said she, "who has taken my box (sarong)?" So she hunted for the nest and at last began to weep, saying, "Who can have taken it? It cannot be Rakian for he has gone to work at his kabun. I am afraid that he will come back and find me." When it was nearly dark Rakian came out from his hiding-place as if he had just come back from his kabun; but the woman sat there without speaking.

“Why are you here?” said Rakian, “perhaps you want to steal my bees.”

“I do not know anything about your bees,” said the woman. So he went to the bareit to look for his bees but of course they were not there for Rakian himself had hidden the nest. “Oh,” said he, “my bees’ nest is not here, perhaps you have taken it. “How should I know anything about your bees’ nest,” said she. “Well, it does not matter,” said Rakian, “will you cook for me, for I am very hungry?”

“I do not want to cook,” said the woman, “for I am vexed.” So Rakian kept on telling her to cook for him, but the woman refused and at last she said, “Where is my sarong?”

“I have not taken it,” said Rakian. “I believe you have hidden it,” said the woman, “and all my clothes and goods are in it.” At last Rakian said, “I will not give it to you for I am afraid you will get into it again.”

“I will not get into it,” said the woman, “if you like you can take me for your wife. My mother wished to give me to you in this way because you have no wife here and I have no husband either in my country.” Then Rakian took the bees’ nest and gave it to the woman.

“But,” said she, “if you take me as your wife do not ever call me a bee woman, for if you do I shall be much ashamed.” So they married and had a child. Now one day there was a feast at a neighboring house and Rakian went to eat there. “Where is your wife from?” said a man at the feast, “for we have never seen such a beautiful woman before.”

“She is from this kampong,” replied Rakian. When all the men had become drunk they still kept asking him whence he had got his wife, and saying that they had never before seen such a beautiful woman. At last Rakian, who had up to that time always replied that he had taken his wife from the kampong, became drunk also. Then he forgot his promise and said, “The truth is that my wife was at first a bee.” So the men stopped questioning him and Rakian went home.

When he got to the house his wife would not speak to him. “Why will you not speak?” said Rakian. “What did I tell you long ago?” said she. “I think you have been saying things to make me ashamed.”

“I have not said anything,” replied Rakian. “You are lying,” said his wife, “for though the house is far off I heard. When men asked whence I came, at first you would not tell them, but when you became drunk, then you told them everything.” Then Rakian in his turn became silent. “I will go home,” said she, “for you have made me ashamed; but the child I will leave with you. In seven days my father will pass on his way home to his country and I will go with him.” So Rakian wept. At the end of seven days Rakian saw a white bee flying to his house, and his wife came down the steps from his house and saying, “There is my father,” she became a bee again and flew off after the other.

Then Rakian rushed into the house and seized the child, for it was in his heart to follow his wife and her father, “For,” said he, “if my wife is not here the child will die because it is still little.” So he hunted for the bees until he saw them going in front of him in the jungle. At the end of seven days he had lost sight of them and still he had not come to any kampong. On the eighth day he came to a bathing-place at a river. Then both he and the child, being hungry and weary, lay down by the side of the river and slept. At last a woman came from the kampong and woke Rakian and said, “Rakian, why don’t you go to your wife’s house instead of sleeping here with your child, for the house is not far off?”

“When I have bathed,” said Rakian, “you must show me the way,” and the woman replied, “Very well.” So Rakian bathed and then he followed the woman and it was not long before they came to a kampong. “That is her house,” said his guide, pointing to a long-house, “but her room is right in the middle of it. There are eleven rooms in the house and if you enter it you must not be afraid, for the roof beams are full of bees, but they do not attack men.” So Rakian climbed up into the house and found it full of bees, both large and small, but in the middle room there were none. Men in the house there were none, only bees. Then the child began to cry and Rakian sat down. “Otun [term of endearment],” said a voice in the middle room, “Why do you not come out? Have you no pity on your child who is weeping here?” Then after a time Rakian’s wife appeared in the room and the child ran to her at once, and Rakian’s heart became light; but his wife said to him, “What did I tell you at first that you were not to tell whence I came? If you had not been able to follow me here, certainly there would have been distress for you.” When she had finished speaking all the bees dropped down from the roof beams to the floor and became men. As for Rakian and his child they stayed in the kampong and did not go back any more.

LANGAON

Tradition Bearer: Sirinan

Source: Evans, Ivor H. N. “Folk Stories of the Tempassuk and Tuaran Districts, British North Borneo.” The Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 43 (1913): 435–439.

Date: ca. 1910

Original Source: Borneo

National Origin: Malaysia

---

As in the tale of “Rakian” (page 320), a man acquires an animal wife, but he fails to keep her because he violates the rules that have been imposed upon him. In his initial wandering and later in his quest to recover his wife, he learns courage and integrity and at last becomes worthy of marriage to a goddess.

---

Langaon had made a kabun [garden] sufficient in which to sow two mandores of padi [rice] and after a time it bore fruit. When the padi harvest came the men of the kampong went to reap in their kabuns and Langaon went also to reap in his, but when he had finished his reaping he found the produce of it was only two mandores, just what he had sown at first. "Why is this?" said Langaon. "Other men all have a good return from their sowing; I alone have no padi." So he went to the old men of the kampong and told them about it.

However, he decided to make another kabun and this time to sow three mandores. So he made his kabun, and sowed three mandores, and when his padi came up it was better than anyone else's in the kampong; when it began to fruit too it was finer than that in any other kabun. At length harvest time came and Langaon this time got three mandores of padi for his harvest while every other man had at least a full tankob [large bin].

Then he made up his mind to leave the village and search for better ground in which to plant padi. So he set out and after he had wandered for a long time in the jungle, at last he came to a small river and made himself a sulap there. Here he stopped and made borusats [fish traps] in the stream. The next morning he went to look at his traps, and found that he had got a large catch of fish. "Then," said he, "it would be good to stop here for there is no lack of fish; only I have no salt and no padi, and how can I live without them?" So he set out with his fish to look for some place where he might sell them for salt or padi. After a time he came to a kampong and the people said to him, "Oh, Langaon, where are you going?"

"I have run away from my kampong and am living near the river," said Langaon. "I have caught many fish but as I have neither salt nor padi, I have come here to sell them." Then they called him to come into the house and they gave him padi and salt and cooking pots and mats in exchange for his fish. So Langaon was much pleased and the people of the kampong asked him to come every day and bring them fish. When he got home he had sufficient to eat and vessels in which to cook, for hitherto he had used bamboo to cook in. So he decided to stop at the river, and make himself a large hut.

The next morning there were again many fish in his traps and Langaon thought, "I shall be ashamed if I go every day to the kampong, so I will dry these fish in the sun, and tomorrow I will take them the dry fish and any fresh fish I get from the traps." On the following day, Langaon again went to the kampong, and the people of the kampong gave him parangs [machetes] and spears and cloth in exchange for his fish. Then Langaon said to himself, "I had better tell them I shall not come again at once, as the river has fallen since there has been no rain, and until rain comes again I shall have no fish." So he told them, but they said to him, "If you have no fish, come all the same." Langaon went home, and though he got many fish he did not go to the kampong for another week. At last, however, he started for the kampong with his fish, but when he got there, he said, "Today I do not wish to sell my fish; I will divide them among you, but I will not take anything in return.” So he divided the fish among them and each man got two tempurongs [half of a coconut shell used as a drinking or food vessel] full.

“Why do you not ask a price for your fish,” said the people of the kampong.

“I am not without food,” said Langaon, “I still have much left from what you gave me before, but if I have no food left and catch no fish, I will come and ask you for what I want.” So it was agreed, and Langaon asked them, when was the time for making kabuns there, and they said, “As soon as this month is finished we begin to make them.” When the month was finished, Langaon went back to the kampong, bringing with him a little fish to give to the people, and again he asked them when they would start making kabuns.

“Oh, any time we feel inclined,” said they, “tomorrow or the next day,” and they asked him to come and live in their kampong, but Langaon refused. So he went home and the next day he began to make a kabun, and when he had cut down all the trees, his kabun was large enough to sow two mandores of seed in. “Well,” he thought, “I will rest a little till other people begin to burn” (the cut trees). After about twenty days he saw great quantities of smoke coming from near the kampong and going to his kabun, he fired it until not a single tree trunk was left. “This is, troublesome,” thought he, “I have no seed to sow in my kabun.”

In the morning, he took his fish with him and went to the kampong to ask for seed, and when he was still far off, they started calling to him to bring his fish. So he divided his fish among them, everybody getting a tempurong full; and the people of the kampong asked him if he had sown his padi. “Not yet,” said Langaon, “I came here today, to ask you to give me some seed.”

“How big is your kabun?”

“About two or three mandores large,” replied Langaon. So each man in the kampong gave him a mandore of seed, until there were none left who had not given.

“Why do you give me so much?” said Langaon, “for my kabun is not a large one, only enough for two mandores. If each man were to give me one or two tempurongs full I shall not finish it, but this you have given me is much more than I shall use; besides, how shall I get it home, for I shall only be able to carry two or three mandores.”

“Never –mind,” said the men of the kampong, “whatever you do not want to sow you can leave here, and you can use it to eat.” So when he went home he took only three mandores of seed with him, and the next day he started and sowed two mandores in his kabun. The padi sprouted and thrived, and Langaon said, “Ah, perhaps this year I shall have plenty of padi,” and each day he went to his kabun, though there were no weeds in it. At last he said, “What use is it for me to go to the kabun for there are no weeds in it,” and for six days he remained at home. On the seventh day he went back and found that Maragang monkeys had broken into his kabun and damaged his padi. Then Langaon wept,

“Ah,” said he, “all my padi has been destroyed.” So he tried to raise the stems which the monkeys had beaten down, and he resolved to move his house to the kabun, so that he might guard what remained of the crop. He stayed there at the kabun until his padi had recovered, and when it was ripe, he said to himself, “I must make my binolet [storage vessel].” Then he went into the jungle to get wood for the binolet, and slept a night there, but when he returned home he found not a single grain of padi left in his kabun, all the ears of grain had been taken and only the straw left standing, and there were tracks of many monkeys everywhere. “Ah,” said Langaon, “I will run away from here, for first of all the monkeys damaged my crop, and now when it is ripe they have come again and eaten it all.” So he set out again, and after he had wandered in the jungle for a long time, at last he made another sulap [hut], but this time there was no river near, and he had to live on whatever he could find in the jungle. He had brought away with him the one mandore of padi seed which he had not planted in his former kabun, and here he again made a kabun and sowed the seed in it. This time he made his kabun round his house so that he might keep a guard on his crop, and when the padi came up it was very good. There he lived until his padi was in the ear.

One day he went to fetch water from the river and on coming back he saw a great many Maragang monkeys near his kabun; though they had not yet entered it and eaten his padi. Then he dropped his water vessel and went to drive away the Maragangs, but the monkeys attacked him, and Langaon ran away, for he had first come from the river, and had neither parang nor spear with him. When he got to his sulap he snatched up his spear and wounded one of the monkeys and they all ran off, except the largest of them, which still fought with him. Then Langaon retreated from the monkey backwards, until without noticing it, he became entrapped between four large tree stumps which stood in the kabun; and there both Langaon and the monkey stopped fighting while after some time the monkey suddenly became transformed into a beautiful woman.

Langaon seeing this, came out from the tree stumps and spoke to her. “Where do you come from?” said he.

“My mother ordered me to come here,” replied the woman. “When you made a kabun before, I came there also, but you did not guard your padi. The padi which you said monkeys ate was reaped and I also was among the reapers.”

“Where did you put the padi?” said Langaon.

“In my house,” said the woman, “and the people of my kampong reaped with me.”

“Well,” said Langaon, “I have no food, for this padi is not yet ripe.”

“You had better come home to my house,” said the woman. So Langaon followed the woman home, and found that her house was in the jungle, and not far from his kabun. “I am alone here,” said she, “for my father and mother and my companions are in my kampong which is a long way off. My father has much pity for you because you have no wife, and I also. All this padi in my house is yours, for when you made the kabun in your village, it was I who stole your padi, and when you made a kabun by the river, I went there also.”

So Langaon stopped there, and the woman told him how she was really a Maragang monkey, but had become a woman. Then she became his wife, and Langaon said, “I will search for some kampong near, for it is evil for us to be all alone here.”

“Oh,” said the woman, “if you want a kampong, there is one not far off,” and she pointed out a kampong to him which he had not noticed before; but his wife besought him not to go there, and so he remained with her. At last, when they had a child, Langaon said, “I should like to go to the kampong; if I start today I shall return today also, for it is not far away.”

His wife said, “Do not go, for I shall be very much frightened, while you are away there.” But Langaon did not pay attention to his wife’s words, and after a while she said to him, “Well, if you go do not sleep the night there, for I shall be all alone here with the child.” So Langaon started off, and when he got to the kampong he found a great feast going on, and joining in it he became drunk and forgot about going home. For seven days he stopped there eating and drinking, and on the sixth night he fell in love with a woman of the kampong. However, on the seventh day he started home. and when he came to his house, his wife was very angry and would not speak to him. “Why are you angry?” said he.

“Why should I not be angry,” said his wife, “for you have been unfaithful with another woman, for though you were far off, I know it, and you have a mark on you by which I can tell.” But Langaon denied it. “If,” said his wife, “you deny it, I will take from you the mark by which I know that you have been unfaithful.”

“You may take it,” said Langaon.

“Well,” said she, “I will show you, for I am the God of your kampong (Kenharingan Tumanah),” and taking a looking-glass she showed him the appearance of the other woman and himself in the glass. Then said Langaon, “It is true.”

“I will leave you,” said his wife, “and take the child with me, for you have now a wife in the kampong.” But Langaon asked for pardon, saying he would pay what was according to custom, as a recompense. But still his wife refused to stop with him; so when it was near night he bound her hands and feet to his, for he was frightened that she would run away. So they slept, but when Langaon awoke in the morning, the ropes were opened, and his wife and child had gone. Then Langaon wept, for he did not know the kampong in which his wife lived. On the second day he stopped weeping and started out to look for his wife, “For,” said he, “wherever I find a kampong there will I search.” So he wandered in the jungle and one day he met a herd of deer which attacked him. Then Langaon ran away and crept into a hole in the ground and hid, and the deer could not catch him.

The next morning he came out of the hole and started again, but he had not gone far before he met a herd of wild pigs and these also attacked him, and as before he ran away until, coming to the same hole, he again got into it to hide. There he slept and dreamed, and in his dream a man came to him and said, “Langaon, you are a coward to run from the deer and wild pig, for if I were looking for my wife I would fight them.”

“How can I fight them,” said Langaon, “for I am all alone and they are many?”

“If you journey again tomorrow and are brave,” said the man, “you will get your wife back, for she will ride a rhinoceros.”

“Formerly I was not afraid even of the rhinoceros,” said Langaon, “but I found that I was afraid of these stags and wild pig.”

“If you are afraid,” said the man, “you will not get your wife back.”

“How shall I know the animal she is riding,” said Langaon, “for the other animals had no one riding them?”

“You will know the one,” said the man, “because it will have bells on it; that is the one you must hunt, but do not let it go or you will lose your wife.”

In the morning Langaon awoke, and set off early in search of his wife, and, after a time, he came upon a herd of rhinoceros and among them he saw a large one which had bells hanging round its neck. So he waited for the rhinoceros with the bells to attack him, and did not run away, and when he caught hold of it by the bells round its neck all the rest of the herd vanished. The one he had caught also tried to escape, but Langaon struggled with it for three days, until he stumbled and fell close to his own house, and in falling he let go the bells. The rhinoceros disappeared and Langaon sat down to think outside his house. After a time he heard a child begin to weep inside and he went in to see who was there, and opening his door found that his wife and child had returned.

THE MOUSE DEER AND THE GIANT

Tradition Bearer: Si Ungin

Source: Evans, Ivor H. N. “Folk Stories of the Tempassuk and Tuaran Districts, British North Borneo.” The Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 43 (1913): 477–478.

Date: ca. 1910

Original Source: Borneo

National Origin: Malaysia

---

Like hare, tortoise, and spider in Africa, spider in the Caribbean, rabbit in the African American south, and coyote in many Native American traditions, mouse deer—plandok—plays a trickster role in parts of Southeast Asia, especially Borneo, Java, Sumatra and the Malay Peninsula. As is the case with other trickster cycles, the incidents commonly are arranged as a sequence of related tales, but the sequence of incidents is subject to considerable variation. In general, however, the cycle begins with the trickster cleverly exploiting one of his fellows and incurring the victim's lasting enmity. The following collection of mouse deer trickster tales begins with an interrelated set of narratives told by a single narrator, Si Ungin. In this and the following series of five tales, it is clear that one of mouse deer's primary motivations is demonstrating the superiority of his wits over his fellow creatures' physical attributes. The gergasi in the following narrative is a giant forest demon who carries a spear over his shoulder.

---

Once upon a time there were seven kinds of animals, the kerbau (buffalo), the sapi (ox), the dog, the stag, the horse, the plandok (mouse-deer), and the kijang (barking-deer, Cervulus muntjac). These animals agreed to catch fish and when they had cast a round net into the sea they drew it to the edge and there were many fish in it. They placed their fish on the sand, and someone said, "Who will guard our fish while we go and cast the net again, for we are afraid of the gergasi." Then said the kerbau, "I will guard the fish for I am not afraid of him, if he comes here I will fight him with my horns."

When the other animals had gone away the gergasi came and said, "Ha, ha, ha, what a lot of fish you have caught! I'll eat them directly, and if you don't like it I'll eat you too."

Said the kerbau, "All right, come here and I'll horn you."

"Very well," said the gergasi, "if you won't give me your fish I will eat you." When the gergasi had got close, and the kerbau made as if to horn him, he seized hold of its horns and the kerbau could do nothing, because the gergasi was very big and strong.

Then the kerbau cried out, "Let go; if you let me go you can eat the fish." So the gergasi let him go and the kerbau swam off to his companions, who were in the sea catching fish. When he came there, he said to them, "The gergasi has eaten our fish; he caught hold of my horns and I could do nothing."

Then the other animals were angry with the kerbau and said, "If we were to go on fishing till we died the gergasi would get all our fish"; and the horse said to him, "You fish with these others this time; I'll guard the fish, and if I don't manage to bite the gergasi at any rate I'll kick him." So the animals brought the fish to the same place and leaving them there in charge of the horse went again to catch more.

When the other animals had been gone a good time, out came the gergasi again, and said "Ha, ha, ha, if you don't swim off again to your companions, I'll eat you as well as the fish."

"Well," said the horse, "come and take them if you can, but I will guard them till I die." On the gergasi's approach the horse tried to bite him; but the gergasi caught him by the head and he could do nothing. Then the horse reared up and the gergasi let go his head. When he had got free he let fly at the gergasi with his heels but the gergasi caught him by the hind legs. So the horse begged to be let go and the gergasi let him go, and while the horse was swimming away to his companions the gergasi ate the fish.

When the horse reached his companions he said, "I too have done my best, but the gergasi has got the fish. First I tried to bite him, and he caught me by the head. Then I reared and, having shaken him off, tried to kick him, but he only caught me by the legs, and I had to give in."

Then his companions said, "What is the use of our catching fish, we only get tired and the gergasi eats them; it is best that we should go home." So the sapi, the stag, the dog and the kijang said, "What is the use of our trying to fight the gergasi, for we are afraid; all the strong animals have tried but they have all been beaten. Let us go home."

The plandok only remained silent, and when all the others had had their say he said, "You go and catch fish again and I will stop on guard."

"What can you do," said the horse, "who are so small? How can you fight the gergasi?"

"Nevermind," replied the plandok, "I can't fight him or kill him but I should like to guard the fish." The other animals wanted to go home, but the plandok persuaded them and they again caught many fish and these they placed on the sand in the same spot. Then said the stag, "Who is going to guard the fish?" and the kerbau replied, "Why the plandok said just now that he would."

"Very well," said the plandok, "I will guard them but perhaps some other animal would prefer to, as my body is so small." But none of the other animals were willing, so the plandok said, "All right, I will guard them, but put them in a heap and cover them with leaves so that they cannot be seen." Then his companions heaped up the fish and covered them with leaves and having done so went back to the fishing. When the others had gone the plandok went and got some rattan and cut it into strips such as are used for binding anything.

As soon as he had finished, out came the gergasi and said, "Ha, ha, ha, is the plandok guarding here? Why, I got the fish from the kerbau and the horse, what do you think you, who are so small, can do? You had better give me the fish or I'll eat you along with them."

Then the plandok said, "I'm not guarding the fish, I'm working cutting up rattan," and the gergasi, who had come near but had not seen the fish said, "What are you doing with the rattan?"

"I'm binding it round my knees," replied the plandok. "Why are you doing that?" said the gergasi. "Don't you see the sky?" said the plandok, "it looks like falling, see how low it has got; that's why I am binding up my knees."

"Why do you bind up your knees if the sky looks like falling?" asked the gergasi.

"I'm binding up my knees so that I can get into our well here; for, if the sky falls, I shall not get hurt when I'm down there." Then the gergasi looked at the sky and saw that it was very low. "Don't bind up your legs first," said he, "bind mine."

"All right," said the plandok, "only go over to the well first." So the two went to the well, the plandok carrying the rattan. Then the gergasi said, "You bind yourself up first," but the plandok replied, "If I bind myself up first how can I bind you up afterwards."

"Very well," said the gergasi, "bind me first, but you shall be the first to go into the well."

"If I do that," said the plandok, "I shall not die from the sky falling on me but from your falling on top of me in the well." So the gergasi agreed to go first as what the plandok said seemed reasonable; and the plandok bound up the gergasi firmly, tying his hands to his knees.

"Why have you bound me so tightly?" said the gergasi, but the plandok only gave him a push and he fell into the well.

"Ah, now you can stop there till you die," said the plandok you don't know the plandok's cleverness."

"I suppose I shall die here," said the gergasi.

"Yes," said the plandok, "for you have always stolen our fish." After a little time there came the plandok's companions, bringing more fish. "Ah, see how clever I am," said the plandok, "for I have bound the gergasi! You said the gergasi was strong. How then have I managed to tie him up?"

"You lie," said the kerbau, and the horse, "How could you manage to bind him."

"If you don't believe me," said the plandok, "look into that well and see if he's not there." So all the animals went to the well and saw the gergasi.

Then said the horse and the kerbau, "How did you bind him?"

"What's the use of your asking," said the plandok, "you don't know the plandok's cunning. However, you'd better kill him with a spear or something because he's stolen our fish so often." So they killed the gergasi with a spear.

When the gergasi was dead they agreed to eat on the shore, and when they had cooked their fish and rice they found only one thing wanting, and that was pepper. So as they had no red pepper they did without it, though as they were accustomed to it they did not enjoy their food so much.

Then while they were eating, the plandok saw that the end of the dog's penis was showing red, "Ah," said he, "we were seeking for red pepper just now—there is some I see." And he pointed to the dog's penis. The dog did not understand and the stag and the kijang said, "Where is pepper."

"There," said the plandok, and he again pointed to the dog. Then the dog became very angry because he was ashamed and the stag and the kijang had laughed at him. Then the stag, the kijang, and the plandok became frightened and ran away and the dog pursued them. And the dog always hunts these three until the present day, because they made him ashamed.

The dog was hot on the track of the plandok when they entered the jungle. The plandok, however, managed by using its teeth and feet to climb a tree. The dog came below the tree but could neither see the plandok's tracks nor follow its scent beyond this spot. So the dog left following the plandok and went to hunt the stag and kijang. When he got to the place where the animals had fed he found that they had all gone but their fish and rice were left behind. Then he hunted the stag and the kijang but could not catch them. At last he said, "Well, if I ever see either the stag or the kijang or the plandok I will kill them, and my children and their descendants shall do the same." And so they do down to the present day.

A little time after the dog met the horse, the kerbau and the ox and these four animals shared the food, for the dog was not angry with them, because they had not laughed at him.

THE MOUSE DEER AND THE TIGER

Tradition Bearer: Si Ungin

Source: Evans, Ivor H. N. "Folk Stories of the Tempassuk and Tuaran Districts, British North Borneo." The Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 43 (1913): 474.

Date: ca. 1910

Original Source: Borneo

National Origin: Malaysia

---

Tiger is a typical adversary of mouse deer in his traditional role of trickster. In this tale, the narrator states that "the plandok went in search of the tiger" with the apparent intent of tormenting him. The orut is a sash bound around the abdomen during battle to hold in intestines if the wearer is wounded.

---

When the dog had gone home the plandok went in search of the tiger, and on his way he came across a lot of snakes which were lying coiled up in circles near the tiger's house. The plandok waited there and the snakes did not move. Then came the tiger, and the tiger and the plandok saw each other at the same moment.

The tiger, however, did not see the snakes, and said to the plandok, "Plandok, what are you doing here?"

"Oh," said he, "I've been waiting here a long time on guard, because the Rajah has ordered me to."

“What are you guarding?” said the tiger. “I am guarding the Rajah’s goods here, his oruts [sash],” said he, pointing to the snakes. Then the tiger looked at the oruts, and seeing them coiled up, he said, “What if we drag them undone, then I can tie them round my waist and see if they are good ones or not.”

“I dare not let you do it,” said the plandok, “as the Rajah has put me here to guard his goods, but if you like I will ask him.” Now the plandok was frightened of the tiger and wanted to beat a retreat, so he said, “I will go ahead, and if I meet the Rajah I will call to you.” Then the plandok started in search of the Rajah, and when he had got some little way off, he called to the tiger and said, “I have met the Rajah, and he says that you can try on the cloths.” Then the tiger caught hold of the snakes and dragged at them, and they, waking, attacked him, winding themselves about his body and biting him. Thus the tiger died. As for the plandok he ran off, saying, “Ah, you tiger, you consider yourself strong, don’t you? But you are no match for the cunning of the plandok.”

THE MOUSE DEER AND THE BEAR

Tradition Bearer: Si Ungin

Source: Evans, Ivor H. N. “Folk Stories of the Tempassuk and Tuaran Districts, British North Borneo.” The Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 43 (1913): 474–475.

Date: ca. 1910

Original Source: Borneo

National Origin: Malaysia

---

Mouse deer reveals a “duelist’s mentality” in the following narrative, in that he is said to go out in pursuit of strong animals to defeat.

---

When the tiger was dead the plandok began to think how he could get the best of the bear, for he had heard that the bear was also a strong animal. As he was walking along one day he came across a bees’ nest in a tree, and sat down near it to wait. After he had been there for some time there came the bear. “What are you doing here?” said he.

“I am guarding the Rajah’s tawag-tawag [gong],” answered the plandok, “which he has left in my charge.”

“May I try its sound,” said the bear, “whether it is good or not?” The plandok answered as before that he must ask the Rajah first, and when he had gone off and had got some distance away, he called out, “The Rajah says you can strike the gong.” So the bear struck the nest and the bees, coming out in a fury, stung him to death.

THE MOUSE DEER AND THE HERMIT CRAB

Tradition Bearer: Si Ungin

Source: Evans, Ivor H. N. "Folk Stories of the Tempassuk and Tuaran Districts, British North Borneo." The Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 43 (1913): 475–476.

Date: ca. 1910

Original Source: Borneo

National Origin: Malaysia

---

The following narrative is a variant of the widely distributed tale type "Race Won by Deception" (AT 1074) in which the trickster loses out to an adversary who is even more clever than he. The best-known variant to this type is "The Tortoise and the Hare."

---

When the plandok had cheated all the strong animals and had brought about their deaths, he wished to have a contest of wits with an animal who considered himself clever, so he went in search of one, and at last he met the omong [hermit crab] and the omong said to him, "Plandok, all the strong animals have been killed by your cunning, but if you like to try your wits against mine, I am ready."

"Very well," said the plandok, "that is just for what I am looking, animals who consider themselves long-headed; but how would you like to compete with me?"

"I should like to race you," said the omong, "and if you win I will acknowledge your cleverness and your power of running."

"What, you want to race with me?" said the plandok, "you can only walk sideways on the sand, and you don't race with your body only for you have to carry a shell as well." So the plandok felt ashamed to run a race with the omong, but he said, "When are we to race?"

"Tomorrow," replied the omong, "we will meet in the middle of the sands and race. You had better call your companions and I will call mine too."

"Very well," said the plandok, "I will come tomorrow."

"We will make a four-sided course for the race," said the omong, "and we will race along the sides of the square from post to post." On the morrow the plandok and his companions came, and also the omong with his, and it was decided that whoever won should be considered the champion over all the animals, for the plandok had already overcome, all the strongest of them.

When they arrived at the open sand by the sea they made a square, placing stakes at the corners. Now the plandok collected all his followers into one place as did also the omong. The omong, however, had made a plot and chosen three of his companions like him in appearance and size, and had told them to bury them-selves in the sand by three of the corners of the racecourse, but to leave the fourth corner, the starting-point, vacant. Then said the omong to the plandok, "When you get to the first post call out, 'Omong,' and if I don't answer you will know that I have been left behind and that you have won the race." So the plandok and the omong started to race from the first post, the omong saying, "Run." When the plandok heard the omong say "Run," he gave a jump and the omong, who of course was left behind, quickly buried himself in the sand, without anyone seeing him; for the spectators were some way off and the omong small. So the plandok ran without looking back, and when he got near the first post the second crab had come out of the sand and was waiting for him. When the plandok got to the post he called out, "Omong," and the crab answered, "Yes." So the plandok seeing what was apparently the same crab gave another jump and started running for the second post. The same thing happened here also, and the plandok said to himself, "How is it that the omong who walks so slowly manages to keep up with me?" At the third post the crab again answered, and the plandok, who was breathing heavily from running at top speed, set off as fast as he was able, for the original starting-post, which was also to be the finish of the race. When he got there the omong was waiting for him, and again when the plandok called out, "Omong," he was answered. Then the plandok was ashamed and wished to die, so he ran from stake to stake until his breath was exhausted, and when he reached the starting point he called out again, "Omong," and the omong answered, "Yes." Thereupon the plandok, who had no breath at all left, fell down and died, and the omongs cried out that the omong was the champion; but the plandok's followers kept silence.

THE MOUSE DEER AND THE CROCODILE

Tradition Bearer: Anggor

Source: Evans, Ivor H. N. "Folk Stories of the Tempassuk and Tuaran Districts, British North Borneo." The Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 43 (1913): 475.

Date: ca. 1910

Original Source: Borneo

National Origin: Malaysia

---

As is the case with the tiger, numerous tales are told of the tricks played by the mouse deer on the crocodile.

---

The plandok was walking one day near the edge of a river and he saw some fruit on a tree on the other side. He was just going to cross when he saw the crocodile. “Who is that?” said the plandok, but the crocodile did not answer. Then said the plandok, “Ah, I know who you are, you are the crocodile. In seven days’ time I will bring my whole tribe to fight you, and do you also bring your people.” When the seventh day had arrived, the plandok went down to the river very early, before the crocodile had come, and walked backwards and forwards until the whole of the river margin was covered with its tracks. After a time the crocodile and his companions arrived. Then the plandok, who was awaiting them, spoke and said, “You are late in coming; my followers waited and waited for you, but at last they grew tired and have gone home. If you do not believe me, look at their tracks on the bank. I should like to count how many you and your companions are, so draw yourselves up in a row from one side of the river to the other.” So the crocodiles did so, and the plandok started walking on their backs counting “One, two, three,” when suddenly he gave a jump and reached the other bank. Then he called out, “Ah, I have cheated you, for how else could a plandok fight with crocodiles. I saw the fruit on the other side of the river, but I was afraid to swim across as I knew you were waiting for me.”

“Very well,” said the crocodile, “wait till you come down to the river to drink and I’ll eat you.” A few days afterwards the plandok, who had forgotten about the crocodile, came down to the river to drink, and the crocodile caught him by the leg. Then the plandok took hold of a piece of wood and pulled it towards him, and when he had done this he called out, “That is not my leg you have caught hold of; this is my leg,” said he, pointing to the piece of wood. So the crocodile let go of the plandok’s leg and the plandok sprang away, calling out, “Ah, I have cheated you again, how foolish is the crocodile!”

“Very well,” said the crocodile, “another time I won’t let go of your foot so easily.”

THE MOUSE DEER IN A HOLE

Tradition Bearer: Orang Tua Ransab

Source: Evans, Ivor H. N. “Folk Stories of the Tempassuk and Tuaran Districts, British North Borneo.” The Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 43 (1913): 477.

Date: ca. 1910

Original Source: Borneo

National Origin: Malaysia

---

The following tale demonstrates the trickster’s typical willingness to sacrifice innocent parties to serve his own ends.

---

The plandok when wandering in the jungle one day fell into a large hole in the ground and could not get out again. After a time the timbadou [wild cow] came to the hole, and seeing the plandok, said, "Why, plandok, what are you doing there?"

"Oh," said the plandok, "I've come here to see my mother and father, my sisters and brothers."

"Wait a bit," said the timbadou, "and I will come down too, for I also wish to see my mother and father, sisters and brothers," but the plandok told the timbadou he was not to come down. Then the timbadou answered that if he said that again he would fall on him from above, and he, the plandok, would die. So the plandok gave the timbadou leave to get into the hole and the timbadou came down.

When he was down the timbadou said to the plandok, "Where are my father and mother?"

"Wait a little," said the plandok, "I've lost them just at present." So the timbadou waited and after a time the rhinoceros came to the hole and asked them what they were doing. Then the plandok answered as before that he was amusing himself, that he was seeing his father and mother and that there were lots of shops down there.

Whereupon the rhinoceros came down too, "For," said he, "my father and mother are dead and I would like to meet them and see how they have come to life again." Next came the stag and asked what they were doing and the plandok replied that he was seeing his father and mother and that there were many people sailing away on voyages down there. So the stag also jumped down. After that came the kijang [barking-deer], and he receiving the same answer from the plandok came down too. Then since the other animals were standing on each other's backs in the hole, the timbadou at the bottom and the kijang at the top, the plandok was able to scramble up to the top on their backs and make his escape from the place. Now when he had got out he met a man and his dog hunting, and the dog having got on his scent pursued him. Then the plandok made for the hole and running round it once or twice departed. So the dog, while following the scent of the plandok, came to the hole and seeing the timbadou and the other animals stopped there barking. Then the man came up and killed them all. As for the plandok he got off scot-free.

INDONESIA

---

THE FIRST VILLAGE

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Pleyte, C. M. "An Unpublished Batak Creation Legend." Journal of the Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 26 (1897): 103–109.

Date: ca. 1897

Original Source: Indonesia

National Origin: Indonesia

---

The Batak, for whom this myth offered their traditional explanation of the creation and population of the world, comprise several distinct ethnic groups who reside in the highlands of north Sumatra, an Indonesian island located north of Java and west of Malaysia. Like all mythologies, theirs accounts not only for physical features of the universe, but also for technology (the fire brought down from the other world by cow flea) and features of the supernatural universe (the benevolent mythic figure from other narratives, Rumari, an old widow who lives in a paradise called Pulo porlak pagaran, "fenced island garden"). The opening lines of the myth are an invocation that constitutes the customary opening for Batak tales.

---

“I Fold my hands respectfully above my head, O gods on high!”
“Seven times pardon, lord, for naming thy name, Batara guru doli [the major deity of the Batak] who reignest among the gods of the upper regions!”
“Lord of the seven strongholds, whose walls are so high, that the elephants stoop before them, the surrounding bamboo compels the storm to respect.”

“Possessor of the bathing place Si-mangera-era, situated in an inaccessible region.”

The ficus Yambu bares extends its vault over thee, when thou enjoyest thyself with thine in the fields, or pronoucest judgment in the shade of its foliage, wherein the birds of the sky hover to and fro, flapping their wings and warbling sweetly.”

Si-tapi Sindar di mata ni ari [“Si-tapi who is illuminated by the sun”] daughter of Batara guru, sat at the gate of heaven, dressing her hair, wherein she made an extraordinarily beautiful parting. She felt a desire to look downward, but her heart was struck with sadness when she could discover nothing but a bare plain. When she came home, her father remarked the alteration of her features and asked with compassionate interest, “What is the matter, my dear daughter? You seem put out.”

“Nothing is the matter with me, father, why should I be discontented? I have the happiness to be your daughter, and is it not already blithe to see the birds Patija raja and Burukburuk bolajan?”

Batara guru slept and had a bad dream. “I woke disturbed, for in my sleep I saw an unwonted agitation in the air, and the ground shook as if it were moved by an earthquake,” he said to his daughter, and turning to one of his Mandi-swallows,” he ordered it to go down.

“How shall I get there, lord?”

“Here is a jacket of my father’s, put it on in order not to get too tired with flying in such a vast space,” said Si-tapi Sindar di mata ni ari.

The swallow sailed downward, tracing wide circles in the air, but it saw nothing whatever on which it could rest. At last it espied the rock Tanjuk tolu, and let itself, quite exhausted, down upon it. Then it rolled up the jacket and used it as a cushion on which to take the rest it so much wanted.

Si-tapi Sindar di mtata ni ari became impatient on account of the long absence of the swallow, and sent the bird Patija raja to look after it. Patija raja was also provided with a jacket and hovered on it downward. After it had looked for a long time in all directions, it discovered at last the swallow sleeping peacefully.

“Why do not you come?”

“The Storm wind makes it impossible for me to fly upward.”

“Say rather that you are not willing; why such a false pretence? Look how I shall manage.”

Patija raja flew up in mid-air, but it was overmastered by the strong wind which drove him towards the east, and he was obliged to come back without delay.

“What did I tell you, it is impossible!”

“Now then we shall have to stay here for the present.”

“What can be the reason that they stay so long?” said the princess, growing more and more impatient. She called the cowflea and said, “Please go down and see why they do not come back.”

“I must, you say, go thither; but is there nothing that I have to take with me?”

“Here is a firesteel [flint and steel used to strike sparks for making fire]; take it in your armpit, and be careful that nobody here shall know that I have given it to you.”

The cowflea went, and one would say that the little balls protruding from his head had been his eyes, if it were not known that his organs of sight were in his armpits. The flea despaired at first of finding the two birds, but had nevertheless had the good luck of meeting them still on the tanjuk tolu. “Why do not you come? The princess is so angry!”

“The strong wind has made our return impossible, and that is why we are still sitting here.”

The three began to consider together what they ought to do. They resolved to go to the rock Nanggar jati [an immense rock reaching to the sky] and to try to make their return from its top. When they had reached the rock, Patija raja began to climb it. He arrived half way up and looked on all sides, but he discovered nothing that could be of use to them in their embarrassment. Only a bare plain was spread before his eyes. Therefore he climbed higher, and first, when he reached the top, he saw the roots of the Yambu barus dangling gently above him. He hoped now to be soon back, provided he succeeded in grasping one of the roots, but notwithstanding all his efforts, they still remained out of his reach. He began to lament loudly, for his last hope was gone.

His cries rose upward and were heard by the princess, who thought that she recognized the voice of her favorite bird. She sent one of her servants to see what had happened, and was soon after aware of the truth. She asked then for her betel-pouch, and opened it so that the scent spread far off, and Patija raja, who smelt it, was full of sad thoughts on account of his beloved mistress.

Si-tapi Sindar di mata ni ari went to the gate of heaven and took with her a magic ring, her betel-pouch, and seven hen’s eggs. When arrived, she sat down and looked downward, upon which, espying Patija raja, she said to him, “Do not cry any more but hasten to come up.”

“Alas, princess, I cannot reach the roots of the Yambu bares, all my endeavors have been in vain.”

“Since it cannot be otherwise, you must make up your mind to go down again; I shall take care that you want nothing.”

She let down the magic ring and gave Patija raja these directions: “When you three have settled on the Tanjuk tolu, then you must open the eggs, and you will find in them all the plants and trees which you may require; but if you want to have cattle, you must call on the magic ring, and you will get not only cattle but also all kinds of animals, habitations, council-houses, and whatever more you may wish for.”

When the adventurers found themselves together again on Tanjuk tole, they opened the eggs, scattered round about them the contents, and by this means soon saw splendid fields and gardens appear. In a short time they were, by the power of the magic ring, put in possession of houses and all they wanted.

They feasted then, eating and drinking good things, and settled also that Patija raja should be king, the swallow vice-king, and the cowflea commander of the warriors of the newly established village. Then they prayed to Batara guru that they might have offspring in order to people the village.

When he had heard their prayer, Batara guru ordered his sister Pandan rumari, to go to the earth.

“But, brother, how shall I get there?”

“Do not be anxious about your journey, aunt; I shall make it as easy as possible for you,” said Si-tapi Sindar di mata ni ari.

“You must choose a good spot to settle there, aunt; and when you have made your establishment, you must promise me that on the next festival Saturday [the Saturday preceding the full moon of each month] you will come on to the top of the rock.”

Si-tapi Sindar di mata ni ari now twisted her hair into a basket, wherein her aunt Pandan rumari, after having put a magic ring on her finger, placed herself to be let down on the Nanggar jaii. When she arrived on the top, she looked fearfully round about, but finally went down the rock. She settled at the foot of it, and called her abode Pulo porlak pagaran. When the festival Saturday arrived, Pandan rumari went to the top of the Nanggar jati, where the roots of the Yambu bares still dangled. She tried to take hold of one, but failed, and, not knowing what to do, she began to weep loudly.

At the moment Si-tapi Sindar mata n, ari heard the sobbing, she said to herself, “Is not this my aunt?” And going to the gate of heaven to look down, she found at once that she was right. At the same time she remembered what had been concerted. She ordered a servant to bring her a woman’s jacket, a jew’s harp, a pair of ear ornaments, a mirror, and lemons, twelve different kinds grown on the same branch. She let all these things down to her aunt and then took leave of her with the following words, “Go back down the rock, dear aunt, and take with you the bird Imbulu Man, who can be of service to you, if you want to enter into relation with Patija raja and his comrades.”

Pandan rumari then got the bird Imbulu Man to accompany her, who was no ordinary bird, since she had no feathers, and she was like a human being as regarded her skin. She was also, through the will of Batara guru, pregnant of a human fruit.

When she had returned to her dwelling, Pandan rumari, on account of the situation in which the bird found herself, gave her an appropriate couch, surrounded by mats arranged like curtains.

One day, Pandan rumari lighted a great fire, the smoke of which rose on high and was perceived by the inhabitants of Tanjuk tole.

“Go and see who makes a fire there,” said Patija raja to the swallow.

“But when I arrive there and find somebody, I shall have to say something.”

“If you do not know the person, ask him who has made him come there.”

The swallow came to Pandan rumari and asked her who had sent her to that place. “Batara guru sent me here. But you come as if called for, because Imbulu Man must be with you at Tanjuk tole,” answered Pandan rumari.

When the swallow arrived at Tanjuk tole with Imbulu Man, this last addressed Patija raja as follows, “The reason why I have been sent here by the princess, is that I should provide you offspring so that you do not remain without subjects.” After some time, Imbulu Man was delivered of two daughters, of whom Patija raja and the swallow each took one for his wife. If Imbulu Man were to give birth to one more daughter later, then the cowflea was to have her for a wife. The cowflea was by no means satisfied, and thinking that he might have to wait a very long time for his wife, he secretly got Imbulu Man with child, in order to secure his wish. It appeared soon that she was again pregnant, and she declared that this was the cowflea’s doing; but he was let off after a slight reprimand from Patija raja.

Imbulu Man was afterwards delivered of a son, who had the name of Bala porang. After that Patija raja had by his wife a son, to whom they gave the name of Raja Manuksang di portibi. As for the swallow, he had two daughters, the one of whom they called Sada lumbar, and the other Boru dognu; at the feast of the naming of his daughters, the swallow gave himself the title of Namora Mangipa.

As they made their children intermarry, the inhabitants of Tanjuk tole could soon rejoice in the possession of numerous descendants, whose swarms filled the newly founded village.

SRY NAGASARY

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Scheltema, J. F. “Sry Nagasary.” Journal of American Folklore 32 (1919): 324–342.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Indonesia

National Origin: Indonesia

---

From the beginning of the Common Era (first century A.D.), the Indonesian archipelago has been influenced by the Hindu religion from the Indian subcontinent. In the fourteenth century through the beginning of the sixteenth century, the powerful Hindu Majapahit Empire extended its influence from its seat of power in Java throughout a large portion of Indonesian and into the Malay Peninsula to the north. Even when Islam established dominance in around 1500 C.E., Hinduism remained influential in the traditions of Indonesia. The following tale, which seems to derive from a Javanese variant, reflects not only this continuing Hindu influence, but also the moral codes that grew out of the synthesis of Hindu, indigenous, and Islamic values.

---

Once upon a time there was a man, named Kyahy Taboos, who lived in a village near the mouth of a river that flowed from the blue mountains in the interior of one of the Sunda Islands toward the sea. He had four sons: Bagal, a wood-carver; Sompoq, a merchant; Paning, a jeweler; and Mashmool who, being the last-born and favorite, was allowed to follow his natural bent toward music and poetry instead of learning a more useful and profitable trade than that of a merry-andrew [jester] as the elder brothers contemptuously called him when discussing his gifts of entertainment. Though brought up in a very religious way and considering themselves of the elect and knowing that the teachings of Batara Guru, the great god, urged man to goodwill and kindness in his dealings with all his fellow-creatures, and especially to love and charity in his relations with his kindred, envy had taken possession of their hearts because their father indulged Mashmool upon whom therefore they looked with eyes of hatred.

So when Kyahy Taboos had been summoned by the gods to receive the amount of his due, Bagal, speaking also for Sompoq and Paning even on the day of their father's burial, said to Mashmool with a lying tongue, "How dost thou propose to provide thy share in our means of subsistence? Our father has left us little more than this house in which we live. Thy brother Sompoq buys and sells merchandise at a profit; thy brother Paning is a worker in gold and silver, and a dealer in precious stones, and whatever passes through his hands leaves also substantial gain behind; I am thoroughly acquainted with the nature and qualities of the different kinds of wood and proficient, for the good of our common household, in turning kayu mahar into shafts for lances and spears, and into sheaths for krisses, using kayu kamuning for the upper parts where the steel touches first in sending the weapon home, improving by skilful carving the design of kayu pelèt to enhance the mysterious play of its black and red-brown spots on its luminous grain, a premonition of deeds of darkness and blood, but thou, what canst thou do to earn thy rice and salt?"

"I am a musician," answered Mashmool, dignified and self-conscious for all his modesty, "I can recite in fitting language what has been preserved in our chronicles of ancient wisdom and what they record of high mettle and tender devotion, of virtue and purity in mortals emulating the gods."

"And who cares?" asked Sompoq.

"No one sufficiently to untie his purse-string for accomplishments of the sort," remarked Paning.

"Nor is it incumbent on us to encourage idlers," continued Bagal.

These words were hard to hear and since his brothers persisted in their abusive speech, finding fault with everything he did or left undone, Mashmool resolved to part from them. When he made known his intention to travel and see the wide world and seek his fortune in distant lands, they laid their heads together, discussing how to defraud him of his portion of their father's inheritance, at least how to put him off with a most inadequate payment in cash. But the generous Mashmool, whose mind was not set on worldly considerations, never thought of a settlement; trustful because upright himself, he deemed it quite regular that his brothers should remain in undivided possession of their father's patrimony until his return, an arrangement perfectly agreeable to them. And so, at his departure, with his suling [bamboo flute] under his arm to try his luck as a wandering minstrel, his brothers' farewell with ostentatious wishes for his success in crossing the seven seas and roaming the seven empires, was of the most affectionate description, touching enough, in fact, to make him search his innocent heart when under way, as to whether perhaps he had done the sons of his father an injustice by doubting their brotherly love. But he walked on.

After Mashmool had gone, the trade of the wicked brothers in their respective occupations began to fall off. It seemed that with him prosperity had turned its back on them. At first they thought that Mashmool, incensed by his treatment at their hands, had sought the assistance of some wizard to obtain revenge through the agency of malevolent spirits, ever prone to mischief and rancorous tricks. To foil these demons they attached strips of white cloth to the roof-corners and other conspicuous parts of their dwelling, a potent means to draw the attention of well-disposed deities to the sinister work of the servants of Evil in the abode of godly men, for so the trio considered themselves, being scrupulously strict in the observance of the ceremonial duties prescribed by their creed, very godly indeed, provided that godliness did not interfere with their greed.

Their astonishment knew no bounds at noticing, when the pieces of white cloth had been fluttering in the wind for a while, that the host of malignant fiends who had chased off their customers, persisted in pursuing them with ill luck. The men with well-tempered lance and spear points to be mounted on strong, flexible shafts, and with beautifully damascened krisses to be further embellished with sheaths of a correct pattern and artistically carved hafts, still passed their door with averted heads to entrust the delicate work to one of Bagal's competitors. The women going to market still avoided the booths of Sompoq and Parting whatever pains they took to attract both matrons and virgins by a cunning display of silk and gold brocade, of ear-rings and bangles and necklaces, jewelry fit for princesses and queens, beyond price yet dirt-cheap if the fair ones only would venture a bid.

Putting the blame on the minor deities who neglected to protect Batara Guru's [supreme god in the Sundanese pantheon] own, Mashmool's brothers never suspected the real cause of the adverse circumstances they had to struggle against, namely, their hardness in their dealings, their rapacity which did not even stop short at cheating and turned people away from them.

One night, after having spent the evening with Sompoq and Parting in their habitual grumbling at the incomprehensible attitude of the rulers of the universe inflicting hardships on the deserving, Bagal had a dream. He fancied himself carving out of wood, and he took special note that it was kayu nagasary, the image of an apsara, one of the hand-maidens of Indra, that amuse the god by dancing before his throne on Mount Mandara; and when the image was ready, it took life and showered gold on its maker. Marveling at his vision and not being able to make out its meaning, Bagal told Sompoq and Paning, who did not understand any better than he. They resolved therefore to refer the matter to a saintly hermit with a great reputation for the interpretation of dreams. Charging his usual price for the accustomed offerings to the divine guardians of the secrets of the past, present and future, and keeping them moreover in long suspense while engaged in pressing those lords of the recondite for precise information, the saintly hermit made at last known as Batara Guru's, the upper god's manifest will, revealed by the aforesaid sapient beings after the completion of the sacrifice, that Bagal should do, consciously in his waking state, that which his soul had been made to do without the cooperation of the body. Rich reward would be the result.

So Bagal carved a life-sized image of an apsara, and it was a fine piece of sculpture and he called it Sry Nagasary after the name of the wood suggested by his dream. Sompoq and Parting, desirous of participating in the promised rich reward, which they construed to mean abundant wealth, clothed the puppet with silk and brocade, and adorned it with jewelry. Bagal, loath to share his good fortune, told them repeatedly that this was not in the dream but as they insisted and were two to his one, he had to acquiesce, pretending with a sour face that he conferred the solicited favor upon them out of the fullness of his brotherly affection. And this display of fraternal disinterestedness became the more fervent the less inclination Sry Nagasary evinced to realize the hopes excited by the saintly hermit's words.

Her presence, remarked the brothers to one another, brought no change in their condition, and if they did not know what to think of a world that refused to acknowledge their superior virtue, or of a heaven full of gods whom they lost no opportunity to wheedle into the belief of their obedient piety but who, nevertheless, suffered their neighbors to treat them according to their works rather than according to their professions, neither could they conceive why the saintly hermit had deluded them by a false interpretation of the dream, making them the laughing-stock of the village for the affair had become known and every one ridiculed the credulity of Kyahy Taboos's sons, who expected a wooden image, dressed and bedecked with jewels like a woman of quality, to restore the credit and standing which they had lost by their grasping dishonesty.

When they complained to the saintly hermit and sought redress, they received his assurance that his interpretation of the dream was right. "You should break yourselves of the bad habit of blaming others for your own faults," he added. "The truth of the apsara's failure to gratify your wishes is a long distance beside your surmise. To exercise her functions in discharge of the task assigned to her, she needs not only a human shape, since she is now dwelling among mortals; and clothes for decency's sake, since she is earthly on earth; and garnishment of her beauty, since even a celestial female will strive with might and main to please men, but also music to guide her dancing. Oh that you had not driven away your younger brother, the musician!"

They were surprised and pained by the reproof implied in the saintly hermit's remark and replied somewhat hotly, though he was a holy man, that Mashmool had gone of his own accord. And with respect to his excellence in music, he did not possess a monopoly of the art. If it were not for their sure knowledge of its being an empty, almost sinful pastime, they could no doubt learn to play any instrument as well and better than he.

"Hearts absorbed in the contemplation of the divine will cannot be corrupted by the arts that soothe and recreate," rejoined the saintly hermit, a faint smile enlivening his emaciated countenance.

Then he dismissed the brothers who, returning home, had a serious argument, evoked by this utterance as a sequel to his fuller explanation of his interpretation of the dream. Considering and reconsidering, it now appeared entirely clear to them: the rich reward for their righteousness, at last acknowledged by Batara Guru, was to arrive through the apsara dancing to their music; and all their religious scruples about the propriety of that frivolous diversion vanished the moment they saw their advantage in it.

Bagal commenced practicing the rabab [violin], Sompoq the gendang [drum] and Paning the katram [cymbals] in order to form a complete orchestra, by far more sonorous and melodious, more adequate to accompany a celestial dancer, they flattered themselves, than Mashmool's feeble efforts with a simple bamboo flute ever could be.

After persistent and strenuous toil they noticed slight movements in the puppet. It began to quake and quiver; with their progress in the production of a concordant combination from the sounds they generated, to change its posture and position at the measure of the tune to which they strove to do justice. The achievement put an end to the scoffing of their neighbors who, compelled by curiosity, sought their company for ocular evidence of their prodigious command over a wooden image into which they had blown life, causing it to go through its paces as if it were a real dancing-girl.

The neighbors were, of course, made to pay for the privilege. Sry Nagasary's monetary value expelled from the minds of the brothers all doubts of her divine mission to recompense them for their holiness, tardily but now fitly recognized by Batara Guru. This was the rich reward foretold by the saintly hermit, which flowed more and more richly as their proficiency in handling their musical instruments increased, to wit, their mechanical proficiency, always short of the artistic touch born from an inspiration intrinsically foreign to their coarse-grained temperament. And this was the reason, but they knew it not, why Sry Nagasary, instead of budding into life, remained a marionette with lips always sealed; set, truly, in machine-like motion by their music such as it was, but stark again the instant it ceased.

Even though they prospered, thanks to the apsara's offices, the brothers began to mistrust her lack of animation unless specially roused to activity. Constitutionally suspicious and spiteful, they also mistrusted one another, each meditating in his mind how he could become her sole possessor, secure for himself alone the rich reward by releasing the aerial nymph from her wooden prison and marrying her. Surely, Batara Guru had decreed her transmigration into an earthly shape for the highest good. And was not the highest good attainable in this case that the rich reward should go to the most meritorious, the most godly of the three as each of them believed himself to be?

For ways and means the saintly hermit could be consulted. So once more they went up to him; not together, however, but separately and secretly, in fear of being caught at their knavish game, turning on their heels at every few steps to keep their father's spirit off their track for Kyahy Taboos, angered in the narrow valley of death at their intent to cheat one another, might contrive to cross it with calamitous result. The saintly hermit showed not the least surprise at their coming and gave each the same answer to his request for advice, again faintly smiling as Bagal, Sompoq and Paning, to conceal their base motives, feigned an ardent solicitude for the ultimate fate of the wooden apsara, whose incarnation they said that they wished to compass for her own weal, namely, to insure her happiness in union with Batara Guru's chosen one.

"To fulfill her destiny and yours, according to Batara Guru's will," declared the saintly hermit, "your apsara needs a human soul to conclude in its human stage the divine labor enjoined on her. Whoever, with a clean heart and clean hands, gives his soul to her in token of his true love, shall have hers." Having spoken these words to Bagal, Sompoq and Paning successively, the saintly hermit declined to tell them anything more.

They spent their days and nights in pondering the queer, puzzling recommendation that they should give their souls to Sry Nagasary. Uncertain how to act upon it and avoiding one another because burning with envy, they endeavored to despoil destiny of its secrets by communicating with soothsayers, whose divinations at the cost of incessant offerings on numberless altars to numberless gods, brought them not a step farther. When they met to join in their musical performances, necessary to induce the apsara to dance, it was no pleasure to them, rather a vexation, to observe her growing skill, which attracted to their house people from far and near, and made the treasure in their coffers swell. They got their gold and silver too dear, prospering at the expense of their tranquility of mind for each of the three was constantly scheming how to defraud the others of that source of income and finally of lasting comfort to its exclusive possessor. Since they had to share their good fortune, it made them utterly miserable.

Meanwhile the fame of the dancing image had spread to distant lands. Mashmool, the youngest brother, heard it spoken of on his travels and also somewhat homesick notwithstanding his unpleasant experience, he resolved to go and see for himself. After many new adventures and subsisting on his minstrelsy during his journey back as he had done all the time, he arrived at last, tired and footsore, in his native village. It was evening and nobody recognized him because he had become taller of stature while his features, too, had undergone a change reflecting a wider knowledge of the world, a riper insight which nevertheless abided by the guileless sincerity of his candid nature.

To reach his home he had either to cross the river in a boat or to skirt it upstream for quite a distance to pass over a bridge and return by the opposite bank. Standing near the water's edge, he looked at the rising ground on the other side, purple in the rays of the setting sun. Behind the first bend where, giving way to cultivated ground, the tangled mangroves ceased to fringe the stream, lay the house of his desire. In the growing darkness he saw many lights glimmering between the palms that masked its landing-place. Many more lights floated onward with the flood. They belonged to sampans and larger craft, koleks and jukoongs, all making for the luminous headland. Mashmool inquired of a man, just embarked and ready to push off, what was going on that the whole village, and strangers too, it seemed, were speeding toward the semblance of some palace of a thousand torches, transplanted from a fairy tale to reality.

"Whence comest thou?" asked the man. "Even the people that live beyond the stars know of Sry Nagasary and of her dancing every market day. Jump in if thou hast a wish to behold the marvelous lady, a runaway from Indra's paradise."

Eyering Mashmool more closely as he did jump in, his flute in his hand and his violin under his arm, a Sumatra rabab he had learned to play when associating with the Rawas brethren of his guild, the man continued, voicing the misgivings naturally awakened by a strolling minstrel's appearance, "That is, supposing thou possessest the wherewithal to satisfy the craving for lucre which dishonors the sons of Kyahy Taboos who exhibit the apsara. Thou, companion of the road, canst pander to their infamy with cash? If not, thy going up is bootless and unavailing fatigue."

"Verily, thy words lack wisdom," retorted Mashmool, pointing to his instruments. "Shall music be barred where dancing sways the night?"

"Thou speakest truth," assented the man, beginning to paddle. "And oh for the dancing there would be with the youngest son of Kyahy Taboos leading instead of Bagal, who draws his bow across the copper strings as if he were sawing wood, while Sompoq and Paning bang the drum and clank the cymbals like irate husbandmen in their ricefields shooing off the birds. But Mashmool, where does he wander and what has happened to him since his shameless brothers turned him out?"

Mashmool had his reasons not yet to reveal his identity. His answers to the friendly but garrulous boatman's questions about the country he hailed from, his musical training, the object of his visit and so forth, were short and evasive. Aided by the tide, which was setting in, they soon rounded the point near the landing-place, beached the boat and joined the crowd that sought admittance to the spacious hall where the performance was to be given. Originally open on three sides, it had been closed by means of screens of split bamboo between the pillars to prevent impecunious or penurious curiosity procuring gratification without pecuniary sacrifice. Over the outer gate, truly, was an inscription in large characters, a motto from the sacred books of ancient lore, extending a cordial welcome to friends, acquaintances and every one else who chose to enter, but Bagal, guarding the door, assisted by Sompoq and Paning, construed that greeting in a fashion which made their guests comment with wry faces upon words soft as butter proceeding from demons of avarice lurking in their hearts.

When Mashmool entered, paying them the gate-money, the brothers never suspected their father's preferred son they had wronged, in the travel-worn stranger questing admission. They took him for a wandering musician attracted by the renown of their marvelous preeminence in his art, which forced even inanimate objects to sympathetic obedience, and saluted him with the obligatory phrase in addressing visitors from foreign parts, "Our gain is great, O bestower of favors! That thy voyage has not been impeded by the perils of the road."

"The gain is mine, O you on whom Batara Guru showers his blessings! And it is your favor I seek," answered Mashmool in a low tone not to let his voice betray him.

Thereupon Bagal ordered the servants to spread mats for the spectators to sit upon with due regard to their rank and station, lining three sides of the space, also covered with matting, which was reserved for the performing puppet. He himself with Sompoq and Paning took place on the fourth side, muttering prayers while in the middle incense was burned as an indispensable preliminary to the exhibition. Then, getting up from their crouched position, they pushed the wooden doll forward, Sry Nagasary, in the regulation dress of a dancing girl: from her hips down she was clothed in a kahin, a garment of brocade wound round her middle and kept securely attached by the weight of its own graceful folds; her body was wrapped in the kemben, a narrow strip of silk, encircling her upward to the armpits and held tight by passing the ends under its loops; a pending, that is, a golden girdle, fastened more firmly both kahin and kemun; a slen-dang or scarf, stuck to right and left between the pending and her waist, completed her costume with a string of melaty [variety of jasmine] hanging down from her neck, and the kerabu [type of earring], bracelets and finger-rings which were the special admiration of her female beholders.

These could be heard but not seen behind the slatted shutters and screens of split bamboo through the interstices of which they watched over the heads of their squatted men-folk what was bechancing the aerial nymph dispatched from heaven for their amusement. Their excited whispers subsided into a long-drawn "Ah!" as they perceived the first signs of animation in her hands and arms and visage, yellow with boreh [preparation of curcuma and cocoa oil, used at ceremonial functions to anoint and color the parts of the body which remain bare] when the three brothers, each coaxing his instrument into laborious discipline without minding the other two, began to attack the dancing music proper after an equally cacophonous prelude. Bagal, keeping his bow between his fingers as if manipulating a saw, to repeat the boatman's simile, worked the strings in an unsteady, painful manner of which his rabab complained loudly in screechy, chiding accents, like those of a testy old woman. Sompoq thwacked the drum, altogether independent of his lead, and Paning belabored the cymbals quasi-derisively of that shrill scolding, its strident sound going through interminable, monotonous, ill-executed variations of the attempted tune, wrangling with the jeering response of the gendang's bing-bang and the katram's click-clack, until at last by sheer reiteration of the invitation to dance, it persuaded Sry Nagasary to perform her sembah, the salutation expressive of her readiness to commence.

It was hailed with exclamations of unbounded, though, owing to the awe attending her astounding feats, of suppressed enthusiasm. While, with clumsy movements like those of an automaton, she took hold of her scarf, disengaging it from her girdle to raise it to her shoulders, putting it round her neck with the ends hanging down to her knees, Bagal, as leader of the orchestra, redoubled his vigor. Without prejudice on behalf of key or melody or harmony, he dispensed his fortes in an audaciously liberal style, goading Sompoq and Paning to surpass his energetic zeal with vicious fortissimos on their instruments, the three producing a combination of dissonants which gave an alarming foretaste of the futurist music that enraptures ultra-modern audiences in our Temples of Symphony and Philharmonic Halls.

Sry Nagasary made the best of it. Dancing slowly and mechanically, she warmed up to her divine art—that is, to a certain extent, to the extent permitted by the character of her accompaniment. Her stolid face, indeed, smeared with boreh, had nothing human, still less anything indicative of her heavenly extraction, yet, first the women and then the men remarked that her eyes, as she glided round, languidly lifting and twisting her arms and hands and fingers, began to move in her head. They moved sleepily, though, like the eyes of one acting under the impulse of a dream.... But lo! Her hair, it had become real hair and in it was stuck a leaf of the waringin-tree, just as if she were a common dancing-girl, performing in the street and desirous to attract lovers....

Encouraged by these familiar associations, the chief of the village, who attended ex officio, got up and took Sry Nagasary's scarf from her clumsily fumbling hands. Thereupon, followed by the tottering doll, he approached with the mincing steps prescribed by native etiquette his superior, the demang or chief of the district, also present, to squat down opposite the latter and to offer it as an invitation to the first dance a deux, an honor pertaining to the guest highest in rank. Again according to native etiquette there was a protracted contest of courtesy between the two officials, the one insisting with due deference, the other politely refusing to accept the scarf until at last he yielded and, begging to be excused on account of his age while handing it back to the wooden lady, produced a silver coin, tendering the money to her as the price of his exemption from a precedence incompatible with his hoary dignity.

“The proper thing to do,” muttered the bystanders who watched Sry Nagasary clutching the coin with an awkward gesture and sliding by fits and starts, unconscious of her actions, toward a copper vessel in front of Bagal, into which she let it fall.

The chinking sound of its striking the rim and bottom displeased the women behind the shutters and screens. “An unmannerly dancing girl,” they whispered to one another, commenting upon this trick which, like the ostentatious display of a waringin-leaf, is a common one among the artists of the streets, who take good care to make the tangible evidence of approval, extracted from a male admirer, ring in its receptacle to stimulate the generosity of his rivals.

Moving away from the collection-bowl, Sry Nagasary halted before the village chief, whose turn had now come either to dance with her or to open his purse. He chose the former course, seconded by two of his elders, one to his right, the other to his left. Squirming about, contorting their limbs, encircling the unsightly image of a celestial virgin at the measureless measure of a wildly unharmonious orchestra, they presented a sight extravagantly weird and lugubrious in their chasse-croise with the grotesque apsara, descended from Indra’s court for the delectation of mortals. Although some of the onlookers enlivened the scene by clapping their thighs in time with the drum and cymbals, genially and affably to show the appreciation obligatory on well-bred neighbors, the pause, announced by an unearthly yelp of Bagal’s rabab, was welcomed as a relief even by the most curious.

Sry Nagasary relapsed at once into her original state of superlative woodenness. Never before, however, had she done so well, danced in such a life-like style as that night. The three brothers took, of course, all the credit of her progress in pose and attitude and elegant carriage to themselves. But those of the company who had not been wholly absorbed in the spectacle because distracted by their close observation of the stranger in their midst, the wandering minstrel half hid in a corner with his eyes riveted on the dancing doll that seemed to gain in vitality under his gaze, were of a different opinion.

“He has the air of a gandharva [a heavenly musician] in search of his apsara: no wonder that she responds,” said the women and girls, favorably impressed by the looks and deportment of the handsome youth.

“Is not this Mashmool, come back to claim his portion among the sons of Kyahy Taboos?” A selectman asked of the village scribe.

The accosted authority, whose wife had nursed Mashmool after the death of his mother in childbed, scrutinized him closely and cried. “Indeed it is and my hearty greeting to him!”

The exclamation and the crowding forward of the villagers to salute the wanderer happily restored to his friends, awakened his brothers to a sense of something unusual going on, an event not on the evening's program. Joining the circle which had formed around Mashmool, they now recognized him too, their preoccupation as owners, managers and orchestra of the show having so far prevented their taking much notice of him. His arrival did not suit them at all but they went up to him with sugary words and a grand display of joy at his return, and they entreated him to consider himself at home in their father's house, forgetting that it was his as well as theirs.

In their vexation at Mashmool's unexpected reappearance, they solaced themselves with the thought that their generous but vague assurances of hospitable intent could easily be modified after they had had time to consider the case at their leisure, basing their line of conduct on mature reflection. For the present Sry Nagasary's resuscitation claimed their undivided attention. So they took up again their instruments to resume their arduous functions in the eagerly awaited second part of the performance. But, while they preluded with more than ordinary absence of concord and consonance, owing to their perturbed state of mind, the demang, after a whispered consultation with the village chief, interrupted their play and proposed an arrangement the idea of which had already occurred to several others: since Mashmool was known to be an excellent musician, could not Bagal leave the musical direction to him the better to discharge the duties of the general management?

Bagal argued that Sry Nagasary, being a personal gift from Batara Guru to himself and, he added under the stress of their presence, to his brothers Sompoq and Paning, would most certainly decline to dance to any music but his own. One might try, answered the demang. His proposition in favor of the change being carried by acclamation, Bagal was obliged to give in and resign the leadership of the orchestra to Mashmool who, rejecting his elder brother's fiddle, commenced tuning the Sumatra rabab which he had learned to play during his peregrinations in Jamby and the Rawas. Besides other differences in construction, it had three strings of twisted silk instead of the two copper ones which Bagal never succeeded in stretching properly to sound the right notes of the salendro-octave. Mashmool's prelude revealed at once his indisputable superiority as an apt pupil of the eminent virtuoso that made Batang Asay, where this maestro had established a school, a name famous among the connoisseurs from Majapahit to Manang Kabau.

The coarse, raw noises, suggestive of an abusive hag, a shrieking virago, which Bagal had inflicted upon his audience, gave way to soft tones like those of a love-sick maiden whose hopes and desires are bursting into song. Mashmool's masterly execution of the opening strains profoundly touched the cloistered women and girls who, for all his having been recognized as Kyahy Taboos's youngest son, could not get rid of the fanciful belief that the wandering minstrel was an incarnation of the primal and essential Gandharva, the patron of their sex, the deity of courtship and marriage. His tender call to come forth and dance, a gentle but irresistible summons to the completion of high events, had a still more wonderful effect upon the apsara, manifestly so anxious to do his bidding that it almost petrified Bagal, who sat motionless with mingled feelings of amazement and exasperation while Sompoq and Paning, no less confounded, fortunately forgot to follow their younger brother's lead with their drum and cymbals.

In fact, every one doubted the evidence of his senses when Sry Nagasary stepped airily to the middle of the space assigned for the exhibition of her art, subject to a transformation unlike and much greater than that which had enabled the lumbering doll, fashioned by Bagal and dressed and bedecked with jewels by Sompoq and Paning, to go through its twitching paces. Her features took a living hue; the layer of boreh disappeared from her face and arms and hands, leaving them tinted like the dusky-yellow rind of the succulent langsah. The life-blood, vital principle of human existence, rushed up from its source beneath the lotus and tinged her cheeks; her bosom heaved; her brow expanded; her lustreless eyes began to sparkle; the waringin leaf in her hair-knot blossomed into a red-glowing rose.

Nimble, yet stately, she danced to the measure of Mashmool's accords, swaying her lithe body on her haunches, extending and bending upward her fingers, spreading and waving her scarf with winding, graceful movements. Timidly advancing, shyly receding, she seemed to hold converse with the all-spirit, wooing its creative essence and being wooed, trembling under unseen caresses, melted to conceive and bear like a flower-bud in the warmth of the sun. How beautiful she was! And her dancing in agitation of ecstasy an elation of the soul, a solution of the riddle of man and woman, of the noble and the base, of heaven and earth!

The hearts of those who beheld her throbbed with rapture. They were now perfectly convinced that she was one of Indra's hand-maidens, her home the abode of the gods. And, miracle upon miracle, when she finished her dance with Mashmool's last note quavering sky-ward, she did not subside into the rigid inanity from which he had quickened her, but, after craving with a sembah and obtaining his permission to withdraw, disappeared into the women's apartments, bestowing on him a parting glance which made the young folks turn white, then scarlet under their brown skins as their tumultuous blood ceased its flow, immediately to dash on again through their veins in fiery waves.

And one of the elders said, "The ghandarva fully deserves his reward."

"Nay, call him Kama, the god of the flowery bow, smiled upon by Raty, his fond spouse," replied the village scribe, who was something of a prig.

The demang, rising to depart after thanking Bagal for the rare entertainment provided and Mashmool for its exceptional success, gave the sign for the assembly to break up. The village chief followed suit, escorting him home at the head of a numerous retinue. Thereupon the rest of the guests dispersed in due sequence, taking a perfunctory leave of their host and his two brothers next in age, but very cordially commending themselves to the youngest and complimenting him upon the new proof of his surpassing talent they had just enjoyed. Mashmool accepted their praise with a modesty which endeared him still more, especially to the fair among his admirers. Yet, however unassuming his behavior, this homage to his musical proficiency, not to mention Sry Nagasary's evident preference for his person and accompaniment, was not at all to his seniors' liking. On the other hand, they saw their advantage in retaining him until they had mastered the trick, for so they considered it, which wrought the magical transition of a wooden image into an embodiment of the transports of paradise, far beyond their own past achievements unaided by occult artifice.

So they, too, complimented him, feigning to be overjoyed at his return, cajoling him, beseeching him to stay and live with them forever but resolved in their minds to get rid of him the instant they had wheedled him out of his secret. They ordered the servants to spread a sleeping-mat for him in the verandah over the stream that laved the basement of the house, his favorite place to pass the night in as they affectionately remembered. Without doubt he was tired and they needed also a good rest after the fatigue of the night's performance, wherefore they begged him to excuse them for the nonce from expatiating upon their contentment caused by his hale and hearty presence, from exchanging the news of the village for an account of his travels and adventures: the morrow would bring time for that together with the festive celebration of his restitution to the parental roof.

Meanwhile they were consumed with a desire to see Sry Nagasary in the flesh as she withdrew from the dance, to speak to her privately, to establish their claims on the promised reward, each for himself to the exclusion of the other two. But at the women's quarters they were told in reply to their sly inquiries, that the lady had gone to the river for a bath, as might have been expected from an apsara, a water-nymph reincarnate; that she had imperiously commanded when retiring for repose after the refreshing expedition, on no pretext to suffer any one to annoy her with requests for an interview, least of all Bagal, Sompoq or Paning.

Mashmool, believing in his brothers' fond protestations, had laid himself down upon his sleeping-mat, thinking of the strange events of the day, of the ungainly wooden doll transfigured by the effective energy of his music into a celestial princess, of the fervid glance that lovely, peerless being had shot at him, grateful for her delivery, promising worlds of joy. It made him inexpressibly happy, gave him a feeling of beatitude that mingled in the surrounding darkness with the blissful smell of the juicy herbs of the pasture grounds and the sappy buds of the sprouting trees in the jungle, carried from far inland on the wings of the cooling mountain breeze. The growing stillness disposed him to slumber but his rest was not untroubled.

Tossing about, Mashmool was dreaming of the apsara, whom he fancied at his side, leaning over him and looking at him with eyes that plucked his heart out of his body, when a stronger scent, a scent of flowers, delicious and exciting, woke him up. The scent came from melaty and chompaca [variety of magnolia] strung profusely in the thick coils of her hair from which now the rose had vanished as, earlier in the evening, the waringin-leaf. Sitting up, fully awakened by the emotion produced by her close proximity, Mashmool saw however nothing, though he heard a faint rustle of flowing robes, soon lost in the gurgle of the water that swirled past beneath his feet. Had she come to him, the spirit of divine delight, Sry Nagasary? Or had it been one of the comely shaped witches that prowl by night to tear open the breasts of men in search of the clotted drop of blood?

Whoever or whatever it might have been, Mashmool resolved to watch for a new manifestation, surveying the black, eddying current, trying to pierce the murky wall of river and cloud blurred together, that closed him in. Wrapped in his sarong, he sat quite still, noting every suspicious ticking and creaking of rafters and flooring, every shuffle of unshod feet he discerned moving in the house between the whirl of fluttering bats and the yelping bark of the wild dogs that were snapping at one another over the carrion thrown up by the tide. Nervously vigilant he sat until the first glimmer of the rising moon, blinking through the thin, flying filaments of vapor that detached them-selves from the heavy mist which rested on land and sea, began to disperse the gloom. Then he took his flute and played a piece in laud of the soft, silvery light, so melodious that the occupants of the women's quarters, from mistress to lowest serving wench, spoke the next morning of heavenly lutes they had heard.

And his heart being full, Mashmool laid aside his flute to address himself to the moon in verses of the kind whose meter, in the guise of an eagle, once mounted to the realm of sublime felicity and stole the celestial liquor soma, lulling its guardian to neglectful sleep. And having done his duty by the benign luminary, Mashmool gave vent to the love he felt in him for Sry Nagasary and he sang:

My lady is like the yolk of the egg of the world
 She is the cause and the aim of all that exists;
 Of her true lover's anguish and bliss for ever and ever,
 Of the pain he exultantly bears for her sake.

No more time elapsed than necessary to sheathe a kris, when a voice responded, a voice sweet as honey and distinct as the tones of Vishnu's conch that stirs creation from its crest to its navel at his passing astride on the bird Garuda:

Through trials and suff'ring prepare to enter thy kingdom.
 Man's strength's steel'd by patience and man's love by delay.
 Is not the air cleared and cleansed by thunder and lightning?
 Steadily chase thy desire by night and by day.

Mashmool had wooed and won the apsara without the assistance of the saintly hermit, and deep silence, the mysterious silence of the hours before dawn ushers the work and battle of mortal existence, confirmed the announcement of her conditional surrender.

The incident did not escape the attention of the brothers who, stung by the apsara's refusal to see them, were spying on her to keep track of further developments. Though the more jealous of one another the more beautiful she had become and the more accomplished in her profitable art without collapsing the moment she lost the spur of musical incitement, they dropped their rivalry to unite in their common envy of Mashmool. Their backs hunched up and their livers burst of hatred at her response to his declaration, the first articulate utterance that proceeded from her lips in their hearing, and such an utterance!

"We have labored," said Bagal, "and his is the gain!"

"We have admitted him to our home, him who came as driftwood," added Sompoq, "and extended our hospitality to him and this is how he repays our kindness, licking up the mead poured out for us by the gods."

"He has brought with him a spirit of evil, his master," continued Paning, "the one that taught him those tricks, and benefactions to the wicked are always punished by the gods, adverse as they must needs be to dealings with devils and the children of their wrath."

So they talked, wicked words leaving their mouths, sinful words suggested by the spirits of evil that lived in themselves who could not apprehend the fact of Mashmool's superior power over the heavenly nymph originating simply in his superior musical skill backed by his superior cast of mind. Acting on the prognostics of Bagal's dream, as interpreted by the saintly hermit, and competing for the promised reward, they had prepared for everything except that which now had happened. To obviate its consequences, they resolved upon the sacrifice of a human life, (and whose life could it be but Mashmool's?), first to frighten his demonic master into revealing to them the coveted secret; secondly to serve the gods, notably Batara Guru, whose evident will it was that the apsara's mission should redound to their advantage, not his. Dreadful deeds are sometimes planned and done in the professed service of the gods!

Mashmool was asleep after his amorous vigil. Having ascertained this, the conspirators armed themselves and stealthily entered the verandah over whose balustrade they hoped to cast him, when finished, into the river which, as they knew by experience, never gave back what had sunk, properly weighted, beneath its whirling surface to its slimy bottom. Mashmool's regular breathing augured well for their undertaking. But suddenly, already near his sleeping mat and reaching for their krisses, their fratricidal hands were arrested by an apparition, luminous in the moon glow. Startled, they drew back. Sry Nagasary, premonished by her divine perception, had come to warn them off and they went, turning tail like beaten dogs, yet self-righteous enough, even in the hour of their discomfiture and repudiation, to make one another believe that it was they who renounced her since they detected their danger: do not the gods when the holy practices of sanctified men threaten damage to their pre-eminence, employ apsaras to lure those saints from the blessed road? Enlightened by the happenings of the night, they would abstain.

When the mean, by far too crafty fools had gone, withering under her contemptuous stare, Sry Nagasary stooped and touched Mashmool's forehead. He woke up a second time and, looking around, unquiet as a budding plant stirred by the longings of spring, he saw now plainly before him the earthly form of her who had become a dweller in his heart. Bending toward him her dainty figure that seemed wrought of the sheen of the waning moon, she carried her clean beauty proudly as a regal garment. Perplexed and afraid to speak to one descended from the highest sphere to expose herself to contact with mortals, ordained for a purpose he could not divine, to disport among them as she was wont to do among the gods, he gazed at her in silence, intoxicated by the blithe-some influence of her personality, the very marrow of love.

"Thy singing has moved me strangely," she said. "Hast thou the strength to be mine?"

"Forgive me," he answered. "I forgot myself: thou belongest to my brothers and my manifest duty is to go."

"Thy brothers are a rottenness at the core of the sanctity they pretend. They sham devotion, disturbing its limpid course, stirring up its dregs and besmirching themselves. Indra's thunderbolt will destroy them: Rudra, the blue-black demon, is already tracing their path. But, by the light of the moon! I have a more important matter in hand than to discuss thy brothers' share in my assuming this shape, which will confound them through their rascal stupidity. Therefore again: Hast thou the strength to be mine; mine in my master's palace of Amaravati, in the fragrant gardens of Randana?"

Though his courage never turned away from a legitimate object, Mashmool repeated that he would resume his wanderings rather than contend with his brothers for a treasure he prized above all but considered theirs. Thereupon Sry Nagasary, unfolding their machinations and disclosing their intention to kill him, as a king's messenger unwraps a royal dispatch from its yellow silken cover and discloses its contents, told him of their frustrated attempt on his life, adding that their fate, whatever he might wish or do, was in the hands of Varuna, the god of justice and punishment. This having dissipated his scruples, he gladly confessed his love and declared his readiness to prove it by performing any task she might be pleased to appoint.

Her answer fed the lurking suspicion always associated with the unexpected fulfillment of a strong desire:

"My home is in heaven and, though the celestial beverage of delight I dispense, can be drunk by gods or by men at Batara Guru's discretion, the privileged mortal has to select between earthly marriage, which is a short, counterfeit happiness, and lasting felicity in svarloka, the palace and gardens of eternal bliss, which to gain requires fortitude and continence and high endeavor while traversing the valley of sorrow. It is in thy choice to abase me, an apsara, to thy own uncleansed condition, or to raise thyself to mine as a gandharva, my consort before the throne, a servant of Agni, the effulgent, and of Varuna, the exalted judge. Choose thy destiny for me to follow!”

Flurried by the alternative and impelled by the rash impatience that marks the hot lover, Mashmool had it on the tip of his tongue to beg her consent for immediate espousal, but the knowledge of its brief, incomplete satisfaction marred the tempting picture of undeferred possession as the shadow of a cloud darkens a sun-lit landscape. He stood motionless: gratification of the sin-ridden flesh for a fleeting hour or the soul’s reward in undecaying beatitude, the real treasure in Sry Nagasary’s gift?

Dawn had now arrived, Ushas, the shimmer of newborn day, sweethearting with the streaks of vapor in the sky, turning their complexion from palest pink to deepest carmine, and the celestial virgin took her bridegroom by the hand, leading him out of the house to the riverside.

There she held back and spoke, “Look, the moon, the lady of fecundity under whose influence Indra created the universe and fixed the orbits of the planets, Soma, restored to her dominion, is drunk up by the gods; she waneth and will not be filled ere I return to my place on high. What is thy choice? Which way shall we travel, either together for a little while, constantly menaced by irrevocable separation as between a mortal and a child of the stars; or apart for a little while, thou undoing thy desire of its low, lustful wrappings to let me precede where, after trial and purification in the accomplishment of thy task, thou shalt become my other self among the diamonds that stud the roof of the world?”

Loaded with the perfumes of bourgeoning woods, the land wind rippled the water whose playful wavelets rocked the coconut shells which the girls of the village, praying to Soma, had filled with sweet-meats and sent floating down the stream to dispose to favor the deity in charge of the matrimonial market.

The passing fisher-folk as they steered their boats seaward before the auspicious breeze, and the husbandmen as they made up to plough their ricefields and saw them standing, Mashmool and Sry Nagasary, silhouetted against the amber and garnet welkin, in earnest, affectionate communion, said, “Lo! The apsara has found her gandharva.”

From afar they were watched by the saintly hermit, who had been drawn from his holy meditations by the rapidly spreading news of Sry Nagasary’s release from bondage by the charm of Mashmool’s enchanting melodies, and was curious to know whether the youngest of the sons of Kyahy Taboos, conquering himself, would reap the rich reward Batara Guru had empowered the apsara to bestow on the most deserving.

“Oh she,” he muttered, “she, the cloud-spirit, groping in her deliverance for the liberation of her lover from the thralldom of carnal appetite, will she attain her wish and elevate him to glory?”

Mashmool seemed to hesitate. Anxious for a token, he scanned the horizon to the North where Kubera, the god of worldly indulgence, keeps his court, and to the North-East where Chandra illuminates the joys of paradise.

“Thou, Surya, direct his decision!” pleaded Sry Nagasary, invoking the sun, which began to climb the firmament in his golden chariot behind his milk-white, lucent horses.

At his advent Mashmool obtained the inspiration he had sought. And Surya soon reigning supreme, Mashmool loudly published his choice, erect on the ridge at the river’s edge, gorgeously clothed in the lord of fruition’s reflected radiance as in shining armor, clenching shining weapons, put in his hands by the resplendent god: a flaming sword to strike at error and deceit, a lance with flashing head to drive back falsehood into slanderous throats, the minstrel having enlisted as a warrior in Batara Guru’s army of the upright.

And Sry Nagasary contemplated him contentedly, fain to ascend whence she had come, going before with a cheery word of trust in a speedy consummation of their union; with a prayer in her heart for its perfection in purity, such a prayer as no god can resist: May my soul be his soul as his soul is my soul, one forever in whole, undying truth!

SUNRISE

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Dixon, Roland. Oceanic Mythology. Boston: Marshall Jones Company, 1916, 224–227.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Indonesia

National Origin: Indonesia

---

The following tale contains the common elements of questing for a lost sibling, animal helpers, and mistaken identification of a reflection in the water. These and other motifs in “Sunrise” are worldwide. The inclusion of the garuda, a monstrous mythic bird recognized both by Hindus and Buddhists, points to a more direct influence from South Asia. In contrast, the motif of an animal or object answering for an escaping fugitive is characteristically Indonesian.

---

Two sisters, whose parents had been killed and eaten by a tiger and a garuda bird, saved themselves from their parents’ fate by hiding in a drum; but one day a man went out hunting, and his arrow falling on the roof of the house where the two were hidden, he found the girls and took the older, whose name was Sunrise, as his wife.

After a time the man said to his sister-in-law, "Bring me a piece of bamboo, that I may knock out the partition (at the nodes) and make a water-vessel for you to get water in," but when he fixed it, he secretly made holes through the bottom also. He then gave her the water-vessel, and she went to the stream to bring water, but the bamboo would not hold it; and after she had tried for a long time, she discovered the holes in the bottom. Accordingly she returned to the house, but found that Sunrise and her husband had gone, for he had pierced the bottom of the water-vessel so that he and his wife might have time to run away.

Before going off, however, Sunrise had left two lice behind her and had instructed them to answer for her when her sister should return and thus delay pursuit, her orders being, "If she calls me from the landside, do you answer from the seaside; if she calls me from the seaside, do you answer from the land-side; if she asks you the way, show it to her." When the deserted sister returned to the house, she called to Sunrise and thought she heard an answer, but when she went thither, the reply came from the opposite direction. Thus deceived by the false calls, she was long delayed; but finally she discovered the trick, asked the way which Sunrise had taken, and set off in pursuit.

By and by she came upon an old woman, to whom she called, "Oh, granny! Oh, granny! look here!"

The old woman said to herself, "Well, ever since the world was made, I have lived alone, so I won't look," but, nevertheless, she did look, and then asked, "Well, Granddaughter, where do you come from?"

"Granny, I am seeking my older sister," said the other sister, whose name was Kokamomako; and then hearing the sound of a drum, she inquired, "Granny, why are they having a feast over there?"

The old woman answered, "Just now they went by with your sister," and so Kokamomako, continued on her way.

When she came to the house, she called out, "Show me the hair of my sister in the window," but the people inside held up the hair of a cat, whereupon Kokamomako said, "My sister is indeed ugly, but that is the hair of a cat. You must show me her foot."

Then the people took the foot of a cat and thrust it out of the window, saying, "If you want us to produce your sister, you must pick up a basket of rice that we will throw out," whereupon they threw it out and scattered it. Then Kokamomako wept, for this was a task which she could not accomplish; but a rice-bird came up to her and asked, "What is your trouble, and what do you want, that you are picking that up?"

She replied, "I have no trouble, and I don't want anything, but they have hidden my elder sister."

Then the rice-bird helped her, and it was not long before the rice was all gathered; but still the people would not bring out her sister, Sunrise; whereupon Kokamomako said, "If you don't produce my sister, I will go home and set fire to my house," adding, "when you see blue smoke, that will be the furniture; when you see white smoke, that will be money; when you see red smoke, that will be I.” Then she went away, and soon they saw that she had set fire to her house, perceiving that the smoke was first blue, then white, and then red. Knowing that her sister was now dead, Sunrise went and bathed, and when she came back to the house, she took a knife and stabbed herself and died. By and by her husband went to carry her food, and found her dead, whereupon he also took a knife and tried to kill himself, but did not succeed.

Now there was a slave in the house who went to get water at the river, and when she looked in the stream, seeing the reflection of Sunrise, she thought it was her own and called out, “Oh, sirs, you said that I was ugly, but really I am beautiful.” Proud of her supposed good looks and thinking herself too good to be a slave, she threw away her water-vessel and broke it; but when she went back to the house, they sent her back again for water and once more she saw the reflection of Sunrise, for the latter and her younger sister (their ghosts) were hidden in the top of a tree that leaned over the stream. This, however, the slave did not know, and again she said, “Oh, sirs, you said that I was ugly, but I am really beautiful,” and again she threw away the water-vessel and broke it, doing this seven times before she told the people in the house that she had seen the reflection of Sunrise.

In the house was another slave who suffered from wounds on his legs, and the husband of Sunrise ordered him to dive into the stream in order to seize her, but he refused. So all set upon him, and he was forced to do as he was bid; but though he dove and dove, and broke open his wounds, and colored the stream with his blood, he could not find Sunrise.

Accordingly he came ashore and said, “I told you just now that I could not do it, and now you have forced me to try, and I have broken my wounds open again.”

Thereupon, as they sat by the stream, the husband happened to look up, and seeing his wife in the top of the tree, he called out, “Let down a rope, so that I may climb up.”

So she lowered a copper wire, saying, “When you get half way up, don’t hold on so tight,” but when he climbed up and reached the halfway point, she cut the wire, and he fell and was dashed to pieces.

THE LIZARD HUSBAND

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Dixon, Roland. Oceanic Mythology. Boston: Marshall Jones Company, 1916, 210–213.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Indonesia

National Origin: Indonesia

Many Indonesian folktales tell the story of an animal spouse. These frequently take the form of “Beauty and the Beast” (AT 425C). As in the following narrative, the animal husband is misjudged, but by means of enchantment, he triumphs over those who maltreat him.

---

Once there was an old woman who lived alone in the jungle and had a lizard which she brought up as her child. When he was full grown, he said to her, “Grandmother, go to the house of Lise, where there are seven sisters; and ask for the eldest of these for me as a wife.” The old woman did as the lizard requested, and taking the bridal gifts with her, went off; but when she came near the house, Lise saw her and said, “Look, there comes Lizard’s grandmother with a bridal present. Who would want to marry a lizard! Not I.”

The old woman arrived at the foot of the ladder, ascended it, and sat down in Lise’s house, whereupon the eldest sister gave her betel, and when her mouth was red from chewing it, asked, “What have you come for, Grandmother? Why do you come to us?”

“Well, Granddaughter, I have come for this: to present a bridal gift; perhaps it will be accepted, perhaps not. That is what I have come to see.” As soon as she had spoken, the eldest indicated her refusal by getting up and giving the old woman a blow that knocked her across to the door, following this with another that rolled her down the ladder.

The old woman picked herself up and went home; and when she had reached her house, the lizard inquired, “How did your visit succeed?”

She replied, “O! Alas! I was afraid and almost killed. The gift was not accepted, the eldest would not accept it; it seems she has no use for you because you are only a lizard.”

“Do not be disturbed,” said he, “go tomorrow and ask for the second sister,” and the old woman did not refuse, but went the following morning, only to be denied as before. Each day she went again to another of the sisters until the turn of the youngest came. This time the girl did not listen to what Lise said and did not strike the old woman or drive her away, but agreed to become Lizard’s wife, at which the old woman was delighted and said that after seven nights she and her son would come.

When this time had passed, the grandmother arrived, carrying the lizard in a basket. Kapapitoe (the youngest sister) laid down a mat for the old woman to sit on while she spread out the wedding gifts, whereupon the young bride gave her food, and after she had eaten and gone home, the lizard remained as Kapapitoe’s husband. The other sisters took pains to show their disgust. When they returned home at night, they would wipe the mud off their feet on Lizard’s back and would say, “Pitoe can’t prepare any garden; she must stay and take care of her lizard,” but Kapapitoe would say, “Keep quiet. I shall take him down to the river and wash off the mud.”

After a while the older sisters got ready to make a clearing for a garden, and one day, when they had gone to work, the lizard said to his wife, “We have too much to bear. Your sisters tease us too much. Come, let us go and make a garden. Carry me in a basket on your back, wife, and gather also seven empty coconut-shells.” His wife agreed, put her husband in a basket, and after collecting the seven shells, went to the place which they were to make ready for their garden. Then the lizard said, “Put me down on the ground, wife, so that I can run about,” and thus he scurried around, lashing the grass and trees with his tail and covering a whole mountain-side in the course of the day; with one blow he felled a tree, cut it up by means of the sharp points on his skin, set the pieces afire, and burned the whole area, making the clearing smooth and good.

Then he said to Kapapitoe, “Make a little seat for me, so that I can go and sit on it,” and when this was done, he ordered the seven coconut shells to build a house for him, after which he was carried home by his wife. The older sisters returning at evening, saw the new clearing and wondered at it, perceiving that it was ready for planting. When they got home they said to their sister, “You can’t go thus to the planting feast of Ta Datoe. Your husband is only a lizard,” and again they wiped their feet on him.

The next day Lizard and his wife went once more to their clearing and saw that the house had already been built for them by the coconut shells, which had turned into slaves; whereupon the lizard said, “Good, tomorrow evening we will hold the preliminary planting festival, and the next day a planting feast.” Ordering his seven slaves to prepare much food for the occasion, he said to his wife, “Let us go to the river and get ready,” but on arriving at the stream, they bathed far apart, and the lizard, taking off his animal disguise, became a very handsome man dressed in magnificent garments. When he came for his wife, she at first did not recognize him, but at last was convinced; and after she had been given costly new clothes and ornaments, they returned toward Lise’s house. As they came back, the preliminary planting festival had begun, and many people were gathered, including Kapapitoe’s elder sisters, Lise, and the old woman.

The six sisters said, “Tell us, Grandmother, who is that coming? She looks so handsome, and her sarong rustles as if rain were falling. The hem of her sarong goes up and down every moment as it touches her ankles.”

The old woman replied, “That is your youngest sister, and there comes her husband also,” whereupon, overcome with jealousy, the six sisters ran to meet their handsome brother-in-law and vied with each other for the privilege of carrying his betel-sack, saying, “I want to hold the sirih-sack of my brother-in-law.” He, however, went and sat down, and the six went to sit beside him to take him away from their youngest sister, but the lizard would have none of them.

Next day was the planting, and his sisters-in-law would not let the lizard go in company with his wife, but took possession of him and made him angry. Accordingly, when Lise and the sisters were asleep, the lizard got up, waked Kapapitoe, and taking a stone, laid four pieces of bark upon it and repeated a charm, "If there is power in the wish of the six sisters who wipe their feet on me, then I shall, when I open my eyes, be sitting on the ground just as I am now. But if my wish has power, when I open my eyes, I shall be sitting in my house and looking down on all other houses."

When he opened his eyes, he was seated in his house high up on the mountain, for the stone had grown into a great rock, and his house was on top of it. His sisters-in-law tried to climb the cliff, but in vain, and so had to give up, while he and his wife, Kapapitoe, lived happily ever after.

KANTJIL THE MOUSE DEER

---

As noted in the discussion of the Plandok (mouse deer) cycle in Borneo, this trickster figure is popular in Southeast Asia. In Indonesia, the mouse deer is commonly teamed with or pitted against three other figures: ape, crocodile, and tiger. See the Dusun "Mouse Deer the Trickster" cycle (page 328) for additional information and comparative data from Borneo.

---

Mouse Deer and Tiger

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Dixon, Roland. Oceanic Mythology. Boston: Marshall Jones Company, 1916, 186–188.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Indonesia

National Origin: Indonesia

One day the kantjil was resting quietly when he heard a tiger approaching and feared for his life, wherefore, quickly taking a large leaf, he began to fan a pile of dung which happened to lie near. When the tiger came up, and overcome by curiosity asked what he was doing, the mouse-deer said, "This is food belonging to the king. I am guarding it."

The tiger, being very hungry, at once wished to be allowed to eat the royal food, but the kantjil refused for a long time, advising him not to touch it and saying that it would be wrong to betray his trust; but at last he agreed to let the tiger have his way if he would promise to wait before eating it until he, the kantjil, had gone; for thus the blame might be escaped.

No sooner said than done; so when the kantjil had reached a safe distance, he called back to the tiger, "You may begin now," whereupon the tiger hungrily seized what he thought was a delicious morsel, only to be cruelly deceived. Furious at the trick played upon him by the little kantjil, he hurried after the fugitive to get his revenge.

His intended victim, had meanwhile found a very venomous snake, which lay coiled up asleep. Sitting by this, he awaited the tiger's arrival, and when the latter came up raging in pursuit, he told him that he had only himself to blame, since he had been warned not to eat the food. "But," said the kantjil, "you must keep quiet, for I am guarding the girdle of the king. You must not come near it, because it is full of magic power." The tiger's curiosity and desire being, of course, only stimulated by all this, he insisted that he be allowed to try on the precious girdle, to which the kantjil yielded with apparent reluctance, again warning him to be very careful and, as before, saying that the tiger must first let him get safely away, in order that no guilt might attach to him. When the kantjil had run off, the tiger seized the supposed magic girdle, only to be bitten by the snake, which he did not succeed in killing until after a severe struggle.

Thirsting for vengeance, the tiger again took up the pursuit of his clever little adversary, who, meanwhile, had stopped to rest, so that when the tiger caught up with him, he found him sitting near a clump of tall bamboo. The kantjil greeted the tiger warmly and said, without giving the latter time to express his anger, that he had been appointed keeper of the king's trumpet. The tiger, immediately desiring to try this wonderful instrument, was induced to put his tongue between two of the bamboos, being told that, as soon as the wind blew, they would give fine music. The trickster ran off, and presently a strong gust arose, swayed the bamboos, and thus pinched the tiger's tongue entirely off.

Again the tiger gave chase, and this time found the kantjil standing beside a great wasp's nest. As before, the trickster warned the tiger not to disturb him, for he was guarding the king's drum which gave out a very wonderful tone when struck; but the tiger, of course, was most anxious to have the opportunity of sounding it. With feigned reluctance, the kantjil at last agreed, stipulating, as before, that he be allowed to get out of the way. As soon as he had put a safe distance between himself and the tiger, he gave the signal, and the tiger struck the nest, only to be beset the next instant by a swarm of angry wasps.

Mouse Deer, Tiger, and Ape

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Dixon, Roland. Oceanic Mythology. Boston: Marshall Jones Company, 1916, 191–192.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Indonesia

National Origin: Indonesia

The tiger was seeking the kantjil to eat him, when the latter hastened to find a djati-plant, whose leaves he chewed making his mouth blood-red; after which he went and sat down beside a well. By and by the tiger came along, and the trickster, assuming a fierce aspect and driveling blood-red saliva from his mouth, said that the tiger had better look out, as he, the mouse-deer, was accustomed to eat tigers, and if the latter did not believe it, let him look in the well, in which he would see the head of the last one that he had finished. The tiger was much alarmed, though not wholly convinced, so he went to look in the well, where he saw, of course, the reflection of his own head. Thinking that this was really the head of the tiger which the mouse-deer had just eaten, and convinced of the trickster's might, the tiger ran away as fast as he could.

The ape, however, encouraged the tiger not to be afraid of the trickster, who was not so terrible a person after all, and to prove this, he said that he would go with the tiger to seek the kantjil once more; while to demonstrate his good faith he proposed that they should tie their tails together so that they might thus make a common attack, the ape riding on the tiger's back.

The latter agreed and in this way again approached the clever little rascal; but as soon as the latter saw them coming, he called out, "Ha! That is strange! There comes the ape who usually brings me two tigers every day as tribute, and now he is bringing only one." Terrified at this, the tiger ran away as fast as his legs would carry him; and the ape, being tied to his tail, was dashed against the rocks and trees and was killed.

Mouse Deer and Crocodile

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Dixon, Roland. Oceanic Mythology. Boston: Marshall Jones Company, 1916, 190.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Indonesia

National Origin: Indonesia

Once kantjil wished to cross a river which he was unable to wade or swim because it was in flood, so, standing upon the bank, he called for the crocodiles, saying that the king had given command that they should be counted. Accordingly, they came in great numbers and by the trickster's directions arranged themselves in a row extending from bank to bank, whereupon the mouse-deer pretended to count them, jumping from one to the other and calling out, "one," "two," "three," etc., until he reached the opposite bank, when he derided them for their stupidity.

Resolving to be avenged, the crocodile bided his time, and when the trickster came later to the river to drink, he seized one of the mouse-deer's legs in his mouth. Nothing dismayed, the captive picked up a branch and called out, "That is not my leg; that is a stick of wood. My foot is here." The crocodile accordingly let go and snapped at the branch, thinking that it was really the trickster's leg; but this gave the needed opportunity, and the clever mouse-deer bounded away to safety, leaving the stupid crocodile with the stick in his mouth.

The crocodile, however, determined not to go without his revenge, lay in wait, floating like a water-soaked log until the mouse-deer should visit the river again. When, after a while, he did come to the stream and saw the crocodile motionless, he stood on the bank and said, as if he were in doubt whether or not it was a log, "If that is the crocodile, it will float downstream." The crocodile, resolving not to give himself away, remained motionless; and then the trickster added, "But if it is a log, it will float upstream." At once the crocodile began to swim slowly against the current, and the mouse-deer, having discovered what he wished, called out in derision, "Ha! Ha! I have fooled you once more."

ROOSTAM THE GAME-COCK

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Scheltema, J. F. "Roostam the Game-cock." Journal of American Folklore 32 (1919): 306–323.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Indonesia (Sumatra)

National Origin: Indonesia

---

"Roostam the Game-cock" is set during the later period of Dutch influence over Indonesia, a territory in the Dutch East Indies. From 1602 until 1945, with the exception of Japanese conquest in World War II, the Netherlands, first through private enterprise and later via colonialism, exerted dominance in the area. Continuing enmity between the local population and "the Company" as well as rivalries between coastal and highlands regions pervades the legend as adapted by J. F. Scheltema. The symbolic importance of cock-fighting in Indonesia and Southeast Asia, in general, is obvious in the narrative. Success of one's bird brings not only financial gain, but prestige and power. The title clearly demonstrates the close identification between bird and owner.

---

The Malays of the Padang Highlands in Sumatra are born cock-fighters. But for a main of game-fowls, arranged to take place near the beautiful lake of Maninju, sweet, pretty Raissa would be at home instead of on the road between Mator and Pasar Lawang.

It is early, between eight and ten, the hour specified in native speech as most propitious for spreading out the rice in the hull to dry. The people of the Lowlands, truly, would call it late, seeing that they observe much earlier hours for going to market and the transaction of business because the sun makes them. In the cool Highlands, however, there is no such fear of the burning Eye of Day.

The road leads through coffee-gardens and here and there a primitive sugar-plantation with the old-fashioned mill, worked by hand or by a yoke of oxen. Farther away the watered rice-fields are watched over by giant mountains in the hazy distance. Everywhere, in the valleys and on the hills, mother earth lifts up her opulence to the favoring light of heaven, which descends in the glory of a newborn tropical day.

It is not considered proper for young girls to attend market-places, where conversation is held of such meaning, where people are encountered of such an adventurous disposition as ought to be met only by men and old women who know something of the world and its ugly snares. But Raissa, though the child of a well-to-do mother, yea, living in a house with gables pointed upward like horns, the exclusive privilege of the free-born Malay, Raissa is all for new ideas. She has been a pupil of the native school at Mator, where six gurus, appointed by the Dutch Government, instruct some two hundred children, among whom are already fifteen girls. Female emancipation is beginning to spread around the lake of Maninju And Raissa has still another excuse, quite sufficient in her opinion if maidenly coyness may come to the rescue of old-time institutions: Raissa is in love.

Behold her, then, brown but comely, her dark red scarf, embroidered with gold, folded over her head after the manner of the daughters of the land; her eyes, black and bright, brighter yet by the effect of a blue powder rubbed into the lower lids, haughtily looking down upon the other women, who trot to the market loaded with baskets of merchandise. Raissa is proud; proud of her mother's standing in her village; proud of her fine clothes, of the gold bracelets on her wrists, of the gold rings in her ears, while everybody knows that at home she keeps even more golden treasure, to be admired at every feast, gold pins to keep her hair smooth and a gold diadem, the envy of all her friends. Raissa is a girl of consequence and proud of it indeed, very proud, but most proud in the affection of Roostam, surnamed the Game-Cock.

Roostam, a daredevil sort of a young fellow, did not get that nickname for nothing. Apart from his natural proclivity to cock-fighting as a Sumatran Malay and, more particularly, as a scion of the family which has held the record for the raising of game-fowl in the whole country from time immemorial, his maternal uncle, Haji [honorific title given to a Muslim who has taken a pilgrimage to Mecca] Yusoof, being the greatest authority on everything connected with the sport, far and near in the Highlands and in the Lowlands too, Roostam himself is the veriest game-cock among men. Though generous and kind-hearted, his friends and acquaintances know him to be quick at taking offense. He does not suffer any one to slight his interests or, worse still, his pretensions. He is a free-born man, a stickler for the Malay code of etiquette; his young, hot blood rebels against even the thought of compromise; his kris [dagger] lives next door to his ire.

When the old women of the village found out that a match between Roostam and Raissa was a foregone conclusion, they warned their daughters and granddaughters against him with all their might, calling him a scapegrace, a dangerous wild bull in the herd, who sooner or later would get himself and all his kin into trouble, and the girls assented with faces suggestive of sour grapes for secretly they admired Roostam as the flower of chivalry and manly excellence, and they hated Raissa, whose success with him exasperated them. The old men, too, thinking of their own youth or what they made themselves believe that their own youth had been, cherished Roostam's exploits in their hearts and yarned about the vigor of past ages revived in his person.

Especially Haji Yusoo, who had traveled, improving his knowledge by the pilgrimage to Mecca, and through that feat, together with his unequalled experience in the matter of game-fowl, had become a personage of influence, extended his protection to Roostam, as indeed he should, being the lad's maternal uncle. The fundamental principle of all social institutions on the West Coast of Sumatra is the succession by inheritance according to the rules of a strict matrilineal descent. The Malay family, in the narrower sense of the word, consists there of the mother with her offspring. The father does not belong to it; his relationship to his brothers and sisters is of far more consequence than his relationship to his wife and children. And since he is not a member of the social group they constitute, he cannot be its head. The duties and privileges attached to that position devolve upon the eldest brother of his wife, the eldest maternal uncle of his children, called their mammak.

On her way to Pasar Lawang, Raissa passes a trail which leads her through a coffee-plantation to the place where she knows that a cock-fight is on. True, the Government has prohibited that kind of sport, but then Sumatra is, like the rest of the Dutch East Indies, a country of ordinances not enforced and regulations not attended to. Wherever the police raise a cry about cock-fighting, something more lies behind it than the cock-fighting itself, a native vendetta or a native quarrel of some sort, or simply a native desire to worry the Dutch officials. Since, however, the written law must be respected, at any rate by the minions of the law, if not in fact at least in outward appearance, the cock-fights are removed from the market-places to more secluded nooks and corners, an arrangement quite satisfactory to the said minions, who indulge in the national pastime without further reserve, as every one else does, and engage their game-fowls to be pitted either by their own hands or by proxy. So it happened in the case of a native police officer, by common consent called murei, which is the name of a bird with an unmelodious, unpleasant squeak. The nickname was aptly bestowed as Malay nicknames always are. A stranger in the land, a man from Bencoolen, thrown upon the country by the influence of an official who put him on the police force in consideration of personal services, Murei had established his reputation as a sneak, not to be trusted on any account and a braggart withal. He found pleasure in lifting his voice against the breed of game-fowls that were the glory of Roostam and Roostam's mammak, Haji Yusoof. The battle now in progress was planned to cure him of his pluming himself as the possessor of a cock, brought all the way from Padang, which, he boasted, could kill in single combat all the game-cocks between the lake of Maninju and the lake of Singkarah. This morning that valorous bird was to step forward against Roostam's favorite.

Feeling much interested, Raissa has eagerly watched the preparation for the odd fights that are to follow the main as far as game-fowls from Mator may take part. She has witnessed the infinite care bestowed on the separation of the fat cocks from the middling and the middling from the lean before their being cooped and, after the necessary purging of the fat ones, before their being put to their diet. She has followed the sparring exercises, the providing of the spears with muffs, the minute, periodical examination of the feathers, the beak, the eyes, to see if the fowls are in good health. And then, three days before the battle, at the auspicious hour set for the removal of the fighters to the scene of their future great deeds, she attended the last probing of their temper and listened to the animated debates, the endless discussions as to whether they were game or not and which one was most game and how the chances stood, and so forth, and so forth.

Meanwhile Roostam had trained his cock with the utmost assiduity under the guidance of his mammak, Haji Yusoof. All that time of anxious care he hardly allowed Raissa to come near him; but as it concerned a matter of so much moment, she bore him no ill will for being neglected. Sharing his enthusiasm she resigned herself and her unescorted walk to Pasar Lawang, inconsistent with the habitual reserve of a maiden of her rank and station, has no other purpose than to learn the issue of the battle immediately after its having been fought for, surely, the very first thing its promoters will do is to send word to the marketplace where the itinerant tradesmen are awaiting the news to spread it through the whole district as far as Bukit Tinggi. It would be a calamity indeed if a game-cock of Haji Yusoof's breed, in Roostam's hands, lost against a Padang cock in the hands of a man from Bencoolen, and Murei at that. Raissa's excitement running higher and higher, her expectations are, however, of the very best.

Hearing steps behind her and some one calling her by her name, she turns round to see Roostam's mammak coming up, extremely venerable in his regulation dress of a haji, with a tuft of sparse white hair under his chin. He reads the question in her eyes and tells her that, at the time he left the pit, they were still at the preliminaries. Raissa thinks it strange that Roostam's mammak has not waited for the end; yet she ventures no direct inquiry. But soon she understands that something is amiss, when informed of Murei's determination to stay away himself and be represented by one of his underlings. Haji Yusoof does not say so but Raissa feels that he suspects foul play and, being of the elect, declines to get mixed up in the affray which is likely to follow. Haji Yusoof holds an office of responsibility as the chief of the kampong Lawang and, therefore, though of all cock-fights his heart goes out to this special one, he deems it desirable, with a view to possible consequences of possible happenings, that he be able to say: I was not in it.

Solicitous to please Roostam's mammak as women, brown or white, are always eager to please whenever it can further some ultimate purpose, Raissa lets Haji Yusoof pass before her and walks behind him to Pasar Lawang.

The venerable looking Haji Yusoof is a great talker as indeed all Sumatra Malays are, but now he keeps silent and, having reached his dwelling, where he bids Raissa enter with him for a chat with his womenfolk, he goes straight up to where his ketitiran hangs in its cage, suspended from a roof-beam, and takes it down, putting it beside him. The natives are very fond of pigeons, in particular of some kinds that live wild in the woods, as the ketitiran and the punei, which are caught and tamed and then become the constant companions of their owners. Haji Yusoof's ketitiran is a famous one, reputed to bring extraordinary luck. As a matter of fact, Haji Yusoof prospers exceedingly in a worldly sense, harvesting from many rice fields.

Very soon quite a number of callers drop in, anxious to hear about the cock-fight which, for some reason or other, they are not able to attend; anxious also to let their own fowl profit by Haji Yusoof's advice. They have made it a habit on Monday, the market day at Kampong Lawang, to consult Haji Yusoof in that way when visiting the pasar for their weekly purchases. People travel even from Bukit Tinggi and Padang Panjang, yea, from Bua and Solok, to avail themselves of his skill in dealing with the maladies and disorders that fowl, especially game-fowl, are heir to.

On the main battle, now raging between the cocks of Roostam and his opponent, Haji Yusoof has not much to say, and his visitors perceive very soon that the subject is better dismissed in his presence. But he readily imparts his superior wisdom in the treatment of such ailments among poultry as indigestion, costiveness, diarrhea, fever, asthma, gout, consumption, inflammation of the eye, obstruction of the nostrils, melancholy or moping, rheumatism or lifts, with useful hints about molting, loss of feathers, vermin, etc., thrown in. A man from Bua has brought with him an old rheumatic rooster and the younger females of Haji Yusoof's household derive great amusement from the spectacle of this bird, once a game-cock of some renown, strutting round, lifting its legs high and putting them down with care, stiff in limbs and joints, as if it were marching to the sound of the solemn march sometimes heard at Bukit Tinggi when the soldiers, in garrison at Fort de Kock, turn out for a military funeral.

After treating this patient, Haji Yusoof examines the sick-looking eyes, nostrils and mouth of a hen with ruffled feathers, that is suffering from croup, breathing laboriously, and he advises to give her plenty of fresh air, to grease her swollen head every morning before sunrise, to hide her from the moon. Thereupon a bad case of pip claims his attention and he warns against unclean food and muddy water, and prescribes a dose of pepper, administered with coconut-oil or, if that proves insufficient, the cutting off, as a last resort, of the tip of the tongue. Almost forgetting the cock-fight in his endeavors to sustain his reputation as a breeder and physician of poultry, he expatiates upon a remedy against the gapes, somewhat heroic but recommended by long experience ...

Raissa, impatient to learn the result of the battle, slips out to the pasar proper (that is, the place where the pakan or market is held), cunningly calculating that, as soon as anything positive becomes known, it will be proclaimed there first of all. Picking her way to the enclosure of peace, a spot marked off by flat stones standing on end, where formerly the elders used to meet in council and to preside over the bull-fights, cock-fights and other such amusements before the Government stepped in to forbid them, picking her way between the little booths whose owners deal in the produce of the land and articles of daily use in Malay households, she meets many acquaintances, mostly old women for the reason already referred to. If anything, the marriageable girls of the Padang Highlands are even more shy about showing themselves in public than those of other Malay lands. Little girls, however, run about in plenty and several of them, children of poor mothers who squat at the roadside with the fruit of their gardens for sale, offer kopi daoen to the thirsty, a concoction of the leaves of the coffee-shrub. Too poor to drink real coffee while tending the richest of coffee-plantations, they have to leave the berries and beans alone after picking them for export oversea.

Raissa does not worry about such things when she finds herself in the pasar, which is no less a delight to the native fair ones than are the pretentious shops of Rijswijk and Noordwijk at Batavia to their sisters of the ruling race. Raissa worries about Roostam, the Game-Cock, though, for all that, she cannot help admiring the printed cotton goods temptingly displayed by merchants from Padang, trashy stuff, imported from Europe as a cheap substitute for the fine but expensive bajus and sarongs and slendangs of silk and gold lace, the pride of the Highland damsels in days of yore, finery altogether out of the financial reach of the present generation, save of a few who carry them as heirlooms.

A few strangers stroll about, their respective habitats being indicated by their raiment in a country where, if not the material, at least the cut, with purely local variations, has remained stationary from the time when Parapatih Sabateng of Body Chiniago and Kiahny Tumanggangan of Kota Pilihan, in the picturesque valley of Priangan Padang Panjang, laid the foundation of the Malay institutions as they continue up to this day, notwithstanding sharp conflicts between western innovations and the hadat, the ancient, unwritten law. The men of Agam, who frown at the naked legs of their brethren that hail from the XIII Kotas, can be recognized by their long inexpressibles, and Raissa notices even one or two visitors in Acheh-trousers, very wide and loose from the hips down. They make her think of a fellow who lately has courted Roostam's company, at night for he avoids the light of day, gossip marking him as a deserter from the Dutch army in close touch with the malcontents that are opposing the regular troops in Korinchy, and sent in quest of able men for reinforcement of the marauding bands in the North. As to the women who throng the market at Lawang, the strangers among them are still more easily distinguishable, and those of the XIII Kotas, accustomed to arrange their hair in braids, heartily despise the kondeh, the more or less elaborate knot adopted by all the rest. The children, most of them with noses in sad need of wiping, wear their hair—boys (under the age of the head-covering) as well as girls—in most comical little plaits, five for the free-born and four for the common raff.

As noon approaches with the sun high up in the sky, Raissa can hardly master her agitation. Where she passes, the old women eye her maliciously and whisper of Roostam's girl possessing a pusar, a birthmark—they know it for certain—which will make him who marries her or even aspires to her hand, unlucky in all his dealings. Signs and marks on women, horses and pigeons, portending good luck or bad luck to husbands or owners, are an ever welcome theme for discussion.

"Look at her," says one of the hags, "look at her as she goes there, proud of her finery. I am sorry for Roostam!"

"And the old man, Roostam's mammak," says another, "who ought to know and yet encourages his passion for this ill-omened daughter of calamity!"

"What is the will of Haji Yusoof against the will of the young game-cock?"

"And why then does he carry his head so high, wise in forebodings and pusars and krimans, if he cannot stay the evil that comes to his own?"

"Hide thy envy as closely as the wrinkles of age hide thy good looks," some one chimes in, making all the bystanders laugh.

The gossips look up. It is the dubalang, one of the elders of the village, who continues, "It is coming to a fine pass indeed when the orang banyak (the plebs) give the orang patoob (the upper ten) a free ride on their tongues."

"Next thing," remarks a waggish youth, "they will find fault with all the good things the Company [Dutch East Indies Company] promises and does not do."

This speech meets with applause from the lad's friends among those who are gathering round, but the more advised look grave and the dubalang answers, "Thou, wait till thy turn of speaking arrives with thy tooth of discernment!"

Meanwhile at the cockpit, in a sheltered nook off the road, excitement began to run high. For the main battle, in which the game-cock of Roostam was to be pitted against the game-cock of Murei, the latter had failed to appear. The crowd waited with murmuring and growing discontent until at last a messenger from Murei arrived with his bird and the information that he withdrew his patronage. He had bethought himself of the Government prohibition against cock-fighting and, suddenly mindful of his duty as a police officer, declined to countenance the game. Not to disappoint the many then and there assembled to witness the battle, he had nevertheless condescended to send his rooster, permitting them to let it take part as previously arranged, with only this proviso that it was to fight not under his name but under the name of his wakil (substitute), accompanied by quite a number of followers, most of them no free-born Malays, strangers to the country, adventurers of evil repute, a sorry pack.

At this stage of the proceedings, Haji Yusoof, suspecting foul play, left the battleground, not however before giving a piece of advice to Roostam, with a parting glance at Roostam's game-cock, which looked somewhat depressed as if it had been tampered with. The wings and the tail, to be sure, were not cut shorter than they ought to have been and the joints appeared all right, but the animal's general weariness suggested the idea of poison. Knowing the youngster's temper, Haji Yusoof did not speak of it but the thought had occurred to Roostam himself and did not dispose him to calm reasoning when Murei's wakil, after Haji Yusoof's departure, proposed with the utmost impudence that the handling of his fowl be left to the contending party.

Meeting, of course, the strongest opposition, this absurd proposal gave rise to a lengthy discussion and the bystanders, later on, in the light of subsequent events, freely expressed their opinion that such an intermezzo was the real purpose of the claim put forward because it would be helpful in giving the drug, administered to Roostam's bird, the necessary time to operate. It soon became evident to everyone that something was wrong with the Highland favorite. Roostam's friends declared openly that his fowl had been doctored, and tried to persuade him to retire from the main, while others goaded him to the extremity of his pride in their reluctance to lose the chance of a contest between the distasteful Murei and the young hero of the district, for the fight between the roosters was essentially a fight between their owners and the interests they represented.

Roostam was worked up to a dangerous pitch of excitement and this dark young fellow with his fierce eyes, supple and strong, quick and nimble in his movements, fully deserved the nickname that had been given to him, among men no less keen on proving his mettle in any combat offered to him, than a game-cock in condition among poultry.

But his bird, alas! The pride of all the countryside, was clearly not in condition and when, at length, after wearisome exceptions, Murei's wakil consented to the birds being weighed, preparatory to the great encounter, no coaxing or urging, no spurring prevailed upon the animal to show fight. Then it was also discovered that Murei's game-cock had been gaffed [fitted with sharp extensions to his natural spurs] in a fashion strictly prohibited by the regulations as highly unfair to the opposite party, which engendered a new dispute between the backers of Roostam and the backers of Murei, the latter pretending that Roostam had lost because his cock refused battle, the former insisting upon the fact that Murei's cock would have been debarred anyway. The umpire, a man from Mator, decided in favor of Roostam, whereupon Murei's men withdrew, every one of them declining to stay for the games which were to follow the main, after having demanded in vain that the case be referred to another umpire, chosen on the spot from those present.

The withdrawal of the Murei crew caused no sorrow and, while Roostam nursed his cock without saying a word but white with rage under his brown skin, the owners of the other birds that were to compete, prepared them for the odd fights. Taking turns, each cocker, fowl in hand, went to his station to set his bird, sharply eyeing his adversary for no one is allowed to assist in the fight after it has been declared on, either to encourage or to discourage, save to avail himself of the privilege to relieve a rooster which has landed on its back.

The stirring sensations of the game made those who experienced them almost forget what had happened to the champion, defender of the country's honor against all comers. Closely pressing round, squatting after the manner of the land, they grew highly agitated over the gallant behavior of two cocks that proved very evenly matched and took a long time to decide between victory and defeat. The birds renewed the attack vigorously after every separation, viciously slashing round with their armed spurs, flying up with ruffled feathers, struggling to get behind each other for a final assault in the rear. Some of the most admiring ascribed their endurance to the fact of their having been breasted according to the highest requirements of the art; others, critically inclined, considered it an effect of bad heeling. Anyhow, the victory was hotly contested; no more odds were accepted; the timorous hedged their bets—everybody had money on, this way or that, in the majority of cases more than he could afford to lose and the gamblers hung in suspense.

Roostam himself, with a scowl on his face and his sick pet in his lap, was being carried away by the general emotion when, raising his eyes at the sound of nearing footsteps, he suddenly jumped to his feet. Murei, his enemy, stood before him, surrounded by the men who a few moments before were so disagreeably noisy as the backers of that despised trickster's Lowland cock. The boys set to watch the approaches to the pit, had left their posts to gratify their curiosity and thus it happened that Murei with his gang found the road open and safe. The crowd hardly took notice of him in the growing agitation of the fight. Murei was a policeman but what of that? Had he not pitted a cock himself, even for the main battle, the very same morning?

Roostam, however, felt that Murei meant business, that he intended either to profit by the law being transgressed so as to gain an advantage in their personal feud, or simply to avenge himself for the barring out of his bird, the victory having been adjudged to the Highlands, notwithstanding his treacherous ruse. But if Roostam's feathered champion refused battle, Roostam did not and growled in defiance:

“You in uniform? In the uniform of the Company? Don’t you know that the Company does not countenance cock-fighting?”

“I know it and that is why I am here: to stop this game and to arrest you, my fine game-cock.”

The incriminated sports thought first that he jested but he proved to be in dead earnest and, while some began stealing away, the others jeered him:

“Come! Come now! And how about that bird of yours, pitted by your wakil?”

“A liar who says so! Where is my bird? Where is my wakil?”

“Do you pretend to deny that the fellows you are this moment hiding behind, came here this morning, sent by you to pit your Padang crower against my Highland beauty?” asked Roostam with glittering eyes.

“These men are the men I sent this morning to report all about your cock-fight to me and they will be used as witnesses against you.”

“Lying witnesses and you a lying son of a Bencoolen [town in southwest Sumatra]...” Roostam advanced,

“Step out from behind your spies, you cur, and take me if you want me!”

An old man, seeing that all the trouble was only between Roostam and Murei, and desirous to compromise, took the young fellow by the sleeve of his jacket and whispered to him,

“We will settle with Murei. You skip!”

Roostam shook him off, “I will settle for myself. Let him come and take me!”

Murei still delayed executing his threat though he repeated that, being in the Company’s service, he had to stop the cock-fight.

A voice replied by quoting an old Malay adage, playing upon Murei’s name to signify that his reference to the Company’s orders was counted by those present as an empty tale, not worth any consideration.

And another spoke up, “Well, you have stopped the fight, what do you want more?”

“I want my prisoner, the principal of the fight.”

“Come and take me!” said Roostam again. “Come and take me if you dare!”

They all taunted Murei, who urged his men to arrest Roostam:

“Come, Murei, bird of the delectable voice, come and take him!” Nobody stirred.

“Skip!” repeated the old man.

“Well” continued Roostam, “if you won’t come to me, I’ll go to you, you scurvy dog, and spit in your face!”

Quick as lightning, Roostam, the Game-Cock, unsheathed his kris and leaped upon his enemy, spitting in the hateful face, while he sent the cold, blue steel right to the man’s heart. Then he turned round to Murei’s underlings, who had jumped back, beginning to cry amok, and he said, disappearing in the jungle, “Now take me!”

Raissa, waiting in the market-place of Lawang, is getting nervous under the strain of the cock-fight lasting so provokingly long. The sun has already sunk half way down the sky and still no tidings. Surely there must be something amiss and she remembers the Government injunctions against the sport, but then is not Murei, the police officer, one of the principals?

She has sought the shade of a booth kept by a dealer in woman's apparel, who stands haggling with an old dame, a sharp customer. He reminds her of days long past, when his stock in trade consisted of hand-woven goods, of silk and gold brocade, while now there is no money even to buy the cheap, poor, imitation fabrics from over the sea at prices he lays under the obligation to cut down to the ridiculous:

"My grandfather," he says, "amassed wealth in this trade, and my father was able to keep it, but I shall be bankrupt ere long, selling below cost, and yet to live I have to sell."

"So it is with all of us," groans the crone. "What we had, is far behind us and what we have, is less than nothing. I offer thee what I said for this piece of goods."

"Plague on the Company that takes and talks fine and never makes any return! If thou must have this piece of goods for thy granddaughter, who is going to be married as thou sayest, I cannot deny thee, but thou art working my ruin."

"I think that I might have the same stuff even for less, of certain dealers I know at Bukit Tinggi and Payacombo."

"I take the Prophet for a witness that thou laborest under a misapprehension! Though the white merchants of Padang have their agents everywhere in the land to undersell us, whose business it has been to supply this commodity from father to son, for innumerable generations, yet none of them is able to beat my prices. And let it not be rumored about that I agreed to the sum thou hast named, for everybody would come and solicit the same kindness and rob me of my goods! Indeed, it is robbery to exact such dealings! Nevertheless, most venerable mother, this being intended for thy granddaughter, who is to marry."

The philanthropist's eloquence is checked by the passing of a boy, who cries something which creates great consternation all over the market. The merchants leave their merchandise and gather in groups with their customers. In the confusion of voices Raissa distinguishes that the cock-fighters have been surprised and that Roostam, refusing to be taken prisoner, has killed Murei. She hurries to the house of Haji Yusoof. He, if any one, will know whether Roostam has made good his escape.

Haji Yusoof's house is closed. The curious, who rightly suppose with Raissa that Roostam's mammak will have the first and best information as to his course and plans after the scrape at the cockpit, are refused admission. Haji Yusoof, so an attendant tells them, cannot be disturbed in his mid-day nap; he has been sleeping since noon; the report, current in the market-place, has not yet reached him; Haji Yusoof knows nothing.

The curious understand. Roostam's mammak, to be sure, will see his nephew out of this trouble without openly showing his hand. And they approve. Roostam, the Game-Cock, doing ten times better than winning the main in the cockpit, has rid them of Murei, the odious, punishing him for going so far in his boastful pretensions as to set a vile Padang rooster against the game-fowl of the Highlands. Roostam rises high in their esteem and no one entertains for a moment the idea of his being apprehended for the deed. They agree that Haji Yusoof lies under an obligation to keep him concealed in the rimbu gedang (the great jungle as distinguished from the rimbu ketek, the little jungle), until the affair is forgotten or he can be spirited away.

Raissa, being on terms of intimacy with the women of Haji Yusoof's household, has slipped in and found Roostam's mammak wide awake, considering ways and means. She asks him, with a failing heart, what he intends to do in this most serious affair, and he answers, "Nothing but deliver Roostam to the comandoor [local civil servant] as soon as he is caught."

Raissa, greatly agitated, stands aghast at this answer of Roostam's mammak.

"But so far he is not caught," adds the haji.

"And will he be caught?"

Haji Yusoof looks her straight in the eyes and then, affecting the speech he has heard at Mecca, as he is accustomed to do on grave occasions, waives further questions with pious commonplace, "The secrets of the future are with the Most High, the Most Merciful and Compassionate."

Raissa's short interview with Haji Yusoof has made it clear to her that Roostam will not be handed over to the retribution of the rigorous and withal strangely complicated law of the white men. On that score she is satisfied. His safety, however, requires also that he be shielded from the vengeance of Murei's clique and if he has to leave for a while, she wants to see him before he goes and say good-bye. Therefore she resolves not to return to Mator for the time being, but to stay at Haji Yusoof's house where doubtless ere long his hiding-place will be known.

Keenly watchful on the steps that lead to the door of Haji Yusoof's dwelling, which is built on piles, according to the custom of the land; on the alert to intercept the expected messenger from the fugitive to his mammak, Raissa hears some one whispering her name. The voice comes from behind a rice-shed and there she perceives a boy, ten or eleven years old, who bids her follow the path from the village to the little market-place near the lake and wait at the pillar set by the triangulation service. There he will meet her again, by Roostam's command, and he urges her to set out at once, warning her not to ask or answer any questions concerning the Game-Cock's whereabouts. He himself has been charged to inform Haji Yusoof.

The boy is known to Raissa as one of the first disciples of a faqir recently arrived in the neighborhood to open a school and teach religion. Obeying him, she observes punctiliously the directions given her in the name of Roostam and reaches the triangulation pillar to the left of the road where it slopes down to the beach in sharp descent. To avoid the risk of meeting curious acquaintances in the little market-place on the right, she sits down among the high ferns that cover the hilltop overlooking the sheet of water deep down, the lovely lake of Maninju.

It is now late in the afternoon but somehow or other the clouds that roll on from the South with the heat of day to veil its loveliness after the sun has smiled upon it and taken possession in passionate embrace, somehow or other the clouds are tardy in gathering on the hills. Silent and tranquil the lake lies as it lay when the ardent lover withdrew, its surface shining like a polished shield of bronze engraved in strange design, long strips and whirls of water-weeds framing the reflections of the blue sky and the steep, wooded banks. The islands of Moko Moko, near the mouth of the Batang Antokan, the eastern ridges that run out to Tanjong Padang, rest dreamily in the last splendor of glorious light and when at last the clouds do come, throwing a belt of white round waving green, invading the plain to the North, they leave a gleamy dimness trailing over the trees, over the houses of Baju and Anam Kota half hidden among the klapah plantations. And still they come, airy flakes before a curtain of mist. Where the lake has been, in the depth below, nothing but hazy waves of vapor, rising higher and higher, hiding even the fire-mountains far away, the giants that lift their heads to guard the broad valleys from sea to sea.

The view of Lake Maninju from this spot, from the triangulation pillar, is perhaps still more striking than from the little pavilion, built expressly for a belvedere on the top of one of the steep hills that close it in, but Raissa is not in a mood to enjoy the beauty of her surroundings. She waits and waits and does not notice how the people to the right of the road, between their buying and selling, point their fingers at her: the girl of Roostam, the girl of the Game-Cock who has killed Murei; they know the whole story.

A kindly old woman, who is selling salt, takes pity on her and invites her to the bamboo shed she occupies, saying that for somebody's sake she ought not to expose herself too much, "The greater the danger, the greater must be the caution and where they find the loving bird, there they will look for its mate."

Then the old woman begins to complain of the stress of the times, a general complaint. Is she not compelled, at her age, to gain her living by fetching salt from Bukit Tinggi and carry it all the way to the lake of Maninju? And still she has occasion to call herself lucky because she is able to keep body and soul together by saving others the trouble of journeying many miles to the Government salt-store for a week's provision or sometimes less.

Raissa turns but an inattentive ear to the mournful tale of the mumbling crone who, when darkness falls, gathers her baskets together and leaves for home. The little market-place lies deserted now. Beneath, the enshrouded lake; overhead, the glimmering of the stars. Fear and weariness oppress the lonely girl as the night creeps on. At last she hears a stealthy step approaching. It is the boy, Roostam's messenger to Haji Yusoo, who instructed her to bide further developments at the triangulation pillar.

Raissa arises and follows him in the gloom along a trail that leads them through wood and underbrush to a teratak, a clearing with an enclosure for corraling the cattle of the village near by. Two or three other boys are lying around a large fire, lighted to keep the tigers off; seemingly fast asleep, they take no notice of the newcomers. Her guide precedes her to a rudely constructed hut, the door and windows of which are wide open, and there, having entered, she finds four persons together, three men and a woman. In the glare of the fire outside, she recognizes one of the men as Roostam. Nobody greets her and she, too, says not a word as she squats down beside the woman, Roostam's mother, who sits muttering incantations. Roostam's mother, the sister of Haji Yusoof, prides herself no less than he does upon their descent from a fighting family, true to the hadat, a family very conspicuous in the Padri War, the last effort of the Malays of the Padang Highlands to regain their independence; and Roostam's mother possesses many a secret descended through centuries from eldest daughter to eldest daughter, many a charm of the highest value on trying occasions. She is a fierce sort of a woman. Fierceness runs in the blood of her clan and Roostam's spirit shows plainly the truth of the saying that, in breeding, it is the hen as much as the cock which determines the temper of the chick.

At arm's length before her on the ground stands a cage with a pigeon in it. Raissa knows it by the embroidered covering; it is Haji Yusoof's and she infers that the old man must be near, the mammak watching over his charge.

The incantations give way to prayer, several ayats of the Quran being recited in succession by an unfamiliar voice, while the others respond in a drone, "Amin! Amin!"

Raissa surmises the leader to be the faqir, the new religious teacher, which explains how one of the youths of the school just opened came to act as her guide. And when the second stranger, after prayer has ceased, speaks to Roostam of the joys of the holy war against the infidels, she recognizes him as the deserter from the Dutch army who, though donning Acheh-trousers, affects the Batavia [modern Jakarta on the island of Java] lilt over the ear and a pronounced Batavia accent, ae-ing his a's.

It becomes evident to Raissa that they are inciting Roostam, the Game-Cock, to battle. The deserter, who arrived from Korinchy, she remembers, is on his way to Acheh, propagating the good cause, and Roostam, being in trouble, seems perfectly willing to extricate himself by a course altogether in his line: war to the knife against the white men that send fellows like Murei to harass and annoy the real lords of the soil—plague on the cur and his employers!

And the faqir promises success: the Moslem are destined to rule in this life the nations of the earth as in the life to come they are destined for everlasting bliss.

And Roostam's mother dwells upon the traditions of the family, upon the exploits of its members at Bonjol, where the mammak of his mammak was killed on the side of the Padri under Tuanku Imam, valorous warriors who sacrificed their lives for their country and whose death has not been avenged.

Shall her son, with such blood in his veins, be afraid because the white men have guns, big guns, and repeating-rifles and dynamite bombs, fighting from afar? Why not lure them to the mountains and tackle them hand to hand, the unbelievers?

“The killers of the weak and unprotected,” continues the deserter, eyewitness of the horrors at Kampong Pulau Tengah in Korinchy. “Shall strong and able youths sit still and hush their voices and play girls’ games when such things are going on?”

Roostam’s eyes sparkle while they goad him, “I am not afraid of blood,” he says slowly.

“And blood is thirsting for blood,” says his mother.

“And the blood of the infidel opens the gates of Paradise to the faithful,” says the faqir.

Raissa lifts her head, trembling, wishing to speak in her turn, but Roostam’s mother sees the movement and shrieks in her face, “What art thou doing here, thou with the mark that brought bad luck to my son? Art thou not content with his bird, our bird, refusing to fight a Padang bird? Is it to deliver him now to Murei’s evil-eyed gang that thou hast come hither, thou daughter of ill-repute? Out with thee!”

She threatens to strike the girl, but Roostam jumps to his feet. “None of this!” he cries.

“If thou stayest or goest where I can go with thee, I will give thee something that undoes the spell of all marks and signs,” begs Raissa, pulling a ring from her finger.

Roostam looks at her and the deserter says tauntingly, “Another game-cock that shows the white feather!”

Roostam feels the sting and sits down again.

“Don’t gibe him,” entreats Raissa in despair. “It is my grandmother’s ring, a ring of virtue.”

“Can it confound the bloodhounds of the white men now on his track? Can it make him invisible?” asks the deserter, whose mysterious strength lies in the last named accomplishment. “If not, what is the good of his staying here?”

“It undoes all spells,” Raissa rejoins doggedly.

“Keep thy ring!” yells the old woman. “Has he not enough sorrow by virtue of thy mark? Go! Go!”

Roostam does not move and by this token Raissa knows that all is over. She arises and goes, but returns and addresses him once more,, “Thou wilt leave us and do dangerous things. I, the girl with the mark, shall wait for thee here, trusting in the power of this ring on my finger, and pray that, if unhappily the spell comes to nought and thou fallest, male blood-relations may be near to wash thy corpse, and female blood-relations to strew flowers on thy grave.”

Then she steps out into the night, while the faqir again falls to praying, “On the hearts of His followers that are slain in the holy war, the most Exalted sits extended as on His throne.”

“Amin! Amin!”

Raissa, full of anguish, has not gone far in the utter darkness which precedes dawn, when she is terrified by an apparition. Phantom-like, it stands upright near a projecting rock beside the road, shrouded in white, awe-inspiring, an image of the angel of death. She holds her breath in terror, but soon recognizes in that specter Roostam’s mammak, Haji Yusoof. Having left his house to pass the night in watching the trail which leads to the place where his nephew lies in hiding, he has donned for this occasion the white dress used by him and other fervent Muslims in praying, the dress come down to them from the “white time” so called, the time of the Padri, whose uprising was an outcome of the doings of the Wahhabites, the purifiers of the faith. It seems but proper that Haji Yusoof should have chosen those garments for his watch has been a continuous communion with the Invisible Great Watcher in the Night. At the approach of day, between the dawn of the elephants and the dawn of man, he has composed himself to the regulation early morning prayer with its necessary gestures. So it is that Raissa sees him standing, ghost-like, in her path. Drawing near, she hears him, raising his voice to curse the infidels, the strivers against the behests of the Most Gracious, whom he invokes, for Roostam’s sake, the true believer being nearest to God when he treads down God’s enemies. And, confusing the articles of Muslim faith with the traditions of Menangkabau, he prays on, imploring assistance and mercy for those who seek shelter with the Lord and refuge in the hadat, calling down destruction on the heads of the usurpers, who darken the luster of the purified through consecration, of the elect of earth and heaven, set apart for highest honor by anointment and the sprinkling of water, all the fragrance of all flowers not equaling the fragrance of King Adityawarnan....

From the holy Quran he has wandered to the holy inscriptions on the stones of the holy graves at Batu Beragoong and Pagar Ruyong where the old Hindu rulers of the land lie buried.

Raissa listens, glad to have a friend near her in the jungle, which is peopled at night with shetans, jinn and all kinds of evil sprites. It is almost an hour now, the space of time required for the cooking of three allowances of rice, since she has left Roostam in the company of his mother and his wicked counselors; and the dawn of man, the dawn proper, has already streaked the eastern sky with its delicate hues when Haji Yusoof notices her.

He makes a movement which gives her courage to address him, “Roostam wants to fight the Company,” she says.

“Young men should do what old men think.”

“But ...”

“Now leave me, for prayer is better than idle talk.”

Behind her, in a cattle-pen, Raissa hears the little bells of the oxen that are getting up to their work and, alone with her grief, she turns away and takes the path to Matoor, to her mother’s house.

MALAYSIA

---

RAJA DONAN

Tradition Bearer: Mir Hassan

Source: Maxwell, W. E. "Raja Donan: A Malay Fairy Tale." The Folk-Lore Journal 6 (1888): 134–139.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Malay

National Origin: Malaysia

---

The following Malay tale has the complexity and episodic nature of the ordinary folktale. The miracles surrounding the birth of Raja Donan, his early abandonment "Exposure in a Boat" (Motif S141), and prodigious feats in battle and magic are reminiscent of heroes cross-culturally. The Semang tribes, whose appearance the protagonist borrowed for his disguise, are a "Negrito" minority who lived in the mountains of peninsular Malaysia.

---

Once upon a time, in the kingdom of Mandi Angin, there reigned a certain King Raja Besar, whose wife was the Princess Lindongan Bulan. He was blessed in every way that the gods bless mortals, except in one respect, which was that he had no son and heir. By constant prayers and the giving of alms, at length when the king had reigned nearly eight years, there was a prospect of Raja Besar's happiness being completed. All the astrologers were summoned to tell whether the child would be male or female, and what was the lot in store for it. The astrologers, having for a long time continued their incantations, at length perceived that the expected child would be a prince, and that he would be gifted with extraordinary qualities. But the astrologers hated the king, and so they did not tell him the truth, but told him that his child would be a prince who was fated to be a curse to all who would come in contact with him.

Next day the king summoned an old astrologer who was both blind and deaf and infirm to tell the destinies of the child. The old man having pursued his divinations from sunset to sunrise, announced to the king that his son would be a highly gifted prince, and that under him the kingdom would attain an unheard-of prosperity. "This is altogether different," said the king, "from the prognostication of the former soothsayers."

"I am blind and deaf and of failing memory," said the old man, "but in all things that concern the prince your highness may rely on what I say."

At last, a terrible storm then raging, the princess gave birth to a son. The infant disappeared into the earth; then he was vomited out again, seated on a cushion, and with him a sword, a hen's egg, a swivel-gun, a flute, a piece of scented wood for burning, and some incense. The king, influenced by the opinion of the seven lying astrologers, directed that the child should at once be put into a rickety old boat and set adrift on the river. The princess wept on hearing what was to be the fate of her child, and directed her maids to put into the boat a basket full of clothes and another full of provisions for the child. This done, the boat was cast off amid the roaring of cannons which the king had ordered to be fired off for joy that evil had been averted from his kingdom.

The king's elder brother, Bandahara Tua, was living some distance away, at the mouth of the river, and, hearing the cannons, he said, "Surely a prince has been born, and the king has believed the lying astrologers and cast his son away." He prayed that God would send his newborn nephew to him, and, after waiting a day and a night on the bank of the river, at last the little boat was wafted up to his very steps.

The Bandahara went into the cabin to seek his nephew, and having found him he brought him on deck to take him to his house, but found that while he was below the boat had floated into mid-stream, and was being rapidly carried out to sea. Day and night for a year the boat went on, and at the end of that time the little castaway, now able to talk, gave himself the name of Raja Donan.

One day the Bandahara, at the request of his nephew, who said he felt a presentiment of approaching evil, climbed into the look-out place and carefully scanned the horizon, and at length sighted a great fleet of 99 ships approaching them, whose masts were like a grove of cotton trees. Raja Donan now prepared for the worst, and put on the magic garments which his mother had given him, and girded on the sword which was supernaturally produced at the time of his birth.

The fleet approached; it was that of Raja Chamar Lant, of Mundam Batu, who was on board the "Biduri," the largest of all. On sighting the little boat, Raja Chamar Lant ordered one of his galleys to be manned to see who was on board the stranger. This huge boat, carrying 44 rowers, came alongside, and those on board it saw no one but a pretty child, who said that he came from the country of Mandi Angin, from the rice-fields where there are no embankments, from the waters where no fish are ever seen, a lonely place where the ape howls nightly, inhabited only by people who live on fern-shoots." The officers of the galley said that tribute must be paid to his master, or the little boat would be seized as a prize. Raja Donan said he did not refuse to pay, but he should first ask the port-fire of his cannon and the blade of his sword, and if they answered that he should pay there was an end of the matter. With this answer the officer returned to his master, who at once ordered his men to fire and blow the little craft to pieces.

For seven days and nights did the fleet keep up a terrible shower of ball from cannon and musket, and at the end of that time the order to cease firing was given. When the smoke cleared away, there stood the little boat, brighter than ever, and quite unharmed. Raja Chamar Lant was furious. He would show his men how to shoot, and so he fired at Raja Donan's boat. But he did not harm it. Raja Donan now fired his little brass swivel-gun which was thrown out of the earth when he was born, and with the one shot he sunk the whole 99 ships, leaving only the "Biduri" afloat. His trusty craft bore him alongside the survivor. With a terrible shout he boarded it. For three days and nights, single-handed, he kept up the battle with the warriors on board, and finally killed them all, the last being Raja Chamar Lant.

The prince found in the cabin of the "Biduri" the younger sister of Raja Chamar Lant, who prayed him that he would kill her. He, however, soothed her with an account of his woes, and she agreed to go into his boat and remain with him. Raja Donan brought his prahu [Malayan sailboat with a triangular sail and single outrigger] alongside with a wave of his turban, and, having got the princess into it, he then stepped in and sank the "Biduri."

Che Amborg, as the princess was called, told Raja Donan that the reason she had left her beautiful home was that Petukal, a powerful raja, had asked for her in marriage, but her brother had taken her to sea to save her from Petukal, who was even now pursuing them. Raja Donan now prayed for a breeze that would bring them up to Petukal, a breeze "so strong as to be visible in a form resembling human shape, which would lay prostrate the cattle feeding in the fields, and sweep away the young cocoa nuts growing in the courtyard."

For seven days and seven nights they ran before the wind that sprang up, and on the eighth day, about noon, the fleet of Petukal, 99 ships in all, was seen right ahead. Raja Petukal, observing the new comer, sent off his eighty-oared galley to make inquiries. Raja Donan answered them as he had the officers of Raja Chamar Lant, and met their demand for tribute in the same way. In the same way Raja Petukal opened fire, and continued it for seven days and nights, at the end of which time he ordered the firing to cease. So dense was the smoke that it took three days to clear away, and then the little home of Raja Donan was seen to be quite untouched. Raja Petukal, having, like Raja Chamar Lant, fired some of his guns with his own hand, had no better luck. Then Raja Donan with a single shot from his gun sent the whole fleet, excepting the raja's vessel, to the bottom. Raja Donan boarded this, and slew all his enemies except their chief: with him he had a dreadful struggle. Once Raja Donan's sword shivered in his hand when he made a thrust at Raja Petukal, and before he could recover himself his opponent threw him overboard. His prayer to be put back again on deck was answered; and in the next struggle Raja Petukal was hurled into the sea, where he perished.

Che Muda, a sister of Raja Petukal, was found in the cabin, and went with Raja Donan aboard his boat. Guided by the princesses, he sought the shores of the country in which resided the beautiful Princess Ganda Iran. He played his magic flute, and, though he was many miles away, his prayer was heard that the Princess Ganda Iran should be able to hear his music.

She was enraptured, and dispatched a kite to bear to the youth a cap made of beautiful flowers. The kite carried his message, and placed the cap in the hands of Rajah Donan, who in return sent three rings, one as a sign of betrothal, one to bind the promise, and one as a sign that whatever was undertaken would be successfully carried out, and a shawl as a sign of intimacy. When the kite had safely delivered the prince's message, the beautiful princess again dispatched the bird with all kinds of sweetmeats, and in return the prince sent some other presents, telling the kite that they were setting out at once for the princess's palace.

By the prayer of Raja Donan all the troops of Raja Chamar Lant and Raja Petukal were restored to life, and his little bolt was turned into a magnificent palace. He called all the restored warriors together, and, putting chiefs over them, he set out on his journey on foot, taking with him his sword and his magic flute. When on his way, a certain princess, named Linggam Chahya, who resided in heaven, but came down often to the earth to amuse herself, met and fell in love with him, and sent her favorite bird to ask him to come to see her. He pleaded another appointment, but promised to come within three years, three months, and ten days.

Disguised as a Semang, or wild hill-man, with all the skin diseases and sores which disfigure those people, he gained admittance to the Princess Ganda Iran. The raja, her father, forced him to play his magic flute, which when the princess heard she fell down, and was thought to be dead. Preparations were made for her funeral, and the Semang was promised her hand in marriage, and the sovereignty of the country if he restored her to life. He played his magic flute, and when he saw her coming back to life disappeared from the palace.

The Semang could not be found, but in their search the officers of the raja met a pretty child by the roadside. They brought him to the palace, where the princess took a great fancy to him. The child suddenly changed one day into Raja Donan, a handsome young man, and the princess, having heard who he was, was exceedingly happy.

Raja Piakas, who had been affianced to the princess, being exceedingly jealous, on losing her, went to his home and begged his sister that she would help him to take revenge on the country of the Princess Ganda Iran. Now the sister of Raja Piakas had power over all dragons, crocodiles, and all beasts of the earth. These she summoned from all parts of the world, and ordered them to invade the country of the princess who had injured her brother. The reptiles and animals advanced, doing immense mischief; but at the prayer of Raja Donan the sea rushed over the whole land and drowned all these creatures.

Raja Piakas then fitted out an expedition against his former friends, but he was slain in single combat by Raja Donan. The magnanimous conqueror, however, brought him back to life, and married him to the princess Che Amborg.

Raja Donan now set off with his uncle and a large fleet to find his old home in Mandi Angin. After a long voyage they arrived at the well known river, but found everything desolate, the palace gone, the cottages burnt. An old man told them that the king had been dethroned years ago by seven lying astrologers, who were living like rajas far up the river.

Raja Donan found his parents occupying a poor but in a wood; but, having slain the lying astrologers, he put his parents on the throne again, and made Mandi Angin as prosperous and peaceful as it had ever been. Having done this, Raja Donan sailed away to his kingdom, where he ever after dwelt in peace and happiness. He was absent for a short time, however, when he kept his word and visited the Princess Linggan Chahya in the heavens.

PHILIPPINES

---

ADVENTURES OF THE TUGLAY

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Benedict, Laura Watson. "Bagobo Myths." The Journal of American Folklore 26 (1913): 27-35.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Mindanao

National Origin: Philippines

---

Tuglay ("old man") and Tuglibung ("old woman") were the Mona, the beings who lived on the earth before time began. The Mona were very poor and possessed only the rudiments of technology. The names Tuglay and Tuglibung do not refer to specific mythic personages, rather they are generic terms for all the "old people" who are characters in Bagobo myth. The Buso are evil entities, in both human and animal form. The Bagobo universe is infested with them. The Malaki are a large group of semidivine beings. Many, but by no means all, are associated with features and forces of nature. Salamia'wan and Panguli'li are high gods of heaven. The former resides in the second heaven, and the latter in, the ninth. Eight, a sacred number that appears repeatedly, is sacred and therefore found throughout indigenous Bagobo ceremony, myth, and theology.

---

It was eight [number of ritual importance to the Moros] million (kati) years ago, in the days of the Mona, that the following events took place. The Tuglay lived in a fine house the walls of which were all mirrored glass, and the roof was hung with brass chains. One day he went out into the woods to snare jungle-fowl, and he slept in the woods all night. The next day, when he turned to go home, he found himself puzzled as to which trail to take. He tried one path after another, but none seemed to lead to his house. At last he said to himself, "I have lost my way: I shall never be able to get home."

Then he walked on at random until he came to a vast field of rice, where great numbers of men were cutting the palay. But the rice-field belonged to Buso, and the harvesters were all buso-men. When they saw Tuglay at the edge of their field, they were glad, and said to one another, "There's a man! We will carry him home."

Then the buso caught Tuglay, and hastened home with him. Now, the great Buso's mansion stretched across the tops of eight million mountains, and very many smaller houses were on the sides of the mountains, all around the great Buso's house; for this was the city of the buso where they had taken Tuglay. As he was carried through the groves of coconut-palms on Buso's place, all the Coconuts called out, "Tuglay, Tuglay, in a little while the Buso will eat you!"

Into the presence of the great chief of all the buso, they dragged Tuglay. The Datto Buso was fearful to look at. From his head grew one great horn of pure ivory, and flames of fire were blazing from the horn. The Datto Buso questioned the man.

"First of all, I will ask you where you come from, Tuglay."

"I am come from my house in T'oluk Waig," replied the man.

And the great Buso shouted, "I will cut off your head with my sharp kris [Malay sword]!"

"But if I choose, I can kill you with your own sword," boldly answered Tuglay.

Then he lay down, and let the Buso try to cut his neck. The Buso swung his sharp sword; but the steel would not cut Tuglay's neck. The Buso did not know that no knife could wound the neck of Tuglay, unless fire were laid upon his throat at the same time. This was eight million years ago that the Buso tried to cut off the head of Tuglay.

Then another day the Tuglay spoke to all the buso, "It is now my turn: let me try whether I can cut your necks."

After this speech, Tuglay stood up and took from his mouth the chewed betel-nut that is called isse, and made a motion as if he would rub the isse on the great Buso's throat. When the Buso saw the isse, he thought it was a sharp knife, and he was frightened. All the lesser buso began to weep, fearing that their chief would be killed; for the isse appeared to all of them as a keen-bladed knife. The tears of all the buso ran down like blood; they wept streams and streams of tears that all flowed together, forming a deep lake, red in color.

Then Tuglay rubbed the chewed betel on the great Buso's throat. One pass only he made with the isse, and the Buso's head was severed from his body. Both head and body of the mighty Buso rolled down into the great lake of tears, and were devoured by the crocodiles.

Now, the Tuglay was dressed like a poor man, in dark garments. But as soon as he had slain the Buso, he struck a blow at his own legs, and the bark trousers fell off. Then he stamped on the ground, and struck his body, and immediately his jacket and kerchief of bark fell off from him. There he stood, no longer the poor Tuglay, but a Malaki T'oluk Waig, with a gleaming kampilan [broad sword] in his hand.

Then he was ready to fight all the other buso. First he held the kampilan in his left hand, and eight million buso fell down dead. Then he held the kampilan in his right hand, and eight million more buso fell down dead. After that, the Malaki went over to the house of Buso's daughter, who had but one eye, and that in the middle of her forehead. She shrieked with fear when she saw the Malaki coming; and he struck her with his kampilan, so that she too, the woman-buso, fell down dead.

After these exploits, the Malaki T'oluk Waig went on his way. He climbed over the mountains of benati, whose trees men go far to seek, and then he reached the mountains of barayung and balati wood. From these peaks, exultant over his foes, he gave a good war-cry that re-echoed through the mountains, and went up to the ears of the gods. Panguli'li and Salamia'wan heard it from their home in the Shrine of the Sky (Tambara ka Langit), and they said, "Who chants the song of war (ig-sungal)? Without doubt, it is the Malak T'oluk Waig, for none of all the other malaki could shout just like that."

His duty performed, the Malaki left the ranges of balati and barayung, walked down toward the sea, and wandered along the coast until he neared a great gathering of people who had met for barter. It was market-day, and all sorts of things were brought for trade. Then the Malaki T'oluk Waig struck his legs and his chest, before the people caught sight of him; and immediately he was clothed in his old bark trousers and jacket and kerchief, just like a poor man. Then he approached the crowd, and saw the people sitting on the ground in little groups, talking, and offering their things for sale.

The Malaki Lindig Ramut ka Langit and all the other malaki from the surrounding country were there. They called out to him, "Where are you going?"

The Tuglay told them that he had got lost, and had been traveling a long distance. As he spoke, he noticed, sitting among a group of young men, the beautiful woman called Moglung.

She motioned to him, and said, "Come, sit down beside me."

And the Tuglay sat down on the ground, near the Moglung. Then the woman gave presents of textiles to the Malaki Lindig Ramut ka Langit and the other malaki in her crowd. But to the Tuglay she gave betel-nut that she had prepared for him.

After that, the Moglung said to all the malaki, "This time I am going to leave you, because I want to go home."

And off went the Moglung with the Tuglay, riding on the wind.

After many days, the Moglung and the Tuglay rested on the mountains of barayung, and, later, on the mountains of balakuna trees. From these heights, they looked out over a vast stretch of open country, where the deep, wavy meadow-grass glistened like gold; and pastured there were herds of cows and carabao and many horses. And beyond rose another range of mountains, on the highest of which stood the Moglung's house. To reach it they had to cross whole forests of coconut and betel-nut trees that covered eight million mountains. Around the house were all kinds of useful plants and trees. When they walked under the floor of the house [typical Malay houses are pile-dwellings, the floor being raised several feet above the ground], the Moglung said, "My grandmother is looking at me because I have found another grandchild for her."

Then the grandmother (Tuglibung) called to them, saying, "Come up, come up, my grandchildren!"

As soon as they entered the house, the Tuglay sat down in a corner of the kitchen, until the grandmother offered him a better place, saying, "Do not stay in the kitchen. Come and sleep on my bed."

The Tuglay rested eight nights in the grandmother's bed. At the end of the eight nights the Moglung said to him, "Please take this betel-nut that I have prepared for you."

At first Tuglay did not want to take it; but the next day, when the Moglung again offered the betel, he accepted it from her and began to chew. After that, the Tuglay took off his trousers of bark and his jacket of bark, and became a Malaki T'oluk Waig. But the Moglung wondered where the Tuglay had gone, and she cried to her grandmother, "Where is the Tuglay?"

But the Malaki stood there, and answered her, "I am the Tuglay." At first the Moglung was grieved, because the Malaki seemed such a grand man, and she wanted Tuglay back.

But before long the Malaki said to her, "I want you to marry me."

So they were married. Then the Moglung opened her gold box, and took out a fine pair of trousers and a man's jacket, and gave them to the Malaki as a wedding gift.

When they had been living together for a while, there came a day when the Malaki wanted to go and visit a man who was a great worker in brass, the Malaki Tuangun; and the Moglung gave him directions for the journey, saying, "You will come to a place where a hundred roads meet. Take the road that is marked with the prints of many horses and carabao. Do not stop at the place of the cross-roads, for if you stop, the Bia ["Lady" used as an honorific term] who makes men giddy will hurt you."

Then the Malaki went away, and reached the place where a hundred roads crossed, as Moglung had said. But he stopped there to rest and chew betel-nut. Soon he began to feel queer and dizzy, and he fell asleep, not knowing anything. When he woke up, he wandered along up the mountain until he reached a house at the border of a big meadow, and thought he would stop and ask his way. From under the house he called up, "Which is the road to the Malaki Tuangun?"

It was the Bia's voice that answered, "First come up here, and then I'll tell you the road."

So the Malaki jumped up on the steps and went in. But when he was inside of her house, the Bia confessed that she did not know the way to the Malaki Tuangun's house.

"I am the woman," she said, "who made you dizzy, because I wanted to have you for my own."

"Oh! That's the game," said the Malaki. "But the Moglung is my wife, and she is the best woman in the world."

"Never mind that," smiled the Bia. "Just let me comb your hair."

Then the Bia gave him some betel-nut, and combed his hair until he grew sleepy. But as he was dropping off, he remembered a certain promise he had made his wife, and he said to the Bia, "If the Moglung comes and finds me here, you be sure to waken me."

After eight days had passed from the time her husband left home, the Moglung started out to find him, for he had said, "Eight days from now I will return."

By and by the Moglung came to the Bia's house, and found the Malaki there fast asleep; but the Bia did not waken him. Then the Moglung took from the Malaki's toes his toe-rings, and went away, leaving a message with the Bia:

"Tell the Malaki that I am going back home to find some other, malaki: tell him that I'll have no more to do with him."

But the Moglung did not go to her own home; she at once started for her brother's house that was up in the sky-country.

Presently the Malaki woke up, and when he looked at his toes, he found that his brass toe rings were gone.

"The Moglung has been here!" he cried in a frenzy. "Why didn't you waken me, as I told you?" Then he seized his sharp-bladed kampilan, and slew the Bia. Maddened by grief and rage, he dashed to the door and made one leap to the ground, screaming, "All the people in the world shall fall by my sword!"

On his war-shield he rode, and flew with the wind until he came to the horizon. Here lived the Malaki Lindig Ramut ka Langit. And when the two malaki met, they began to fight; and the seven brothers of the Malaki Lindig that live at the edge of the sky, likewise came out to fight. But when the battle had gone on but a little time, all the eight malaki of the horizon fell down dead. Then the angry Malaki who had slain the Bia and the eight young men went looking for more people to kill; and when he had shed the blood of many, he became a buso with only one eye in his forehead, for the buso with one eye are the worst buso of all. Everybody that he met he slew.

After some time, he reached the house of the great priest called "Pandita," and the Pandita checked him, saying, "Stop a minute, and let me ask you first what has happened to make you like this."

Then the Buso-man replied sadly, “I used to have a wife named Moglung, who was the best of all the bia; but when I went looking for the Malaki Tuan-gun, that other Bia made me dizzy, and gave me betel, and combed my hair. Then she was my wife for a little while. But I have killed her, and become a buso, and I want to kill all the people in the world.”

“You had better lie down on my mat here, and go to sleep,” advised the Pandita. While the Buso slept, the Pandita rubbed his joints with betel-nut; and when he woke up, he was a malaki again.

Then the Pandita talked to him, and said, “Only a few days ago, the Moglung passed here on her way to her brother’s home in heaven. She went by a bad road, for she would have to mount the steep rock-terraces. If you follow, you will come first to the Terraces of the Wind (Tarasu’ban ka Kara’mag’), then you reach the Terraces of Eight-fold Darkness (Walu Lapit Dukilum), and then the Terraces of the Rain (Tarasuban k’Udan).

Eagerly the Malaki set out on his journey, with his kabir [woven carrying bag] on his back, and his betel-nut and buyo-leaf in the kabir. He had not traveled far, before he came to a steep ascent of rock-terraces, the Terraces of the Wind, that had eight million steps. The Malaki knew not how to climb up the rocky structure that rose sheer before him, and so he sat down at the foot of the ascent, and took his kabir off his back to get out some betel-nut. After he had begun to chew his betel, he began to think, and he pondered for eight days how he could accomplish his hard journey. On the ninth day he began to jump up the steps of the terraces, one by one. On each step he chewed betel, and then jumped again; and at the close of the ninth day he had reached the top of the eight million steps, and was off, riding on his shield.

Next he reached the sharp-edged rocks called the “Terraces of Needles” (Tarasuban ka Simat), that had also eight million steps. Again he considered for eight days how he could mount them. Then on the ninth day he sprang from terrace to terrace, as before, chewing betel-nut on each terrace, and left the Tarasuban ka Simat, riding on his shield.

Then he arrived at the Terraces of Sheet-Lightning (Tarasuban ka’Dilam-dilam); and he took his kabir off his back, and prepared a betel-nut, chewed it, and meditated for eight days. On the ninth day he jumped from step to step of the eight million terraces, and went riding off on his war-shield. When he reached the Terraces of Forked-Lightning (Tarasuban ka Kirum), he surmounted them on the ninth day, like the others.

But now he came to a series of cuestas [rock ledges] named “Dulama Bolo Kampilan,” because one side of each was an abrupt cliff with the sharp edge of a kampilan; and the other side sloped gradually downward, like a blunt-working bolo. How to cross these rocks, of which there were eight million, the Malaki did not know; so he stopped and took off his kabir, cut up his betel-nut, and thought for eight days. Then on the ninth day he began to leap over the rocks, and he kept on leaping for eight days, each day jumping over one million of the cuestas. On the sixteenth day he was off, riding on his shield.

Then he reached the Terraces of the Thunder (Tarasuban ka Kilat), which he mounted, springing from one terrace to the next, as before, after he had meditated for eight days. Leaving these behind him on the ninth day, he traveled on to the Mountains of Bamboo (Pabungan Kawayanan), covered with bamboo whose leaves were all sharp steel. These mountains he could cross without the eight days' thought, because their sides sloped gently. From the uplands he could see a broad sweep of meadow beyond, where the grass glistened like gold. And when he had descended, and walked across the meadow, he had to pass through eight million groves of coconut trees, where the fruit grew at the height of a man's waist, and every coconut had the shape of a bell (korung-korung). Then he reached a forest of betel-nut, where again the nuts could be plucked without the trouble of climbing, for the clusters grew at the height of a man's waist. Beyond, came the meadows with white grass, and plants whose leaves were all of the rare old embroidered cloth called tambayang. He then found himself at the foot-hills of a range of eight million mountains, rising from the heart of the meadows, and, when he had climbed to their summit, he stood before a fine big house.

From the ground he called out, "If anybody lives in this house, let him come look at me, for I want to find the way to the Shrine in the Sky, or to the Little Heaven, where my Moglung lives."

But nobody answered.

Then the Malaki sprang up the bamboo ladder and looked in at the door, but he saw no one in the house. He was weary, after his journey, and sat down to rest in a chair made of gold that stood there. Soon there came to his ears the sound of men's voices, calling out, "There is the Malaki T'oluk Waig in the house."

The Malaki looked around the room, but there was no man there, only a little baby swinging in its cradle. Outside the house were many malaki from the great town of Lunsud, and they came rushing in the door, each holding a keen blade without handle (sobung). They all surrounded the Malaki in the gold chair, ready to fight him. But the Malaki gave them all some betel-nut from his kabir, and made the men friendly toward him. Then all pressed around the Malaki to look at his kabir, which shone like gold. They had never before seen a man's bag like this one. "It is the kabir of the Malaki T'oluk Waig," they said. The Malaki slept that night with the other malaki in the house.

When morning came, the day was dark, like night, for the sun did not shine. Then the Malaki took his kampilan and stuck it into his belt, and sat down on his shield. There was no light on the next day, nor on the next. For eight days the pitchy darkness lasted; but on the ninth day it lifted. Quick from its cradle jumped the baby, now grown as tall as the bariri-plant; that is, almost knee-high.

“Cowards, all of you!” cried the child to the Malaki Lunsud. “You are no malaki at all, since you cannot fight the Malaki T’oluk Waig.” Then, turning to the Malaki T’oluk Waig, the little fellow said, “Please teach me how to hold the spear.”

When the Malaki had taught the boy how to make the strokes, the two began to fight; for the boy, who was called the Pangalinan, was eager to use his spear against the Malaki. But the Malaki had magical power (matulu), so that when the Pangalinan attacked him with sword or spear, the blades of his weapons dissolved into water. For eight million days the futile battle went on. At last the Pangalinan gave it up, complaining to the Malaki T’oluk Waig, “How can I keep on fighting you, when every time I hit you my knives turn to water?”

Disheartened, the Pangalinan threw away his spear and his sword. But the Malaki would not hurt the Pangalinan when they were fighting; and as soon as the boy had flung his weapons outside the house, the Malaki put his arm around him and drew him close. After that, the two were friends.

One day the Pangalinan thought he would look inside the big gold box that stood in the house. It was his mother’s box. The boy went and raised the lid, but as soon as the cover was lifted, his mother came out from the box.

After this had happened, the Pangalinan got ready to go and find the Moglung whom the Malaki had been seeking. The boy knew where she lived, for he was the Moglung’s little brother. He took the bamboo ladder that formed the steps to the house, and placed it so that it would reach the Shrine in the Sky, whither the Moglung had gone. Up the bamboo rounds he climbed, until he reached the sky and found his sister. He ran to her crying, “Quick! Come with me! The great Malaki T’oluk Waig is down there.”

Then the Moglung came down from heaven with her little brother to their house where the Malaki was waiting for her. The Moglung and the Malaki were very happy to meet again, and they slept together that night.

Next day the Moglung had a talk with the Malaki, and said, “Now I want to live with you; but you remember that other woman, Maguay Bulol, that you used to sleep with. You will want her too, and you had better send for her.”

So the Malaki summoned Maguay Bulol, and in a few minutes Maguay Bulol was there. Then the Malaki had two wives, and they all lived in the same house forever.

STORY OF LUMABAT AND WARI

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Benedict, Laura Watson. “Bagobo Myths.” The Journal of American Folklore 26 (1913): 21–23.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Mindinao

National Origin: Philippines

The following narrative is another myth concerning the earliest times. The tale chronicles the creation of physical features and animal species of the world, and the creation of a god from the son of the “Old Man” and the “Old Woman” (see “Adventures of the Tuglay,” page 388, for background on Tuglay and Tuglibung). The myth also serves moral goals in noting Bagobo disapproval of incest.

---

Tuglay and Tuglibung had many children. One of them was called Lumabat. There came a time when Lumabat quarreled with his sister and was very angry with her. He said, “I will go to the sky, and never come back again.”

So Lumabat started for the sky-country, and many of his brothers and sisters went with him. A part of their journey lay over the sea, and when they had passed the sea, a rock spoke to them and said, “Where are you going?”

In the beginning, all the rocks and plants and the animals could talk with the people.

Then one boy answered the rock, “We are going to the sky-country.” As soon as he had spoken, the boy turned into a rock. But, his brothers and sisters went on, leaving the rock behind.

Presently a tree said, “Where are you going?”

“We are going to the sky,” replied one of the girls.

Immediately the girl became a tree. Thus, all the way along the journey, if any one answered, he became a tree, or stone, or rock, according to the nature of the object that put the question.

By and by the remainder of the party reached the border of the sky. They had gone to the very end of the earth, as far as the horizon. But here they had to stop, because the horizon kept moving up and down (supa-supu). The sky and the earth would part, and then close together again, just like the jaws of an animal in eating. This movement of the horizon began as soon as the people reached there.

There were many young men and women, and they all tried to jump through the place where the sky and the earth parted. But the edges of the horizon are very sharp, like a kampilan [sword], and they came together with a snap whenever anybody tried to jump through; and they cut him into two pieces. Then the parts of his body became stones, or grains of sand. One after another of the party tried to jump through, for nobody knew the fate of the one who went before him.

Last of all, Lumabat jumped quick, quicker than the rest; and before the sharp edges snapped shut, he was safe in heaven. As he walked along, he saw many wonderful things. He saw many *kampilan*s standing alone, and fighting, and that without any man to hold them. Lumabat passed on by them all. Then he came to the town where the bad dead live. The town is called “Kilut” [City of the Dead]. There, in the flames, he saw many spirits with heavy sins on them. The spirits with little sins were not in the flames; but they lay, their bodies covered with sores, in an acid that cuts like the juice of a lemon. Lumabat went on, past them all.

Finally he reached the house of Diwata, and went up into the house. There he saw many diwata, and they were chewing betel-nut [nut of the areca palm]. And one diwata spit from his mouth the isse [the cud, the solid part of the betel-nut that remains after the juice has been extracted] that he had finished chewing. When Lumabat saw the isse coming from the mouth of the god, it looked to him like a sharp knife. Then Diwata laid hold of Lumabat, and Lumabat thought the god held a sharp knife in his hand. But it was no knife: it was just the isse. And Diwata rubbed the isse on Lumabat’s belly, and with one downward stroke he opened the belly, and took out Lumabat’s intestines (betuka).

Then Lumabat himself became a god. He was not hungry any more, for now his intestines were gone. Yet if he wanted to eat, he had only to say, “Food, come now!” and at once all the fish were there, ready to be caught. In the sky-country, fish do not have to be caught. And Lumabat became the greatest of all the diwata.

Now, when Lumabat left home with his brothers and sisters, one sister and three brothers remained behind. The brother named Wari felt sad because Lumabat had gone away. At last he decided to follow him. He crossed the sea, and reached the border of the sky, which immediately began to make the opening and shutting motions. But Wari was agile, like his brother Lumabat; and he jumped quick, just like Lumabat, and got safe into heaven. Following the same path that his brother had taken, he reached the same house. And again Diwata took the isse, and attempted to open Wari’s belly; but Wari protested, for he did not like to have his intestines pulled out. Therefore the god was angry at Wari.

Yet Wari staid on in the house for three days. Then he went out on the atad that joined the front and back part of the gods’ house, whence he could look down on the earth. He saw his home town, and it made him happy to look at his fields of sugarcane and bananas, his groves of betel and coconuts. There were his bananas ripe, and all his fruits ready to be plucked. Wari gazed, and then he wanted to get back to earth again, and he began to cry; for he did not like to stay in heaven and have his intestines taken out, and he was homesick for his own town.

Now, the god was angry at Wari because he would not let him open his belly. And the god told Wari to go home, and take his dogs with him. First the god fixed some food for Wari to eat on his journey. Then he took meadow-grass (karan), and tied the long blades together, making a line long enough to reach down to earth. He tied Wari and the dogs to one end of the line; but before he lowered the rope, he said to Wari, “Do not eat while you are up in the air, for if you eat, it will set your dogs to quarreling. If I hear the sound of dogs fighting, I shall let go the rope.”

But while Wari hung in the air, he got very hungry, and, although he had been let down only about a third of the distance from heaven to earth, he took some of his food and ate it. Immediately the dogs began to fight. Then Diwata in the sky heard the noise, and he dropped the rope of meadow-grass. Then Wari fell down, down; but he did not strike the ground, for he was caught in the branches of the tree called lanipo. It was a tall tree, and Wari could not get down. He began to utter cries; and all night he kept crying, "Aro-o-o-o-i!" Then he turned into a kulago-bird? At night, when you hear the call of the kulago-bird, you know that it is the voice of Wari.

The kulago-bird has various sorts of feathers, feathers of all kinds of birds and chickens; it has the hair of all animals and the hair of man. This bird lives in very high trees at night, and you cannot see it. You cannot catch it. Yet the old men know a story about a kulago-bird once having been caught while it was building its nest. But this was after there came to be many people on the earth.

The three dogs went right along back to Wari's house. They found Wari's sister and two brothers at home, and staid there with them. After a while, the woman and her two brothers had many children.

"In the beginning," say the old men, "brother and sister would marry each other, just like pigs. This was a very bad custom."

THE STORY OF BANTUGAN

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Porter, Ralph S. "The Story of Bantugan," Journal of American Folklore 15 (1902): 143–161.

Date: 1900

Original Source: Philippines (Mindinao)

National Origin: Philippines

---

Mindanao is the second largest and easternmost of the more than 7,000 Philippine Islands. The island maintained a strong Muslim presence in the area from around the fourteenth century, the date of the founding of the Sultanate of Sulu. The legend below recounts the exploits of the Moro (Muslim) hero Bantugan. Present within the narrative, however, are elements of indigenous religion that predate Filipino contact with either Islam or Christianity. Thus, characters are able to become invisible, bladed weapons are magical, and spirits animate the environment. The following elements of Moro culture are useful for an understanding of the tale. Mbama is a package of bongo nut, bulla leaf, lime, and tobacco, considered a delicious combination for a chew by the Moros. If a Moro woman presents a roll of this to a man, it signifies that she is willing to be courted by him. The Tiruray tribe is regarded as the most primitive culture of Mindanao. They live up in the mountains and sometimes in trees. The concept of “juramentado” refers to a Moro who makes a vow before the priest to die taking the blood of a Christian, and believes that in so doing he will go at once to heaven. So he starts out with his sword and attacks every Christian he can find until he is himself killed. The kinship ties among the various characters of this legend are complex, as a guide for the reader, collector Ralph S. Porter offers this genealogy. “Bantugan and his relatives were: Palamata Bantugan, son of Tinumanan sa Lugun Minuluca Dalendeg (brother of the earthquake and thunder). The brothers of Bantugan were: 1, Mapalala Macog; 2, Madali Macabancas; 3, Dalumimbang Dalanda; 4, Damadag la Lupa; 5, Maladia Langig; 6, Marandang Datto Sulug; 7, Malinday Asabarat; 8, Mudsay sa Subu Subu; 9, Pasandalan na Murud; 10, Bendera Mudaya; 11, Pamanay Macalayan; 12, Pandi Macalele. The sisters of Bantugan were: 1, Alcat Ulaunan; 2, Mandanda Uray; 3, Dalinding u Subangan. The sons of Bantugan were: 1, Balatama Lumana; Pandumagan Dayuran; 2, Alungan Pidsiana Lumalang sa Dalisay; 3, Malinday Abunbara Lumanti Dowa Dowa; 4, Tankula Bulantakan Bulu Bulu sa Lagat; 5, Tagatag sa Laya-gum sa Pigculat; 6, Lumbay sa Pegcaualau Daliday Malindu; 7, Lumbay Magapindu” (Porter 143).

---

Once upon a time there came a terrific hurricane which carried the house of the sister of Bantugan from the village of Bombalan to the seacoast.

While there it was seen by a Spanish general who was lying off the coast in his warship. The Spanish general’s name was Mindalunu sa Tunu-Miducau sa da Uata.

The general put the house with the sister of Bantugan on his warship and carried her away to his town of Sugurungan a Lagat.

The king of this town was Dumakulay Amalana Dumombang Mapamatu. For capturing this maiden the general was given high rank and honor and was ordered to build a house for the sister close to the house of the king.

Now when the king asked Alcat (which was the name of Bantugan’s sister) to give him some mbama to chew, she refused, saying, “Do not talk to me, for I have been taken from my brothers and am heavy at heart; if you wish to marry me, go to my brothers and ask them for me.”

When the brothers of Alcat knew that she had been stolen away from them, they were heavy at heart also. Then said Bantugan, “Prepare all of our war boats and launch my great warship Linumuntan Mapalo Mabuculud Linayum. Put out all our battle-flags and let all my brothers gather with me to search for our sister.”

When they were all aboard the captain of Bantugan's warboat called out to it, "Sail like the wind, Linumuntan, so that we may overtake the wicked Spanish general who has carried away the sister of our datto" (chief).

But the ship did not obey his command, and Malinday Asabarat, the seventh brother of Bantugan, said, "It must be that we have a bad soldier on board; let us find out who he is and kill him, that we may proceed on our journey." Then Malinday pointed out a soldier whose name was Masualo Savani Masunu Sakasumba, whose great fault was that he made love to the wives of the dattos and other married women.

When this man knew he was to die, he said, "Tell my friends when you return that I died in battle and not that I was executed."

Then Malinday took him to the bow of the ship and with one stroke of his campilan (Moro broadsword) cut off his head. When the soldier was dead the ship at once began to speed through the water with tremendous velocity, so that all the great fish of the sea were much afraid.

Before long they came to a small island and there anchored, and four men carried the body of the soldier ashore and buried it.

Mapalala Macog now suggested that they rest here a while and sleep. While they were sleeping there came to anchor on the other side of the island a warship of Datto Banningan, who was the accepted lover of Bantugan's sister, Alcat Ulaunan, who had been carried away by the Spaniard, and whom Bantugan had started to search for.

Banningan had ordered the colintangan (large Moro xylophone) to be played in his warship, which was called the Katipapabayan Lumbayan Dakadua, meaning the two-tailed crocodile of the sea.

Now Bendera Mudaya, the tenth brother of Bantugan, heard the loud playing of Banningan's colintangan and he became very wroth, for he thought it would disturb his brother Bantugan's rest, so he called a thousand soldiers and had the lantakas (cannon) fired at the ship of Banningan, and the shot carried away all the principal masts of Banningan's ship and killed many of his soldiers.

Now Banningan's brother, whose name was Mapandala sa Dalen Matankin sa Gavi (he that bites like the pepper of the deep forest), called the master of the ship, whose name was Salindala Kabunga Salgangka sa Bukau, and ordered him to return the fire; but said the master, "Let us first ask permission of Datto Banningan," who just now awakened and inquired what had happened. Mapandala replied that Bantugan's ship had fired on them and begged to be allowed to fire back.

"No," said Banningan, "if we fire on Bantugan I can then never marry his sister."

"But," said the brother, "look at the ruin of the ship and the loss of men. Let this woman go and let us revenge ourselves."

"No," said Banningan, "seeing that you my brother still live not even the loss of ships or men will compel me to attack the great and honorable Bantugan."

So Banning gave orders for his anchors to be raised and his ship to be sailed straight for Bantugan's ship, that they might converse. Banning sat in the bow (ulunan) with two gold embroidered umbrellas held over him.

Now when Bendera Mudaya recognized that it was Banning he had fired at, he broke into tears and cried out, "Ama ku" (my father), "do not scold me. I thought your ship was the ship of our enemies. It is all my fault; do with me as you will."

"No," said Banning, "we are equally sad, let us say no more of it. I but beg of Bantugan to allow me to lash my ship to his." This was soon done and the dattos greeted each other.

Then Banning asked, "What brings you out in your warship with so many soldiers and lantakas?" When Banning had been told that his sweetheart had been carried away by the Spaniards his grief was very great, and with a common enemy these two dattos sealed their friendship.

After a council it was decided that Bantugan should continue the search by sea and that Banning should go by land, as his ship was no longer seaworthy.

After the council Banning returned to his own ship and cast loose from Bantugan, who sailed away. All the panditas (priests) were now called together by Banning and were asked for their advice as to how to proceed to find the lost maiden. They told him, when he started out, not to go as a datto with fine raiment and many followers, but to go alone in the disguise of a tiruray, and that if he went this way he would surely meet with success.

So Banning sent his brother Mapandala back with the ship to their village of Cudarangen, there to be ruler in his stead. But the brother's heart was heavy, for he wanted to go also on the trip, and he begged unavailingly of Banning to let him go, but he would not consent. So Banning went ashore and Mapandala put his ship about to return home, but when Banning was well out of sight Mapandala turned again and started to follow Bantugan as best he could, making many repairs to his ship.

In a day or two he passed by a large town called Pamamaluy a ig Alamay a Lagat, and there encountered a great Spanish warship whose captain inquired where he was from. Mapandala answered, "From Cudarangen." Then the Spaniard asked him where he was going. Mapandala answered, "To search for the sister of Datto Bantugan." Whereupon the Spanish fired upon him; the general on the ship was the same one who had carried away Bantugan's sister, and he ordered Mapandala to return to Cudarangen, saying that not far away there was a fleet of a thousand Spanish ships waiting for Bantugan and his followers.

"Nevertheless," said Mapandala, "I shall not return." And the battle began at once, between Mapandala and the Spaniard. The latter soon won, and Mapandala was badly injured so that his entrails fell out. Both boats were badly injured and many were killed on both sides, but the Spaniards were able to float and navigate, and they looted Mapandala's boat and then returned to their village.

Mapandala's boat was finally cast upon the beach, where it was seen by Banning who came by there on foot at that very moment. He at once boarded her, and when Mapandala saw someone coming he cried out for water which Banning brought him. When they recognized each other Banning embraced his brother and wept to see him so sorely wounded. Mapandala said, "I am surely dying." But Banning called for a fairy from Cudarangen to take his brother back and cure him there of his wounds with a great medicine which he had at home in his chest. When the fairy had taken Mapandala, Banning went on his way.

The warship of Bantugan finally reached the village of the Spaniards, Sudurungan a Lagat, and there found a thousand Spanish war-ships, who at once fired upon them, but the only effect of their firing was to push Bantugan farther away, not a single cannon-ball penetrating his ship.

Banning continued on his road, and after many days reached a high hill from which he could see the great city of the Spaniards, with many ships in the harbor and many more on guard at its entrance. This great display frightened Banning very much, for he thought to himself, "At the very door of the city I will die." So he decided to go back to the brother of Bantugan, who was named Pasandalan na Murud, and who was the sultan of I Labumbalan Tankulabulantan, and ask him what he should do in the face of such dreadful obstacles.

He had not gone far until two little golden birds alighted on his shield (klung) and told him not to go back, for he would be laughed at, and all would say that he was not worthy of his sweetheart. Banning then smote his breast and decided to return to the search even though he died ten times. He then hid his shield and campilan (broadsword) in a hollow rock and carried only a bow and arrows.

As he was passing along the coast he saw the ships of the Spanish general sailing by who had destroyed his own boat. The Spanish general also saw him and called to him to come on board his ship, for he did not think that he had the walk or carriage of a poor tiruray. So Banning went aboard the Spanish ships, and the soldiers were so thick on the deck that he could not help stepping on them as he passed. This made the soldiers mad, but the general said, "Never mind; he is only a poor tiruray, and does not know good manners." The tiruray walked right up and sat down close by the side of the general, which made the general mad on the inside, but he did not show it. Then the general asked him, "Where are you from?"

He answered, "From Lalansayan Lalanun." Now the general knew that the king's brother lived with this family and so the tiruray, who was Banning in disguise, said that he had been sent by the king's brother to inquire if it was true that the king had captured the sister of Bantugan, and for the king to beware, for Bantugan was a powerful and dangerous enemy. Then the general told a great lie, saying that they had had a big war with Bantugan and that Alcat had been given as a peace offering.

This great lie maddened the tiruray, so that for a minute he wanted to go “idzavil” (run amuck or juramentado). The general noticed that the tiruray was getting mad, and asked, “Why are you red in the face? I believe that you are Banningan, and if you are you will go no farther. But the tiruray answered and said, “Show me Banningan, and I myself will slay him.” Then the general said, “Tell me truly from where you come?”

The tiruray answered and said, “From Lansayan Aluna Lundingan Apamalui Deliday Linauig Lumbay Lungan a Lagat, whose datto is Daliday Linauig Lumbay Alungan a Lagat, who is a brother to your king.”

Then the general and the tiruray shook hands, and the general asked, “What is your errand here?”

The tiruray answered, “I come by order of the brother of the king to see if it was true that the king had the sister of Datto Bantugan in his city and if she was beautiful or not.”

The general said, “She is as beautiful as the moon.”

The tiruray now asked the general to take him to see the sister of Bantugan, for he alone would not be allowed to pass the gates. So the general and Banningan went ashore and walked towards the city of the king, and when they reached the gates the guard would only allow the general to pass and would not admit the tiruray.

But the general said, “This tiruray is a good man and comes from the town of the king’s brother.”

Then the captain of the guard said, “No, he cannot pass, for I know that in the city of the king’s brother there are no tirurays.”

“Yes,” said Banningan, “that is true, but I do not claim to live in the town of the king’s brother, but in a village near it named Malasan sa Ulay Uluban sa Bulauan.”

“Well,” said the captain of the guard, “You may go in; you look innocent at any rate.”

So in they went, and soon they came to the second guard, whose captain asked the general, “What is your business with the king?”

The general said, “To beg permission of the king to return to my family.”

“Who is the tiruray with you,” asked the captain of the guard.

“Oh, he is all right, I will vouch for him,” said the general.

Then the captain of the guard said, “Well, you may both pass, but the law is that all who pass this gate must pass through dancing.” So they both danced their way through the gate.

By and by they reached the house of the king, where there were many guards, who did not care to have the tiruray pass, but the king, when he heard that there was a tiruray below, ordered the guard to admit him and bring the man up to him, and when the tiruray had entered the palace he found the floor covered with soldiers sitting and lying down. He clumsily stepped on several, who immediately wanted to kill him, but the king said, “No, he is only a tiruray and knows no manners; do not hurt him.” Then the tiruray walked straight up to the throne and sat right down beside the king, to the great fear of the general, who told him not to, for the king would surely scold him or kill him. When the courtiers saw this poor beggar take his seat by the king’s side, they begged permission to kill him for his presumption. But the king said, “No, I will question him first.”

While Baningan was seated beside the king he saw the armor of his brother lying on the floor and covered with blood. His face became red and the tears fell from his eyes, and he again wanted to be an “idzavil,” but on second thought decided not to, for if he did he could not succeed in seeing his sweetheart.

The king asked him why his face was so red and why he was crying. Baningan answered, “I cry, for I cannot see the sister of Bantugan.”

Then asks the king, “What do you know of the sister of Bantugan, and where do you come from?”

Baningan answered, “From your brother’s town.”

Then the king at once asked him, “Is my brother well and happy?”

“Yes,” said the tiruray, who then asked, “Is the sister of Bantugan as beautiful as she is reported to be?”

“Yes,” said the king, “she is as beautiful as the moon.” Then Baningan asked the king’s permission to see her so that he could tell the king’s brother of her beauty. So the king told the tiruray to go and ask Alcat for bulla for the king to chew, and to tell her that if she would not give it he would have her head cut off.

When the tiruray reached the house in which the sister of Bantugan was kept, a wife of the king (whose name was Salagambal Kla Undiganan) came forward and asked him what he wanted. When he told her, she asked him to come in and sit down, but Baningan said, “I wait for the order of the sister of Bantugan.” But the sister of Bantugan did not care to order the tiruray to come in, for he was of low blood. But on the solicitation of the other wives of the king, she told him to come in and sit down.

When the tiruray came in the house he sat down close to Alcat, who scolded him for it, and ordered him away, but the wives of the king said, “No, he is only a poor tiruray and knows no better; let him stay and we will have some sport with him.”

Then Bantugan’s sister asked him from whence he came.

He answered, “From Mapulud Salin Kikan Palau sa Linun Kayo.”

Then Alcat at once asked him if he knew Datto Bantugan. The tiruray answered and said, “Yes, I know him, but I have heard that he was killed not long ago in a fight with the Spaniards. Also his brother Mapalala Macog, who was killed by a crocodile, and all the other brothers are dead in the warship of Dalumimbang Dalanda.”

When hearing this the sister of Bantugan fell in a faint (the name of the warship was Timbalangay a Uatu Timbidayala Sunga).

When Alcat had recovered from her faint, she asked the tiruray if he knew Banningan. At this the tiruray laughed and showed his teeth, which the sister of Bantugan recognized at once, but she gave no sign of recognition. Then the tiruray said, "Banningan fell in a cave a week ago and has not come out yet." Then he took a ma-lung (a Moro dress) and put it on in Moro style and seized the sister of Bantugan and put her on his lap.

She did not scold him, but asked, "Can you win in a fight with the Spaniards and take me home to my family?"

Banningan answered and said, "Win or lose, I will not leave you. The king has sent me to bring him bulla from you and if you don't give it he will kill you."

"Well," said Bantugan's sister, let him kill me; I will not give him the bulla."

Banningan now called the fairies to bring his campilan and rodella and prepared himself for a fight.

Alcat cried and said, "If you leave me now even for a minute, you will never come back."

"Yes," said Banningan, "I will come back." He then made himself invisible by a spell and went out to the harbor mouth where he could get a stone to sharpen his campilan.

While all this was going on, the king became very impatient at the non-return of the tiruray and sent for him. The women told the messenger that the tiruray had gone some time before, and when the king heard this he said, "The tiruray does not return, for he is ashamed to return without the bulla which Bantugan's sister has refused."

The king then ordered a well dug and had the sister of Bantugan brought to it, that she might be drowned in it. But the courtiers begged that she be spared, for, they said, "If you kill the sister of Bantugan, we will surely have a war with Bantugan and his brothers, and they are very brave men and have many followers." But the king became more and more angry and took his saber to kill the sister of Bantugan.

At that moment Banningan returned in his invisible state and stood by her side. Alcat now said to Banningan, "What are you going to do now?"

He answered, "I will take you up to the top of the highest coconut tree," which he did, and when he returned, became visible to all the court clad in armor and with his campilan and klung. He was at once surrounded by the general and the soldiers of the court, who attacked him, but Banningan defended himself so well that every stroke of his campilan cut off ten heads.

In the mean time, Bantugan arrived at the harbor mouth and heard a great commotion in the city, which was caused by the fight that was going on between Banningan and the king's soldiers. On learning this Bantugan ordered his ship to pass under the water instead of on top, until he reached the point not far from the Spanish fleet. His ship then ascended to the surface, causing great commotion and excitement among the Spaniards. Madali Macabancas now suggested that the ship be anchored bow and stern. This was scarcely done before the Spaniards opened fire on them, and for seven days the fire continued, so that the smoke was so thick that it made the day the same as night.

At the end of the seventh day the smoke rose a little and the Spaniards saw that Bantugan's boat was still uninjured, while they were badly cut up. Their bullets had simply pushed Bantugan's ship farther away.

Marandang Datto Sulug now said, "Let us go ashore with campilan (sword) and klung" (shield). This was done, and the course of fighting was done at once. At the same time Banning was still fighting within the walls.

Just at this time Datto Sulune Cudungangan sa Colingtongan, of the town of Sungiline a Dinal Hayrana Amiara, arrived in his great warship, Galawongat Tinumcup Ukil a Keranda. This datto, whose sister Bantugan was in love with, came to see if he could not act as a peacemaker and have the quarrel cease, so that all should be friends.

He first spoke to Bantugan and told him to quit fighting, so that he could arrange matters with the king, and that anyway Bantugan could not win, for the Spaniards were too many for him. Bantugan answered, and said, "If they give back my sister, I will fight no more, but if not, we will fight to the death."

"Well," said the datto, "wait till I have spoken to the king before you fight any more."

So the datto went in and reached the place where Banning was fighting and also prevailed upon him to wait and fight no more till he had spoken to the king.

When the datto reached the palace, the king agreed to quit fighting if Bantugan would give Alcat to him in marriage.

But the datto said, "If you insist on that condition, the war will last for many years, for Bantugan surely will not give his sister to you, for he has contracted to give her to Banning."

"Well," said the king, "Alcat can go, but her companions must stay, for I prefer Moros to Spaniards."

Then the datto said, "No, this is not good, the fighting will surely continue if you insist on this."

"Well," said the king, "let them all go, but I do not want to see Bantugan at all."

So the datto carried the house and all the women and Alcat down to the ship of Bantugan and put them on board, and Bantugan then returned to his country with Banning (the country of Bantugan was named Ilian a Bumbalan Tankalabulantakan), and when they reached there the house was replanted in its former place, and all were happy.

Now the older brother (Mapalala Macog) said, "Now let Bantugan marry." And it was decided that Bantugan should marry Minilig Urugung Managam a Dalendeg, who was the daughter of the sultan Minialungan Simban of Minifigi a Lungung Minaga na Dalendeg.

Pasandalan na Murud now called Dalumimbang Dalanda and Damagag da Lupa, and ordered them to make a journey to the country of the sultan and ask his daughter's hand in marriage for Bantugan.

"Well," they said, "if the sultan refuses we will not return until we have punished them well."

"No," said Pasandalan, "that will not do. I will get another messenger"; and he called Mapalala Macog, who answered the same as did all the other brothers.

"Well," said Pasandalan, "I will go myself"; but Pandi Macalayan objected and said, "No, let us send Bantugan's son, Balatama Lumana Alcat, Pandumagan Dayuran." (This boy was the son of Bantugan's sister whom Bantugan had married innocently, because when Bantugan was born he was sent away on a ship and did not return until he was grown up, and not knowing his sister Alcat, fell in love with her and married her, and this boy was born before they knew of their relationship.)

When the son was found, he was brought before Pasandalan and said, "Why am I, a child, to be sent on this errand. Why do not some of my uncles go?"

"Well," said Pasandalan, "I will go."

"No," said the son, "let me go as the rest wish." But now Bantugan interrupted and objected to this small boy being sent on so important and dangerous an errand. But the brothers all insisted, and so he was sent away to prepare himself and to return to be instructed. When he came back properly dressed, his mother also came crying, not wanting him to go so far away. But the boy said, "I go because my uncles cannot."

Now Pasandalan said to him, "Have patience and speak good word with the sultan, and even if they speak ill to you have patience as long as you can, but when you cannot stand it any longer, of course you must fight."

So the arms of Bantugan were given him, and when he started away he told them that if he did not return in three months it would surely be that he was dead. So he bade good-bye to all and started on his journey.

After he had been gone some hours Dalumimbang Dalanda disguised himself and went out to try the boy's courage, and appeared before Balatama as an old man and asked him where he was going. Balatama answered and told his errand.

Then Dalumimbang said, "You cannot go any farther; you must return."

But the boy said, "No, I will continue on my errand."

"Well, then," said the old one, "if you don't go back I will kill you."

At this the boy took his campilan and struck at the old one, who disappeared in the air.

Then he kept on his journey, and on reaching a high stone he was able to look back and see the village from which he had come. The sight made him cry and he wanted to return, but the recollection of the order of his uncles made him keep on his way.

By and by a little bird came by and perched upon his shoulder, and asked him where he was going, and on being told said, "Do not go any farther because Mimdalanu sa Tunu Midsicau di Uato is waiting for you to kill you.” But the boy went on just the same, and that night slept on the beach in a bed made of magical snake-belt. In the morning his heart called to him to awake, and when he arose it was with such a bound that it made the beach tremble.

So he continued on his journey, and by and by came to a stone in the form of a man. It was named Mamilbang a Uato and was surrounded by a fence made out of wood called Kayo Naniarugun Kayo Rani Dalandeg, and the land which this fence enclosed belonged to the wife of Satan. It lay across the road and obstructed his way, so he took his campilan and cut down the fence, which made the wife of Satan very mad, so she made the air to be as dark as night; and the boy began to cry, for he could not see his way to continue the journey. Then the wife of Satan made it rain stones as large as houses, but the boy protected himself by holding his shield over him and prayed and called for the winds from the home land to come and help him, which they did, and the air became clear again and the rain ceased, and then Balatama saw the wife of Satan in a window of her house and took her to be his mother, for she resembled her so much. The woman called to him to come up into the house, which he did, and then she asked him what his errand was, and on being told said to him, “Do not go any farther, for the Spaniards are waiting for you to kill you.” But the boy said he would go on his way nevertheless.

Then the woman asked him if he had a charm of gold in the shape of a man. The boy answered, and said that he had one. Then he bade good-bye to Satan’s wife and started on his journey again.

Soon on the road he met a big man-monster with horns who asked him where he was going. The boy told him, and then the monster said to him, “You cannot go any farther; go back to your country where you come from.” But Balatama took his campilan and made a stroke at the monster, who disappeared in the air.

A little farther on he came across a great snake on the road, who also asked his errand, and on being told, the snake said, “No, you cannot pass, for I am the guard on the road, and none can pass here.” So the snake made a motion to seize him, but the boy with his campilan cut the snake into two pieces and threw one half into the sea and one half into the mountains and then went on his way.

After many days he came to a stone set in the middle of the road. It glowed and glistened as if it were made of pure gold, and from this point he could see the city to which he was going. It was a fine large town with ten harbors. He saw one house which seemed to be made of crystal and which he supposed was the house of the sultan. When he came nearer the city, he saw a house made of pure gold.

It took him a long time to reach the harbor mouth, although from the golden stone it appeared to be but a short distance.

When he entered the city gates, he was very careful not to mix with the crowds, for he did not know what kind of people he would meet. When he did meet some of the people they asked him where he was going, but he did not answer them, for they were only workingmen and he, a datto's son, would not converse with them. As he passed the streets all the people stared at him, but he was very beautiful and was admired by all; as he went along he passed a number of datto's sons playing "sefa." They asked him to play, but he said he did not know how. Then one of them said, "Who are you and from where, that you cannot play sefa?" but the son of Bantugan said, "You needn't ask of me; are you the sultan of this town?"

The young man who had questioned him (Batalasalapay an Datto sa Ginaeunan) said, "I am of high blood," and was very wroth.

"Well," said the son of Bantugan, "if you want to fight, I guess you can do so now."

So they fought until an old man came and made them stop. In the meantime some one had carried word to the sultan that there were two people fighting, so the sultan ordered them both brought before him. When they were brought, the son of Bantugan went up and sat down next to the sultan, which made all the other Moros furious, and then the courtiers begged that he might be killed, but the sultan said, "No, let us question him first." Bantugan's son said that before he told his errand to the sultan he wanted all the dattos' sons and dattos present to hear, but they told him it would take too long to gather them. Then Balatama said that before he spoke he wanted all persons to take off their helmets. But they thought this was too much and were very wroth, and wanted to kill him at once. The son of Bantugan then said, "Pshaw, what are you all to me? You are nothing."

Then the sultan said, "Tut, tut, let all take off their helmets so that we can hear this young man's story, for if we kill him we will know nothing of his errand, or from where he comes." So all the helmets were taken off and Balatama arose and told him his name and where he was from. And then all became of a good heart again and the sultan then asked Balatama to tell them his errand.

"I am sent by Pasandalan na Murud Bandelo Madayo to ask for the daughter of the sultan for Datto Bantugan."

The sultan then said to his courtiers, "You, my friends, answer the request."

One courtier then said (Bambay sa Pananian), "I don't see how Bantugan can marry the sultan's daughter, because the first gift (sungut) must be a figure of a man or a woman in pure gold."

"Well," said Bantugan's son, "I am here to hear what you want and to say whether it could be given or not."

"Well," said another datto, "you must also give a great yard with the floor of gold, three feet thick" (this datto's name was Midtumula Buisan Ninbantas Balabagan).

"Well," said Bantugan's son, "all this can be given."

"Then the sister of the princess spoke up and said, "The gifts must be as many as the blades of grass in this city."

“It can be given,” said Balatama.

A datto named Daliday sa Lugungan said, “You must also give a bridge (talitay) built of stone, to cross the Pulangui (Rio Grande de Mindanao).”

“It can be given,” said Balatama.

Batatalatayan now said, “You must change this city from a city of wooden buildings to a city of stone buildings.”

And Dalendegen Sangilan said, “You must give a ship of stone.”

Daliday su Milen demanded that all the coconuts in the sultan’s grove be turned into gold and also the leaves.

“All this would be done,” said the son of Bantugan. “Mapalala Macog will give the yard of gold; Malinday Assabarat the bridge of stone; Dalumimbang Dalanda the boat of stone; Matabalau Man. Guda will give the many gifts; Siagambalanua the golden cocoas. The golden statue I will give. Very well,” said Balatama, “but I will have to go back my to father’s town (Bombalan) to get it.”

At this one of the dattos scolded and said, “You are surely a liar and do not intend to get the statue at all. Let us cut his head off.”

And the sultan said, “Yes, let us have the golden statue now or we will kill you.”

“No,” said Balatama, “if I give you the statue now there will be dreadful storms, rain, and darkness.” But they only laughed at him and demanded the statue. So he reached into the helmet and drew forth the statue of gold, and immediately there was a great storm and earthquakes and it rained stones as big as houses. And the sultan called to Balatama to put back the statue, for they would surely be all killed if he did not.

“Well,” said Balatama, “you would not believe me when I told you, and now I am going to let the storm continue.” But the sultan begged him to put back the statue, and said that if he would put it back Bantugan might come and marry his daughter and give no other presents at all but the golden statue. So Balatama put back the statue, and the air became calm again, to the great relief of the sultan and the dattos.

“Now,” said Balatama, “I will return. But first let me see the future wife.” This was granted, and they asked him when Bantugan would come to the wedding. He told them in three months. So Balatama went to the palace and at the door was stopped by a female guard (Siagambal Anunan Kelam Anandinganan). She told him to sit down and have some bulla to chew. But he answered and said that he was but a child, and did not chew it.

When the princess saw the boy she asked him what he came for. He told her that he had come to see her and then go back and tell his father of her beauty. The princess gave him a ring and a handkerchief for a present and then he bade her good-bye.

On the road home he again met the wife of Satan, who compelled him to stay with her for four months.

There was a sailor of the sea from Kindalungan Minaga Delandeg and another from Ibat a Kadalán, a Spanish town. They met on the high seas, and after greeting each other the second one asked the first one, "Is it true that Bantugan is going to marry the daughter of the sultan?"

"Yes," said the first one, "great preparations are being made for it."

Then the second one said, "Why, does he not know that the great General Linumimbang Sandaw Minabi Salungan is going to marry the same princess?"

"No," said the first, "and I suppose it would not make any difference if he did know." So the sailors separated, and the Spanish sailor went straight up to the general and told him that Bantugan was preparing to marry the sultan's daughter.

The general at once ordered a great expedition to be prepared, and called the chief pandita (Batataswalian) and asked him if he thought it was a good hour for it.

"No," said the chief, "if you go now they will surely have a big fight and you will lose." Nevertheless the general embarked in his great warship, the Minanaga su Macag Maluba Kuman sa Tau, also with him were all of his brothers and following after him were ten thousand other ships. They went to the sultan's city, and their number was so great that they filled the harbor, greatly frightening the people of the city.

And the general's brother disembarked and went to the house of the sultan, where he demanded the princess for his brother, saying that if she was not given the fleet would destroy the city and all the people. This frightened the sultan and his courtiers very much, so they decided to give the daughter to the general and asked him to fix the date for the wedding. He told him that it would be the first full moon. Then the general's brother left, saying that the general would soon come to see them.

Bantugan prepared everything for the wedding, which he expected would take place at the appointed time. But the days went by and Bantugan and his brothers were very much afraid, for the boy had not returned and they feared that he was dead. So after the three months had passed, Bantugan prepared a big expedition to go in search of his son. The great warship was decorated with flags of gold and all the mosquito bar was made of silk.

When they came in sight of the sultan's city one of Bantugan's brothers saw the Spanish fleet in the harbor, and advised Bantugan not to enter until the Spaniards had left. So they brought their ship to anchor, and all felt very sad because they could go no farther. Pidsayana Alungan, a son of Bantugan, came and asked his uncles why they were so sad, but they would not answer him, so he went back, and another son, Bulubulu sa Lagat, came and asked the same of his uncles, but they would not answer him.

Another son now came. Lumbay sa Layagum Pegcaualau Daliday Malindu came and asked the same of his uncles, but none would answer him. Lumbay Magapindu came and asked the same question, but they would give him no answer.

Now came Datto Baningan, who asked the same question of the brothers of Bantugan, saying, "Fear not." But they would give him no answer.

Pandi Macalele came and asked of his brothers, "Why didn't you answer? Why don't we go on? Even if the grass turns into Spaniards we need not fear."

Then Mapalala Macog came and asked the same, saying, "Why do you fear? Even if the cannon balls come like rain and lightning, we can fight always." But still no answer.

Then Marandung Datto Sulung came and spoke to Bantugan. "Why do all our brothers not answer when questioned? Do they fear the Spaniards? Anyway, we are here only to find the son who has not returned, so let us return to Bombalan."

"No," said Bantugan, "let us seek my son, and even if we enter the harbor where the Spaniards are, let us continue the search." So at Bantugan's command the anchors were raised and they sailed into the harbor where lay the Spanish fleet.

The general and his brother were about to go and call to see the princess, and when they reached the palace the daughter called them in and was very nice to them, offering the bulla to the gentlemen.

The general's brother admired one of the sisters of the princess very much, and asked her for bulla, but she laughed at him and would not give it, called him names, and made much fun with him, saying, he was not the general's brother, etc., etc., but only a bilan, manobo, or tiruray, and could not marry her, for he must marry a tiruray. This made the brother of the general very mad and he drew his kris to strike her, but his companion stopped him.

Then the sister of the princess said to him, "Why don't you kill me? I am not afraid of you" and then she went to the window to cool off, for she was very mad at the general and his brother. And the sight of the Spanish fleet in the harbor increased her rage, but just then a parrot with golden plumage hopped into the window and told her to look out into the harbor mouth and there she saw Bantugan's ships entering the harbor, so she called her sister to see them, who came, but could not tell whose flags they were.

Then the general's brother came and looked and said, "We must go and see at once whether it is the fleet of Bantugan, and if it is we must go and kill him and all his people."

So the brother returned to the sultan and asked him if he knew whose ships were coming into the harbor.

The sultan said, "No, I do not know, but will send for my father and see if he knows." So he sent one of his brothers to go and call the father, who, as he was very old, was kept in a little dark room by himself, so he could not get hurt.

The sultan said, "If he is so bent with age that he cannot see, talk, or walk, tickle him in the ribs, and that will make him young again, and you, my brother, carry him here yourself. Do not trust him to the slaves, for if he should fall he would break himself and die."

So the old man was brought, and when he looked at the flags on the ship he said that they were the flags of Bapa ni Bantugan (father of Bantugan), who was a great friend of his in his younger days; and then he told the sultan that he and Bantugan's father had made a contract years ago that their children and children's children should intermarry, and now the sultan had promised his daughter to two people and that great trouble would come on the land.

So the sultan said to the general, "Here are two claimers to my daughter's hand. Go aboard your ships and you and Bantugan go and fight it out, and he who wins will have my daughter."

So the Spaniards opened fire upon Bantugan, and for three days the earth was covered with smoke from the battle, so that neither could see his enemy. The Spanish general said, "I cannot see Bantugan or the fleet anywhere, so let us go and claim the princess."

And when they reached the sultan they demanded his daughter, but the sultan said, "No, let us wait until the smoke rises to make sure that Bantugan is gone."

Pamanay Macalayan called to Maladia Langig and they two went to Bantugan and decided to engage the Spanish fleet. They took down the flags of gold and put up the battle-flags, and when they came within range of the Spanish fleet they opened fire, and their cannon balls carried away great pieces of the mountains, and many of the Spanish fleet were sunk and great darkness and smoke came over the earth.

When the smoke arose the ships of Bantugan were seen to be all unharmed, so the sultan said, "Bantugan has surely won, for his fleet is uninjured and yours is badly damaged and you have lost."

"No," said the general, "we will fight it out on land." So he landed all of his troops and cannon and made ready to meet Bantugan on the land, and when all were landed and ready the Spaniard sent his challenge against Bantugan. Bantugan landed his troops and cannon, but before he commenced fighting he paid his respects to the princess and sultan in case he should be killed. After the fight had begun the Spaniards saw that they could never win with guns and cannon, so they set upon Bantugan with campilans (or "kampilan," long sword used by the Moros of the Philippines) and spears, and soon the general's brother (Masuala Subangam) was killed by Bantugan. Before long the ground was covered with corpses and the rivers were dammed up with their numbers. So the sultan sent word for them not to fight any more, for the air and water were so polluted with the dead bodies.

But the Spaniard answered and said, "If you give your daughter to Bantugan we will fight forever or until we are dead."

The sultan sent a messenger to Bantugan saying, "Let us deceive the Spaniard in order to get him to go away. Let us tell him that you will not marry my daughter, and then we are sure he will leave, and then after he is gone, we can have the wedding."

Bantugan agreed to this, and word was sent to the Spaniards that Bantugan would not marry the sultan's daughter, and that the fighting should cease, because the cannon balls were killing many of the women and children in the city. The Spaniard and Bantugan agreed that neither of them should marry the Princess and that they should be friends. So both the Spaniard and Bantugan sailed away to their home. But Bantugan soon returned and married the princess and continued on his search for his son. He soon found him in the house of the wife of Satan, and took him home with him.

The Spanish general sailed away for about a week, for his home, and then turned about to return to take the princess away by force, for his heart was deceitful, and when he arrived at the city of the sultan, and found that the princess had been carried away by Bantugan, his wrath knew no bounds, so that he destroyed the sultan, his city, and all of its people, and then sailed away to his own city to prepare a great expedition with which he should utterly annihilate Bantugan and his country.

When he arrived off the mouth of the Pulangui with his enormous fleet, their numbers were so great that the horizon could not be seen in any direction.

When Bantugan saw this display of force, his heart sank within him, for he saw that he and his country were doomed to destruction, as he could not hope to gain in a fight with so formidable an antagonist, and such great superiority in numbers. They called a meeting of all the dattos and none could offer any advice, so Bantugan arose and said, "My brothers, the Christian dogs have come to destroy the land, and we cannot successfully oppose them, yet we can die in defense of the fatherland."

So the great warship of Bantugan was again prepared and all the soldiers of Islam embarked thereon, and all their dattos, and with Bantugan standing at the bow they sailed forth to meet their fate. As they approached the Spanish fleet, Bantugan shouted forth his war-song.

"With my campilan which kills many, with my bloody campilan, shining with its gold ornaments, its bombol (a tassel of red hair attached to the handle of the campilan) made from the hair of a beautiful widow, which flashes like the ray of the sun at sunrise. With the beauty of its golden grip coming from the heaven heavenly. Its edge sharp as lightning and reaching even to the heavens. Flashing of its own accord and thirsting for the blood of the Christian dogs, I take it in my hands with such force that the gems in my rings burst from their settings, and fly away like birds. I take my shield painted by my sister, inlaid with flashing pearl. Its grip made of pure gold. Its button a great brilliant. My belt of golden snake. My amulets of pearl, the buttons on my armor taken from the stars. My turban of silver cloth and my helmet of gold. I go to my death, but with me shall die many of ye, Christian dogs."

The fighting soon became fast and furious, but in less than a day it was plainly seen that the Spaniards were winning, and the great warship of Bantugan was filling with water until at last it sank, drawing with it hundreds of the Spaniard's ships, and then a strange thing happened. At the very point where Bantugan's warship sank there arose from the sea a great island covered with bongo palms.

The wife of Bantugan, when she saw that her husband was no more and that his warship was destroyed, gathered together the remaining warriors and set forth herself to avenge him. In a few hours her ship was also sunk and in the place where it sank there arose the mountain of Timaco.

This is the Moro version of the Spanish occupation of Mindanao. Bongos Island is situated about three miles off the mouth of the Rio Grande de Mindanao and is the island said by the Moros to have arisen where Bantugan's ship had sunk. They say that deep within its mountains lives Bantugan and his warriors, and that whenever a Moro's vinta or sailing boat passes by Bongos Island, Bantugan has watchers out to see whether or not there are women in the vinta, and if there are any that suit his fancy, they are snatched from their seats and carried deep into the interior of the mountain. For this reason the Moro women are very reluctant to go to the island of Bongos or even to sail by it.

Timaco is an island marking the south side of the entrance to the north branch of the Rio Grande de Mindanao. It consists of one tall hill thickly covered with trees, and on it are found the only specimens of the "white monkey." These are said by the Moros to be the servants of Bantugan's wife, who lives in the center of the mountain. A Moro would not hurt one of them, but feeds them regularly. It is said that on a still day if one goes high up the mountain and listens carefully, he can hear the chanting and singing of the waiting girls of the wife of Bantugan and also hear the colingtangan (Moro musical instrument like a xylophone).

THE MONKEY AND THE TORTOISE

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Benedict, Laura Watson. "Bagobo Myths." The Journal of American Folklore 26 (1913): 58–62.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Mindinao

National Origin: Philippines

---

This tale casts a series of characters in the trickster role. The scatology is typical of tricksters cross-culturally. The widely known ploy that is at the heart of "The Briar Patch Punishment for Rabbit" (AT 1310) is used by the tortoise to escape the monkey's revenge.

---

One day, when a Tortoise was crawling slowly along by a stream, he saw a baby-monkey drinking water. Presently the Monkey ran up to the Tortoise, and said, "Let's go and find something to eat."

Not far from the stream there was a large field full of banana trees. They looked up, and saw clusters of ripe fruit.

“That’s fine!” said the Monkey, “for I’m hungry and you’re hungry too. You climb first, Tortoise.”

Then the Tortoise crawled slowly up the trunk; but he had got up only a little distance when the Monkey chattered these words, “Roro s’punno, roro s’ pun-nol” (“Slide down, slide down, Tortoise!”).

At once the Tortoise slipped and fell down. Then he started again to climb the tree; and again the Monkey said, “Roro s’punno!” and again the Tortoise slipped and fell down. He tried over and over again; but every time he failed, for the Monkey always said, “Roro s’pinnno!” and made him fall. At last he got tired and gave it up, saying to the Monkey, “Now you try it.”

“It’s too bad!” said the Monkey, “when we’re both so hungry.” Then the Monkey made just three jumps, and reached the ripe fruit. “Wait till I taste and see if they’re sweet,” he cried to the Tortoise, while he began to eat bananas as fast as he could.

“Give me some,” begged the Tortoise.

“All right!” shouted the Monkey, “but I forgot to notice whether it was sweet.” And he kept on eating, until more than half of the fruit was gone.

“Drop down just one to me!” pleaded the Tortoise.

“Yes, in a minute,” mumbled the Monkey.

At last, when but three bananas were left on the tree, the Monkey called, “Look up! Shut your eyes.”

The Tortoise did so. The Monkey then told him to open his mouth, and he obeyed. Then the Monkey said, “I’ll peel this one piece of banana for you.”

Now, the Monkey was sitting on a banana leaf, directly over the Tortoise; but, instead of banana, he dropped his excrement into the Tortoise’s mouth. The Tortoise screamed with rage; but the Monkey jumped up and down, laughing at him. Then he went on eating the remainder of the bananas.

The Tortoise then set himself to work at making a little hut of bamboo posts, with a roof and walls of leaves. The upper ends of the bamboo he sharpened, and let them project through the roof; but the sharp points were concealed by the leaves. It was like a trap for pigs (sankil).

When the Monkey came down from the banana tree, the Tortoise said, “You climb this other tall tree, and look around at the sky. If the sky is dark, you must call to me; for the rain will soon come. Then you jump down on the roof of our little house here. Never mind if it breaks in, for we can soon build a stronger one.”

The Monkey accordingly climbed the tree, and looked at the sky. “It is all very dark!” he exclaimed.

“Jump quick, then!” cried the Tortoise.

So the Monkey jumped; but he got killed from the sharp bamboo points on which he landed.

Then the Tortoise made a fire, and roasted the Monkey. He cut off the Monkey's ears, and they turned into buyo-leaves. He cut out the heart, and it turned into betel-nut. He took out the brain, and it became lime (apog). He made that all into pungaman. The stomach he made into a basket. He put into the basket the betel and the lime and the pungaman and the buyo, and crawled away.

Soon he heard the noise of many animals gathered together. He found the monkeys and the deer and the pigs and the wild birds having a big rice-planting. All the animals were rejoiced to see the Tortoise coming with a basket, for they all wanted to chew betel. The monkeys ran up, chattering, and tried to snatch the betel-nuts; but the Tortoise held them back, saying, "Wait a minute! By and by I will give you some."

Then the monkeys sat around, waiting, while the Tortoise prepared the betel-nut. He cut the nuts and the pungaman into many small pieces, and the buyo-leaf too, and gave them to the monkeys and the other animals. Everybody began to chew; and the Tortoise went away to a distance about the length of one field (sebad kinamat), where he could get out of sight, under shelter of some trees. Then he called to the monkeys, "All of you are eating monkey, just like your own body: you are chewing up one of your own family."

At that, all the monkeys were angry, and ran screaming to catch the Tortoise. But the Tortoise had hid under the felled trunk of an old palma brava tree. As each monkey passed close by the trunk where the Tortoise lay concealed, the Tortoise said, "Drag your member [that is, penis]! Here's a felled tree."

Thus every monkey passed by clear of the trunk, until the last one came by; and he was both blind and deaf. When he followed the rest, he could not hear the Tortoise call out, "Scapa tapol basic"; and his member struck against the fallen trunk. He stopped, and became aware of the Tortoise underneath. Then he screamed to the rest; and all the monkeys came running back, and surrounded the Tortoise, threatening him.

"What do you want?" inquired the Tortoise.

"You shall die," cried the monkeys. "Tell us what will kill you. We will chop you to pieces with the axe."

"Oh, no! That won't hurt me in the least," replied the Tortoise. "You can see the marks on my shell, where my father used to cut my body: but that didn't kill me."

"We will put you in the fire, then, and burn you to death," chorused the monkeys. "Will that do?"

"Fire does not hurt me," returned the Tortoise. "Look at my body! See how brown it is where my father used to stick me into the fire."

"What, then, is best to kill you?" urged the monkeys.

"The way to kill me," replied the Tortoise, "is to take the punch used for brass, and run it into my rectum. Then throw me into the big pond, and drown me."

Then the monkeys did as they were told, and threw him into the pond. But the Tortoise began to swim about in the water.

Exultantly he called to the monkeys, "This is my own home: you see I don't drown." And the lake was so deep that the monkeys could not get him.

Then the monkeys hurried to and fro, summoning all the animals in the world to drink the water in the lake. They all came—deer, pigs, jungle-fowl, monkeys, and all the rest—and began to drink. They covered their pagindis [urethras] with leaves, so that the water could not run out of their bodies. After a time, they had drunk so much that the lake became shallow, and one could see the Tortoise's back.

But the red-billed bakaka-bird that lived in a tree by the water was watching; and as quick as the back of the Tortoise came into sight, the bird flew down and picked off the leaves from the pagindis of the deer. Then the water ran out from their bodies until the lake rose again, and covered the Tortoise. Satisfied, the bird flew back into the tree. But the deer got fresh leaves to cover their pagindis, and began to drink again. Then the bird flew to the monkeys, and began to take the leaves from their pagindis; but one monkey saw him doing it, and slapped him. This made the bird fall down, and then all the monkeys left the Tortoise in the lake, and ran to revenge themselves on the bird.

They snatched him up, pulled out every one of his feathers with their fingers, and laid him naked upon the stump of a tree. All the animals went home, leaving the bird on the stump.

Two days later, one Monkey came to look at the Bakaka. Little feathers were beginning to grow out; but the Monkey thought the bird was dead.

"Maggots are breeding in it," said the Monkey.

Three more days passed, and then the Monkey came again. The Bakaka's feathers had grown out long by that time; and the Monkey said, "It was all rotten, and the pigs ate it."

But the bird had flown away. He flew to the north until he reached a meadow with a big tual tree in the middle. The tree was loaded with ripe fruit.' Perched on one of the branches, the bird ate all he wanted, and when done he took six of the fruit of the tual, and made a necklace for himself. With this hung round his neck, he flew to the house where the old Monkey lived, and sat on the roof. He dropped one tual through the roof, and it fell down on the floor, where all the little monkey-children ran for it, dancing and screaming.

"Don't make such a noise!" chided the old Monkey, "and do not take the tual, for the Bakaka will be angry, and he is a great bird."

But the bird flew down into the house, and gave one tual to the old Monkey.

"That is good," said the old Monkey, tasting it. "Tell me where you got it." But the bird would not tell. Then the old monkey stood up, and kissed him, and begged to be taken to the tual tree.

At last the Bakaka said to all the monkeys, "Three days from now you may all go to the tual tree. I want you all to go, the blind monkey too. Go to the meadow where the grass grows high, and there, in the center of the meadow, is the tual tree. If you see the sky and the air black, do not speak a word; for if you speak, you will get sick.”

At the set time, all the monkeys started for the meadow, except one female monkey that was expecting a baby. The deer and all the other animals went along, except a few of the females who could not go. They all reached the meadow-grass; and the monkeys climbed up the tual tree that stood in the center of the field, until all the branches were full of monkeys. The birds and the jungle-fowl flew up in the tree; but the deer and the other animals waited down on the ground.

Then the sky grew black, for the Bakaka and the Tortoise were going around the meadow with lighted sticks of balekayo, and setting fire to the grass. The air was full of smoke, and the little monkeys were crying; but the old Monkey bit them, and said, “Keep still, for the Bakaka told us not to speak.”

But the meadow-grass was all ablaze, and the flames crept nearer and nearer to the tual tree. Then all the monkeys saw the fire, and cried, “Oh! What will become of us?”

Some of the birds and most of the chickens flew away; but some died in the flames. A few of the pigs ran away, but most of them died. The other animals were burned to death. Not a single monkey escaped, save only the female monkey who staid at home. When her baby was born, it was a boy-monkey. The mother made it her husband, and from this pair came many monkeys.

It was the same with the deer. All were burned, except one doe who stayed at home. When her little fawn was born, it was a male. She made it her husband, and from this one pair came many deer.

POOR LITTLE MARIA

Tradition Bearer: Cornelio

Source: Gardner, Fletcher, and W. W. Newell. “Filipino (Tagalog) Versions of Cinderella.” Journal of American Folklore 19 (1906): 265–270.

Date: 1903

Original Source: Tagalog

National Origin: Philippines

---

“Poor Little Maria” consists of two folktales that merge at the conclusion of the narrative. The first tale, is a Filipino adaptation of “Cinderella” (AT 510A). After the marriage of Maria to the king, the tale plot is extended with a variant of “The Three Golden Sons” (AT 707). The combination of these two tales is uncommon.

---

Once there were a man and his wife who had a daughter named Maria. Maria was a very pretty child and very happy, but unfortunately her father fell in love with a woman who was not his wife, and one day taking his wife out to fish with him he murdered her and threw her body into the water.

Poor little Maria cried a great deal after her mother's death, but her lot was worse after her father married the other woman, for the stepmother set her all kinds of cruel tasks and threatened her with awful penalties if she failed.

Maria had a pet pig, with which she played a great deal, and her stepmother ordered her to kill and clean it. Poor little Maria cried and begged, but the woman forced her to kill the pig. When the pig was cleaned, the stepmother gave Maria ten of the refuse pieces and told her to clean them in the river, and if one piece was missing when she returned, she would be beaten to death. Maria cleaned the pieces in the river, but one slipped away and went down stream.

The child cried and lamented over her fate so that an old crocodile going by asked her what was amiss. "That is nothing," said the crocodile, and he straightway swam after the piece and brought it back. As he turned to swim away, he splashed with his tail and a drop of water fell on her forehead where it became a most beautiful jewel, flashing like the sun and fastened so tightly that it could not be removed.

The little girl went home with the jewel on her forehead shining so brightly that it made every one cross-eyed to look at it, so that it had to be covered with a handkerchief.

The cruel stepmother asked many questions about Maria's good fortune, and when she found out all about it she sent her own daughter to kill a pig and do in all respects as the stepsister had done.

She did so and threw a piece of the refuse meat into the river and cried as it floated off.

The crocodile inquired of this girl also the cause of the trouble, and again brought the meat, but this time when he splashed with his tail, instead of a jewel on the girl's forehead, there was a little bell that tinkled incessantly. All the people knelt and crossed themselves because they thought the "Viaticum" passed, but when they saw the bell on the girl's forehead they laughed and pointed at her. So the daughter had to tie up her forehead for shame, for the bell could not be gotten off.

The stepmother was more cruel than ever to Maria now that she had met with good fortune and her daughter with ill. She set the girl to every kind of dirty work till her whole body was filthy and then sent her to the river to bathe, telling her that if she did not wash her back clean she would beat her to death.

Maria struggled and scrubbed, but she could not reach her back either to see whether it was clean or to wash it, and she began to cry. Out of the river came a great she-crab, that asked the girl her trouble.

“Oh,” said Maria, “if I do not wash my back clean my stepmother will beat me to death.”

“Very well,” said the crab, “that is easily remedied,” and jumping on to Maria’s back scrubbed and scrubbed till her back was perfectly clean. “Now,” said the crab, “you must eat me and take my shell home and bury it in the yard. Something will grow up that will be valuable to you.” Maria did as she was told, and from the place grew a fine lukban (grape fruit) tree which in time bore fruit.

One day the stepmother and her daughter wished to go to church and left Maria to get the dinner. The stepmother told her that dinner must be ready when she returned and must be neither cold nor hot. Maria wept again over the impossibility of the task and was about to despair when an old woman came in, to whom she told her troubles.

The old woman was a stranger but was apparently very wise, for she told Maria to go to church and that she would prepare the dinner. The girl said she had no clothes, but the old woman told her to look in the fruit of the lukban tree, and from the fruit Maria took out all the garments of a princess, a beautiful chariot and eight horses.

Quickly she bathed and arrayed herself and drove by the king’s palace to the church, the jewel on her forehead shining so that it nearly blinded all who looked. The king, seeing such a magnificently dressed princess, sent his soldiers to find out about her, but they could learn nothing and had nothing to show when they returned but one of her little slippers which fell off as she left the church.

Maria went home and hastily put the dress and equipage back into the lukban fruit, and the old woman was there waiting with the dinner, which was neither cold nor hot. When the stepmother came from church, she saw only her stepdaughter there in rags, and everything ready according to her order.

Now the king wished to know who this princess was and ordered a “bando” sent around to every woman and girl in the kingdom, saying he would marry whomever the shoe would fit. The stepmother and her daughter went to the palace, but tied Maria in a sack and set her in the fireplace, telling her that she would be beaten to death if she stirred. The shoe fitted nobody at the palace; whether their feet were long, short, broad, narrow, big, little, or otherwise, it fitted no one.

So the soldiers were sent out again to bring in every one who had not obeyed the “bando” and they looked into the house where Maria lived, but they did not see her. Just then a cock crowed and said, “Kikiriki, that’s the girl.” Kikiriki, there in the fireplace; the shoe fits her foot.” So the soldiers made Maria dress in her finery with the mate to her little slipper on her foot, and with her little chariot and the eight ponies she went to the king’s palace, and the other little slipper fitted exactly.

The stepmother and her daughter were envious, but could do nothing against the king’s wishes, and the king married Maria with great pomp, but none of the jewels were so beautiful as the one that blazed on Maria’s forehead.

In due time it came to be known that an heir would be born, but the king was called away to war. He arranged that a signal should be set, however, a white flag if all went well and a black flag if anything went wrong.

He left the princess in the care of her stepmother and two wise women, and warned them not to let anything bad happen to the queen. The stepmother had not forgotten her hate for Maria, and when the little princes were born, for there were seven, she and the other women took them away and substituted seven little blind puppies.

When the king returned he saw the black flag flying over the tower and hurried to the queen's rooms to find her in tears over the puppies. He ordered the puppies drowned and his wife put into a corner under the staircase, until a place could be built for her. Then he had a hut built outside the palace and placed the queen there in chains.

The seven little princes, stolen from their mother, were put into a box which was cast into the sea and which drifted far away to a shore near an enchanter's cave. This enchanter had an oracle which spoke to him and said, "Go by the mountains and you will be sad, go by the shore and you will be glad," as he was setting out for his daily walk. Obedient to the oracle, he went to the shore and there heard the crying of the babies. He secured the box and carried it and the babies to his cave, and there they lived for several years untroubled.

One day a hunter, chasing deer with dogs, went by that way and saw the children. He returned to town and told what he had seen, and it came to the ears of the old women. They, being afraid that the king would learn of the children's being there, made "maruya," which is a kind of sweetmeat, and mixed poison with it. Then they went out to where the children were and gave them the poisoned sweets, so that they all died. When night came the enchanter was greatly troubled because the children did not come, and taking a torch he set out to look for them. He found the little bodies lying at the foot of a tree, and wept long and bitterly. At last he took them to his cave and laid them in a row on the floor and wept again.

As he lamented he heard the voice of the oracle, which was like a beautiful woman's voice, accompanied by a harp, singing most sweetly, and bidding him beg a medicine of the mother of the Sun, who lives in the house of the Sun across seven mountains to the west. This, she promised, would restore them to life.

So he set out on his long journey, and when he had crossed three mountains he came to a tree on which the birds never lit, and the tree was lamenting the fact. The enchanter inquired the way to the Sun's house, and the tree told him thus and so, but begged him to ask the mother of the Sun why the birds never lit on it. The enchanter went on, and on the next mountain he saw two men sitting in a pair of balances, which pitched up and down like a barca (boat) in a storm. From them he asked again the way to the Sun's house, and they told him and asked him to speak to the mother of the Sun as to why they were condemned to ride the limb of a tree like a boat in a storm.

He went on to the next mountain and there he saw two poor, lean cattle feeding on rich grass. From them also he inquired the direction of the Sun's house, and they told him and requested that he ask the mother of the Sun why they were always lean and fed on rich herbage. He promised and passed on to the next mountain, and there he saw a black ox eating nothing but earth and still fat and sleek. This animal told him how to find the Sun's house and wished to know of the mother of the Sun why he was always fat though he ate only dust.

The enchanter gave his word and went on. At last, late in the afternoon, he arrived at the Sun's house and went boldly upstairs. The mother of the Sun met him and inquired his business, which he told her, and then she told him that he was in great danger, for if her son, the Sun, came home and found him there he would eat him. The enchanter told her that he would not go away without the medicine, and at last the mother of the Sun agreed to hide him; so she wrapped him up so that the Sun could not smell him when he came in and carried him up to the seventh story of the house. There he was to remain until the next morning after the Sun had started off on his journey across the Heavens.

Soon the Sun came in and asked his mother where the man was, but his mother told him there was none and gave him such a fine supper that he forgot about the man, though he remarked once or twice that he certainly thought he smelled man. At last morning came, and when the Sun was far enough away to leave no danger, the mother of the Sun gave the enchanter the medicine that he wanted and started him off on his long journey. She told him, too, the answer to the questions asked by the cattle, the men, and the tree.

When he came to the black ox which lived on the dust, he told it that it was always fat because it was going to Heaven, and it was glad.

To the two oxen which fed on rich pasture and yet were poor, he said that they were so because they were condemned to Hell, and they were sorrowful.

To the men sitting in the pair of balances, he said that they were there because of their sins, and they became sad.

To the tree on which the birds never lit, he said that it was because it was made out of silver and gold, and the tree rustled its leaves in pride.

Finally he came to his cave, and there instead of the bodies of seven young children he saw the bodies of seven handsome young men, for they had grown greatly while he was away. He gave them the medicine, and they at once stood up. Then he told them all of his adventures.

When the boys heard the story, the youngest, who was a dare-devil, set out to find the gold and silver tree and from its branches he shook down a great quantity of gold and silver leaves, which he carried back to the enchanter. The enchanter was proud of the boy and yet angry with him for his rashness, but no one could be angry with him for long, for he was a gentle lad.

The enchanter then took the gold and silver and made clothes for them of cloth of gold, silver sabers, golden belts, and a golden trumpet for the youngest, and sent them away on a Sunday morning to church in the city where the king lived. As they came up close to the city wall, the trumpeter lad blew a merry blast on his horn, and the king sent out to inquire who they might be and to invite them to dinner after church. So they went to the palace after church and sat down to the king's table, and the dishes were brought on. The enchanter had warned them to eat nothing until they had fed a little to a dog, and one of the boys gave some meat to a dog that was with them. The dog was dead in a moment.

The king, ashamed, ordered everything to be changed and new cooks put into the kitchen, for of course he knew nothing of the wickedness against his sons, whom he did not recognize as yet. The boys now very respectfully requested that the woman chained in the hut be brought to the table with them, though they did not know why they should ask such a thing. So the king took his sword and with his own hands, from shame, set his wife free, and had her dressed as a queen and brought to the table. The jewel still glowed on her forehead. As they sat at the table, a stream of milk miraculously coming from the breast of the mother passed to the mouth of the youngest son. Then the king understood, and when he had heard the story of the sons he put the queen again into her rightful place and caused the wicked stepmother and her two accomplices to be pulled to pieces by wild horses.

The king, the queen, and the seven princes, having made an end of their rivals, lived long and happily together.

THE FIFTY-ONE THIEVES

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Gardner, Fletcher. "Tagalog Folk-Tales I." Journal of American Folklore 20 (1907): 114–115.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Tagalog

National Origin: Philippines

---

"The Fifty-One Thieves" is a Tagalog version of "The Forty Thieves" ["Robbers Smuggled Into House in Food Containers"] (AT 954). This folktale enjoys broad distribution cross-culturally, but perhaps the best-known variant is "Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves" drawn from the Middle Eastern classic One Thousand and One Nights. Both Spanish Catholic and Muslim cultures had a profound influence of the culture of the Philippines from the European Renaissance to the present day. Therefore, the Tagalog variant could have been derived from either European or Middle Eastern (Southwest Asian) sources.

---

There were once two brothers, Juan and Pedro. Pedro was rich and was the elder, but Juan was very poor and gained his living by cutting wood. Juan became so poor at last that he was forced to ask alms from his brother, or what was only the same thing, a loan. After much pleading, Pedro gave his brother enough rice for a single meal, but repenting of such generosity, went and took it off the fire, as his brother's wife was cooking it, and carried it home again.

Juan then set out for the woods, thinking he might be able to find a few sticks that he could exchange for something to eat, and went much farther than he was accustomed to go. He came to a road he did not know and followed it for some distance to where it led to a great rocky bluff and there came to an end.

Juan did not know exactly what to think of such an abrupt ending to the roadway, and sat down behind a large rock to meditate. As he sat there a voice within the cliff said, "Open the door," and a door in the cliff opened itself. A man richly dressed came out, followed by several others, whom he told that they were going to a town at a considerable distance. He then said, "Shut the door," and the door closed itself again.

Juan was not sure whether any one else was inside, but he was no coward and besides he thought he might as well be murdered as starved to death, so when the robbers had ridden away to a safe distance without seeing him, he went boldly up to the cliff and said, "Open the door."

The door opened as obediently to him as to the robber, and he went in. He found himself inside a great cavern filled with money, jewels, and rich stuffs of every kind.

Hastily gathering more than enough gold and jewels to make him rich, he went outside, not forgetting to say, "Close the door," and went back to his house.

Having hidden all but a little of his new wealth, he wished to change one or two of his gold pieces for silver so that he could buy something to eat. He went to his brother's house to ask him for the favor, but Pedro was not at home, and his wife, who was at least as mean as Pedro, would not change the money. After a while Pedro came home, and his wife told him that Juan had some money; and Pedro, hoping in turn to gain some advantage, went to Juan's house and asked many questions about the money. Juan told him that he had sold some wood in town and had been paid in gold, but Pedro did not believe him and hid himself under the house to listen. At night he heard Juan talking to his wife, and found out the place and the password. Immediately taking three horses to carry his spoils, he set out for the robbers' cave.

Once arrived, he went straight to the cliff and said, "Open the door," and the door opened immediately. He went inside and said, "Close the door," and the door closed tight. He gathered together fifteen great bags of money, each all he could lift, and carried them to the door ready to put on the horses. He found all the rich food and wine of the robbers in the cave, and could not resist the temptation to make merry at their expense; so he ate their food and drank their fine wines till he was foolishly drunk. When he had reached this state, he began to think of returning home. Beating on the door with both hands, he cried out, "Open, beast. Open, fool. May lightning blast you if you do not open!" and a hundred other foolish things, but never once saying, "Open the door."

While he was thus engaged, the robbers returned, and hearing them coming he hid under a great pile of money with only his nose sticking out. The robbers saw that some one had visited the cave in their absence and hunted for the intruder till one of them discovered him trembling under a heap of coin. With a shout they hauled him forth and beat him until his flesh hung in ribbons. Then they split him into halves and threw the body into the river, and cut his horses into bits, which they threw after him.

When Pedro did not return, his wife became anxious and told Juan where he had gone. Juan stole quietly to the place by night, and recovered the body, carried it home, and had the pieces sewn together by the tailor.

Now the robbers knew that they had been robbed by some one else, and so, when Pedro's body was taken away, the captain went to town to see who had buried the body, and by inquiring, found that Juan had become suddenly rich, and also that it was his brother who had been buried.

So the captain of the robbers went to Juan's house, where he found a ball going on. Juan knew the captain again and that he was asking many questions, so he made the captain welcome and gave him a great deal to eat and drink. One of the servants came in and pretended to admire the captain's sword till he got it into his own hands; and then he began to give an exhibition of fencing, making the sword whirl hither and thither and ending with a wonderful stroke that made the captain's head roll on the floor.

A day or two later, the lieutenant also came to town, and began to make inquiries concerning the captain. He soon found out that the captain had been killed in Juan's house, but Juan now had soldiers on guard at his door, so that it was necessary to use strategy. He went to Juan and asked if he could start a "tienda," or wine-shop, and Juan, who recognized the lieutenant, said, "Yes." Then the lieutenant went away, soon returning with seven great casks, in each of which he had seven men.

These he stored under Juan's house until such time as Juan, being asleep, could be killed with certainty and little danger. When this was done, he went into the house, intending to make Juan drunk and then kill him as Juan had the captain. Juan, however, got the lieutenant drunk first, and soon his head, like the captain's, rolled on the floor.

The soldiers below, like all soldiers, wished to have a drink from the great casks, and so one of them took a borer and bored into one of the casks. As he did so, a voice whispered, "Is Juan asleep yet?"

The soldier replied, "Not yet," and went and told Juan. The casks by his order were all put into a boat, loaded with stones and chains, and thrown into the sea. So perished the last of the robbers.

Juan, being no longer in fear of the robbers, often went to their cave, and helped himself to everything that he wanted. He finally became a very great and wealthy man.

JUAN THE FOOL

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Gardner, Fletcher. "Tagalog Folk-Tales I." Journal of American Folklore 20 (1907): 106–107.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Tagalog

National Origin: Philippines

---

In the folklore of the Philippines, the figure of "Juan" (or often "Juan Puson" in Tagalog folktales) is the archetypal trickster, numskull, and ne'er-do-well rolled into one conventional character. In the following tale modeled on "The Table, the Ass and the Stick" (AT 563), Juan succeeds in spite of himself.

---

Juan was lazy, Juan was a fool, and his mother never tired of scolding him and emphasizing her words by a beating. When Juan went to school he made more noise at his study than anybody else, but his reading was only gibberish. His mother sent him to town to buy meat to eat with the boiled rice, and he bought a live crab which he set down in the road and told to go to his mother and be cooked for dinner. The crab promised, but as soon as Juan's back was turned ran in the other direction.

Juan went home after a while and asked for the crab, but there was none, and they ate their rice without ulam [relish to be eaten with rice, meat especially]. His mother then went herself and left Juan to care for the baby. The baby cried and Juan examined it to find the cause, and found the soft spot on its head. "Aha! It has a boil. No wonder it cries!" And he stuck a knife into the soft spot, and the baby stopped crying. When his mother came back, Juan told her about the boil and that the baby was now asleep, but the mother said it was dead, and she beat Juan again.

Then she told Juan that if he could do nothing else he could at least cut firewood, so she gave him a bolo [machete] and sent him to the woods.

He found what looked to him like a good tree and prepared to cut it, but the tree was a magic tree and said to Juan, "Do not cut me and I will give you a goat that shakes silver money from its whiskers." Juan agreed, and the bark of the tree opened and the goat came out, and when Juan told him to shake his whiskers, money dropped out. Juan was very glad, for at last he had something he would not be beaten for. On his way home he met a friend, and told him of his good fortune. The man made him dead drunk and substituted another goat which had not the ability to shake money from its whiskers, and when the new goat was tried at home poor Juan was beaten and scolded.

Back he went to the tree, which he threatened to cut down for lying to him, but the tree said, "No, do not kill me and I will give you a magic net which you may cast even on dry ground or into a treetop and it will return full of fish," and the tree did even so.

Again he met the friend, again he drank tuba [fermented juice of cocoa, buri, or nipa palms] until he was dead drunk, and again a worthless thing was substituted, and on reaching home he was beaten and scolded.

Once more Juan went to the magic tree, and this time he received a magic pot, always full of rice; and spoons always full of whatever ulam might be wished, and these went the way of the other gifts, to the false friend.

The fourth time he asked of the tree he was given a magic stick that would without hands beat and kill anything that the owner wished. "Only say to it 'Boombye, boomba,' and it will obey your word," said the tree.

When Juan met the false friend again, the false friend asked him what gift he had this time. "It is only a stick that if I say, 'Boombye, boomba,' will beat you to death," said Juan, and with that the stick leaped from his hand and began to belabor the wicked man. "Stop it and I will give you everything I stole from you." Juan ordered the stick to stop, but made the man, bruised and sore, carry the net, the pot, and the spoons, and lead the goat to Juan's home. There the goat shook silver from his beard till Juan's three brothers and his mother had all they could carry, and they dined from the pot and the magic spoons until they were full to their mouths.

"Now," said Juan, "you have beaten me and called me a fool all my life, but you are not ashamed to take good things when I get them. I will show you something else. Boombye, boomba!" and the stick began to beat them all. Quickly they agreed that Juan was head of the house, and he ordered the beating to stop.

Juan now became rich and respected, but he never trusted himself far from his stick day or night. One night a hundred robbers came to break into the house, to take all his goods, and kill him, but he said to the stick, "Boombye, boomba!" and with the swiftness of lightning the stick flew around, and all those struck fell dead till there was not one left. Juan was never troubled again by robbers, and in the end married a princess and lived happily ever after.

THE STORY OF JUAN AND THE MONKEY

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Gardner, Fletcher. "Tagalog Folk-Tales I." Journal of American Folklore 20 (1907): 108-109.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Tagalog

National Origin: Philippines

In this Filipino variant of “Puss in Boots” (AT 545B), the protagonist is localized to a poor farmer rather than an orphaned youngest sibling. Rather than inheriting an animal helper as in the classic versions of this tale type, Juan spares a monkey who has been raiding his crops, thus introducing the “Animal Grateful for Rescue from Peril of Death” motif (B360). The asuang whose wealth the monkey cleverly appropriates after killing him is a creature from Filipino folklore. The asuang is a human who has acquired supernatural powers by eating human flesh. It is a shape-shifter and possesses the power to cause harm and even death by the use of its spells.

Juan was a farmer, a farmer so poor that he had only one shirt and one pair of trousers. Juan was much annoyed by monkeys, who stole his corn. So he set a trap and caught several of them. These he killed with a club until he came to the last, which said to him, “Juan, don’t kill me and I will be your servant all your life.”

“But I will,” said Juan. “You are a thief and do not deserve to live.”

“Juan, let me live, and I will bring you good fortune, and if you kill me you will be poor all your life.” The monkey talked so eloquently that Juan let himself be persuaded, and took the monkey home with him. The monkey was true to his word, and served Juan faithfully, cooking, washing, and hunting food for him, and at night going to distant fields and stealing maize and palay [rice] which he added to Juan’s little store.

One day the monkey said to Juan, “Juan, why do you not marry?”

Said Juan, “How can I marry? I have nothing to keep a wife.”

“Take my advice,” said the monkey, “and you can marry the king’s daughter.” Juan took the monkey’s advice and they set out for the king’s palace. Juan remained behind while the monkey went up to the palace alone.

Outside he called, as the custom is, “Honorable people!” and the king said, “Come in.”

The king said, “Monkey, where do you walk?” and the monkey said, “Mr. King, I wish to borrow your salop. My master wishes to measure his money.”

The king lent him the salop (a measure of about two quarts), and the monkey returned to Juan. After a few hours he returned it with a large copper piece cunningly stuck to the bottom with paste. The king saw it and called the monkey’s attention to it, but the monkey haughtily waved his hand, and told the king that a single coin was of no consequence to his master.

The next day he borrowed the salop again and the coin stuck in the bottom was half a peso, and the third day the coin was a peso, but these he assured the king were of no more consequence to his master than the copper. Then the king told the monkey to bring his master to call, and the monkey promised that after a few days he would.

They went home, and as Juan's clothes must be washed, Juan went to bed while the monkey washed and starched them, pulling, pressing, and smoothing them with his hands because he had no iron.

Then they went to call on the king, and the king told Juan that he should marry the princess as soon as he could show the king a large house, with a hundred head of cattle, carabao [domesticated water buffalo], horses, sheep, and goats. Juan was very despondent at this, though he was too brave to let the king know his thoughts. He told his troubles to the monkey, who assured him that the matter was very easy.

The next day they took a drum and a shovel and went into the mountains, where there was a great enchanter who was a very wealthy man and also an asuang. They dug a great hole and then Juan hid in the woods and began to beat his drum, and the monkey rushed up to the enchanter's house and told him the soldiers were coming, and that he would hide him. So the enchanter went with the monkey to the hole and the monkey pushed him in and began with hands and feet to cover him up. Juan helped, and soon the enchanter was dead and buried. Then they went to the house and at the first door they opened they liberated fifty people who were being fattened for the enchanter's table. These people were glad to help Juan convey all the money, cattle, and all the enchanter's wealth to the town. Juan built a house on the plaza, married the princess, and lived happily ever after, but his friend the monkey, having so well earned his liberty, he sent back to the woods, and their friendship still continued.

JUAN PUSONG

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Maxfield, Berton L., and W. H. Millington. "Visayan Folk-Tales I." Journal of American Folklore 19 (1902): 107–112.

Date: 1904

Original Source: Panay, Visayan

National Origin: Philippines

---

Juan Pusong ("Tricky John") is the prototypical trickster among the people of the Visayas, the central cluster of the Philippine Islands located between Luzon to the north and Mindanao to the south. As is the case with tricksters cross-culturally, Juan Pusong is cunning, dishonest, and willing to sacrifice friends and family to his own ends. In this tradition, as in many others in Southeast Asia, the trickster often comes to a bad end.

---

As the name implies, he is represented as being deceitful and dishonest, sometimes very cunning, and, in some of the stories told of him, endowed with miraculous power. The stories are very simple and of not very great excellence. The few which follow will serve as samples of the narratives told of this popular hero.

Juan Pusong was a lazy boy. Neither punishment nor the offer of a reward could induce him to go to school, but in school-time he was always to be found on the plaza, playing with the other boys.

His mother, however, believed him to be in school, and each day prepared some dainty for him to eat upon his return home. Juan was not satisfied with deceiving his mother in this way, but used to play tricks on her.

“Mother,” he said, one day, “I have already learned to be a seer and to discover what is hidden. This afternoon when I come home from school I will foretell what you have prepared for me.”

“Will you?” said his mother joyfully, for she believed all he said, I will try to prepare something new and you will not be able to guess it.”

“I shall, mother, I shall, let it be whatever it may,” answered Juan.

When it was time to go to school, Juan pretended to set out, but instead he climbed a tree which stood near the kitchen, and hiding himself among the leaves, watched through the window all that his mother did.

His mother baked a bibingca, or cake made of rice and sweet potato, and hid it in a jar. “I will bet anything,” she said, “that my son will not guess what it is.” Juan laughed at his mother’s self-conceit.

When it was time for school to close he got down, and with a book in his hand, as though he had really come from school, appeared before his mother and said Mother, I know what you are keeping for me.”

“What is it?” asked his mother.

The prophecy that I have just learned at school says that there is a bibingca hidden in the olla [jar].”

The mother became motionless with surprise. “Is it possible?” she asked herself, “my son is indeed a seer. I am going to spread it abroad. My son is a seer.”

The news was spread far and wide and many people came to make trial of Pusong’s powers. In these he was always successful, thanks to his ability to cheat.

One day a ship was anchored in the harbor. She had come from a distant island. Her captain had heard of Pusong’s power and wished to try him. The trial consisted in foretelling how many seeds the oranges with which his vessel was loaded contained. He promised to give Juan a great quantity of money if he could do this.

Pusong asked for a day's time. That night he swam out to the vessel, and, hidden in the water under the ship's stern, listened to the conversation of the crew. Luckily they were talking about this very matter of the oranges, and one of them inquired of the captain what kind of oranges he had.

"My friend," said the captain, "these oranges are different from any in this country, for each contains but one seed."

Pusong had learned all that he needed to know, so he swam back to the shore, and the next morning announced that he was ready for the trial.

Many people had assembled to hear the great seer. Pusong continued to read in his book, as though it was the source of his information. The hour agreed upon struck, and the captain of the vessel handed an orange to Juan and said, "Mr. Pusong, you may tell us how many seeds this orange contains."

Pusong took the orange and smelled it. Then he opened his book and after a while said, "This orange you have presented me with contains but one seed."

The orange was cut and but the one seed found in it, so Pusong was paid the money. Of course he obtained a great reputation throughout the country, and became very rich.

Juan Pusong's father drove his cows out one day to pasture. Juan slipped secretly from the house, and going to the pasture, took the cows into the forest and tied them there. When his father was going for the cows he met Juan and asked, "Where did you come from?"

The boy replied, "I have just come from school. What are you looking for?"

"I am looking for our cows," said his father.

"Why, didn't you tell me that before," asked Juan. "Wait a minute," and he took his little book from his pocket and, looking into it, said, "Our cows are in such a place in the forest, tied together. Go and get them." So his father went to the place where Juan said the cows were and found them.

Afterwards it was discovered that Juan could not read even his own name, so his father beat him for the trick he had played.

Pusong had transgressed the law, and was for this reason put into a cage to be in a short time submerged with it into the sea.

Tabloc-lai, a friend of Pusong's, passed by and saw him in the cage. What are you there for?" Tabloc-lai asked.

"Oh!" answered Pusong, "I am a prisoner here, as you see, because the chief wants me to marry his daughter and I don't want to do it. I am to stay here until I consent."

"What a fool you are!" said Tabloc-lai. "The chief's daughter is pretty, and I am surprised that you are not willing to marry her."

"Hear me, Tabloc-lai!" said the prisoner. "If you want to marry the chief's daughter, let me out and get in here in my place; for tomorrow they will come and ask you if you will consent. Then you will be married at once."

"I am willing!" exclaimed Tabloc-lai. "Get out and I will take your place!"

Next morning the chief ordered his soldiers to take the cage with the prisoner to the sea and submerge it in the water.

Tabloc-lai, on seeing the soldiers coming toward him, thought they would make inquiries of him as Pusong had said. "I am ready now," he said, "I am ready to be the princess's husband."

"Is this crazy fellow raving?" asked the soldiers. "We are ordered to take you and submerge you in the sea."

"But," objected Tabloc-lai, "I am ready now to marry the chief's daughter."

He was carried to the sea and plunged into the water, in spite of his crying, "I am not Pusong! I am Tabloc-lai!"

The next week the chief was in his boat, going from one fish-trap to another, to inspect them. Pusong swam out to the boat.

The chief, on seeing him, wondered, for he believed that Pusong was dead. "How is this?" he asked. "Did you not drown last week?"

"By no means. I sank to the bottom, but I found that there was no water there. There is another world where the dead live again. I saw your father and he charged me to bid you go to him, and afterwards you will be able to come back here, if you wish to do so."

"Is that really true, Pusong?" asked the chief.

"Yes, it is really true," was the reply.

"Well, I will go there. I will have a cage made and go through the way you did."

So the next morning the chief was submerged in the water, with the hope of coming back. When a considerable time had elapsed without seeing his return, his servants searched for Pusong, in order to punish him, but he had escaped to the mountains.

There was once a king who had three young and beautiful daughters named Isabel, Catalina, and Maria.

In the capital city of the kingdom lived a young man known by the name of Juan Pusong. He had as friends an ape, named Amo-Mongo, and a wildcat, whose name was Singalong. The three friends were passing one day in front of the palace, and, seeing the three young ladies, were greatly charmed by their beauty.

Pusong, who posed as a young aristocrat of considerable learning, determined to go before the king and declare his love for the Princess Isabel. The king received him favorably, and offered him a seat; but Juan refused to sit down until he should know the result of his request.

The king was astonished at his manner, and asked him what he wanted. Juan replied that he had presumptuously allowed himself to be charmed by the beauty of the Princess Isabel, and humbly requested the king's consent to their marriage. The king had the princess summoned before him, and in the presence of Pusong asked her if she would accept this man as her husband. She dutifully expressed her willingness to do whatever her father wished, so the king granted the request of Pusong, who was immediately married to Isabel.

When Amo-Mongo saw how successful Pusong had been, he presented himself before the king, as his friend had done, and requested the hand of the Princess Catalina. The king, somewhat unwillingly, gave his consent, and these two were also married.

When Singalong saw to what high positions his friends had attained, he became desirous of like fortune, so he went to the king and obtained his consent to his marriage with the Princess Maria.

All three of the king's sons-in-law lived with their wives at the palace, at the king's expense. The latter seeing that his daughters' husbands were lazy fellows, determined to make them useful, so he sent Pusong and Amo-Mongo out to take charge of his estates in the country, while to Singalong he gave the oversight of the servants who worked in the kitchen of the palace.

Pusong and Amo-Mongo went out to the hacienda with the intention of doing something, but when they arrived there, they found so much to do that they concluded that it would be impossible to attend to everything and so decided to do nothing.

The latter, after merely looking over the estate, entered the forest, in order to visit his relatives there. His fellow monkeys, who knew of his marriage with the princess, believed him to be of some importance, and begged him to save them from the famine which was devastating the forest. This Amo-Mongo, with much boasting of his wealth, promised to do, declaring that at the time of harvest he would give them plenty of rice.

When Pusong and his companion returned to the palace they were asked by the king how many acres they had cleared. They replied that they had cleared and planted about one thousand acres. The king was satisfied with their answer, and, at Amo-Mongo's request, gave orders for a large quantity of rice to be carried from the store-house to the spot in the forest where his son-in-law had promised the monkeys that they should find it.

On the other hand, Singalong during the day did nothing, and as the king never saw him at work he disliked his third son-in-law very much. Yet every morning there were great piles of fish and vegetables in the palace kitchen. Amo-Mongo, knowing that his brother-in-law usually went out at night in order to bring something home, contrived to get up early and see what there was in the kitchen, so as to present it to the king as the result of his own labors. In this way, Amo-Mongo became each day dearer and dearer to the king, while Singalong became more and more disliked.

Maria knew that her husband procured their food in some way, for every morning he said to her, "All that you see here I have brought." However, the king knew nothing of all this.

When the early harvest time came, the king commanded Amo-Mongo to bring rice to make pilipig. (Rice pounded into flakes and toasted, a dish of which Filipinos are very fond.)

Amo-Mongo did not know where he could find it, but set out in the direction from which he had seen Singalong coming each morning, and soon came to an extensive rice field bearing an abundant crop. He took a goodly portion of it and, returning to the palace, had the pilipig prepared and set before the king and his household. Every one ate of it, except Singalong, who was the real owner, and his wife, who had been secretly notified by him of the truth of the matter.

Maria was greatly perplexed by what her husband had told her, so she determined one night to watch him. She discovered that, as soon as the other people were asleep, her husband became transformed into a handsome prince and left the palace, leaving behind him his cat's dress. As soon as he had gone, Maria took the cast-off clothing of her husband and cast it into the fire. Singalong smelt it burning and returned to the palace, where he found his wife and begged her to return to him his cat's dress. This she was unable to do, since it was entirely consumed. As a result, Singalong was obliged to retain the form of a prince, but he was afraid to appear before the king in this guise, and so hid himself.

In the morning, Maria went to the king and told him the truth about her husband. Her father, however, thought that she was crazy, and when she insisted, invited her to accompany him to Amo-Mongo's farm, in order to convince her of her error. Many people went with them, and Amo-Mongo led them to the farm, which was really Singalong's, but told them that it belonged to himself. Besides other things, Singalong had planted many fruits, among them atimon [melon] and candol.

Amo-Mongo, seeing the diversity of fruits, began to eat all he could, until he became unable to move a step. Whenever his wife urged him to come away, he would take an atimon under his arm and a candol or so in his hands, until at last his wife, angry at his greediness, gave him a push which caused him to fall headlong, striking his head against a stone and being instantly killed.

Then Singalong, who had secretly followed the crowd from the palace, showed himself to the king in his proper form. After making suitable explanations, he led them to a fine palace in the middle of the hacienda. There they all lived together, but Pusong and his wife, who in former times had treated Singalong very harshly, giving him only the bones and scraps from the table, were now obliged to act as servants in the kitchen of the king's new palace.

TRUTH AND FALSEHOOD

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Maxfield, Berton L., and W. H. Millington. "Visayan Folk-Tales I." Journal of American Folklore 19 (1902): 100–102.

Date: 1904

Original Source: Panay, Visayan

National Origin: Philippines

---

The fable “Truth and Falsehood” utilizes personified abstractions (that is, truth and falsehood) to make its moral point. The familiar motifs “Dead Man as Helper” (E341.1) and “Grateful Animals” (B350) are used in the plot to permit the triumph of “truth” over his resentful companion “falsehood.”

---

One day Truth started for the city to find some work. On his way he overtook Falsehood, who was going to the city for the same purpose. Falsehood asked permission to ride on the horse with Truth, and his request was granted.

On the way they questioned each other as to the sort of work they wanted. Truth stated that he intended to be a secretary, so that he might always be clean and white. Falsehood declared that he would be a cook, because then he would always have plenty of fine things to eat.

As they were riding along, they met a man carrying a corpse to the cemetery. He had no one to help him, and Truth, in his great pity for the man, jumped off his horse and helped him. After the corpse was buried, Truth asked, “Did you pray for the repose of the soul of the dead?”

“No,” was the reply, “I do not know how to pray, and I have no money to pay the priest for candles.”

Then Truth gave the man all the money he had, that he might have prayers said for the dead man, and went back to his companion.

When dinner time came, Falsehood was very angry at finding out that Truth had given all his money away, but finally proposed that they should go to the river and catch some fish for dinner. When they arrived at the river, they found some fish which had been caught in a shallow pool near the bank, and caught all they wanted. But Truth was very sorry for the fish, and threw his half back into the river. Falsehood murmured at him and said, “It would have been better for you to give them to me. If I had known that you would throw them into the river, I would not have given you any of them.”

Then they rode on. As they were going through a thick wood in the heart of the mountain they heard a noise as of crying, far away. Truth went forward to find what it was, but Falsehood, trembling with fear, hid himself close behind his comrade. At last they saw seven little eagles in a nest high in a tree. They were crying with hunger, and their mother was nowhere to be seen. Truth was sorry for them, and killed his horse, giving some of the meat to the young eagles, and spreading the rest on the ground beneath the tree, so that the mother-bird might find it.

Falsehood hated his comrade for having killed the horse, because now they were obliged to travel on foot. They went down the mountain, and entering the city, presented themselves before the king, desiring to be taken into his service, the one as secretary and the other as cook. The king granted both requests.

When Falsehood saw that his former companion sat at the table with the king and was always clean and dressed in good clothes, while he himself was dirty and had to eat in the kitchen, he was very angry and determined to do something to ruin the one whom now he hated so bitterly.

One day the king and queen went to sail on the sea. As they were far from land, the queen dropped her ring overboard. When Falsehood heard of the accident, he went to the king and said, "My Lord, the King, my friend—your secretary—has told me that he was endowed with magic powers and is able to find the queen's ring. He says if he does not find it he is willing for you to hang him."

The king immediately sent for Truth, and said to him, "Find the queen's ring without delay, or I will have you hanged early tomorrow morning."

Truth went down to the shore, but seeing how impossible it would be to find the ring, began to weep. A fish came near, and floating on top of the water, asked, "Why are you weeping?"

"I weep," Truth replied, "because the king will hang me early tomorrow morning unless I find the queen's ring, which has fallen into the sea."

The fish swam out and got the ring and gave it to Truth. Then he said, "I am one of the fishes which you found on the bank of the river and threw back into the water. As you helped me when I was in trouble, I am very glad that I have been able to help you now."

On another day, Falsehood went to the king and said, "My Lord King, do you remember what I told you the other day?"

"Yes," replied the king, "and I believe you told me the truth, as the ring has been found."

"Well," replied Falsehood, "my friend told me last night that he is a great magician and that he is willing for you to hang him in the sight of all the people, since it will not hurt him."

The king sent for Truth and told him, "I know what you have said to your friend. Tomorrow I will have you hanged in the sight of all the people, and we will see whether you are the great magician you claim to be."

That night Truth could not sleep. About midnight, as he was in great distress, a spirit suddenly appeared to him and asked what was the cause of his grief. Truth related his trouble, and the spirit said, "Do not weep. Tomorrow morning I will take your form and wear your clothes, and let them hang me."

The next morning, just at dawn, the spirit put on Truth's clothes and went out to be hanged. Many people came to see the hanging, and after it was over, returned to their homes. What was the astonishment of the king and those with him when, upon their return to the palace, they found Truth there before them, alive and well!

That night the spirit appeared to Truth and said, "I am the spirit of the dead man for whom you gave your money that prayers might be said for the repose of his soul." Then it disappeared.

On another day Falsehood appeared before the king, and said, "My Lord the King, my friend the secretary told me last night that if you would let him marry your daughter, in one night his wife should bring forth three children." The king sent for Truth and said, "I will give you my daughter to be your wife and if tonight she does not bear three children, I will have you buried alive tomorrow morning."

So they were married. But at midnight, as Truth lay awake thinking of the fate that was in store for him in the morning, an eagle flew through the window, and asked the cause of his sorrow. Truth related his tale, and the eagle said, "Do not worry; I will take care of that." Then he flew away, but just before the break of day three eagles came, each bearing a new-born babe.

Truth awakened the princess and said to her, "My dear wife, these are our children. We must love them and take good care of them."

Then the king, who had been awakened by the noise of children crying, sent to ask what it was all about. When he heard the news he came into the tower where the princess was, and when he saw the children he was overcome with joy; for he had no sons, and greatly desired to have an heir to his throne. So the king made a great feast and gave over his crown and scepter to his son-in-law, to be king in his stead.

Thus we see that those who help others when in trouble shall themselves be aided when they are in difficulty.

Glossary

---

anecdote: Originally, a short, humorous tale. Now, the term commonly refers to single-episode narratives, regarded as true and commonly concentrating on an individual.

animal tales: Narratives told as conscious fictions in which the characters, though they speak and behave like human beings, are animals. These animal characters are commonly stock types. For example, in many Native American traditions, coyote is regarded as an exploitive, impulsive manipulator. In African American tales, rabbit is type cast in the same role. The tales are most often moralistic (“don’t be greedy”) or etiological (why the frog has no tail) in intent.

belief tales: Legends or personal experience narratives that are told with the purpose of validating a particular folk belief.

cautionary tales: Narratives whose plots embody a message cautioning against the consequences of particular kinds of behavior.

culture hero: Character in myth who finishes the work that brings technology (usually symbolized as fire), laws, religion, and other elements of culture to humans. Culture heroes may take over the business of creating order out of chaos where a Supreme Creator left off. The culture hero serves as a secondary creator or transformer of the universe. He/she transforms the universe by means of his gifts into a universe in which humans can live. In some myths, the culture hero cleanses the universe of things that threaten human existence: monsters, cannibals, or meteorological phenomena.

cumulative tale: A tale that begins with an incident, action, or phrase and adds a succession of elements to create a lengthy chain of events.

cycle: A group of tales that focuses on a central character, plot, or theme.

fable: Fictional narrative ending with a didactic message that is often couched in the form of a “moral” or proverb.

fairy tale: See ordinary folktale.

family saga: Chronologically and often thematically linked collection of legends constituting the folk history of a particular family, usually over several generations. The term was coined by folklorist Mody C. Boatright.

folk history: Accounts based on perceptions of historical events rather than on written documentation or similar media.

- formula/formulaic element: Conventional elements that recur in folk narrative. For example, clichés, structural patterns, stock characters, or situations.
- framing: The act of setting apart a traditional performance from other types of activity by words, occasions of performance or other distinguishing features.
- genre: Type, category.
- legend: Narrative told as truth, set in the historical past, and that does not depart from the present reality of the members of the group.
- local legend: Legends derived from and closely associated with specific places and events believed to have occurred in those locales.
- märchen: See ordinary folktale.
- motif: Small element of traditional narrative content, such as an event, object, concept, or pattern.
- myth: Narratives that explain the will (the intent) and the workings (the orderly principles) of a group's major supernatural figures. Myth is set in a world that predates the present reality.
- natural context: Setting, in all its elements, in which a performance would ordinarily take place.
- novelle: Romantic tale.
- numskull: Character who behaves in an absurdly ignorant fashion, also called "noodle."
- ordinary folktale: Highly formulaic and structured fictional narrative that is popularly referred to as "fairytale" and designated by folklorists as märchen or "wonder tale." Term coined by folklorist Stith Thompson.
- personal experience narrative: Narrative intended as truth performed in the first person by the individual to whom the described events happened.
- personal legend: Narrative intended as truth told about a specific (usually well-known) individual.
- resource person: The bearer of a particular tradition, such as the performer of a folktale.
- stock character: Recurrent narrative character who invariably plays a stereotyped role such as trickster or fool.
- tale type: Standard, recurrent folk narrative plot.
- tall tale: Fictional narrative often told as a firsthand experience, which gradually introduces hyperbole until the audience realizes by the conclusion that the tale is a lie.
- trickster: Character who defies the limits of propriety and often gender and species. Trickster lives on the margins of his world by his wits and is often regarded as possessing supernatural power. Often a mythic figure such as a coyote or hare will function as both culture hero and trickster.
- validating device: Any element occurring within a traditional narrative that is intended to convince listeners that the tale is true.
- variant: Version of a standard tale type.

Bibliography to Volume 2

---

- Batchelor, John. "Specimens of Ainu Folk-Lore." Transactions of the Asiatic Society of Japan 18 (1890): 25–85.
- Bayliss, Clara Kern. "Philippine Folktales." Journal of American Folklore 21 (1908): 46–53.
- Benedict, Laura Watson. "Bagobo Myths." The Journal of American Folklore 26 (1913): 13–63.
- Bogoras, Waldemar. "Chukchee Mythology." The Jessup North Pacific Expedition, ed. Franz Boas. Memoir of the American Museum of Natural History New York. Vol. VIII. New York: The American Museum of Natural History New York, 1910.
- Bogoras, Waldemar. "The Folklore of Northeastern Asia as Compared with that of Northwest America." American Anthropologist 4 (1902): 577–683.
- Bogoras, Waldemar. Koryak Texts, Publications of the American Ethnological Society V. Leyden: E. J. Brill, Ltd., 1917.
- Brauns, David. Japanische Märchen und Sagen. Leipzig: Verlag von Wilhelm Friedrich, 1885.
- Burton, Richard. Vikram and the Vampire, ed. Elizabeth Burton. London: Tylston and Edwards, 1893.
- Colum, Padric. Orpheus: Myths of the World. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1930.
- Dixon, Roland. Oceanic Mythology. Boston: Marshall Jones Company, 1916.
- Evans, Ivor H. N. "Folk Stories of the Tempassuk and Tuaran Districts, British North Borneo." The Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 43 (913): 422–479.
- Frere, Mary. Old Deccan Days. London: J. Murray, 1868.
- Gardner, Fletcher, and W. W. Newell. "Filipino (Tagalog) Versions of Cinderella." Journal of American Folklore 19 (1906): 265–280.
- Gardner, Fletcher, and W. W. Newell. "Tagalog Folk-Tales I." Journal of American Folklore 20 (1907): 104–116.
- Hearn, Lafcadio. In Ghostly Japan. Boston: Little, Brown, and Co., 1899.
- Hearn, Lafcadio. Kwaidan: Stories and Studies of Strange Things. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin and Co., 1904.
- Hutton, H. "Folktales of the Angami Nagas of Assam." Folklore 25 (1914): 476–498.

Bibliography to Volume 2

- Jacobs, Joseph. Indian Fairy Tales. London: David Nutt, 1912.
- Lang, Andrew. The Crimson Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1903.
- Lang, Andrew. The Green Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1892.
- Lang, Andrew. The Olive Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1907.
- Lang, Andrew. The Pink Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1897.
- Lang, Andrew. The Violet Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1901.
- Mackenzie, Donald A. Indian Myth and Legend. London: The Gresham Publishing Company, Ltd., 1913.
- Maxfield, Bertou L., and W. H. Millington. "Visayan Folk-Tales I" Journal of American Folklore 19 (1902): 97–112.
- Maxwell, W. E. "Raja Donan: A Malay Fairy Tale." The Folk-Lore Journal 6 (1888): 134–139.
- Miura, Kiyoko. "Two Songs That Were Sung and Danced by Owl God." Yakura Epos of the Ainus: Study and Translation of Kamuy-Yukara. <http://www.harvestfields.ca/ebook/etexts1/01/38/00.htm> (July 2, 2007).
- O'Connor, W. F. Folk Tales from Tibet. London: Hurst and Blackett, Ltd., 1906.
- Parker, Henry. Village Folk Tales of Ceylon. London: Luzac and Company, 1910.
- Pilsudski, Bronislas [Bronislaw]. "Ainu Folklore." Journal of American Folklore 25 (1912): 72–86.
- Pleyte, C. M. "An Unpublished Batak Creation Legend." Journal of the Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 26 (1897): 103–109.
- Porter, Ralph S. "The Story of Bantugan." Journal of American Folklore 15 (1902): 143–161.
- Ryder, Arthur W., trans. [author unknown, Sanskrit title Vetalapañchavimsati]. Twenty-Two Goblins. London: J.M. Dent, 1917.
- Sarma, Bagwhan Das. "A Folktale from Kumaon State." Folklore 8 (1897): 181–184.
- Scheltema, J. F. "Roostam the Game-cock." Journal of American Folklore 32 (1919): 306–323.
- Scheltema, J. F. "Sry Nagasary." Journal of American Folklore 32 (1919): 324–342.
- Shelton, A. L. Tibetan Folktales. St. Louis, MO: United Christian Missionary Society, 1925.
- Smith, Richard Gordon. Ancient Tales and Folklore of Japan. London: A. and C. Black, 1908.
- Steel, Flora Annie. Tales of the Punjab: Told by the People. New York: Macmillan and Company, 1894.
- Swynnerton, Charles. Indian Nights' Entertainment: Folk-Tales from the Upper Indus. London: Elliot Stock, 1892.

Cumulative Index

---

Boldface numbers refer to volume numbers.

1: Africa, The Middle East,
Australia, and Oceania
2: Asia
3: Europe
4: North and South America

- Abandonment, 1:36, 2:167
Abduction: maidens, 3:216; rescue
from supernatural, 2:24; rival ethnic group, 3:216; supernatural
bridegroom, 1:420
Aborigines, 1:297, 2:152
Absaroka (tribe), 4:67–69
Abu'n-Nuwâ's, 1:251
"Abu-Nowâs," 1:9–11
Acceptance, 3:67, 3:160, 4:110
Acoma Pueblo, 4:3–12, 4:102,
4:106
"The Adams Diggins," 4:267–72
Adlet, 4:72
"The Adventures of Kororo-
manna," 4:322
"Adventures of the Tuglay,"
2:388–95
"Advice of the Fox," 3:54
Africa: Central, 1:61–134; Eastern,
1:27–58; Northern, 1:1–25,
1:14, 3:385; Southern, 1:135–65;
Western, 1:61–134, 4:163
African American folktales,
4:159–208; Anansi tales, 4:326;
"The Bride of the Evil One,"
3:360; Cajun folktales, 4:209;
Creek tale, 4:65; rabbits, 4:415;
sources, 1:130–34; Southern tricksters, 4:45; trickster figure,
1:61
African Americans, 1:78, 4:63
African Caribbean, 4:403–40
African Diaspora, 1:57, 1:61,
1:126, 1:129
African folktales, 1:1–165; audience, 1:126; Bluebeard plot,
3:360; Malabasy influence, 1:33;
maroons, 4:324; old story as,
4:422; supernatural medicine,
1:87; Surinam maroons, 4:324
Afterlife, 2:83, 3:144, 4:185
Aggies, 4:220
Agha, 1:201
Agricultural lifestyle, 1:29, 1:98
Ainu, 2:3–27
"The Ai'wan Shamans," 2:50–58
Akan ethnic groups, 1:61, 1:96
"Aki Gahuk, the Father of the Crocodiles," 2:311–13
Akuapem, 1:61–64
Alabama (tribe), 4:13–18
Aladdin tales, 3:163
"Alcestis," 3:244–53
Aleut people, 4:19–24
Algonquin cultures, 4:124
"Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves,"
2:419
Allegory, 1:253
Alligator, 4:65
Ama-terasu, 2:59
Ambition, 2:123
America, 3:49
Amorality, 1:70
Amulets, 1:3, 1:49–52, 1:319,
4:95, 4:172
Anaconda, 4:448
Analogy, 2:301
"Ananse Buys the Town," 1:62–63
Anansi, 1:61, 1:96, 4:124, 4:163,
4:324, 4:326, 4:329–30, 4:424,
4:425–28, 4:429; Nancy, 4:405;
'tory, 4:324–29
"Anansi and the Lady in the Well," 4:429–30
"Anansi Eats Mutton,"
4:325–27
Anasazi, 4:124
Ancelet, Barry Jean, 4:220
Ancestors, 1:29, 2:59, 4:140
Ancestral ghosts, 1:333
Andalusia, 3:385
"Andras Baive," 3:321–24, 3:324
Anecdote, 3:285, 4:252
Angami, 2:261, 2:263, 2:264
Angels, 1:264
Angulimala, 2:156
"Animal Allows Himself to Be Tied to Another for Safety,"
2:121
Animal gratitude, 2:268, 2:429,
2:436, 3:364; lack of, 2:277;
repayment, 3:113; rescue from death, 2:176; snake, 4:329–30
Animal guardians, 4:98
Animal helpers: abusive family,
3:59; antelopes, 4:102; bulls,
3:185; quest role, 2:359; serpent,

Cumulative Index

- 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania
2: Asia
3: Europe
4: North and South America
- 4:309; Snow White, 3:261; unseen, 4:98–101
“The Animal Languages,” 2:295, 2:301, 3:109
Animals: clan totems, 4:89; dwarves, 3:81; folk tale characters, 1:64; grateful, 1:242; guise for spirit helpers, 4:327; hero transformation, 3:139; possessing spirits, 4:447; taming of wild, 3:313; tricksters, 2:328, 2:333; weak and larger, 2:121; witches as, 4:284; world vs. humans, 3:352
“Animals Grateful for Rescue from Peril of Death,” 2:176
Animal skin, 3:212
Animal spouse: husband, 3:86; justice, 4:255; lizard husband, 2:362; transformation, 2:320, 2:323; wife, 1:265, 4:431
Animal tales, 1:35, 4:329; African American and Caribbean sources, 1:130–34; Bantu, 1:31; cat and mouse, 2:128; Creek and African American, 4:63; danger descriptions, 1:149; fable function, 1:66, 2:126; fable trickster/culture hero, 4:161; fox nature in, 3:334; konehu cycle, 4:343; moral lesson, 4:110; moral precepts, 1:116; myth combination, 1:303, 1:306; Naga, 2:265–67; narrative functions, 3:313; origins explanation, 1:306; plot features, 1:57; question-and-answer pattern, 2:152; self-serving characters, 1:35. See also Trickster
Animism, 2:3; environmental elements, 2:14; shape-shifting, 2:17; Tibetan, 2:113
“Annancy and the Yam Hill,” 1:61, 4:424–25
Ann Nancy, 4:163–64
“The Antelope Boy,” 4:102–5
Anthropomorphic animals, 4:415; bears, 4:89; spider, 4:324
Anthropomorphic beings, 1:67, 1:353, 3:316
Antigua, 4:405–13
Anti-Semitism, 3:379
Anxieties, 3:360, 4:76
Apache, 4:25–32, 4:273
Ape, 2:365–66
Appalachian folktales, 4:225–43
Arabian Peninsula, 1:179
Arabic folk tradition, 1:220, 2:83
Arab influence, 1:12, 1:49
Arabs, 1:260
Arahat (people), 2:156
Arawak (people), 4:297–98, 4:443–52
Archetype tales, 3:67
Arctic, 4:72, 4:74
Arctic peoples. See Circumpolar cultures; Eskimo
Aristocracy, 1:98
Arizona (Native Americans), 4:285, 4:291
Arjuna, 2:142
Armenia, 1:169–79
Ascetics, 2:92
Ashanti, 1:61
Ashkenazim, 3:141–48, 3:147
Asia: East, 2:1–130; Malabasy influence, 1:33; South, 2:131–303; Southeast, 2:305–438
Assassination, 2:64
Assimilation, 1:201
Asuang, 2:429
Ataro, 1:333, 1:341
Athabascans, 4:72
Athletic competition, 4:95
Audience, 1:126, 1:176
Aurohuac, 4:297–98
Australia, 1:297–327
Autobiography, 4:258
Avenger, 1:240, 4:19
“Awa-Wanga Animal Fables,” 1:30
Axaiacatzin, 4:400
Aymara (people), 4:299–305
Aztec, 4:393
Babalawo, 1:129
“Baboon Disguises Himself and Becomes a Farmer,” 1:56–57
“The Babracote and the Camundi,” 4:448–49
Baca, Elfego, 4:275–79
Badger, 2:97
Baghdad, 1:10
Bagobo (people), 2:388
Bahamas, 4:414–22
Bajau, 2:307
“The Baker of Beauty,” 3:54–58
Ball games, 4:364
Bands of families, 4:74
Bantu, 1:29, 1:30–31, 1:49, 1:58, 1:64, 1:68
Banyan, 1:52
Bards, 2:74
Basque, 3:339–59
Batak (people), 2:338
Bats, 4:341
Battles, 2:74, 2:383, 3:54, 3:339
Baule (people), 1:61
Bear, 3:81, 4:40, 4:89; Brer, 4:161–62; fox and, 1:133–34; John the, 4:376; as maiden, 4:136–39; Mouse Deer and, 2:333; origin, 4:39–42; women lover, 4:118–20
“The Bear and the Fox,” 1:133–34
Beards, 3:81
“Bear Maiden,” 4:136–39
“The Beautiful and the Ugly Twin,” 3:373
“Beauty and the Beast,” 2:362
Beckwith, Martha Warren, 1:380, 4:420, 4:425, 4:426, 4:430
Bedouin, 1:179–80
Bee, 3:174
“The Beginning,” 2:307–8
Beliefs: animistic, 2:3; Bön, 2:113; indigenous, 2:307; shape-shifting, 2:17
Belief tale: hag legend, 4:199; spirit possession, 4:203; white deer, 4:228; witch identity, 4:284
Bell, Robert, 4:57
Bella Bella, 4:72
Benevolence, 1:216–17; ancestral ghosts, 1:333; fallen angles, 1:264; ironic, 4:89; naiveté,

- 3:285; protectors, 4:43; serpent, 4:309; skull, 1:92; validation, 1:92
- “Benevolence,” 1:216–17
- Benin, 1:124
- Berberisca, 3:385
- Berbers, 1:12
- Bering Strait, 2:40
- Betel nut, 1:343
- Betrothal, 1:313
- “The Bewitched Wives,” 4:70–71
- Bewitching: culpability, 4:255; female jinn, 1:24; medicine, 4:85; wives, 4:70–71
- Bharata, 2:142
- Biblical narrative, 1:42–43, 1:181, 1:196
- “Big Bad Wolf,” 4:186
- “Big Man-eater,” 4:16–18
- “The Big Worm,” 4:421–22
- “The Billy Goat and the King,” 2:295–97, 2:301, 3:109
- Billy the Kid, 4:258
- Birds, 1:297, 2:266–67; assistance of pet, 3:270; mythic, 2:359; ordinary folktale roles, 3:67; tengu, 2:92; trickster sparrow, 1:291; willy-wagtail, 1:303
- “The Birds and the Snakes,” 2:266–67
- “Bird’s Pea Gets Stuck in Socket of Mill-handle,” 2:291
- “The Bird That Made Milk,” 1:158, 1:161–65
- Birth, 3:21, 4:112, 4:364
- Black, 3:253
- “The Black Dragon and the Red Dragon,” 1:267–73
- Blame shifting, 1:72, 1:223, 4:165
- “Blessing from the Owl God,” 2:3–13
- Blind, 2:74, 3:113
- Blocking characters, 1:6
- Blood feuds, 3:304
- “Bluebeard,” 3:34, 3:360–64
- Boas, Franz, 4:367, 4:380
- Boccaccio, Giovanni, 3:274–75
- Boer, 1:144
- “The Boiled Crab,” 2:266
- Bolivia, 4:299
- Bön, 2:113, 2:123
- Bones, 4:412–13
- Bonney, William H., 4:258
- Book of Jasher*, 1:181
- Booky, 4:418
- “The Borah of Byamee,” 1:313–19
- Borneo, 2:307–37
- Bornu (people), 1:98
- Born with caul, 4:203
- Borrowings: American ethnic group, 4:174; American south, 4:209; Cinderella variant, 4:382; from Maroons, 4:343; setting adaptation, 4:380
- Boston, 1:251, 1:253
- “Boudreaux and the Cottonmouth,” 4:219–20
- Bouqui, 4:209–15
- Bourke, John G., 4:281
- Boys, 3:21; culture hero, 4:112; initiation ceremony, 1:313, 1:322; leadership test, 3:96; orphan, 2:263; trickster, 2:263, 4:102. See also Brothers
- “The Boy Who Could Keep a Secret,” 3:96–103
- Brahma, 2:133
- “The Brahman, the Tiger, and the Six Judges,” 2:152–56, 2:277
- Brahmans, 2:152
- “The Brave Tailor,” 1:287, 4:232
- Brazil, 4:306
- Brer Bear, 4:161–62
- Brer Dog, 4:175–79
- Brer Rabbit, 4:45, 4:166–89
- “Brer Rabbit’s Cool Air Swing,” 4:170–71
- Brer Squirrel, 4:170–71
- Brer Turkey, 4:179–82
- Brer Wolf, 4:168–70, 4:170–71, 4:186
- “The Briar-Patch Punishment for Rabbit,” 1:152, 2:415, 4:121, 4:415
- Bribri, 4:351–56
- Bride: cannibal spirits, 1:92; courtship, 3:289; of demons, 4:193–98; of evil one, 1:85, 2:172, 3:360; hero winning, 3:295; husband abduction rescues, 2:24; nonhuman form, 3:212; price customs, 1:82; to spirit, 1:92; substitute, 1:260; test, 1:47–48, 3:289; underworld, 1:353, 1:372–80
- “The Bride from the Underworld,” 1:353, 1:372–80
- Bridegroom abduction by supernatural, 1:420
- “The Bride of the Evil One,” 1:85, 3:360, 4:193–98
- “The Bride Rescues Her Husband,” 2:24–27
- “The Bride Test,” 1:47
- Britain, 3:1–64
- Brother Abraham Jasper, 4:185
- “The Brother and the Sister,” 1:260–64
- “Brother Elephant and Brother Whale,” 4:417–18
- Brotherhood of Penitents, 4:279
- “Brother Rabbit, Brother Booky, and Brother Cow,” 4:418–20
- “Brother Rabbit an’ Brother Tar-Baby,” 1:152, 2:156, 4:121, 4:209, 4:414–17
- Brothers, 4:380; culture heroes, 1:324; tame and wild, 4:33–34; twin, 3:385, 4:148; younger, 2:245–47, 3:201–2, 3:216
- Buchanan, George, 4:440
- Buddha, 2:156
- Buddhism, 2:83, 2:92
- Buffalo, 4:50, 4:116–18, 4:264
- Bullroarer, 1:313
- Bulls, 3:185
- Bulu, 1:64–77
- Bunda, 1:303
- Bunyip, 1:310
- Burkovina, 3:171
- Burma, 2:261
- “The Burning of the Old House,” 3:309–12
- Bushmen. See San
- Bush spirits, 4:332, 4:338
- Buso, 2:388
- Buzzard, 4:163–64, 4:182
- Byamee, 1:313
- Caingang, 4:306–8
- “Cajun Cockfight,” 4:220–21
- Cajun folktales, 4:45, 4:209–21
- Calabar, 1:80

Cumulative Index

- |                                                    |
|----------------------------------------------------|
| 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania |
| 2: Asia                                            |
| 3: Europe                                          |
| 4: North and South America                         |
- Calabash tree, 4:364–66, 4:397
“The Calabash Tree,” 4:364–66
“The Cannibal and the Pig Who Ate Human Flesh,” 1:347–49
Cannibalism, 1:347–49, 3:231, 3:317, 4:16–18; Adlet, 4:72; Caribbean peoples, 4:448; children, 1:158–61; evil spirits, 2:105; ghosts, 2:83; giants, 4:16; hunting of heads, 2:309; mother, 1:158; Native American tales, 4:16; preternatural stupidity, 1:55; supernatural power, 2:429
“The Cannibal Mother and Her Children,” 1:158–61
Cannibal spirits, 1:92
“A Cannibal Story,” 1:324–27, 1:347
Carib, 4:448, 4:450, 4:453–58
Caribbean, 4:164, 4:403–58; animal tale sources, 1:130–34; Ann Nancy/Anansi, 4:163; Cajuns, 4:209
Caribbean folktales: Anansi, 4:326; maxims, 4:425; serpent helper, 4:309
“The Carpenter and the Amulet,” 1:49–52
Caste system, 2:152
“The Cat and the Mice,” 2:128–30
“The Cat as Sham Holy Man,” 2:128
Cats, 2:100, 2:128, 4:409
“The Cat’s Elopement,” 2:100–102
Cautionary tales: dog control, 4:50; drowning, 3:92; enemies, 3:379; good advice, 3:313; natural gifts, 1:393; social norms, 2:262; social transgressions, 3:28; upper classes, 3:182
Central Africa, 1:61–134
Central America, 4:349–401
Central Europe, 3:65–138
Ceylon. See Sri Lanka
Chakana, 4:315
Champions, 2:142
Chaos, 2:28
Chapbooks, 3:3–4, 3:21
Characters: conventional, 2:427; predators/prey, 2:128; self-serving, 1:35; stock, 1:5, 2:128, 3:130, 3:185, 4:167, 4:215, 4:220; Two-Faces, 4:53; untrustworthy, 1:35. See also Culture hero; Trickster
Charlemagne, 3:339
“The Charmed Ring,” 2:176–81, 3:163
Cherokee nation, 4:33–49, 4:94–98
Cheyenne tribe, 4:50–56
Chicken feet, 3:212
Chih Nü, 2:30
Children, 3:67, 3:141; abandoned, 2:167; of animals and humans, 4:376; bearing supernatural agreement, 3:373; cannibals, 1:55–56, 1:158–61; of deities, 1:55, 1:398, 3:231, 4:301, 4:319, 4:456; of deities and humans, 3:231; lost and animal guardian, 4:89; neglected, 4:429; orphan, 2:263; orphans, 2:262; trickster, 2:318–19, 2:319; twins, 3:373, 3:385, 4:34, 4:83, 4:84, 4:105–10, 4:148–55, 4:359, 4:364, 4:456
“The Children and the Cannibal,” 1:55–56
“The Children of the Sun,” 4:301, 4:319
Chile, 4:309–14
China, 1:223, 2:28–35
Chinese philosophy, 2:28
Chipmunk, 4:84
Choctaw tribe, 4:13
Choruses, 1:126
Christian influence, 1:179, 3:253, 4:374, 4:389
Christians, 1:223, 1:331, 2:399
Chukchee, 2:36–58, 2:105
Churinga, 1:319, 1:3038
Cigarettes, 4:102
“Cinderella,” 2:419, 3:58–59, 3:77, 3:270–74, 4:382
“Cinder Mary,” 4:382–84
Circumpolar cultures, 2:36, 2:40, 3:313
Cities, 1:3, 1:10, 1:14, 1:16, 1:124, 3:390
City dwellers, 1:3
City-states, 1:98, 1:124
Clan: ancestor, 4:140; animal helpers, 4:98; lineage, 4:3–4, 4:79, 4:140; membership, 1:42; totem animals, 4:89
Cleansing environment: culture hero, 1:324, 3:231, 4:359; twin hero, 4:84, 4:148
“A Clever Hunter and a Bird,” 1:116, 1:117–18
Cleverness, 1:31, 2:319, 4:53, 4:232, 4:415
“The Clever Orphan,” 2:263–64
Climate: arctic, 4:74; exaggeration, 4:285, 4:291; tropical, 1:78
Closings, 1:106, 1:291, 4:409
“Clothing Caught in a Graveyard,” 4:252
Clubhouses, 1:345
Coastal dwellers: Chukchee, 2:36–58
Coastal trade, 1:64
Coats-of-arms, 4:79
Cock fighting, 4:220–21
Cockroach, 4:430
“Cock’s Breakfast,” 4:430–31
Colonialism, 2:367
Comic fiction, 1:291
Comic misunderstandings, 1:223
Comic narrative, 3:143, 4:423
Comic tales, 1:3, 1:6, 1:218
Community: survival of, 1:238, 4:72; trickster role, 1:80, 4:162, 4:172
Competition, 4:188
Competitors, 1:64, 1:71, 1:345
Complexion of spirits, 1:333
Comrade Lapin, 4:45
Conclusions, 4:425
Congo, 1:78–79
Conjuration, 4:172, 4:200, 4:203
Conjuror, 1:431
Contagion, 4:227
“Contempt for His Torturers,” 3:147–48

- "Coon in the Box," 2:247, 4:183–85
 Cooperation, 4:162
 Corn, 4:33
 Cornwall, 3:3
 "The Corpse Killed Five Times," 1:223
 Corpses, 1:341
 Cosmology, 1:396, 3:299; humanity, 1:396; primal chaos, 1:353
 Cosquin, Emmanuel, 1:242
 Côte d'Ivoire, 1:61
 Courtship, 2:398–99, 3:289, 4:188
 Cow, 4:418
 Co-wives, 1:106
 Coyote, 2:128, 4:110–11, 4:116, 4:284
 "Coyote and the Buffalo," 4:116–18
 "The Coyote and the Woodpecker," 4:29, 4:110–11
 Crabs, 2:266, 2:334, 3:256
 Crazy-Dogs-Wishing-to-Die, 4:67
 "The Creation," 1:431–32, 4:299, 4:301, 4:315, 4:357–58
 Creation myth, 1:353, 1:396, 2:338, 4:423; Bagobo, 2:396; death, 2:307; dividing and ordering, 2:28; Haggada narrative, 1:185; Japanese, 2:62; Maya, 4:357–66; Navajo, 4:124–29
 "Creation of Heaven and Earth," 1:396–98, 1:398, 1:431
 "The Creation of the World," 1:184–95, 1:196
 Creators: anthropomorphic, 1:300; lata, 1:331; male and female, 4:50; raven, 4:140; Viracocha, 4:299, 4:304, 4:315; wrath, 4:357
 Creek Nation, 4:13, 4:57–62, 4:63–66
 Crests, 4:79
 Criminals, 1:24
 Crimination, 1:14
 Crocodile, 2:311–13, 2:335–36, 2:366–67
 "The Crocodile and the Dog," 1:33–34
 "Crocodile's Treason," 1:148–52
 Cross-cultural categories, 1:87
 Cross-cultural distribution: animal tales, 1:31; borrowing, 4:209; bride of demons, 4:194; "Brother Rabbit an' the Tar-baby," 4:414; ghost obligation fulfillment, 2:86; Hansel and Grettel variants, 3:67; magic swords, 3:96; motifs, 1:45; night hag, 4:225; obstacle flight, 4:118; omen origin, 4:354–55; setting adaptation, 4:380; shape-shifters, 3:212; sibling rivalry, 1:106; signs of tragic events, 4:448; titan in origin myth, 2:28; tricksters, 1:154, 2:430–31; trickster traits, 2:415; unnatural suitor, 1:85; vampire characteristics, 3:174; variant transformations, 2:298
 Cross-cultural elements: duendes, 4:387; hero, 2:383; supernatural, 3:357
 Cross-cultural influence, 4:382
 Cross-cultural phenomenon: hag experience, 4:199; shamanism, 2:36
 Crow tribe, 4:67–69
 Cruel stepmother, 1:119, 1:260, 2:167, 3:18
 "The Crumb in the Beard," 3:266–70
 "The Crystal Casket," 3:261–66
 "The Crystal Coffin," 3:72–77
 Cuchulain, 3:39
 Cultural complexity: food supply, 4:145; living by rule, 4:393; Nahua and Aztec, 4:393; Natchez, 4:145
 Culture: Armenia, 1:169; Australian aboriginal, 1:297; clashes, 4:273; Efik tales, 1:82; mixture, 1:49; perpetuation, 3:141; pig significance, 1:347; Southwest region Spanish, 4:281
 Culture hero: animal fables, 4:161–62; anthropomorphic, 1:300; characteristics, 1:398; cleansing environment, 1:324, 3:231, 4:84, 4:148, 4:359; divine ancestors, 1:29; fire theft, 4:27, 4:64; fox, 4:27; Hercules, 3:231; Manabozho, 4:124; mina birds, 1:297; monster-slayers, 1:120; pair, 4:304; raven, 2:40, 4:75; raven/El, 4:140; stone boy, 4:112; Theseus, 3:231; totemic clans, 1:301; trickster, 1:353, 3:3; twins, 1:347, 4:84, 4:359, 4:364; Viracocha, 4:299. See also Trickster
 Cumulative tale, 2:291
 "Cunnie-More-than-Father," 4:425–28
 "Cupid and Psyche," 1:242
 "Curanderas and Brujas," 4:280–82
 Curiosity, 3:280
 Curses, 2:295, 3:304
 Cycles: Anansi, 1:61–63, 4:426; animal tricksters, 2:328–29; Brer Rabbit, 4:45, 4:166–89; death-bed promises, 1:242; Jack tales, 4:229; John and Master, 4:183; Kampuaa myths, 1:380; Konehu, 4:343; Lapin and Bouqui, 4:209; mouse deer, 2:364; night hag legends, 4:225; Phoebe Ward witch, 4:225; rabbit-big man-eater, 4:18; rabbit tales, 4:367; Raja Rasalu legend, 2:268; tale names explanation, 1:61–62; Ulster myths, 3:39
 Cyclops, 3:350
 Dance: death sentence, 1:147; goddess of, 1:361; Shinto rites, 2:59; warrior culture, 4:95
 Dangers, 1:149, 1:369
 Darkness, 4:332
 "The Darkness and the Cleaving-Together," 1:353–57
 Date palm, 2:298
 Daughter, 2:191–95, 3:120
 Dead: appropriation of living, 2:86; communication with, 1:238; helpful, 2:268, 2:436; spirits, 1:67; unquiet, 3:339
 "Dead Man as Helper," 2:436
 Deans, James, 4:79
 Death: animal gratitude, 2:176; entry into world, 1:431; facing to win bride, 2:195; haunting and untimely, 4:251; of hero, 3:39; imposition of, 2:62; myths, 1:396; occupations and social

Cumulative Index

- |                                                    |
|----------------------------------------------------|
| 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania |
| 2: Asia                                            |
| 3: Europe                                          |
| 4: North and South America                         |
- class, 2:70; outwitting of, 2:133; overcoming, 1:341; personal attack causation, 4:47; portent, 4:341; revival from, 1:343; shaman powers, 2:36; trickster bringing of, 1:398; water of, 1:242
- “The Death and Burial of the Poor Hen-Sparrow,” 2:281–88, 2:291
- Deathbed promises, 1:242
- “Death of Baldr,” 3:296–98
- “Death of Cuchulain,” 3:39–48
- “The Death of the Little Hen,” 2:281
- Death sentences, 1:147
- Deceit, 2:203
- Deception: courting trick, 4:188; Jack-O’-My-Lanterns, 4:206; of women, 2:203–21
- “Deceptive Tug-of-War,” 4:417
- Decorum, 1:82
- Deer, 4:29, 4:45, 4:173–75, 4:228
- De Fábrega, H. Pittier, 4:354
- Deification: creation myth, 1:396; of wind, 4:25; Yoruba myth, 1:124
- Deities: akua, 1:369; Ama-terasu, 2:59; disguised, 4:315; genealogical linkage to humans, 1:417; good and evil, 4:353; rampaging, 1:347; romance with mortals, 2:30; sky, 2:62; snake, 2:123
- Deluge, 1:181, 4:306
- “The Deluge,” 4:301, 4:306–8
- “The Demon Lover,” 1:85, 4:194
- Demons, 2:156, 2:329, 4:193–98
- “The Demon with the Matted Hair,” 2:156–59
- Denmark, 3:285–91
- Dervishes, 1:216
- Descendants, 1:29
- “The Descendants of Fanga,” 1:353, 1:417–19
- Destruction: all-encompassing, 3:61; in deluge, 4:306; twin culture heroes, 4:359
- Deuteronomy, 1:181
- Devices: frame tales, 2:184–85 (See also Formulaic devices); “Mother Goose,” 3:360 (See also Linking devices; Rhetorical devices; Validating devices). See also Frame story
- Devil, 2:113–16, 4:65, 4:389, 4:436; Jack-O’-My-Lanterns, 4:206; marriage to, 3:280; selling soul to, 4:186
- “Diamond Cut Diamond,” 2:254–60, 2:255
- Dieri (people), 1:300, 1:322
- Dilemma of gift as curse, 2:295
- “Dinewan the Emy, and Goomblebuggon the Bustard,” 1:305–8
- Discord in creation, 1:431
- Disease causation, 4:47
- Disguise: failure, 1:57; fallen angels, 1:264; trickster, 1:72, 4:407–8. See also Shape-shifter; Shape-shifting
- Dishonesty, 2:430
- “The Disobedient Daughter Who Married a Skull,” 1:85–87, 1:92, 3:360
- Distribution: Indo-European tradition, 2:167; Rabbit’s [Hare’s] triumph, 1:152
- “To Divide Presents and Strokes,” 1:6
- Divination, 1:129, 2:113
- Divine ancestor, 1:29
- Divine conflicts, 1:361
- Divine essence, 1:124, 2:3
- Division of labor, 1:158, 1:161
- Dogs, 1:33–34, 1:398, 4:50, 4:67; Brer, 4:175–79; tanuki, 2:95
- Domestic strife, 1:5
- Donkey, 4:191–93
- “The Doom of the Katt-a-quins,” 4:145–47
- Double Faces, 4:34, 4:53
- Double man, 4:95
- Double spirits, 4:202
- “Dr. Know-All,” 2:247, 4:184
- “The Dragon Prince and the Stepmother,” 1:282–87
- Dragons, 2:80, 2:116, 3:160; helpfulness, 1:268
- “The Dragon-Slayer,” 3:185, 3:253, 3:351
- Dravidian (people), 2:298
- Dreams: power of, 3:216; prophetic, 4:327; seeking women in, 4:385
- Drowning, 3:92
- Ducks, 4:218
- Duelist mentality, 2:333
- Duendes, 4:387, 4:391
- Dusun, 2:307, 2:309, 2:319
- Dutch East Indies, 2:367–82
- Dutch Guiana. See Suriname
- Dwarfs, 2:32, 3:81
- “The Dybbuk of Bunker Street,” 3:143–47
- Dyerwine, 1:303
- Earth gods, 1:369
- East Asia, 2:1–130
- Eastern Africa, 1:27–58
- Eastern Europe, 3:139–228
- Eating fruit motif, 3:253
- Economy, 1:61, 1:80
- Edge of world, 4:76
- Education, 3:381, 3:390
- Edwards, Charles, 4:420
- Eel, 1:353
- Efik, 1:80–95, 3:360
- Egypt, 1:3–12, 1:42
- “Eight Brothers,” 2:245–47
- Eight (sacred number), 2:388
- “El: The Myth of the Raven,” 4:140–45
- Elders, 4:102
- “The Election of the King of the Animals,” 1:130
- “The Elephant and the Rooster,” 1:131
- “The Elephant and the Tortoise,” 1:80–82
- Elephants, 1:13, 1:80, 4:417
- “Elfego Baca,” 4:275–79
- Elijah, 1:240
- El Salvador, 4:397
- Elves, 4:387
- Emotions, 1:300
- Enemies of group, 3:379

- England, 3:3–38
 English influence, 4:229, 4:440
 “Enmity of Fowl and Cockroach,” 4:430
 Environment: animistic beliefs, 2:14; arctic, 4:72, 4:74; Australian Aborigines, 1:297; cleansing by culture hero, 1:324, 3:231, 4:84, 4:148, 4:359; culture heroes, 1:398; explanation, 1:393, 3:351, 3:352; plot modification, 4:410
 Epics, 2:142, 2:268
Er tin tin, 4:324
 Eskimo, 4:70–78
 Ethics, 2:277, 4:3–4
 Ethnic groups: Appalachian region, 4:229; Aztec sacred history, 4:393; Borneo, 2:307; conflict, 4:450; Congo, 1:78; Jewish communities, 3:141. See also names of specific groups
 Euripides, 3:245
 Europe, 3:1–398
 European influence: Brer Rabbit trick, 4:188; Central American folklore, 4:367; Cheyenne, 4:54; Creek tale, 4:65; Efik, 1:80; Natchez, 4:121; tale elements, 4:136–37; West African trade, 1:64
 Evil, 1:264, 4:389
 Evil eye, 3:174
 Evil one, 4:193–98
 Evil spirits, 2:105
 Exaggeration, 4:285, 4:291
 Exchanges of eyes, 1:80
 Excommunication rites, 3:28
 “An Exile’s Revenge,” 1:345–47
 Explanation, 2:80, 2:261, 4:423; animal nature, 1:80; animal tale mythic, 1:303; animal tales, 1:31, 1:35; emergence from underworld, 4:302; fable moralization, 1:112; historical enmity, 4:450; justice, 4:409; local features, 3:28; Muslim prohibitions, 1:12; origins, 1:306; prayer wand, 2:14; rational in legend, 4:301; relationships with other peoples, 2:309; sacred objects, 1:308; taboo adherence, 1:67; tattooing, 1:425
 “The Exploits of Koneho,” 4:342–48
 Explorer accounts, 4:291
 “Exposure in a Boat,” 2:383
 Expulsion, 1:260
 Eyamba, 1:87
 Eyes: animal, 1:80–82; closing, 2:128; evil, 3:174; exchanges of, 1:80
 “The Fable of the Leopard and Hyena,” 1:31
 Fables, 1:112; admonition, 1:121; animal tale, 1:66, 2:126, 2:265, 3:313, 4:161; animal tricksters, 1:76; Bulu, 1:64; envy, 2:102; moralizing, 1:33, 1:112; personified morals, 2:436; trickster/culture hero, 4:161
 Fábrega, H. Pittier de, 4:353
The Facetious Nights (Straparola), 3:275
 Facts, 2:67
 Fairies, 4:247
 Fair tales, 3:360, 3:364
 Fairy queen, 3:21
 “Faithful John,” 2:159
 Fallen angels, 1:264
 Fall from grace, 1:196, 4:453
 Falling fruit, 1:169, 1:176
 “The Fall of Man and the Punishment of the Serpent,” 1:196–200
 False bride, 1:87
 Falsehood, 2:435–38
 Family: animal helpers, 3:59; bands, 4:74; divine lineage, 2:59; escape of abusive, 3:59; ghosts as guardian, 1:333; human and divine, 1:417; property reclamation, 4:189; relationships, 4:448
 Family sagas, 4:159
 Family trees, 1:353
 “Famine,” 4:67–69
 “The Famine and the Spider,” 1:132–33
 Fang (people), 1:64
 “Fangono,” 1:419–25
 Fantastic animals, 1:36
 Fante, 1:61, 1:96–97
 Far away land, 2:13
 Farmers, 2:262; Angami, 2:261; good, 3:285–88; origin myth, 4:3; Pueblo practices, 4:102; rain-bringing, 4:83
 Fate of warrior, 3:304
 “The Father and Son Who Married Mother and Daughter,” 2:184, 2:191–95, 3:275
 Fathers: jealousy of sons, 4:426; marriage, 2:191–95; sibling rivalry, 1:106; unkind sister partiality, 3:18
 Fathers-in-law, 1:322
 Fattening houses, 1:82–83
 Faust legends, 3:160
 “Fear,” 1:257–60
 Fear of night hag, 4:225
 Fellahin, 1:3–4
 Female beauty, 1:82
 Female creator, 4:332
 Female figures, 2:40
 Female jinn, 1:24
 Female protagonists, 3:34, 4:255
 Females, 4:3–4, 4:83
 Female spirits, 2:40, 4:74
 “Ferdinand the True and Ferinand the False,” 3:364
 Feudal lords, 2:70
 Fez, 1:16
 “The Fifty-One Thieves,” 2:424–27
 Figonas, 1:335–41, 1:339
 Fin-back whale, 4:79
 Fire, 1:319; acquisition, 1:398; gift of, 1:29; making motif, 4:13; theft, 4:27, 4:64
 Fire Dragaman, 4:16, 4:236–40
 “The First People,” 2:62–63
 First person myths, 2:13, 2:16
 “The First Village,” 2:338–42
 Fish, 4:420
 “The Fisher and His Wife,” 2:102
 “The Fisherman and the Boyard’s Daughter,” 3:182–84
 “The Fisherman and the Jinn,” 1:220–23, 2:184, 3:275
 “The Fish Lover,” 4:420
 “The Fish Peri,” 1:176, 1:264–67, 1:268
 “The Flight,” 4:436

Cumulative Index

- 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania
2: Asia
3: Europe
4: North and South America
- Flight by heroes: girl helpers, 3:125, 3:152, 3:171, 4:248, 4:435–36
“The Flood,” 4:124–36
“The Fly and the Ant,” 1:134
Folk beliefs: animal shape-shifters, 2:95; Basque, 3:357; devil in Mexican, 4:389; hag identification, 4:199; hoodoo, 4:203–5; Russian, 3:216; unquiet dead, 3:339
Folk history, 4:400
Folk medicine, 4:248
Folktale: classification, 1:158; fair tales, 3:360; Indo-European central tale types, 2:167; myth distinction, 4:89; traditions, 1:47
Folk traditions: pow-wow doctors, 4:244
Folly, 3:36, 4:215
Food, 1:319, 4:145; fruit, 1:169, 1:176, 3:253
Fool Dog, 4:67
Foolishness: fox as trickster, 4:29; husband-wife misunderstanding, 4:411; numskull tale, 2:288; stereotype, 4:220
Fools: Buchanan, George, 4:440; Jean Sot, 4:215, 4:217, 4:218; trickster success, 4:168; wise, 2:221–33
Foragers, 1:313
Forbidden rooms, 3:280
Forces, 2:28
Foreign rulers, 1:3
Forest demon, 2:329
Forest spirits, 4:453
“The Forgotten Fiancée,” 4:436
Forgotten fiancée motif, 3:12
Formulaic devices, 1:169; closing, 1:106, 1:291; composition, 1:106; endings, 1:176, 4:229; openings, 1:106, 1:274, 4:324, 4:327, 4:415; question-and-answer pattern, 2:152, 2:250
Formulaic usage: four in Native American groups, 4:124; Polish märchens, 3:139; sacred, 4:40, 4:47
Fornander, Abraham, 1:380
“The Forsaken Fiancée: Service as Menial,” 3:77
Fortune, 4:215
Fortune telling, 4:183–84
“The Forty Thieves,” 2:424
Four (sacred number), 4:3, 4:124, 4:354–55
Fox, 2:97, 2:126–28, 3:325, 3:334, 4:29–32, 4:182–83; fire-stealer, 4:27
“Fox and Deer,” 4:29
“Fox and Kingfisher,” 4:29, 4:30–31, 4:110
“Fox and Mountain Lion,” 4:29, 4:31
“Fox and Rabbit,” 4:31–32
“The Fox and the Lapp,” 3:325
Foxes, 2:95, 4:284
Frame story: devices, 1:220–38, 2:203; linking in, 1:228; Sanskrit, 2:184; tall tales, 4:291
France, 3:360–78, 4:209
“Frau Hölle,” 3:90, 4:434
Freedom, 1:147
Frog god, 1:380–85
“The Frog Prince,” 2:298–301, 2:298–303
Frogs, 2:116, 2:121–22, 3:211, 4:456
“From ‘Gisli the Outlaw,’” 3:303–12
Fruit: eating piece, 3:253; falling, 1:169, 1:176
Fugitive accountability, 2:359
Fuseli, John Henry, 4:199
Gamblers, 4:124–29
Gambling for life, 2:268
Game-cock, 2:367–82
“Ga’na’a’s Adventures Among the Cherokee,” 4:94–98
Gardner, Emelyn, 4:253
Garuda, 2:359
Gaster, M., 1:242
Gazelle, 1:78
Gender, 1:161
Genealogy: Bantugan, 2:399; mythological, 1:417; mythology role, 1:353; rider claims, 1:372
Generations, 2:123
Genesis, 1:42–43, 1:181, 1:196
“The Genius,” 3:104–9
Genre: legends. See Animal tales; Fables; Fair tales; Myth; Ordinary folktales
Geographic features, 3:28
Geological features, 1:361, 1:393
Gergasi, 2:329
“Gerhajis and Arab,” 1:42–43
German influence, 4:244–57
Germany, 3:67–95
Ghana, 1:96; Yoruba culture, 1:124
“Ghost Legends of the Blue Mountains,” 4:247–48
“Ghost of the Violet Well,” 2:70–74
“The Ghost Penitente,” 4:279–80
Ghosts: corpse seeking, 2:83; obligation fulfillment motif, 2:86; Penitente, 4:279
Ghouls, 2:83
“Giant of the Flood,” 1:181–84
Giants, 3:298; biblical deluge extrapolation, 1:181; cannibal figure, 4:16; cyclops, 3:350; slaying, 3:3; zimwi, 1:55
“A Giant’s Rock-Throwing,” 1:393–95
Gift, 1:3, 1:5; animal languages, 3:109; curse of, 2:295; natural, 1:393
“A Gift for the Sultan,” 1:4–6
“Gifts for My Son Mohammed,” 1:3–4, 1:5, 3:194
“The Gifts of the Little People,” 2:32
Gilbert Islands, 1:353
“Ginas and the Rajah,” 2:318–20
Ginzberg, Louis, 1:185
“The Girl and the Fish,” 4:420–21
Girls, 1:43–44, 2:250–57, 4:248–51; bewitchment removal, 4:70; helper of hero’s flight, 3:125, 3:152, 3:171, 4:248, 4:435–36; kind/unkind, 1:121, 2:315, 3:18,

- 3:90, 4:434; two, 3:81; waxgirl, 1:78
 “The Girl Without Legs,” 1:43–44
 Gladden, George, 4:258
 “The Glass Axe,” 3:124–30, 3:125
 Gluttony, 1:80
 Goats, 2:295, 3:109
 Goblins, 2:186–91
 Goblins apparitions, 4:206
 Goblin tales, 2:184
 “God,” 4:379–82
 Gods/goddesses: birth of first, 2:62; child of human and underworld, 1:398; creation myth, 1:396; creator, 1:431; Hawaiian nature, 1:369; Hiiaka, 1:361; Lata, 1:331; marriage worthiness, 2:320; mortal women and, 3:231; offspring, 1:380; Pele, 1:361; shape-shifting, 2:17. See also Creators; Deities
 Gold Coast, 1:61
 “The Golden Crab,” 3:256–60
 “The Golden Hairpin,” 2:86–91
 “The Golden Spinster,” 3:120–24
 Golden staffs, 4:315
 Gold mines, 4:268
 Gold trade, 1:61
 “The Good Serpent,” 4:309–14
 “The Grain of Corn,” 2:291–95
 “Grandfather’s Escape to Free Haven,” 4:159–61
 “Granny Steel,” 4:251
 Grass-cutting sword, 2:64
 Grateful animals. See Animal gratitude
 “The Grateful Animals,” 2:195, 3:364
 “The Grateful Beasts,” 3:113–19
 “The Grateful Dead,” 3:139
 “The Grateful Tartaro and the Heren-suge,” 3:350–56
 “The Great Fire Bird,” 1:297–99
 Greece, 3:231–60
 Greed, 2:83, 2:264–65, 4:167
 Greek myth, 1:120, 3:231, 3:245
 Greeley, Horace, 4:185
 “The Green Lady,” 3:18–21
 Griffin, 3:185
 Grimm, Jacob, 3:67
 Grimm, Wilhelm, 3:67
 Groom, Francis Hinds, 3:174
 Guaraauano. See Warrau
 Guardians, 1:14
 Guardian spirits, 4:98
 “Guarding the Door,” 4:411
 Guatemala, 4:357
 Guile, 1:70, 4:206
 Gullibility, 4:168
 Gunfighters of American west, 4:258, 4:275
 “Gylaginning,” 3:292
 Gypsies, 3:163, 3:185
 Habitat abandonment, 1:36
 Hag-craft, 4:199
 Hags. See Night hag
 Haida, 4:79–82
 Hair, 1:333
 “Haliwari and the Wonderful Tree,” 4:443–46, 4:448
 Hammer, 3:298
 Hanauer, James, 1:241
 Hani al-Hakami, Abu-Nuwas al-Hasan ben, 1:10
 “Hansel and Grettel,” 3:67–72, 4:16
 “Hans My Hedgehog,” 3:86, 3:275
 Hare, 1:58, 1:68; Japanese folklore, 2:97. See also Rabbit
 “Harisarmen,” 2:247–50
 Harris, Joel Chandler, 1:130, 1:152, 4:186, 4:414
 Hartman, C. V., 4:364
 “Háttatal,” 3:292
 Haunting, 4:251
 Hausa, 1:98–115
 Hawaii, 1:331, 1:361–96
 Head hunting, 2:309
 Healers: curandero/a, 4:283; magical-religious cures, 4:200; piat, 4:443; pow-wow doctors, 4:244; shaman, 4:338; witch doctors, 4:227
 Heart, 1:300
 Hebrew traditional tale, 1:181–200
 “The Hedgehog and the Rat,” 1:35–36
 Hedgehogs, 3:86
 “Hello, house!/: Cave Call,” 4:367
 Helpers: Anansi, 4:429; animal, 2:359, 3:59, 3:185, 3:261, 4:98–101, 4:102, 4:309; dead men, 2:268, 2:436; girls, 3:125, 3:152, 3:171, 3:435–36, 4:248, 4:435–36; name, 3:120; nuns as, 3:253; ogres, 3:130; spirits in animal guise, 4:327; witches, 3:130
 “Help from Elijah,” 1:240
 “The Helpful Horse,” 1:45, 3:351
 Hen-sparrow, 2:281–88
 Hercules, 3:231
 Herders, 2:36–58
 Hermit crabs, 2:334
 “Hero Comes into Ogre’s Power,” 4:436
 Heroes: Bantugan, 2:398–99; cross-cultural motifs, 2:383; Cuchulain, 3:39; dragon-slayer tale type, 3:253; external transformation, 2:107; girl helpers, 3:125, 3:152, 3:171, 4:248, 4:435–36; identity and transformation, 3:139; promised to supernatural figures, 3:125; Raja Rasalu, 2:268; rescue of princess, 2:100; Roldan, 3:339; winning bride, 2:195. See also Culture hero
 “Hero is Driven from Home by His Stepmother,” 1:45
 “The Hero Twins,” 4:105–10
 Heym, Paul, 4:248
 Hierarchy of powers, 4:374
 Hiiaka, 1:361
 Hina, 1:380
 Hindu influence, 2:342–43
 Hinduism, 2:142
 Hindu theology, 2:133
 Historical accounts, 4:258; Elfego Baca, 4:275; folk history, 4:400; “Victorio’s Raid,” 4:272–75
 Historical events, 3:292, 4:400
 Historical figures, 1:10; Efik tales, 1:87; Ildris I, 1:16; Omar ibn el Khattâb, 1:213
 Historical narrative, 2:64
 Historical past, 2:16, 3:3
 History: oral transmission, 4:159; sacred, 4:393; shamans and band enmity, 2:51; warring factions, 2:142

Cumulative Index

1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania
2: Asia
3: Europe
4: North and South America

- "History of a Buffalo Hunter," 4:264–67
 "The History of Tom Thumb," 3:21–28
 Hobley, C. W., 1:31
 Hodgetts, Edith M. S., 3:194
 "Holding Down the Hat," 3:194
 "Holding up the Rock," 4:367
 Holy Land. See Palestine
 Holy man, 1:313, 2:203, 4:443
 Honor, 2:70
 Hoodoo, 4:172, 4:200, 4:203–5, 4:258
 Hopi, 4:83–88
 Horokaruru, 2:13
 "On Horseback," 4:214–15
 "The House Carpenter," 1:85, 4:194
 "How a Fox Fell Vicim to His Own Deceit," 2:126–28
 "How Ananse Tales Got Their Name," 1:61–62, 4:405
 "How a Small Kamak Was Transformed into a Harpoon Line," 2:105–7
 "How Brer Fox Dream He Eat Possum," 4:165, 4:409
 "How Brer Rabbit Brings Dust Out of the Rock," 4:187–89
 "How Brer Rabbit Practice Medicine," 4:168–70, 4:209
 "How Brothers and Sisters Came to Quarrel," 1:106–8
 "How Come Brer Bear Sleeps in the Winter," 4:161–62
 "How Come Mr. Buzzard to Have a Bald Head," 1:61, 4:163–64, 4:405
 "How Come Pigs Can See the Wind," 4:186–87
 "How Jáburu Ate the Seed of Our Kin," 3:353–54
 "How Man Made Woman Respect Him," 4:324–25
 "How Pain, Misery, and Death Came into the World," 4:448, 4:453–54
 "How Rabbi Joshua Went to Paradise Alive," 3:142–43
 "How Shango Hanged Himself and What Resulted," 1:124–26
 "How Sibû Killed Sórkura," 4:354–56
 "How Some Wild Animals Became Tame Ones," 3:313–16
 "How the Deer Obtained His Horns," 4:45–47
 "How the Devil Married Three Sisters," 3:280–82
 "How the Elves Punished a Quarrelsome Man," 4:387–89
 "How the Elves Put a Holy Father and His Sacristan to Flight," 4:391–92
 "How the First Bribri Indians Were Born," 4:351–52
 "How the Man Fooled the Tiger," 4:454–55
 "How the Raja's Son Won the Princess Labam," 2:195–202
 "How Theseus Slew the Devourers of Men," 1:120, 3:231–44, 3:253
 "How the Stalos Were Tricked," 3:316–21, 3:324
 "How the Twins Killed the Giant Elk," 4:84–85
 "How the Twins Visited the Sun," 4:83–84
 "How the Whites Became Rich," 4:54–56
 "How the Wicked Tankuki Was Punished," 2:94–96
 "How Thunder Came for the First Time," 1:126–28
 "How Tiyo Punished Man-Eagle," 4:85–88
 "How to Choose a Wife," 1:47–48
 "How Turtle Deceived Leopard into Eating His Own Mother," 1:74–75
 "How Turtle Inherited Leopard's Goods," 1:71–72
 "How Turtle's Greed Brought Him to a Sad End," 1:75–77
 "How We Beat the Caribs," 4:450–51
 Hufford, David, 4:199
 Human beings: animal disguise, 1:57; animal metamorphosis, 4:447; animal tricksters, 1:75; bears, 4:89; birth of first, 2:62; children by gods, 3:231; children of animals, 4:376; fire acquisition, 1:297; hunting of heads, 2:309; immortals and, 4:43; instruction by culture hero, 4:304; kinship to bears, 4:40; linkage to gods, 1:417; non-human boundary, 4:89; opposed by animal world, 3:352; origin, 2:40, 2:261, 3:351; pacts with superhuman, 3:357; spirits of deceased, 1:67; tricksters, 3:316
 Human flesh, 2:83, 2:105
 Humanity, 1:396, 4:353
 Human persistence, 1:108
 Human relationships, 4:25
 Humor, 1:218, 3:36
 Hunchbacks, 1:223
 Hungary, 3:96–138
 Hunger, 2:128
 Hunters, 4:57; animals granting success, 4:40; kindness repayment, 4:330; relationship with wolf, 4:33; white deer legend, 4:228
 Hunting, 2:262; animal competitors, 1:64; buffalo, 4:264; luck, 4:232; tall tale, 4:240
 Hunting and gathering: Ainu, 2:3; Australian Aborigines, 1:297; dog use, 4:50; life-way information, 1:313; Warrau, 4:50
 Husbands: animal, 2:362, 3:86; animal wife motif, 2:320; cruel, 4:448; foolish misunderstanding, 4:411; gender differences, 4:423; respect for, 4:324; saving life of, 2:133; supernatural abduction, 2:24; treacherous, 4:450
 Huts of witches, 3:212
 Hutton, H., 2:263
 Hyena, 1:108
 Ianu, 2:14
 Iberian Peninsula, 1:14
 Iceland, 3:292–312

- Identity: Basque, 3:339; devil, 4:389; heroes transformation, 3:139
- Idris ibn 'Abd Allah ibn Hassan II, 1:16
- Idrisid Dynasty, 1:16
- "Ifa," 1:129–30
- Ile Ife, 1:124
- Illanun, 2:307
- Ill omens, 4:354–55
- Immigrants: detached souls
functions, 3:144; Irish, 3:49; tradition preservation, 1:251
- Impiety: afterlife punishment, 2:83; all-encompassing destruction, 3:61; consequences of, 2:311
- Inca, 4:299, 4:301, 4:304, 4:315–23
- Incantations, 4:41–42
- Incarnations, 2:156
- India, 2:133–260; Nagaland, 2:261–67
- Indian Ocean, 1:56–57
- Indigenous categories, 1:87
- Indirect direction, 4:170, 4:212; rhetorical device, 4:170
- Indo-European folktales, 1:43, 1:169, 2:167
- Indonesia, 2:338–82; Madagascar, 1:33
- Inference strategy, 2:301
- Infidelity, 2:110
- Initiation ceremony, 1:313, 1:322
- In-laws, 2:186–91
- Innocence, 3:285
- Innocent parties, 2:336, 2:430
- Integrity: gratitude repayment, 3:113; husband demonstration, 2:320; reward for, 2:191
- Intelligence, 1:253, 4:188, 4:417
- Intentional fictions, 1:33
- International distribution: hero winning bride, 2:195; legend motifs, 2:268; sham wise man, 2:247
- "In the Beginning," 2:28–30, 3:293–96
- Inuit, 4:70
- Ireland, 3:39–53
- Iroquois bird, 1:126
- Iroquois League, 4:89–101
- Irving, Washington, 4:247
- Ishhak, 1:42
- Islam, 2:307; Bedouin culture, 1:179; Hausa people, 1:98; Indonesia, 2:342–43; Morocco, 1:12; political structures, 1:45; power structure, 1:5; scholarship, 3:390; Somalia, 1:42
- Islamic folktales, 1:42; Nasrudin, 1:7; Palestinian, 1:213–37
- Islamic influence: Borneo, 2:307; Mindanao, 2:398–99; Philippines, 2:419; Spain, 3:385; Swahili people, 1:49
- Islamic scholars, 1:216
- Islands, 2:156
- Isleta Pueblo, 4:102–11
- "The Isolated Island," 2:66–69
- Israel, 1:181–200
- Italy, 3:261–82
- "Ivanoushka the Simpleton," 3:201–11
- Izanagi, 2:62
- Jack, 4:232
- Jackal, 1:58, 1:144, 1:149, 2:152, 2:267, 2:301
- "The Jackal as Schoolmaster," 3:285
- "Jack and His Golden Snuff-box," 3:163–70
- "Jack and the Bean-pole," 4:16, 4:189–91
- "Jack and the Beanstalk," 3:12, 4:189
- "Jack and the Devil Errant," 4:435–39
- "Jack and the Fire Dragaman," 4:16, 4:236–40
- "Jack My Hedge Hog," 3:85–89, 3:275
- "Jack-O'-My-Lantern," 4:205–8
- "Jack's Hunting Trip," 4:240–43
- Jack (slave), 4:183–84
- Jack tales, 4:188, 4:229
- "Jack the Giant-killer," 3:3–12
- Jade Emperor, 2:30
- Jaguar, 4:376, 4:446–47, 4:455
- "Jake Strauss," 4:251–52
- Jamaica, 4:405, 4:423–40
- "James Harris," 1:85, 4:194
- Japan, 2:3, 2:59–104
- "Jauw's Dream," 4:327–29
- Java, 2:342–43
- Jean Sot, 4:215, 4:218
- "Jean Sot and the Cowhide," 4:215–17
- "Jean Sot Feeds Cows Needles," 4:217–18
- "Jean Sot Kills the Duck," 4:218–19
- Jellyfish, 2:80–83
- Jenks, Albert Ernest, 4:136–37
- Jewish folktales: Ashkenazim, 3:141–48; Sephardim, 3:379–84
- Jewish quarter, 1:16
- Jews, 1:14, 1:45, 1:223, 1:238
- Jicarilla Apache, 4:25–32
- "Jikininki," 2:83–86
- Jinn, 1:24, 1:220, 1:268
- "The Jinns," 1:24–25
- John and Master cycle, 4:183
- Johnson, Robert, 4:186
- "John the Bear," 4:376
- John the Fool, 4:215
- "John Tiger," 4:376–79
- Jokes: pretentiousness, 4:391; regional stereotypes, 4:220–21; romantic rivals, 4:174; stock character, 4:220; trickster, 3:148, 4:219
- Journeys to underworld, 2:62, 4:380, 4:443
- Juan Puson, 2:427
- "Juan Pusong," 2:430–35
- "Juan the Fool," 2:427–28
- Judaism, 1:179
- "The Judge Appropriates the Object of Dispute," 2:195, 3:325
- Judges, 2:152–56, 4:330
- "Judgments of Karakash," 1:218–20
- Justice: bone searching out, 4:412–13; explanatory plots, 4:409; murder victim, 2:181; outwitting of, 2:133; poetic, 4:191; raven as agent of, 4:145; secret societies, 1:83; traditional peoples, 4:19; trickster success, 4:168; when bewitched, 4:255
- Kabbala, 1:238
- "Kadiwonkuru: A Legend of the Yaurokya," 1:319–21
- Kaingag. See Caingang
- Kalahari Desert, 1:137

Cumulative Index

- |                                                    |
|----------------------------------------------------|
| 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania |
| 2: Asia                                            |
| 3: Europe                                          |
| 4: North and South America                         |
- Kamak, 2:105
 “Kampuaa Legends: Legends of the Hog God,” 1:380–93
 “Kampuaa on Oahu and Kauai,” 1:385–89
 “Kanati and Selu: The Origin of Corn and Game,” 4:33–39, 4:45
 “Kantjil the Mouse Deer,” 2:364–67
 “Karamunagau,” 1:339–41
 “Kara Mustapha the Hero,” 1:287–91
 Karna, 2:142
 Kashgar, 1:223
 Kauravas, 2:142
 Kenharingan, 2:307
 Kenya, 1:49
 “The Kind and the Unkind Girls,” 1:121, 2:315, 3:18, 3:90, 4:434
 Kindness sibling motif, 2:313, 2:315
 Kind/unkind, 1:121, 3:18, 3:90, 4:434
 King, 2:184–85; animal speech, 3:109; billy goats, 3:109; curing of, 3:390; pig, 3:274–80; of snakes, 3:253; swab maiden, 3:185–89
 “The King and the Four Girls,” 2:250–57
 “The King and the Ju Ju Tree,” 1:92–95
 Kingfisher, 4:30
 “King of the Snakes,” 3:253
 “King Pig,” 3:274–80
 Kings, 2:152, 2:295
 “King Thunderbeard,” 3:266
 “The King Who Learned the Speech of Animals,” 2:301–3, 3:109
 Kinship: Bantugan, 2:399; bears to humans, 4:40; bond violation, 1:35–36; female lineage, 4:3–4; in-law roles, 1:322; legends, 2:67; maternal uncles, 1:345
 Kintyèli, 4:124
 Kiribati, 1:353–57
 “The Knights of the Fish,” 3:385–90
 “Kolbein’s Killing,” 3:307–9
 “Komatari, the First Medicine Man,” 4:338–41
 Kôn, 1:67
 Konehu cycle, 4:343
 Koryak, 2:105–12
 Kroeber, A. L., 4:54
 Kshatriyas, 2:152
 Kurdistan, 1:201
 Kurds, 1:201–13
 Kusanagi-no-Tsurgi (sword), 2:59
 Kuyimokuna, 1:300–301

 Labeled pointing attacks, 1:300
 “La Belle aux Cheveux d’Or,” 1:242
 “The Lad Who Knew Everything,” 3:109–13
 “Lady Featherflight,” 3:12–18
 Lake Titicaca, 4:301
 Lakota, 4:112–20
 Làloména, 1:36
 “Lame Habiyó,” 1:45
 Land of dead. See Underworld
 “Langaon,” 2:323–28
 Language of animals, 2:295, 2:301, 3:109
 Lapin, 4:209, 4:212, 4:214
 Lapin and Bouqui cycle, 4:209
 Lapland, 3:321–24
 “Lata and Sinota,” 1:331–32
 Law, 2:133, 4:19
 Lebanon, 1:213
 Legal system, 1:218
 “The Legend of Maui,” 1:398–416
 “The Legend of Savaddan Lake,” 3:61–63
 “Legend of the Breadfruit Tree,” 1:368–72
 Legends, 1:313, 4:301; animal world, 4:448; Arabic origin, 1:12; Arawak-Carib enmity, 4:450; Baca, Elfego, 4:275; boy initiation, 1:313, 1:322; classification, 2:16; colonial enmity, 2:367; common functions, 3:28; duende behavior, 4:391; environmental features, 1:393; Faust, 3:160; functions of, 2:66–67; ghost, 4:247–48; hag belief, 4:199; haunting, 4:251; human-supernatural intersection, 3:357; Jewish Middle Easterners, 1:238; Kurdish tradition, 1:201; local, 4:252; lost islands, 2:66; lost treasure and gold mines, 4:268; narrative of origin, 4:13; night hag cycle, 4:225; northwest native people crests, 4:79; origin narrative, 4:13; prophet in, 4:297; Raja Rasalu in, 2:268; regional rivalries, 2:367; resistance to foreign forces, 3:339; selling soul to devil, 4:186; spirits of deceased, 1:67; supernatural, 1:24, 1:310, 2:16, 2:70, 2:74, 2:86, 3:357, 4:387; survival, 3:147; sword, 2:64; tale classification, 1:87; tale time, 4:89; tragic lovers, 3:178; trickster, 1:241; unseen animal helpers, 4:98–101; Victorio raid, 4:273; witchcraft and curing, 4:281; witch practices, 4:227
 Le Jumel de Barneville, Marie-Catherine, 3:364
 Leopard, 1:70–77, 1:144
 “The Leopard in the Maize Farm,” 1:78–79
 Liars, 4:285, 4:291
 Lies, 4:291
 Life: gambling for, 2:268; saving of husband’s, 2:133; seed origins of, 4:353; water of, 1:242
 “Ligat Liou,” 2:313, 2:315–18
 Lineage: clan, 4:3–4, 4:79, 4:140; family divine, 2:59; female, 4:3–4; hereditary, 4:79; Luo myth, 1:29; Somalia, 1:42
 Lines of descent, 1:345
 Linguistic relationships, 1:30–31
 Linking devices, 1:228
 “The Lion and the Jackal,” 1:144–46, 3:285, 4:343
 “The Lion and the Unicorn,” 1:287, 4:232–36
 Lions, 4:232–36
 “Little-Bird-Man and Raven-Man,” 2:107–10
 “Little Brother and Little Sister,” 1:260

- “The Little Hunchback,” 1:223–28
 Little John, 4:219
 “Little One Left Alive (Che-Che-Puy-Ew-Tis),” 4:57–62
 “The Little Red Ox,” 3:58
 Living and dead, 2:86
 Lizard, 1:319, 1:353
 “The Lizard Husband,” 2:361–64
 Localization: Cinderella variant, 4:382; folktale variant, 4:189; foreign tales, 1:176; legend acceptance, 3:160; märchen plot, 4:236; supernatural legends, 2:86
 Local legends, 4:252
 Lockheart, Sol, 4:200
 Lodges, 4:112
 Loki, 3:298–99
 “The Long-Legs,” 4:374–75
 Longley, Bill, 4:258
 Los Hermanos Penitente, 4:279
 Loss of innocence, 1:196
 Lost children, 4:89
 Lost islands, 2:66
 Lost love, 1:282
 Lost siblings, 2:359
 Lost treasure, 4:268
 Louisiana, 4:209
 Love: quest for women, 1:420; separation and true, 2:100; suitor sensibility and, 3:373
 Lovers, 3:178, 4:118–20
 Luck, 4:229, 4:232, 4:425
 “Lucky Jack,” 4:229–32
 “The Lucky Shot,” 4:240
 Luguna Pueblo, 4:106
 Luhya, 1:29–32
 Lummis, Charles, 4:106
 Luxman, 2:159–67

 Macaw, 4:358–64
 Madagascar, 1:33–41
 “Made Over to the Devil,” 3:170–73
 “Mafua,” 1:428–30
 Magic, 2:383; contagious, 3:216; creator gods, 1:431; healer cures, 4:200; Kabbala, 1:238; Sami people, 3:321–24; saving from wild, 2:262; of song, 4:431; sympathetic, 4:227
 Magical devices: fiddles, 1:147; singing, 1:158; swords, 3:96; tricksters, 1:78
 Magical objects, 2:268; acquisition, 2:116; hero use, 2:195
 Magical powers: restoration, 1:43; resuscitation, 3:385; transformations, 1:310
 “The Magic Fiddle,” 2:181–84
 Magicians, 3:21
 “The Magic Object is Stolen from the Hero but He Forces Its Return,” 2:176
 Magic-religious practice, 4:283
 Magic remedies, 3:390
 “The Magic Ring,” 2:176, 3:104
 Magpie Man, 2:110–12
 Magyars, 3:96
The Mahabharata (scripture), 2:133, 2:142
 Maidens, 3:216, 4:76, 4:136–37
 Majapahit Empire, 2:342
 “Making a Rope of Sand,” 2:319, 3:28
 Makunaima, 4:456
 Malabasy culture, 1:33
 Malaysia, 2:383–86
 Male creator, 4:332
 Malevolent beings, 1:310, 1:319
 Malice, 3:81
 Malicious spirits, 1:24
 Malignant spirit, 1:333
 Manabozho, 4:124
 “Manco Capac,” 4:301–2, 4:302
 “A Man Deceives a Women,” 2:185, 2:203–21, 3:275
 Mandra-mankana, 1:301
 “Mandra-Mankana, Also Called Bakuta-Terkana-Tarana or Kantayulkana,” 1:301–3
 Man-eagle, 4:85–88
 Man-eater, 3:231, 4:16–18
 Manhood initiation, 1:313, 1:322
 “The Man in the Moon,” 2:13, 2:14–15
 “Manoli,” 3:178–81
 “The Man Persecuted Because of His Beautiful Wife,” 1:265
 Mantis, 1:154
 “The Mantis Assumes the Form of a Hartebeest,” 1:137, 1:154–57

 “The Man Who Flew Like a Bird and Swam Like a Fish,” 3:139
 “A Man with a Wife Who Could Change Herself into a Wild Animal,” 1:119–20
 “Many Wise Fools,” 2:185, 2:203, 2:221–33, 3:275
 Maori, 1:396
 Märchen, 4:236, 4:415
 Marginality, 4:4, 4:33–34, 4:102
 Maritine trade, 1:56–57
 Maroons, 4:324–31, 4:343
 Marriage: to animals, 1:57; Bluebeard plot, 3:360; conclusion merger, 2:419; devil, 3:280; Efik customs, 1:82–83; father/son to mother/daughter, 2:191–95; female deity, 2:30; magical restoration, 1:43; strife, 1:5; trickster, 4:75–76
 Mason County War, 4:258
 Masquerade figure, 1:83
 Massachusetts, 1:176
 Matthews, Washington, 4:124
 Maui, 1:398
 Maxims, 4:425
 Maya, 4:357–66, 4:397
 “The Maya Creation,” 4:357–58
 Medicine: knowledge, 4:85–86; pow-wowing, 4:248
 Mediterranean Europe, 3:229–82
 Melanesia, 1:329–49
 Men, 1:158, 2:92
 “The Merchant of Venice,” 1:52
 Merchants: tale telling, 1:52
 Merlin, 3:21
 Metamorphosis: animal/human/animal, 4:447
 “Meteor Hell! Cicero Done It,” 4:285–90
 Mexico, 4:349–401, 4:367–92
 Mice, 2:128–30
 Micronesia, 1:351–57
 Middle East, 1:49, 1:167–293, 1:223, 1:251
 Migration: Carib, 4:453; Navajo to Southwest, 4:124; ocean, 1:396; Pipil oral history, 4:397; Plains natives, 4:112
 Military epics, 2:74
 “The Miller at the Professor’s Examination,” 3:35–38

Cumulative Index

- |                                                    |
|----------------------------------------------------|
| 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania |
| 2: Asia                                            |
| 3: Europe                                          |
| 4: North and South America                         |
- Mina, 1:297
Mindanao, 2:398–99
Minotaur, 3:231
Miracle worker, 1:240
“A Miraculous Sword,” 2:59, 2:64–66
“Miti’ and Magpie Man,” 2:110–12
Mizrahim, 1:238
Modernization of folktales, 4:189
Moldavia, 3:178
Mole, 4:86
Money, 3:54
Monkey, 2:267, 2:428–30, 4:405
“The Monkey and the Jackal,” 2:267
“The Monkey and the Jellyfish,” 2:80–83
“The Monkey and the Tortoise,” 2:415–19
“The Monkey’s Fiddle,” 1:147–48
“Monkey Who Left His Heart at Home,” 2:80
Monks, 2:184–85
Monsters, 1:282; cleansing environment of, 1:324, 4:124; garuda, 2:359; griffin, 3:185; man-eagle, 4:85; slaying of, 4:34; stupid, 3:316–17, 3:351; trickster skills over, 4:53; twins cleansing from, 4:84, 4:148; wit over, 1:282
Monster-slayer: tricksters, 4:16–17; twins, 4:84, 4:148; youthful, 1:120
Moon, 2:97, 4:385
Mooney, James, 4:47
Moon gods, 4:359
Moralistic tales, 4:380
Morality: comic misunderstanding, 1:223; Pueblo view, 4:110
Moral lessons, 2:203
Morals: code synthesis, 2:343; fable personifications, 2:436; fables, 1:112; goals, 2:396; origin explanations, 1:306; precepts, 1:33, 1:116
“More Cunning than Father,” 4:425–28
Morocco, 1:12–25
“The Mosquito’s Village,” 2:313–14
Mother, 1:106, 1:158; boasting, 3:120; eating of fruit, 3:253; marriage, 2:191–95. See also Stepmother
“Mother Goose,” 3:360
“Mother Holle,” 3:89–92, 4:253
Mothers-in-law, 1:322
Motif, 2:359; animal gratitude, 2:176, 2:268, 2:277, 2:429, 2:436, 3:113, 3:364, 4:329–30; black ship sails, 3:253; cleansing of world, 1:324, 3:231, 4:84, 4:124, 4:148, 4:359; combinations, 4:385; concealing murder, 4:343; creation myth, 2:62; cross-cultural, 1:45; cruel stepmother, 1:119, 1:260, 2:167, 3:18; “Dead Man as Helper,” 2:436; defiance by young women, 4:76; devil’s questions test, 4:194; disguise and trickery, 1:57; disguised deities, 4:315; divided villages, 4:148; eating fruit, 3:253; “Enmity of Fowl and Cockroach,” 4:430; exchanges, 4:121–22; “Exposure in a Boat,” 2:383; expulsion by stepmother, 1:45; fire making, 4:13; folly turned to fortune, 4:215; forgotten fiancée, 3:12; ghost obligation fulfillment, 2:86; “The Girl as Helper in the Hero’s Flight,” 3:12, 3:125, 3:152, 3:171, 4:248, 4:435–36; human/animal spouse transformation, 2:320; Indo-European central, 2:167; legend international, 2:268; lost islands, 2:66; magic power of song, 4:431; magic sword, 3:96; obstacle flight, 2:62, 2:298, 4:118, 4:194, 4:385; ocean migration, 4:13; rescue from supernatural abduction, 2:24; tale classification, 1:87; theft of food, 4:409; tragic event signs, 4:448; transformation into stones, 4:319; treacherous husband, 4:450; trickster cousins, 3:49; trickster shape-shifting, 4:170; twin, 1:347, 4:456; two siblings, 2:313; underworld symbolism, 3:152; unnatural suitor, 1:85; weak animal deceives larger, 2:121; “What Is in the Dish: Poor Crab,” 4:184; witch, 3:216; younger brothers, 2:245
Motivations: Anansi, 4:429; stupidity, 4:218; tricksters, 2:329, 4:175, 4:214
Mountain lion, 4:31
“Mountain of the Bell,” 1:179–80
Mountain spirits, 4:247
Mount Yoshino, 2:70
Mouse, 2:128
Mouse deer, 2:328–37, 2:364–67
“The Mouse Deer and Crocodile,” 2:366–67
“The Mouse Deer and the Bear,” 2:333
“The Mouse Deer and the Crocodile,” 2:335–36
“The Mouse Deer and the Giant,” 2:328–32
“The Mouse Deer and the Hermit Crab,” 2:334–35
“The Mouse Deer and the Tiger,” 2:332–33, 2:364–65
“The Mouse Deer in a Hole,” 2:336–37
“The Mouse Deer, Tiger, and Ape,” 2:365–66
Mozambique: Swahili people, 1:49
“Mr. Deer’s My Riding Horse,” 4:173–75, 4:214
“Mr. Hard Time,” 4:411–12
Much Ado About Nothing (Shakespeare), 3:34
Mules, 4:212–14
Mullah, 1:42
Mullah Nasrudin, 1:6–9
Münchhausen, Karl Friedrich Hieronymus von, 4:291
Munsumundok, 2:307
Mura-mura, 1:300, 1:301, 1:319
“The Mura-Mura Darana,” 1:308–9
Murder: avengers and justice, 4:19; bone accusation, 4:412–13; curse for, 3:304; justice, 2:181; trickster concealment, 4:343

- Musician: unclean occupation, 2:181
 Muslim prohibitions, 1:12
 Muslims, 1:241
 Myanmar, 2:261
 "My Son Ali," 1:176–78
 "The Mysterious Deer," 4:228–29
 Mystical figures, 1:216
 Myth, 1:125, 1:158, 2:261, 4:297, 4:301; Ananse characteristics, 1:96; anthropomorphic culture hero, 1:300; birth from spittle, 4:364; cosmological, 1:396; creation, 2:307, 2:338, 4:124–29, 4:357; creators, 1:301; criteria, 3:3; deity-herdsman marriage, 2:30; deluge, 4:306; divided vil-lages, 4:148; divination systems, 1:129; earliest times, 2:388, 2:396; environmental features, 1:393; events time making, 1:324; evil spirits, 2:105; fire acquisition, 1:297, 4:64; folktale distinction, 4:89; Haggada and biblical, 1:196; hunting rituals, 4:40; impiety, 2:311; infidelity and spousal revenge, 2:110; jour-ney to underworld, 1:372; line-age, 1:417; lodge rites, 4:112; Luo, 1:29; Native American, 4:67; northwest native people, 4:79; omen origins, 4:354–55; origin, 1:29, 1:137, 1:353, 2:28, 2:40, 4:3, 4:13, 4:25, 4:73, 4:302, 4:341, 4:351; plant life, 4:353; power of holy men/ healers, 4:443; prayer wand, 2:14; rabbit-big man-eater, 4:18; ritual preparation for, 4:33; ruler genealogy, 1:372; sacred history, 4:393; sacred plants, 4:397; searching for sun, 4:76; self-brought-up-man, 2:13; shaman rituals, 4:338; spirit origin, 1:335, 1:339; subsistence staples, 1:161; sword, 2:59, 2:64; tale classification, 1:87, 4:423; tattoo origins, 1:425; trickster, 1:303, 2:107, 4:45–47; turtle messen-gers, 2:80; twin culture heroes, 4:106, 4:359, 4:456; volcanic activity, 1:361; world view, 3:352
 Mythical creatures, 3:185, 4:387
 Mythology, 1:380; cosmological, 1:396; dividing and ordering process, 2:309; genealogy, 1:353, 1:417; Greek, 1:120, 3:231, 3:245; Hindu, 2:133–44; Norse, 3:292, 3:298–99; Polynesian, 1:417; Yoruba, 1:124. See also Creation myth; Origin myths
 Na Areean, 1:353
 Naga, 2:261–67
 Nagas, 2:116
 Naiveté, 3:285
 "The Name of the Helper," 3:120
 Names of stock characters, 1:5
 Naming of species, 4:304
 Nancy, 4:405, 4:407, 4:429
 "Nancy and the Honey Tree," 1:61, 4:405–7
 "Nancy Fools His Wife," 1:61, 4:326, 4:407–8
 Narrative, 1:345, 2:80; allegorical class, 1:253; animal husband, 2:362; animal tale functions, 3:313; fairy tales as literary, 3:360; faithful servant, 2:159; frame tales, 2:184–85; god first person usage, 2:17; historical, 4:400; historical and shamanic, 2:51; infidelity and spousal revenge, 2:110; legends, 1:241; localization, 1:176; location, 2:13; origin, 4:25; origins, 4:13; personal experience, 3:141, 3:144, 3:339; plot amalga-mation, 1:242; question-and-answer pattern, 2:250; religious fiction, 1:223; sacred songs, 2:3; sacred sword, 2:64; spirits and shamans, 2:36; supernatural beings in, 1:268; traditional rites, 2:59; trickster role reversal, 2:97
 Narrator, 1:169, 4:285; first person, 2:13, 2:16
 Narwhal, 4:72
 Nasrudin, 1:6–7
 Natchez, 4:121–23
 Native Caribbeans, 4:441–51
 Native North America, 4:1–155
 Native North American influence, 4:327
 Native North Americans: hunting by Plains, 4:50; tame and wild brother narratives, 4:33–34; transvestites, 4:13; Two-Faces character, 4:53; Yoruba culture, 1:124
 Native North American traditions: bears in, 4:89; youthful monster-slayers, 1:120
 Natural forces, 1:124, 2:17
 Natural order adherence, 4:420
 Natural phenomenon, 1:369
 Nature spirits, 2:59
 Navajo, 4:124–29
 Negev, Israel, 1:179
 Netherlands, 2:367
 "Never Tell the Things of Taboo You Happen to See," 1:67–68
 Newell, William Wells, 4:206, 4:247
 New Zealand, 1:396–416
 Nezahualpilli, 4:400
 Nicholas, Francis C., 4:297
 Nigeria, 1:87
 Night hag, 4:199, 4:225
 "The Night Owl and His Bat Brothers-in-law," 4:341–42
Nights with Uncle Remus (Chandler), 4:186
 Nikitine, B., 1:201
 "The Nix of the Mill Pond," 3:92
 "The Nixy," 3:92–95
 Nkondi, 1:78
 Nobility: boyard, 3:182; clan divi-sion, 1:42; clans and crests, 4:79
 Nomadic peoples: Australian, 1:297; Bedoin, 1:179; Caingang, 4:306–8; Cheyenne, 4:54; Chuk-chee, 2:36; Crow, 4:67; Lakota, 4:112; San, 1:137; Warrau, 4:332
 Nonhuman-human boundary, 4:89
 Nonsense phrases, 1:291
 "Noqoilpi, the Gambler: A Navajo Myth," 4:124–29
 Nordic countries, 3:283–335
 Norse mythology, 3:292, 3:298–99
 North America, 4:1–294; ethnic borrowing, 4:174; non-native ethnic cultures, 4:157–221

Cumulative Index

- |                                                    |
|----------------------------------------------------|
| 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania |
| 2: Asia                                            |
| 3: Europe                                          |
| 4: North and South America                         |
- North Carolina, 4:163
 Northeastern Woodlands, 4:124
 Northern Africa, 1:1–25, 3:385; Sephardim, 1:14
 Northwest Coast native cultures, 4:79–82, 4:140
 Norway, 3:304, 3:321–24
 Novella, 1:43, 1:420
 Nubians, 1:5
 Nuhua, 4:393–401
 “Numskulls Unable to Count Their Own Number,” 2:288
 Numskull tale, 2:288–90; Aggies, 4:220; Boudreaux, 4:220; Jean Sot, 4:215, 4:217; Juan Puson, 2:427
 “Numskull Talks to Himself and Frightens Robbers Away,” 4:215
 Núnñē’hi, 4:43
 Nuns, 3:253

 Oath of secrecy, 2:320, 4:447
 Obligations and generational tension, 2:123
 Obstacle flight, 2:62, 2:298, 4:118, 4:194, 4:385
 Occult, 1:24, 4:172
 Occupations, 2:70, 2:181
 Oceania, 1:295–432, 1:331
 Ocean migration, 4:13
 ‘Off with the rat’s head,’ 1:106
 Og, 1:181
 “Ogre Carries Sham Dead Man,” 4:455
 Ogres, 3:317; cautionary tales, 2:262; folktale classification, 1:158; helper role, 3:130; hospitality to, 4:236; stupid, 3:350–51
 “The Ogre’s Tasks,” 4:436
 Ojibwa, 4:130–39
 “The Old Bride Chosen,” 4:436
 Old people, 2:388, 2:396
 Old stories, 4:422
 Old women, 4:199

 Omar ibn el Khattāb, 1:213
 Omens, 4:354–55
One Thousand and One Nights, 1:10, 1:220, 2:184, 2:419, 3:275
 “One Thousand Rubles,” 3:148
 Onondaga, 4:89
 Openings, 1:106, 1:274, 2:329, 2:338, 4:324, 4:327, 4:415
 Opportunism, 3:334
 Oral histories of families, 4:159
 Oral performance, 3:171
 Oral tradition: anxieties, 3:360; epic transmission, 2:74; formulaic composition, 1:106; Haggada creation narrative, 1:185; Hausa people, 1:98; lost islands, 2:66; Pipil migration, 4:397
 “The Order of the Hideous Masked Persons, and How They Met Their Fate,” 1:120–21
 Ordinary folktales, 4:253, 4:255, 4:367, 4:376, 4:385, 4:435–39; allegorical class, 1:253; blind learns secrets, 3:113; “The Cannibal Mother and Her Children,” 1:158; complexity and episodes, 2:383; contrasts and parallelism, 3:67; cross-cultural motif, 1:45; dwarf’s gift, 2:32; faithful servant, 2:159; “The Fish Lover,” 4:420; formulaic devices, 1:169; genre elements, 4:253; justice not done, 4:255; “The Kind and Unkind Girls,” 2:315; learning fear variant, 1:257; localization and modernization, 4:189; multiepisodic, 2:274; plot amalgamation, 1:242; plot inversion, 2:298; pre-Columbian/European blend, 4:309; prisoner freedom, 1:147; rescue from supernatural abduction, 2:24; social status elevation, 3:73; stolen magic objects and return, 2:176; threes in, 3:201; transformation in, 3:185; trickster perseverance, 1:251
 Origin: of human beings, 2:261; of predators, 2:311; of sacred objects, 1:308; of sacred plants, 4:397; of sea mammals, 4:74; of serpent figonas, 1:335, 1:339; of social practices, 1:303; of species characteristics, 1:303; of women, 4:423
 Origin myths: Birbri, 4:351; deluge, 4:306; foces, 2:28; Norse, 3:293–96; old people in, 2:388; raven as self-created one, 2:40; San, 1:137; Warrau, 4:341
 “Origin of Acoma,” 1:324, 4:3–12, 4:34, 4:102
 “Origin of Fire,” 4:27–28
 “Origin of Tattooing,” 1:428
 “Origin of the Adlet and the Whiteman,” 4:73–75
 “Origin of the Alabama Indians,” 4:13–16
 “Origin of the Apaches,” 4:25–27
 “The Origin of the Calabash Tree and the Tobacco Plant,” 4:397–98
 “Origin of the Ja-Luo,” 1:29–30
 “The Origin of the Narwhal,” 4:72–73
 “Origin of the Spider,” 1:108–11
 “The Origin of Woman,” 4:423–24
 “Origins,” 1:137–43
 Orphans, 2:262
 Otohime, 2:80
 Ottoman Empire, 1:238, 3:96
 Outcasts, 2:70
 Outlaw hero, 4:162
 “Outwitting the King,” 1:251–53, 1:253
 “The Owl,” 2:3, 2:13–14
 Owl god, 2:3
 Owls, 4:284, 4:341

 Pacts with devil, 4:186
 Padamelon, 1:303
 Pakistan, 2:268–90
 Palestine, 1:181; Islamic, 1:213–37; Jewish, 1:238–50
 Pandavas, 2:142
 P’an Ku, 2:28
 Papa, 1:369
 Papa-tu-a-nuku, 1:398
 Paradise, 2:338
 Parent defiance, 4:76
 Parodies, 1:218
 Parrot, 2:167
 “Paul Heym, the Wizard of Lebanon,” 4:248

- Peach Tree villages, 4:13
 Peasant trickster, 3:194
 Pele, 1:361
 "Pele and Kamapuaa," 1:309–93
 "Pele's Long Sleep," 1:361–68
 Pennsylvania German folktales, 4:244–57
 Performance: cumulative tale, 2:291; formulaic closing, 1:176; narration devices, 1:176; values of folk, 1:33
 Peris, 1:282
 Perrault, Charles, 3:360, 3:364
 Perseverance, 1:251, 3:77
 Persia, 1:220, 1:264, 3:379
 Persian origins, 1:5
 Personal experience narratives: battle legends, 3:339; buffalo hunting, 4:264; classification, 2:16; cultural traditions, 3:141; detached souls, 3:144; goblin apparitions, 4:206; religious, 4:200; root/two-headed doctors, 4:202–3; Southwest gun-fighters, 4:258; tall tales, 4:240; witch, 4:244
 Personality traits, 4:174
 Personal narratives, 4:159
 Personal protectors, 2:16
 Personification, 2:62, 2:436
 Peru, 4:299
 "Peter Ox," 3:285–88
 Philippines, 2:388–438
 "Phoebe Ward, Witch," 4:225–26
 Physical strength, 1:310
 Pia, 4:456
 Piai, 4:443
 Pigs, 1:347, 3:274–80, 4:186
 "The Pig with the Golden Bristles," 3:202
 Pipil, 4:397
 Plains native culture, 4:50, 4:112
 Plandok, 2:328–37, 2:364–67
 Plants, 1:319, 4:3, 4:397
 "Playing Godfather," 4:164–66, 4:409
 "Playing Mourner," 4:408–10
 "Playing the Godfather," 4:168
 Play-on-words, 2:263
 Plot: amalgamated, 1:242; animal tales, 1:57; benevolent naïveté, 3:285; biblical variant, 1:42, 1:181; bone leading to murderer, 4:412–13; boundary crossing, 4:194; "Cinderella" extension, 2:419; explanatory justice, 4:409; fable admonition, 1:121; frame tale resolution, 2:184–85; "Girl as Helper in the Hero's Flight," 4:435–36; granting wishes, 2:102; Indian frame tale conclusions, 2:233; ironic, 4:89; Jack tales, 4:229; looking for wife, 3:289; märchen, 4:236; numskull, 2:288; resemblance, 1:43; revenge justice, 4:19; shape-shifting spouses, 1:119; "The Singing Bone," 2:181; social justice for wife, 4:19; stolen magic ring, 2:176; true love and separation, 2:100; twist and revenge, 1:6; "Unjust Umpire Misappropriates Disputed Goods," 2:116; unnatural suitors, 1:85
 Poetry, 2:3
 Poland, 3:139–62
 Political systems, 1:45, 1:61; colonialism, 2:367
 Polygamy, 1:106
 Polynesia, 1:359–432
 Polynesian mythology, 1:417
 "Poor Little Maria," 2:419–24
Popol Vuh, 4:357
 Popular culture, 4:264; chapbooks, 3:3–4; tengu in, 2:92
 Porcupine, 4:89
 Porter, Ralph S., 2:399
 Portugal, 3:379
 Portuguese–West African trade, 1:116
 "Possessed of Two Spirits," 4:202–5
 Possum, 4:165
 "A Pound of Flesh," 1:52
 Power: dreams, 3:216; hierarchy of, 4:374; holy men/healers, 4:443; Islam structure, 1:5; magic song, 4:431; ogres, 4:436; shaman, 2:36, 2:51, 4:70; superficial appearance, 2:16; supernatural, 1:369, 2:36–58, 2:429, 4:40, 4:124; weak trickster, 2:121; witch social, 1:253; words variants, 4:405; word use, 4:405
 Powers: magical, 1:43, 1:310, 3:385; shaman, 4:70
 Pow-wow doctors, 4:244, 4:248
 Pow-wowing, 4:248
 Prayer wands, 2:14
 Preacher, 4:167
 Pre-Columbian culture: ball game, 4:364; Incas, 4:315
 Predators, 2:128, 2:311
 Presentation, 2:3
 Preservation of traditions, 1:251
 Pretension, 3:36, 4:391
 Preternatural beings, 1:55
 Prey, 2:128
 "The Priest and the Devil," 4:389–91
 Priests, 1:129, 1:341, 2:152, 4:389
 Primal chaos, 1:353
 Prince, 2:116–20, 2:184–85, 2:298; five weapons, 2:156; folly exposure, 2:221; monster guise, 1:282
 "Prince Fickle and Fair Helena," 3:77–80
 "The Prince's Elopement," 2:184–91, 3:275
 Princess, 4:209–12; criticism of suitors, 3:266; Labam, 2:195–202; rescue, 2:100; as reward, 3:390
 "The Princess on the Glass Mountain," 3:202
 "The Princess with Golden Hair," 1:241–50
 "Prince Unexpected," 3:152–60, 3:171
 Prisoner freedom, 1:147
 Prophetic dreams, 4:327
 Prophets, 4:297
 "The Prose Edda," 3:292–98
 Prosperity, 3:285
 Protagonists: female, 3:34, 4:255; maternal uncles, 1:345; wit over monsters, 1:282
 Protectors, 2:16, 4:43
 Protestant religions, 4:200
 Protest tales: racial discrimination, 4:185
 Proverb: diamond cut diamond, 2:255; kinship bonds, 1:36
 Pseudo-verification: tall tales, 4:285
 Psycho-physiological phenomenon: hag experience, 4:199

Cumulative Index

- 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania
2: Asia
3: Europe
4: North and South America
- Pueblo: Acoma, 4:3; influence, 4:25; Isleta, 4:102–11
“Punchkin,” 2:167–76
Punishment: in afterlife, 2:83;
agents of fall, 1:196; curiosity
and, 3:280; profane touch, 1:369
Punjab, 2:255, 2:268, 2:291–97
Puns, 4:179; orphan boy trickster,
2:263
Punt, 1:42
Purim, 3:379
“Puss in Boots,” 2:429
- “The Queen with a Hundred
Lovers,” 4:400
Quest: lost love, 1:282; lost siblings, 2:359; lover for beloved,
1:420; wife recovery, 2:320
“Quest for Lost Sister,” 1:274
Question-and-answer pattern,
2:152, 2:250
“Quetzalcoatl and Tezcatliopca,”
4:393–96
- Rabbi, 3:143, 3:381
“The Rabbi Extracts a Confession,”
1:240–41
“The Rabbi Kolonimos,” 1:238–39
Rabbit, 4:45, 4:63, 4:65, 4:367,
4:410, 4:414, 4:418; African American traditions, 4:415;
blame shifting, 4:165; Brer, 4:45,
4:166–89; Cajun folktales,
4:209; fox, 4:31; konehu, 4:343;
romantic rival humiliation,
4:173; tar baby, 4:121–23; trickster and Anansi, 1:61; trickster/culture hero, 4:16–17, 4:162. See
also Hare
“Rabbit and Big Man-Eater,”
4:17–18
“Rabbit and Coyote,” 4:367
“The Rabbit and the Python,”
1:116–17
“Rabbit Fools Alligator,” 4:65–66,
4:343
Rabbit foot amulet, 4:172
“Rabbit Gets a Turkey for Wildcat,” 4:63–64, 4:343
“Rabbit Kills Big Man-Eater,”
4:16–17
“Rabbit Rides Fox A-Courting,”
4:174
“Rabbit Steals Fire,” 4:64–65,
4:343
“Rabbit’s Triumph,” 1:152–54
“Race Won by Deception,” 2:334
Racial discrimination: protest tale,
4:185
Rain, 4:83
Rainbows, 1:333
Rain-bringing, 1:308, 4:102
Rainstorms, 1:333
“Raja Donan,” 2:383–86
“Raja Rasalu,” 2:268–76
“Rakian,” 2:320–23, 2:323
“Rama and Luxman,” 2:159–67
“Range Life in Texas,” 4:258–64
Rascals, 2:255
Rat, 4:409
“The Rat Princess and the Greedy
Man,” 2:264–65
“The Rattlesnake’s Vengeance,”
4:42–43
Raven, 2:40, 2:105, 4:75–76,
4:140–45, 4:145–47
Raven-Man, 2:107–10
“The Raven Mocker,” 4:47–49
“Raven’s Creation,” 2:39–43
“The Reason for Abstaining from Wine and Pork,” 1:12–14
Rebirth, 2:36, 4:112
Reconstruction period, 4:258
“Recovering the Sun,” 4:76–78
“The Red Calf,” 3:58–60
Reece, Harry, 4:291
Reef Islands, 1:331
Regional rivalries, 2:367
Religion: healer magic cures,
4:200; Hopi practices, 4:83;
Shinto, 2:59
Religious authorities, 1:24, 1:216,
3:28, 4:102
Religious beliefs, 4:297
Religious devotions, 3:143
Religious experiences, 4:200
Religious factions, 1:223
Religious instruction, 3:381
Religious societies, 4:279
Reptiles, 2:116
Rescue: by bridegroom, 1:420; from death, 2:176; from supernatural
abductions, 2:24
“Rescue by the Sister,” 3:280
Resistance legends, 3:339
Retribution, 1:43
“Return of a Cantonist,” 3:141–42
“Return of Siegfried,” 4:247–48
Revenge: creator role, 1:301; curse,
3:304; myth and spousal, 2:110;
plot twist, 1:6; social justice,
4:19; stepmother scheme, 3:261;
trickster, 2:415, 4:163; vampire
bats, 4:341; witches, 4:227
Rewards, 2:191, 2:315
Rhetorical devices, 2:281, 2:291,
4:170
Rhyme, 2:281, 2:291
“The Rich and the Poor Peasant,”
2:245
“Ricky of the Tuft,” 3:373–78
Rings, 2:176–81
“Rip Van Winkle” (Irving), 4:247
Rituals: calling game, 4:33; daily affairs, 2:181; dance, 2:59; hunting success, 4:40; magic, 4:227;
preparation for hearing myth,
4:33; shaman healing, 4:338;
shamanic, 2:51; sun deity, 4:319;
warrior cultures, 4:95; warrior
preparation, 4:95
Ritual songs, 4:40, 4:42, 4:355
“The Robber Bridegroom,” 3:34–35
“Robbers Smuggled into House in Food Containers,” 2:424
Roberts, John, 3:163
Robertson, Steve, 4:285, 4:291
Robinson, Braziel, 4:203
“The Rogish Peasant,” 3:194–97
Roland, 3:339
“Roldan’s Bugle Horn,” 3:339–50
Roma, 3:130, 3:163–77
Roman Catholicism, 4:279
Romania, 3:178–93
“Roostam the Game-Cock,”
2:367–82

- Rooster feet, 4:389
 Root doctors, 4:203–5
 “Royal Rivals: The Pandavas and Kauravas,” 2:133, 2:141–53, 2:142
 Rulers, 1:372, 4:319
 “Rumplestiltskin,” 3:120
 “Runaway Scrape,” 4:13
 Rural culture, 1:3
 Russia, 2:3, 3:141, 3:194–228

 “The Sack of Peas and the Mule,” 4:212–14
 Sacred formulas, 4:47
 Sacred history, 4:393
 Sacred objects: origins, 1:308; swords, 2:64; taboos, 1:369
 Sacred songs, 2:3, 2:16, 4:39
 Sacred texts, 1:185
 Sacrifice: community and self-, 1:238; of innocents, 2:336, 2:430
 Sailors, 1:345
 Saka, 2:268
 Sami (people), 3:313–35
 Samoa, 1:417–30
 Samurai class, 2:70
 “Samyekukuru and His Sister,” 2:17–19
 San (people), 1:137–57
 San Cristoval, 1:333, 1:335
 Santals, 2:181
 “The Saragossan Purim,” 3:379–80
 Satan, 4:186
 Savitri, 2:133–44
 “The Scabby Shaman,” 2:43–50
 Scheherazade, 1:220
 Scheltema, J. F., 2:367
 Science: magic remedies, 3:390
 Scotland, 3:54–60
 Scottish Irish, 4:229
 Scythians, 2:268
 Sea, 2:13
 Seafaring: dangers and rewards, 2:67
 Sea-lions, 4:124
 “Seal Island,” 2:15–17
 “The Search for the Lost Husband,” 3:256
 Seasons: arctic, 4:74; motifs interpretation, 3:152
 Sea spirits: Eskimo female, 4:74

 “The Secret Room,” 4:255–57
 Secrets: blind learning of, 3:113
 Secret societies: justice enforcement, 1:83
 Seeds, 4:353
 Self-brought up-man, 2:13
 Self-brought-up-Man, 2:16, 2:17
 Self-created one, 2:40
 Self-interest: trickster, 3:299
 Self-sacrifice: community, 1:238
 Self-serving characters: animal tales, 1:35
 Semang (people), 2:383
 Semidivine beings, 2:388
 Seneca tribe, 4:95–101
 Sephardim, 1:14, 1:16, 1:238, 3:379–84
 Serpents, 2:277
 Serpent, 1:196, 1:335, 1:339, 2:100; horned, 4:50; seven-headed, 3:253–56, 3:351
 Serpents, 4:309
 Servant: faithful, 2:159
 Servants, 1:5
 Settings: medieval, 1:45
 Settlements: Tlingit, 4:145
 “The Seven-headed Serpent,” 3:253–56
 “The Seven Wise Men of Buneyr,” 2:288–90
 Shahryar, 1:220
 Shakespeare, William, 1:52, 3:34
 Shaman, 4:338; curative powers, 4:70; divination, 2:113; power and rituals, 2:51; powers, 2:36, 2:43; sea spirit visitation, 4:74; shape-shifting, 3:321
 Shamanism, 2:113, 3:313, 4:338
 Shango, 1:124–29
 Shape-shifter: Anansi, 4:326; asuang, 2:429; Brer Rabbit, 4:170; daughter of underworld lord, 3:152; god-human offspring, 1:380; Japanese animal, 2:95; night hag, 4:225; nixies, 3:92; omens, 4:354–55; rabbit, 4:121; shaman divination, 2:113; Spider-Woman, 4:85–86; wife in animal guise, 1:265; wisemen-shaman, 3:321; Yurokons, 4:453

 Shape-shifting, 1:333; acts, 3:174; animal skin transformation, 3:212; animistic beliefs, 2:17; evil spirits, 2:105; pow-wow doctor, 4:248; spouses, 1:119; trickster, 4:407–8; trickster monster-slayer, 4:17; tricksters, 1:72, 1:154; witches, 4:284. See also Transformation
 “The Shepherd and the Daughter of the Sun,” 4:319–23
 Shinto, 2:59, 2:62
 Shiva, 2:191
 “A Short History, Purporting to Give the Origin of the Hausa Nation and the Story of Their Conversion to the Mohammedan Religion,” 1:98–105
 Siberia, 2:36–58, 2:105–12
 Siblings: abandonment and community, 4:72; beautiful/ugly twins, 3:373; kind/rude motif, 2:313, 2:315; quest for lost, 2:359; younger, 3:198, 4:137. See also Brothers; Sisters; Twins
 Signs of tragic events, 4:354, 4:448
 Sikes, W. Wirt, 4:206
 “The Silence Wager,” 1:5, 3:182
 “The Silver Plate and the Transparent Apple,” 3:198–201
 Simpletons, 3:198, 3:201
 Sinai Peninsula, 1:179
 Singing, 1:126, 1:158
 “The Singing Bone,” 1:106, 2:181, 3:185, 3:198, 4:412
 Sioux. See Lakota
 Sis Pig, 4:186
 “Sister of the Sun,” 3:324–34
 Sisters: marriage to devil, 3:280; unkind, 3:18, 3:90
 “Skáldskaparmál,” 3:292
 Skin: animal, 3:212; changing, 4:121, 4:225; having two, 1:87–92; metamorphosis, 4:447
 Skunk, 4:354–55
 Sky deity, 2:62
 Slavery, 4:186
 Slaves, 1:5, 1:61, 1:80; Bahamas, 4:414; maroons in Suriname, 4:324
 “The Slave’s Fortune,” 3:380–84

Cumulative Index

- |                                                    |
|----------------------------------------------------|
| 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania |
| 2: Asia                                            |
| 3: Europe                                          |
| 4: North and South America                         |
- "The Slaying of the Tanuki," 2:97–100
 "Sleeping Beauty," 3:73
 Smoking: rain-bringing, 4:102
 Snake, 1:324, 2:116, 2:123, 2:266, 4:42, 4:124, 4:330, 4:448
 "Snake and Hunter," 4:329–31
 "The Snake Helper," 4:309
 Snorri Strurluson, 3:292
 Snowbird, 4:75–76
 "Snow-White," 3:261
 "Snow-White and Rose-Red," 3:81–85
 Soane, E. B., 1:201
 Social class: caste divisions, 2:152; cautionary tale, 3:182; status legend, 2:70; wit not distinguishing, 1:253
 Social conditions: humor, 1:218; protest tale, 4:185
 Social hierarchy, 2:67, 2:152
 Social norms, 2:262
 Social order, 1:16, 3:28, 4:387
 Social organization, 1:179
 Social power, 1:253
 Social practices, 1:303
 Social relations: clans, 1:42; cumulative tale, 2:291; Jews and Muslims, 1:241; trickster motivations, 4:175
 Social status: animal language gift, 3:109; blind, 3:113; elevation, 3:73; marriage, 1:43
 Social truths, 1:33
 Society: customary law, 4:19; subsistence and stability, 4:79
 "Sol Lockheart's Call," 4:200–202
 Solomon Islands, 1:331–49
 Somalia, 1:42–58, 1:421; Swahili people, 1:49
 Somersaults, 3:174, 3:185
 "The Song of Roland," 3:339
 "The Song of the Coffee Pot," 1:253–56
 Songs: magic, 4:431; ritual, 4:40, 4:42, 4:355; sacred, 2:3, 2:16, 4:39; transformation power, 4:431; trickster use, 1:73
 "The Son of the Hunter," 1:169
 Sons: father jealousy of, 4:426; of human and animal, 4:376; marriage, 2:191–95; winning princess, 2:195–202
 Sorcerers, 2:167
 Sórkura, 4:354
 Soul, 3:144, 4:186
 South America, 4:295–348
 South Asia influence: Indonesia, 2:359
 Southeast Asia, 2:305–438
 Southern Africa, 1:135–65
 Southern plains, 4:148
 Southern U.S., 4:164; Aggies and Cajuns, 4:220–21; cross-cultural borrowing, 4:209; fool motifs, 4:215; Southern tricksters, 4:45
 Southwestern U.S.: Aggies, 4:220
 Southwestern U.S. folktales, 4:258–94
 Southwestern U.S. native peoples, 4:124
 Spain, 3:385–98; conquest of Mexico, 4:367; duendes, 4:387; Jews, 3:381; Sephardim, 3:379
 Spanish influence, 2:419
 Sparrow, 1:291
 Spider, 1:87, 1:96, 4:324, 4:429; anthropomorphic trickster, 4:163; tricksters, 1:108; West African trickster, 1:61
 Spider-Woman, 2:40, 4:83, 4:85–86
 "The Spirit of a Buried Man," 3:149–52
 "The Spirit of Defenders of Nikäi," 4:43–45
 Spirits: animals possessing, 4:447; bush, 4:332, 4:338; daily affairs, 2:181; of dead, 1:67; double, 4:202; evil, 2:105; forest, 4:453; guardian animal, 4:98; haunting, 4:251; helpers in animal guise, 4:327; mountain, 4:247; mythic origin, 1:335; nature, 2:59; shaman powers, 2:36; water, 3:92; wish granting, 2:102
 Spiritual essence, 2:17
 Spirituality in warfare, 4:95
 Spouse: animal, 1:265, 2:362, 3:86, 4:255, 4:431; demonic, 3:280; extraordinary tasks, 4:137; infidelity and revenge myth, 2:110; shape-shifting, 1:119; transformation, 2:167, 2:320, 2:323. See also Husbands; Wife
 Sri Lanka, 2:298–303
 "Sry Nagasary," 2:342–59
 Stalo, 3:316, 3:321
 Stars, 4:148–55, 4:456
 Steiner, Roland, 4:200
 Stepdaughter, 1:282
 Stepmother: cruel, 1:119, 1:260, 2:167, 3:18; revenge schemes, 3:261; wicked, 1:176, 2:122, 2:268; witch parallelism, 3:67
 "Stepmother Demands Bull's Blood," 1:45
 Stereotypes: Aggies and Cajuns, 4:220–21; foolishness, 4:220; regional jokes, 4:220–21
 Stock characters: Boudreaux, 4:220; gypsy, 3:130, 3:185; Jean Sot, 4:215; mutes, 4:220; names, 1:5; preacher, 4:167
 Stone, 4:112, 4:319
 "The Stone Boy," 4:112–15
 "The Stonecutter," 2:102–4
 "Stonger and Strongest," 2:102
 "The Storm Fiend," 1:274–82
 Storm god, 2:59
 "A Story About a Giant, and the Cause of Thunder," 1:111–15
 "Story of a Tengu," 2:92–94
 "The Story of Bantugan," 2:398–415
 "De Story of de Man and Six Poached Eggs," 4:439–40
 "The Story of Hok Lee and the Dwarfs," 2:32–35
 "The Story of Ibonía," 1:36
 "The Story of Juan and the Monkey," 2:428–30
 "The Story of Lodge Boy, After-Birth Boy and Double-Face," 4:34
 "Story of Lumbart and Wari," 2:395–98
 "The Story of Mini-Nashi-Hoichi," 2:74–80
 "The Story of Mr. Fox," 3:34–35

- “Story of Savitri,” 2:133–41
 Story of Tangi-nui, 1:398
 “The Story of the Buffalo and the Lion,” 1:32
 “The Story of the Children and the Zimwi,” 1:55
 “Story of the Fin-back Crest,” 4:79–82
 “The Story of the Flesh of the Thigh,” 1:52–54
 “The Story of the Kite and the Mole,” 1:32
 “The Story of the Pretty Goldilocks,” 3:364–72
 “The Story of the Prince’s Friend,” 2:116–20, 2:121, 2:123
 “The Story of the Rat and the Cat,” 1:31–32
 “The Story of the Sun and the Moon,” 4:384–87
 “The Story of the Swan Maiden and the King,” 3:185–89
 “The Story of the Two Devils,” 2:113–16, 2:123
 “The Story of the Vizir Who Was Punished,” 1:228–37
 Strangers, 2:315
 Straparola, Giovanni Francesco, 3:274–75
 Strategy, 2:301, 4:162
 “Stronger and Strongest,” 2:265, 4:374
 “Student of Paradise,” 1:4
 Stupidity: Jean Sot, 4:218; monster, 3:316–17, 3:351; preternatural, 1:55; puns, 4:217. See also Fools
 “Stupid Stories Depending on a Pun,” 4:217
 Subsistence: Ainu, 2:3; Australian Aborigines, 1:297; Borneo, 2:307; labor division, 1:158; myth, 1:161; myths, 1:161; predictability, 4:79; Sami people, 3:313; tales recalling, 1:56
 Sudras, 2:152
 Sufism, 1:7, 1:216
 Suicide, 2:70
 “The Suitor,” 3:289–91
 Suitors: admirable shape shifting, 1:265; avenging slight, 3:266; courtship attempts, 3:289; curiosity about, 3:280; love and sensibility, 3:373; unnatural, 1:85
 Sun, 2:107, 4:76–78, 4:83, 4:385, 4:456
 “The Sun, the Frog, and the Firesticks,” 4:456–58
 Sun deity, 4:319; Vukub-Cakix, 4:359
 Sun goddess, 2:59
 “The Sun Goddess and the Storm God,” 2:59–62
 “Sunrise,” 2:359–61
 Sunshowers, 1:333
 Superficial appearance, 2:16
 Supernatural: assistance, 3:270; bridegroom, 1:420; creation myths, 2:338; flight, 4:389; two-headed doctors, 4:203
 Supernatural assault, 1:300; night hag, 4:199, 4:227; shaman powers, 4:70
 Supernatural beings, 2:388; Bagobo myths, 2:388; snakes, 4:42; workings of, 1:268
 Supernatural belief, 1:341
 Supernatural figures, 3:125
 Supernatural head of society, 1:83
 Supernatural legend: duendes role, 4:387; female jinn, 1:24; human-supernatural intersection, 3:357; manhood initiation ceremony, 1:313; military epic, 2:74; Self-brought-up-Man, 2:16; social class status, 2:70; validating devices, 2:86
 Supernaturally-caused affliction, 1:92
 Supernatural medicine, 1:87
 Supernatural power: acquired by cannibalism, 2:429; incantations, 4:40; Manabozho, 4:124; taboo objects, 1:369
 Supernatural presence, 2:3
 Superstitions, 4:252
 “The Surety,” 1:213–16
 Surfboard, 1:372
 Suriname, 4:324
 Suriname Maroon, 4:324–31
 “Suto and Tato,” 1:201–13
 Swahili, 1:49–58
 “The Swallow and the Tortoise,” 1:116, 1:118–19
 Swords: drawing of, 3:96; sacred Japanese, 2:59, 2:64; theft-murder curse, 3:304
 Symbolism: cockfighting, 2:367; seasonal and solar motifs, 3:152
 Sympathetic magic, 4:227
 Syria, 1:251–55
 Székeley, 3:104
 Ta’aroa, 1:431
 “The Table, the Ass, and the Stick,” 2:427, 4:191
 “Tablecloth, Donkey, and Club,” 4:191–93
 Taboo, 1:67, 1:369
 Taboo words, 4:425
 “Tach the Prophet,” 4:297–98
 Tagalog, 2:424
 Tahiti, 1:431–32
 “The Tail-fisher,” 4:410
 Taino (people), 4:443
 Tale: cumulative, 2:281; generational tension, 2:123; linking of series, 1:228; myth classification, 1:87, 4:423; numskull, 2:288; performance, 1:42
 “Tale of a Lantern,” 1:16–22, 1:45
 “The Tale of an Ogress,” 2:262–63
 “A Tale of a Snake,” 2:266
 “The Tale of Our Dying Away,” 3:352–53
The Tale of the Heike (military epic), 2:74
 “Tale of the Rabbit,” 4:367–73
 “Tales of Fox,” 4:29–32
 Tale type: “The Cat as Sham Holy Man,” 2:128; death sentence revocation, 1:147; domestic strife, 1:5; “Dragon-Slayer,” 3:253; “The Fox Persuades the Cock to Crow with Closed Eyes,” 2:128; “The Grateful Dead,” 3:139; hero winning bride, 2:195; Indo-European central, 2:167; “The Judge Appropriates the Object of Dispute,” 3:325; multiepisodic Turkish, 1:274; rabbit cycle, 4:367; “The Search for the Lost Husband,” 3:256; “The Singing Bone,” 4:412; “Theft of Butter (Honey)

Cumulative Index

- |                                                    |
|----------------------------------------------------|
| 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania |
| 2: Asia                                            |
| 3: Europe                                          |
| 4: North and South America                         |
- by Playing Godfather," 4:164; ungrateful animals, 2:277
- Tall tales, 4:240, 4:285, 4:291
- Tangaroa, 1:431
- Tanuki, 2:95–96, 2:97–100
- Tanzania, 1:49
- Taoism, 2:28
- "Taraematawa," 1:341–43
- Taranga, 1:398
- Tar baby, 1:78, 2:156, 4:121–23, 4:209–12, 4:367, 4:414
- "The Tar Baby," 4:121–23, 4:414
- "The Tarbaby and the Rabbit," 2:156, 4:367
- Tartaro, 3:350–51
- Tasks to win spouse, 2:195, 4:137
- "Tattoo," 1:425–30
- Technology: creation myth, 2:338; fire, 4:64; gift of Africa, 1:29
- Temptation, 1:36
- Tengu, 2:92–94
- Tensions, 2:123
- Territorial rights, 3:351
- Tests: bride, 1:47, 3:289; child trickster, 2:319; by devil, 4:194; drawing of sword, 3:96; sincerity, 3:148; wife, 1:66
- Tetragrammaton, 1:238
- Texas, 4:258
- Texas A&M University students, 4:220
- Texas Revolution of 1836, 4:13
- Theft: of fire, 4:27, 4:64; of food, 3:334, 4:409; of sword, 3:304
- "Theft of Butter (Honey) by Playing Godfather," 4:164, 4:409
- "The Theft of Fish," 3:334
- "Them Petrified Buzzards," 4:285, 4:290–94
- Theseus, 3:231
- Thomas, Mary, 4:159
- Thompson, Stith, 1:420, 4:110
- "Thor in Peril," 3:298–303
- "The Thrall's Curse," 3:304–7
- "Three Animals as Brothers-in-law," 1:274
- "The Three Golden Sons," 2:419
- "The Three Lemons," 3:130–38, 3:163, 3:185
- "Three Little Pigs and the Big Bad Wolf," 4:186
- "Three Men of Galway," 3:49–53
- "The Three Precepts," 3:54
- "The Three Rajahs," 2:308–11
- Three (sacred number), 3:201
- "The Three Stolen Princesses," 3:253
- Tibet, 2:113–30
- Tiger, 2:152–56, 2:332, 2:364–65
- "The Tiger and the Frog," 2:121–22
- "The Tiger Changed into a Woman," 4:446–48
- "Tiger Softens His Voice," 4:431–34
- Ti Jean, 4:219
- "Ti Jean Cannot Tell a Lie," 4:219
- Time: mythic events, 1:324; story classification, 4:89
- Tiruray tribe, 2:399
- Titans: myth of, 2:28
- Tiyo, 4:85–88
- Tlingit (people), 4:140–45, 4:140–47
- Tobacco, 4:338, 4:397
- Togo: Yoruba culture, 1:124
- Tolba, 1:24
- Toltecs, 4:393
- "Tom Thumb," 3:3, 3:21
- Tone: revealing content, 2:221
- Tools: culture hero, 1:398
- Tortoise, 1:68–77, 1:80, 1:82–85, 1:152, 2:415–19
- "The Tortoise and the Elephant," 1:68–70
- "The Tortoise and the Hare," 2:334
- "The Tortoise with a Beautiful Daughter," 1:82–85
- Totem animals, 4:89
- Totemic clans: culture heroes, 1:301
- Toyotomi Hidetsugu, 2:67
- Toyotomi Hideyoshi, 2:67
- Trade: Efik-European, 1:80; West African, 1:116
- Trade routes: morality on, 1:223
- Traders, 2:152
- Tradition: immigrant community preservation, 1:251
- Traditional arts, 4:253
- Traditional healers: roles and methods, 1:92
- Tradition bearers, 4:253
- Trances, 4:338
- Transformation, 1:310; act inversion, 3:174; animal spouse, 2:320, 2:323; anthropomorphic to wild, 4:415; external, 2:107; heroes into stars, 4:148–55; plot inversion, 2:298; somersaults, 3:185; song power of, 4:431; spouse, 2:167; into stones, 4:319; twins in stars, 4:456. See also Shape-shifting
- Transformation tales: hero identity, 3:139
- Transvestites: Native Americans, 4:13
- Transylvania, 3:104, 3:178
- Trapping, 4:57
- "Trapping a Hag," 4:198–99
- Traps: magical, 1:78
- Travel between worlds, 2:43
- "The Treacherous Jackal," 1:57–58
- Treasure: dwarves, 3:81; lost, 4:268
- Trees, 3:299
- Trials: siblings in arctic communities, 4:72
- "Tricking of Gylfi," 3:292
- Trickster: Abu'n-Nuwa's, 1:251; African animal tales, 1:68; Algonquin cultures, 4:124; amorality and guile, 1:70; Anansi, 1:61, 1:96, 4:163, 4:324, 4:326, 4:329–30, 4:425–30; animal fables, 1:76; animal myth, 1:303; animal tales, 1:57, 1:80, 2:328, 4:161–62; Ann Nancy, 4:163; Bantu tales, 1:68–77; being tricked, 4:410; Big Raven, 2:105; blame shifting, 1:72, 4:165; Boudreaux, 4:220; Brer Rabbit, 4:45, 4:166–89, 4:170; buzzard, 4:182; cat, 2:128; cockroach, 4:430; community interest, 4:172; community service, 1:80; cousins bested, 3:49;

- cowardly, 1:144; coyote, 4:116; cross-cultural characteristics, 2:430–31; culture hero function, 3:3; cunning amorality, 1:71; drunken success, 4:455; dual nature, 1:6; duelist mentality, 2:333; Egypt, 1:3; exploitation, 4:174; exposure, 2:107; extraordinary nature, 2:318–19; fire theft, 4:64; fox, 3:325, 4:27, 4:29; frog, 2:121–22; gazelle, 1:78; human, 3:316; imitation, 4:110; Jack, 4:229; jackal, 1:58, 1:144, 2:152; Japanese animal, 2:97; Jewish legends, 1:241; jokes, 3:148; Juan Puson, 2:427, 2:430–31; konehu, 4:343; Kororomanna, 4:332; Lapin, 4:209; Lata, 1:331; Loki, 3:298–99; loss by, 2:334; Maori, 1:3.98; marginality, 4:102; mole, 4:86; motivations, 4:175, 4:214; mouse deer cycle, 2:328–37, 2:364; opportunistic nature, 3:334; orphan boy, 2:263; peasant, 3:194; poets, 1:10; popular African, 1:152; precocious child, 2:318–19; puns against, 4:179; rabbi, 3:143; rabbit, 4:16–17, 4:45, 4:65, 4:121, 4:415; raven, 2:40, 4:75, 4:140; sacrifice of innocents, 2:336, 2:430; scatology, 2:415; Self-brought-up-Man, 2:17; serpent, 1:196; shape-shifting, 1:72, 1:154; skills over monsters, 4:53; sparrow, 1:291; spider, 1:353; strategy, 2:301, 4:162; tanuki, 2:95; theft of food, 4:409; Ti Jean, 4:219; traits, 1:68; twins, 4:84; ungrateful animals, 2:277; wallaroo, 1:303; West African, 1:108; younger brothers, 2:245. See also Culture hero
- “The Trickster and the Sultan,” 1:6–9
- “Trouble (Rabbit Loses His Tail),” 4:179–82
- “The True Sweetheart,” 3:77
- Truth, 2:435–38
- “Truth and Falsehood,” 2:435–38
- Tsamba tormas, 2:123
- “Tsarevna Frog,” 3:211–16
- Tuglay, 2:388–95
- Tuglibung, 2:388
- Turkey, 1:257–93
- Turkish narratives, 1:176
- Turks, 1:3
- Turtle, 1:72–77, 1:333, 2:80
- “Turtle Deceives Zoe, Giving Leopard the Blame for Stealing Zoe’s Daughter,” 1:72–74
- “Turtle Drinks at the Expense of the Other Beasts,” 1:70–71
- “Turtle Surpasses Man in Ingenuity,” 1:75
- “Twardowski the Magician,” 3:160–62
- “The Twelve-Headed Griffin,” 3:185
- Twenty-Two Goblins*, 2:184, 2:233, 3:275
- Twins: children of sun, 4:456; culture hero, 4:359, 4:364; heroes, 4:105–10; magical resuscitation, 3:385; Native American motif, 4:34, 4:148–55; sun visited by, 4:83; trickster cleansing, 4:84, 4:148
- “The Twins or Blood-Brothers,” 3:385
- “Two Boys and Their Grandmothers,” 1:121–23
- “The Two Boys Who Slew the Monsters and Became Stars,” 1:120, 1:324, 4:34, 4:53, 4:57, 4:106, 4:148–55, 4:456
- “Two-Faces,” 4:53–54, 4:57
- “Two Girls, the Bear and the Dwarf,” 3:81
- Two-headed doctors, 4:203
- “The Two Hunchbacks,” 1:64–66
- “Two Sons of the Creator,” 4:304–5, 4:319
- “The Two Sons of the Creator,” 4:315
- Tyrants, 4:162
- Uganda, 1:29
- Ukraine, 3:171
- Ulster myth cycle, 3:39
- Unclean occupations, 2:181
- Underground world, 4:3, 4:25, 4:86
- “Under the Green Old Oak Tree,” 2:181, 4:412–13
- Underworld, 1:398; bride, 1:353, 1:372–80; child with god of, 1:398; emergence from, 4:302; gods of, 1:369; journey to, 1:372, 2:62, 4:380; revival from, 1:343; symbolism, 3:152
- “The Ungrateful Serpent Returned to Captivity,” 2:152, 2:277, 4:329
- Unicorn, 4:232–36
- United Kingdom, 3:3, 3:54
- United States, 1:176
- Universe: creation, 1:396, 1:431, 2:28, 2:338; description, 2:43; ordering, 1:324, 2:309
- “Unjust Umpire Misappropriates Disputed Goods,” 2:116
- Unkind/kind. See Kind/unkind
- Unkind sibling motif, 2:315
- Unnatural suitors: motifs of, 1:85
- “The Unseen Helpers,” 4:98–101
- Untrustworthy characters, 1:35
- Upper classes, 3:182
- Urban cultures, 1:3
- Urban–rural dichotomy, 1:3
- Uzume, 2:59
- Vaiyas, 2:152
- Validating devices: facts, 2:67; foreign tales, 1:176; localization, 2:86, 3:160, 4:387; naming, 4:387; tall tales, 4:285
- Vampire: bats, 4:341; folly exposure, 2:221; frame tale, 2:203; frame tale by captured, 2:203
- “The Vampire,” 3:173–77, 3:185
- “The Vampire Puzzles Raja Vikram,” 2:203, 2:233–44, 3:275
- “The Vampire” Puzzles Raja Vikram,” 2:185
- Variants: “Animal Allows Himself to Be Tied to Another for Safety,” 2:121; “The Animal Languages,” 2:295, 2:301, 3:109; “The Beautiful and the Ugly Twin,” 3:373; biblical, 1:42; “Bird’s Pea Gets Stuck in Socket

Cumulative Index

1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania
2: Asia
3: Europe
4: North and South America

of Mill-Handle," 2:291; "The Brave Tailor," 1:287, 4:232; "Cinderella," 2:419, 3:58, 3:270, 4:382; "Deceptive Tug-of-War," 4:417; deity-herdsman marriage, 2:30; domestic strife, 1:5; "The Dragon-Slayer," 3:351; "Ferdinand the True and Ferdinand the False," 3:364; formulaic devices, 1:169; "The Forty Thieves," 2:424; "The Gifts of the Little People," 2:32; "The Girl as Helper in the Hero's Flight," 3:125, 3:152, 3:171; "Guarding the Door," 4:411; "Hansel and Gretel," 3:67; "Hans my Hedgehog," 3:275; "The Helpful Horse," 3:351; Indian frame tale conclusions, 2:233; Italian tales, 3:261; "Jack and the Beanstalk," 4:189; "John the Bear," 4:376; "The Kind and the Unkind Girls," 3:18, 3:90, 4:434; "The King's New Clothes," 2:250; "King Thunderbeard," 3:266; "Little Brother and Little Sister," 1:260; "The Lucky Shot," 4:240; "The Magic Ring," 2:176, 3:104, 3:163; "Monkey Who Left His Heart at Home," 2:80; moral code synthesis, 2:343; "The Name of the Helper," 3:120; plot inversion, 2:298; power words, 4:405; predators/prey characters, 2:128; "Puss in Boots," 2:429; Rabbit's / Hare's triumph, 1:152; "Rescue by the Sister," 3:280; "The Rich and the Poor Peasant," 2:245; "Robbers Smuggled into House in Food Containers," 2:424; "The Search for the Lost Husband," 3:256; "The Singing Bone," 2:181, 4:412; "Sleeping

Beauty," 3:73; "Snow-White," 3:261; storylines, 1:4; "Stronger and Strongest," 2:265, 4:374-75; "Stupid Stories Depending on a Pun," 4:217; "The Table, the Ass, and the Stick," 4:191-93; tar baby, 4:121; "Theft of Butter (Honey) by Playing Godfather," 4:409; "The Theft of Fish," 3:334; "The Three Golden Sons," 2:419; "The Three Oranges," 3:130-38; "The Three Precepts," 3:54; "Tom Thumb," 3:21; "The Twins or Blood-Brothers," 3:385; "Two Girls, the Bear and the Dwarf," 3:81; "Ungrateful Serpent Returned to Captivity," 2:277; "The Ungrateful Serpent Returned to Captivity," 4:329; "The Watcher Blinded," 4:182; "The Youth Who Wanted to Learn What Fear Is," 1:257
 Vasques, Manuel Jesus, 4:264
 Veddah, 2:298
 Verse, 2:268, 3:21
 "Victorio's Raid," 4:272-75
Vikram and the Vampire, 2:185, 2:203, 2:233, 3:275
 Villages: divided, 4:148; Isleta Pueblo, 4:102; justice enforcement, 1:83; Native American, 4:13
 Viracocha, 4:299, 4:304, 4:309
 "Viracocha," 4:315-19
 Virgins of the sun, 4:319
 Virtue-reward tale type plots, 3:77
 Visayas, 2:430
 Visions, 4:200
 Viziers, 1:216
 Volcanoes, 1:361
 Vows, 2:399
 "Vukub-Cakix, the Great Macaw," 4:358-64, 4:364

 "Waipumaremare," 1:343-45
 Wakea, 1:369
 Wales, 3:61-63
 "Walking from Magical Forgetfulness," 4:436
 Wallachia, 3:178
 Wallachia language, 3:174
 Wallaroo, 1:303
 "The Wallaroo and the Willy-Wagtail," 1:303-5, 1:306
 Walt Disney, 1:152
 "Walutahanga," 1:335-39
 Warfare, 4:95
 Warrau, 4:332-48
 Warriors, 2:152, 3:304, 4:95
 Wars, 4:258, 4:273
 "Warungarce," 1:333-35
 "The Watcher Blinded," 4:182
 "The Watcher Tricked," 4:182-83
 Water of life and death, 1:242
 Waters (tabooed), 1:372
 Water spirits, 3:92
 Waxgirl, 1:78
 "The Way in which Andrianoro Obtained a Wife from Heaven," 1:36-41
 Weak animals, 2:121
 Weapons: prince of five, 2:156; sword myth, 2:59, 2:64; tests, 3:96; theft-murder curse, 3:304
 "The Weaver Maiden and the Herdsman," 2:30-32
 "The Weight before the Door," 1:14-16, 1:45, 1:238
 Werewolves, 3:174
 Western Africa, 1:61-134; Ann Nancy/Anansi, 4:163
 Western Europe, 3:337-98
 Westervelt, W. D., 1:380
 West Indies, 4:405
 Whales, 4:79, 4:417
 "What Happens to Wives When They Think More Highly of Anything Else Than Their Husbands," 1:6-67
 "What Is in the Dish: Poor Crab," 4:184
 "When Brer Rabbit Help Brer Terrapin," 4:200
 "When Brer Rabbit Saw Brer Dog's Mouth So Brer Dog Can Whistle," 4:175-79
 "When Brer Rabbit Was Presidin' Elder," 4:166-67
 "When Raven Wanted to Marry Snowbird and Fly with the Geese," 4:75-76, 4:140

- “The White Slipper,” 3:390–98
 “Why Ananse Lives in the Ceiling,” 1:96–97
 “Why Men and Tigers Are Enemies,” 2:261–62
 “Why Rabbit Has a Short Tail,” 4:410–11
 “Why the People Tote Brer Rabbit Foot in Their Pocket,” 4:172–73, 4:175
 “Why the Worms Are Blind and Why the Elephant Has Small Eyes,” 1:80–82
 Wichita, 4:148–55
 “The Wicked Sparrow,” 1:291–93
 “The Wicked Stepmother,” 1:176, 2:122–26
 Wife, 1:106; animal guise, 1:265, 2:320, 2:323; animals seeking human, 4:431; cruelty to, 4:448; deception of, 4:407; dwellings, 1:106; foolish misunderstanding, 4:411; gender differences, 4:423; infidelity, 4:443; looking for, 3:289; metamorphosed tiger, 4:447; saving husband’s life, 2:133; social justice plot, 4:19; traded for mule, 4:212
 “The Wild Cat and the Rat,” 1:34–35
 Wildness, 4:415
 Willy-wagtail, 1:303
 Wilson, Howard Barrett, 1:253
 Windigo, 4:16
 “The Wine, the Farm, the Princess and the Tarbaby,” 4:209–12
 Winged men, 2:92
 Winter, 4:161–62
 Wisdom: choice over money, 3:54; decorum, 1:82; trickster, 1:82, 4:172
 Wise fools, 1:7, 2:221–33
 Wisemen, 2:247, 3:321
 Wishes, 2:102
 “The Witch and Her Servants,” 3:216–28
 “The Witch and the Boiler,” 4:226–28
 “The Witch and the New Born Infant,” 3:356–59
 “The Witch at Bosen Corner,” 2:315, 4:434–35
 Witchcraft, 4:283; skin taking, 4:121; Southwest region Spanish culture, 4:281
 Witch doctors, 4:227
 Witches: Berberisca, 3:385; bruja/brujo, 4:283; brujas, 4:281; elders opposition to, 4:102; helper role, 3:130; huts, 3:212; legends, 4:227; motif range, 3:216; night-goer, 4:47; night hag, 4:225; possessing two hearts, 4:83; shape-shifting, 3:174, 3:357, 4:85–86, 4:284; social power, 1:253; stepmother parallelism, 3:67; trickster action against, 4:172
 “Witches Discovered,” 4:281, 4:284–85
 “Witch Flights,” 4:281, 4:283–84, 4:389
 Wits, 1:72
 “The Witty Exploits of Mr. George Buchanan the King’s Fool,” 4:440
 Wolf, 4:33, 4:98, 4:209, 4:248–51
 Wolf clan, 4:140–45
 “The Wolf Dives into the Water for Reflected Cheese,” 4:367
 “Wolf of the Greenwood,” 4:248–51
 “The Woman Who Was Fond of Intestines,” 4:19–24
 “The Woman with a Bear Lover,” 4:118–20
 “The Woman with Two Skins,” 1:87–92
 Women: bear as lover, 4:118–20; children by gods, 3:231; child with underworld god, 1:398; clan lineage, 4:3–4; creator of human, 4:332; deception by man, 2:203–21; dream appearance, 4:385; gardening, 2:3; hunter-gatherer society value, 1:313; marriage to disguised animals, 1:57; origin, 4:423; parent defied by young, 4:76; stealing of, 4:450; subsistence labor, 1:158; suicide, 2:70; supernatural bridegroom abduction, 1:420; supernatural child bearing agreement, 3:373; treatment of husband, 4:324; warrior, 3:39. See also Bride; Wife
 Women-spirit, 4:70
 “The Wonderful Tar-Baby Story” (Harris), 1:152, 4:414
 Woodpecker, 4:110–11
 Words, 4:405, 4:425
 World, 2:156–59, 4:76
 “The Worship of the Thunderbolt: A Story of Shango,” 1:128–29
 Wrenchall, Leitia Humphreys, 4:244
 Writing systems, 4:33, 4:357

 Xhosa (people), 1:158–65

 Yama, 2:133
 Yamato-dake no Mikoto, 2:64
 Yoruba, 1:124–34
 Yoshino Yama, 2:70
 Younger brothers, 2:245, 3:216
 Younger siblings, 2:167, 3:198
 “The Young Man and the Snake,” 2:276–81
 “Young Men Who Killed the Horned Serpent and Released the Buffalo,” 4:50–53
 “Your Horse Stays Outside,” 4:185–86
 “The Youth in the Land of Cheaters,” 2:255
 “The Youth Who Received Supernatural Powers from the Ke’let,” 2:36–58, 2:105
 “The Youth Who Wanted to Learn What Fear Is,” 1:257
 Yu-Huan, 2:30
 Yukara, 2:3
 Yupik (people), 4:70
 “The Yuri-Ulu,” 1:321–24
 Yurokons (people), 4:453

 Zimwi, 1:55
 Zuni Pueblo, 4:124

About the Editor

THOMAS A. GREEN is Associate Professor of Anthropology at Texas A&M University. His many books include The Greenwood Library of American Folktales (Greenwood, 2006), and Martial Arts in the Modern World (Praeger, 2003).

The Greenwood Library of

world folktales

STORIES FROM THE GREAT COLLECTIONS

volume three

Europe

EDITED BY THOMAS A. GREEN

The Greenwood Library
of
World Folktales

The Greenwood Library of World Folktales

---

Stories from the Great Collections

VOLUME 3

Europe

Edited by Thomas A. Green

Jack Zipes, Advisory Editor

GREENWOOD PRESS
Westport, Connecticut • London

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

The Greenwood library of world folktales : stories from the great collections / edited by Thomas A. Green.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 978-0-313-33783-3 ((set) : alk. paper) — ISBN 978-0-313-33784-0
((v. 1) : alk. paper) — ISBN 978-0-313-33785-7 ((v. 2) : alk. paper) —
ISBN 978-0-313-33786-4 ((v. 3) : alk. paper) — ISBN 978-0-313-33787-1
((v. 4) : alk. paper)

1. Tales. 2. Folklore. I. Green, Thomas A., 1944-

GR74.G74 2008

398.2—dc22 2007041323

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data is available.

Copyright © 2008 by Thomas A. Green

All rights reserved. No portion of this book may be reproduced, by any process or technique, without the express written consent of the publisher.

Library of Congress Catalog Card Number: 2007041323

ISBN: 978-0-313-33783-3 (set)

978-0-313-33784-0 (vol. 1)

978-0-313-33785-7 (vol. 2)

978-0-313-33786-4 (vol. 3)

978-0-313-33787-1 (vol. 4)

First published in 2008

Greenwood Press, 88 Post Road West, Westport, CT 06881

An imprint of Greenwood Publishing Group, Inc.

www.greenwood.com

Printed in the United States of America

The paper used in this book complies with the Permanent Paper Standard issued by the National Information Standards Organization (Z39.48-1984).

10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

Contents

---

VOLUME 3

Introduction to Volume 3	ix
Europe	1
Britain and Ireland	1
England	3
Jack the Giant-Killer	3
Lady Featherflight	12
The Green Lady	18
The History of Tom Thumb	21
The Demon Tregeagle	28
The Story of Mr. Fox	34
The Miller at the Professor's Examination	35
Ireland	39
Death of Cuchulain	39
Three Men of Galway	49
Scotland	54
The Baker of Beaully	54
The Red Calf	58
Wales	61
The Legend of Savaddan Lake	61

Contents

Central Europe	65
Germany	67
Hansel and Grettel	67
The Crystal Coffin	72
Prince Fickle and Fair Helena	77
Snow-White and Rose-Red	81
Jack My Hedge Hog	85
Mother Holle	89
The Nixy	92
Hungary	96
The Boy Who Could Keep a Secret	96
The Genius	104
The Lad Who Knew Everything	109
The Grateful Beasts	113
The Golden Spinster	120
The Glass Axe	124
The Three Lemons	130
Eastern Europe	139
Ashkenazim	141
Return of a Cantonist	141
How Rabbi Joshua Went to Paradise Alive	142
The Dybbuk of Bunker Street	144
Contempt for His Torturers	147
One Thousand Rubles	148
Poland	149
The Spirit of a Buried Man	149
Prince Unexpected	152
Twardowski the Magician	160
Roma	163
Jack and His Golden Snuff-box	163
Made over to the Devil	170
The Vampire	173
Romania	178
Manoli	178
The Fisherman and the Boyard's Daughter	182

The Story of the Swan Maiden and the King	185
The Twelve-Headed Griffin	189
Russia	194
The Roguish Peasant	194
The Silver Plate and the Transparent Apple	198
Ivanoushka the Simpleton	201
Tsarevna Frog	211
The Witch and Her Servants	216
The Mediterranean	229
Greece	231
How Theseus Slew the Devourers of Men	231
Alcestis	244
The Seven-Headed Serpent	253
The Golden Crab	256
Italy	261
The Crystal Casket	261
The Crumb in the Beard	266
Cinderella	270
King Pig	274
How the Devil Married Three Sisters	280
The Nordic Countries	283
Denmark	285
Peter Ox	285
The Suitor	289
Iceland	292
The Prose Edda	292
Thor in Peril	298
From "Gisli the Outlaw"	303
Sami	313
How Some Wild Animals Became Tame Ones	313
How the Stalos Were Tricked	316
Andras Baive	321
Sister of the Sun	324
The Fox and the Lapp	334

Contents

Western Europe	337
Basque	339
Roldan's Bugle Horn	339
The Grateful Tartaro and the Heren-Suge	350
The Witch and the New Born Infant	356
France	360
Bluebeard	360
The Story of Pretty Goldilocks	364
Ricky of the Tuft	373
Sephardim	379
The Saragossan Purim	379
The Slave's Fortune	380
Spain	385
The Knights of the Fish	385
The White Slipper	390
Glossary	399
Bibliography to Volume 3	401
Cumulative Index	403

Introduction to Volume 3

---

Europe is the westernmost peninsula of the Eurasian-African landmass, including the British Isles and Iceland far to the west. To the south, the Strait of Gibraltar establishes the boundary between the Iberian Peninsula and Africa. The eastern boundary between Asia and Europe is not so clearly defined, however. For purposes of The Greenwood Library of World Folktales, Europe includes not only the territory west of the Ural Mountains, the Ural River, and Caspian Sea, but those nations of the former Soviet Union such as Georgia, Kazakhstan, Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, Kyrgyzstan, and Tajikistan with cultural as well as political ties to Russia. The following divisions have been established for this collection: Britain and Ireland, Central Europe, Eastern Europe, the Mediterranean, the Nordic countries, and Western Europe.

Britain and Ireland have preserved a traditional narrative repertoire influenced by an indigenous Celtic culture and a culture of Germanic invaders who began arriving in the fifth century B.C.E. Later influences included Viking incursions and settlement in the ninth century and the Norman Conquest of the late eleventh century. The Celtic heritage appears not only in tales from Ireland (Éire) and those constituent countries of the United Kingdom that maintained Celtic identities into the twenty-first century (Northern Ireland, Scotland, and Wales), but also in Brittany across the English Channel and in the English county of Cornwall (see introductory notes to “Jack the Giant-Killer,” page 3 for further discussion). The preservation of traditional narratives in the British Isles was stimulated by the Celtic Revival of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, which sought to foster an appreciation for the art that gave voice to Celtic identity. One product of this cultural renaissance is “Death of Cuchulain” (page 39). Local legends (for example, “The Legend of Savaddan Lake,” page 61) and internationally distributed märchens (see, for example, “The Red Calf,” page 58 and “Lady Featherflight,” page 12) are well represented, also.

Central Europe, for purposes of this collection, includes those countries associated with the political entities formerly known as Austria-Hungary and Prussia (Austria, the Czech Republic, Germany, Hungary, Slovakia, Slovenia) and Switzerland. Historically, Central Europe constituted of a buffer zone between the Ottoman Empire and the Western European nations. This historical experience, as well as the Magyar founders of Hungary, is called forth in “The Boy Who Could Keep a Secret” (page 96). Just as the appreciation and collection of the Celtic folklore of Britain and Ireland was furthered by the Celtic Revival, the study of German folktales was inspired by the work of brothers Jacob (1785–1863) and Wilhelm (1786–1859) Grimm. Although the Grimms were not the first to collect and publish German folktales, their Kinder und Hausmärchen (“Children’s and Household Tales”) has appeared in multiple editions; the individual tales have been included in hundreds of anthologies, and among the general public they remain the most well-known collectors of folk narrative. Variants of seven of their classic tales appear in this volume (cited as Grimm). See Germany (pages 67–95).

Eastern Europe constitutes not only Poland, Romania, Russia, and those countries that were members of the former United Soviet Socialist Republic (for example, Belarus, Georgia, and Ukraine), but also groups strongly associated with Eastern Europe that were dispersed across national borders both within and outside Eastern Europe. The two of the latter groups include the Ashkenazic Jewish community and the Roma, or Romani, most widely known as the gypsies—a label considered derogatory by group members. Narratives told by the Ashkenazim range from personal experience narratives recalling religious persecution (see, for example, “Return of a Cantonist,” page 141 and “Contempt for His Torturers,” page 147) to trickster tales in which a clever member of the group gets the better of a superior adversary (for example, “How Rabbi Joshua Went to Paradise Alive,” page 142). The Roma repertoire commonly recounts the folk beliefs of the area in which they reside, but in some cases confronts prejudice by presenting group members in a heroic light (see, “Jack and His Golden Snuff-box,” page 163). While many of the tales of Eastern Europe are variants of cross-culturally disseminated tales, they often contextualize the narratives by references to local customs and social institutions. For example, the plot of “The Fisherman and the Boyard’s Daughter” (page 182) is constructed around the customs that control the relationships between peasants and nobility in Romania from the fifteen through the twentieth centuries.

The Mediterranean subregion joins Europe, Asia, and Africa, and the Mediterranean Sea has served as a passage for trade goods, people, and ideas for millennia. Among the cultures that arose in this environment were the Classical European civilizations of Greece and Rome. The fact that the sea was one of the preoccupations of Greek antiquity is demonstrated in myths such as “How Theseus Slew the Devourers of Men” (page 231). Despite the Christian character of later Greek folktales, the classical myths appear to have an enduring effect as seen in the motif of the black sail in the modern “The Seven-Headed Serpent” (page 253). Given the access the location of Greece provides to the rest of Eurasia and Africa, however, it comes as no surprise that other tales such as “The Golden Crab” (page 256) represent common tale types. The Italian tales included in this collection are equally widely distributed. The cultural diversity of Italy notwithstanding, “The Crystal Casket” (page 261), “The Crumb in the Beard” (page 266), and “Cinderella” (page 270) are variants of well-known tales found throughout Europe and most notably included in the collections of the Brothers Grimm. “King Pig” (page 274) is a literary version of the tale later collected by the Grimms as “Hans My Hedgehog” (Grimm 108). Therefore, although the story has the characteristics of literary invention rather than of folk performance, author Giovanni Francesco Straparola (1480–1557) obviously used a traditional tale as his model. The practice of composing literary works by elaborating on traditional tales was put to good use in Western Europe as well.

The narrative examples from the Nordic Countries of Denmark, Finland, Norway, Sweden, and Iceland draw on three bodies of narrative. The tales of the Sami (or Lapps) represent the aboriginal oral traditions of Finland, Norway, and Sweden. As the narratives demonstrate, shamanism and animism play central roles in Sami culture (see, for example, “How Some Wild Animals Became Tame Ones,” page 313, and “How the Stalos Were Tricked,” page 316). A second body of narrative that is central to the Nordic subregion is myth and saga. A selection from “The Prose Edda” (page 292) and “Thor in Peril” (page 298) are drawn from the former, and “From ‘Gisli the Outlaw’” (page 303) illustrates the nature of the Icelandic saga. Finally, the modern Danish folktales “The Suitor” (page 289) and “Peter Ox” (page 285) exemplify the narratives of Nordic folk culture, as distinct from aboriginal narrative or narratives of the “classic” period.

Much of the subregion Western Europe, in the broadest sense of that term, has been treated elsewhere in this introduction under more specific categories (for example, Central Europe). The following comments, therefore, focus on France and the Iberian Peninsula as representing the Western European subregion. France, which shares borders with both Central European and Mediterranean countries and coasts on both the Mediterranean Sea and the English Channel, has had the opportunity to absorb diverse European traditions in addition to the aboriginal Celtic, Romanized Celtic, and Germanic cultures that provided the raw materials for French regional cultures. The Basques residing in the Pyrenees, a mountain range partitioning off the Iberian Peninsula from France, constitute one of these distinctive folk groups. The Basques maintain an intense sense of cultural identity that comes to life in their narrative traditions (see, for example, “Roldan’s Bugle Horn,” page 339). Unique customs and folk beliefs also shape their tales, as in “The Grateful Tartaro and the Heren-Suge” (page 350). France, like Italy and Germany, developed literary versions of traditional tales, narratives that are more widely known to contemporary readers than their folk models. This literary tradition gave rise, in fact, to the phrase “fairy tale” (see notes for “The Story of Pretty Goldilocks,” page 364) and the fictional persona “Mother Goose” (see notes for “Bluebeard,” page 360). On the other side of the Pyrenees, the tales of the Iberian Peninsula blended the European Catholic worldview with North African (Moorish) Islamic culture. The folktale collections of novelist Cecilia Francisca Josefa De Arrom (1796–1877), writing under the pseudonym of Fernà Caballero, indicate that Moorish influence persisted well into the nineteenth century. Moreover, the tolerant attitudes of Moorish Spain (Al-Andalus) and the accessibility of the Iberian Peninsula to North Africa allowed the Sephardim (Jews who traced their origins to Spain and Portugal) to flourish from around the eighth century until their expulsion following the “Reconquest” of the subregion by Spain and Portugal in the late fifteenth century. “The Saragossan Purim” (page 379) and “The Slave’s Fortune” (page 380) are products of Sephardic traditional narratives dating from the post-expulsion period.

Introduction to Volume 3

EUROPE

Britain and Ireland

ENGLAND

---

JACK THE GIANT-KILLER

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Hartland, Edwin Sidney. English Fairy and Other Folktales. London: Walter Scott, 1890, 3–17.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Chapbooks

National Origin: England

---

Sharing the island of Great Britain with Scotland and Wales, England is the largest of the four constituent countries of the United Kingdom: England, Northern Ireland, Scotland, and Wales. The county of Cornwall is located on a peninsula west of Devon and extending southwest into the Atlantic Ocean. Historically, Cornwall has been noted as a mining region and elements of the tale reflect this occupation. Jack overcomes his first giant adversary using a miner's shovel and pickaxe, and in many of his adventures, he retrieves treasure from subterranean regions. Jack accomplishes his goals by wit and makes the world safe for humanity. Therefore, he serves the functions of culture hero by using the means of trickster, a common practice in myth. While "Jack the Giant-Killer" (AT 328) does not meet all the criteria of myth, the period of Arthur's reign in England is used here and elsewhere (see "The History of Tom Thumb," page 21, for example) to denote a long-ago age embodying more possibilities than the historical past of performers and audiences. The tale as published by Hartland was collated from chapbooks. The term chapbook refers to pamphlets, cheaply printed and widely distributed, that served as a medium of entertainment, current news, and history. The news most often consisted of rumor, and the history was unreliable. The chapbooks, however, were important media for popular culture well into the nineteenth century.

---

In the reign of King Arthur, there lived in the county of Cornwall, near the Land's End of England, a wealthy farmer who had one only son called Jack. He was brisk and of a ready lively wit, so that whatever he could not perform by force and strength he completed by ingenious wit and policy. Never was any person heard of that could worst him, and he very often even baffled the learned by his sharp and ready invention.

In those days the Mount of Cornwall was kept by a huge and monstrous giant of eighteen feet in height, and about three yards in compass, of a fierce and grim countenance, the terror of all the neighboring towns and villages. He lived in a cave in the midst of the Mount, and would not suffer any one else to live near him. His food was other men's cattle, which often became his prey, for whensoever he wanted food he would wade over to the mainland, where he would furnish himself with whatever came in his way. The good folk, at his approach, forsook their habitations, while he seized on their cattle, making nothing of carrying half-a-dozen oxen on his back at a time; and as for their sheep and hogs, he would tie them round his waist like a bunch of bandoliers. This course he had followed for many years, so that all Cornwall was impoverished by his depredations.

One day Jack, happening to be present at the town hall when the magistrates were sitting in council about the giant, asked what reward would be given to the person who destroyed him. The giant's treasure, they said, was the recompense. Quoth Jack, "Then let me undertake it."

So he furnished himself with a horn, shovel, and pickaxe, and went over to the Mount in the beginning of a dark winter's evening, when he fell to work, and before morning had dug a pit twenty-two feet deep, and nearly as broad, covering it over with long sticks and straw. Then strewing a little mould upon it, it appeared like plain ground. This completed, Jack placed himself on the contrary side of the pit, farthest from the giant's lodging, and, just at the break of day, he put the horn to his mouth, and blew, Tantivy, Tantivy.

This unexpected noise aroused the giant, who rushed from his cave, crying, "You incorrigible villain, are you come here to disturb my rest? You shall pay dearly for this. Satisfaction I will have, and this it shall be, I will take you whole and broil you for breakfast," which he had no sooner uttered, than tumbling into the pit, he made the very foundations of the Mount to shake.

"Oh, giant," quoth Jack, "where are you now? Oh faith, you are gotten now into Lob's Pound, where I will surely plague you for your threatening words: what do you think now of broiling me for your breakfast? Will no other diet serve you but poor Jack?" Thus having tantalized the giant for a while, he gave him a most weighty knock with his pickaxe on the very crown of his head, and killed him on the spot.

This done, Jack filled up the pit with earth, and went to search the cave, which he found contained much treasure. When the magistrates heard of this, they made a declaration he should henceforth be termed Jack the Giant-Killer, and presented him with a sword and an embroidered belt, on which were written these words in letters of gold—

Here's the right valiant Cornish man,
Who slew the giant Cormelian.

The news of Jack's victory soon spread over all the West of England, so that another giant, named Blunderbore, hearing of it, vowed to be revenged on the little hero, if ever it was his fortune to light on him. This giant was the lord of an enchanted castle situated in the midst of a lonesome wood. Now Jack, about four months afterwards, walking near this wood in his journey to Wales, being weary, seated himself near a pleasant fountain and fell fast asleep. While he was enjoying his repose, the giant, coming for water, there discovered him, and knew him to be the far-famed Jack, by the lines written on the belt. Without ado, he took Jack on his shoulders and carried him towards his enchanted castle.

Now, as they passed through a thicket, the rustling of the boughs awakened Jack, who was strangely surprised to find himself in the clutches of the giant. His terror was not yet begun, for on entering the castle, he saw the ground strewed with human bones, the giant telling him his own would ere long increase them. After this the giant locked poor Jack in an immense chamber, leaving him there while he went to fetch another giant living in the same wood to share in Jack's destruction. While he was gone, dreadful shrieks and lamentations affrighted Jack, especially a voice which continually cried:

Do what you can to get away,
Or you'll become the giant's prey;
He's gone to fetch his brother, who
Will kill, likewise devour you too.

This dreadful noise had almost distracted Jack, who, going to the window, beheld afar off the two giants coming towards the castle. "Now," quoth Jack to himself, "my death or my deliverance is at hand." Now, there were strong cords in a corner of the room in which Jack was, and two of these he took, and made a strong noose at the end; and while the giants were unlocking the iron gate of the castle he threw the ropes over each of their heads. Then drawing the other ends across a beam, and pulling with all his might, he throttled them. Then, seeing they were black in the face, and sliding down the rope, he came to their heads, when they could not defend themselves, and drawing his sword, slew them both.

Then, taking the giant's keys, and unlocking the rooms, he found three fair ladies tied by the hair of their heads, almost starved to death. "Sweet ladies," quoth Jack, "I have destroyed this monster and his brutish brother, and obtained your liberties.” This said, he presented them with the keys, and so proceeded on his journey to Wales.

Having but little money, Jack found it well to make the best of his way by traveling as fast as he could, but losing his road, he was benighted, and could not get a place of entertainment until, coming into a narrow valley, he found a large house, and by reason of his present needs took courage to knock at the gate.

But what was his surprise when there came forth a monstrous giant with two heads; yet he did not appear so fiery as the others were, for he was a Welsh giant, and what he did was by private and secret malice under the false show of friendship. Jack, having told his condition to the giant, was shown into a bedroom, where, in the dead of night, he heard his host in another apartment muttering these words:

Though here you lodge with me this night,
You shall not see the morning light:
My club shall dash your brains outright!

“Say’st thou so,” quoth Jack; “that is like one of your Welsh tricks, yet I hope to be cunning enough for you.” Then, getting out of bed, he laid a billet in the bed in his stead, and hid himself in a corner of the room. At the dead time of the night in came the Welsh giant, who struck several heavy blows on the bed with his club, thinking he had broken every bone in Jack’s skin. The next morning Jack, laughing in his sleeve, gave him hearty thanks for his night’s lodging.

“How have you rested?” quoth the giant; “did you not feel anything in the night?”

“No,” quoth Jack, “nothing but a rat, which gave me two or three slaps with her tail” With that, greatly wondering, the giant led Jack to breakfast, bringing him a bowl containing four gallons of hasty pudding.

Being loath to let the giant think it too much for him, Jack put a large leather bag under his loose coat, in such a way that he could convey the pudding into it without its being perceived. Then, telling the giant he would show him a trick, taking a knife, Jack ripped open the bag, and out came all the hasty pudding.

Whereupon, saying, “Odds splutters, hur can do that trick hurself,” the monster took the knife, and ripping open his belly, fell down dead.

Now, it fell in these days that King Arthur’s only son requested his father to furnish him with a large sum of money, in order that he might go and seek his fortune in the principality of Wales, where lived a beautiful lady possessed with seven evil spirits. The king did his best to persuade his son from it, but in vain; so at last granted the request, and the prince set out with two horses, one loaded with money, the other for himself to ride upon.

Now, after several days’ travel, he came to a market-town in Wales, where he beheld a vast concourse of people gathered together. The prince demanded the reason of it, and was told that they had arrested a corpse for several large sums of money which the deceased owed when he died. The prince replied that it was a pity creditors should be so cruel, and said, "Go bury the dead, and let his creditors come to my lodging, and there their debts shall be discharged." They accordingly came, but in such great numbers that before night he had almost left himself moneyless.

Now Jack the Giant-Killer, coming that way, was so taken with the generosity of the prince, that he desired to be his servant. This being agreed upon, the next morning they set forward on their journey together, when, as they were riding out of the town, an old woman called after the prince, saying, "He has owed me twopence these seven years; pray pay me as well as the rest,"

Putting his hand to his pocket, the prince gave the woman all he had left, so that after their day's refreshment, which cost what small spell Jack had by him, they were without a penny between them.

When the sun began to grow low, the king's son said, "Jack, since we have no money, where can we lodge this night?"

But Jack replied, "Master, we'll do well enough for I have an uncle lives within two miles of this place; he is a huge and monstrous giant with three heads; he'll fight five hundred men in armor, and make them to fly before him."

"Alas!" quoth the prince, "what shall we do there? He'll certainly chop us up at a mouthful. Nay, we are scarce enough to fill one of his hollow teeth!"

"It is no matter for that," quoth Jack; "I myself will go before and prepare the way for you; therefore tarry and wait till I return." Jack then rode away full speed, and coming to the gate of the castle, he knocked so loud that he made the neighboring hills resound.

The giant roared out at this like thunder, "Who's there?"

He was answered, "None but your poor Cousin Jack."

Quoth he, "What news with my poor Cousin Jack?"

He replied, "Dear uncle, heavy news, God wot!"

"Prithee," quoth the giant, "what heavy news can come to me? I am a giant with three heads, and besides thou knowest I can fight five hundred men in armor, and make them fly like chaff before the wind."

"Oh, but," quoth Jack, "here's the king's son a-coming with a thousand men in armor to kill you and destroy all that you have!"

"Oh, Cousin Jack," said the giant, "this is heavy news indeed! I will immediately run and hide myself and thou shalt lock, bolt, and bar me in, and keep the keys until the prince is gone." Having secured the giant, Jack fetched his master, when they made themselves heartily merry whilst the poor giant laid trembling in a vault under the ground.

Early in the morning Jack furnished his master with a fresh supply of gold and silver, and then sent him three miles forward on his journey, at which time the prince was pretty well out of the smell of the giant. Jack then returned, and let the giant out of the vault, who asked what he should give him for keeping the castle from destruction.

“Why,” quoth Jack, “I desire nothing but the old coat and cap, together with the old rusty sword and slippers which are at your bed’s head.”

Quoth the giant, “Thou shalt have them; and pray keep them for my sake, for they are things of excellent use. The coat will keep you invisible, the cap will furnish you with knowledge, the sword cuts asunder whatever you strike, and the shoes are of extraordinary swiftness. These may be serviceable to you, therefore take them with all my heart.”

Taking them, Jack thanked his uncle, and then having overtaken his master, they quickly arrived at the house of the lady the prince sought, who, finding the prince to be a suitor, prepared a splendid banquet for him. After the repast was concluded, she wiped his mouth with a handkerchief, saying, “You must show me that handkerchief tomorrow morning, or else you will lose your head.” With that she put it in her bosom.

The prince went to bed in great sorrow, but Jack’s cap of knowledge instructed him how it was to be obtained. In the middle of the night she called upon her familiar spirit to carry her to Lucifer. But Jack put on his coat of darkness and his shoes of swiftness, and was there as soon as her.

When she entered the place of the evil one, she gave the handkerchief to old Lucifer, who laid it upon a shelf, whence Jack took it and brought it to his master, who showed it to the lady the next day, and so saved his life.

On that day, she saluted the prince, telling him he must show her the lips tomorrow morning that she kissed last night, or lose his head. “Ah,” he replied, “if you kiss none but mine, I will”

“That is neither here nor there,” said she; “if you do not, death’s your portion!” At midnight she went as before, and was angry with old Lucifer for letting the handkerchief go.

“But now,” quoth she, “I will be too hard for the king’s son, for I will kiss thee, and he is to show me thy lips.”

Which she did, and Jack, who was standing by, cut off the devil’s head and brought it under his invisible coat to his master, who the next morning pulled it out by the horns before the lady. Thus broke, the enchantment and the evil spirit left her, and she appeared in all her beauty. They were married the next morning, and soon after went to the court of King Arthur, where Jack, for his many great exploits, was made one of the Knights of the Round Table.

Having been successful in all his undertakings, Jack resolved not to remain idle, but to perform what services he could for the honor of his king and country, and besought King Arthur to fit him out with a horse and money to enable him to travel in search of strange and new adventures. “For,” said he, “there are many giants yet living in the remotest part of Wales, to the unspeakable damage of your majesty’s liege subjects; wherefore, may it please you to encourage me, I do not doubt but in a short time to cut them off root and branch, and so rid all the realm of those giants and monsters of nature.” When the king had heard this noble request, he furnished Jack with all necessaries, and Jack started on his pursuit, taking with him the cap of knowledge, sword of sharpness, shoes of swiftness, and invisible coat, the better to complete the dangerous enterprises which now lay before him.

Jack traveled over vast hills and wonderful mountains, and on the third day came to a large wood, which he had no sooner entered than he heard dreadful shrieks and cries. Casting his eyes round, he beheld with terror a huge giant dragging along a fair lady and a knight by the hair of their heads, with as much ease as if they had been a pair of gloves. At this sight Jack shed tears of pity, and then, alighting from his horse, he put on his invisible coat, and taking with him his sword of sharpness, at length with a swinging stroke cut off both the giant's legs below the knee, so that his fall made the trees to tremble.

At this the courteous knight and his fair lady, after returning Jack their hearty thanks, invited him home, there to refresh his strength after the frightful encounter, and receive some ample reward for his good services. But Jack vowed he would not rest until he had found out the giant's den. The knight, hearing this, was very sorrowful, and replied, "Noble stranger, it is too much to run a second risk; this monster lived in a den under yonder mountain, with a brother more fierce and fiery than himself. Therefore, if you should go thither, and perish in the attempt, it would be a heartbreaking to me and my lady. Let me persuade you to go with us, and desist from any further pursuit."

"Nay," quoth Jack, "were there twenty, not one should escape my fury. But when I have finished my task, I will come and pay my respects to you."

Jack had not ridden more than a mile and a half; when the cave mentioned by the knight appeared to view, near the entrance of which he beheld the giant sitting upon a block of timber, with a knotted iron club by his side, waiting, as he supposed, for his brother's return with his barbarous prey. His goggle eyes were like flames of fire, his countenance grim and ugly, and his cheeks like a couple of large fitches of bacon, while the bristles of his beard resembled rods of iron wire, and the locks that hung down upon his brawny shoulders were like curled snakes or hissing adders.

Jack alighted from his horse, and, putting on the coat of darkness, approached near the giant, and said softly, "Oh! are you there? It will not be long ere I shall take you fast by the beard."

The giant all this while could not see him, on account of his invisible coat, so that Jack, coming up close to the monster, struck a blow with his sword at his head, but, missing his aim, he cut off the nose instead. At this, the giant roared like claps of thunder, and began to lay about him with his iron club like one stark mad. But Jack, running behind, drove his sword up to the hilt in the giant's back, which caused him to fall down dead. This done, Jack cut off the giant's head, and sent it, with his brother's head also, to King Arthur, by a Waggoner he hired for that purpose.

Jack now resolved to enter the giants' cave in search of his treasure, and, passing along through a great many windings and turnings, he came at length to a large room paved with freestone, at the upper end of which was a boiling caldron, and on the right hand a large table, at which the giants used to dine. Then he came to a window, barred with iron, through which he looked and beheld a vast of miserable captives, who, seeing him, cried out, "Alas! young man, art thou come to be one amongst us in this miserable den?"

"Ay," quoth Jack, "but pray tell me what is the meaning of your captivity?"

"We are kept here," said one, "till such time as the giants have a wish to feast, and then the fattest among us is slaughtered! And many are the times they have dined upon murdered men!"

"Say you so," quoth Jack, and straightway unlocked the gate and let them free, who all rejoiced like condemned malefactors at sight of a reprieve. Then searching the giants' coffers, he shared the gold and silver equally amongst them.

It was about sunrise the next day when Jack, after seeing the captives on their way to their respective places of abode, mounted his horse to proceed on his journey, and, by the help of his directions, reached the knight's house about noon. He was received here with all demonstrations of joy by the knight and his lady, who in an honorable respect to Jack prepared a feast which lasted many days, all the gentry in the neighborhood being of the company. The worthy knight was likewise pleased to present him with a beautiful ring, on which was engraved a picture of the giant dragging the distressed knight and his lady, with this motto:

We are in sad distress, you see,
Under a giant's fierce command,
But gain our lives and liberty
By valiant Jack's victorious hand.

But in the midst of all this mirth a messenger brought the dismal tidings that one Thunderdell, a giant with two heads, having heard of the death of his two kinsmen, came from the northern dales to be revenged on Jack, and was within a mile of the knight's seat, the country people flying before him like chaff. But Jack was no whit daunted, and said, "Let him come! I have a tool to pick his teeth; and you, ladies and gentlemen, walk but forth into the garden, and you shall witness this giant Thunderdell's death and destruction."

The situation of this knight's house was in the midst of a small island encompassed with a moat thirty feet deep and twenty feet wide, over which lay a drawbridge. Wherefore Jack employed men to cut through this bridge on both sides, nearly to the middle; and then, dressing himself in his invisible coat, he marched against the giant with his sword of sharpness. Although the giant could not see Jack, he smelt his approach, and cried out in these words:

Fee, fi, fo, fum
I smell the blood of an English man
Be he alive or be he dead,
I'll grind his bones to make me bread!

"Say'st thou so," said Jack; "then thou art a monstrous miller indeed."

At which the giant cried out again, "Art thou that villain who killed my kinsmen? Then I will tear thee with my teeth, suck thy blood, and grind thy bones to powder."

"You will catch me first," quoth Jack, and throwing off his invisible coat, so that the giant might see him, and putting on his shoes of swiftness, he ran from the giant, who followed like a walking castle, so that the very foundations of the earth seemed to shake at every step. Jack led him a long dance, in order that the gentlemen and ladies might see; and at last, to end the matter, ran lightly over the drawbridge, the giant, in full speed, pursuing him with his club. Then, coming to the middle of the bridge, the giant's great weight broke it down, and he tumbled headlong into the water, where he rolled and wallowed like a whale. Jack, standing by the moat, laughed at him all the while; but though the giant foamed to hear him scoff; and plunged from place to place in the moat, yet he could not get out to be revenged. Jack at length got a cart-rope and cast it over the two heads of the giant, and drew him ashore by a team of horses, and then cut off both his heads with his sword of sharpness, and sent them to King Arthur.

After some time spent in mirth and pastime, Jack, taking leave of the knights and ladies, set out for new adventures. Through many woods he passed, and came at length to the foot of a high mountain. Here, late at night, he found a lonesome house, and knocked at the door, which was opened by an ancient man with a head as white as snow. "Father," said Jack, "have you entertainment for a benighted traveler that has lost his way?"

"Yes," said the old man; "you are right welcome to my poor cottage." Whereupon Jack entered, and down they sat together, and the old man began to discourse as follows:

"Son, I am sensible you are the great conqueror of giants, and behold, my son, on the top of this mountain is an enchanted castle, maintained by a giant named Galligantus, who, by the help of an old conjurer, betrays many knights and ladies into his castle, where by magic art they are transformed into sundry shapes and forms; but, above all, I lament the misfortune of a duke's daughter, whom they fetched from her father's garden, carrying her through the air in a burning chariot drawn by fiery dragons, when they secured her within the castle, and transformed her into the shape of a white hind. And though many knights have tried to break the enchantment, and work her deliverance, yet no one could accomplish it, on account of two dreadful griffins which are placed at the castle gate, and which destroy every one who comes near. But you, my son, being furnished with an invisible coat, may pass by them undiscovered, where on the gates of the castle you will find engraven in large letters by what means the enchantment may be broken."

The old man having ended, Jack gave him his hand, and promised that in the morning he would venture his life to free the lady.

In the morning Jack arose and put on his invisible coat and magic cap and shoes, and prepared himself for the enterprise. Now, when he had reached the top of the mountain he soon discovered the two fiery griffins, but passed them without fear, because of his invisible coat. When he had got beyond them, he found upon the gates of the castle a golden trumpet hung by a silver chain, under which these lines were engraved:

Whoever shall this trumpet blow,
Shall soon the giant overthrow,
And break the black enchantment straight;
So all shall be in happy state.

Jack had no sooner read this but he blew the trumpet, at which the castle trembled to its vast foundations, and the giant and conjurer were in horrid confusion, biting their thumbs and tearing their hair, knowing their wicked reign was at an end. Then the giant stooping to take up his club, Jack at one blow cut off his head; whereupon the conjurer, mounting up into the air, was carried away in a whirlwind. Thus was the enchantment broken, and all the lords and ladies who had so long been transformed into birds and beasts returned to their proper shapes, and the castle vanished away in a cloud of smoke.

This being done, the head of Galligantus was likewise, in the accustomed manner, conveyed to the Court of King Arthur, where the very next day, Jack followed, with the knights and ladies who had been so honorably delivered. Whereupon, as a reward for his good services, the king prevailed upon the afore-said duke to bestow his daughter in marriage on honest Jack. So married they were, and the whole kingdom was filled with joy at the wedding. Furthermore, the king bestowed on Jack a noble habitation, with a very beautiful estate thereto belonging, where he and his lady lived in great joy and happiness all the rest of their days.

LADY FEATHERFLIGHT

Tradition Bearer: Elizabeth Hoar

Source: Newell, W. W. "Lady Featherflight." Journal of American Folklore 6 (1893): 54–62.

Date: 1891

Original Source: England

National Origin: England

---

The following narrative is based largely on "The Girl as Helper in the Hero's Flight" (AT 313). An episode in which the helpful giant's daughter is imperiled by the foolishness of a group of villagers is substituted for the more common "Forgotten Fiancée" (Motif D 2003). The final brief episode of stealing the giant's treasure is reminiscent of "Jack and the Beanstalk" (AT 328).

---

A poor woman, living on the edge of a wood, came at last to where she found nothing in the cupboard for the next day's breakfast. She called her boy Jack, and said, "You must now go into the wide world; if you stay here, there will be two of us to starve. I have nothing for you but this piece of black bread. On the other side of the forest lies the world. Find your way to it, and gain your living honestly." With that she bade him good-bye and he started. He knew the way some distance into the thickest of the forest, for he had often been there for fagots. But after walking all day, he saw no farm, path, or tree, and knew that he was lost. Still he traveled on and on, as long as the daylight lasted, and then lay down and slept.

The next morning he ate the black bread, and wandered on all day. At night he saw lights before him, and was guided by them to a large palace, where he knocked for a long time in vain. At last the door was opened, and a lovely lady appeared, who said as she saw him, "Go away as quickly as you can. My father will soon come home, and he will surely eat you."

Jack said, "Can't you hide me, and give me something to eat, or I shall fall down dead at your door?"

At first she refused, but afterwards yielded to Jack's prayers, and told him to come in and hide behind the oven. Then she gave him food, and told him that her father was a giant, who ate men and women. Perhaps she could keep him overnight, as she had already supper prepared.

After a while, the giant came banging at the door, shouting, "Featherflight, let me in; let me in!" As she opened the door he came in, saying, "Where have you stowed the man? I smelt him all the way through that wood."

Featherflight said, "Oh father, he is nothing but a poor, little, thin boy! He would make but half a mouthful, and his bones would stick in your throat; and beside he wants to work for you; perhaps you can make him useful. But sit down to supper now, and after supper I will show him to you."

So she set before him half of a fat heifer, a sheep, and a turkey, which he swallowed so fast that his hair stood on end. When he had finished, Featherflight beckoned to Jack, who came trembling from behind the oven. The giant looked at him scornfully and said, "Indeed, as you say, he is but half a mouthful. But there is room for flesh there, and we must fatten him up for a few days; mean-while he must earn his victuals. See here, my young snip, can you do a day's work in a day?"

And Jack answered bravely, "I can do a day's work in a day as well as another."

So the giant said, "Well, go to bed now. I will tell you in the morning your work." So Jack went to bed, and Lady Featherflight showed him; while the giant lay down on the floor with his head in Featherflight's lap, and she combed his hair and brushed his head till he went fast asleep.

The next morning Jack was called bright and early, and was taken out to the farmyard, where stood a large barn, unroofed by a late tempest. Here the giant stopped and said, "Behind this barn you will find a hill of feathers; thatch me this barn with them, and earn your supper, and, look you! if it be not done when I come back tonight, you shall be fried in meal, and swallowed whole for supper.” Then he left, laughing to himself as he went down the road.

Jack went bravely to work and found a ladder and basket; he filled the basket, and ran up the ladder, and then tried hard to make a beginning on the thatch. As soon as he placed a handful of feathers, half would fly away as he wove them in. He tried for hours with no success, until at last half of the hill was scattered to the four winds, and he had not finished a hand-breadth of the roof.

Then he sat down at the foot of the ladder and began to cry, when out came Lady Featherflight, with the basket on her arm, which she set down at his feet, saying, “Eat now, and cry after. Meantime I will try to think what I can do to help you.”

Jack felt cheered, and went to work, while Lady Featherflight walked round the barn, singing as she went, “Birds of land and birds of sea, Come and thatch this roof for me.” As she walked round the second time, the sky grew dark, and a heavy cloud hid the sun and came nearer and nearer to the earth, separating at last into hundreds and thousands of birds. Each, as it flew, dropped a feather on the roof, and tucked it neatly in; and when Jack’s meal was finished the roof was finished, too.

Then Featherflight said, “Let us talk and enjoy ourselves till my father the giant comes home.” So they wandered round the grounds and the stables, and Lady Featherflight told of the treasure in the strong room, till Jack wondered why he was born without a sixpence. Soon they went back to the house, and Jack helped, and Lady Featherflight prepared supper, which tonight was fourteen loaves of bread, two sheep, and a jack-pudding, by way of finish, which would almost have filled the little house where Jack was born.

Soon the giant came home, thundered at the door again, and shouted, “Let me in, let me in!” Featherflight served him with the supper already laid, and the giant ate it with great relish. As soon as he had finished, he called to Jack, and asked him about his work. Jack said, “I told you I could do a day’s work in a day as well as another. You’ll have no fault to find.” The giant said nothing, and Jack went to bed. Then, as before, the giant lay down on the floor with his head in Featherflight’s lap. She combed his hair and brushed his head till he fell fast asleep.

The next morning the giant called Jack into the yard, and looked at his day’s work. All he said was, “This is not your doing,” and he proceeded to a heap of seed, nearly as high as the barn, saying, “Here is your day’s work. Separate the seeds, each into its own pile. Let it be done when I come home tonight, or you shall be fried in meal, and I shall swallow you, bones and all.”

Then the giant went off down the road, laughing as he went. Jack seated himself before the heap, took a handful of seeds, put corn in one pile, rye in another, oats in another, and had not begun to find an end of the different kinds when noon had come, and the sun was right over head. The heap was no smaller, and Jack was tired out, so he sat down, hugged his knees, and cried.

Out came Featherflight, with a basket on her arm, which she put down before Jack, saying, "Eat now, and cry after." So Jack ate with a will, and Lady Featherflight walked round and round the heap, singing as she went, "Birds of earth and birds of sea, Come and sort this seed for me."

As she walked round the heap for the second time, still singing, the ground about her looked as if it was moving. From behind each grain of sand, each daisy stem, each blade of grass, there came some little insect, gray, black, brown, or green, and began to work at the seeds. Each chose some one kind, and made a heap by itself. When Jack had finished a hearty meal, the great heap was divided into countless others; and Jack and Lady Featherflight walked and talked to their hearts' content for the rest of the day.

As the sun went down the giant came home, thundered at the door again, and shouted, "Let me in; let me in!"

Featherflight greeted him with his supper, already laid, and he sat down and ate, with a great appetite, four fat pigs, three fat pullets, and an old gander. He finished off with a jack-pudding. Then he was so sleepy he could not keep his head up; all he said was, "Go to bed, youngster; I'll see your work tomorrow." Then, as before, the giant laid his head down on the floor with his head in Featherflight's lap. She combed his hair and brushed his head, and he fell fast asleep.

The next morning the giant called Jack into the farmyard earlier than before. "It is but fair to call you early, for I have work more than a strong man can well do." He showed him a heap of sand, saying, "Make me a rope to tether my herd of cows, that they may not leave the stalls before milking time." Then he turned on his heel, and went down the road laughing.

Jack took some sand in his hands, gave a twist, threw it down, went to the door, and called out, "Featherflight! Featherflight! This is beyond you: I feel myself already rolled in meal, and swallowed, bones and all."

Out came Featherflight, saying with good cheer, "Not so bad as that. Sit down, and we will plan what to do." They talked and planned all the day. Just before the giant came home, they went up to the top of the stairs to Jack's room; then Featherflight pricked Jack's finger and dropped a drop of blood on each of the three stairs. Then she came down and prepared the supper, which tonight was a brace of turkeys, three fat geese, five fat hens, six fat pigeons, seven fat woodcocks, and half a score of quail, with a jack-pudding.

When he had finished, the giant turned to Featherflight with a growl, "Why so sparing of food tonight? Is there no good meal in the larder? This boy whets my appetite. Well for you, young sir, if you have done your work. Is it done?"

"No, sir," said Jack boldly. "I said I could do a day's work in a day as well as another, but no better."

The giant said, "Featherflight, prick him for me with the larding needle, hang him in the chimney corner well wrapped in bacon, and give him to me for my early breakfast."

Featherflight says, "Yes, father." Then, as before, the giant laid his head down on the floor with his head in Featherflight's lap. She combed his hair, and brushed his head, and he fell fast asleep.

Jack goes to bed, his room at the top of the stairs. As soon as the giant is snoring in bed, Featherflight softly calls Jack and says, "I have the keys of the treasure house; come with me." They open the treasure house, take out bags of gold and silver, and loosen the halter of the best horse in the best stall in the best stable. Jack mounts with Featherflight behind, and off they go.

At three o'clock in the morning, not thinking of his order the night before, the giant wakes and calls, "Jack, get up."

"Yes, sir," says the first drop of blood.

At four o'clock the giant wakes, turns over, and says, "Jack, get up."

"Yes, sir," says the second drop of blood.

At five o'clock the giant wakens, turns over, and says, "Jack, get up."

"Yes, sir," says the third drop of blood.

At six o'clock the giant wakens, turns over, and says, "Jack, get up," and there was no answer.

Then with great fury he says, "Featherflight has overslept herself; my breakfast won't be ready." He rushes to Featherflight's room; it is empty. He dashes downstairs to the chimney corner, to see if Jack is hanging there, and finds neither Jack nor Featherflight.

Then he suspects they have run away, and rushes back for his seven-leagued boots, but cannot find the key under his pillow. He rushes down, finds the door wide open, catches up his boots and rushes to the stable. There he finds that the best horse from the best stall from the best stable has gone. Jumping into his boots, he flies after them, swifter than the wind.

The runaways had been galloping for several hours, when Jack hears a sound behind him, and, turning, sees the giant in the distance. "O Featherflight! Featherflight! All is lost!"

But Featherflight says, "Keep steady, Jack, look in the horse's right ear, and throw behind you over your right shoulder what you find."

Jack looks and finds a little stick of wood, throws it over his right shoulder, and then there grows up behind them a forest of hard wood. "We are saved," says Jack.

"Not so certain," says Lady Featherflight, "but prick up the horse, for we have gained some time."

The giant went back for an axe, but soon hacked and hewed his way through the wood, and was on the trail again.

Jack again heard a sound, turned and saw the giant, and said to Lady Featherflight, "All is lost."

"Keep steady, Jack," says Featherflight; "look in the horse's left ear, and throw over your left shoulder what you find." Jack looked, found a drop of water, throws it over his left shoulder, and between them and the giant there arises a large lake, and the giant stops on the other side, and shouts across, "How did you get over?"

Featherflight calls, "We drank, and our horses drank, and we drank our way through."

The giant shouts scornfully back, "Surely I am good for what you can do," and he threw himself down and drank, and drank, and drank, and then he burst.

Now they go on quietly till they come near to a town. Here they stop, and Jack says, "Climb this tree, and hide in the branches till I come with the parson to marry us. For I must buy me a suit of fine clothes before I am seen with a gay lady like yourself."

So Featherflight climbed the tree with the thickest branches she could find, and waited there, looking between the leaves into a spring below. Now this spring was used by all the wives of the townspeople to draw water for breakfast. No water was so sweet anywhere else; and early in the morning they all came with pitchers and pails for a gossip, and to draw water for the kettle. The first who came was a carpenter's wife, and as she bent over the clear spring she saw, not herself, but Featherflight's lovely face reflected in the water. She looks at it with astonishment and cries, "What! I, a carpenter's wife, and I so handsome? No, that I won't," and down she threw the pitcher, and off she went.

The next who came was the potter's wife, and as she bent over the clear spring she saw, not herself, but Featherflight's lovely face reflected in the water. She looks at it with astonishment and cries, "What! I, a potter's wife, and I so handsome? No, that I won't," and down she threw the pitcher, and off she went.

The next who came was the publican's wife, and as she bent over the clear spring she saw, not herself, but Featherflight's lovely face reflected in the water. She looks at it with astonishment and cries, "What! I, a publican's wife, and I so handsome? No, that I won't," and down she threw the pitcher, and off she went.

The next who came was the scrivener's wife, and as she bent over the clear spring she saw, not herself, but Featherflight's lovely face reflected in the water. She looks at it with astonishment and cries, "What! I, a scrivener's wife, and I so handsome? No, that I won't," and down she threw the pitcher, and off she went.

The next who came was the lacemaker's wife, and as she bent over the clear spring she saw, not herself, but Featherflight's lovely face reflected in the water. She looks at it with astonishment and cries, "What! I, a lacemaker's wife, and I so handsome? No, that I won't," and down she threw the pitcher, and off she went.

All the men in the town began to want their breakfast, and one after another went out into the market-place to ask if any one by chance had seen his wife. Each came with the same question and all received the same answers. All had seen them going, but none had seen them returning. They all began to fear foul play, and all together walked out toward the spring. When they reached it, they found the broken pitchers all about the grass, and the pails bottom upwards floating on the water.

One of them, looking over the edge, saw the face reflected, and, knowing that it was not his own, looked up. Seeing Lady Featherflight, he called to his comrades, “Here is the witch, here is the enchantress. She has bewitched our wives. Let us kill her.” And they began to drag her out of the tree, in spite of all she could say.

Just at this moment Jack comes up, galloping back on his horse, with the parson up behind. You would not know the gaily dressed cavalier to be the poor, ragged boy who passed over the road so short a time before.

As he came near he saw the crowd and shouted, “What’s the matter? What are you doing to my wife?”

The men shouted, “We are hanging a witch; she has bewitched all our wives, and murdered them, for all we know.” The parson bade them stop, and let the Lady Featherflight tell her own story.

When she told them how their wives had mistaken her face for theirs, they were silent a moment, and then one and all cried, “If we have wedded such fools, they are well sped,” and turning walked back to the town.

The parson married Jack and Lady Featherflight on the spot, and christened them from the water of the spring, and then went home with them to the great house that Jack had bought as he passed through the town. There the newly married pair lived happily for many months, until Jack began to wish for more of the giant’s treasure, and proposed that they should go back for it. But they could not cross the water.

Lady Featherflight said, “Why not build a bridge?” And the bridge was built. They went over with wagons and horses, and brought back so heavy a load that, as the last wagonful passed over the bridge, it broke, and the gold was lost.

Jack lamented and said, “Now we can have nothing more from the giant’s treasure-house.”

But Lady Featherflight said, “Why not mend the bridge?”

So the bridge was mended, And my story’s ended.

THE GREEN LADY

Tradition Bearer: Mary Ann Smith

Source: Gomme, A. B. “The Green Lady: A Folktale from Hertfordshire.” Folklore 7 (1896): 411–415.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: England

National Origin: England

---

In this variant of “The Kind and the Unkind Girls” (AT 480), the usual motif of the “Cruel Stepmother” (S31) has been omitted. Instead, a father who is partial to the unkind sister motivates the heroine’s departure and subsequent adventures.

---

Once upon a time there was an old man who had two daughters. Now one of these girls was a steady decent girl, and the other was a stuck-up, proud, conceited piece; but the father liked her best, and she had the most to eat and the best clothes to wear.

One day the nice girl said to her father, "Father, give me a cake and a bottle of beer, and let me go and seek my fortune." So the father gave her a cake and a bottle of beer, and she went out to seek her fortune. After she had walked a weary while through the wood she sat down by a tree to rest herself, and eat her cake and drink her beer. While she was eating, a little old man came by, and he said, "Little girl, little girl, what are you doing under my tree?"

She said, "I am going to seek my fortune, sir. I am very tired and hungry, and I am eating my dinner."

The old man said, "Little girl, little girl, give me some dinner too."

She said, "I have only some cake and a bottle of beer; if you like to have some of that, you may." The old man said he would; so he sat down, and they ate the cake and drank the beer all up.

Then the little girl was going on further, and the old man said, "I will tell you where to seek your fortune. Go on further and further into the wood, until you come to a little old cottage where the green lady lives. Knock at the door, and when she opens it tell her you've come to seek service. She will take you in; mind you be a good girl and do all she tells you to do, and you'll come to no harm." So the little girl thanked him kindly and went on her way. Presently she came to the little cottage in the wood, and she knocked at the door.

Then the door was opened by a pretty green lady, who said, "Little girl, little girl, what do you want?"

"I've come to seek service, ma'am," said the little girl.

"What can you do?" said the green lady.

"I can bake, and I can brew, and about the house can all things do," said the little girl.

"Then come in," said the green lady; and she took her into the kitchen.

"Now," said she, "you must be a very good girl; sweep the house well, make the dust fly; and mind you don't look through the keyhole, or harm will befall you." The little girl swept the house well and made the dust fly. Then the green lady said, "Now go to the well and bring in a pail of nice clean water to cook the supper in. If the water isn't clear, change it and change it till it is."

Then the little girl took a pail and went to the well. The first pail she drew, the water was so muddy and dirty she threw it away. The next pail full she drew, the water was a little clearer, but there was a silver fish in it.

The fish said, "Little girl, little girl, wash me and comb me and lay me down softly." So she washed it and combed it and laid it down softly. Then she drew another pailful. The water was a little clearer, but there was a gold fish in it.

The fish said, "Little girl, little girl, wash me and comb me and lay me down softly." So she washed it and combed it and laid it down softly.

Then she drew another pailful. This was clean water, but there was still another fish who said the same thing as the others had done; so she washed this one too, combed it and laid it down softly. Then she drew another pailful, and this was quite clear and fresh. Then the three fish raised their heads and said:

They who eat the fairies' food
In the churchyard soon shall dwell.
Drink the water of this well,
And all things for thee shall be good.
Be but honest, bold, and true,
So shall good fortune come to you.

Then the little girl hasted to the house, swept up the kitchen, and made the dust fly quickly; for she thought she would surely be scolded for being away so long, and she was hungry too. The green lady then showed her how to cook the supper and take it into the parlor, and told her she could take some bread and milk for herself afterwards. But the little girl said she would rather have a drink of water and some of her own cake; she had found some crumbs in her pocket, you must know.

Then the green lady went into the parlor, and the little girl sat down by the fire. Then she was thinking about her place and what the fish had said, and she wondered why the green lady had told her not to look through the keyhole. She thought there could not be any harm in doing this, and she looked through the keyhole, when what should she see but the green lady dancing with a bogey! She was so surprised that she called out, "Oh! what can I see, a green lady dancing with a bogey!"

The green lady rushed out of the room and said, "What can you see?"

The little girl replied, "Nothing can I see, nothing can I spy, nothing can I see till the days high die!" [probably, day I die].

Then the green lady went into the parlor again to have her supper, and the little girl again looked through the keyhole. Again she sang, "Oh! what can I see, a green lady dancing with a bogey!"

The green lady rushed out, "Little girl, little girl, what can you see?"

The girl said, "Nothing can I see, nothing can I spy, nothing can I see till the days high die!"

This happened a third time, and then the green lady said, "Now you shall see no more"; and she blinded the little girl's eyes.

"But," said the green lady, "because you have been a good girl and made the dust fly, I will give you your wages and you shall go home." So she gave her a bag of money and a bundle of clothes, and sent her away. So the little girl stumbled along the path in the dark, and presently she stumbled against the well. Now there was a fine young man sitting on the brink of the well; and he told her he had been sent by the fish of the well to see her home, and would carry her bag of money and her bundle for her. He told her, too, before starting on their journey to bathe her eyes in the well. This she did; and she found her eyes came back to her, and she could see as well as ever. So the young man and the little girl went along together until they arrived at her father's cottage; and when the bag was opened there was all sorts of money in it, and when the bundle was opened there was all sorts of fine clothes in it. And the little girl married the young man, and they lived happy ever after.

Now, when the other girl saw all the fine things her sister had got, she came to her father and said, "Father, give me a cake and a bottle of beer, and let me go and seek my fortune." Her father gave her a cake and a bottle of beer, and the same things happened to her as to her sister. But when the old man asked her for some dinner she said, "I haven't enough for myself, so I can't give you any"; and when she was at the green lady's house she didn't make the dust fly, and the green lady was cross with her; and when she went to the well and the fish got into her pails of water, she said the fishes were wet, sloppy things, and she wasn't going to mess her hands and clean frock with them, and she threw them back roughly into the well; and she said she wasn't going to drink nasty cold water for her supper when she could have nice bread and milk; and when the green lady took out her eyes for looking through the keyhole she didn't get a bag of money and a bundle of clothes for her wages, because she hadn't made the dust fly, and she had no one to help her and take her home. So she wandered about all night and all day, and she died; and no one knows where she was buried or what became of her.

THE HISTORY OF TOM THUMB

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Hartland, Edwin Sidney. English Fairy and Other Folktales. London: Walter Scott, 1890, 272–285.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: The Comical and Merry Tricks of Tom Thumb. Paisley, ca. 1820 (chapbook).

National Origin: England

---

In this variant of "Tom Thumb" (AT 700), the miraculous birth of the boy no bigger than his father's thumb is arranged by the Arthurian magician Merlin and the queen of the fairies in return for an act of kindness and because Merlin was "amused with the idea of a boy no bigger than a man's thumb." The hero's diminutive stature proves to be both a blessing and a curse during his adventures. Many chapbooks presented their narratives in verse form; therefore, the verse sections of the following tale reflect the variant's chapbook origins.

---

It is said that in the days of the celebrated Prince Arthur, who was king of Britain in the year 516, there lived a great magician, called Merlin, the most learned and skilful enchanter in the world at that time.

This famous magician, who could assume any form he pleased, was traveling in the disguise of a poor beggar, and being very much fatigued, he stopped at the cottage of an honest ploughman to rest himself and asked for some refreshment.

The countryman gave him a hearty welcome, and his wife, who was a very good-hearted, hospitable woman, soon brought him some milk in a wooden bowl, and some coarse brown bread on a platter.

Merlin was much pleased with this homely repast and the kindness of the ploughman and his wife; but he could not help observing that though everything was neat and comfortable in the cottage, they seemed both to be very dispirited and unhappy. He therefore questioned them on the cause of their melancholy, and learned that they were miserable because they had no children.

The poor woman declared, with tears in her eyes, that she should be the happiest creature in the world if she had a son; and although he was no bigger than her husband's thumb, she would be satisfied.

Merlin was so much amused with the idea of a boy no bigger than a man's thumb, that he determined to pay a visit to the queen of the fairies, and request her to gratify the poor woman's wish. The droll fancy of such a little personage among the human race pleased the fairy queen too, exceedingly, and she promised Merlin that the wish should be granted. Accordingly, in a short time after, the ploughman's wife was safely delivered of a son, who, wonderful to relate! was not a bit bigger than his father's thumb.

The fairy queen, wishing to see the little fellow thus born into the world, came in at the window while the mother was sitting up in the bed admiring him. The queen kissed the child, and, giving it the name of Tom Thumb, sent for some of the fairies, who dressed her little favorite according to the instructions she gave them:

An oak-leaf hat he had for his crown;
His shirt of web by spiders spun;
With jacket wove of thistle's down;
His trousers were of feathers done.
His stockings, of apple-rind, they tie
With eyelash from his mother's eye:
His shoes were made of mouse's skin,
Tann'd with the downy hair within.

It is remarkable that Tom never grew any larger than his father's thumb, which was only of an ordinary size; but as he got older he became very cunning and full of tricks. When he was old enough to play with the boys, and had lost all his own cherry-stones [used much like marbles in children's games], he used to creep into the bags of his playfellows, fill his pockets, and, getting out unobserved, would again join in the game.

One day, however, as he was coming out of a bag of cherry-stones, where he had been pilfering as usual, the boy to whom it belonged chanced to see him. "Ah, ha! my little Tommy," said the boy, "so I have caught you stealing my cherry-stones at last, and you shall be rewarded for your thievish tricks." On saying this, he drew the string tight round his neck, and gave the bag such a hearty shake, that poor little Tom's legs, thighs, and body were sadly bruised. He roared out with pain, and begged to be let out, promising never to be guilty of such bad practices again.

A short time afterwards his mother was making a batter-pudding, and Tom, being very anxious to see how it was made, climbed up to the edge of the bowl; but unfortunately his foot slipped, and he plumped over head and ears into the batter, unobserved by his mother, who stirred him into the pudding-bag, and put him in the pot to boil.

The batter had filled Tom's mouth, and prevented him from crying; but, on feeling the hot water, he kicked and struggled so much in the pot, that his mother thought that the pudding was bewitched, and, instantly pulling it out of the pot, she threw it to the door. A poor tinker, who was passing by, lifted up the pudding, and, putting it into his budget, he then walked off. As Tom had now got his mouth cleared of the batter, he then began to cry aloud, which so frightened the tinker that he flung down the pudding and ran away. The pudding being broke to pieces by the fall, Tom crept out covered over with the batter, and with difficulty walked home. His mother, who was very sorry to see her darling in such a woeful state, put him into a tea-cup, and soon washed off the batter; after which she kissed him, and laid him in bed.

Soon after the adventure of the pudding, Tom's mother went to milk her cow in the meadow, and she took him along with her. As the wind was very high, for fear of being blown away, she tied him to a thistle with a piece of fine thread. The cow soon observed the oak-leaf hat, and, liking the appearance of it, took poor Tom and the thistle at one mouthful. While the cow was chewing the thistle Tom was afraid of her great teeth, which threatened to crush him in pieces, and he roared out as loud as he could, "Mother, mother!"

"Where are you, Tommy, my dear Tommy?" said his mother.

"Here, mother," replied he, "in the red cow's mouth."

His mother began to cry and wring her hands; but the cow, surprised at the odd noise in her throat, opened her mouth and let Tom drop out. Fortunately his mother caught him in her apron as he was falling to the ground, or he would have been dreadfully hurt. She then put Tom in her bosom and ran home with him.

Tom's father made him a whip of a barley straw to drive the cattle with, and having one day gone into the fields, he slipped a foot and rolled into the furrow. A raven, which was flying over, picked him up, and flew with him to the top of a giant's castle that was near the seaside, and there left him.

Tom was in a dreadful state, and did not know what to do; but he was soon more dreadfully frightened; for old Grumbo the giant came up to walk on the terrace, and observing Tom, he took him up and swallowed him like a pill.

The giant had no sooner swallowed Tom than he began to repent what he had done; for Tom began to kick and jump about so much that he felt very uncomfortable, and at last threw him up again into the sea. A large fish swallowed Tom the moment he fell into the sea, which was soon after caught, and bought for the table of King Arthur. When they opened the fish in order to cook it, every one was astonished at finding such a little boy, and Tom was quite delighted at regaining his liberty. They carried him to the king, who made Tom his dwarf, and he soon grew a great favorite at court; for by his tricks and gambols he not only amused the king and queen, but also all the knights of the Round Table.

It is said that when the king rode out on horseback, he frequently took Tom along with him, and if a shower came on, he used to creep into his majesty's waistcoat pocket, where he slept till the rain was over.

King Arthur one day interrogated Tom about his parents, wishing to know if they were as small as he was, and what circumstances they were in. Tom told the king that his father and mother were as tall as any of the persons about court, but in rather poor circumstances. On hearing this, the king carried Tom to his treasury, the place where he kept all his money, and told him to take as much money as he could carry home to his parents, which made the poor little fellow caper with joy. Tom went immediately to procure a purse, which was made of a water-bubble, and then returned to the treasury, where he received a silver threepenny-piece to put into it.

Our little hero had some difficulty in lifting the burden upon his back; but he at last succeeded in getting it placed to his mind, and set forward on his journey. However, without meeting with any accident, and after resting himself more than a hundred times by the way, in two days and two nights he reached his father's house in safety.

Tom had traveled forty-eight hours with a huge silver-piece on his back, and was almost tired to death, when his mother ran out to meet him, and carried him into the house.

Tom's parents were both happy to see him, and the more so as he had brought such an amazing sum of money with him; but the poor little fellow was excessively wearied, having traveled half a mile in forty-eight hours, with a huge silver threepenny-piece on his back. His mother, in order to recover him from the fatigue he had undergone, placed him in a walnut shell by the fireside, and feasted him for three days on a hazel-nut, which made him very sick; for a whole nut used to serve him a month.

Tom soon recovered; but as there had been a fall of rain, and the ground very wet, he could not travel back to King Arthur's court; therefore his mother, one day when the wind was blowing in that direction, made a little parasol of cambric paper, and tying Tom to it, she gave him a puff into the air with her mouth, which soon carried him to the king's palace. The king, queen, and all the nobility were happy to see Tom again at court, where he delighted them by his dexterity at tilts and tournaments; but his exertions to please them cost him very dear, and brought on such a severe fit of illness that his life was despaired of.

However, the queen of the fairies, hearing of his indisposition, came to court in a chariot drawn by flying mice, and placing Tom by her side, drove through the air without stopping till they arrived at her palace. After restoring him to health, and permitting him to enjoy all the gay diversion of Fairy-land, the queen commanded a strong current of air to arise, on which she placed Tom, who floated upon it like a cork in the water, and sent him instantly to the royal palace of King Arthur.

Just at the time when Tom came flying across the courtyard of the palace, the cook happened to be passing with the king's great bowl of furmenty [wheat pudding], which was a dish his majesty was very fond of: but unfortunately the poor little fellow fell plump into the middle of it, and splashed the hot furmenty about the cook's face.

The cook, who was an ill-natured fellow, being in a terrible rage at Tom for frightening and scalding him with the furmenty, went straight to the king, and represented that Tom had jumped into the royal furmenty, and thrown it down out of mere mischief. The king was so enraged when he heard this, that he ordered Tom to be seized and tried for high treason; and there being no person who dared to plead for him, he was condemned to be beheaded immediately.

On hearing this dreadful sentence pronounced, poor Tom fell a-trembling with fear, but, seeing no means of escape, and observing a miller close to him gaping with his great mouth, as country boobies do at a fair, he took a leap, and fairly jumped down his throat. This exploit was done with such activity that not one person present saw it, and even the miller did not know the trick which Tom had played upon him. Now, as Tom had disappeared, the court broke up, and the miller went home to his mill.

When Tom heard the mill at work, he knew he was clear of the court, and therefore he began to tumble and roll about, so that the poor miller could get no rest, thinking he was bewitched; so he sent for a doctor. When the doctor came, Tom began to dance and sing; and the doctor, being as much frightened as the miller, sent in haste for five other doctors and twenty learned men.

When they were debating upon the cause of this extraordinary occurrence, the miller happened to yawn, when Tom, embracing the opportunity, made another jump, and alighted safely upon his feet on the middle of the table.

The miller, who was very much provoked at being tormented by such a little pigmy creature, fell into a terrible rage, and, laying hold of Tom, he then opened the window, and threw him into the river. At the moment the miller let Tom drop a large salmon swimming along at the time saw him fall, and snapped him up in a minute. A fisherman caught the salmon, and sold it in the market to the steward of a great lord. The nobleman, on seeing the fish, thought it so uncommonly fine that he made a present of it to King Arthur, who ordered it to be dressed immediately. When the cook cut open the fish, he found poor Tom, and ran to the king with him; but his majesty, being engaged with state affairs, ordered him to be taken away, and kept in custody till he sent for him.

The cook was determined that Tom should not slip out of his hands this time, so he put him into a mouse-trap, and left him to peep through the wires. Tom had remained in the trap a whole week, when he was sent for by King Arthur, who pardoned him for throwing down the furmenty, and took him again into favor. On account of his wonderful feats of activity, Tom was knighted by the king, and went under the name of the renowned Sir Thomas Thumb. As Tom's clothes had suffered much in the batter-pudding, the furmenty, and the insides of the giant, miller, and fishes, his majesty ordered him a new suit of clothes, and to be mounted as a knight.

Of Butterfly's wings his shirt was made,
His boots of chicken's bide;
And by a nimble fairy blade,
Well learned in the tailoring trade,
His clothing was supplied.
A needle dangled by his side;
A dapper mouse he used to ride,
Thus strutted Tom in stately pride!

It was certainly very diverting to see Tom in this dress, and mounted on the mouse, as he rode out a-hunting with the king and nobility, who were all ready to expire with laughter at Tom and his fine prancing charger.

One day, as they were riding by a farmhouse, a large cat, which was lurking about the door, made a spring, and seized both Tom and his mouse. She then ran up a tree with them, and was beginning to devour the mouse; but Tom boldly drew his sword, and attacked the cat so fiercely that she let them both fall, when one of the nobles caught him in his hat, and laid him on a bed of down, in a little ivory cabinet.

The queen of the fairies came soon after to pay Tom a visit, and carried him back to Fairy-land, where he remained several years. During his residence there, King Arthur, and all the persons who knew Tom, had died; and as he was desirous of being again at court, the fairy queen, after dressing him in a suit of clothes, sent him flying through the air to the palace, in the days of King Thunstone, the successor of Arthur. Every one flocked round to see him, and being carried to the king, he was asked who he was—whence he came—and where he lived? Tom answered:

My name is Tom Thumb,
From the fairies I've come.
When King Arthur shone,
This court was my home.

In me he delighted,
 By him I was knighted;
 Did you never hear of Sir Thomas Thumb?

The king was so charmed with this address that he ordered a little chair to be made, in order that Tom might sit upon his table, and also a palace of gold, a span high, with a door an inch wide, to live in. He also gave him a coach, drawn by six small mice.

The queen was so enraged at the honors conferred on Sir Thomas that she resolved to ruin him, and told the king that the little knight had been saucy to her.

The king sent for Tom in great haste, but being fully aware of the danger of royal anger, he crept into an empty snail-shell, where he lay for a considerable time, until he was almost starved with hunger; but at last he ventured to peep out, and perceiving a fine large butterfly on the ground, near the place of his concealment, he approached very cautiously, and getting himself placed astride on it, was immediately carried up into the air. The butterfly flew with him from tree to tree and from field to field, and at last returned to the court, where the king and nobility all strove to catch him; but at last poor Tom fell from his seat into a watering-pot, in which he was almost drowned.

When the queen saw him she was in a rage, and said he should be beheaded; and he was again put into a mousetrap until the time of his execution.

However, a cat, observing something alive in the trap, patted it about till the wires broke, and set Thomas at liberty.

The king received Tom again into favor, which he did not live to enjoy, for a large spider one day attacked him; and although he drew his sword and fought well, yet the spider's poisonous breath at last overcame him:

He fell dead on the ground where he stood,
 And the spider suck'd every drop of his blood.

King Thunstone and his whole court were so sorry at the loss of their little favorite, that they went into mourning, and raised a fine white marble monument over his grave, with the following epitaph:

Here lyes Tom Thumb, King Arthur's knight,
 Who died by a spider's cruel bite.
 He was well known in Arthur's court,
 Where he afforded gallant sport;
 He rode at tilt and tournament,
 And on a mouse a-hunting went,
 Alive he filled the court with mirth;
 His death to sorrow soon gave birth.
 Wipe, wipe your eyes, and shake your head
 And cry, Alas Tom Thumb is dead!

THE DEMON TREGEAGLE

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Hartland, Edwin Sidney. English Fairy and Other Folktales. London: Walter Scott, 1890, 158–167.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Hunt, Robert. Popular Romances of the West of England. 1st series, 133. London: John Camden Hotten, 1865.

National Origin: England

---

The legend of “The Demon Tregeagle” satisfies a range of functions commonly served by this genre. Tregeagle’s fate cautions against not only the depredations that are committed by great sinners, but his punishment warns the community about the consequences of social transgressions in general. The inevitable results of Church corruption are dramatized by the obligation of subsequent, morally responsible, clerics to hold the deathless demon at bay. The chastisement of the religious hierarchy is made explicit in the following passage, “‘To bring him from the grave has been to me so dreadful a task, that I leave him to your care, and that of the Prior’s by whom he was so beloved.’ Having said this, the defendant left the court.” On the other hand, the actions of St. Petroc validate both his power and benevolence, as well as his intimate relationship to his namesake community, Padstow (“Petroc’s stowe [place]”). At a more mundane level, the legend explains local features of the environment such as a bar of sand off the coast of Porthieven. Two final issues concerning the legend should be addressed. The reference to “bell, book, and candle” alludes to an excommunication rite for members of the Roman Catholic Church who have committed a particularly heinous sin. The tasks imposed on Tregeagle have many traditional precedents, for example, “Making a Rope of Sand” (AT 1174).

---

Thrice he began to tell his doleful tale,
And thrice the sighs did swallow up his voice.

—Thomas Sackville

Who has not heard of the wild spirit Tregeagle? He haunts equally the moor, the rocky coasts, and the blown sand-hills of Cornwall. From north to south, from east to west, this doomed spirit is heard of, and to the day of judgment he is doomed to wander, pursued by avenging fiends. Forever endeavoring to perform some task by which he hopes to secure repose, and being forever defeated. Who has not heard the howling of Tregeagle? When the storms come with all their strength from the Atlantic, and urge themselves upon the rocks around the Land's End, the howls of the spirit are louder than the roaring of the winds. When calms rest upon the ocean, and the waves can scarcely form upon the resting waters, low wailings creep along the coast. These are the wailings of this wandering soul. When midnight is on the moor, or on the mountains, and the night winds whistle amidst the rugged cairns, the shrieks of Tregagle are distinctly heard. We know then that he is pursued by the demon dogs, and that till daybreak he must fly with all speed before them. The voice of Tregagle is everywhere, and yet he is unseen by human eye. Every reader will at once perceive that Tregagle belongs to the mythologies of the oldest nations, and that the traditions of this wandering spirit in Cornwall, which center upon one tyrannical magistrate, are but the appropriation of stories which belong to every age and country. Tradition thus tells Tregagle's tale.

There are some men who appear to be from their births given over to the will of tormenting demons. Such a man was Tregagle. He is as old as the hills, yet there are many circumstances in the story of his life which appear to remove him from this remote antiquity. Modern legends assert him to belong to comparatively modern times, and say that, without doubt, he was one of the Tregagles who once owned Trevorder, near Bodmin. We have not, however, much occasion to trouble ourselves with the man or his life; it is with the death and the subsequent existence of a myth that we are concerned.

Certain it is that the man Tregagle was diabolically wicked. He seems to have been urged on from one crime to another until the cup of sin was overflowing.

Tregagle was wealthy beyond most men of his time, and his wealth purchased for him that immunity which the Church, in her degenerate days, too often accorded to those who could aid the priesthood with their gold or power. As a magistrate he was tyrannical and unjust, and many an innocent man was wantonly sacrificed by him for the purpose of hiding his own dark deeds. As a landlord he was rapacious and unscrupulous, and frequently so involved his tenants in his toils that they could not escape his grasp. The stain of secret murder clings to his memory, and he is said to have sacrificed a sister whose goodness stood between him and his demon passions; his wife and children perished Victims to his cruelties. At length death drew near to relieve the land of a monster whose name was a terror to all who heard it. Devils waited to secure the soul they had won, and Tregagle in terror gave to the priesthood wealth, that they might fight with them and save his soul from eternal fire. Desperate was the struggle, but the powerful exorcisms of the banded brotherhood of a neighboring monastery drove back the evil ones, and Tregagle slept with his fathers, safe in the custody of the churchmen who buried him with high honors in St. Breock Church. They sang chants and read prayers above his grave, to secure the soul which they thought they had saved. But Tregagle was not fated to rest. Satan desired still to gain possession of such a gigantic sinner, and we can only refer what ensued to the influence of the wicked spiritings of his ministers.

A dispute arose between two wealthy families respecting the ownership of extensive lands around Bodmin. The question had been rendered more difficult by the nefarious conduct of Tregeagle, who had acted as steward to one of the claimants, and who had destroyed ancient deeds, forged others, and indeed made it appear that he was the real proprietor of the domain. Large portions of the land Tregeagle had sold, and other parts were leased upon long terms, he having received all the money and appropriated it. His death led to inquiries, and then the transactions were gradually brought to light. Involving, as this did, large sums of money—and indeed it was a question upon which turned the future well-doing or ruin of a family. It was fought by the lawyers with great pertinacity. The legal questions had been argued several times before the judges at the assizes. The trials had been deferred, new trials had been sought for and granted, and every possible plan known to the lawyers for postponing the settlement of a suit had been tried. A day was at length fixed, upon which a final decision must be come to, and a special jury was sworn to administer justice between the contending parties. Witnesses innumerable were examined as to the validity of a certain deed, and the balance of evidence was equally suspended. The judge was about to sum up the case and refer the question to the jury, when the defendant in the case, coming into Court, proclaimed aloud that he had yet another witness to produce. There was a strange silence in the judgment hall. It was felt that something chilling to the soul was amongst them, and there was a simultaneous throb of terror as Tregeagle was led into the witness-box.

When the awe-struck assembly had recovered, the lawyers for the defendant commenced their examination, which was long and terrible. The result, however, was the disclosure of an involved system of fraud, of which the honest defendant had been the victim, and the jury unhesitatingly gave a verdict in his favor.

The trial over, everyone expected to see the specter witness removed. There, however, he stood powerless to fly, although he evidently desired to do so. Spirits of darkness were waiting to bear him away, but some spell of holiness prevented them from touching him. There was a struggle with the good and the evil angels for this sinner's soul, and the assembled court appeared frozen with horror. At length the judge with dignity commanded the defendant to remove his witness.

“To bring him from the grave has been to me so dreadful a task, that I leave him to your care, and that of the Prior's by whom he was so beloved.” Having said this, the defendant left the court.

The churchmen were called in, and long were, the deliberations between them and the lawyers as to the best mode of disposing of Tregeagle.

They could resign him to the devil at once, but by long trial the worst of crimes might be absolved, and as good churchmen they could not sacrifice a human soul. The only thing was to give the spirit some task, difficult beyond the power of human nature, which might be extended far into eternity. Time might thus gradually soften the obdurate soul, which still retained all the black dyes of the sins done in the flesh, that by infinitely slow degrees repentance might exert its softening power. The spell therefore put upon Tregagle was, that as long as he was employed on some endless assigned task, there should be hope of salvation, and that he should be secure from the assaults of the devil as long as he labored steadily. A moment's rest was fatal; labor unresting, and forever, was his doom.

One of the lawyers remembering that Dosmery Pool was bottomless, and that a thorn bush which had been flung into it, but a few weeks before, had made its appearance in Falmouth harbor, proposed that Tregagle might be employed to empty this profound lake. Then one of the churchmen, to make the task yet more enduring, proposed that it should be performed by the aid of a limpid shell having a hole in it.

This was agreed to, and the required incantations were duly made. Bound by mystical spells, Tregagle was removed to the dark moors, and duly set to work. Year after year passed by, and there day and night, summer and winter, storm and shine, Tregagle was bending over the dark water, working hard with his perforated shell; yet the pool remained at the same level.

His old enemy the devil kept a careful eye on the doomed one, resolving, if possible, to secure so choice an example of evil. Often did he raise tempests sufficiently wild, as he supposed, to drive Tregagle from his work, knowing that if he failed for a season to labor, he could seize and secure him. These were long tried in vain; but at length an auspicious hour presented itself.

Nature was at war with herself; the elements had lost their balance, and there was a terrific struggle to recover it. Lightnings flashed, and coiled like fiery snakes around the rocks of Roughtor. Fire-balls fell on the desert moors and hissed in the accursed lake. Thunders pealed through the heavens, and echoed from hill to hill; an earthquake shook the solid earth, and terror was on all living. The winds arose and raged with a fury which was irresistible, and hail beat so mercilessly on all things that it spread death around. Long did Tregagle stand the "pelting of the pitiless storm," but at length he yielded to its force and fled. The demons in crowds were at his heels. He doubled, however, on his pursuers and returned to the lake; but so rapid were they that he could not rest the required moment to dip his shell in the now seething waters.

Three times he fled round the lake, and the evil ones pursued him. Then, feeling that there was no safety for him near Dosmery Pool, he sprang swifter than the wind across it, shrieking with agony, and thus—since the devils cannot cross water, and were obliged to go round the lake—he gained on them and fled over the moor.

Away, away went Tregagle, faster and faster the dark spirits pursuing, and they had nearly overtaken him, when he saw Roach Rock and its chapel before him. He rushed up the rocks, with giant power clambered to the eastern window, and dashed his head through it, thus securing the shelter of its sanctity.

The defeated demons retired, and long and loud were their wild wailings in the air. The inhabitants of the moors and of the neighboring towns slept not a wink that night.

Tregeagle was safe, his head was within the holy church, though his body was exposed on a bare rock to the storm. Earnest were the prayers of the blessed hermit in his cell on the rock, to be relieved from his nocturnal and sinful visitor.

In vain were the recluse's prayers. Day after day, as he knelt at the altar, the ghastly head of the doomed sinner grinned horribly down upon him. Every holy ejaculation fell upon Tregeagle's ear like molten iron. He writhed and shrieked under the torture; but legions of devils filled the air, ready to seize him, if for a moment he withdrew his head from the sanctuary. Sabbath after Sabbath the little chapel on the rock was rendered a scene of sad confusion by the interruption which Tregeagle caused. Men trembled with fear at his agonizing cries, and women swooned. At length the place was deserted, and even the saint of the rock was wasting to death by the constant perturbation in which he was kept by the unholy spirit, and the demons who, like carrion birds, swarmed around the holy cairn. Things could not go on thus. The monks of Bodmin and the priests from the neighboring churches gathered together, and the result of their long and anxious deliberations was that Tregeagle, guarded by two saints, should be taken to the north coast, near Padstow, and employed in making trusses of sand, and ropes of sand with which to bind them. By powerful spell Tregeagle was removed from Roach, and fixed upon the sandy shores of the Padstow district. Sinners are seldom permitted to enjoy any peace of soul. As the ball of sand grew into form, the tides rose, and the breakers spread out the sands again a level sheet; again was it packed together and again washed away. Toil! Toil! Toil! Day and night unrestingly, sand on sand grew with each hour, and ruthlessly the ball was swept, by one blow of a sea wave, along the shore.

The cries of Tregeagle were dreadful; and as the destruction of the sand heap was constantly recurring, a constantly increasing despair gained the mastery over hope, and the ravings of the baffled soul were louder than the roarings of the winter tempest.

Baffled in making trusses of sand, Tregeagle seized upon the loose particles and began to spin them into a rope. Long and patiently did he pursue his task, and hope once more rose like a star out of the midnight darkness of despair. A rope was forming when a storm came up with all its fury from the Atlantic, and swept the particles of sand away over the hills.

The inhabitants of Padstow had seldom any rest. At every tide the howlings of Tregeagle banished sleep from each eye. But now so fearful were the sounds of the doomed soul, in the madness of the struggle between hope and despair, that, the people fled the town, and clustered upon the neighboring plains, praying, as with one voice, to be relieved from the sad presence of this monster.

St. Petroc, moved by the tears and petitions of the people, resolved to remove the spirit; and by the intense earnestness of his prayers, after long wrestling, he subdued Tregeagle to his will. Having chained him with the bonds which the saint had forged with his own hands, every link of which had been welded with a prayer, St. Petroc led the spirit away from the north coast, and stealthily placed him on the southern shores.

In those days Ella's Town, now Heiston, was a flourishing port. Ships sailed into the estuary, up to the town, and they brought all sorts of merchandise, and returned with cargoes of tin from the mines of Breage and Wendron.

The wily monk placed his charge at Bareppa, and there condemned him to carry sacks of sand across the estuary of the Loo, and to empty them at Porthleven, until the beach was clean down to the rocks. The priest was a good observer. He knew that the sweep of the tide was from Trewavas Head round the coast towards the Lizard, and that the sand would be carried back steadily and speedily as fast as the spirit could remove it.

Long did Tregagle labor; and of course in vain. His struggles were giant-like to perform his task, but he saw the sands return as regularly as he removed them. The sufferings of the poor fishermen who inhabited the coast around Porthleven were great. As the howlings of Tregagle disturbed the dwellers in Padstow, so did they now distress those toil-worn men.

When sorrow is highest,
Relief is nighest.

And a mischievous demon-watcher, in pure wantonness, brought that relief to those fishers of the sea.

Tregagle was laden with a sack of sand of enormous size, and was wading across the mouth of the estuary, when one of those wicked devils, who were kept ever near Tregagle, in very idleness tripped up the heavily laden spirit. The sea was raging with the irritation of a passing storm; and as Tregagle fell, the sack was seized by the waves, and its contents poured out across this arm of the sea.

There, to this day, it rests a bar of sand, fatally destroying the harbor of Ella's Town. The rage of the inhabitants of this seaport—now destroyed—was great; and, with all their priests, away they went to the Loo Bar, and assailed their destroyer. Against human anger Tregagle was proof. The shock of tongues fell harmlessly on his ear, and the assault of human weapons was unavailing.

By the aid of the priests, and faith-inspired prayers, the bonds were once more placed upon Tregagle; and he was, by the force of bell, book, and candle, sent to the Land's End. There he would find no harbor to destroy, and but few people to terrify. His task was to sweep the sands from Porthcurnow Cove round the headland called Tol-Peden-Penwith, into Nanjisal Cove. Those who know that rugged headland, with its cubical masses of granite, piled in Titanic grandeur one upon another, will appreciate the task; and when to all the difficulties are added the strong sweep of the Atlantic current—that portion of the Gulf stream which washes our southern shores—it will be evident that the melancholy spirit has indeed a task which must endure until the world shall end.

Even until today is Tregagle laboring at his task. In calms his wailing is heard; and those sounds which some call the “soughing of the wind,” are known to be the moanings of Tregagle; while the coming storms are predicated by the fearful roarings of this condemned mortal.

THE STORY OF MR. FOX

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Hartland, Edwin Sidney. English Fairy and Other Folktales. London: Walter Scott, 1890, 25–27.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: England

National Origin: England

---

“The Story of Mr. Fox,” commonly referred to as “The Robber Bridegroom” (AT 955 and Grimm 40) is a grisly tale with an international distribution. Joseph Jacobs (1890) ties the tale to Malone’s Variorum Shakespeare (1790), as a gloss to Much Ado About Nothing (I:i, 146) “Like the old tale, my Lord, It is not so, nor ‘twas not so, but, indeed, God forbid it should be so.” The “old tale” to which the character Benedick refers is “Mr. Fox.” This tale like many variants of “The Bluebeard” tale (AT 312)—see page 360 of this volume for a French example of the latter tale type—empowers a female protagonist confronted by a victimizing male.

---

Once upon a time there was a young lady called Lady Mary, who had two brothers. One summer they all three went to a country seat of theirs, which they had not before visited. Among the other gentry in the neighborhood who came to see them was a Mr. Fox, a bachelor, with whom they, particularly the young lady, were much pleased. He used often to dine with them, and frequently invited Lady Mary to come and see his house. One day that her brothers were absent elsewhere, and she had nothing better to do, she determined to go thither, and accordingly set out unattended. When she arrived at the house and knocked at the door, no one answered.

At length she opened it and went in; over the portal of the door was written, “Be bold, be bold, but not too bold.” She advanced; over the staircase was the same inscription. She went up; over the entrance of a gallery, the same again. Still she went on, and over the door of a chamber found written:

Be bold, be bold, but not too bold,
Lest that your heart’s blood should run cold!

She opened it; it was full of skeletons and tubs of blood. She retreated in haste, and, coming downstairs, saw from a window Mr. Fox advancing towards the house with a drawn sword in one hand, while with the other he dragged along a young lady by her hair. Lady Mary had just time to slip down and hide herself under the stairs before Mr. Fox and his victim arrived at the foot of them. As he pulled the young lady upstairs, she caught hold of one of the banisters with her hand, on which was a rich bracelet. Mr. Fox cut it off with his sword. The hand and bracelet fell into Lady Mary's lap, who then contrived to escape unobserved, and got safe home to her brothers' house.

A few days afterwards Mr. Fox came to dine with them as usual. After dinner the guests began to amuse each other with extraordinary anecdotes, and Lady Mary said she would relate to them a remarkable dream she had lately had.

"I dreamt," said she, "that as you, Mr. Fox, had often invited me to your house, I would go there one morning. When I came to the house I knocked at the door, but no one answered. When I opened the door, over the hall I saw written, 'Be bold, be bold, but not too bold.' But," said she, turning to Mr. Fox, and smiling, "It is not so, nor it was not so."

Then she pursued the rest of the story, concluding at every turn with, "It is not so, nor it was not so," until she came to the room full of skeletons, when Mr. Fox took up the burden of the tale, and said:

It is not so, nor it was not so,
And God forbid it should be so!

which he continued to repeat at every subsequent turn of the dreadful story, until she came to the circumstance of his cutting off the young lady's hand, when, upon his saying, as usual:

It is not so, nor it was not so,
And God forbid it should be so!

Lady Mary retorts by saying:

But it is so, and it was so,
And here the hand I have to show!

at the same moment producing the hand and bracelet from her lap, whereupon the guests drew their swords, and instantly cut Mr. Fox into a thousand pieces.

THE MILLER AT THE PROFESSOR'S EXAMINATION

Tradition Bearer:

Source: Wright, Thomas. "The Miller at the Professor's Examination." Folk-Lore Record 2 (1879): 173–176.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: England

National Origin: England

---

The following joke illustrates the ways in which humor can be used to critique folly. In this instance, the pretensions of academe are exposed by a member of the working class.

---

There once came to England a famous foreign professor, and before he came he gave notice that he would examine the students of all the colleges in England. After a time he had visited all but Cambridge, and he was on his road thither to examine publicly the whole university. Great was the bustle in Cambridge to prepare for the reception of the professor, and great also were the fears of the students, who dreaded the time when they must prove their acquirements before one so famous for his learning. As the period of his arrival approached their fears increased, and at last they determined to try some expedient which might avert the impending trial, and for this purpose several of the students were disguised in the habits of common laborers, and distributed in groups of two or three at convenient distances from each other along the road by which the professor was expected.

He had in his carriage arrived at the distance of a few miles from Cambridge when he met the first of these groups of laborers, and the coachman drew up his horses to inquire of them the distance. The professor was astonished to hear them answer in Latin. He proceeded on his way, and, after driving about half a mile, met with another group of laborers at work on the road, to whom a similar question was put by the coachman. The professor was still more astonished to hear them give answer in Greek. "Ah!" thought he, "they must be good scholars at Cambridge, when even the common laborers on the roads talk Latin and Greek. It won't do to examine them in the same way as other people." So all the rest of the way he was musing on the mode of examination he should adopt, and, just as he reached the outskirts of the town, he came to the determination that he would examine them by signs. As soon, therefore, as he had alighted from his carriage, he lost no time in making known this novel method of examination.

Now the students had never calculated on such a result as this from their stratagem, and they were, as might well be expected, sadly disappointed. There was one student in particular who had been studying very hard, and who was expected by everybody to gain the prize at the examination, and, as the idlest student in the university had the same chance of guessing the signs of the professor as himself, he was in very low spirits about it.

When the day of examination arrived, instead of attending it, he was walking sadly and mournfully by the banks of the river, near the mill, and it happened that the miller, who was a merry fellow and used to talk with this student as he passed the mill in his walks, saw him, and asked him what was the matter with him. Then the student told him all about it, and how the great professor was going to examine by signs, and how he was afraid that he should not get through the examination.

"Oh! if that's all," said the miller, "don't be low about the matter. Did you never hear that a clown may sometimes teach a scholar wisdom? Only let me put on your clothes, with your cap and gown, and I'll go to the examination instead of you; and if I succeed you shall have the credit of it, and if I fail I will tell them who I am."

"But," said the student, "everybody knows that I have but one eye."

"Never mind that," said the miller; "I can easily put a black patch over one of mine." So they changed clothes, and the miller went to the professor's examination in the student's cap and gown, with a patch on his eye.

Well, just as the miller entered the lecture-room, the professor had tried all the other students, and nobody could guess the meaning of his signs or answer his questions. So the miller stood up, and the professor, putting his hand in his coat pocket, drew out an apple, and held it up towards him. The miller likewise put his hand in his pocket, and drew out a crust of bread, which he in like manner held out towards the professor. Then the professor put the apple in his pocket, and pointed at the miller with one finger: the miller in return pointed at him with two: the professor pointed with three: and the miller held out his clenched fist. "Right!" said the professor; and he adjudged the prize to the miller.

The miller made all haste to communicate these good tidings to his friend the student, who was waiting at the mill; and the student, having resumed his own clothes, hastened back to hear the prize given out to him. When he arrived at the lecture-room, the professor was on his legs explaining to the assembled students the meaning of the signs which himself and the student who had gained the prize made use of.

"First," said he, "I held out an apple, signifying thereby the fall of mankind through Adam's sin, and he very properly held up a piece of bread, which signified that by Christ, the bread of life, mankind was regenerated. Then I held out one finger, which meant that there is one God in the Trinity; he held out two fingers, signifying that there are two; I held out three fingers, meaning that there are three; and he held out his clenched fist, which was as much as to say that the three are one."

Well, the student who got the prize was sadly puzzled to think how the miller knew all this, and as soon as the ceremony of publishing the name of the successful candidate was over he hastened to the mill, and told him all the professor had said.

"Ah!" said the miller, "I'll tell you how it was. When I went in the professor looked mighty fierce, and he put his hand in his pocket, and fumbled about for some time, and at last he pulled out an apple, and he held it out as though he would throw it at me. Then I put my hand in my pocket, and could find nothing but an old crust of bread, and so I held it out in the same way, meaning that if he threw the apple at me I would throw the crust at him. Then he looked still more fiercely, and held out his one finger, as much as to say he would poke my one eye out, and I held out two fingers, meaning that if he poked out my one eye I would poke out his two, and then he held out three of his fingers, as though he would scratch my face, and I clenched my fist and shook it at him, meaning that if he did I would knock him down. And then he said I deserved the prize.”

IRELAND

---

DEATH OF CUCHULAIN

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Gregory, Lady Isabella Augusta Perse. Cuchulain of Muirthemne: The Story of the Men of the Red Branch of Ulster. London: John Murray, 1902, 334–350.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Ireland

National Origin: Ireland

---

Cuchulain is the central hero of the Ulster cycle of Irish myth. His name, “Culann’s Hound,” was bestowed on him when as a child he killed a savage dog that attacked him belonging to the smith Culann. In recompense, the boy gave himself in service to the smith as his “watch dog.” Cuchulain was trained by the famous woman warrior Scáthach, and distinguished himself as the foremost of the elite Red Branch Knights, protectors of Ulster’s king Conchobar mac Nessa. The narrative of his final battle and Conall’s campaign of revenge against the victorious forces who had conspired to bring about the hero’s death includes the extraordinarily moving lament of Emer over the death of her husband, Cuchulain.

---

Cuchulain went on then to the house of his mother, Dechtire, to bid her farewell. And she came out on the lawn to meet him, for she knew well he was going out to face the men of Ireland, and she brought out wine in a vessel to him, as her custom was when he passed that way. But when he took the vessel in his hand, it was red blood that was in it. “My grief!” he said, “my mother Dechtire, it is no wonder others to forsake me, when you yourself offer me a drink of blood.” Then she filled the vessel a second, and a third time, and each time when she gave it to him, there was nothing in it but blood.

Then anger came on Cuchulain, and he dashed the vessel against a rock, and broke it, and he said, "The fault is not in yourself, my mother Dechtire, but my luck is turned against me, and my life is near its end, and I will not come back alive this time from facing the men of Ireland."

Then Dechtire tried hard to persuade him to go back and to wait till he would have the help of Conall. "I will not wait," he said, "for anything you can say; for I would not give up my great name and my courage for all the riches of the world. And from the day I first took arms till this day, I have never drawn back from a fight or a battle. And it is not now I will begin to draw back," he said, "for a great name outlasts life."

Then he went on his way, and Cathbad, that had followed him, went with him. And presently they came to a ford, and there they saw a young girl, thin and white-skinned and having yellow hair, washing and ever washing, and wringing out clothing that was stained crimson red, and she crying and keening all the time. "Little Hound," said Cathbad, "do you see what it is that young girl is doing? It is your red clothes she is washing, and crying as she washes, because she knows you are going to your death against Maeve's great army. And take the warning now and turn back again."

"Dear master," said Cuchulain, "you have followed me far enough; for I will not turn back from my vengeance on the men of Ireland that are come to burn and to destroy my house and my country. And what is it to me, the woman of the Sidhe to be washing red clothing for me? It is not long till there will be clothing enough, and armor and arms, lying soaked in pools of blood, by my own sword and my spear. And if you are sorry and loth to let me go into the fight, I am glad and ready enough myself to go into it, though I know as well as you yourself I must fall in it. Do not be hindering me any more, then," he said, "for, if I stay or if I go, death will meet me all the same. But go now to Emain, to Conchubar and to Emer [Cuchulain's wife], and bring them life and health from me, for I will never go back to meet them again. It is my grief and my wound, I to part from them! And O Laeg [Cuchulain's charioteer!]" he said, "we are going away under trouble and under darkness from Emer now, as it is often we came back to her with gladness out of strange places and far countries."

Then Cathbad left him, and he went on his way. And after a while he saw three hags, and they blind of the left eye, before him in the mud, and they having a venomous hound they were cooking with charms on rods of the rowan tree. And he was going by them, for he knew it was not for his good they were there.

But one of the hags called to him, "Stop a while with us, Cuchulain."

"I will not stop with you," said Cuchulain.

"That is because we have nothing better than a dog to give you," said the hag. "If we had a grand, big cooking-hearth, you would stop and visit us; but because it is only a little we have to offer you, you will not stop. But he that will not show respect for the small, though he is great, he will get no respect himself."

Then he went over to her, and she gave him the shoulder-blade of the hound out of her left hand, and he ate it out of his left hand. And he put it down on his left thigh, and the hand that took it was struck down, and the thigh he put it on was struck through and through, so that the strength that was in them before left them.

Then he went down the road of Meadhon-Luachair, by Slieve Fuad, and his enemy, Erc, son of Cairbre, saw him in the chariot, and his sword shining red in his hand, and the light of his courage plain upon him, and his hair spread out like threads of gold that change their color on the edge of the anvil under the smith's band, and the Crow of Battle in the air over his head.

"Cuchulain is coming at us," said Erc to the men of Ireland, "and let us be ready for him." So they made a fence of shields linked together, and Erc put a couple of the men that were strongest here and there, to let on to be fighting one another, that they might call Cuchulain to them; and he put a Druid with every couple of them, and he bid the Druid to ask Cuchulain's spears of him, for it would be hard for him to refuse a Druid. For it was in the prophecy of the children of Calatin that a king would be killed by each one of those spears in that battle.

And he bid the men of Ireland to give out shouts, and Cuchulain came against them in his chariot, doing his three thunder feats, and he used his spear and his sword in such a way, that their heads, and their hands, and their feet, and their bones, were scattered through the plain of Muirthemne; like the sands on the shore, like the stars in the sky, like the dew in May, like snow-flakes and hailstones, like leaves of the trees, like buttercups in a meadow, like grass under the feet of cattle on a fine summer day. It is red that plain was with the slaughter Cuchulain made when he came crashing over it.

Then he saw one of the men that was put to quarrel with the other, and the Druid called to him to come and hinder them, and Cuchulain leaped towards them. "Your spear to me," cried the Druid.

"I swear by the oath of my people," said Cuchulain, "you are not so much in want of it as I am in want of it myself. The men of Ireland are upon me," he said, "and I am upon them."

"I will put a bad name on you if you refuse it to me," said the Druid.

"There was never a bad name put on me yet, on account of any refusal of mine," said Cuchulain, and with that he threw the spear at him, and it went through his head, and it killed the men that were on the other side of him.

Then Cuchulain drove through the host, and Lugaid, son of Curoi, got the spear. "Who is it will fall by this spear, children of Calatin?" said Lugaid.

"A king will fall by it," said they. Then Lugaid threw the spear at Cuchulain's chariot, and it went through and hit the driver, Laeg, son of Rianganabra, and he fell back, and his bowels came out on the cushions of the chariot.

"My grief!" said Laeg, "it is hard I am wounded."

Then Cuchulain drew the spear out, and Laeg said his farewell to him, and Cuchulain said, "Today I will be a fighter and a chariot-driver as well."

Then he saw the other two men that were put to quarrel with one another, and one of them called out it would be a great shame for him not to give him his help. Then Cuchulain leaped towards them.

“Your spear to me, Cuchulain,” said the Druid. “I swear by the oath my people swear by,” said he, “you are not in such want of the spear as I am myself, for it is by my courage, and by my arms, that I have to drive out the four provinces of Ireland that are sweeping over Muirthemne today.”

“I will put a bad name upon you,” said the Druid. “I am not bound to give more than one gift in the day, and I have paid what is due to my name already,” said Cuchulain. Then the Druid said, “I will put a bad name on the province of Ulster, because of your refusal.”

“Ulster was never dispraised yet for any refusal of mine,” said Cuchulain, “or for anything I did unworthily. Though little of my life should be left to me, Ulster will not be reproached for me today.” With that he threw his spear at him, and it went through his head, and through the heads of the nine men that were behind him, and Cuchulain went through the host as he did before.

Then Erc, son of Cairbre Niafer, took up his spear. “Who will fall by this?” he asked the children of Calatin.

“A king will fall by it,” they said.

“I heard you say the same thing of the spear that Lugaid threw a while ago,” said Erc.

“That is true,” said they, “and the king of the chariot-drivers of Ireland fell by it, Cuchulain’s driver Laeg, son of Rianganabra.”

With that, Erc threw the spear, and it went through the Grey of Macha [Cuchulain’s horse]. Cuchulain drew the spear out, and they said farewell to one another. And then the Grey went away from him, with half his harness hanging from his neck, and he went into Glas-linn, the grey pool in Slieve Fuad.

Then Cuchulain drove through the host, and he saw the third couple disputing together, and he went between them as he did before. And the Druid asked his spear of him, but he refused him. “I will put a bad name on you,” said the Druid.

“I have paid what is due to my name today,” said he; “my honor does not bind me to give more than one request in a day.”

“I will put a bad name upon Ulster because of your refusal.”

“I have paid what is due for the honor of Ulster,” said Cuchulain.

“Then I will put a bad name on your kindred,” said the Druid.

“The news that I have been given a bad name shall never go back to that place I am never to go back to myself; for it is little of my life that is left to me,” said Cuchulain. With that he threw his spear at him, and it went through him, and through the heads of the men that were along with him.

“You do your kindness unkindly, Cuchulain,” said the Druid, as he fell.

Then Cuchulain drove for the last time through the host, and Lugaid took the spear, and he said, “Who will fall by this spear, children of Calatin?”

“A king will fall by it,” said they. “I heard you saying that a king would fall by the spear Erc threw a while ago.”

“That is true,” they said, “and the Grey of Macha fell by it, that was the king of the horses of Ireland.”

Then Lugaid threw the spear, and it went through and through Cuchulain’s body, and he knew he had got his deadly wound; and his bowels came out on the cushions of the chariot, and his only horse went away from him, the Black Sainglain, with half the harness hanging from his neck, and left his master, the king of the heroes of Ireland, to die upon the plain of Muirthemne.

Then Cuchulain said, “There is great desire on me to go to that lake beyond, and to get a drink from it.”

“We will give you leave to do that,” they said, “if you will come back to us after.”

“I will bid you come for me if I am not able to come back myself,” said Cuchulain.

Then he gathered up his bowels into his body, and he went down to the lake. He drank a drink and he washed himself, and he returned back again to his death, and he called to his enemies to come and meet him.

There was a pillar-stone west of the lake, and his eye lit on it, and he went to the pillar-stone, and he tied himself to it with his breast-belt, the way he would not meet his death lying down, but would meet it standing up. Then his enemies came round about him, but they were in dread of going close to him, for they were not sure but he might be still alive.

“It is a great shame for you,” said Erc, son of Cairbre, “not to strike the head off that man, in revenge for his striking the head off my father.”

Then the Grey of Macha came back to defend Cuchulain as long as there was life in him, and the hero-light was shining above him. And the Grey of Macha made three attacks against them, and he killed fifty men with his teeth, and thirty with each of his hoofs. So there is a saying, “It is not sharper work than this was done by the Grey of Macha, the time of Cuchulain’s death.”

Then a bird came and settled on his shoulder. “It is not on that pillar birds were used to settle,” said Erc.

Then Lugaid came and lifted up Cuchulain’s hair from his shoulders, and struck his head off, and the men of Ireland gave three heavy shouts, and the sword fell from Cuchulain’s hand, and as it fell, it struck off Lugaid’s right hand, so that it fell to the ground. Then they cut off Cuchulain’s hand, in satisfaction for it, and then the light faded away from about Cuchulain’s head, and left it as pale as the snow of a single night. Then all the men of Ireland said that as it was Maeve had gathered the army, it would be right for her to bring away the head to Cruachan.

“I will not bring it with me; it is for Lugaid that struck it off to bring it with him,” said Maeve. And then Lugaid and his men went away, and they brought away Cuchulain’s head and his right hand with them, and they went south, towards the Lifé river.

At that time the army of Ulster was gathering to attack its enemies, and Conall was out before them, and he met the Grey of Macha, and his share of blood dripping from him. And then he knew that Cuchulain was dead, and himself and the Grey of Macha went looking for Cuchulain's body. And when they saw his body at the pillar-stone, the Grey of Macha went and laid his head in Cuchulain's breast.

"That body is a heavy care to the Grey of Macha," said Conall.

Then Conall went after the army, thinking in his own mind what way he could get satisfaction for Cuchulain's death. For it was a promise between himself and Cuchulain that whichever of them would be killed the first, the other would get satisfaction for his death.

"And if I am the first that is killed," said Cuchulain at that time, "how long will it be before you get satisfaction for me?"

"Before the evening of the same day," said Conall, "I will have got satisfaction for you. And if it is I that will die before you," he said, "how long will it be before you get satisfaction for me?"

"Your share of blood will not be cold on the ground," said Cuchulain, "when I will have got satisfaction for you."

So Conall followed after Lugaid to the river Lifé.

Lugaid was going down to bathe in the water, but he said to his chariot-driver, "Look out there over the plain, for fear would any one come at us unknown."

The chariot-driver looked around him. "There is a man coming on us," he said, "and it is in a great hurry he is coming; and you would think he has all the ravens in Ireland flying over his head, and there are flakes of snow speckling the ground before him."

"It is not in friendship the man comes that is coming like that," said Lugaid. "It is Conall Cearnach it is, with Dub-dearg, and the birds that you see after him, they are the sods the horse has scattered in the air from his hoofs, and the flakes of snow that are speckling the ground before him, they are the froth that he scatters from his mouth and from the bit of his bridle. Look again," said Lugaid, "and see what way is he coming."

"It is to the ford he is coming, the same way the army passed over," said the chariot-driver.

"Let him pass by us," said Lugaid, "for I have no mind to fight with him."

But when Conall came to the middle of the ford, he saw Lugaid and his chariot-driver, and he went over to them. "Welcome is the sight of a debtor's face," said Conall. "The man you owe a debt to is asking payment of you now, and I myself am that man," he said, "for the sake of my comrade, Cuchulain, that you killed. And I am standing here now, to get that debt paid."

They agreed then to fight it out on the plain of Magh Argetnas, and in the fight Conall wounded Lugaid with his spear. From that they went to a place called Ferta Lugdac. "I would like that you would give me fair play," said Lugaid.

“What fair play?” said Conall Cearnach.

“That you and I should fight with one hand,” said he, “for I have the use of but one hand.”

“I will do that,” said Conall. Then Conall’s hand was bound to his side with a cord, and then they fought for a long time, and one did not get the better of the other. And when Conall was not gaining on him, his horse, Dub-dearg, that was near by, came up to Lugaid, and took a bite out of his side.

“Misfortune on me,” said Lugaid, “it is not right or fair that is of you, Conall.”

“It was for myself to do what is right and fair,” said Conall.

“I made no promise for a beast, that is without training and without sense.”

“It is well I know you will not leave me till you take my head, as I took Cuchulain’s head from him,” said Lugaid. “Take it, then, along with your own head. Put my kingdom with your kingdom, and my courage with your courage; for I would like that you would be the best champion in Ireland.”

Then Conall made an end of him, and he went back, bringing Cuchulain’s head along with him to the pillar stone where his body was.

And by that time Emer had got word of all that had happened, and that her husband had got his death by the men of Ireland, and by the powers of the children of Calatin. And it was Levarcham brought her the story, for Conall Cearnach had met her on his way, and had bade her go and bring the news to Emain Macha; and there she found Emer, and she sitting in her upper room, looking over the plain for some word from the battle.

And all the women came out to meet Levarcham, and when they heard her story, they made an outcry of grief and sharp cries, with loud weeping and burning tears; and there were long dismal sounds going through Emain, and the whole country round was filled with crying. And Emer and her women went to the place where Cuchulain’s body was, and they gathered round it there, and gave themselves to crying and keening.

And when Conall came back to the place, he laid the head with the body of Cuchulain, and he began to lament along with them, and it is what he said, “It is Cuchulain had prosperity on him, a root of valor from the time he was but a soft child; there never fell a better hero than the hero that fell by Lugaid of the Lands. And there are many are in want of you,” he said, “and until all the chief men of Ireland have fallen by me, it is not fitting there should ever be peace.

“It is grief to me, he to have gone into the battle without Conall being at his side; it was a pity for him to go there without my body beside his body. Och! It is he was my foster-son, and now the ravens are drinking his blood; there will not be either laughter or mirth, since the Hound has gone astray from us.”

“Let us bury Cuchulain now,” said Emer.

“It is not right to do that,” said Conall, “until I have avenged him on the men of Ireland. And it is a great shouting I hear about the plain of Muirthemne, and it is full the country is of crying after Cuchulain; and it is good at keeping the country and watching the boundaries the man was that is here before me, a cross-hacked body in a pool of blood. And it is well it pleased Lugaid, son of Curoi, to be at the killing of Cuchulain, for it was Cuchulain killed the chiefs and the children of Deaguid round Fain, son of Foraoi, and round Curoi, son of Daire himself. And this shouting has taken away my wits and my memory from me," he said, "and it is hard for me, Cuchulain not to answer these cries, and I to be without him now; for there is not a champion in Ireland that was not in dread of the sword in his hand. And it is broken in halves my heart is for my brother, and I will bring my revenge through Ireland now, and I will not leave a tribe without wounding, or true blood without spilling, and the whole world will be told of my rout to the end of life and time, until the men of Munster and Connaught and Leinster will be crying for the rising they made against him. And without the spells of the children of Calatin, the whole of them would not have been able to do him to death."

After that complaint, rage and madness came on Conall, and he went forward in his chariot to follow after the rest of the men of Ireland, the same way as he had followed after Lugaid.

And Emer took the head of Cuchulain in her hands, and she washed it clean, and put a silk cloth about it, and she held it to her breast; and she began to cry heavily over it, and it is what she said:

"Ochone!" said she, "it is good the beauty of this head was, though it is low this day, and it is many of the kings and princes of the world would be keening it if they knew the way it is now, and the poets and the Druids of Ireland and of Alban; and many were the goods and the jewels and the rents and the tributes that you brought home to me from the countries of the world, with the courage and the strength of your hands!"

And she made this complaint:

"Och, head! Ochone, O head! you gave death to great heroes, to many hundreds; my head will lie in the same grave, the one Stone will be made for both of us.

"Och, hand! Ochone, hand that was once gentle. It is often it was put under my head; it is dear that hand was to me!

"Dear mouth! Ochone, kind mouth that was sweet-voiced telling stories; since the time love first came on your face, you never refused either weak or strong!

"Dear the man, dear the man, that would kill the whole of a great host; dear his cold bright hair, and dear his bright cheeks!

"Dear the king, dear the king, that never gave a refusal to any; thirty days it is tonight since my body lay beside your body.

"Och, two spears! Ochone, two spears, Och, shield! Och, deadly sword! Let them be given to Conall of the battles; there was never any wage given like that.

"I am glad, I am glad, Cuchulain of Muirthemne, I never brought red shame on your face, for any unfaithfulness against you.

“Happy are they, happy are they, who will never hear the cuckoo again forever, now that the Hound has died from us.

“I am carried away like a branch on the stream; I will not bind up my hair today. From this day I have nothing to say that is better than Ochone!”

And then she said, “It is long that it was showed to me in a vision of the night, that Cuchulain would fall by the men of Ireland, and it appeared to me Dundéalgan to be falling to the ground, and his shield to be split from lip to border, and his sword and his spears broken in the middle, and I saw Conall doing deeds of death before me, and myself and yourself in the one death. And oh! my love,” she said, “we were often in one another’s company, and it was happy for us; for if the world had been searched from the rising of the sun to sunset, the like would never have been found in one place, of the Black Sainglain and the Grey of Macha, and Laeg the chariot-driver, and myself and Cuchulain. And it is breaking my heart is in my body, to be listening to the pity and the sorrowing of women and men, and the harsh crying of the young men of Ulster keening Cuchulain, and Ulster to be in its weakness, and without strength to revenge itself upon the men of Ireland.”

And after she made that complaint, she brought Cuchulain’s body to Dundéalgan; and they all cried and keened about him until such time as Conall Cearnach came back from making his red rout through the army of the men of Ireland.

For he was not satisfied to make a slaughter of the men of Munster and Connaught, without reddening his hand in the blood of Leinster as well.

And when he had done that, he came to Dundéalgan, and his men along with him, but they made no rejoicing when they went back that time. And he brought the heads of the men of Ireland along with him in a gad, and he laid them out on the green lawn, and the people of the house gave three great shouts when they saw the heads.

And Emer came out, and when she saw Conall Cearnach, she said, “My great esteem and my welcome before you, king of heroes, and may your many wounds not be your death; for you have avenged the treachery done on Ulster, and now what you have to do is to make our grave, and to lay us together in the grave, for I will not live after Cuchulain.

“And tell me, Conall,” she said, “whose are those heads all around on the lawn, and which of the great men of Ireland did they belong to?”

And she was asking, and Conall was answering, and it is what she said, “Tell me, Conall, whose are those heads, for surely you have reddened your arms with them. Tell me the names of the men whose heads are there upon the ground.”

And Conall said, “Daughter of Forgall of the Horses, young Emer of the sweet words, it is in revenge for the Hound of Feats I brought these heads here from the south.”

“Whose is the great black head, with the smooth cheek redder than a rose; it is at the far end, on the left side, the head that has not changed its color?”

"It is the head of the king of Meath, Erc, son of Cairbre of Swift Horses; I brought his head with me from far off, in revenge for my own foster-son."

"Whose is that head there before me, with soft hair, with smooth eyebrows, its eyes like ice, its teeth like blossoms; that head is more beautiful in shape than the others?"

"A son of Maeve; a destroyer of harbors, yellow-haired Maine, man of horses; I left his body without a head; all his people fell by my hand."

"O great Conall, who did not fail us, whose head is this you hold in your hand? Since the Hound of Feats is not living, what do you bring in satisfaction for his head?"

"The head of the son of Fergus of the Horses, a destroyer in every battle-field, my sister's son of the narrow tower; I have struck his head from his body."

"Whose is that head to the west, with fair hair, the head that is spoiled with grief? I used to know his voice; I was for a while his friend."

"That is he that struck down the Hound, Lugaid, son of Curoi of the Rhymes. His body was laid out straight and fair, I struck his head off afterwards."

"Whose are those two heads farther out, great Conall of good judgment? For the sake of your friendship, do not hide the names of the men put down by your arms."

"The heads of Laigaire and Clar Cuilt, two men that fell by my wounds. It was they wounded faithful Cuchulain; I made my weapons red in their blood."

"Whose are those heads farther to the east, great Conall of bright deeds? The hair of the two is of the one color; their cheeks are redder than a calf's blood."

"Brave Cullain and hardy Cunlaid, two that were used to overcome in their anger. There to the east, Emer, are their heads; I left their bodies in a red pool."

"Whose are those three heads with evil looks I see before me to the north? Their faces blue, their hair black; even hard Conall's eye turns from them."

"Three of the enemies of the Hound, daughters of Calatin, wise in enchantments; they are the three witches killed by me, their weapons in their hands."

"O great Conall, father of kings, whose is that head that would overcome in the battle? His bushy hair is gold-yellow; his headdress is smooth and white like silver."

"It is the head of the son of Red-Haired Ross, son of Necht Min, that died by my strength. This, Emer, is his head; the high king of Leinster of Speckled Swords."

"O great Conall, change the story. How many of the men that harmed him fell by your hand that does not fail, in satisfaction for the head of Cuchulain?"

"It is what I say, ten and seven scores of hundreds is the number that fell, back to back, by the anger of my hard sword and of my people."

"O Conall, what way are they, the women of Ireland, after the Hound? Are they mourning the son of Sualtim? Are they showing respect through their grief?"

"O Emer, what shall I do without my Cuchulain, my fine nursling, going in and out from me, tonight?"

“O Conall, lift me to the grave. Raise my stone over the grave of the Hound; since it is through grief for him I go to death, lay my mouth to the mouth of Cuchulain.

“I am Emer of the Fair Form; there is no more vengeance for me to find; I have no love for any man. It is sorrowful my stay is after the Hound.”

And after that Emer bade Conall to make a wide, very deep grave for Cuchulain; and she laid herself down beside her gentle comrade, and she put her mouth to his mouth, and she said, “Love of my life, my friend, my sweetheart, my one choice of the men of the earth, many is the woman, wed or unwed, envied me till today: and now I will not stay living after you.”

And her life went out from her, and she herself and Cuchulain were laid in the one grave by Conall. And he raised the one stone over them, and he wrote their names in Ogham, and he himself and all the men of Ulster keened them.

But the three times fifty queens that loved Cuchulain saw him appear in his Druid chariot, going through Emain Macha; and they could hear him singing the music of the Sidhe [fairies].

THREE MEN OF GALWAY

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Michaelis, Kate Woodbridge. “An Irish Folk-Tale.” Journal of American Folklore 23 (1910): 425–428.

Date: 1910

Original Source: Ireland

National Origin: Ireland

---

In a narrative built on motifs commonly found in both “The Robber Brothers” (AT 1525R) and “The Rich and the Poor Peasant” (AT 1535), a trickster gets the better of two older and exploitive cousins; variants of the same tales usually pit brothers against one another. The concluding sentence of the tale may be intended as social commentary on America and the waves of immigrants who left Ireland during this period.

---

Over beyant [beyond], on the road to Galway, there were three cabins that stood side by side, each the same as all the rest; and in them lived three cousins, with their three mothers and their three cows. Times was hard then in Ireland, and has been since, and the cousins had to work hard to put bread in their stomachs and breath in their bodies; so one day the eldest cousin says to the others, “Let us drive our cows to market and sell them for a good price, and be rich then!” and the others agreed.

Now, it chanced that the youngest cousin's cow was very lean entirely, the smallest and poorest of all the cows in the land; and as the three walked together, the other two said teasing words to him, because it was little his cow would bring in the market.

At last the youngest cousin got vexed indeed, and says he to his cousins, "Go you to the market with your large and fine cows, me and my cow will bide here. I will kill her and sell the hide and tallow." So he bided, and the others went on. Well, after he was tired of being vexed, he up and killed his little cow, and began to strip the hide off her carcass. While he worked, and mind you, it was not the nicest of work, who should come hopping along but a big magpie, head on one side, looking wise indeed.

"Peck-peck!" says he, like any human, for he caught a smell of the blood; so up he hopped on the hide to see what it was all about; and immediate the youngest cousin whipped over the hide, master Magpie inside, and started for the nearest tavern, hide and bird under his arm.

When he got to the tavern, in he marched, bold as you please, calling out for a nip of whiskey to stay his stomach, for it was near to starving the poor boy was. So the barmaid—she was the daughter of the host—she looked him over, and, seeing that he was dressed the poorest and had nought with him but a bundle of bloody hide, just served him with the worst but one of the whiskeys of the world. As soon as the cousin got the taste of it on his tongue, he put his foot on the bundle of hide, and the magpie within screeched out loud.

"And what's that?" says the girl.

"'Tis my magpie, warning me," says the cousin.

"And what is he after warning you?" says the girl.

"He's warning me of the poorness of the whiskey," says he. So the girl, not believing him at all, nodded her head to herself, and put before him the one other whiskey that could be worse. Now, the minute he smelled of it, down came the cousin's foot as hard as might be, and loud screeched out the poor craythur below.

"And this is poorer still, he tells me," says the youngest cousin.

"Faix, and it's right he is," says the girl. So she ran and called her father, who came, all in a hurry, to see the bird that was telling tales on his whiskeys. When he had talked with the cousin, and the bird had cocked the bright eye at it, nothing would suit him but he must own it; so he offered money for it, till at last the youngest cousin went off with his pockets full of gold, and the bird biding behind at the tavern.

When the two older cousins came back from the market, it was long faces they had, for never a one had asked to buy their cows, and they were foot-sore and weary. When they saw the youngest cousin sitting by his door and counting over his gold, they were dumb-struck. When they could get breath to question him, he boasted that he had killed and stripped his cow, rolled a magpie in its hide, and taken it to the public-house, where he had sold it to the landlord for all that gold.

“And is it buying bloody magpies he is?” asked the cousins.

“Faix, and it is,” says he.

As soon as morning comes, up gets the two cousins, kills their fine fat cows, strips them, catches two magpies, wraps them in the skins, and hurries off with them to the nearest inn. Then, of course, the landlord just laughs in their faces, and when they talk back, drives them out with hard words. Home they came, pocket-empty, and vexed indeed with the youngest cousin. Now, it chanced that he, hiding safe from them, heard the threats they made. So when the night came, he coaxed his old mother to sleep in his bed, and himself got well into the chimney. In came the two cousins, creeping easy, fell upon the poor mother, who was the aunt of the two of them, heaven rest her soul! and left her cold and dead. Up came the youngest cousin out of the chimney, fixed up his mother in her best clothes all fine, and carried her on his back to the house of a farmer who had the best well in all the country round. As it was early, he propped his old mother against the well, her back to the house, and when it was light, went to the door and asked to buy wine for himself and for her.

“It’s bashful she is,” says he to the daughter of the farmer, “and never a step will she come into the house. Go you out with the wine and give it to her. It’s hard of hearing she is,” says he, “so you must pinch her and shake her well if she does not turn round.”

Out went the girl with the wine, called loud, bellowed, then, at the last, up and shook her good, when into the well, head and heels, went she. At that the girl she ran away screaming out; and when she did not come back, the youngest cousin went out and found his mother deep in the well. And the storming of the man! Crying out and stomping his feet, and saying that it was all the mother he had in the world! At this came out the farmer and gave him all the gold he had in the house to stop his noise, lest the people going by should hear it. And the farmer took the old woman out of the well that very day, for fear she should spoil the water; for it was a very good well, that was.

When the two cousins got up next morning, who should they see but the youngest cousin with a great bag of gold.

“And how come you alive?” said they, well vexed.

“Faix,” says he, “it was my mother you killed, and I’ve been to the village beyant and sold her for all this gold. It’s a great price they are paying for old hags for gunpowder,” says he.

So the two of them lost no time in killing their mothers, put them in bags, and hurried off to the village, calling out, loud, “Old hags for gunpowder! Old hags for gunpowder!” and then the people were quite mad with them. They fell upon them and beat them, and shut them up in the jail, for killing of their mothers, nice tidy old dames that they were!

Well, after they got out again, they came home; and there they found the youngest cousin living on the best to be had, and they didn’t like it at all, at all. It was a great deal they said to him about the lot of trouble he had given them; and they were so vexed at him, that he saw he had best beware. So he kept far away from them. But one day he was searching after rabbits, which he well liked for his supper, and had just caught two, when he saw the two cousins after him; and before he could hide from them, they were upon him, had him tied, and in a bag, ready to put an end to him. But just as they were tying the bag, he managed slyly to break the foot of each rabbit he had caught, one the left, and the other the right, and let them go free; and off they scudded, one to the right and the other to the left. Now, the two cousins also liked well, rabbits for supper; and, having the youngest cousin fast tied, they left him there in the bag, and off they ran, chasing the rabbits.

Now, it chanced well for the youngest cousin that while they were pursuing of the woods in search of the rabbits, along came a jobber, driving a herd of cattle to the fair; and he heard the youngest cousin in the bag singing out gay that he was going to heaven, for he had heard the jobber going by. The jobber, he was having a hard time, poor man, and he had heard that heaven was a fine place.

“And how do you get there?” says he to the cousin in the bag.

“Get you into this bag, and I will show you,” says the youngest cousin. So the jobber cut the strings of the bag, and out leapt the cousin and put the jobber in the bag in his place, tied fast the strings, and bid him wait for the angels to carry him straight to heaven. Then home went the youngest cousin by the shortest road, driving of the herd of cattle before him.

After a bit, came back the two cousins, with no rabbits and bad in their tempers, picked up the bag, and threw it, man and all, into a hole without a bottom, and went home. And, behold! when they turned the corner, there was the youngest cousin, large as life, and a great deal more natural, smoking his pipe after the milking of his new cows. And beside his stool was the bag of gold the jobber had left behind him on the ground.

“And is it out of the hole you are?” says they, hardly trusting to their eyesight.

“It is, indeed,” says he, “and it’s much obliged to you I am for putting me in. Mind that gold now!”

“And where did you get it?” said they.

“In the bottom of the hole,” says he, “and it’s many a bag I had to leave behind me when I climbed out. There was but two I had time for; and one I gave to a jobber passing by, for a fine herd of cattle that was just after eating its supper in the field beyant.”

Then the two cousins, they just fell on his neck, and they said they would forgive him everything, and never kill him again, if he would but tell them how to get to that hole, for the way had gone clean out of their minds.

So off the three went, side by side, as pleasant as you please; and when they came to the hole, “One at a time!” says the youngest cousin; so he tied the eldest cousin well into a bag, and pitched him into the hole. But when he could find no bottom to it, he began to cry out and to curse.

“Faix, and what may that noise be?” says the middle cousin.

“It’s our cousin crying out for joy at the bags of gold,” says the youngest cousin; then the middle cousin ran quick to the bag and got in without help, he was so feared that the eldest cousin would get the biggest share of the gold. Then the youngest cousin tied him up well and pitched him down into the well. And there the two of them are to this very day.

But the youngest cousin took his pick of the three cabins, and he married a fine wife and had plenty of children, and money to spare for every one of them; and when he died, he left a cabin apiece to three of them, but the rest of his family went over to America, and very likely they are dead by now.

SCOTLAND

---

THE BAKER OF BEAULY

Tradition Bearer: Dr. Corbet

Source: MacBain, Alexander, and W. A. Clouston. "The Baker of Beauly': A Highland Version of the Tale of 'The Three Precepts.'" Folklore 3 (1892): 183–192.

Date: 1887

Original Source: Scotland

National Origin: Scotland

---

The following variant of "The Three Precepts" (AT 150 as "Advice of the Fox") stresses the value of good counsel over money. By choosing wisdom over wages, the protagonist acquires both. Currently, Scotland (along with England, Northern Ireland, and Wales) is one of the four constituent countries of the United Kingdom. Lying immediately to the north of England on the island of Great Britain, political conflicts with that nation marked long periods of Scottish history. The Battle of Culloden (1746) was the final clash between the Jacobites who supported the claims of Charles Edward Stuart to the British throne and the British troops of King George II. The battle resulted in a decisive defeat of the Jacobites, and, since the majority of Prince Charles' forces were Highland Scots, a brutal suppression of that culture.

---

At the time of the Battle of Culloden there lived in Beauly a widow who had an only son, whose name was Donald Fraser. He went along with the rest of the Clan Fraser to the battle. The rebels were defeated, and Donald fled to Beauly as fast as his legs could carry him. His poor mother was glad to see him back again unslain, unslain, sound and healthy, poor, hungry, and tired as he was. He, however, knew that his life would be endangered if he stayed in his mother's bothy [simple shelter] for one night, as the red-coats were in pursuit of those that helped the Prince, though it was by the press-gang the most of the Frasers were compelled to join Lord Lovat, who was afterwards beheaded. He was thus a wanderer for three years, taking shelter in the hills, hollows, rocks, woods, and caves that lie between the Bannock Loch and Birds' Loch in the heights of Beaully. On a certain day at the end of three years, he says to his mother, "Woman, I feel tired of my life; we are now reduced to poverty, and destitute of both meat and clothes. I will go and try if I can get work, come what may."

"You will not go," says she, "till first you get your mother's bannock [griddle baked cake made of oatmeal] and blessing."

She made a Beltane bannock ready for him in the morning, and thus with the bannock and his mother's blessing he set out for Inverness. There he got no work to do. From Inverness he proceeded to Nairn, where he got work. He took up his lodgings in the house of an old man who had an only daughter. By-and-by Donald began to court the girl and married her. On the night of the wedding whatever came into Donald's head, he got up, put on his clothes, went away and left her there. On he traveled till he arrived at Keith, where he tried to get work, but failed. Thence he proceeded to Huntly, but could find no work there. At last he was on the verge of starvation, for bread or drink he had not tasted since he had left Nairn. There was no alternative for him but to go and beg. He went into a baker's shop and said, "In the name of God, give me something to eat, for I am dying of hunger."

"Bread or drink you will not get from me, you nasty beast," says the baker. "If I were giving to every one of your class that comes the way, I would not have much left to myself."

"Oh," says poor Donald, "don't allow me to die of hunger; give me food, and I will do anything you ask me."

"What could you do?" says the baker.

"I can work," says Donald.

"But," says the baker, "I don't want a workman just now, and I am sure you cannot bake."

"But could I not learn?" says Donald.

"Undoubtedly you could learn," says the baker, "but it would take you seven years to do so."

"Give me food," says Donald, "and tomorrow morning I'm your man."

He served the baker for seven years, and at the end of the seven years, says the baker to Donald, "I am well pleased with you. You served your time honestly, and today I do not know where there is a better tradesman than you. I do not know how I will get on without you, but if you will stay with me for another seven years, I will give you this (mentioning the wages) for the past seven years and the seven to come."

“Tomorrow morning,” says Donald, “I’m your man.”

He served the baker for the second seven years, and at the end of the seven years the same agreement was made between them as at the end of the first seven years, with this difference, however, that at the end of the seven years Donald was to receive double the wages he had got for the fourteen years he had already served. They agreed as usual, and honest Donald served the baker for twenty-one years. At the expiry of the twenty-one years, the baker says to Donald, “You are now at the end of three seven years, and if you will serve me for another period of seven years, I will give you as much pay for the seven as you have to get for the twenty-one that are past.”

“No, I will not stay for one year more,” says Donald. “I will go home and see my wife.”

“Your wife,” says the baker; “have you a wife? You’re a strange man; you have been here for twenty-one years, and no one ever heard you say you had a wife. But now,” says the baker, “which would you rather: your three wages or three advices?”

“Oh,” says Donald, “I cannot answer that question till I get the advice of a wiser man than myself; but I will tell you in the morning.”

Donald came down early in the morning as he had promised.

“What now?” asked the baker. “Which are you going to take—the three wages or the three advices?”

“The three advices,” says Donald.

“Well, the first advice is,” says the baker. “Keep the proper roundabout road; the second advice is: Do not stay in a house where there is a young, beautiful wife, with an old surly husband; and the third advice is: Think thrice before you ever lift your hand to strike anyone. And here is money for you to take you home, and also three loaves of bread; but remember that you will neither look at them nor take them asunder till you do so at your wife’s knee, so that they may be the means of making peace between you, for you are so long away from her that it is hard to say whether she is alive or dead, or how will she welcome you.”

Donald at once set off for Nairn. His intention was to stay the first night at Keith, and next night he would be at home. On the road between Huntly and Keith he overtook a peddler, who greeted him kindly, and asked him where he was going. Donald told him he was going to Keith. The peddler said he was very glad, as he was going there too; and the conversation they would have on the road would make them feel the journey shorter.

Thus they went along till they came to a wood, when the peddler said, “There is a short cut through this wood which will shorten our journey to Keith by three miles, besides taking the road.”

“Take it, then,” says Donald. “Dear have I paid for the advice. I’ll take the road.”

The peddler took the short cut through the wood, but did not proceed far when Donald heard cries of “Murder! Murder!”

Off he set through the wood to help the peddler, who was after being robbed by two robbers.

“You now see the force of my advice,” Donald says. “You are robbed, and you may be thankful you were not murdered, let alone the time we have lost. We will not reach Keith tonight.”

They came to a farmer’s house at the roadside, and as it was late, and they were still a good way from Keith, they went in and asked if they could get lodgings for the night. This they got from the inmates, who were sitting round a good fire, in a frank and pleasant manner. They also got a good warming and plenty to eat.

Donald saw the farmer’s wife, a young and charming woman. An old, grey, blear-eyed, unkempt man came in after her. But when he had come in, Donald says to the peddler, “I will not stay here any longer. Dear have I paid for the advice.”

“Surely you are not going to take the road at this time of night,” says the peddler; “and if you won’t stay in the house, you can sleep in the barn.”

Donald agreed to this proposal, and he went to sleep in the barn with his clothes on. He had a wisp of straw for a pillow, a wisp of straw for a bolster, a wisp of straw on both sides of him, and a wisp above him. He was so buried in straw that he had barely room to breathe.

He had scarcely slept, when two persons came in, and sat on the straw right on the top of him. Uncomfortable as he was, he dared not complain or open his mouth, but with a scissors he had in his pocket he cut off a small piece of the coat of the man that was sitting near his head, which was going into his mouth and eyes, and he put the piece he had cut off into his waistcoat-pocket. The man and woman, for such they happened to be, now began courting at the hardest. At last the woman said, “What a pity that old and nasty bodach (earl) wasn’t dead. If you would place the razor on his neck, I would send it through his throat myself.”

This was what happened. When Donald came out of the barn in the morning, the poor peddler was in the hands of the officers of the law. He was handcuffed, and was being taken away to Aberdeen on the charge of having murdered the farmer. In the morning the farmer was found dead with his throat cut.

Donald followed them to Aberdeen; the peddler was taken before the Lords; he was condemned, and the judge put on the black cap to pronounce the sentence of death. At this moment Donald gets up in court, and says, “My Lord, if you please, can a man that has not been summoned to court as a witness speak?”

“What have you to say?” asked his Lordship.

Donald then related the circumstances of the barn, and requested that the young widow’s sweetheart be brought into court in the clothes he wore on the night of the murder, and that he (Donald) could give proof that the young man was guilty and the peddler innocent.

The young man was taken into court, and when he was placed at the bar, Donald asked if there was a tailor in the court-house.

“Yes,” says a man, rising opposite him.

“Try,” says Donald to the tailor, “if there is a piece cut off from the skirt of his coat.”

“Yes,” says the tailor.

Thereupon Donald produced from his waistcoat-pocket the piece he had cut off from the man’s coat, and giving it to the tailor, asked him if it suited the piece wanting in the coat.

“Yes,” says the tailor, “it is the very piece that was cut off from the skirt of the coat.”

Donald then related the circumstances of the case a second time. The man and woman were both executed in Aberdeen for this murder, and the peddler was free.

Donald now set out for Nairn to visit his wife, but, before leaving the town, he bought a pistol, powder, and shot. “Who knows,” says he, “what may happen to me before I reach my journey’s end?”

At last the good man arrived at Nairn at night, but well did he find out the house of his loving wife. He opened the door, and upon going in, he at once knew his wife’s voice as she and another man were quarreling. He charged his pistol to shoot the man; but here he remembered his third advice the baker gave him, “Think thrice before you lift your hand to strike any man.”

When the man stopped quarreling, the woman began and said, “You young rascal, I have only yourself, and little pleasure have I ever got from you or your father before you. He left me the night we were married, and it is not known whether he is dead or alive; but he left you behind him to be a burden on me.”

When Donald heard this, he was thankful he did not shoot his son; so he marched in where the pair were, took the loaves of white bread off his back, and broke them on his wife’s knee. Out of the first loaf tumbled the wages of the first seven years; out of the second, the wages of the second seven years, and out of the third the wages of the third seven years. Afterwards they lived together as happy as people could wish for.

THE RED CALF

Tradition Bearer: Mrs. Moir

Source: “Three Folktales from Old Meldrum, Aberdeenshire.” Folk-Lore Journal 2 (1884): 72–74.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Scotland

National Origin: Scotland

---

The following variant of the “Cinderella” plot (AT 510A) adds elements of the closely related tale type “The Little Red Ox” (AT 511A).

Specifically, the heroine's benefactor is a red calf, her abusive family attempts to cause the slaughter of the helpful animal, and the girl escapes with the calf's help. Compare "The Red Calf" to the Italian "Cinderella" (page 270).

---

Once, a long time ago, there was a gentleman had two lassies. The oldest was ugly and ill natured, but the youngest was a bonnie lassie and good; but the ugly one was the favorite with her father and mother. So they ill used the youngest in every way, and they sent her into the woods to herd cattle, and all the food she got was a little porridge and whey.

Well, amongst the cattle was a red calf, and one day it said to the lassie, "Gee [give] that porridge and whey to the doggie, and come wi' me."

So the lassie followed the calf through the wood, and they came to a bonnie hoosie [house], where there was a nice dinner ready for them; and after they had feasted on everything nice they went back to the herding.

Every day the calf took the lassie away, and feasted her on dainties; and every day she grew bonnier. This disappointed the father and mother and the ugly sister. They expected that the rough usage she was getting would take away her beauty; and they watched and watched until they saw the calf take the lassie away to the feast. So they resolved to kill the calf; and not only that, but the lassie was to be compelled to kill him with an axe. Her ugly sister was to hold his head, and the lassie who loved him had to give the blow and kill him.

She could do nothing but greet [weep]; but the calf told her not to greet, but to do as he bade her; and his plan was that instead of coming down on his head she was to come down on the lassie's head who was holding him, and then she was to jump on his back and they would run off. Well, the day came for the calf to be killed, and everything was ready—the ugly lassie holding his head, and the bonnie lassie armed with the axe. So she raised the axe, and came down on the ugly sister's head; and in the confusion that took place she got on the calf's back and they ran away.

And they ran and better nor ran till they came to a meadow where grew a great lot of rashes [rushes]; and, as the lassie had not on many clothes, they pu'ed rashes, and made a coatie for her. And they set off again and traveled, and traveled, till they came to the king's house. They went in, and asked if they wanted a servant. The mistress said she wanted a kitchen lassie, and she would take Rashin-Coatie.

So Rashin-Coatie said she would stop, if they keepit the calf too. They were willing to do that. So the lassie and the calf stoppit in the king's house, and everybody was well pleased with her; and when Yule came, they said she was to stop at home and make the dinner, while all the rest went to the kirk [church]. After they were away the calf asked if she would like to go. She said she would, but she had no clothes, and she could not leave the dinner. The calf said he would give her clothes, and make the dinner too. He went out, and came back with a grand dress, all silk and satin, and such a nice pair of slippers. The lassie put on the dress, and before she left she said:

Ilka peat gar anither burn,
An' ilka spit gar anither turn,
An' ilka pot gar anither play,
Till I come frae the kirk on gude Yule day.

So she went to the kirk, and nobody kent [knew] it was Rashin-Coatie. They wondered who the bonnie lady could be; and, as soon as the young prince saw her, he fell in love with her, and resolved he would find out who she was, before she got home; but Rashin-Coatie left before the rest, so that she might get home in time to take off her dress, and look after the dinner. When the prince saw her leaving, he made for the door to stop her; but she jumped past him, and in the hurry lost one of her shoes. The prince kept the shoe, and Rashin-Coatie got home all right, and the folk said the dinner was very nice.

Now the prince was resolved to find out who the bonnie lady was, and he sent a servant through all the land with the shoe. Every lady was to try it on, and the prince promised to marry the one it would fit. That servant went to a great many houses, but could not find a lady that the shoe would go on, it was so little and neat.

At last he came to a henwife's house, and her daughter had little feet. At first the shoe would not go on, but she paret [pared] her feet, and clippit [clipped] her toes, until the shoes went on. Now the prince was very angry. He knew it was not the lady that he wanted; but, because he had promised to marry whoever the shoe fitted, he had to keep his promise.

The marriage day came, and, as they were all riding to the kirk, a little bird flew through the air, and it sang:

Clippit feet an' paret taes is on the saidle set;
But bonnie feet an' braw feet sits in the kitchen neuk.

"What's that ye say?" said the prince.

"Oh," says the henwife, "would ye mind what a feel bird says?"

But the prince said, "Sing that again, bonnie birdie."

So the bird sings:

Clippit feet an' paret taes is on the saidle set;
But bonnie feet an' braw feet sits in the kitchen neuk.

The prince turned his horse and rode home, and went straight to his father's kitchen, and there sat Rashin-Coatie. He kent her at once, she was so bonnie; and when she tried on the shoe it fitted her, and so the prince married Rashin-Coatie, and they lived happy, and built a house for the red calf, who had been so kind to her.

WALES

---

THE LEGEND OF SAVADDAN LAKE

Tradition Bearer: Isaac C. Hughes

Source: “The Legend of Savaddan Lake.” Folklore 19 (1908): 459–463.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Wales

National Origin: Wales

---

Wales, one the four constituent countries of the United Kingdom, occupies the southwest portion of the island of Great Britain. The following Welsh legend accounts both for the origin of Savaddan Lake and for the “Church of St. Gastayn.” An important theme of the narrative is the inevitable and all-encompassing destruction that is wrought by impiety. Extraordinary acts of devotion are required to atone for such transgressions.

---

Not far from the foot of the Black Mountains of Brecon, in a low lovely fertile valley, under the shadow of Mount Troedd, lies Savaddan Lake (the Llangorse Lake of our maps). The following tradition is told regarding it.

Many years ago, when all the surrounding country was under Prince Tewdryg, the bed of the lake was occupied by Savaddan, a town identified with the Roman Loventium. It was, at the time of our story, ruled by a maiden, the beautiful and high-spirited Gwenonwy, who was under Tewdryg’s suzerainty. From far and wide came suitors for her hand and throne, but none found such favor as the noble Gruffydd, youngest son of a neighboring prince named Meigyr. He was all that her heart could desire, yet the maiden Princess dared not wed him, for her father on his deathbed had demanded, and received her promise, never to become the bride of one who was not her equal both in birth and fortune.

She was a rich and powerful Princess, while he, though of good birth, was poor. After long delays Gruffydd determined to bring matters to a crisis, and went one night to the Princess's bower and urged her to forget her oath and wed him, regardless of her promise.

"Never," replied the Princess, "shall it be said that the daughter of the noble Ieuan broke her word. I love you, Gruffydd; but my honor is dearer to me than even your love. You, too, are a Prince, and of a noble family. Use your good arm and sword as your fathers have done, and gain wealth as they did, and come to me a year hence my equal as well in fortune as in rank. For a year and a day I will wait and pray for you; return to me within that time a bridegroom worthy of Gwenonwy's hand, or return no more."

The Prince then left Savaddan and his love, and went to the court of Tewdryg, and for ten months fought under his banner against Madoc, the rebel lord of Skenpeth, gaining much honor but little wealth. At last the war ended, and Gruffydd resolved to make a final appeal to the love of Gwenonwy. Leaving Tewdryg's capital, he arrived on the third day of his journey at Bryn-yr-Allt, a monastery on the mountain side overlooking Savaddan. Here he asked and obtained shelter for the night. He had not slept long when he was awakened by the sound of voices in the refectory, which was separated from his room only by a thin wooden partition.

He overheard a conversation between Owen the Sub-Prior and another monk, Father Aeddan, from which he learnt that the Prior was expected to return next day, bringing with him mules laden with precious stones and jeweled robes, bequeathed to the monastery by Howell, Prince of Cwmdru, whom he had attended on his deathbed. Gruffydd determined, on hearing this, to waylay and rob the Prior. He went to a spring, named Codvan's Well, by which the Prior must pass, attacked him and left him for dead, and carried off his mules with their loads to Savaddan.

He told Gwenonwy his story, and was received by her with favor. Meanwhile the monks who had gone out to meet the Prior found him lying insensible, but he recovered sufficiently to tell them who the murderer was before he died. That night an order arrived from Princess Gwenonwy that a monk from the monastery should attend that night at the Palace to unite her to Gruffydd, Prince of Bronllys. In the evening a vast assembly thronged the royal chapel to witness the marriage.

Father Owen performed the ceremony, and as the young pair knelt before him for the final benediction, the priest stepped forward, and in a loud authoritative tone exclaimed, "Rise, Gruffydd of Bronllys, thou murderer; and thou, too, lady accomplice in his crime, inasmuch as thou hast not avenged it. Wedded, yet unblest, hear God's decree. Thou, Prince, hast shed sacred blood, and thou, Princess, rejoicest in the unholy deed. Therefore God shall visit you with a great and terrible punishment. In His mercy He will bear with you for a time, but in the fourth generation the blow will fall not only on yourselves, but on all your unblest seed. It shall be; God hath spoken it."

Without the blessing of the Church upon her union, the kneeling Princess rose in a rage, and, turning to her guards, she said, "This presumptuous man has dared to offer an insult to a Princess of Savaddan within her own palace walls. Hence with him to the guard tower. Let him there await the fulfillment of his prophecy. Should he still live at the fourth generation, and his words prove vain, he shall die. It shall be; I have spoken it."

Many long and weary years the good father spent in a lonely cell at Savaddan, while the town and Court were given up to debauchery and vice.

Meanwhile Gruffydd and Gwenonwy, now growing old, saw springing up around them a goodly family of children and grandchildren. Soon Myvig, their eldest grandson, married, and in due course a child was born. This was the long-dreaded advent of the fourth generation; still there was no evidence of the predicted punishment.

On the fortieth day from the birth of Myvig's son, the Princess, persuading herself that Owen's curse was merely an idle threat, summoned all her family and friends to a great banquet in honor of the young prince's birth. On the appointed day the great hall of the palace was full. The feast was at its height, and wine was flowing freely, when four guards entered, leading the venerable Sub-Prior.

The Prince taunted him with the non-fulfillment of his prophecy, but he only repeated that vengeance was at hand unless the guilty ones repented. The Prince ordered that he be shut up in the topmost room of the watch-tower, which should then be burnt to the ground. And this was done.

Father Aeddán, now Prior, heard of what had happened, and from the monastery above watched the town and flames of the burning tower shoot up towards the sky. After the tower had fallen, a mist came down upon the valley and hid the town. While the Prior prayed the mist gradually rose, and the valley was seen entirely filled with a vast lake. No trace of the lost town ever appeared save a cradle containing a sleeping child, the infant son of Myvig, the last of the princes of Savaddan.

Lifting the child from its cradle, Father Aeddán bore it to the monastery. Naming it Gastayn, he taught it all that the good monks could teach. Gastayn afterwards expressed a desire to embrace the ascetic life, and built a hut on the lake's edge in a sheltered spot. There he spent a life of great piety and rigor, in continual prayer for the souls of his wicked progenitors. His holiness and learning was so famed that one of the royal princes of South Wales entrusted his sons to Gastayn's care. Following in the footsteps of their pious tutor, they became renowned for the purity and sanctity of their lives, some of them, indeed, even obtaining the glorious crown of martyrdom. Gastayn, at his death, was buried in his hermitage, where in after years a church was built which to this day bears the name of the "Church of St. Gastayn."

Such is the legend told by the country folk in the neighborhood, who still gravely tell you that on a calm summer's day it is possible to see the church tower through the waters of the lake, and even to hear the bells ring!

Central Europe

GERMANY

---

HANSEL AND GRETTEL

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Lang, Andrew. The Blue Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1889, 251–258.

Date: ca. 1812–1814

Original Source: Grimm, Jacob and Wilhelm. Kinder- und Hausmärchen (Children's and Household Tales).

National Origin: Germany

---

Germany's location in west central Europe and on the Baltic and North Seas made for a rich repertoire of folktales. The scholarship of the Brothers Grimm, Jacob (1785–1863) and Wilhelm (1786–1859), rather than the geographic location of their homeland, led to certain tales as becoming virtual archetypes of their types. “Hansel and Grettel” (AT 327A, Grimm Tale 15) is one such tale. Variants of the narrative are distributed cross-culturally; this version illustrates well the contrasts and parallelism that is typical of the ordinary folktale (or märchen). The innocent children are contrasted to the cruel and cynical stepmother and witch (who may, in fact, be one in the same). Birds lead them into disaster, but a bird also saves them. Many other examples of this pattern become apparent on reading the tale.

---

Once upon a time there dwelt on the outskirts of a large forest a poor woodcutter with his wife and two children; the boy was called Hansel and the girl Grettel. He had always little enough to live on, and once, when there was a great famine in the land, he couldn't even provide them with daily bread. One night, as he was tossing about in bed, full of cares and worry, he sighed and said to his wife, "What's to become of us? how are we to support our poor children, now that we have nothing more for ourselves?"

"I'll tell you what, husband," answered the woman; "early tomorrow morning we'll take the children out into the thickest part of the wood; there we shall light a fire for them and give them each a piece of bread; then we'll go on to our work and leave them alone. They won't be able to find their way home, and we shall thus be rid of them."

"No, wife," said her husband, "that I won't do; how could I find it in my heart to leave my children alone in the wood? The wild beasts would soon come and tear them to pieces."

"Oh! you fool," said she, "then we must all four die of hunger, and you may just as well go and plane the boards for our coffins"; and she left him no peace till he consented.

"But I can't help feeling sorry for the poor children," added the husband.

The children, too, had not been able to sleep for hunger, and had heard what their stepmother had said to their father. Grettel wept bitterly and spoke to Hansel, "Now it's all up with us."

"No, no, Grettel," said Hansel, "don't fret yourself; I'll be able to find a way to escape, no fear." And when the old people had fallen asleep he got up, slipped on his little coat, opened the back door and stole out. The moon was shining clearly, and the white pebbles which lay in front of the house glittered like bits of silver. Hansel bent down and filled his pocket with as many of them as he could cram in. Then he went back and said to Grettel, "Be comforted, my dear little sister, and go to sleep: God will not desert us"; and he lay down in bed again.

At daybreak, even before the sun was up, the woman came and woke the two children, "Get up, you lie-abeds, we're all going to the forest to fetch wood." She gave them each a bit of bread and said, "There's something for your luncheon, but don't you eat it up before, for it's all you'll get." Grettel took the bread under her apron, as Hansel had the stones in his pocket. Then they all set out together on the way to the forest. After they had walked for a little, Hansel stood still and looked back at the house, and this maneuver he repeated again and again.

His father observed him, and said, "Hansel, what are you gazing at there, and why do you always remain behind? Take care, and don't lose your footing."

"Oh! father," said Hansel, "I am looking back at my white kitten, which is sitting on the roof, waving me a farewell."

The woman exclaimed, "What a donkey you are! That isn't your kitten, that's the morning sun shining on the chimney." But Hansel had not looked back at his kitten, but had always dropped one of the white pebbles out of his pocket on to the path.

When they had reached the middle of the forest the father said, "Now, children, go and fetch a lot of wood, and I'll light a fire that you may not feel cold."

Hansel and Grettel heaped up brushwood till they had made a pile nearly the size of a small hill.

The brushwood was set fire to, and when the flames leaped high the woman said, “Now lie down at the fire, children, and rest yourselves: we are going into the forest to cut down wood; when we’ve finished we’ll come back and fetch you.”

Hansel and Grettel sat down beside the fire, and at midday ate their little bits of bread. They heard the strokes of the axe, so they thought their father was quite near. But it was no axe they heard, but a bough he had tied on a dead tree, and that was blown about by the wind. And when they had sat for a long time their eyes closed with fatigue, and they fell fast asleep.

When they awoke at last it was pitch dark. Grettel began to cry, and said, “How are we ever to get out of the wood?”

But Hansel comforted her. “Wait a bit,” he said, “till the moon is up, and then we’ll find our way sure enough.” And when the full moon had risen he took his sister by the hand and followed the pebbles, which shone like new three penny bits, and showed them the path. They walked on through the night, and at daybreak reached their father’s house again.

They knocked at the door, and when the woman opened it she exclaimed, “You naughty children, what a time you’ve slept in the wood! We thought you were never going to come back.” But the father rejoiced, for his conscience had reproached him for leaving his children behind by themselves.

Not long afterward there was again great dearth in the land, and the children heard their mother address their father thus in bed one night, “Everything is eaten up once more; we have only half a loaf in the house, and when that’s done it’s all up with us. The children must be got rid of; we’ll lead them deeper into the wood this time, so that they won’t be able to find their way out again. There is no other way of saving ourselves.”

The man’s heart smote him heavily, and he thought, “Surely it would be better to share the last bite with one’s children!” But his wife wouldn’t listen to his arguments, and did nothing but scold and reproach him. If a man yields once he’s done for, and so, because he had given in the first time, he was forced to do so the second.

But the children were awake, and had heard the conversation. When the old people were asleep Hansel got up, and wanted to go out and pick up pebbles again, as he had done the first time; but the woman had barred the door, and Hansel couldn’t get out. But he consoled his little sister, and said, “Don’t cry, Grettel, and sleep peacefully, for God is sure to help us.”

At early dawn the woman came and made the children get up. They received their bit of bread, but it was even smaller than the time before. On the way to the wood Hansel crumbled it in his pocket, and every few minutes he stood still and dropped a crumb on the ground. “Hansel, what are you stopping and looking about you for?” said the father. “I’m looking back at my little pigeon, which is sitting on the roof waving me a farewell,” answered Hansel.

“Fool!” said the wife; “that isn’t your pigeon, it’s the morning sun glittering on the chimney.” But Hansel gradually threw all his crumbs on the path. The woman led the children still deeper into the forest farther than they had ever been in their lives before. Then a big fire was lit again, and the mother said, “Just sit down there, children, and if you’re tired you can sleep a bit; we’re going into the forest to cut down wood, and in the evening when we’re finished we’ll come back to fetch you.”

At midday Grettel divided her bread with Hansel, for he had strewn his all along their path. Then they fell asleep, and evening passed away, but nobody came to the poor children. They didn’t awake till it was pitch dark, and Hansel comforted his sister, saying, “Only wait, Grettel, till the moon rises, then we shall see the bread-crumbs I scattered along the path; they will show us the way back to the house.” When the moon appeared they got up, but they found no crumbs, for the thousands of birds that fly about the woods and fields had picked them all up.

“Never mind,” said Hansel to Grettel; “you’ll see we’ll find a way out”; but all the same they did not. They wandered about the whole night, and the next day, from morning till evening, but they could not find a path out of the wood. They were very hungry, too, for they had nothing to eat but a few berries they found growing on the ground. And at last they were so tired that their legs refused to carry them any longer, so they lay down under a tree and fell fast asleep.

On the third morning after they had left their father’s house they set about their wandering again, but only got deeper and deeper into the wood, and now they felt that if help did not come to them soon they must perish. At midday they saw a beautiful little snow-white bird sitting on a branch, which sang so sweetly that they stopped still and listened to it. And when its song was finished it flapped its wings and flew on in front of them. They followed it and came to a little house, on the roof of which it perched; and when they came quite near they saw that the cottage was made of bread and roofed with cakes, while the window was made of transparent sugar.

“Now we’ll set to,” said Hansel, “and have a regular blow-out. I’ll eat a bit of the roof, and you, Grettel, can eat some of the window, which you’ll find a sweet morsel.” Hansel stretched up his hand and broke off a little bit of the roof to see what it was like, and Grettel went to the casement and began to nibble at it.

Thereupon a shrill voice called out from the room inside, “Nibble, nibble, little mouse, Who’s nibbling my house?”

The children answered, “Tis Heaven’s own child, The tempest wild,” and went on eating, without putting themselves about. Hansel, who thoroughly appreciated the roof, tore down a big bit of it, while Grettel pushed out a whole round window-pane, and sat down the better to enjoy it.

Suddenly the door opened, and an ancient dame leaning on a staff hobbled out. Hansel and Grettel were so terrified that they let what they had in their hands fall. But the old woman shook her head and said, “Oh, ho! you dear children, who led you here? Just come in and stay with me, no ill shall befall you.”

She took them both by the hand and let them into the house, and laid a most sumptuous dinner before them—milk and sugared pancakes, with apples and nuts. After they had finished, two beautiful little white beds were prepared for them, and when Hansel and Grettel lay down in them they felt as if they had got into heaven.

The old woman had appeared to be most friendly, but she was really an old witch who had waylaid the children, and had only built the little bread house in order to lure them in. When anyone came into her power she killed, cooked, and ate him, and held a regular feast-day for the occasion. Now witches have red eyes, and cannot see far, but, like beasts, they have a keen sense of smell, and know when human beings pass by. When Hansel and Grettel fell into her hands she laughed maliciously, and said jeeringly, “I’ve got them now; they sha’n’t escape me.”

Early in the morning, before the children were awake, she rose up, and when she saw them both sleeping so peacefully, with their round rosy cheeks, she muttered to herself, “That’ll be a dainty bite.” Then she seized Hansel with her bony hand and carried him into a little stable, and barred the door on him; he might scream as much as he liked, it did him no good. Then she went to Grettel, shook her till she awoke, and cried, “Get up, you lazy-bones, fetch water and cook something for your brother. When he’s fat I’ll eat him up.” Grettel began to cry bitterly, but it was of no use; she had to do what the wicked witch bade her.

So the best food was cooked for poor Hansel, but Grettel got nothing but crab-shells. Every morning the old woman hobbled out to the stable and cried, “Hansel, put out your finger, that I may feel if you are getting fat.” But Hansel always stretched out a bone, and the old dame, whose eyes were dim, couldn’t see it, and thinking always it was Hansel’s finger, wondered why he fattened so slowly. When four weeks had passed and Hansel still remained thin, she lost patience and determined to wait no longer. “Hi, Grettel,” she called to the girl, “be quick and get some water. Hansel may be fat or thin, I’m going to kill him tomorrow and cook him.”

Oh! how the poor little sister sobbed as she carried the water, and how the tears rolled down her cheeks! “Kind heaven help us now!” she cried; “if only the wild beasts in the wood had eaten us, then at least we should have died together.”

“Just hold your peace,” said the old hag; “it won’t help you.”

Early in the morning Grettel had to go out and hang up the kettle full of water, and light the fire. “First we’ll bake,” said the old dame; “I’ve heated the oven already and kneaded the dough.” She pushed Grettel out to the oven, from which fiery flames were already issuing. “Creep in,” said the witch, “and see if it’s properly heated, so that we can shove in the bread.” For when she had got Grettel in she meant to close the oven and let the girl bake, that she might eat her up too. But Grettel perceived her intention, and said, “I don’t know how I’m to do it; how do I get in?”

“You silly goose!” said the hag, “the opening is big enough; see, I could get in myself,” and she crawled toward it, and poked her head into the oven. Then Grettel gave her a shove that sent her right in, shut the iron door, and drew the bolt. Gracious! How she yelled, it was quite horrible; but Grettel fled, and the wretched old woman was left to perish miserably.

Grettel flew straight to Hansel, opened the little stable door, and cried, “Hansel, we are free; the old witch is dead.” Then Hansel sprang like a bird out of a cage when the door is opened. How they rejoiced, and fell on each other’s necks, and jumped for joy, and kissed one another! And as they had no longer any cause for fear, they went in the old hag’s house, and here they found, in every corner of the room, boxes with pearls and precious stones.

“These are even better than pebbles,” said Hansel, and crammed his pockets full of them; and Grettel said, “I too will bring something home,” and she filled her apron full.

“But now,” said Hansel, “let’s go and get well away from the witch’s wood.” When they had wandered about for some hours they came to a big lake. “We can’t get over,” said Hansel; “I see no bridge of any sort or kind.”

“Yes, and there’s no ferry-boat either,” answered Grettel; “but look, there swims a white duck; if I ask her she’ll help us over,” and she called out, “Here are two children, mournful very, Seeing neither bridge nor ferry; Take us upon your white back, And row us over, quack, quack!”

The duck swam toward them, and Hansel got on her back and bade his little sister sit beside him. “No,” answered Grettel, “we should be too heavy a load for the duck: she shall carry us across separately.”

The good bird did this, and when they were landed safely on the other side, and had gone for a while, the wood became more and more familiar to them, and at length they saw their father’s house in the distance. Then they set off to run, and bounding into the room fell on their father’s neck. The man had not passed a happy hour since he left them in the wood, but the woman had died. Grettel shook out her apron so that the pearls and precious stones rolled about the room, and Hansel threw down one handful after the other out of his pocket. Thus all their troubles were ended, and they lived happily ever afterward.

My story is done. See! There runs a little mouse; anyone who catches it may make himself a large fur cap out of it.

THE CRYSTAL COFFIN

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Lang, Andrew. The Green Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1892, 290–295.

Date: ca. 1812

Original Source: Grimm, Jacob and Wilhelm. Kinder- und Hausmärchen (Children's and Household Tales).

National Origin: Germany

---

The following narrative is a variant of the ordinary folktale most widely known in English as “Sleeping Beauty” (AT 410). In the following variant, the protagonist is of humble rather than noble birth. His ultimate good fortune is more the work of fate, curiosity, and circumstance than of any conscious quest. The elevation of the tailor in social status as the conclusion of the tale is typical of this genre in European tradition. “The Glass Coffin” is Tale 163 in the Grimm’s corpus.

---

Now let no one say that a poor tailor can’t get on in the world, and, indeed, even attain to very high honor. Nothing is required but to set the right way to work, but of course the really important thing is to succeed.

A very bright active young tailor once set off on his travels, which led him into a wood, and as he did not know the way he soon lost himself. Night came on, and there seemed to be nothing for it but to seek out the best resting-place he could find. He could have made himself quite comfortable with a bed of soft moss, but the fear of wild beasts disturbed his mind, and at last he determined to spend the night in a tree.

He sought out a tall oak tree, climbed up to the top, and felt devoutly thankful that his big smoothing-iron was in his pocket, for the wind in the tree-tops was so high that he might easily have been blown away altogether.

After passing some hours of the night, not without considerable fear and trembling, he noticed a light shining at a little distance, and hoping it might proceed from some house where he could find a better shelter than in the top of the tree, he cautiously descended and went towards the light. It led him to a little hut all woven together of reeds and rushes. He knocked bravely at the door, which opened, and by the light which shone from within he saw an old gray-haired man dressed in a coat made of bright-colored patches. “Who are you, and what do you want?” asked the old man roughly.

“I am a poor tailor,” replied the youth. “I have been benighted in the forest, and I entreat you to let me take shelter in your hut till morning.”

“Go your way,” said the old man in a sulky tone, “I’ll have nothing to do with tramps. You must just go elsewhere.”

With these words he tried to slip back into his house, but the tailor laid hold of his coat-tails, and begged so hard to be allowed to stay that the old fellow, who was by no means as cross as he appeared, was at length touched by his entreaties, let him come in, and after giving him some food, showed him quite a nice bed in one corner of the room. The weary tailor required no rocking to rest, but slept sound till early morning, when he was roused from his slumbers by a tremendous noise. Loud screams and shouts pierced the thin walls of the little hut. The tailor, with new-born courage, sprang up, threw on his clothes with all speed and hurried out. There he saw a huge black bull engaged in a terrible fight with a fine large stag. They rushed at each other with such fury that the ground seemed to tremble under them and the whole air to be filled with their cries. For some time it appeared quite uncertain which would be the victor, but at length the stag drove his antlers with such force into his opponent's body that the bull fell to the ground with a terrific roar, and a few more strokes finished him.

The tailor, who had been watching the fight with amazement, was still standing motionless when the stag bounded up to him, and before he had time to escape forked him up with its great antlers, and set off at full gallop over hedges and ditches, hill and dale, through wood and water. The tailor could do nothing but hold on tight with both hands to the stag's horns and resign himself to his fate. He felt as if he were flying along. At length the stag paused before a steep rock and gently let the tailor down to the ground.

Feeling more dead than alive, he paused for a while to collect his scattered senses, but when he seemed somewhat restored the stag struck such a blow on a door in the rock that it flew open. Flames of fire rushed forth, and such clouds of steam followed that the stag had to avert its eyes. The tailor could not think what to do or which way to turn to get away from this awful wilderness, and to find his way back amongst human beings once more.

As he stood hesitating, a voice from the rock cried to him, "Step in without fear, no harm shall befall you."

He still lingered, but some mysterious power seemed to impel him, and passing through the door he found himself in a spacious hall, whose ceiling, walls, and floor were covered with polished tiles carved all over with unknown figures. He gazed about, full of wonder, and was just preparing to walk out again when the same voice bade him, "Tread on the stone in the middle of the hall, and good luck will attend you."

By this time he had grown so courageous that he did not hesitate to obey the order, and hardly had he stepped on the stone than it began to sink gently with him into the depths below. On reaching firm ground he found himself in a hall of much the same size as the upper one, but with much more in it to wonder at and admire. Round the walls were several niches, in each of which stood glass vessels filled with some bright-colored spirit or bluish smoke. On the floor stood two large crystal boxes opposite each other, and these attracted his curiosity at once. Stepping up to one of them, he saw within it what looked like a model in miniature of a fine castle surrounded by farms, barns, stables, and a number of other buildings. Everything was quite tiny, but so beautifully and carefully finished that it might have been the work of an accomplished artist. He would have continued gazing much longer at this remarkable curiosity had not the voice desired him to turn round and look at the crystal coffin which stood opposite. What was his amazement at seeing a girl of surpassing loveliness lying in it! She lay as though sleeping, and her long, fair hair seemed to wrap her round like some costly mantle. Her eyes were closed, but the bright color in her face, and the movement of a ribbon, which rose and fell with her breath, left no doubt as to her being alive.

As the tailor stood gazing at her with a beating heart, the maiden suddenly opened her eyes, and started with delighted surprise.

“Great heavens!” she cried, “my deliverance approaches! Quick, quick, help me out of my prison; only push back the bolt of this coffin and I am free.”

The tailor promptly obeyed, when she quickly pushed back the crystal lid, stepped out of the coffin and hurried to a corner of the hall, when she proceeded to wrap herself in a large cloak. Then she sat down on a stone, desired the young man to come near, and, giving him an affectionate kiss, she said, “My long-hoped-for deliverer, kind heaven has led you to me, and has at length put an end to all my sufferings. You are my destined husband, and, beloved by me, and endowed with every kind of riches and power, you shall spend the remainder of your life in peace and happiness. Now sit down and hear my story. I am the daughter of a wealthy nobleman. My parents died when I was very young, and they left me to the care of my eldest brother, by whom I was carefully educated. We loved each other so tenderly, and our tastes and interests were so much alike that we determined never to marry, but to spend our entire lives together. There was no lack of society at our home. Friends and neighbors paid us frequent visits, and we kept open house for all. Thus it happened that one evening a stranger rode up to the castle and asked for hospitality, as he could not reach the nearest town that night. We granted his request with ready courtesy, and during supper he entertained us with most agreeable conversation, mingled with amusing anecdotes. My brother took such a fancy to him that he pressed him to spend a couple of days with us, which, after a little hesitation, the stranger consented to do. We rose late from table, and whilst my brother was showing our guest to his room I hurried to mine, for I was very tired and longed to get to bed. I had hardly dropped off to sleep when I was roused by the sound of some soft and charming music. Wondering whence it could come, I was about to call to my maid who slept in the room next mine, when, to my surprise, I felt as if some heavy weight on my chest had taken all power from me, and I lay there unable to utter the slightest sound. Meantime, by the light of the night lamp, I saw the stranger enter my room, though the double doors had been securely locked. He drew near and told me that through the power of his magic arts he had caused the soft music to waken me, and had made his way through bolts and bars to offer me his hand and heart. My repugnance to his magic was so great that I would not condescend to give any answer. He waited motionless for some time, hoping no doubt for a favorable reply, but as I continued silent he angrily declared that he would find means to punish my pride, and therewith he left the room in a rage.

“I spent the night in the greatest agitation, and only fell into a doze towards morning. As soon as I awoke I jumped up, and hurried to tell my brother all that had happened, but he had left his room, and his servant told me that he had gone out at daybreak to hunt with the stranger.

“My mind misgave me. I dressed in all haste, had my palfrey saddled, and rode off at full gallop towards the forest, attended by one servant only. I pushed on without pausing, and ere long I saw the stranger coming towards me, and leading a fine stag. I asked him where he had left my brother, and how he had got the stag, whose great eyes were overflowing with tears. Instead of answering he began to laugh, and I flew into such a rage that I drew a pistol and fired at him; but the bullet rebounded from his breast and struck my horse in the forehead. I fell to the ground, and the stranger muttered some words, which robbed me of my senses.

“When I came to myself I was lying in a crystal coffin in this subterranean vault. The Magician appeared again, and told me that he had transformed my brother into a stag, had reduced our castle and all its defenses to miniature and locked them up in a glass box, and after turning all our household into different vapors had banished them into glass phials. If I would only yield to his wishes he could easily open these vessels, and all would then resume their former shapes.

“I would not say a word more than I had done previously, and he vanished, leaving me in my prison, where a deep sleep soon fell on me. Amongst the many dreams which floated through my brain was a cheering one of a young man who was to come and release me, and today, when I opened my eyes, I recognized you and saw that my dream was fulfilled. Now help me to carry out the rest of my vision. The first thing is to place the glass box which contains my castle on this large stone.”

As soon as this was done the stone gently rose through the air and transported them into the upper hall, whence they easily carried the box into the outer air. The lady then removed the lid, and it was marvelous to watch the castle, houses, and farmyards begin to grow and spread themselves till they had regained their proper size. Then the young couple returned by means of the movable stone, and brought up all the glass vessels filled with smoke. No sooner were they uncorked than the blue vapors poured out and became transformed to living people, in whom the lady joyfully recognized her many servants and attendants.

Her delight was complete when her brother (who had killed the Magician under the form of a bull) was seen coming from the forest in his proper shape, and that very day, according to her promise, she gave her hand in marriage to the happy young tailor.

PRINCE FICKLE AND FAIR HELENA

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Lang, Andrew. The Green Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1894, 216–221.

Date: ca. 1812

Original Source: Grimm, Jacob and Wilhelm. Kinder- und Hausmärchen (Children's and Household Tales).

National Origin: Germany

---

This tale (Grimm Tale 186, “The True Sweetheart”) combines a plot that is best known in English as “Cinderella” (AT 510A) with elements of “The Forsaken Fiancée: Service as a Menial” (AT 884). The theme of both tale types, the rewards of perseverance and virtue, is intensified by combining the two related plots.

---

There was once upon a time a beautiful girl called Helena. Her own mother had died when she was quite a child, and her stepmother was as cruel and unkind to her as she could be. Helena did all she could to gain her love, and performed the heavy work given her to do cheerfully and well; but her stepmother’s heart wasn’t in the least touched, and the more the poor girl did the more she asked her to do.

One day she gave Helena twelve pounds of mixed feathers and bade her separate them all before evening, threatening her with heavy punishment if she failed to do so.

The poor child sat down to her task with her eyes so full of tears that she could hardly see to begin. And when she had made one little heap of feathers, she sighed so deeply that they all blew apart again. And so it went on, and the poor girl grew more and more miserable. She bowed her head in her hands and cried, “Is there no one under heaven who will take pity on me?”

Suddenly a soft voice replied, “Be comforted, my child: I have come to help you.” Terrified to death, Helena looked up and saw a Fairy standing in front of her, who asked in the kindest way possible, “Why are you crying, my dear?”

Helena, who for long had heard no friendly voice, confided her sad tale of woe to the Fairy, and told her what the new task she had been given to do was, and how she despaired of ever accomplishing it.

“Don’t worry yourself about it any more,” said the kind Fairy; “lie down and go to sleep, and I’ll see that your work is done all right.” So Helena lay down, and when she awoke all the feathers were sorted into little bundles; but when she turned to thank the good Fairy she had vanished.

In the evening her stepmother returned and was much amazed to find Helena sitting quietly with her work all finished before her.

She praised her diligence, but at the same time racked her brain as to what harder task she could set her to do.

The next day she told Helena to empty a pond near the house with a spoon which was full of holes. Helena set to work at once, but she very soon found that what her stepmother had told her to do was an impossibility. Full of despair and misery, she was in the act of throwing the spoon away, when suddenly the kind Fairy stood before her again, and asked her why she was so unhappy?

When Helena told her of her stepmother's new demand she said, "Trust to me and I will do your task for you. Lie down and have a sleep in the meantime."

Helena was comforted and lay down, and before you would have believed it possible the Fairy roused her gently and told her the pond was empty. Full of joy and gratitude, Helena hurried to her stepmother, hoping that now at last her heart would be softened towards her. But the wicked woman was furious at the frustration of her own evil designs, and only thought of what harder thing she could set the girl to do.

Next morning she ordered her to build before evening a beautiful castle, and to furnish it all from garret to basement. Helena sat down on the rocks which had been pointed out to her as the site of the castle, feeling very depressed, but at the same time with the lurking hope that the kind Fairy would come once more to her aid.

And so it turned out. The Fairy appeared, promised to build the castle, and told Helena to lie down and go to sleep in the meantime. At the word of the Fairy the rocks and stones rose and built themselves into a beautiful castle, and before sunset it was all furnished inside, and left nothing to be desired. You may think how grateful Helena was when she awoke and found her task all finished.

But her stepmother was anything but pleased, and went through the whole castle from top to bottom, to see if she couldn't find some fault for which she could punish Helena. At last she went down into one of the cellars, but it was so dark that she fell down the steep stairs and was killed on the spot.

So Helena was now mistress of the beautiful castle, and lived there in peace and happiness. And soon the noise of her beauty spread abroad, and many wooers came to try and gain her hand.

Among them came one Prince Fickle by name, who very quickly won the love of fair Helena. One day, as they were sitting happily together under a lime tree in front of the castle, Prince Fickle broke the sad news to Helena that he must return to his parents to get their consent to his marriage. He promised faithfully to come back to her as soon as he could and begged her to await his return under the lime tree where they had spent so many happy hours.

Helena kissed him tenderly at parting on his left cheek, and begged him not to let anyone else kiss him there while they were parted, and she promised to sit and wait for him under the lime tree, for she never doubted that the Prince would be faithful to her and would return as quickly as he could.

And so she sat for three days and three nights under the tree without moving. But when her lover never returned, she grew very unhappy, and determined to set out to look for him. She took as many of her jewels as she could carry, and three of her most beautiful dresses, one embroidered with stars, one with moons, and the third with suns, all of pure gold. Far and wide she wandered through the world, but nowhere did she find any trace of her bridegroom. At last she gave up the search in despair. She could not bear to return to her own castle where she had been so happy with her lover, but determined rather to endure her loneliness and desolation in a strange land. She took a place as herd-girl with a peasant, and buried her jewels and beautiful dresses in a safe and hidden spot.

Every day she drove the cattle to pasture, and all the time she thought of nothing but her faithless bridegroom. She was very devoted to a certain little calf in the herd, and made a great pet of it, feeding it out of her own hands. She taught it to kneel before her, and then she whispered in its ear:

Kneel, little calf, kneel;
Be faithful and leal [loyal],
Not like Prince Fickle,
Who once on a time
Left his fair Helena Under the lime.

After some years passed in this way, she heard that the daughter of the king of the country she was living in was going to marry a Prince called "Fickle." Everybody rejoiced at the news except poor Helena, to whom it was a fearful blow, for at the bottom of her heart she had always believed her lover to be true.

Now it chanced that the way to the capital led right past the village where Helena was, and often when she was leading her cattle forth to the meadows Prince Fickle rode past her, without ever noticing the poor herd-girl, so engrossed was he in thoughts of his new bride. Then it occurred to Helena to put his heart to the test and to see if it weren't possible to recall herself to him. So one day as Prince Fickle rode by she said to her little calf:

Kneel, little calf, kneel;
Be faithful and leal,
Not like Prince Fickle,
Who once on a time
Left his poor Helena Under the lime.

When Prince Fickle heard her voice it seemed to him to remind him of something, but of what he couldn't remember, for he hadn't heard the words distinctly, as Helena had only spoken them very low and with a shaky voice. Helena herself had been far too moved to let her see what impression her words had made on the Prince, and when she looked round he was already far away. But she noticed how slowly he was riding, and how deeply sunk he was in thought, so she didn't quite give herself up as lost.

In honor of the approaching wedding a feast lasting many nights was to be given in the capital. Helena placed all her hopes on this, and determined to go to the feast and there to seek out her bridegroom.

When evening drew near she stole out of the peasant's cottage secretly, and, going to her hiding-place, she put on her dress embroidered with the gold suns, and all her jewels, and loosed her beautiful golden hair, which up to now she had always worn under a kerchief, and, adorned thus, she set out for the town.

When she entered the ballroom all eyes were turned on her, and everyone marveled at her beauty, but no one knew who she was. Prince Fickle, too, was quite dazzled by the charms of the beautiful maiden, and never guessed that she had once been his own ladylove. He never left her side all night, and it was with great difficulty that Helena escaped from him in the crowd when it was time to return home. Prince Fickle searched for her everywhere, and longed eagerly for the next night, when the beautiful lady had promised to come again.

The following evening the fair Helena started early for the feast.

This time she wore her dress embroidered with silver moons, and in her hair she placed a silver crescent. Prince Fickle was enchanted to see her again, and she seemed to him even more beautiful than she had been the night before. He never left her side, and refused to dance with anyone else. He begged her to tell him who she was, but this she refused to do. Then he implored her to return again next evening, and this she promised him she would.

On the third evening Prince Fickle was so impatient to see his fair enchantress again, that he arrived at the feast hours before it began, and never took his eyes from the door. At last Helena arrived in a dress all covered with gold and silver stars, and with a girdle of stars round her waist, and a band of stars in her hair. Prince Fickle was more in love with her than ever, and begged her once again to tell him her name.

Then Helena kissed him silently on the left cheek, and in one moment Prince Fickle recognized his old love. Full of remorse and sorrow, he begged for her forgiveness, and Helena, only too pleased to have got him back again, did not, you may be sure, keep him waiting very long for her pardon, and so they were married and returned to Helena's castle, where they are no doubt still sitting happily together under the lime tree.

SNOW-WHITE AND ROSE-RED

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Lang, Andrew. The Blue Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1894, 259–265.

Date: ca. 1812

Original Source: Grimm, Jacob and Wilhelm. Kinder- und Hausmärchen (Children's and Household Tales).

National Origin: Germany

---

In this variant of “Two Girls, the Bear and the Dwarf” (AT 426), attributes of the dwarf are consistent with those found in Germanic folklore. That is, dwarves are said to hoard treasure and sport long, full beards. The malice of this particular dwarf is revealed not only by his behavior toward his benefactors, but in the general antipathy shown toward him by the animals that, before his appearance had been docile and protective toward the human characters in the tale.

---

A poor widow once lived in a little cottage with a garden in front of it, in which grew two rose trees, one bearing white roses and the other red. She had two children, who were just like the two rose trees; one was called Snow-white and the other Rose-red, and they were the sweetest and best children in the world, always diligent and always cheerful; but Snow-white was quieter and more gentle than Rose-red. Rose-red loved to run about the fields and meadows, and to pick flowers and catch butterflies; but Snow-white sat at home with her mother and helped her in the household, or read aloud to her when there was no work to do. The two children loved each other so dearly that they always walked about hand in hand whenever they went out together, and when Snow-white said, “We will never desert each other,” Rose-red answered, “No, not as long as we live”; and the mother added, “Whatever one gets she shall share with the other.”

They often roamed about in the woods gathering berries and no beast offered to hurt them; on the contrary, they came up to them in the most confident manner; the little hare would eat a cabbage leaf from their hands, the deer grazed beside them, the stag would bound past them merrily, and the birds remained on the branches and sang to them with all their might.

No evil ever befell them; if they tarried late in the wood and night overtook them, they lay down together on the moss and slept till morning, and their mother knew they were quite safe, and never felt anxious about them. Once, when they had slept all night in the wood and had been wakened by the morning sun, they perceived a beautiful child in a shining white robe sitting close to their resting-place. The figure got up, looked at them kindly, but said nothing, and vanished into the wood. And when they looked round about them they became aware that they had slept quite close to a precipice, over which they would certainly have fallen had they gone on a few steps further in the darkness. And when they told their mother of their adventure, she said what they had seen must have been the angel that guards good children.

Snow-white and Rose-red kept their mother's cottage so beautifully clean and neat that it was a pleasure to go into it. In summer Rose-red looked after the house, and every morning before her mother awoke she placed a bunch of flowers before the bed, from each tree a rose. In winter Snow-white lit the fire and put on the kettle, which was made of brass, but so beautifully polished that it shone like gold. In the evening when the snowflakes fell their mother said, "Snow-white, go and close the shutters," and they drew round the fire, while the mother put on her spectacles and read aloud from a big book and the two girls listened and sat and span. Beside them on the ground lay a little lamb, and behind them perched a little white dove with its head tucked under its wings.

One evening as they sat thus cozily together someone knocked at the door as though he desired admittance. The mother said, "Rose-red, open the door quickly; it must be some traveler seeking shelter." Rose-red hastened to unbar the door, and thought she saw a poor man standing in the darkness outside; but it was no such thing, only a bear, who poked his thick black head through the door. Rose-red screamed aloud and sprang back in terror, the lamb began to bleat, the dove flapped its wings, and Snow-white ran and hid behind her mother's bed.

But the bear began to speak, and said, "Don't be afraid: I won't hurt you. I am half frozen, and only wish to warm myself a little."

"My poor bear," said the mother, "lie down by the fire, only take care you don't burn your fur." Then she called out, "Snow-white and Rose-red, come out; the bear will do you no harm; he is a good, honest creature." So they both came out of their hiding-places, and gradually the lamb and dove drew near too, and they all forgot their fear. The bear asked the children to beat the snow a little out of his fur, and they fetched a brush and scrubbed him till he was dry. Then the beast stretched himself in front of the fire, and growled quite happily and comfortably.

The children soon grew quite at their ease with him, and led their helpless guest a fearful life. They tugged his fur with their hands, put their small feet on his back, and rolled him about here and there, or took a hazel wand and beat him with it; and if he growled they only laughed. The bear submitted to everything with the best possible good nature, only when they went too far he cried, "Oh! children, spare my life!"

"Snow-white and Rose-red, Don't beat your lover dead."

When it was time to retire for the night, and the others went to bed, the mother said to the bear, "You can lie there on the hearth, in heaven's name; it will be shelter for you from the cold and wet.” As soon as day dawned the children led him out, and he trotted over the snow into the wood. From this time on the bear came every evening at the same hour, and lay down by the hearth and let the children play what pranks they liked with him; and they got so accustomed to him that the door was never shut till their black friend had made his appearance.

When spring came, and all outside was green, the bear said one morning to Snow-white, “Now I must go away, and not return again the whole summer.”

“Where are you going to, dear bear?” asked Snow-white.

“I must go to the wood and protect my treasure from the wicked dwarfs. In winter, when the earth is frozen hard, they are obliged to remain underground, for they can’t work their way through; but now, when the sun has thawed and warmed the ground, they break through and come up above to spy the land and steal what they can; what once falls into their hands and into their caves is not easily brought back to light.”

Snow-white was quite sad over their friend’s departure, and when she unbarred the door for him, the bear, stepping out, caught a piece of his fur in the door-knocker, and Snow-white thought she caught sight of glittering gold beneath it, but she couldn’t be certain of it; and the bear ran hastily away, and soon disappeared behind the trees.

A short time after this the mother sent the children into the wood to collect fagots. They came in their wanderings upon a big tree which lay felled on the ground, and on the trunk among the long grass they noticed something jumping up and down, but what it was they couldn’t distinguish. When they approached nearer they perceived a dwarf with a wizened face and a beard a yard long. The end of the beard was jammed into a cleft of the tree, and the little man sprang about like a dog on a chain, and didn’t seem to know what he was to do.

He glared at the girls with his fiery red eyes, and screamed out, “What are you standing there for? Can’t you come and help me?”

“What were you doing, little man?” asked Rose-red.

“You stupid, inquisitive goose!” replied the dwarf; “I wanted to split the tree, in order to get little chips of wood for our kitchen fire; those thick logs that serve to make fires for coarse, greedy people like yourselves quite burn up all the little food we need. I had successfully driven in the wedge, and all was going well, but the cursed wood was so slippery that it suddenly sprang out, and the tree closed up so rapidly that I had no time to take my beautiful white beard out, so here I am stuck fast, and I can’t get away; and you silly, smooth-faced, milk-and-water girls just stand and laugh! Ugh! what wretches you are!”

The children did all in their power, but they couldn’t get the beard out; it was wedged in far too firmly. “I will run and fetch somebody,” said Rose-red.

“Crazy blockheads!” snapped the dwarf; “what’s the good of calling anyone else? You’re already two too many for me. Does nothing better occur to you than that?”

“Don’t be so impatient,” said Snow-white, “I’ll see you get help,” and taking her scissors out of her pocket she cut off the end of his beard.

As soon as the dwarf felt himself free he seized a bag full of gold which was hidden among the roots of the tree, lifted it up, and muttered aloud, “Curse these rude wretches, cutting off a piece of my splendid beard!” With these words he swung the bag over his back, and disappeared without as much as looking at the children again.

Shortly after this Snow-white and Rose-red went out to get a dish of fish. As they approached the stream they saw something which looked like an enormous grasshopper springing toward the water as if it were going to jump in. They ran forward and recognized their old friend the dwarf. “Where are you going to?” asked Rose-red; “you’re surely not going to jump into the water?”

“I’m not such a fool,” screamed the dwarf. “Don’t you see that cursed fish is trying to drag me in?” The little man had been sitting on the bank fishing, when unfortunately the wind had entangled his beard in the line; and when immediately afterward a big fish bit, the feeble little creature had no strength to pull it out; the fish had the upper fin, and dragged the dwarf toward him. He clung on with all his might to every rush and blade of grass, but it didn’t help him much; he had to follow every movement of the fish, and was in great danger of being drawn into the water. The girls came up just at the right moment, held him firm, and did all they could to disentangle his beard from the line; but in vain, beard and line were in a hopeless muddle. Nothing remained but to produce the scissors and cut the beard, by which a small part of it was sacrificed.

When the dwarf perceived what they were about he yelled to them, “Do you call that manners, you toad-stools! to disfigure a fellow’s face? It wasn’t enough that you shortened my beard before, but you must now needs cut off the best bit of it. I can’t appear like this before my own people. I wish you’d been in Jericho first.” Then he fetched a sack of pearls that lay among the rushes, and without saying another word he dragged it away and disappeared behind a stone.

It happened that soon after this the mother sent the two girls to the town to buy needles, thread, laces, and ribbons. Their road led over a heath where huge boulders of rock lay scattered here and there. While trudging along they saw a big bird hovering in the air, circling slowly above them, but always descending lower, till at last it settled on a rock not far from them. Immediately afterward they heard a sharp, piercing cry. They ran forward, and saw with horror that the eagle had pounced on their old friend the dwarf, and was about to carry him off. The tender-hearted children seized hold of the little man, and struggled so long with the bird that at last he let go his prey.

When the dwarf had recovered from the first shock he screamed in his screeching voice, “Couldn’t you have treated me more carefully? You have torn my thin little coat all to shreds, useless, awkward hussies that you are!” Then he took a bag of precious stones and vanished under the rocks into his cave.

The girls were accustomed to his ingratitude, and went on their way and did their business in town. On their way home, as they were again passing the heath, they surprised the dwarf pouring out his precious stones on an open space, for he had thought no one would pass by at so late an hour. The evening sun shone on the glittering stones, and they glanced and gleamed so beautifully that the children stood still and gazed on them. “What are you standing there gaping for?” screamed the dwarf, and his ashen-gray face became scarlet with rage. He was about to go off with these angry words when a sudden growl was heard, and a black bear trotted out of the wood. The dwarf jumped up in great fright, but he hadn’t time to reach his place of retreat, for the bear was already close to him.

Then he cried in terror, “Dear Mr. Bear, spare me! I’ll give you all my treasure. Look at those beautiful precious stones lying there. Spare my life! what pleasure would you get from a poor feeble little fellow like me? You won’t feel me between your teeth. There, lay hold of these two wicked girls, they will be a tender morsel for you, as fat as young quails; eat them up, for heaven’s sake.” But the bear, paying no attention to his words, gave the evil little creature one blow with his paw, and he never moved again.

The girls had run away, but the bear called after them, “Snow-white and Rose-red, don’t be afraid; wait, and I’ll come with you.” Then they recognized his voice and stood still, and when the bear was quite close to them his skin suddenly fell off, and a beautiful man stood beside them, all dressed in gold. “I am a king’s son,” he said, “and have been doomed by that unholy little dwarf, who had stolen my treasure, to roam about the woods as a wild bear till his death should set me free. Now he has got his well-merited punishment.”

Snow-white married him, and Rose-red his brother, and they divided the great treasure the dwarf had collected in his cave between them. The old mother lived for many years peacefully with her children; and she carried the two rose trees with her, and they stood in front of her window, and every year they bore the finest red and white roses.

JACK MY HEDGE HOG

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Lang, Andrew. The Green Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1892, 290–295.

Date: ca. 1812–1814

Original Source: Grimm, Jacob and Wilhelm. Kinder- und Hausmärchen (Children’s and Household Tales).

National Origin: Germany

Originally “Hans My Hedgehog” in the Grimms’ corpus (Tale 108), Lang renames the tale “Jack My Hedgehog” with the inclusion of this variant of AT 441 in his anthology. The theme of the animal husband who is associated with the forest is common in the world’s folktales. In some cases, the spouse or suitor is menacing. In the present narrative, however, the protagonist is depicted as a recluse who rewards virtue and punishes dishonorable behavior.

---

There was once a farmer who lived in great comfort. He had both lands and money, but, though he was so well off, one thing was wanting to complete his happiness; he had no children. Many and many a time, when he met other farmers at the nearest market town, they would tease him, asking how it came about that he was childless. At length he grew so angry that he exclaimed, “I must and will have a child of some sort or kind, even should it only be a hedgehog!”

Not long after this his wife gave birth to a child, but though the lower half of the little creature was a fine boy, from the waist upwards it was a hedgehog, so that when his mother first saw him she was quite frightened, and said to her husband, “There now, you have cursed the child yourself.”

The farmer said, “What’s the use of making a fuss? I suppose the creature must be christened, but I don’t see how we are to ask anyone to be sponsor to him, and what are we to call him?”

“There is nothing we can possibly call him but Jack my Hedgehog,” replied the wife.

So they took him to be christened, and the parson said, “You’ll never be able to put that child in a decent bed on account of his prickles.” Which was true, but they shook down some straw for him behind the stove, and there he lay for eight years. His father grew very tired of him and often wished him dead, but he did not die, but lay on there year after year.

Now one day there was a big fair at the market town to which the farmer meant to go, so he asked his wife what he should bring her from it. “Some meat and a couple of big loaves for the house,” said she.

Then he asked the maid what she wanted, and she said a pair of slippers and some stockings.

Lastly he said, “Well, Jack my Hedgehog, and what shall I bring you?”

“Daddy,” said he, “do bring me a bagpipe.” When the farmer came home he gave his wife and the maid the things they had asked for, and then he went behind the stove and gave Jack my Hedgehog the bagpipes.

When Jack had got his bagpipes he said, “Daddy, do go to the smithy and have the house cock shod for me; then I’ll ride off and trouble you no more.” His father, who was delighted at the prospect of getting rid of him, had the cock shod, and when it was ready Jack my Hedgehog mounted on its back and rode off to the forest, followed by all the pigs and asses which he had promised to look after.

Having reached the forest he made the cock fly up to the top of a very tall tree with him, and there he sat looking after his pigs and donkeys, and he sat on and on for several years till he had quite a big herd; but all this time his father knew nothing about him.

As he sat up in his tree he played away on his pipes and drew the loveliest music from them. As he was playing one day a King, who had lost his way, happened to pass close by, and hearing the music he was much surprised, and sent one of his servants to find out where it came from. The man peered about, but he could see nothing but a little creature which looked like a cock with a hedgehog sitting on it, perched up in a tree. The King desired the servant to ask the strange creature why it sat there, and if it knew the shortest way to his kingdom.

On this Jack my Hedgehog stepped down from his tree and said he would undertake to show the King his way home if the King on his part would give him his written promise to let him have whatever first met him on his return.

The King thought to himself, "That's easy enough to promise. The creature won't understand a word about it, so I can just write what I choose."

So he took pen and ink and wrote something, and when he had done Jack my Hedgehog pointed out the way and the King got safely home.

Now when the King's daughter saw her father returning in the distance she was so delighted that she ran to meet him and threw herself into his arms. Then the King remembered Jack my Hedgehog, and he told his daughter how he had been obliged to give a written promise to bestow whatever he first met when he got home on an extraordinary creature which had shown him the way. The creature, said he, rode on a cock as though it had been a horse, and it made lovely music, but as it certainly could not read he had just written that he would not give it anything at all. At this the Princess was quite pleased, and said how cleverly her father had managed, for that of course nothing would induce her to have gone off with Jack my Hedgehog.

Meantime Jack minded his asses and pigs, sat aloft in his tree, played his bagpipes, and was always merry and cheery. After a time it so happened that another King, having lost his way, passed by with his servants and escort, wondering how he could find his way home, for the forest was very vast. He too heard the music, and told one of his men to find out whence it came. The man came under the tree, and looking up to the top there he saw Jack my Hedgehog astride on the cock.

The servant asked Jack what he was doing up there. "I'm minding my pigs and donkeys; but what do you want?" was the reply. Then the servant told him they had lost their way, and wanted some one to show it them. Down came Jack my Hedgehog with his cock, and told the old King he would show him the right way if he would solemnly promise to give him the first thing he met in front of his royal castle.

The King said, "Yes," and gave Jack a written promise to that effect.

Then Jack rode on in front pointing out the way, and the King reached his own country in safety.

Now he had an only daughter who was extremely beautiful, and who, delighted at her father's return, ran to meet him, threw her arms round his neck and kissed him heartily. Then she asked where he had been wandering so long, and he told her how he had lost his way and might never have reached home at all but for a strange creature, half-man, half-hedgehog, which rode a cock and sat up in a tree making lovely music, and which had shown him the right way. He also told her how he had been obliged to pledge his word to give the creature the first thing which met him outside his castle gate, and he felt very sad at the thought that she had been the first thing to meet him.

But the Princess comforted him, and said she should be quite willing to go with Jack my Hedgehog whenever he came to fetch her, because of the great love she bore to her dear old father.

Jack my Hedgehog continued to herd his pigs, and they increased in number till there were so many that the forest seemed full of them. So he made up his mind to live there no longer, and sent a message to his father telling him to have all the stables and outhouses in the village cleared, as he was going to bring such an enormous herd that all who would might kill what they chose. His father was much vexed at this news, for he thought Jack had died long ago. Jack my Hedgehog mounted his cock, and driving his pigs before him into the village, he let every one kill as many as they chose, and such a hacking and hewing of pork went on as you might have heard for miles off.

Then said Jack, "Daddy, let the blacksmith shoe my cock once more; then I'll ride off, and I promise you I'll never come back again as long as I live." So the father had the cock shod, and rejoiced at the idea of getting rid of his son.

Then Jack my Hedgehog set off for the first kingdom, and there the King had given strict orders that if anyone should be seen riding a cock and carrying a bagpipe he was to be chased away and shot at, and on no account to be allowed to enter the palace. So when Jack my Hedgehog rode up the guards charged him with their bayonets, but he put spurs to his cock, flew up over the gate right to the King's windows, let himself down on the sill, and called out that if he was not given what had been promised him, both the King and his daughter should pay for it with their lives. Then the King coaxed and entreated his daughter to go with Jack and so save both their lives.

The Princess dressed herself all in white, and her father gave her a coach with six horses and servants in gorgeous liveries and quantities of money. She stepped into the coach, and Jack my Hedgehog with his cock and pipes took his place beside her. They both took leave, and the King fully expected never to set eyes on them again. But matters turned out very differently from what he had expected, for when they had got a certain distance from the town Jack tore all the Princess's smart clothes off her, and pricked her all over with his bristles, saying, "That's what you get for treachery. Now go back, I'll have no more to say to you." And with that he hunted [chased] her home, and she felt she had been disgraced and put to shame till her life's end.

Then Jack my Hedgehog rode on with his cock and bagpipes to the country of the second King to whom he had shown the way. Now this King had given orders that, in the event of Jack's coming the guards were to present arms, the people to cheer, and he was to be conducted in triumph to the royal palace.

When the King's daughter saw Jack my Hedgehog, she was a good deal startled, for he certainly was very peculiar looking; but after all she considered that she had given her word and it couldn't be helped. So she made Jack welcome and they were betrothed to each other, and at dinner he sat next her at the royal table, and they ate and drank together.

When they retired to rest the Princess feared lest Jack should kiss her because of his prickles, but he told her not to be alarmed as no harm should befall her. Then he begged the old King to place a watch of four men just outside his bedroom door, and to desire them to make a big fire. When he was about to lie down in bed he would creep out of his hedgehog skin, and leave it lying at the bedside; then the men must rush in, throw the skin into the fire, and stand by till it was entirely burnt up.

And so it was, for when it struck eleven, Jack my Hedgehog went to his room, took off his skin and left it at the foot of the bed. The men rushed in, quickly seized the skin and threw it on the fire, and directly it was all burnt Jack was released from his enchantment and lay in his bed a man from head to foot, but quite black as though he had been severely scorched.

The King sent off for his physician in ordinary, who washed Jack all over with various essences and salves, so that he became white and was a remarkably handsome young man. When the King's daughter saw him she was greatly pleased, and next day the marriage ceremony was performed, and the old King bestowed his kingdom on Jack my Hedgehog.

After some years Jack and his wife went to visit his father, but the farmer did not recognize him, and declared he had no son; he had had one, but that one was born with bristles like a hedgehog, and had gone off into the wide world. Then Jack told his story, and his old father rejoiced and returned to live with him in his kingdom.

MOTHER HOLLE

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Lang, Andrew. The Red Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1890, 303–306.

Date: ca. 1812–1814

Original Source: Grimm, Jacob and Wilhelm. Kinder- und Hausmärchen (Children's and Household Tales).

National Origin: Germany

---

“Mother Holle,” titled “Frau Hölle” (literally, “Mrs. Hell”) in the Grimms’ collection (Grimm 24) is a variant of the “The Kind and the Unkind Girls” (AT 480). The punishment meted out to the unkind sister is in keeping with the name of the old woman in the tale’s title. The fact that she also dispenses rewards should discourage taking the name “Mrs. Hell” too literally, however.

---

Once upon a time there was a widow who had two daughters; one of them was pretty and clever, and the other ugly and lazy. But as the ugly one was her own daughter, she liked her far the best of the two, and the pretty one had to do all the work of the house, and was in fact the regular maid of all work. Every day she had to sit by a well on the high road, and spin till her fingers were so sore that they often bled. One day some drops of blood fell on her spindle, so she dipped it into the well meaning to wash it, but, as luck would have it, it dropped from her hand and fell right in. She ran weeping to her stepmother, and told her what had happened, but she scolded her harshly, and was so merciless in her anger that she said, “Well, since you’ve dropped the spindle down, you must just go after it yourself, and don’t let me see your face again until you bring it with you.”

Then the poor girl returned to the well, and not knowing what she was about, in the despair and misery of her heart she sprang into the well and sank to the bottom. For a time she lost all consciousness, and when she came to herself again she was lying in a lovely meadow, with the sun shining brightly overhead, and a thousand flowers blooming at her feet. She rose up and wandered through this enchanted place, till she came to a baker’s oven full of bread, and the bread called out to her as she passed, “Oh! take me out, take me out, or I shall be burnt to a cinder. I am quite done enough.”

So she stepped up quickly to the oven and took out all the loaves one after the other.

Then she went on a little farther and came to a tree laden with beautiful rosy-cheeked apples, and as she passed by it called out, “Oh I shake me, shake me, my apples are all quite ripe.”

She did as she was asked, and shook the tree till the apples fell like rain and none were left hanging. When she had gathered them all up into a heap she went on her way again, and came at length to a little house, at the door of which sat an old woman.

The old dame had such large teeth that the girl felt frightened and wanted to run away, but the old woman called after her, “What are you afraid of, dear child? Stay with me and be my little maid, and if you do your work well I will reward you handsomely; but you must be very careful how you make my bed—you must shake it well till the feathers fly; then people in the world below say it snows, for I am Mother Holle.”

She spoke so kindly that the girl took heart and agreed readily to enter her service. She did her best to please the old woman, and shook her bed with such a will that the feathers flew about like snow-flakes; so she led a very easy life, was never scolded, and lived on the fat of the land. But after she had been some time with Mother Holle she grew sad and depressed, and at first she hardly knew herself what was the matter. At last she discovered that she was homesick, so she went to Mother Holle and said, “I know I am a thousand times better off here than I ever was in my life before, but notwithstanding, I have a great longing to go home, in spite of all your kindness to me. I can remain with you no longer, but must return to my own people.”

“Your desire to go home pleases me,” said Mother Holle, “and because you have served me so faithfully, I will show you the way back into the world myself.”

So she took her by the hand and led her to an open door, and as the girl passed through it there fell a heavy shower of gold all over her, till she was covered with it from top to toe.

“That’s a reward for being such a good little maid,” said Mother Holle, and she gave her the spindle too that had fallen into the well.

Then she shut the door, and the girl found herself back in the world again, not far from her own house; and when she came to the courtyard the old hen, who sat on the top of the wall, called out, “Click, clock, clack, Our golden maid’s come back.”

Then she went in to her stepmother, and as she had returned covered with gold she was welcomed home.

She proceeded to tell all that had happened to her, and when the mother heard how she had come by her riches, she was most anxious to secure the same luck for her own idle, ugly daughter; so she told her to sit at the well and spin. In order to make her spindle bloody, she stuck her hand into a hedge of thorns and pricked her finger. Then she threw the spindle into the well, and jumped in herself after it. Like her sister she came to the beautiful meadow, and followed the same path. When she reached the baker’s oven the bread called out as before, “Oh! take me out, take me out, or I shall be burnt to a cinder. I am quite done enough.”

But the good-for-nothing girl answered, “A pretty joke, indeed; just as if I should dirty my hands for you!”

And on she went. Soon she came to the apple tree, which cried, “Oh! Shake me, shake me, my apples are all quite ripe.”

“I’ll see myself farther,” she replied, “one of them might fall on my head.”

And so she pursued her way. When she came to Mother Holle's house she wasn't the least afraid, for she had been warned about her big teeth, and she readily agreed to become her maid.

The first day she worked very hard, and did all her mistress told her, for she thought of the gold she would give her; but on the second day she began to be lazy, and on the third she wouldn't even get up in the morning. She didn't make Mother Holle's bed as she ought to have done, and never shook it enough to make the feathers fly. So her mistress soon grew weary of her, and dismissed her, much to the lazy creature's delight.

"For now," she thought, "the shower of golden rain will come."

Mother Holle led her to the same door as she had done her sister, but when she passed through it, instead of the gold rain a kettle full of pitch came showering over her.

"That's a reward for your service," said Mother Holle, and she closed the door behind her.

So the lazy girl came home all covered with pitch, and when the old hen on the top of the wall saw her, it called out, "Click, clock, clack, Our dirty slut's come back."

But the pitch remained sticking to her, and never as long as she lived could it be got off.

THE NIXY

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Lang, Andrew. The Yellow Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1894, 108–113.

Date: ca. 1843

Original Source: Grimm, Jacob and Wilhelm. Kinder- und Hausmärchen (Children's and Household Tales).

National Origin: Germany

---

Nixies are water spirits from Germanic tradition. Although they are shape-shifters, they usually appear in tales in human form. The belief in these beings is likely to serve a cautionary function regarding the dangers of drowning posed by isolated bodies of water. Lang's folktale is listed as Tale 181 in the Grimms' collection. The plot is the same as "The Nix of the Mill Pond" (AT 316).

---

There was once upon a time a miller who was very well off, and had as much money and as many goods as he knew what to do with. But sorrow comes in the night, and the miller all of a sudden became so poor that at last he could hardly call the mill in which he sat his own. He wandered about all day full of despair and misery, and when he lay down at night he could get no rest, but lay awake all night sunk in sorrowful thoughts.

One morning he rose up before dawn and went outside, for he thought his heart would be lighter in the open air. As he wandered up and down on the banks of the mill-pond he heard a rustling in the water, and when he looked near he saw a white woman rising up from the waves. He realized at once that this could be none other than the nixy of the mill-pond, and in his terror he didn't know if he should fly away or remain where he was. While he hesitated the nixy spoke, called him by his name, and asked him why he was so sad.

When the miller heard how friendly her tone was, he plucked up heart and told her how rich and prosperous he had been all his life up till now, when he didn't know what he was to do for want and misery.

Then the nixy spoke comforting words to him, and promised that she would make him richer and more prosperous than he had ever been in his life before, if he would give her in return the youngest thing in his house.

The miller thought she must mean one of his puppies or kittens, so promised the nixy at once what she asked, and returned to his mill full of hope. On the threshold he was greeted by a servant with the news that his wife had just given birth to a boy.

The poor miller was much horrified by these tidings, and went in to his wife with a heavy heart to tell her and his relations of the fatal bargain he had just struck with the nixy. "I would gladly give up all the good fortune she promised me," he said, "if I could only save my child." But no one could think of any advice to give him, beyond taking care that the child never went near the mill-pond.

So the boy thrived and grew big, and in the meantime all prospered with the miller, and in a few years he was richer than he had ever been before. But all the same he did not enjoy his good fortune, for he could not forget his compact with the nixy, and he knew that sooner or later she would demand his fulfillment of it. But year after year went by, and the boy grew up and became a great hunter, and the lord of the land took him into his service, for he was as smart and bold a hunter as you would wish to see. In a short time he married a pretty young wife, and lived with her in great peace and happiness.

One day when he was out hunting a hare sprang up at his feet, and ran for some way in front of him in the open field. The hunter pursued it hotly for some time, and at last shot it dead. Then he proceeded to skin it, never noticing that he was close to the mill-pond, which from childhood up he had been taught to avoid. He soon finished the skinning, and went to the water to wash the blood off his hands. He had hardly dipped them in the pond when the nixy rose up in the water, and seizing him in her wet arms she dragged him down with her under the waves. When the hunter did not come home in the evening his wife grew very anxious, and when his game bag was found close to the mill-pond she guessed at once what had befallen him. She was nearly beside herself with grief, and roamed round and round the pond calling on her husband without ceasing. At last, worn out with sorrow and fatigue, she fell asleep and dreamt that she was wandering along a flowery meadow, when she came to a hut where she found an old witch, who promised to restore her husband to her.

When she awoke next morning she determined to set out and find the witch; so she wandered on for many a day, and at last she reached the flowery meadow and found the hut where the old witch lived. The poor wife told her all that had happened and how she had been told in a dream of the witch's power to help her.

The witch counseled her to go to the pond the first time there was a full moon, and to comb her black hair with a golden comb, and then to place the comb on the bank. The hunter's wife gave the witch a handsome present, thanked her heartily, and returned home.

Time dragged heavily till the time of the full moon, but it passed at last, and as soon as it rose the young wife went to the pond, combed her black hair with a golden comb, and when she had finished, placed the comb on the bank; then she watched the water impatiently. Soon she heard a rushing sound, and a big wave rose suddenly and swept the comb off the bank, and a minute after the head of her husband rose from the pond and gazed sadly at her. But immediately another wave came, and the head sank back into the water without having said a word. The pond lay still and motionless, glittering in the moonshine, and the hunter's wife was not a bit better off than she had been before.

In despair she wandered about for days and nights, and at last, worn out by fatigue, she sank once more into a deep sleep, and dreamt exactly the same dream about the old witch. So next morning she went again to the flowery meadow and sought the witch in her hut, and told her of her grief. The old woman counseled her to go to the mill-pond the next full moon and play upon a golden flute, and then to lay the flute on the bank.

As soon as the next moon was full the hunter's wife went to the mill-pond, played on a golden flute, and when she had finished placed it on the bank. Then a rushing sound was heard, and a wave swept the flute off the bank, and soon the head of the hunter appeared and rose up higher and higher till he was half out of the water. Then he gazed sadly at his wife and stretched out his arms towards her. But another rushing wave arose and dragged him under once more. The hunter's wife, who had stood on the bank full of joy and hope, sank into despair when she saw her husband snatched away again before her eyes.

But for her comfort she dreamt the same dream a third time, and betook herself once more to the old witch's hut in the flowery meadow. This time the old woman told her to go the next full moon to the mill-pond, and to spin there with a golden spinning-wheel, and then to leave the spinning-wheel on the bank.

The hunter's wife did as she was advised, and the first night the moon was full she sat and spun with a golden spinning-wheel, and then left the wheel on the bank. In a few minutes a rushing sound was heard in the waters, and a wave swept the spinning-wheel from the bank. Immediately the head of the hunter rose up from the pond, getting higher and higher each moment, till at length he stepped on to the bank and fell on his wife's neck.

But the waters of the pond rose up suddenly, overflowed the bank where the couple stood, and dragged them under the flood. In her despair the young wife called on the old witch to help her, and in a moment the hunter was turned into a frog and his wife into a toad. But they were not able to remain together, for the water tore them apart, and when the flood was over they both resumed their own shapes again, but the hunter and the hunter's wife found themselves each in a strange country, and neither knew what had become of the other.

The hunter determined to become a shepherd, and his wife too became a shepherdess. So they herded their sheep for many years in solitude and sadness.

Now it happened once that the shepherd came to the country where the shepherdess lived. The neighborhood pleased him, and he saw that the pasture was rich and suitable for his flocks. So he brought his sheep there, and herded them as before. The shepherd and shepherdess became great friends, but they did not recognize each other in the least.

But one evening when the moon was full they sat together watching their flocks, and the shepherd played upon his flute. Then the shepherdess thought of that evening when she had sat at the full moon by the mill-pond and had played on the golden flute; the recollection was too much for her, and she burst into tears. The shepherd asked her why she was crying, and left her no peace till she told him all her story. Then the scales fell from the shepherd's eyes, and he recognized his wife, and she him. So they returned joyfully to their own home, and lived in peace and happiness ever after.

HUNGARY

---

THE BOY WHO COULD KEEP A SECRET

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Lang, Andrew. The Crimson Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1903, 37–46.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Jones, W. Henry, and L. Kropf. The Folktales of the Magyars. London: E. Stock, 1889.

National Origin: Hungary

---

The Magyars came to the mountainous area of Central Europe that constitutes contemporary Hungary from Central Asia, eventually becoming the nation's principal ethnic group. References to the Sultan in the tale locate events in the period during which the Turkish Ottoman Empire expanded into Hungary and other areas of Central Europe in the early decades of the sixteenth century. The drawing of a sword as the test of leadership and the sword's rattling in its scabbard to warn the bearer are central to the plot of this narrative. The motif of the magic sword is cross-culturally distributed.

---

Once upon a time there lived a poor widow who had one little boy. At first sight you would not have thought that he was different from a thousand other little boys; but then you noticed that by his side hung the scabbard of a sword, and as the boy grew bigger the scabbard grew bigger too. The sword which belonged to the scabbard was found by the little boy sticking out of the ground in the garden, and every day he pulled it up to see if it would go into the scabbard. But though it was plainly becoming longer and longer, it was some time before the two would fit.

However, there came a day at last when it slipped in quite easily. The child was so delighted that he could hardly believe his eyes, so he tried it seven times, and each time it slipped in more easily than before. But pleased though the boy was, he determined not to tell anyone about it, particularly not his mother, who never could keep anything from her neighbors.

Still, in spite of his resolutions, he could not hide altogether that something had happened, and when he went in to breakfast his mother asked him what was the matter.

“Oh, mother, I had such a nice dream last night,” said he; “but I can’t tell it to anybody.”

“You can tell it to me,” she answered. “It must have been a nice dream, or you wouldn’t look so happy.”

“No, mother; I can’t tell it to anybody,” returned the boy, “till it comes true.”

“I want to know what it was, and know it I will,” cried she, “and I will beat you till you tell me.”

But it was no use, neither words nor blows would get the secret out of the boy; and when her arm was quite tired and she had to leave off, the child, sore and aching, ran into the garden and knelt weeping beside his little sword. It was working round and round in its hole all by itself, and if anyone except the boy had tried to catch hold of it, he would have been badly cut. But the moment he stretched out his hand it stopped and slid quietly into the scabbard.

For a long time the child sat sobbing, and the noise was heard by the king as he was driving by. “Go and see who it is that is crying so,” said he to one of his servants, and the man went.

In a few minutes he returned saying, “Your Majesty, it is a little boy who is kneeling there sobbing because his mother has beaten him.”

“Bring him to me at once,” commanded the monarch, “and tell him that it is the king who sends for him, and that he has never cried in all his life and cannot bear anyone else to do so.” On receiving this message the boy dried his tears and went with the servant to the royal carriage. “Will you be my son?” asked the king.

“Yes, if my mother will let me,” answered the boy. And the king bade the servant go back to the mother and say that if she would give her boy to him, he should live in the palace and marry his prettiest daughter as soon as he was a man.

The widow’s anger now turned into joy, and she came running to the splendid coach and kissed the king’s hand. “I hope you will be more obedient to his Majesty than you were to me,” she said; and the boy shrank away half-frightened. But when she had gone back to her cottage, he asked the king if he might fetch something that he had left in the garden, and when he was given permission, he pulled up his little sword, which he slid into the scabbard.

Then he climbed into the coach and was driven away.

After they had gone some distance the king said, "Why were you crying so bitterly in the garden just now?"

"Because my mother had been beating me," replied the boy.

"And what did she do that for?" asked the king again.

"Because I would not tell her my dream."

"And why wouldn't you tell it to her?"

"Because I will never tell it to anyone till it comes true," answered the boy.

"And won't you tell it to me either?" asked the king in surprise.

"No, not even to you, your Majesty," replied he.

"Oh, I am sure you will when we get home," said the king smiling, and he talked to him about other things till they came to the palace.

"I have brought you such a nice present," he said to his daughters, and as the boy was very pretty they were delighted to have him and gave him all their best toys.

"You must not spoil him," observed the king one day, when he had been watching them playing together. "He has a secret which he won't tell to anyone."

"He will tell me," answered the eldest princess; but the boy only shook his head.

"He will tell me," said the second girl.

"Not I," replied the boy.

"He will tell me," cried the youngest, who was the prettiest too.

"I will tell nobody till it comes true," said the boy, as he had said before; "and I will beat anybody who asks me."

The king was very sorry when he heard this, for he loved the boy dearly; but he thought it would never do to keep anyone near him who would not do as he was bid. So he commanded his servants to take him away and not to let him enter the palace again until he had come to his right senses.

The sword clanked loudly as the boy was led away, but the child said nothing, though he was very unhappy at being treated so badly when he had done nothing. However, the servants were very kind to him, and their children brought him fruit and all sorts of nice things, and he soon grew merry again, and lived amongst them for many years till his seventeenth birthday. Meanwhile the two eldest princesses had become women, and had married two powerful kings who ruled over great countries across the sea. The youngest one was old enough to be married too, but she was very particular, and turned up her nose at all the young princes who had sought her hand.

One day she was sitting in the palace feeling rather dull and lonely, and suddenly she began to wonder what the servants were doing, and whether it was not more amusing down in their quarters. The king was at his council and the queen was ill in bed, so there was no one to stop the princess, and she hastily ran across the gardens to the houses where the servants lived. Outside she noticed a youth who was handsomer than any prince she had ever seen, and in a moment she knew him to be the little boy she had once played with.

“Tell me your secret and I will marry you,” she said to him; but the boy only gave her the beating he had promised her long ago, when she asked him the same question. The girl was very angry, besides being hurt, and ran home to complain to her father.

“If he had a thousand souls, I would kill them all,” swore the king.

That very day a gallows was built outside the town, and all the people crowded round to see the execution of the young man who had dared to beat the king’s daughter. The prisoner, with his hands tied behind his back, was brought out by the hangman, and amidst dead silence his sentence was being read by the judge when suddenly the sword clanked against his side. Instantly a great noise was heard and a golden coach rumbled over the stones, with a white flag waving out of the window. It stopped underneath the gallows, and from it stepped the king of the Magyars, who begged that the life of the boy might be spared.

“Sir, he has beaten my daughter, who only asked him to tell her his secret. I cannot pardon that,” answered the princess’s father.

“Give him to me, I’m sure he will tell me the secret; or, if not, I have a daughter who is like the Morning Star, and he is sure to tell it to her.”

The sword clanked for the third time, and the king said angrily, “Well, if you want him so much you can have him; only never let me see his face again.” And he made a sign to the hangman. The bandage was removed from the young man’s eyes, and the cords from his wrists, and he took his seat in the golden coach beside the king of the Magyars. Then the coachman whipped up his horses, and they set out for Buda [western portion of the city that became Budapest in the nineteenth century].

The king talked very pleasantly for a few miles, and when he thought that his new companion was quite at ease with him, he asked him what was the secret which had brought him into such trouble. “That I cannot tell you,” answered the youth, “until it comes true.”

“You will tell my daughter,” said the king, smiling.

“I will tell nobody,” replied the youth, and as he spoke the sword clanked loudly. The king said no more, but trusted to his daughter’s beauty to get the secret from him.

The journey to Buda was long, and it was several days before they arrived there. The beautiful princess happened to be picking roses in the garden, when her father’s coach drove up. “Oh, what a handsome youth! Have you brought him from fairyland?” cried she, when they all stood upon the marble steps in front of the castle.

“I have brought him from the gallows,” answered the king; rather vexed at his daughter’s words, as never before had she consented to speak to any man.

“I don’t care where you brought him from,” said the spoiled girl. “I will marry him and nobody else, and we will live together till we die.”

“You will tell another tale,” replied the king, “when you ask him his secret. After all he is no better than a servant.”

“That is nothing to me,” said the princess, “for I love him. He will tell his secret to me, and will find a place in the middle of my heart.”

But the king shook his head, and gave orders that the lad was to be lodged in the summer-house.

One day, about a week later, the princess put on her finest dress, and went to pay him a visit. She looked so beautiful that, at the sight of her, the book dropped from his hand, and he stood up speechless. “Tell me,” she said, coaxingly, “what is this wonderful secret? Just whisper it in my ear, and I will give you a kiss.”

“My angel,” he answered, “be wise, and ask no questions, if you wish to get safely back to your father’s palace; I have kept my secret all these years, and do not mean to tell it now.”

However, the girl would not listen, and went on pressing him, till at last he slapped her face so hard that her nose bled. She shrieked with pain and rage, and ran screaming back to the palace, where her father was waiting to hear if she had succeeded. “I will starve you to death, you son of a dragon,” cried he, when he saw her dress streaming with blood; and he ordered all the masons and bricklayers in the town to come before him.

“Build me a tower as fast as you can,” he said, “and see that there is room for a stool and a small table, and for nothing else. The men set to work, and in two hours the tower was built, and they proceeded to the palace to inform the king that his commands were fulfilled. On the way they met the princess, who began to talk to one of the masons, and when the rest were out of hearing she asked if he could manage to make a hole in the tower, which nobody could see, large enough for a bottle of wine and some food to pass through.

“To be sure I can,” said the mason, turning back, and in a few minutes the hole was bored.

At sunset a large crowd assembled to watch the youth being led to the tower, and after his misdeeds had been proclaimed he was solemnly walled up. But every morning the princess passed him in food through the hole, and every third day the king sent his secretary to climb up a ladder and look down through a little window to see if he was dead. But the secretary always brought back the report that he was fat and rosy.

“There is some magic about this,” said the king.

This state of affairs lasted some time, till one day a messenger arrived from the Sultan bearing a letter for the king, and also three canes. “My master bids me say,” said the messenger, bowing low, “that if you cannot tell him which of these three canes grows nearest the root, which in the middle, and which at the top, he will declare war against you.”

The king was very much frightened when he heard this, and though he took the canes and examined them closely, he could see no difference between them. He looked so sad that his daughter noticed it, and inquired the reason.

“Alas! my daughter,” he answered, “how can I help being sad? The Sultan has sent me three canes, and says that if I cannot tell him which of them grows near the root, which in the middle, and which at the top, he will make war upon me. And you know that his army is far greater than mine.”

“Oh, do not despair, my father,” said she. “We shall be sure to find out the answer”; and she ran away to the tower, and told the young man what had occurred.

“Go to bed as usual,” replied he, “and when you wake, tell your father that you have dreamed that the canes must be placed in warm water. After a little while one will sink to the bottom; that is the one that grows nearest the root. The one which neither sinks nor comes to the surface is the cane that is cut from the middle; and the one that floats is from the top.”

So, the next morning, the princess told her father of her dream, and by her advice he cut notches in each of the canes when he took them out of the water, so that he might make no mistake when he handed them back to the messenger. The Sultan could not imagine how he had found out, but he did not declare war.

The following year the Sultan again wanted to pick a quarrel with the king of the Magyars, so he sent another messenger to him with three foals, begging him to say which of the animals was born in the morning, which at noon, and which in the evening. If an answer was not ready in three days, war would be declared at once. The king’s heart sank when he read the letter. He could not expect his daughter to be lucky enough to dream rightly a second time, and as a plague had been raging through the country, and had carried off many of his soldiers, his army was even weaker than before. At this thought his face became so gloomy that his daughter noticed it, and inquired what was the matter.

“I have had another letter from the Sultan,” replied the king, “and he says that if I cannot tell him which of three foals was born in the morning, which at noon, and which in the evening, he will declare war at once.”

“Oh, don’t be cast down,” said she, “something is sure to happen”; and she ran down to the tower to consult the youth.

“Go home, idol of my heart, and when night comes, pretend to scream out in your sleep, so that your father hears you. Then tell him that you have dreamt that he was just being carried off by the Turks because he could not answer the question about the foals, when the lad whom he had shut up in the tower ran up and told them which was foaled in the morning, which at noon, and which in the evening.”

So the princess did exactly as the youth had bidden her; and no sooner had she spoken than the king ordered the tower to be pulled down, and the prisoner brought before him. “I did not think that you could have lived so long without food,” said he, “and as you have had plenty of time to repent your wicked conduct, I will grant you pardon, on condition that you help me in a sore strait. Read this letter from the Sultan; you will see that if I fail to answer his question about the foals, a dreadful war will be the result.”

The youth took the letter and read it through. "Yes, I can help you," replied he; "but first you must bring me three troughs, all exactly alike. Into one you must put oats, into another wheat, and into the third barley. The foal which eats the oats is that which was foaled in the morning; the foal which eats the wheat is that which was foaled at noon; and the foal which eats the barley is that which was foaled at night." The king followed the youth's directions, and, marking the foals, sent them back to Turkey, and there was no war that year.

Now the Sultan was very angry that both his plots to get possession of Hungary had been such total failures, and he sent for his aunt, who was a witch, to consult her as to what he should do next.

"It is not the king who has answered your questions," observed the aunt, when he had told his story. "He is far too stupid ever to have done that! The person who has found out the puzzle is the son of a poor woman, who, if he lives, will become King of Hungary. Therefore, if you want the crown yourself, you must get him here and kill him."

After this conversation another letter was written to the Court of Hungary, saying that if the youth, now in the palace, was not sent to Turkey within three days, a large army would cross the border. The king's heart was sorrowful as he read, for he was grateful to the lad for what he had done to help him; but the boy only laughed, and bade the king fear nothing, but to search the town instantly for two youths just like each other, and he would paint himself a mask that was just like them. And the sword at his side clanked loudly.

After a long search twin brothers were found, so exactly resembling each other that even their own mother could not tell the difference. The youth painted a mask that was the precise copy of them, and when he had put it on, no one would have known one boy from the other. They set out at once for the Sultan's palace, and when they reached it, they were taken straight into his presence. He made a sign for them to come near; they all bowed low in greeting. He asked them about their journey; they answered his questions all together, and in the same words. If one sat down to supper, the others sat down at the same instant. When one got up, the others got up too, as if there had been only one body between them. The Sultan could not detect any difference between them, and he told his aunt that he would not be so cruel as to kill all three.

"Well, you will see a difference tomorrow," replied the witch, "for one will have a cut on his sleeve. That is the youth you must kill." And one hour before midnight, when witches are invisible, she glided into the room where all three lads were sleeping in the same bed. She took out a pair of scissors and cut a small piece out of the boy's coat-sleeve which was hanging on the wall, and then crept silently from the room. But in the morning the youth saw the slit, and he marked the sleeves of his two companions in the same way, and all three went down to breakfast with the Sultan. The old witch was standing in the window and pretended not to see them; but all witches have eyes in the backs of their heads, and she knew at once that not one sleeve but three were cut, and they were all as alike as before. After breakfast, the Sultan, who was getting tired of the whole affair and wanted to be alone to invent some other plan, told them they might return home. So, bowing low with one accord, they went.

The princess welcomed the boy back joyfully, but the poor youth was not allowed to rest long in peace, for one day a fresh letter arrived from the Sultan, saying that he had discovered that the young man was a very dangerous person, and that he must be sent to Turkey at once, and alone. The girl burst into tears when the boy told her what was in the letter which her father had bade her to carry to him. "Do not weep, love of my heart," said the boy, "all will be well. I will start at sunrise tomorrow."

So next morning at sunrise the youth set forth, and in a few days he reached the Sultan's palace. The old witch was waiting for him at the gate, and whispered as he passed, "This is the last time you will ever enter it." But the sword clanked, and the lad did not even look at her. As he crossed the threshold fifteen armed Turks barred his way, with the Sultan at their head.

Instantly the sword darted forth and cut off the heads of everyone but the Sultan, and then went quietly back to its scabbard. The witch, who was looking on, saw that as long as the youth had possession of the sword, all her schemes would be in vain, and tried to steal the sword in the night, but it only jumped out of its scabbard and sliced off her nose, which was of iron. And in the morning, when the Sultan brought a great army to capture the lad and deprive him of his sword, they were all cut to pieces, while he remained without a scratch.

Meanwhile the princess was in despair because the days slipped by, and the young man did not return, and she never rested until her father let her lead some troops against the Sultan. She rode proudly before them, dressed in uniform; but they had not left the town more than a mile behind them, when they met the lad and his little sword. When he told them what he had done they shouted for joy, and carried him back in triumph to the palace; and the king declared that as the youth had shown himself worthy to become his son-in-law, he should marry the princess and succeed to the throne at once, as he himself was getting old, and the cares of government were too much for him. But the young man said he must first go and see his mother, and the king sent him in state, with a troop of soldiers as his bodyguard.

The old woman was quite frightened at seeing such an array draw up before her little house, and still more surprised when a handsome young man, whom she did not know, dismounted and kissed her hand, saying, "Now, dear mother, you shall hear my secret at last! I dreamed that I should become King of Hungary, and my dream has come true. When I was a child, and you begged me to tell you, I had to keep silence, or the Magyar king would have killed me. And if you had not beaten me nothing would have happened that has happened, and I should not now be King of Hungary."

THE GENIUS

Tradition Bearer: Benedek Elek

Source: Gaster, M. "Székeley Tales." Folklore 4 (1893): 331–339.

Date: ca. 1893

Original Source: Hungarian Székeley

National Origin: Hungarian

---

The Székeley (or Székellers) are among the three most historically prominent ethnic groups of Hungary—along with the Magyars and Saxons. Currently, the largest population of Székellers lives in Transylvania (Romania). Bram Stoker's Dracula, in fact, explicitly claims a Székeley ancestry. "The Genius" is a variant of "The Magic Ring" (AT 560).

---

There was once a king. This king had but one only son; but, the good God alone knows why, he was so furiously angry with him one day that he drove him out of the house to go where he liked—up or down! In vain the queen took his part, in vain she made the whole village weep for the dear child torn from her heart; there was no pardon; the little prince must go away. The prince set out then very sadly; he went strolling on over hill and dale. As he goes, he hears someone, very much out of breath, running behind him, and calling out his name. He turns back, and sees a servant from the court. He has brought him a watch, sent after him by his dear mother. The prince took the watch, put it in his pocket, and then went on.

As he goes along he takes the watch out and opens the case, and then some invisible being, or something, speaks, and says, "What are your commands, my soul, my dear good master?"

The prince was astonished at this, very much so; his astonishment was so great that he did not say a single word, but put the watch back in his pocket.

All at once the road branched off in two directions; the one leading to a huge great wood, the other to a large city. He considered which he should take. It would be well to go into the town and pass the night there, but he had not a single stray kreuzer. He therefore went towards the wood, thinking that he can at least make a fire there, perhaps, too, he will be able to catch a bird, then he will gather strawberries and mushrooms, and have such a supper that the king himself can't do better.

He went into the wood, therefore, and there chose out a great tree, under which he sat down. He takes out his watch to see what o'clock it is, then that invisible being, or something, speaks again, and asks him, "What are your commands, my soul, my dear good master?"

Thus answered the prince, "Well, if you want me to give commands, then make me something to eat, and out of the ground too."

Scarcely had the prince looked round when there before him stood a table spread with all sorts of good dainty dishes. The little prince fell to manfully; then he lay down in the soft grass, and did not get up till the sun shone on his stomach.

He started off again and went strolling on until he came to such a great high mountain that it was impossible to see either the end, or the length, or the top of it. He looked right, he looked left, he looked up, he went round about, this way and that, but he could not find any means of getting over it in any way, it was so lofty and so steep. But he looked and looked about until he found a hole which led into the mountain. He entered this hole, but he had hardly gone the distance of a good gun-shot when he got into such intense darkness that he could not move either backwards or forwards. He puts his hand in his pocket to get a match, and while he was feeling for a match the watch touched his hand, and he took it out.

"What are your commands, my soul, my dear good master?" asked the genius again.

"I command you," said the prince, "to get me some light from somewhere."

As he gave the command, a lighted wax-taper was already in his hand, and by its light he strolled further on. He went deeper and deeper in, until all at once the passage began to widen out. There he found a house. He pushed the door open, and there finds an old dwarf. He greets him in a becoming manner.

"God give you good day, my dear Mr. Father; pray how are you, how does your precious health serve you?"

"Good day," answered the dwarf; "I am well; but who are you, and what sort of business are you upon that you come here, where not even a mouse comes?"

The prince told the story of his sad fate with very bitter lamentations, so that the dwarf's heart was sad for him. He encouraged and comforted him, telling him not to grieve at all, for he will procure him just such a place as the one he has left. Then he told him that beyond the mountain there was a powerful but good-hearted king; he, too, had had an only son, but he had been lost in the wars. Now, if he will go to this king, who will soon be killed by grief, and will say that he is his lost son, the king would grieve no more, and he would not be a world-wanderer. The prince resolved upon this, and the dwarf carefully instructed him what he was to say to the king. "Say that you are called Paul, that you left home seven years ago, and did not write because you were taken prisoner, and kept in such grievous captivity that you were unable either to write a letter or send a message. Then ask this, too, whether the three little sisters whom you left alive at the time of your departure are still living."

The prince thanked him much for his good advice, took leave of the dwarf, and with that set off out of the mountain. When he got out he took out his watch and gave this command to the genius, "Take me to the other side of this mountain, to the king whose only son was lost while soldiering."

"Good, my soul, my dear good master," said the genius, "only shut your eyes."

The prince shut his eyes, and felt that his feet did not touch the ground, and that he was flying as quick as thought. But this did not last long; again his feet touched the ground, and then the genius said, "Now open your eyes!"

The prince opened them and looked round; and then—behold a wonder! He was standing before the gateway of a palace, which was even more splendid than his father's. When he had taken a good look round at the palace and its environs, he pushed the gate open and went at once to the king. He did not trouble himself much, to be sure, but fell upon the king's neck at once, embraced him and kissed him, saying, "My precious dear good father, my illustrious father, my lord, I have not seen you for just seven years, and I began to think I should never see you again in this life!"

The king was amazed and astounded, looked at the boy from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot, before, behind, and every way, but still he could not exactly recognize him as his own dear son. However, he answered all questions in such a way that the king distrusted him no longer, and in his great joy he made such a feast that even the Wallachian parson had wine instead of brandy with his puliszka [porridge and curds], and even the lame began to dance.

All three princesses were living, and the prince thought it would be a good thing to present his "sisters" with some handsome gift. He took out his watch and ordered the genius to bring the three girls three bouquets of golden flowers, such as human eye had never seen. Not an hour had passed, when all three golden bouquets were there. He sent them to the rooms of the three young ladies as secretly as possible, so that one knew nothing about the other.

Well, time waxes and wanes. One evening there was a great ball at the royal palace, and the youngest princess placed the beautiful golden bouquet in her bosom. Then, all at once, there was such a brilliant light that they might just as well have put out the wax candles. The elder princesses did not bring their bouquets, and each thought that their sister had stolen hers. They set upon her to make her give back their flowers.

"I shall certainly not give them up!" said the little princess. "If you have any too, fetch them out; they are sure to be where you put them."

At this both the girls run away, and come back each with a golden bouquet. And then there was such a flood of light that not even the sun could have shone more brightly.

News of this went through the whole land; everyone talked of nothing but the wonderful golden bouquets. The king could not praise his son enough for having thought of his sisters even in his captivity, and for having managed to be so economical as to be able to buy three golden bouquets. But the major-domo shook his head, and said to the king, "Now, my illustrious king, don't be angry, but there is some diablerie in this, and I wager that if your Majesty commands that a golden bridge shall be built from your Majesty's palace to my palace by tomorrow morning, the duke will do this, too."

The king laughed the major-domo to scorn, but the latter persisted, until at last he promised to put his son to the test.

The king had his son up, and told him of his desire. He was an old man, but he liked what was fine, and he thought that, as a person who had seen the world, he would perhaps know some possible way of building a golden bridge.

The prince told him just to wait till the morning, as he could not say anything until then. Then, when they had separated, the prince took out his watch, and told the genius of the king's wish.

"It is no matter, my soul, my dear good master," said the spirit; "the bridge will be there by morning."

And so it was! But it was so beautiful, so glittering, that when the king got up and looked out of window he almost fell backwards in his great astonishment. He had his son called at once, and said to him, "Well, you have done this well, my son; but if you can do so much, then you can do more also. If you don't build a palace of pure, fine gold, seven stories high, by tomorrow morning, and if this palace does not stand upon a slender diamond foot, I will have your head cut off!"

The king thought, however, that his son would not be able to do this, and he was already rejoicing that he would be able to put him to death; for he was afraid that he would send him to hell with his diablerie. The prince himself did not believe that the genius would be able to build such a palace; nevertheless, he told him what the king wanted. Thereupon he went to bed, and in the morning he got up. And pray, was not the seven-storied palace standing before his window! He was almost killed with astonishment; and the king still more. They were obliged to sprinkle him with cold water, he was so faint with intense amazement.

But the king had still not had wonders enough. The next day a courtyard was wanted for the golden palace. When he had this, he wished for a garden, in which all, even to the smallest blade of grass, should be of gold and diamonds. For this he allowed three days.

"Good," thought the prince, "I will do this, too; but if he is not satisfied with this, I will leave him, as St. Paul did the Wallachians."

For he had only stayed till now for the sake of the little princess. But the major-domo proposed to the king that they should go out hunting until the turn came for the garden, and take the duke with them; for he remembered that before the war he was very fond of hunting. They at once determined that they would go hunting. But before they set out, the major-domo told the prince that it would be well for him to leave that beautiful watch of his at home, for it might easily be spoilt in the forest, and then there was no master-workman to mend it here, as there was abroad. The prince took his advice, and left the watch in his room.

But they had scarcely reached the forest when the major-domo, who had watched the prince when he was talking to his watch one night, ran home, climbed up into the prince's room by the window, took the watch out, and opened it. The genius sprang out as usual, but he asked a different question. This is what he asked, "What are your commands, you thief, my robber-master?"

"I command you to take me to a place where even the wind seldom goes, and no one but a mouse ever comes."

In an instant the major-domo was where he wished to be, and the prince's watch with him.

The prince comes home from hunting in the evening, goes straight to his room, and looks for his watch the first thing. He looks for it, but does not find it. He turns over and looks through everything, but in vain: his watch is gone! gone! gone! Oh, the prince is sad! For what is he to do without a watch? There will be an end to his life if he does not suddenly make himself scarce. As quick as thought he ran out of the palace, and went straight ahead.

For seven days and seven nights he went on and on without stopping, he made inquiries in all directions, but did not come upon any trace of the precious treasure. On the eighth day, just at sundown, he reached a little hut. He pushes the door open. And then he finds that the Sun himself lives there, and was just then about to go to bed. He wishes him good-evening properly, and begs pardon for disturbing him so late.

"Pray what is your business, my son?" the Sun asked him.

He tells him that he is looking for such and such a major-domo.

"Oh, my dear son," answered the Sun, "I travel round the world, but only from east to west, and he whom you seek does not go that way, or I should certainly have seen him. But see, not far from here lives the King of the Winds; his sons travel over all parts of the world, he will certainly know about your major-domo."

The prince thanked him for the good advice, wished the Sun a peaceful good-night, and with that he went to the King of the Winds. But he, too, only said that neither he nor his sons had seen any such major-domo, and he must certainly have crept into some place such as the wind itself very seldom wanders into. Perhaps the King of the Mice would be able to direct him. He went to the King of the Mice. The King of the Mice immediately summoned all the mice there were, and inquired whether they had not seen such and such a major-domo.

"Might their eyes fall out if they had seen him," so answered they every one. The prince was just going to turn back very sadly, when there hobbled forward a lame mouse. The King of the Mice asks him, too, whether he had not seen a major-domo.

"Why, to be sure I have seen him," answered the lame mouse; "I have just come from there; but he lives under-ground, in a stone cave, and in such a small hole that even I can scarcely get in."

The prince was delighted, and asked the mouse only to take him to the cave, and they will soon contrive something when they are there. They came to the cave, and there they began to consult what they were to do now.

At last they determined that the mouse should creep into the hole, gnaw through the watch-chain while the major-domo was asleep, and bring the watch out to the prince.

When a good half-hour had passed, the mouse came with the watch; and in return the prince caused the genius to fetch so much corn that the mouse was able to live like a lord upon it all his life. The major-domo they left in the cave, where he neither lived nor died, and whence he would never escape by his own efforts.

The prince now went back to the court of his second father, and they were just then burying him!

The kingdom he had left to his youngest daughter, for she was the cleverest. They had only just buried the king when the two elder girls married two kings' sons, and he asked the youngest. We must say, by the way, he confessed that he was not the princesses' brother, and had only given himself out as the king's son to comfort him, and by advice of the dwarf.

Well, the youngest princess did not need much asking. They quickly took boards, made benches and tables, and held three such wedding-feasts all at once that, maybe, they have not come to an end yet.

THE LAD WHO KNEW EVERYTHING

Tradition Bearer: Benedek Elek

Source: Gaster, M. "Székeley Tales." Folklore 4 (1893): 339–344.

Date: ca. 1893

Original Source: Hungarian Székeley

National Origin: Hungarian

---

In this variant of "The Animal Languages" (AT 670), the gift of animal languages brings wealth and status to a poor youth. Unlike most other versions of the tale, "The Lad Who Knew Everything" takes a tragic turn. Compare this narrative with the more typical comic conclusions of "The Billy Goat and the King" (Volume 2, page 295) and "The King Who Learned the Speech of Animals" (Volume 2, page 301).

---

There was once a poor lad. All the great efforts he made were to no purpose, he could not make anything of them, and he only became more of a beggar every day. The poor lad was much worried and very low-spirited to find that he was always unsuccessful in everything, whatever he attempted, and that he would have to remain a beggar all his life. Really he would not torment himself any more, he would put an end to this miserable life. All that he possessed was a rope, and with this he went into the wood, intending to hang himself.

While he was wandering sadly in the huge wood, he heard a sound of piteous lamentation; he goes towards it, and then he sees a little tiny snake writhing about on the top of a tree-trunk, which was on fire, but it was unable to escape, for it was surrounded by flames and red-hot embers, and it would be killed if it went near them.

“But,” said the poor lad to himself, “I won’t let this unreasoning animal die an innocent death, though I have determined to die myself.” With that he went up to the burning trunk, stretched out a good firm bough, and lifted the little snakelet down on it.

Ha! How profusely the poor little snake thanked him! And it would not leave its life-preserver any peace until he accompanied it to its father’s come, and allowed him also to thank him for his kindness.

“God bless you,” thought the lad, “it will prolong my life a little, at all events.”

For, words are words, but the poor lad was afraid of death. He therefore accompanied the little snakelet to his father’s home. They went slowly on until they reached a large cave. It was here that the young snake’s father lived, and he was the very King of the Snakes himself. Eh! behold a wonder! the King of the Snakes was just as big as a hay-fork, and in his head there shone such a large diamond that the poor lad almost lost the sight of his eyes when he stepped in. There lay the King of the Snakes in the middle of the cave, and when the lad stepped in he fixed his great eyes upon him.

“Well,” thought the lad, “I shall have no need to hang myself, for this snake will gobble me up at once.”

But when the aged king knew that the poor lad had pre-served his son’s life, his countenance changed at once, and he said to the lad, “God bless you, you poor boy, for saving my son’s life. In return I will make you fortunate all your life, and your descendants fortunate too; only I warn you of this, not to tell anyone in the world of my gift, for the very moment you do, your life will come to an end.”

Now the King of the Snakes whispered something in the lad’s ear, and then the poor lad felt at once that from that moment he was not the same person that he had been before. All at once he knew everything, and he knew everything in such sort that he was equally well able to talk to human beings and animals, and he could even understand the humming of the flies besides.

He thanked the King of the Snakes over and over again for his valuable gift, and said, “I thank you, illustrious King of the Snakes, for your invisible gift. I saved your child’s life, and you have saved mine, for I was resolved upon dying a horrible death!”

With that he took his leave, commending the King of the Snakes, with his entire family and all his people, to God, and then set out towards home. He went sauntering on through the wood, and all at once he hears the sparrows twittering in a tree overhead. The oldest sparrow was just then speaking and saying, "Ah! if this poor lad could know what I know, he certainly would not think of putting an end to his life, but he would grow so rich that he would not exchange even with the king."

"You don't say so!" said the other sparrows. "How would it be possible?"

"Why, this way, to be sure," said the other sparrow; "by digging up the pan of gold which is beneath the hollow willow tree, and he would be rich all his life, even if he were to distribute half to the poor."

"Hem," thinks the poor lad to himself, "I will try, anyhow, whether the old sparrow speaks the truth."

He went home, procured a spade and hoe, and in the evening returned to the wood, to the hollow tree. He began to dig, and he dug until his spade clinked against the pan.

Hurrah! he hurriedly seized hold of the pan, and the sweat just dropped from his face while he lifted the pan full of gold out of the hole.

For indeed it was full of gold to the top; the old sparrow had not lied. He took the gold home too that same evening, and the next morning he began at the lower end of the village, and did not stop until he had distributed half among the poor.

He gained great esteem in the village, you may be sure! And then, moreover, when his neighbor's cow fell ill, and he knew from its lowing what was the matter with it, and was able to cure it besides, the whole village and the neighborhood too, for a great distance round, came to him, bringing all their sick animals, and he cured them.

But when he had nothing else to do, he always wandered out in the woods and fields, and listened to what the birds were saying. One day, being very tired with wandering about so much, he sat down on the roots of a tree. While he was lying there idly, a raven overhead spoke and said, "Ah! if the person who is dozing under the tree knew what I know, he would be the king's son-in-law in a week!"

"If he knew what, then?" asked the other ravens.

"Why, this, that the king's daughter has lost her precious gold cross, and now she has bound herself not to marry anyone but the man who shall produce the gold cross, for it is a keepsake from her dear mother. The man who can find it is not yet born into this world. It is in a good place here, in the hollow of the tree. The old king, however, has had a proclamation made throughout the whole kingdom that he will give his daughter and half his kingdom to, whoever produces the gold cross."

The lad laughed to himself, and thought, "You have spoken just at the right time, you chattering raven!"

He waited for them to fly away, and then he climbed up the tree, and actually found the gold cross in the hollow.

He hastened home immediately, but before he went to the king, he had such a palace built for him that there was not its fellow for a distance of seventh-seven lands; then he sent for a tailor, and ordered such a brilliant gunya [short cloak] that he might even have been taken for a duke. When both the palace and his cloak were ready, and he had looked at himself repeatedly from head to foot in the pier-glass to see whether he looked like a gentleman (which he did, of course!), he took the gold cross and set out with it to the king's court. He went straight up into the princess's room, and told a great lie, saying that he had taken the cross away from twelve robbers.

And, the princess was so delighted, she could not think of anything in her great delight. Then, when she had had a good look at the lad, and saw that he was a handsome, knightly-looking youth, she certainly did not take back her word, but said, "Here is my hand, I am yours till death, till my coffin is closed!"

After that there was a wedding, but such a wedding that the whole country rang with it, and it was talked of besides more than seven times seven lands off. The young couple lived happily, only the wife was not pleased at her husband's always wandering in the woods and fields, nor at his constantly forgetting himself even when they went out together, and listening to the songs of all the birds. They often quarreled about this, but then they made peace again.

One day they rode out on horseback into the wood. For a good while they kept close together, but then the mistress's horse lagged a little behind. The master's horse neighed back at it, "I say, you, why are you lagging behind?"

"It is easy for you," answered the mistress's horse. "You have only one to go with besides yourself, and I have three."

On hearing this the master laughed very much.

"What are you laughing at so heartily?" asked his wife.

"That I can't tell you," answered her husband. There was great wrath at this! Her husband was laughing at her! Who could tell what he did not think about her! But she would not leave him any peace until he told her.

"Very well," said her husband, "I will tell you, but, believe me, I shall die that same instant. Do you wish me to die?"

"Don't make game of me!" burst forth the lady. "You won't die just for telling a secret to your wife."

"Well then, I will tell you. If you desire my death, let it be as you wish."

The lady only laughed. She did not believe her husband.

However, he told her from beginning to end his adventure with the snake, and when he had come to the end of his story, that moment he fell from his horse and died suddenly.

Now, indeed, the lady believed that her husband was right, but it was too late. The wonder-working doctor who could raise her husband up was not yet born. She was never comforted, not entirely even when her beautiful little golden-haired son was born, and grew up into just such a gallant lad as his father had been. The one thing she taught her son was to keep any promise once made lest the same thing should happen to him as to his dear father.

So it was, that was the end, it was true. If anyone does not believe it, let him go and see.

THE GRATEFUL BEASTS

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Lang, Andrew. The Yellow Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1894, 64–74.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Hermann R. Kletke

National Origin: Hungary

---

The following ordinary folktale begins with the episode of “The Two Travelers” (AT 613) in which a blinded man learns secrets that allow him to attain wealth and social status. Most of the tale, however, follows the developmental structure of “The Grateful Animals” (AT 544). In repaying their debts of gratitude, the nonhuman characters reveal themselves to have more integrity than the antagonists of the narrative.

---

There was once upon a time a man and woman who had three fine-looking sons, but they were so poor that they had hardly enough food for themselves, let alone their children. So the sons determined to set out into the world and to try their luck. Before starting their mother gave them each a loaf of bread and her blessing, and having taken a tender farewell of her and their father the three set forth on their travels.

The youngest of the three brothers, whose name was Ferko, was a beautiful youth, with a splendid figure, blue eyes, fair hair, and a complexion like milk and roses. His two brothers were as jealous of him as they could be, for they thought that with his good looks he would be sure to be more fortunate than they would ever be.

One day all the three were sitting resting under a tree, for the sun was hot and they were tired of walking. Ferko fell fast asleep, but the other two remained awake, and the eldest said to the second brother, “What do you say to doing our brother Ferko some harm? He is so beautiful that everyone takes a fancy to him, which is more than they do to us. If we could only get him out of the way we might succeed better.”

“I quite agree with you,” answered the second brother, “and my advice is to eat up his loaf of bread, and then to refuse to give him a bit of ours until he has promised to let us put out his eyes or break his legs.”

His eldest brother was delighted with this proposal, and the two wicked wretches seized Ferko’s loaf and ate it all up, while the poor boy was still asleep.

When he did awake he felt very hungry and turned to eat his bread, but his brothers cried out, “You ate your loaf in your sleep, you glutton, and you may starve as long as you like, but you won’t get a scrap of ours.”

Ferko was at a loss to understand how he could have eaten in his sleep, but he said nothing, and fasted all that day and the next night. But on the following morning he was so hungry that he burst into tears, and implored his brothers to give him a little bit of their bread. Then the cruel creatures laughed, and repeated what they had said the day before; but when Ferko continued to beg and beseech them, the eldest said at last, “If you will let us put out one of your eyes and break one of your legs, then we will give you a bit of our bread.”

At these words poor Ferko wept more bitterly than before, and bore the torments of hunger till the sun was high in the heavens; then he could stand it no longer, and he consented to allow his left eye to be put out and his left leg to be broken. When this was done he stretched out his hand eagerly for the piece of bread, but his brothers gave him such a tiny scrap that the starving youth finished it in a moment and besought them for a second bit.

But the more Ferko wept and told his brothers that he was dying of hunger, the more they laughed and scolded him for his greed. So he endured the pangs of starvation all that day, but when night came his endurance gave way, and he let his right eye be put out and his right leg broken for a second piece of bread.

After his brothers had thus successfully maimed and disfigured him for life, they left him groaning on the ground and continued their journey without him.

Poor Ferko ate up the scrap of bread they had left him and wept bitterly, but no one heard him or came to his help. Night came on, and the poor blind youth had no eyes to close, and could only crawl along the ground, not knowing in the least where he was going. But when the sun was once more high in the heavens, Ferko felt the blazing heat scorch him, and sought for some cool shady place to rest his aching limbs. He climbed to the top of a hill and lay down in the grass, and as he thought under the shadow of a big tree. But it was no tree he leant against, but a gallows on which two ravens were seated. The one was saying to the other as the weary youth lay down, “Is there anything the least wonderful or remarkable about this neighborhood?”

“I should just think there was,” replied the other; “many things that don’t exist anywhere else in the world. There is a lake down there below us, and anyone who bathes in it, though he were at death’s door, becomes sound and well on the spot, and those who wash their eyes with the dew on this hill become as sharp-sighted as the eagle, even if they have been blind from their youth.”

“Well,” answered the first raven, “my eyes are in no want of this healing bath, for, Heaven be praised, they are as good as ever they were; but my wing has been very feeble and weak ever since it was shot by an arrow many years ago, so let us fly at once to the lake that I may be restored to health and strength again.” And so they flew away.

Their words rejoiced Ferko’s heart, and he waited impatiently till evening should come and he could rub the precious dew on his sightless eyes.

At last it began to grow dusk, and the sun sank behind the mountains; gradually it became cooler on the hill, and the grass grew wet with dew. Then Ferko buried his face in the ground till his eyes were damp with dewdrops, and in a moment he saw clearer than he had ever done in his life before. The moon was shining brightly, and lighted him to the lake where he could bathe his poor broken legs.

Then Ferko crawled to the edge of the lake and dipped his limbs in the water. No sooner had he done so than his legs felt as sound and strong as they had been before, and Ferko thanked the kind fate that had led him to the hill where he had overheard the ravens’ conversation. He filled a bottle with the healing water, and then continued his journey in the best of spirits. He had not gone far before he met a wolf, who was limping disconsolately along on three legs, and who on perceiving Ferko began to howl dismally.

“My good friend,” said the youth, “be of good cheer, for I can soon heal your leg,” and with these words he poured some of the precious water over the wolf’s paw, and in a minute the animal was springing about sound and well on all fours. The grateful creature thanked his benefactor warmly, and promised Ferko to do him a good turn if he should ever need it. Ferko continued his way till he came to a ploughed field. Here he noticed a little mouse creeping wearily along on its hind paws, for its front paws had both been broken in a trap.

Ferko felt so sorry for the little beast that he spoke to it in the most friendly manner, and washed its small paws with the healing water. In a moment the mouse was sound and whole, and after thanking the kind physician it scampered away over the ploughed furrows.

Ferko again proceeded on his journey, but he hadn’t gone far before a queen bee flew against him, trailing one wing behind her, which had been cruelly torn in two by a big bird. Ferko was no less willing to help her than he had been to help the wolf and the mouse, so he poured some healing drops over the wounded wing. On the spot the queen bee was cured, and turning to Ferko she said, “I am most grateful for your kindness, and shall reward you some day.” And with these words she flew away humming, gaily.

Then Ferko wandered on for many a long day, and at length reached a strange kingdom. Here, he thought to himself, he might as well go straight to the palace and offer his services to the King of the country, for he had heard that the King’s daughter was as beautiful as the day. So he went to the royal palace, and as he entered the door the first people he saw were his two brothers who had so shamefully ill-treated him. They had managed to obtain places in the King's service, and when they recognized Ferko with his eyes and legs sound and well they were frightened to death, for they feared he would tell the King of their conduct, and that they would be hung.

No sooner had Ferko entered the palace than all eyes were turned on the handsome youth, and the King's daughter herself was lost in admiration, for she had never seen anyone so handsome in her life before. His brothers noticed this, and envy and jealousy were added to their fear, so much so that they determined once more to destroy him. They went to the King and told him that Ferko was a wicked magician, who had come to the palace with the intention of carrying off the Princess.

Then the King had Ferko brought before him, and said, "You are accused of being a magician who wishes to rob me of my daughter, and I condemn you to death; but if you can fulfill three tasks which I shall set you to do your life shall be spared, on condition you leave the country; but if you cannot perform what I demand you shall be hung on the nearest tree." And turning to the two wicked brothers he said, "Suggest something for him to do; no matter how difficult, he must succeed in it or die."

They did not think long, but replied, "Let him build your Majesty in one day a more beautiful palace than this, and if he fails in the attempt let him be hung."

The King was pleased with this proposal, and commanded Ferko to set to work on the following day. The two brothers were delighted, for they thought they had now got rid of Ferko forever. The poor youth himself was heart-broken, and cursed the hour he had crossed the boundary of the King's domain. As he was wandering disconsolately about the meadows round the palace, wondering how he could escape being put to death, a little bee flew past, and settling on his shoulder whispered in his ear, "What is troubling you, my kind benefactor? Can I be of any help to you? I am the bee whose wing you healed, and would like to show my gratitude in some way."

Ferko recognized the queen bee, and said, "Alas! how could you help me? For I have been set to do a task which no one in the whole world could do, let him be ever such a genius! Tomorrow I must build a palace more beautiful than the King's, and it must be finished before evening."

"Is that all?" answered the bee, "then you may comfort yourself; for before the sun goes down tomorrow night a palace shall be built unlike any that King has dwelt in before. Just stay here till I come again and tell you that it is finished." Having said this she flew merrily away, and Ferko, reassured by her words, lay down on the grass and slept peacefully till the next morning. Early on the following day the whole town was on its feet, and everyone wondered how and where the stranger would build the wonderful palace. The Princess alone was silent and sorrowful, and had cried all night till her pillow was wet, so much did she take the fate of the beautiful youth to heart.

Ferko spent the whole day in the meadows waiting the return of the bee. And when evening was come the queen bee flew by, and perching on his shoulder she said, "The wonderful palace is ready. Be of good cheer, and lead the King to the hill just outside the city walls." And humming gaily she flew away again.

Ferko went at once to the King and told him the palace was finished. The whole court went out to see the wonder, and their astonishment was great at the sight which met their eyes. A splendid palace reared itself on the hill just outside the walls of the city, made of the most exquisite flowers that ever grew in mortal garden. The roof was all of crimson roses, the windows of lilies, the walls of white carnations, the floors of glowing auriculars and violets, the doors of gorgeous tulips and narcissi with sunflowers for knockers, and all round hyacinths and other sweet-smelling flowers bloomed in masses, so that the air was perfumed far and near and enchanted all who were present.

This splendid palace had been built by the grateful queen bee, who had summoned all the other bees in the kingdom to help her.

The King's amazement knew no bounds, and the Princess's eyes beamed with delight as she turned them from the wonderful building on the delighted Ferko. But the two brothers had grown quite green with envy, and only declared the more that Ferko was nothing but a wicked magician.

The King, although he had been surprised and astonished at the way his commands had been carried out, was very vexed that the stranger should escape with his life, and turning to the two brothers he said, "He has certainly accomplished the first task, with the aid no doubt of his diabolical magic; but what shall we give him to do now? Let us make it as difficult as possible, and if he fails he shall die."

Then the eldest brother replied, "The corn has all been cut, but it has not yet been put into barns; let the knave collect all the grain in the kingdom into one big heap before tomorrow night, and if as much as a stalk of corn is left let him be put to death."

The Princess grew white with terror when she heard these words; but Ferko felt much more cheerful than he had done the first time, and wandered out into the meadows again, wondering how he was to get out of the difficulty. But he could think of no way of escape. The sun sank to rest and night came on, when a little mouse started out of the grass at Ferko's feet, and said to him, "I'm delighted to see you, my kind benefactor; but why are you looking so sad? Can I be of any help to you, and thus repay your great kindness to me?"

Then Ferko recognized the mouse whose front paws he had healed, and replied, "Alas I how can you help me in a matter that is beyond any human power! Before tomorrow night all the grain in the kingdom has to be gathered into one big heap, and if as much as a stalk of corn is wanting I must pay for it with my life."

"Is that all?" answered the mouse; "that needn't distress you much. Just trust in me, and before the sun sets again you shall hear that your task is done." And with these words the little creature scampered away into the fields.

Ferko, who never doubted that the mouse would be as good as its word, lay down comforted on the soft grass and slept soundly till next morning. The day passed slowly, and with the evening came the little mouse and said, "Now there is not a single stalk of corn left in any field; they are all collected in one big heap on the hill out there."

Then Ferko went joyfully to the King and told him that all he demanded had been done. And the whole Court went out to see the wonder, and were no less astonished than they had been the first time. For in a heap higher than the King's palace lay all the grain of the country, and not a single stalk of corn had been left behind in any of the fields. And how had all this been done? The little mouse had summoned every other mouse in the land to its help, and together they had collected all the grain in the kingdom.

The King could not hide his amazement, but at the same time his wrath increased, and he was more ready than ever to believe the two brothers, who kept on repeating that Ferko was nothing more nor less than a wicked magician. Only the beautiful Princess rejoiced over Ferko's success, and looked on him with friendly glances, which the youth returned.

The more the cruel King gazed on the wonder before him, the more angry he became, for he could not, in the face of his promise, put the stranger to death. He turned once more to the two brothers and said, "His diabolical magic has helped him again, but now what third task shall we set him to do? No matter how impossible it is, he must do it or die."

The eldest answered quickly, "Let him drive all the wolves of the kingdom on to this hill before tomorrow night. If he does this he may go free; if not he shall be hung as you have said."

At these words the Princess burst into tears, and when the King saw this he ordered her to be shut up in a high tower and carefully guarded till the dangerous magician should either have left the kingdom or been hung on the nearest tree.

Ferko wandered out into the fields again, and sat down on the stump of a tree wondering what he should do next. Suddenly a big wolf ran up to him, and standing still said, "I'm very glad to see you again, my kind benefactor. What are you thinking about all alone by yourself? If I can help you in any way only say the word, for I would like to give you a proof of my gratitude."

Ferko at once recognized the wolf whose broken leg he had healed, and told him what he had to do the following day if he wished to escape with his life. "But how in the world," he added, "am I to collect all the wolves of the kingdom on to that hill over there?"

"If that's all you want done," answered the wolf, "you needn't worry yourself. I'll undertake the task, and you'll hear from me again before sunset tomorrow. Keep your spirits up." And with these words he trotted quickly away.

Then the youth rejoiced greatly, for now he felt that his life was safe; but he grew very sad when he thought of the beautiful Princess, and that he would never see her again if he left the country. He lay down once more on the grass and soon fell fast asleep.

All the next day he spent wandering about the fields, and toward evening the wolf came running to him in a great hurry and said, "I have collected together all the wolves in the kingdom, and they are waiting for you in the wood. Go quickly to the King, and tell him to go to the hill that he may see the wonder you have done with his own eyes. Then return at once to me and get on my back, and I will help you to drive all the wolves together."

Then Ferko went straight to the palace and told the King that he was ready to perform the third task if he would come to the hill and see it done. Ferko himself returned to the fields, and mounting on the wolf's back he rode to the wood close by.

Quick as lightning the wolf flew round the wood, and in a minute many hundred wolves rose up before him, increasing in number every moment, till they could be counted by thousands. He drove them all before him on to the hill, where the King and his whole Court and Ferko's two brothers were standing. Only the lovely Princess was not present, for she was shut up in her tower weeping bitterly.

The wicked brothers stamped and foamed with rage when they saw the failure of their wicked designs. But the King was overcome by a sudden terror when he saw the enormous pack of wolves approaching nearer and nearer, and calling out to Ferko he said, "Enough, enough, we don't want any more."

But the wolf on whose back Ferko sat, said to its rider, "Go on! go on!" and at the same moment many more wolves ran up the hill, howling horribly and showing their white teeth.

The King in his terror called out, "Stop a moment; I will give you half my kingdom if you will drive all the wolves away." But Ferko pretended not to hear, and drove some more thousands before him, so that everyone quaked with horror and fear.

Then the King raised his voice again and called out, "Stop! you shall have my whole kingdom, if you will only drive these wolves back to the places they came from."

But the wolf kept on encouraging Ferko, and said, "Go on! go on!" So he led the wolves on, till at last they fell on the King and on the wicked brothers, and ate them and the whole Court up in a moment.

Then Ferko went straight to the palace and set the Princess free, and on the same day he married her and was crowned King of the country. And the wolves all went peacefully back to their own homes, and Ferko and his bride lived for many years in peace and happiness together, and were much beloved by great and small in the land.

THE GOLDEN SPINSTER

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Wratislaw, A. H. Sixty Folk-Tales from Exclusively Slavonic Sources. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin and Co., 1890, 82–89.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Collected from oral tradition by K. J. Erben

National Origin: Hungary

---

This tale of a daughter's predicament caused by her mother's false boasting is a variant of "The Name of the Helper" (AT 500). The plot is best known in the form popularized by the Grimms' "Rumpelstiltskin" (Grimm 55).

---

Far away somewhere beyond the Red Sea, there was a certain young lord. When he had grown up in body and mind, he bethought himself that indeed it would not be a bad thing to look round him in the world and seek out a nice wife for himself, and a good mistress for his household. Well, as he determined, so he did. He went out into the world, but could not find such a one as he would have liked.

At last he went somehow into the house of a widow, who had three daughters, all maidens. The two elder were as active as wasps for work, but the youngest, who was named Hanka, was like a leaden bird for everything that wanted doing. When the young lord came to them at spinning time he was astounded. "How is it," thought he, "that Hanka can be sleeping in the chimney-corner, while the other spinsters are hard at work at their tasks?" He said to their mother, "But, old lady, tell me, why don't you make that one, too, take a distaff? She is quite a grown-up girl, and would amuse herself by work."

"Ah! Young sir," replied the mother, "I would allow her to spin with all my heart; I would fill her distaff myself; but what then? She is such a spinster, that by herself she would by morning spin up not only all our spinning materials, but all the thatch from the roof, and that into golden threads; nay, at last she would betake herself to my gray hairs; I am obliged, therefore, to give her a holiday."

"If this be so," said the delighted suitor, "and if it is God's will, you can give her to me to wife. You see, I have a nice establishment—flax, hemp, whole heaps of the finer and commoner kinds of tow; she could spin away to her heart's content." At such language the old woman did not take long for consideration, and Hanka woke from her slumbers. They brought the bridegroom expectant a handsome olive-colored handkerchief out of the clothes-chest, adorned him with periwinkles, and performed the marriage ceremony that very evening. The other spinsters were somewhat mortified at Hanka's good fortune, but finally were content at it, hoping that they, too, would get rings on their fingers, now that the idle hand, as they nicknamed Hanka, had obtained a husband. The next day our young bridegroom ordered his horses to be harnessed, and when all was ready, placed the tearful bride beside him in a handsome carriage, gave his hand to his mother-in-law, called out "Farewell!" to the bride's sisters, and they left the village at a gallop.

For better or worse! Poor Hanka sat by her youthful husband mournful and tearful, just as if the chickens had eaten up all her bread. He talked to her enough, but Hanka was as mute as a fish. "What's the matter with you?" said he. "Don't be frightened. At my house, indeed, there will be no going to sleep for you. I shall give you all that your heart desires. You will have flax, hemp, fine and coarse tow enough for the whole winter, and I have got in a store of apples for spittle."

But our Hanka became more sorrowful the further they went. Thus they arrived in the evening at the young lord's castle, got down from the carriage, and, after supper, the future lady was conducted into a large room, in which, from top to bottom, lay nothing but spinning materials. "Well," said he, "here you have distaff, spindle, and spindle-ring, and rosy apples and a few peas for spittle—spin away! If you spin all this, by morning, into golden threads, we shall be man and wife at once if not, I shall cause you to be put to death without further ado." Thereupon the young lord went out and left the spinster to spin.

When Hanka was left alone, she didn't seat herself under the distaff, for she didn't even know how to twirl the threads, but began sorrowfully to exclaim, "Oh God! God! here I am come out to vile disgrace! Why did not my mother teach me to work and spin like my two sisters? I might then have reposed in peace at home; but, as it is, sinful creature that I am, I must perish miserably."

As she was thus expressing her feelings, the wall suddenly opened, and a little manikin stood before the terrified Hanka, with a red cap on his head and an apron girt round his waist; before him he pushed a little golden hand-cart. "Why have you your eyes so tearful?" inquired he of Hanka. "What has happened to you?"

"As if; sinful soul that I am, I should not weep," said she; "only think, they have ordered me to spin all these spinning materials into golden threads by morning, and if I don't do so, they will have me put to death without any ceremony. Oh God! God! what shall I do, forlorn in this strange world?"

"If that is all," said the manikin, "don't be frightened. I will teach you to spin golden threads cleverly; but only on this condition, that I find you this time next year in this very place. Then, if you do not guess my honorable name, you will become my wife, and I shall convey you away in this cart. But, if you guess it, I shall leave you in peace. But this I tell you: if you choose to hide yourself anywhere this time next year, and if you fly ever so far beneath the sky, I shall find you, and will wring your neck. Well, have you agreed to this?"

It was not, sooth to say, very satisfactory to Hanka; but what could the poor thing do? At length she bethought herself, "Let it be left to God, whether I perish this way or that! I agree." The manikin, on hearing this, made three circuits round her with his golden cart, seated himself under the distaff, and repeating:

Thus, Haniczka, thus!
Thus, Haniczka, thus!
Thus, Haniczka, thus!

taught and instructed her to spin golden threads. After this, as he came, so he departed, and the wall closed up of itself behind him.

Our damsel, from that time forth a real golden spinster, sat under the distaff, and seeing how the spinning materials decreased and the golden threads increased, spun and spun away, and by morning had not only spun up all, but had had a good sleep into the bargain.

In the morning, as soon as the young lord awoke, he dressed himself and went to visit the golden spinster. When he entered the room he was all but blinded by the glitter, and wouldn't even believe his eyes, that it was all gold. But when he had satisfied himself that so it was, he began to embrace the golden spinster, and declared her his true and lawful wife. Thus they lived in the fear of God, and if our young lord had previously loved his Haniczka for the golden spinning, he then loved her a thousand times more for the beautiful son that she in the meantime bore him.

But what? There's no footpath without an end, neither could the joy of our wedded pair endure forever. Day passed after day, till finally the appointed time approached within a span. Now our Hanka began to be more sorrowful from moment to moment; her eyes were as red as if they were baked, and she did nothing but creep like a shadow from room to room. And, indeed, it was a serious thing for a young mother to have to lose all at once her good husband and her beautiful son! Hitherto her poor husband knew nought about anything, and comforted his wife as well as he could; but she would not be comforted. When she bethought herself what a nasty dwarf she was going to obtain instead of her shapely husband, she all but dashed herself against the walls from excessive agony.

At last she managed to overcome herself, and revealed everything to her husband as it had occurred to her on that first night. He became, from horror, as pale as a whitewashed wall, and caused proclamation to be made throughout the whole district that, if anyone knew of such a dwarf, and should make known his real name, he would give him a piece of gold as large as his head.

"Ah! what a windfall such a piece of gold as that would be!" whispered neighbor to neighbor, and they dispersed on all sides, examined all corners, all but looked into the mouse holes, searched and searched as for a needle, but, after all, couldn't find anything out. Nobody knew and nobody had seen the dwarf, and as for his name, no living soul could guess it. Under such circumstances the last day arrived; nothing had been seen or heard of the manikin, and our Hanka, with her boy at her breast, was wringing her hands at the prospect of losing her husband.

Her unhappy husband, whose eyes were almost exhausted from weeping, in order, at any rate, to escape from beholding the agony of his wife, took his gun on his shoulder, fastened his faithful hounds in a leash, and went out hunting. After hunting time—it was about the hour of afternoon luncheon—it began to lighten on all sides and in all directions, rain poured so that it would have been a shame to turn a dog out into the roads, and in this tempest all our young lord's servants sought shelter where they could, and got so lost that he remained with only one on a densely wooded unknown hill, and that as soaked and dripping as a rat. Where were they to seek shelter before the ever-increasing storm? where to dry themselves? where to obtain harbor for the night? The unlucky pair, master and servant, looked round on all sides to see whether they couldn't espy a shepherd's hut or a cattle-shed; but where nothing is, there is nothing.

Finally, when they had almost strained their eyes out of the sockets, they saw where, out of the hole of the side shaft of a mine, puffs of smoke were rolling, as from a limekiln. "Go, lad," said the young lord to the servant, "look whence this smoke issues; there must be people there. Ask them whether they will give us lodging for the night."

The servant went off and returned in a jiffy with the intelligence that neither door, nor shed, nor people were there. "Fie, you're only a duffer!" said the lord to his servant with chattering teeth. "I'll go myself; you, for a punishment, shall drip and freeze." Well, the noble lord took the job in hand, but neither could he espy anything, save that in one place smoke kept continually issuing out of the side shaft.

At last in disgust he said, "Whatever devil on devil may bring, know I must whence all this smoke comes." So he went to the hole itself, knelt beside it and peeped in. As he was thus peeping, he espied, somewhere under ground, where food was cooking in a kitchen, and covers were laid for two on a stone table. Round this table ran a little manikin in a red cap with a golden hand-cart before him, and from time to time, after making the circuit, he sang:

I've manufactured a golden spinster for the young lord,
 She will try to guess my name tonight;
 If she guesses my name aright, I shall leave her;
 If she guesses it not, I shall take her:
 My name is Martynko Klyngas.

And again he ran like mad round the table and shouted:

I'm preparing nine dishes for supper,
 I'll place her in a silken bed;

If she guesses my name aright, I shall leave her;
If she guesses it not, I shall take her:
My name is Martynko Klyngas.

The young lord wanted nothing more; he ran as fast as his legs could carry him to his servant, and, as it now cleared up a little, they were fortunate enough to find a path, by which they hastened home.

He found his wife at home in agony, in misery, streaming with tears; for she thought she would not be able even to take leave of her husband, as he was so long away. "Don't afflict yourself, my wife," were the young lord's first words when he entered the room. "I know what you require; his name is Martynko Klyngas." And then he, without delay, recounted to her everything, where he had gone and what had happened to him.

Hanka could scarcely keep on her feet for joy, embraced and kissed her husband, and betook herself joyfully into the room, in which she had spent the first night, to finish spinning the golden threads. At midnight the wall opened, and the manikin with the red cap came in, as he had done that time last year, and running round her with the golden cart shouted with the utmost power of his lungs:

If you guess my name, I leave you;
If you guess it not, I take you;
Only guess, guess away!

"I'll have a try to guess," said Hanka; "your name is Martynko Klyngas." As soon as she had uttered this, the little dwarf seized his cart, threw his cap on the ground, and departed as he had come; the wall closed, and Hanka breathed in peace.

From that time forth she spun no more gold, and, indeed, neither was it necessary for her so to do, for they were rich enough. She and her husband lived happily together, their boy grew like a young tree by the water's side; and they bought a cow, and on the cow a bell, and here's an end to the tale I tell.

THE GLASS AXE

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Lang, Andrew. The Yellow Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1894, 141–148.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Hermann R. Kletke

National Origin: Hungary

---

“The Glass Axe” draws on the basic plot structure of “The Girl as Helper of the Hero in His Flight” (AT 313A). In the classic versions of this tale type, the hero has been promised to an evil supernatural figure in return for the latter’s assistance. In this variant, however, there is the implication that the Queen’s pregnancy resulted from some such bargain, but this is never overtly stated.

---

There was once upon a time a King and Queen who had everything they could possibly wish for in this world except a child. At last, after twelve years, the Queen gave birth to a son; but she did not live long to enjoy her happiness, for on the following day she died. But before her death she called her husband to her and said, “Never let the child put his feet on the ground, for as soon as he does so he will fall into the power of a wicked Fairy, who will do him much harm.” And these were the last words the poor Queen spoke.

The boy thrived and grew big, and when he was too heavy for his nurse to carry, a chair was made for him on little wheels, in which he could wander through the palace gardens without help; at other times he was carried about on a litter, and he was always carefully watched and guarded for fear he should at any time put his feet to the ground.

But as this sort of life was bad for his health, the doctors ordered him horse exercise, and he soon became a first-rate rider, and used to go out for long excursions on horseback, accompanied always by his father’s stud-groom and a numerous retinue.

Every day he rode through the neighboring fields and woods, and always returned home in the evening safe and well. In this way many years passed, and the Prince grew to manhood, and hardly anyone remembered the Queen’s warning, though precautions were still taken, more from use and wont than for any other reason.

One day the Prince and his suite went out for a ride in a wood where his father sometimes held a hunt. Their way led through a stream whose banks were overgrown with thick brushwood. Just as the horsemen were about to ford the river, a hare, startled by the sound of the horses’ hoofs, started up from the grass and ran towards the thicket. The young Prince pursued the little creature, and had almost overtaken it, when the girth of his saddle suddenly broke in two and he fell heavily to the ground. No sooner had his foot touched the earth than he disappeared before the eyes of the horrified courtiers.

They sought for him far and near, but all in vain, and they were forced to recognize the power of the evil Fairy, against which the Queen had warned them on her death-bed. The old King was much grieved when they brought him the news of his son’s disappearance, but as he could do nothing to free him from his fate, he gave himself up to an old age of grief and loneliness, cherishing at the same time the hope that some lucky chance might one day deliver the youth out of the hands of his enemy.

Hardly had the Prince touched the ground than he felt himself violently seized by an unseen power, and hurried away he knew not whither. A whole new world stretched out before him, quite unlike the one he had left. A splendid castle surrounded by a huge lake was the abode of the Fairy, and the only approach to it was over a bridge of clouds. On the other side of the lake high mountains rose up, and dark woods stretched along the banks; over all hung a thick mist, and deep silence reigned everywhere.

No sooner had the Fairy reached her own domain than she made herself visible, and turning to the Prince she told him that unless he obeyed all her commands down to the minutest detail he would be severely punished. Then she gave him an axe made of glass, and bade him cross the bridge of clouds and go into the wood beyond and cut down all the trees there before sunset. At the same time she cautioned him with many angry words against speaking to a black girl he would most likely meet in the wood.

The Prince listened to her words meekly, and when she had finished took up the glass axe and set out for the forest. At every step he seemed to sink into the clouds, but fear gave wings to his feet, and he crossed the lake in safety and set to work at once.

But no sooner had he struck the first blow with his axe than it broke into a thousand pieces against the tree. The poor youth was so terrified he did not know what to do, for he was in mortal dread of the punishment the wicked old Fairy would inflict on him. He wandered to and fro in the wood, not knowing where he was going, and at last, worn out by fatigue and misery, he sank on the ground and fell fast asleep.

He did not know how long he had slept when a sudden sound awoke him, and opening his eyes he saw a black girl standing beside him. Mindful of the Fairy's warning he did not dare to address her, but she on her part greeted him in the most friendly manner, and asked him at once if he were under the power of the wicked Fairy. The Prince nodded his head silently in answer.

Then the black girl told him that she too was in the power of the Fairy, who had doomed her to wander about in her present guise until some youth should take pity on her and bear her in safety to the other side of the river which they saw in the distance, and on the other side of which the Fairy's domain and power ended.

The girl's words so inspired the Prince with confidence that he told her all his tale of woe, and ended up by asking her advice as to how he was to escape the punishment the Fairy would be sure to inflict on him when she discovered that he had not cut down the trees in the wood and that he had broken her axe.

"You must know," answered the black girl, "that the Fairy in whose power we both are is my own mother, but you must not betray this secret, for it would cost me my life. If you will only promise to try and free me I will stand by you, and will accomplish for you all the tasks which my mother sets you.”

The Prince promised joyfully all she asked; then having once more warned him not to betray her confidence, she handed him a draught to drink which very soon sunk his senses in a deep slumber.

His astonishment was great when he awoke to find the glass axe whole and unbroken at his side, and all the trees of the wood lying felled around him!

He made all haste across the bridge of clouds, and told the Fairy that her commands were obeyed. She was much amazed when she heard that all the wood was cut down, and saw the axe unbroken in his hand, and since she could not believe that he had done all this by himself, she questioned him narrowly if he had seen or spoken to the black girl. But the Prince lied manfully, and swore he had never looked up from his work for a moment. Seeing she could get nothing more out of him, she gave him a little bread and water, and showing him to a small dark cupboard she told him he might sleep there.

Morning had hardly dawned when the Fairy awoke the Prince, and giving him the glass axe again she told him to cut up all the wood he had felled the day before, and to put it in bundles ready for firewood; at the same time she warned him once more against approaching or speaking a word to the black girl if he met her in the wood.

Although his task was no easier than that of the day before, the youth set out much more cheerfully, because he knew he could count on the help of the black girl. With quicker and lighter step he crossed the bridge of clouds, and hardly had he reached the other side than his friend stood before him and greeted him cheerfully.

When she heard what the Fairy demanded this time, she answered smilingly, “Never fear,” and handed him another draught, which very soon caused the Prince to sink into a deep sleep.

When he awoke everything was done. All the trees of the wood were cut up into firewood and arranged in bundles ready for use.

He returned to the castle as quickly as he could, and told the Fairy that her commands were obeyed. She was even more amazed than she had been before, and asked him again if he had either seen or spoken to the black girl; but the Prince knew better than to betray his word, and once more lied freely.

On the following day the Fairy set him a third task to do, even harder than the other two. She told him he must build a castle on the other side of the lake, made of nothing but gold, silver, and precious stones, and unless he could accomplish this within an hour, the most frightful doom awaited him.

The Prince heard her words without anxiety, so entirely did he rely on the help of his black friend. Full of hope he hurried across the bridge, and recognized at once the spot where the castle was to stand, for spades, hammers, axes, and every other building implement lay scattered on the ground ready for the workman’s hand, but of gold, silver, and precious stones there was not a sign.

But before the Prince had time to feel despondent the black girl beckoned to him in the distance from behind a rock, where she had hidden herself for fear her mother should catch sight of her. Full of joy the youth hurried towards her, and begged her aid and counsel in the new piece of work he had been given to do.

But this time the Fairy had watched the Prince's movements from her window, and she saw him hiding himself behind the rock with her daughter. She uttered a piercing shriek so that the mountains re-echoed with the sound of it, and the terrified pair had hardly dared to look out from their hiding-place when the enraged woman, with her dress and hair flying in the wind, hurried over the bridge of clouds.

The Prince at once gave himself up for lost, but the girl told him to be of good courage and to follow her as quickly as he could. But before they left their shelter she broke off a little bit of the rock, spoke some magic words over it, and threw it in the direction her mother was coming from. In a moment a glittering palace arose before the eyes of the Fairy which blinded her with its dazzling splendor, and with its many doors and passages prevented her for some time from finding her way out of it.

In the meantime the black girl hurried on with the Prince, hastening to reach the river, where once on the other side they would forever be out of the wicked Fairy's power. But before they had accomplished half the way they heard again the rustle of her garments and her muttered curses pursuing them closely.

The Prince was terrified; he dared not look back, and he felt his strength giving way. But before he had time to despair the girl uttered some more magic words, and immediately she herself was changed into a pond, and the Prince into a duck swimming on its surface.

When the Fairy saw this her rage knew no bounds, and she used all her magic wits to make the pond disappear; she caused a hill of sand to arise at her feet, meaning it to dry up the water at once. But the sand hill only drove the pond a little farther away, and its waters seemed to increase instead of diminishing. When the old woman saw that the powers of her magic were of so little avail, she had recourse to cunning. She threw a lot of gold nuts into the pond, hoping in this way to catch the duck, but all her efforts were fruitless, for the little creature refused to let itself be caught.

Then a new idea struck the wicked old woman, and hiding herself behind the rock which had sheltered the fugitives, she waited behind it, watching carefully for the moment when the Prince and her daughter should resume their natural forms and continue their journey. She had not to wait long, for as soon as the girl thought her mother was safely out of the way, she changed herself and the Prince once more into their human shape, and set out cheerfully for the river.

But they had not gone many steps when the wicked Fairy hurried after them, a drawn dagger in her hand, and was close upon them, when suddenly, instead of the Prince and her daughter, she found herself in front of a great stone church, whose entrance was carefully guarded by a huge monk.

Breathless with rage and passion, she tried to plunge her dagger into the monk's heart, but it fell shattered in pieces at her feet. In her desperation she determined to pull down the church, and thus to destroy her two victims forever. She stamped three times on the ground, and the earth trembled, and both the church and the monk began to shake. As soon as the Fairy saw this she retreated to some distance from the building, so as not to be hurt herself by its fall. But once more her scheme was doomed to failure, for hardly had she gone a yard from the church than both it and the monk disappeared, and she found herself in a wood black as night, and full of wolves and bears and wild animals of all sorts and descriptions.

Then her wrath gave place to terror, for she feared every moment to be torn in pieces by the beasts who one and all seemed to defy her power. She thought it wisest to make her way as best she could out of the forest, and then to pursue the fugitives once more and accomplish their destruction either by force or cunning.

In the meantime the Prince and the black girl had again assumed their natural forms, and were hurrying on as fast as they could to reach the river. But when they got there they found that there was no way in which they could cross it, and the girl's magic art seemed no longer to have any power. Then turning to the Prince she said, "The hour for my deliverance has not yet come, but as you promised to do all you could to free me, you must do exactly as I bid you now. Take this bow and arrow and kill every beast you see with them, and be sure you spare no living creature."

With these words she disappeared, and hardly had she done so than a huge wild boar started out of the thicket near and made straight for the Prince. But the youth did not lose his presence of mind, and drawing his bow he pierced the beast with his arrow right through the skull. The creature fell heavily on the ground, and out of its side sprang a little hare, which ran like the wind along the river bank. The Prince drew his bow once more, and the hare lay dead at his feet; but at the same moment a dove rose up in the air, and circled round the Prince's head in the most confiding manner. But mindful of the black girl's commands, he dared not spare the little creature's life, and taking another arrow from his quiver he laid it as dead as the boar and the hare. But when he went to look at the body of the bird he found instead of the dove a round white egg lying on the ground.

While he was gazing on it and wondering what it could mean, he heard the sweeping of wings above him, and looking up he saw a huge vulture with open claws swooping down upon him. In a moment he seized the egg and flung it at the bird with all his might, and lo and behold! instead of the ugly monster the most beautiful girl he had ever seen stood before the astonished eyes of the Prince.

But while all this was going on the wicked old Fairy had managed to make her way out of the wood, and was now using the last resource in her power to overtake her daughter and the Prince. As soon as she was in the open again she mounted her chariot, which was drawn by a fiery dragon, and flew through the air in it. But just as she got to the river she saw the two lovers in each other's arms swimming through the water as easily as two fishes.

Quick as lightning, and forgetful of every danger, she flew down upon them. But the waters seized her chariot and sunk it in the lowest depths, and the waves bore the wicked old woman down the stream till she was caught in some thorn bushes, where she made a good meal for all the little fishes that were swimming about.

And so at last the Prince and his lovely Bride were free. They hurried as quickly as they could to the old King, who received them with joy and gladness. On the following day a most gorgeous wedding feast was held, and as far as we know the Prince and his bride lived happily forever afterwards.

THE THREE LEMONS

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Wratislaw, A. H. Sixty Folk-Tales from Exclusively Slavonic Sources. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin and Co., 1890, 82–89.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Unavailable

National Origin: Hungary

---

This variant of the ordinary folktale “The Three Oranges” (AT 408) incorporates witches and giant ogres as helpers to the protagonist rather than giving them their usual malevolent roles. In most of its particulars, however, the narrative follows the plot of the quest for the “Orange Princess.” The stock character of the gypsy alludes to the historical prejudice against the Roma. See pages 163–177 for examples of three Roma folktales.

---

There was once upon a time an old king who had an only son. This son he one day summoned before him, and spoke to him thus, “My son, you see that my head has become white; ere long I shall close my eyes, and I do not yet know in what condition I shall leave you. Take a wife, my son! Let me bless you in good time, before I close my eyes.” The son made no reply, but became lost in thought; he would gladly with all his heart have fulfilled his father's wish, but there was no damsel in whom his heart could take delight.

Once upon a time, when he was sitting in the garden, and just considering what to do, all of a sudden an old woman appeared before him—where she came, there she came.

“Go to the glass hill, pluck the three lemons, and you will have a wife in whom your heart will take delight,” said she, and as she had appeared so she disappeared. Like a bright flash did these words dart through the prince’s soul. At that moment he determined, come what might, to seek the glass hill and pluck the three lemons. He made known his determination to his father, and his father gave him for the journey a horse, arms and armor, and his fatherly blessing.

Through forest-covered mountains, through desert plains, went our prince on his pilgrimage, for a very, very great distance; but there was nothing to be seen, nothing to be heard of the glass hill and the three lemons.

Once, quite wearied out with his long journey, he threw himself down under the cool shade of a broad lime tree. As he threw himself down, his father’s sword, which he wore at his side, clanged against the ground, and a dozen ravens began croaking at the top of the tree. Frightened by the clang of the sword, they rose on their wings, and flew into the air above the lofty tree. “Hem! till now I haven’t seen a living creature for a long while,” said the prince to himself, springing from the ground. “I will go in the direction in which the ravens have flown maybe some hope will disclose itself to me.”

He went on—he went on anew for three whole days and three nights, till at last a lofty castle displayed itself to him at a distance. “Praise be to God! I shall now at any rate come to human beings,” cried he, and proceeded further.

The castle was of pure lead; round it flew the twelve ravens, and in front of it stood an old woman—it was Jezibaba [a forest witch]—leaning on a long leaden staff. “Ah, my son! whither have you come? Here there is neither bird nor insect to be seen, much less a human being,” said Jezibaba to the prince. “Flee, if life is dear to you; for, if my son comes, he will devour you.”

“Ah! Not so, old mother, not so!” entreated the prince. “I have come to you for counsel as to whether you cannot let me have some information about the glass hill and the three lemons.”

“I have never heard of the glass hill; but stay! When my son comes home, maybe he will be able to let you have the information. But I will now conceal you somewhat; you will hide yourself under the besom [broom], and wait there concealed till I call you.”

The mountains echoed, the castle quaked, and Jezibaba whispered to the prince that her son was coming. “Foh! Foh! There is a smell of human flesh; I am going to eat it!” shouted Jezibaba’s son, while still in the doorway, and thumped on the ground with a huge leaden club, so that the whole castle quaked.

“Ah, not so, my son, not so!” said Jezibaba, soothing him. “There has come a handsome youth who wants to consult you about something.”

“Well, if he wants to consult me, let him come here.”

“Yes, indeed, my son, he shall come, but only on condition that you promise to do nothing to him.”

“Well, I’ll do nothing to him, only let him come.”

The prince was trembling like an aspen under the besom, for he saw before him through the twigs an ogre, up to whose knees he didn’t reach. Happily his life was safe-guarded, when Jezibaba bade him come out from under the besom. “Well, you beetle, why are you afraid?” shouted the giant. “Whence are you? What do you want?”

“What do I want?” replied the prince. “I’ve long been wandering in these mountains, and can’t find that which I am seeking. Now I’ve come to ask you whether you can’t give me information about the glass hill and the three lemons.”

Jezibaba’s son wrinkled his brow, but, after a while, said in a somewhat gentler voice, “There’s nothing to be seen here of the glass hill; but go to my brother in the silver castle, maybe he’ll be able to tell you something. But stay, I won’t let you go away hungry. Mother, here with the dumplings!” Old Jezibaba set a large dish upon the table, and her gigantic son sat down to it.

“Come and eat!” shouted he to the prince.

The prince took the first dumpling and began to eat, but two of his teeth broke, for they were dumplings of lead.

“Well, why don’t you eat? Maybe you don’t like them?” inquired Jezibaba’s son. “Yes, they are good; but I don’t want any just now.”

“Well, if you don’t want any just now, pocket some, and go your way.”

The good prince was obliged to put some of the leaden dumplings into his pocket. He then took leave and proceeded further.

On he went and on he went for three whole days and three nights, and the further he went, the deeper he wandered into a thickly wooded and gloomy range of mountains. Before him it was desolate, behind him it was desolate; there wasn’t a single living creature to be seen. All wearied from his long journey, he threw himself on the ground. The clang of his silver-mounted sword spread far and wide. Above him four and twenty ravens, frightened by the clash of his sword, began to croak, and, rising on their wings, flew into the air. “A good sign!” cried the prince. “I will go in the direction in which the birds have flown.”

And on he went in that direction, on he went as fast as his feet could carry him, till all at once a lofty castle displayed itself to him! He was still far from the castle, and already its walls were glistening in his eyes, for the castle was of pure silver. In front of the castle stood an old woman bent with age, leaning on a long silver staff, and this was Jezibaba. “Ah, my son! How is it that you have come here? Here there is neither bird nor insect, much less a human being!” cried Jezibaba to the prince; “if life is dear to you, flee away, for if my son comes, he will devour you!”

“Nay, old mother, he will hardly eat me. I bring him a greeting from his brother in the leaden castle.”

“Well, if you bring a greeting from the leaden castle, then come into the parlor, my son, and tell me what you are seeking.”

“What I am seeking, old mother? For ever so long a time I’ve been seeking the glass hill and the three lemons, and cannot find them; now I’ve come to inquire whether you can’t give me information about them.”

“I know nothing about the glass hill; but stay! when my son comes, maybe he will be able to give you the information. Hide yourself under the bed, and don’t make yourself known unless I call you.”

The mountains echoed with a mighty voice, the castle quaked, and the prince knew that Jezibaba’s son was coming home. “Foh! Foh! There’s a smell of human flesh; I’m going to eat it!” roared a horrible ogre already in the door-way, and thumped upon the ground with a silver club, so that the whole castle quaked.

“Ah! not so, my son, not so; but a handsome youth has come and has brought you a greeting from your brother in the leaden castle.”

“Well, if he’s been at my brother’s, and if he has done nothing to him, let him have no fear of me either; let him come out.” The prince sprang out from under the bed, and went up to him, looking beside him as if he had placed himself under a very tall pine. “Well, beetle, have you been at my brother’s?”

“Indeed, I have; and here I’ve still the dumplings, which he gave me for the journey.”

“Well, I believe you; now tell me what it is you want.”

“What I want? I am come to ask you whether you can’t give me information about the glass hill or the three lemons.”

“Hem! I’ve heard formerly about it, but I don’t know how to direct you. Meanwhile, do you know what? Go to my brother in the golden castle, he will direct you. But stay, I won’t let you go away hungry. Mother, here with the dumplings!” Jezibaba brought the dumplings on a large silver dish, and set them on the table. “Eat!” shouted her son.

The prince, seeing that they were silver dumplings, said that he didn’t want to eat just then, but would take some for his journey, if he would give him them.

“Take as many as you like, and greet my brother and aunt.” The prince took the dumplings, thanked him courteously, and proceeded further.

Three days had already passed since he quitted the silver castle, wandering continuously through densely wooded mountains, not knowing which way to go, whether to the right hand or to the left. All wearied out, he threw himself down under a wide-spreading beech, to take a little breath. His silver-mounted sword clanged on the ground, and the sound spread far and wide. “Krr, krr, krr!” croaked a flock of ravens over the traveler, scared by the clash of his sword, and flew into the air. “Praise be to God! the golden castle won’t be far off now,” cried the prince, and proceeded, encouraged, onwards in the direction in which the ravens showed him the road.

Scarcely had he come out of the valley on to a small hill, when he saw a beautiful and wide meadow, and in the midst of the meadow stood a golden castle, just as if he were gazing at the sun; and before the gate of the castle stood an old bent Jezibaba, leaning on a golden staff “Ah! my son! what do you seek for here?” cried she to the prince. “Here there is neither bird nor insect to be seen, much less a human being! If your life is dear to you, flee, for if my son comes, he will devour you!”

“Nay, old mother, he’ll hardly eat me,” replied he. “I bring him a greeting from his brother in the silver castle.”

“Well, if you bring him a greeting from the silver castle, come into the parlor and tell me what has brought you to us.”

“What has brought me to you, old mother? I have long been wandering in this mountain range, and haven’t been able to find out where are the glass hill and the three lemons. I was directed to you, because haply you might be able to give me information about it.”

“Where is the glass hill? I cannot tell you that; but stay! When my son comes, he will counsel you which way you must go, and what you must do. Hide yourself under the table, and stay there till I call you.”

The mountains echoed, the castle quaked, and Jezibaba’s son stepped into the parlor. “Fob! Foh! There’s a smell of human flesh; I’m going to eat it!” shouted he, while still in the doorway, and thumped with a golden club upon the ground, so that the whole castle quaked.

“Gently, my son, gently!” said Jezibaba, soothing him; “there is a handsome youth come, who brings you a greeting from your brother in the silver castle. If you will do nothing to him, I will call him at once.”

“Well, if my brother has done nothing to him, neither will I do anything to him.” The prince came out from under the table and placed himself beside him, looking, in comparison, as if he had placed himself beside a lofty tower, and showed him the silver dumplings in token that he had really been at the silver castle. “Well, tell me, you beetle, what you want!” shouted the monstrous ogre; “if I can counsel you, counsel you I will; don’t fear!” Then the prince explained to him the aim of his long journey, and begged him to advise him which way to go to the glass hill, and what he must do to obtain the three lemons. “Do you see that black knoll that looms yonder?” said he, pointing with his golden club; “that is the glass hill; on the top of the hill stands a tree, and on the tree hang three lemons, whose scent spreads seven miles round. You will go up the glass hill, kneel under the tree, and hold up your hands; if the lemons are destined for you, they will fall off into your hands of themselves; but, if they are not destined for you, you will not pluck them, whatever you do. When you are on your return, and are hungry or thirsty, cut one of the lemons into halves, and you will eat and drink your fill. And now go, and God be with you! But stay, I won’t let you go hungry. Mother, here with the dumplings!” Jezibaba set a large golden dish on the table. “Eat!” said her son to the prince, “or, if you don’t want to do so now, put some into your pocket; you will eat them on the road.” The prince had no desire to eat, but put some into his pocket, saying that he would eat them on the road. He then thanked him courteously for his hospitality and counsel, and proceeded further.

Swiftly he paced from hill into dale, from dale on to a fresh hill, and never stopped till he was beneath the glass hill itself. There he stopped, as if turned to a stone. The hill was high and smooth; there wasn't a single crack in it. On the top spread the branches of a wondrous tree, and on the tree swung three lemons, whose scent was so powerful that the prince almost fainted. s God help me! Now, as it shall be, so it will be. Now that I'm once here, I will at any rate make the attempt," thought he to himself; and began to climb up the smooth glass; but scarcely had he ascended a few fathoms when his foot slipped, and he himself, pop! down the hill, so that he didn't know where he was, or what he was, till he found himself on the ground at the bottom.

Wearied out, he began to throw away the dumplings, thinking that their weight was a hindrance to him. He threw away the first, and lo! the dumpling fixed itself on the glass hill. He threw a second and a third, and saw before him three steps, on which he could stand with safety.

The prince was overjoyed. He kept throwing the dumplings before him, and in every case steps formed themselves from them for him. First he threw the leaden ones, then the silver, and then the golden ones. By the steps thus constructed he ascended higher and higher till he happily attained the topmost ridge of the glass hill. Here he knelt down under the tree and held up his hands. And lo! The three beautiful lemons flew down of themselves into the palms of his hands. The tree disappeared, the glass hill crashed and vanished, and when the prince came to himself, there was no tree, no hill, but a wide plain lay extended before him.

He commenced his return homeward with delight. He neither ate nor drank, nor saw nor heard, for very joy. But when the third day came, a vacuum began to make itself felt in his stomach. He was so hungry that he would gladly have then and there betaken himself to the leaden dumplings if his pocket hadn't been empty. His pocket was empty, and all around was just as bare as the palm of his hand. Then he took a lemon out of his pocket and cut it into halves; and what came to pass? Out of the lemon sprang a beautiful damsel, who made a reverence before him, and cried out, "Have you made ready for me to eat? Have you made ready for me to drink? Have you made pretty dresses ready for me?"

"I have nothing, beautiful creature, for you to eat, nothing for you to drink, nothing for you to put on," said the prince, in a sorrowful voice, and the beautiful damsel clapped her white hands thrice before him, made a reverence and vanished.

"Aha! now I know what sort of lemons these are," said the prince; "stay! I won't cut them up so lightly." From the cut one he ate and drank to his satisfaction, and thus refreshed, proceeded onwards.

But on the third day a hunger three times worse than the preceding, assailed him. "God help me!" said he; "I have still one remaining over. I'll cut it up."

He then took out the second lemon, cut it in halves, and lo! a damsel still more beautiful than the preceding one placed herself before him. "Have you made ready for me to eat? Have you made ready for me to drink? Have you made pretty dresses ready for me?"

"I have not, dear soul! I have not!" and the beautiful damsel clapped her hands thrice before him, made a reverence, and vanished.

Now he had only one lemon remaining; he took it in his hand and said, "I will not cut you open save in my father's house," and therewith proceeded onwards. On the third day he saw, after long absence, his native town. He didn't know himself how he got there, when he found himself at once in his father's castle. Tears of joy bedewed his old father's cheeks, "Welcome, my son! Welcome a hundred times," he cried, and fell upon his neck. The prince related how it had gone with him on his journey, and the members of the household how anxiously they had waited for him.

On the next day a grand entertainment was prepared; lords and ladies were invited from all quarters; and beautiful dresses, embroidered with gold and studded with pearls were got ready. The lords and ladies assembled, took their seats at the tables, and waited expectantly to see what would happen. Then the prince took out the last lemon, cut it in halves, and out of the lemon sprang a lady thrice as beautiful as had been the preceding ones. "Have you made ready for me to eat? Have you made ready for me to drink? Have you got pretty dresses ready for me?"

"I have, my dear soul, got everything ready for you," answered the prince, and presented the handsome dresses to her. The beautiful damsel put on the beautiful clothes, and all rejoiced at her extraordinary beauty. Ere long the betrothal took place, and after the betrothal a magnificent wedding.

Now was fulfilled the old king's wish; he blessed his son, resigned the kingdom into his hands, and ere long died.

The first thing that occurred to the new king after his father's death was a war, which a neighboring king excited against him. Now he was constrained for the first time to part from his hard-earned wife. Lest, therefore, anything should happen to her in his absence, he caused a throne to be erected for her in a garden beside a lake, which no one could ascend, save the person to whom she let down a silken cord, and drew that person up to her.

Not far from the royal castle lived an old woman, the same that had given the prince the counsel about the three lemons. She had a servant, a gipsy, whom she was in the habit of sending to the lake for water. She knew very well that the young king had obtained a wife, and it annoyed her excessively that he had not invited her to the wedding, nay, had not even thanked her for her good advice.

One day she sent her maidservant to the lake for water. She went, drew water, and saw a beautiful image in the water. Under the impression that this was her own reflection, she banged her pitcher on the ground, so that it flew into a thousand pieces. "Are you worthy," said she, "that so beautiful a person as myself should carry water for an old witch like you?" As she uttered this she looked up, and lo! It wasn't her own reflection that she saw in the water, but that of the beautiful queen. Ashamed, she picked up the pieces and returned home.

The old woman, who knew beforehand what had occurred, went out to meet her with a fresh pitcher, and asked her servant, for appearance's sake, what had happened to her. The servant related all as it had occurred. "Well, that's nothing!" said the old woman. "But, do you know what? Go you once more to the lake, and ask the lady to let down the silken cord and draw you up, promising to comb and dress her hair. If she draws you up, you will comb her hair, and when she falls asleep, stick this pin into her head. Then dress yourself in her clothes and sit there as queen."

It wasn't necessary to use much persuasion to the gipsy; she took the pin, took the pitcher, and returned to the lake. She drew water and looked at the beautiful queen. "Dear me! How beautiful you are! Ah! you are beautiful!" she screamed, and looked with coaxing gestures into her eyes. "Yes," said she; "but you would be a hundred times more beautiful if you would let me comb and dress your hair; in truth, I would so twine those golden locks that your lord could not help being delighted." And thus she jabbered, thus she coaxed, till the queen let down the silken cord and drew her up.

The nasty gipsy combed, separated, and plaited the golden hair till the beautiful queen fell sound asleep. Then the gipsy drew out the pin, and stuck it into the sleeping queen's head. At that moment a beautiful white dove flew off the golden throne, and not a vestige remained of the lovely queen save her handsome clothes, in which the gipsy speedily dressed herself, took her seat in the place where the queen sat before, and gazed into the lake; but the beautiful reflection displayed itself no more in the lake, for even in the queen's clothes the gipsy nevertheless remained a gipsy.

The young king was successful in overcoming his enemies, and made peace with them. Scarcely had he returned to the town, when he went to the garden to seek his delight, and to see whether anything had happened to her. But who shall express his astonishment and horror, when, instead of his beautiful queen, he beheld a sorry gipsy. "Ah, my dear, my very dear one, how you have altered!" sighed he, and tears bedewed his cheeks.

"I have altered, my beloved! I have altered; for anxiety for you has tortured me," answered the gipsy, and wanted to fall upon his neck; but the king turned away from her and departed in anger. From that time forth he had no settled abode, no rest; he knew neither day nor night; but merely mourned over the lost beauty of his wife, and nothing could comfort him.

Thus agitated and melancholy, he was walking one day in the garden. Here, as he moved about at haphazard, a beautiful white dove flew on to his hand from a high tree, and looked with mournful gaze into his bloodshot eyes. "Ah, my dove! why are you so sad? Has your mate been transformed like my beautiful wife?" said the young king, talking to it and caressingly stroking its head and back. But feeling a kind of protuberance on its head, he blew the feathers apart, and behold! the head of a pin! Touched with compassion, the king extracted the pin; that instant the beautiful mourning dove was changed into his beautiful wife.

She narrated to him all that had happened to her, and how it had happened; how the gipsy had deluded her, and how she had stuck the pin into her head. The king immediately caused the gipsy and the old woman to be apprehended and burnt without further ado.

From that time forth nothing interfered with his happiness, neither the might of his enemies nor the spite of wicked people. He lived with his beautiful wife in peace and love; he reigned prosperously, and is reigning yet, if he be yet alive.

Eastern Europe

ASHKENAZIM

---

RETURN OF A CANTONIST

Tradition Bearer: Mrs. D. Rivkin

Source: Verschleiser, Emanuel. Interview of H. Kleinfeld. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers' Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC, June 10, 2007.

Date: 1938

Original Source: Russia

National Origin: Ashkenazim

---

The Ashkenazim are descended from West German Jewish communities that became a presence in the area with the advent of the medieval period (500–1000 C.E.). Members of the group established communities not only in Germany, but also throughout Central and Eastern Europe. Separation between the Ashkenazi Jewish communities and the Middle Eastern (Mizrahim) and Mediterranean (Sephardim) communities led to the development of distinctive traditions, including religious customs and linguas franca (most significantly Yiddish). The following personal experience narrative attests to the difficulty of perpetuating Ashkenazic religious and cultural traditions in the face of antisemitic political systems. The collector of this oral memoir states,

At the time of Czar Nicolai I [1825–1856], small Jewish children were caught in the streets, taken into far Russian provinces, brought up as Christians and given to the army. They were called “Cantonists.” Many stories grew up about them, relating dramatic reunions, return to the Jewish faith, etc.

---

I was looking out through the window. It was a clear snowy morning a carriage stopped at our door and a gentleman stepped out and came in to our house. I was not surprised because many Christian gentlemen came to our house. My father was dealing in hemp which he bought up from the local estates and sent off to far places, even Germany. We lived in the provincial county seat of Wietebesk. The gentleman began to inquire of my father about his family, how many brothers he had and all the history of his family.

My mother was scared and told my father. "I beg you, guard your tongue, you are always talking."

And after some more talk, when father asked the gentleman why all those questions, the stranger fell on my father's neck, saying, "I am your brother."

He was one of the "Cantonists." And he told us his whole history. When he was a child he was caught by the Czar catchers, taken with many other Jewish children; taken far away to be brought up as a Russian soldier and a Christian. But he never forgot that he was a Jew. He had talent as a musician and so was given musical education and became later a famous pianist. When he became a free man he made many times inquiries about his family because he never forgot that he is a Jew. At last he found his family and he is happy, and he wants to remain with us, he said, and become a Jew again. My mother had some fears but my father overcame them. The man remained in our house and returned to the Jewish faith.

My sister, a young girl of eighteen, fell in love with him. He was a man in his fifties but there was something compelling, inspiring in the man. She wanted to marry him. My father and mother were in despair. They threatened and cried, but nothing helped. She went away with him, married him. Although he formally returned to the Jewish faith, my father considered him a Christian and he sat Shiva (seven-day mourning) and tore his clothing, as is the Jewish custom, when somebody died. For him his daughter was dead.

She lived with him in Riga. She had with him two children. When she gave birth to the second child she died in milk-fever (milk in her breasts became poisoned). In her death agonies she cried that God punished her because she married a Christian.

HOW RABBI JOSHUA WENT TO PARADISE ALIVE

Tradition Bearer: K. Heisler

Source: Verschleiser, Emanuel. Interview of H. Kleinfeld. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers' Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC, June 10, 2007.

Date: 1938

Original Source: Galicia (now Poland and the Ukraine)

National Origin: Ashkenazim

While the following comic narrative extols the power of religious devotion, the Rabbi's ultimate success results from wit. Therefore, the protagonist plays the role of a trickster whose ability is magnified by outmaneuvering the master deceiver.

---

The great Rabbi Joshua was wrapped up all his life in the study of the Torah and knew little about the everyday world. A man doesn't live forever. His time came and God said, to the Angel of Death, "Go to Reb Joshua, take his holy soul and bring it before my throne but I command you that whatever he ask of you thou it be the biggest and hardest thing you shall give it to him.... Not many such pious men live on the earth."

The angel went to carry out God's command and he come to Reb Joshua. He stood before him and said, "Your time has come and you must leave this world for the other world. God himself sent me to you that I should take your soul to Him. But before I take you soul God has commanded me to fulfill one wish of yours. It may be hard to fulfill but I will do it. Because you found favor in God's eyes. So consider well.... Any desire I will do it even if it is most difficult, because you found favor in God's eyes. Well, what is your wish?"

"I ask of you," said Reb Joshua "that you show me my place in Paradise."

"Your request in very difficult to fulfill," the angel answered, "but alas I have to fulfill God's wish. Get ready. You will not be able to enter paradise but we will come near the wall of paradise and you will be able to see your place looking thru a gateway."

Reb Joshua was afraid to follow him. How can one believe the Angel of Death? Just when I will be contemplating something he will use his knife on my throat and there will be no help for it. Such a fellow isn't to be trusted. "Come and lose no time" the Angel of Death said, "you have only a few minutes to live."

"If you want me to go with you," Reb Joshua said, "give me your sword because I am greatly afraid of you."

The Angel of Death gave Reb Joshua his sword and led Reb Joshua through valleys and deserts until they came to Paradise. The angel then lifted Reb Joshua to the wall of paradise and Reb Joshua saw all the pious men sitting in happiness and peace. At the sight of this he lost all desire to return to our world. Why should he have to die first in order to enter paradise? He would rather save himself the pains of dying and enter paradise alive. Without much ado he jumped over the fence into paradise. The Angel of Death has no right to enter paradise. So Reb Joshua remained there alive.

The Angel of Death went with a complaint to the Almighty that Reb Joshua deceived him.

God answered, "That isn't deceiving. To deceive the Angel of Death in permissible. You want to kill him so he has a right to try to get away from you."

THE DYBBUK OF BUNKER STREET

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Polacheck, Hilda. Chicago Folklore. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers' Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC, June 10, 2007.

Date: 1939

Original Source: Unavailable

National Origin: Ashkenazim

---

As a Diasporic community, the Ashkenazim are globally dispersed, but retain a coherent core of religious practices and traditional beliefs. The concept of an entity called the dybbuk is one such belief. A dybbuk is a detached soul of a person who, though dead, has not been allowed to enter the afterworld. The entity attaches itself to a living person, and in cases such as the one in this personal experience narrative, may serve to bring about the death of the host. In the immigrant context detailed below, belief in the dybbuk may function to reinforce traditional mores and moral codes or to explain forces (in this instance, a typhoid epidemic) that are not an element of the traditional worldview of the community.

---

Yes, I remember the story of the Dybbuk of Bunker Street. It was back in 1902, when the story got around that a dybbuk was going from house to house, making people sick. I was just eight years old then; my mother wanted to have a birthday party for me, but she didn't have enough money, so she took me to a nickel-show. On the way home, she told me she would buy some ice-cream for supper. But when we got home, our small kitchen was crowded with neighbors.

My father had been brought home from the clothing factory where he worked. I remember seeing him in bed. He looked very pale. I heard the women saying something about the dybbuk having gotten into him. My mother ran for the doctor and I was told to go out and pray. But I sat on the steps of the dark hall just outside the kitchen.

Two old women came into the hall. I guess they did not see me. I heard one of them say, "If a dybbuk gets into a God fearing person, and a holy Rabbi can be found who knows how to force the dybbuk out of the body, the person will get well. But if the dybbuk gets into a sinner, who does not eat kosher food and who does not daven, (pray) he hasn't got a chance. He will die."

Two days later my father was dead. I did not think he was a sinner. I did not think he had time to be a sinner. He worked every day and ate all his meals at home. And my mother cooked only kosher food. I did not understand the whole business.

My mother got a job in the factory where my father worked, but she did not earn as much as he had. She used to get me ready for school before she went to work in the morning and give me a penny for a roll. This was my lunch. After school I played on the street or in the dirty alley, till my mother came home.

I remember that house on Bunker Street where the dybbuk was supposed to go from place to place. That house was built for one family, but when we lived there, six families were living in the house. No one had a bath room. There was one toilet in the hall for the six families, and some of them had as many as six or eight kids.

When my father was alive and my mother did not have to go to work, she used to bathe me in a wash tub in the kitchen. We had two rooms, a bedroom and a kitchen. She used to keep my clothes clean. I remember I had a white blouse with embroidery ruffles on the collar and the cuffs. It would take my mother an hour to iron this shirt, but she did not mind it. She used to heat the iron on a coal stove and it took a long time to get the iron hot. She used to like to dress me up on Saturdays and take me for a walk to look in the windows of the big store on Halsted Street. But she got awful mean after my father died. All she did in the evening was cry and fight with me. She stopped bathing me and I never wore that white blouse again. Sometimes I used to wonder if the dybbuk got into my mother. Maybe she was tired.

We had many Irish neighbors and a lot of them were sick, too. But the old Jewish women said that the dybbuk only made Jews sick. I used to play with a little Irish boy who was in my room in school. He lived next door to us. He had three brothers and two sisters, and the whole family got sick. They all died except the little boy. He'd a been better off if he had died. When he was ten years old he was sent to reform school. He was in jail most of his life.

Do I believe it was a dybbuk? Well, I don't know. It must-a been something that made people sick and mean. My mother did not get sick, but she was plenty mean. I got sick of hearing her fight, and when I was twelve, I ran away from home. One day I was hungry, so I stole two apples from the grocery stand. The grocery man caught me, and I was sent to reform school. The first time my mother came to see me, in the reform school, she said the dybbuk must have gotten into me. I guess she felt bad when I was sent to reform school. She used to bring me apples and sometimes an orange.

I remember another dybbuk story which the old women used to tell. A few doors from where we lived, there was a large stable where the horses and wagons of a large department store on State Street used to be kept. Every morning the drivers used to hitch the horses to the wagons and go down town to get the wagons loaded for deliveries. They used to deliver goods all over. Sometimes they went to Evanston and as far north as Highland Park.

Well, one of the drivers lived on bunker Street, and he started out to deliver goods. On the way he took sick and he was brought home. That evening some women came to see my mother, and I heard them say that the dybbuk surely had the driver. I was out on the street near the stable when the horses and wagon came back from the day's deliveries, and I heard the driver tell one of the other men that the people in Evanston to whom he had delivered goods, were sick, too. "Do you think the dybbuk traveled to Evanston?" he asked laughing.

A couple of weeks later, some ladies came around and they looked at all the houses and there was some talk that the flies brought the sickness. But the old women stuck to their dybbuk. They said that a dybbuk can enter the smallest and the largest thing. So maybe the dybbuk got into the flies. The flies may have stayed on the horses, or the harness and that is how the sickness got to Evanston. Then a few weeks later, I heard one of the drivers say that people in Evanston, called the sickness typhoid fever. That they had found out that Bunker Street was overcrowded. That so many people using one toilet made the water back up after heavy rains and then the flies were all over the toilets, and then they flew into the houses and got on the food and that is what caused the sickness.

But the best dybbuk story of all was the one about a young Jewish girl who ran away with a young Irish feller. Everybody on Bunker Street was having fits. The Jews said the dybbuk would surely get into the girl, and the Irish said that some devil would get the feller. But the girl's father got sick and died and the feller's two sisters and mother died from the same sickness, but nothing happened to the girl and the feller. So the story of the dybbuk was gradually forgotten.

All I got to say is that whether it was a dybbuk or typhoid fever, all my hard luck started when my father died. If I hadn't been sent to reform school, I wouldn't have landed in jail. Yes, I served ten years. When I came out of reform school, I was sixteen years old. I went to live with my mother, but she kept throwing it up to me that I disgraced her by being sent to reform school, so I lit out and ran away.

There was a gang hanging around Bunker Street and I joined them. We used to steal anything we could lay our hands on, then spend the money on eating, drinking and going to burlesque shows. Sometimes we got arrested, but one of the big shots used to get us out. I use to pass the house once in a while, where my mother lived, but I never went in. Then I heard she died and the relatives buried her. They did not tell me about it, so I was not at the funeral. I can never forget that.

Well, one day I was caught sticking up a man with a gun in my hand, and the big shot could not get me off. So I was sent up for [ten?] years. When I came out, I went to see an uncle. He told me that my mother had left me five hundred dollars from a lodge policy. I was sick of the life I was living, so I took the money and opened a little cigar store. And as you see, I still have the store. I make enough to live on.

Just the other day, one of the old neighbors came into the store. What do you think we talked about? The Dybbuk of Bunker Street.

CONTEMPT FOR HIS TORTURERS

Tradition Bearer: Mr. Wollman

Source: Roth, Terry, and Sam Schwartz. Interview of Mr. Wollman. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers' Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC. <http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/wpaintro/wpahome.html> (October 16, 2005).

Date: 1939

Original Source: Poland

National Origin: Ashkenazim

---

The Ashkenazim (or Ashkenazic Jews) are the descendants of the medieval Jewish communities located in Germany and the surrounding territory. As noted above (“Return of a Cantonist,” page 141), many Ashkenazim eventually migrated to Eastern European countries, particularly Poland and Russia. The following legend portrays an appropriate survival attitude for adverse conditions. Although religion is an important component of the narrative, it transmits a social secular message as distinct from a religious truth in the context Mr. Wollman reports.

---

I’ll relate you a story my friend he told me.

In the olden days, about one hundred years ago, the Jews in Poland were the middle element, between the peasantry and the big landlords. They used to collect taxes from the peasants for the big landlords.

There was one Jew, he had about six daughters to marry and he was the one that collected the taxes. The landlord was the nobility. So since he had about six daughters to marry, he took down some money that he collected, and he married them off. Then he didn’t have money to pay to the landlords. Those days, the landlord was the absolutely Czar of his peasants.

So, you’ll pardon me, since he didn’t have the money, he went to the landlord and he said to leave down his pants and flog him. Because he didn’t have the money to pay. So they flogged him and they let him to rest off a week and another day they flogged him and let him to rest. So the Jewish fellow went to the Rabbi and he told the Rabbi, “What shall I do? They are flogging me and it hurts.”

So the Rabbi answered him. “What do you care? He’s only a goy (non-Jew). It doesn’t mean anything.”

Why did he tell me that? Because he’s a married man and has five children. And he was out of work at that time. So he related that story in connection with his condition. This is the philosophy of the Hasidism. That he looked with contempt on his torturers. No matter how they torture him, he doesn’t care.

ONE THOUSAND RUBLES

Tradition Bearer: K. Heisler

Source: Verschleiser, Emanuel. Interview of H. Kleinfeld. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers’ Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC, June 10, 2007.

Date: 1938

Original Source: Russia

National Origin: Ashkenazim

---

This joke features a Jewish trickster turning the tables on “a gentleman” (presumably a non-Jew) who had intended to test the protagonist’s sincerity. A subtext of the narrative is the conflict between Jew and Gentile in both the European and American contexts.

---

A merchant went once for a walk. What does a Jew and a merchant think about especially when business is bad? He thinks how to help himself. If he would at least have one thousand rubles he could help himself, if not he is lost. He will be bankrupt. He is so engrossed in his thoughts that he is talking out loud, “Ai, if I would only find one thousand rubles! I have to have a thousand rubles. Nine hundred even wouldn’t help.”

Behind him walked a gentleman who heard what the Jew said. He thinks to himself, “I will try the Jew.” He takes out of his pocket nine hundred rubies and throws them on the ground.

The Jew sees the nine hundred rubles, he isn’t lazy, he picks them up and hides them.

The gentleman sees it, comes running, “Listen,” he says, “didn’t you say that you wouldn’t pick up less than a thousand.”

“I’ll tell you,” answers the Jew, “I reminded myself that I have home a hundred rubles.”

POLAND

---

THE SPIRIT OF A BURIED MAN

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Wratislaw, A. H. Sixty Folk-Tales from Exclusively Slavonic Sources. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin and Co., 1890, 121–125.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Unavailable

National Origin: Poland

---

Bordered on the west by the central European country of Germany and on the east, north, and south by other eastern European countries, the Polish folktale corpus maintains features of both regions. For example, the scholarship notes that Polish märchens often omit the beginning, middle, and closing formulas of other Eastern European variants (Brzozowska-Krajka 2006). The following tale incorporates the familiar tale type of “The Grateful Dead” (AT 505), but it portrays the hero as utilizing the powers of transformation with which he has been rewarded to save a king and win a princess as in “The Man Who Flew Like a Bird and Swam Like a Fish” (AT 665). As in many tales of transformation, the hero’s identity is verified by a token taken from him when he was in animal form.

---

A poor scholar was going by the highway into a town, and found under the walls of the gate the body of a dead man, unburied, trodden by the feet of the passers-by. He had not much in his purse, but willingly gave enough to bury him, that he might not be spat upon and have sticks thrown at him. He performed his devotions over the fresh heaped-up grave, and went on into the world to wander.

In an oak wood sleep overpowered him, and when he awoke, he espied with wonderment a bag full of gold. He thanked the unseen beneficent hand, and came to the bank of a large river, where it was necessary to be ferried over. The two ferrymen, observing the bag full of gold, took him into the boat, and just at an eddy took from him the gold and threw him into the water. As the waves carried him away insensible, he by accident clutched a plank, and by its aid floated successfully to the shore.

It was not a plank, but the spirit of the buried man, who addressed him in these words, "You honored my remains by burial; I thank you for it. In token of gratitude I will teach you how you can transform yourself into a crow, into a hare, and into a deer." Then he taught him the spell. The scholar, when acquainted with the spell, could with ease transform himself into a crow, into a hare, and into a deer.

He wandered far, he wandered wide, till he wandered to the court of a mighty king, where he remained as an archer in attendance at the court. This king had a beautiful daughter, but she dwelt on an inaccessible island, surrounded on all sides by the sea. She dwelt in a castle of copper, and possessed a sword such that he who brandished it could conquer the largest army. Enemies had invaded the territory of the king; he needed and desired the victorious sword. But how to obtain it, when nobody had up to that time succeeded in getting on to the lonely island? He therefore made proclamation that whoever should bring the victorious sword from the princess should obtain her hand, and, moreover, should sit upon the throne after him. No one was venturesome enough to attempt it, till the wandering scholar, then an archer attached to the court, stood before the king announcing his readiness to go, and requesting a letter, that on receipt of that token the princess might give up the weapon to him. All men were astonished, and the king entrusted him with a letter to his daughter.

He went into the forest, without knowing in the least that another archer attached to the court was dogging his steps. He first transformed himself into a hare, then into a deer, and darted off with haste and speed; he traversed no small distance, till he stood on the shore of the sea. He then transformed himself into a crow, flew across the water of the sea, and didn't rest till he was on the island. He went into the castle of copper, delivered to the beautiful princess the letter from her father, and requested her to give him the victorious sword.

The beautiful princess looked at the archer. He captured her heart at once. She asked inquisitively how he had been able to get to her castle, which was on all sides surrounded by water and knew no human footsteps. Thereupon the archer replied that he knew secret spells by which he could transform himself into a deer, a hare, and a crow.

The beautiful princess, therefore, requested the archer to transform himself into a deer before her eyes. When he made himself into a graceful deer, and began to fawn and bound, the princess secretly pulled a tuft of fur from his back.

When he transformed himself again into a hare, and bounded with pricked up ears, the princess secretly, pulled a little fur off his back. When he changed himself into a crow and began to fly about in the room, the princess secretly pulled a few feathers from the bird's wings. She immediately wrote a letter to her father and delivered up the victorious sword.

The young scholar flew across the sea in the form of a crow, then ran a great distance in that of a deer, till in the neighborhood of the wood he bounded as a hare. The treacherous archer was already there in ambush, saw when he changed himself into a hare, and recognized him at once. He drew his bow, let fly the arrow, and killed the hare. He took from him the letter and carried off the sword, went to the castle, delivered to the king the letter and the sword of victory, and demanded at once the fulfillment of the promise that had been made.

The king, transported with joy, promised him immediately his daughter's hand, mounted his horse, and rode boldly against his enemies with the sword. Scarcely had he espied their standards, when he brandished the sword mightily several times, and that towards the four quarters of the world. At every wave of the sword large masses of enemies fell dead on the spot, and others, seized with panic, fled like hares. The king returned joyful with victory, and sent for his beautiful daughter, to give her to wife to the archer who brought the sword.

A banquet was prepared. The musicians were already striking up, the whole castle was brilliantly lighted; but the princess sat sorrowful beside the assassin-archer. She knew at once that he was in nowise the man whom she saw in the castle on the island, but she dared not ask her father where the other handsome archer was; she only wept much and secretly: her heart beat for the other.

The poor scholar, in the hare's skin, lay slain under the oak, lay there a whole year, till one night he felt himself awakened from a mighty sleep, and before him stood the well-known spirit, whose body he had buried. He told him what had happened to him, brought him back to life, and said, "Tomorrow is the princess's wedding; hasten, therefore, to the castle without a moment's delay; she will recognize you; the archer, too, who killed you treacherously, will recognize you."

The young man sprang up promptly, went to the castle with throbbing heart, and entered the grand saloon, where numerous guests were eating and drinking. The beautiful princess recognized him at once, shrieked with joy, and fainted; and the assassin-archer, the moment he set eyes on him, turned pale and green from fear.

Then the young man related the treason and murderous act of the archer, and in order to prove his words, turned himself in presence of all the assembled company into a graceful deer, and began to fawn upon the princess. She placed the tuft of fur pulled off him in the castle on the back of the deer, and the fur immediately grew into its place. Again he transformed himself into a hare, and similarly the piece of fur pulled off, which the princess had kept, grew into its place immediately on contact. All looked on in astonishment till the young man changed himself into a crow. The princess brought out the feathers which she had pulled from its wings in the castle, and the feathers immediately grew into their places.

Then the old king commanded the assassin-archer to be put to death. Four horses were led out, all wild and unbroken. He was bound to them by his hands and feet, the horses were started off by the whip, and at one bound they tore the assassin-archer to pieces.

The young man obtained the hand of the young and charming princess. The whole castle was in a brilliant blaze of light, they drank, they ate with mirth; and the princess did not weep, for she possessed the husband that she wished for.

PRINCE UNEXPECTED

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Wratislaw, A. H. Sixty Folk-Tales from Exclusively Slavonic Sources. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin and Co., 1890, 108–120.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Unavailable

National Origin: Poland

---

The hero in this variant of “The Girl as Helper in the Hero’s Flight” (AT 313) is rescued by the shape-shifting youngest daughter of the immortal Bony lord of the underworld. The motifs of twelve sisters, a subterranean sojourn, the transformation of a princess into a flower, and a hero who enters a trance provoked considerable speculation about the solar and seasonal symbolism in this tale among nineteenth-century folklorists.

---

There was a king and queen who had been married for three years, but had no children, at which they were both much distressed. Once upon a time the king found himself obliged to make a visit of inspection round his dominions; he took leave of his queen, set off and was not at home for eight months.

Towards the end of the ninth month the king returned from his progress through his country, and was already hard by his capital city, when, as he journeyed over an uninhabited plain during the most scorching heat of summer, he felt such excessive thirst that he sent his servants round about to see if they could find water anywhere and let him know of it at once. The servants dispersed in various directions, sought in vain for a whole hour, and returned without success to the king.

The thirst-tormented king proceeded to traverse the whole plain far and wide himself, not believing that there was not a spring somewhere or other; on he rode, and on a level spot, on which there had not previously been any water, he espied a well with a new wooden fence round it, full to the brim with spring water, in the midst of which floated a silver cup with a golden handle. The king sprang from his horse and reached after the cup with his right hand; but the cup, just as if it were alive and had eyes, darted quickly on one side and floated again by itself. The king knelt down and began to try to catch it, now with his right hand, now with his left, but it moved and dodged away in such a manner that, not being able to seize it with one hand, he tried to catch it with both. But scarcely had he reached out with both hands when the cup dived like a fish, and floated again on the surface. "Hang it!" thought the king, "I can't help myself with the cup, I'll manage without it." He then bent down to the water, which was as clear as crystal and as cold as ice, and began in his thirst to drink.

Meanwhile his long beard, which reached down to his girdle, dipped into the water. When he had quenched his thirst, he wanted to get up again—something was holding his beard and wouldn't let it go. He pulled once and again, but it was of no use; he cried out therefore in anger, "Who's there? let go!"

"It's I, the subterranean king, immortal Bony, and I shall not let go till you give me that which you left unknowingly at home, and which you do not expect to find on your return." The king looked into the depth of the well, and there was a huge head like a tub, with green eyes and a mouth from ear to ear, which was holding the king by the beard with extended claws like those of a crab, and was laughing mischievously.

The king thought that a thing of which he had not known before starting, and which he did not expect on his return, could not be of great value, so he said to the apparition, "I give it." The apparition burst with laughter and vanished with a flash of fire, and with it vanished also the well, the water, the wooden fence, and the cup; and the king was again on a hillock by a little wood kneeling on dry sand, and there was nothing more. The king got up, crossed himself, sprang on his horse, hastened to his attendants, and rode on.

In a week or maybe a fortnight the king arrived at his capital; the people came out in crowds to meet him; he went in procession to the great court of the palace and entered the corridor. In the corridor stood the queen awaiting him, and holding close to her bosom a cushion, on which lay a child, beautiful as the moon, kicking in swaddling clothes. The king recollected himself, sighed painfully, and said within himself, "This is what I left without knowing and found without expecting!" And bitterly, bitterly did he weep. All marveled, but nobody dared to ask the cause. The king took his son, without saying a word, in his arms, gazed long on his innocent face; carried him into the palace himself, laid him in the cradle, and, suppressing his sorrow, devoted himself to the government of his realm, but was never again cheerful as formerly, since he was perpetually tormented by the thought that some day Bony would claim his son.

Meanwhile weeks, months, and years flowed on, and no one came for his son. The prince, named "Unexpected," grew and developed, and eventually became a handsome youth. The king also in course of time regained his usual cheerfulness; and forgot what had taken place, but alas everybody did not forget so easily.

Once the prince, while hunting in a forest, became separated from his suite and found himself in a savage wilderness. Suddenly there appeared before him a hideous old man with green eyes, who said, "How do you do, Prince Unexpected? You have made me wait for you a long time."

"Who are you?"

"That you will find out hereafter, but now, when you return to your father, greet him from me, and tell him that I should be glad if he would close accounts with me, for if he doesn't soon get out of my debt of himself, he will repent it bitterly." After saying this the hideous old man disappeared, and the prince in amazement turned his horse, rode home and told the king his adventure.

The king turned as pale as a sheet, and revealed the frightful secret to his son. "Don't cry, father!" replied the prince, "it isn't a great misfortune! I shall manage to force Bony to renounce the right over me, which he tricked you out of in so underhand a manner, and if in the course of a year I do not return, it will be a token that we shall see each other no more." The prince prepared for his journey, the king gave him a suit of steel armor a sword, and a horse, and the queen hung round his neck a cross of pure gold. At leave-taking they embraced affectionately, wept heartily, and the prince rode off.

On he rode one day, two days, three days, and at the end of the fourth day at the setting of the sun he came to the shore of the sea, and in the self-same bay espied twelve dresses, white as snow, though in the water, as far as the eye could reach, there was no living soul to be seen; only twelve white geese were swimming at a distance from the shore. Curious to know to whom they belonged, he took one of the dresses, let his horse loose in a meadow, concealed himself in a neighboring thicket, and waited to see what would come to pass.

Thereupon the geese, after disporting themselves on the sea, swam to the shore; eleven of them went to the dresses, each threw herself on the ground and became a beautiful damsel, dressed herself with speed, and flew away into the plain. The twelfth goose, the last and prettiest of all, did not venture to come out on the shore, but only wistfully stretched out her neck, looking on all sides. On seeing the prince she called out with a human voice, "Prince Unexpected, give me my dress; I will be grateful to you in return."

The prince hearkened to her, placed the dress on the grass, and modestly turned away in another direction. The goose came out on the grass, changed herself into a damsel, dressed herself hastily, and stood before the prince; she was young and more beautiful than eye had seen or ear heard of.

Blushing, she gave him her white hand, and, casting her eyes down, said with a pleasing voice, "I thank you, good prince, for hearkening to me: I am the youngest daughter of immortal Bony; he has twelve young daughters, and rules in the subterranean realm. My father, prince, has long been expecting you and is very angry; however, don't grieve, and don't be frightened, but do as I tell you. As soon as you see King Bony, fall at once on your knees, and, paying no regard to his outcry, upbraiding, and threats, approach him boldly. What will happen afterwards you will learn, but now we must part." On saying this the princess stamped on the ground with her little foot; the ground sprang open at once, and they descended into the subterranean realm, right into Bony's palace, which shone all underground brighter than our sun.

The prince stepped boldly into the reception-room. Bony was sitting on a golden throne with a glittering crown on his head; his eyes gleamed like two saucers of green glass and his hands were like the nippers of a crab. As soon as he espied him at a distance, the prince fell on his knees, and Bony yelled so horribly that the vaults of the subterranean dominion quaked; but the prince boldly moved on his knees towards the throne, and, when he was only a few paces from it, the king smiled and said, "Thou hast marvelous luck in succeeding in making me smile; remain in our subterranean realm, but before thou becomest a true citizen thereof thou art bound to execute three commands of mine; but because it is late today, we will begin tomorrow; meanwhile go to thy room."

The prince slept comfortably in the room assigned to him, and early on the morrow Bony summoned him and said, "We will see, prince, what thou canst do. In the course of the following night build me a palace of pure marble; let the windows be of crystal, the roof of gold, an elegant garden round about it, and in the garden seats and fountains; if thou buildest it, thou wilt gain thyself my love; if not, I shall command thy head to be cut off."

The prince heard it, returned to his apartment, and was sitting mournfully thinking of the death that threatened him, when outside at the window a bee came buzzing and said, "Let me in!" He opened the lattice, in flew the bee, and the princess, Bony's youngest daughter, appeared before the wondering prince. "What are you thus thinking about, Prince Unexpected?"

"Alas! I am thinking that your father wishes to deprive me of life."

"Don't be afraid! lie down to sleep, and when you get up tomorrow morning your palace will be ready."

So, too, it came to pass. At dawn the prince came out of his room and espied a more beautiful palace than he had ever seen, and Bony, when he saw it, wondered, and wouldn't believe his own eyes. "Well! thou hast won this time, and now thou hast my second command. I shall place my twelve daughters before thee tomorrow; if thou dost not guess which of them is the youngest, thou wilt place thy head beneath the axe."

"I unable to recognize the youngest princess!" said the prince in his room; "what difficulty can there be in that?"

“This,” answered the princess, flying into the room in the shape of a bee, “that if I don’t help you, you won’t recognize me; for we are all so alike that even our father only distinguishes us by our dress.”

“What am I to do?”

“What, indeed! That will be the youngest over whose right eye you espy a ladycow [lady bug, a small beetle]; only look well. Adieu!”

On the morrow King Bony again summoned Prince Unexpected. The princesses stood in a row side by side, all dressed alike and with eyes cast down. The prince looked and marveled how alike all the princesses were; he went past them once, twice—he did not find the appointed token; the third time he saw a ladycow over the eyebrow of one, and cried out, “This is the youngest princess!”

“How the deuce have you guessed it?” said Bony angrily. “There must be some trickery here. I must deal with your lordship differently. In three hours you will come here again, and will show your cleverness in my presence. I shall light a straw, and you will stitch a pair of boots before it goes out, and if you don’t do it you will perish.”

The prince returned desponding and found the bee already in his apartment. “Why pensive again, prince?”

“How shouldn’t I be pensive, when your father wants me to stitch him a pair of boots, for what sort of cobbler am I?”

“What else will you do?”

“What am I to do? I shan’t stitch the boots, and I’m not afraid of death—one can but die once!”

“No, prince, you shall not die! I will endeavor to rescue you, and we will either escape together or perish together! We must flee—there’s nothing else to be done.” Saying this, the princess spat on one of the window-panes, and the spittle immediately froze.

She then went out of the room with the prince, locked the door after her, and threw the key far away; then, taking each other by the hands, they ascended rapidly, and in a moment found themselves on the very spot whence they had descended into the subterranean realm; there was the self-same sea, the self-same shore overgrown with rushes and thorn bushes, the self-same fresh meadow, and in the meadow cantered the prince’s well-fed horse, who, as soon as he descried his rider, came galloping straight to him. The prince didn’t stop long to think, but sprang on his horse, the princess seated herself behind him, and off they set as swift as an arrow.

King Bony at the appointed hour did not wait for Prince Unexpected, but sent to ask him why he did not appear. Finding the door locked, the servants knocked at it vigorously, and the spittle answered them from the middle of the room in the prince’s voice, “Anon!”

The servants carried this answer to the king; he waited, waited, no prince; he therefore again sent the same servants, who heard the same answer, “Anon!” and carried what they had heard to the king.

“What’s this? Does he mean to make fun of me?” shouted the king in wrath, “Go at once, break the door open and conduct him to me!”

The servants hurried off, broke open the door, and rushed in. What, indeed? there was nobody there, and the spittle on the pane of glass was splitting with laughter at them. Bony all but burst with rage, and ordered them all to start off in pursuit of the prince, threatening them with death if they returned empty-handed. They sprang on horseback and hastened away after the prince and princess.

Meanwhile Prince Unexpected and the princess, Bony’s daughter, were hurrying away on their spirited horse, and amidst their rapid flight heard “tramp, tramp,” behind them. The prince sprang from the horse, put his ear to the ground and said, “They are pursuing us.”

“Then,” said the princess, “we have no time to lose.” Instantly she transformed herself into a river, changed the prince into a bridge, the horse into a raven, and the grand highway beyond the bridge divided into three roads. Swiftly on the fresh track hastened the pursuers, came on to the bridge, and stood stupefied; they saw the track up to the bridge, but beyond it disappeared, and the highway divided into three roads. There was nothing to be done but to return, and they came with nought. Bony shouted with rage, and cried out, “A bridge and a river! It was they. How was it that ye did not guess it? Back, and don’t return without them!” The pursuers recommenced the pursuit.

“I hear ‘tramp, tramp!’” whispered the princess, Bony’s daughter, affrightedly to Prince Unexpected, who sprang from the saddle, put his ear to the ground, and replied, “They are making haste, and are not far off.” That instant the princess and prince, and with them also their horse, became a gloomy forest, in which were roads, by-roads, and footpaths without number, and on one of them it seemed that two riders were hastening on a horse.

Following the fresh track, the pursuers came up to the forest, and when they espied the fugitives in it, they hastened speedily after them. On and on hurried the pursuers, seeing continually before them a thick forest, a wide road and the fugitives on it; now, now they thought to overtake them, when the fugitives and the thick forest suddenly vanished, and they found themselves at the self-same place whence they had started in pursuit. They returned, therefore, again to Bony empty-handed.

“A horse, a horse! I’ll go myself! they won’t escape out of my hands!” yelled Bony, foaming at the mouth, and started in pursuit.

Again the princess said to Prince Unexpected, “Methinks they are pursuing us, and this time it is Bony, my father, himself, but the first church is the boundary of his dominion, and he won’t be able to pursue us further. Give me your golden cross.” The prince took off his affectionate mother’s gift and gave it to the princess, and in a moment she was transformed into a church, he into the priest, and the horse into the bell; and that instant up came Bony.

“Monk!” Bony asked the priest, “hast thou not seen some travelers on horseback?”

“Only just now Prince Unexpected rode this way with the princess, Bony’s daughter. They came into the church, performed their devotions, gave money for a mass for your good health, and ordered me to present their respects to you if you should ride this way.” Bony, too, returned empty-handed. But Prince Unexpected rode on with the princess, Bony’s daughter, in no further fear of pursuit.

They rode gently on, when they saw before them a beautiful town, into which the prince felt an irresistible longing to go. “Prince,” said the princess, “don’t go; my heart forebodes misfortune there.”

“I’ll only ride there for a short time, and look round the town, and we’ll then proceed on our journey.”

“It’s easy enough to ride thither, but will it be as easy to return? Nevertheless, as you absolutely desire it, go, and I will remain here in the form of a white stone till you return; be circumspect, my beloved; the king, the queen, and the princess, their daughter, will come out to meet you, and with them will be a beautiful little boy—don’t kiss him, for, if you do, you will forget me at once, and will never set eyes on me more in the world—I shall die of despair. I will wait for you here on the road for three days, and if on the third day you don’t return, remember that I perish, and perish all through you.” The prince took leave and rode to the town, and the princess transformed herself into a white stone, and remained on the road.

One day passed, a second passed, the third also passed, and nothing was seen of the prince. Poor princess! He had not obeyed her counsel; in the town, the king, the queen, and the princess their daughter, had come out to meet him, and with them walked a little boy, a curly-headed chatterbox, with eyes as bright as stars. The child rushed straight into the prince’s arms, who was so captivated by the beauty of the lad that he forgot everything, and kissed the child affectionately. That moment his memory was darkened, and he utterly forgot the princess, Bony’s daughter.

The princess lay as a white stone by the wayside, one day, two days, and when the third day passed and the prince did not return from the town, she transformed herself into a cornflower, and sprang in among the rye by the roadside.

“Here I shall stay by the roadside; maybe some passer-by will pull me up or trample me into the ground,” said she, and tears like dew-drops glittered on the azure petals. Just then an old man came along the road, espied the corn-flower in the rye by the wayside, was captivated by its beauty, extracted it carefully from the ground, carried it into his dwelling, set it in a flower-pot, watered it, and began to tend it attentively. But—O marvel!—ever since the time that the cornflower was brought into his dwelling, all kind of wonders began to happen in it. Scarcely was the old man awake, when everything in the house was already set in order, nowhere was the least atom of dust remaining. At noon he came home—dinner was all ready, the table set; he had but to sit down and eat as much as he wanted.

The old man wondered and wondered, till at last terror took possession of him, and he betook himself for advice to an old witch of his acquaintance in the neighborhood. “Do this,” the witch advised him, “get up before the first morning dawn, before the cocks crow to announce daylight, and notice diligently what begins to stir first in the house, and that which does stir, cover with this napkin: what will happen further, you will see.”

The old man didn’t close his eyes the whole night, and as soon as the first gleam appeared and things began to be visible in the house, he saw how the cornflower suddenly moved in the flower-pot, sprang out, and began to stir about the room; when simultaneously everything began to put itself in its place; the dust began to sweep itself clean away, and the fire kindled itself in the stove. The old man sprang cleverly out of his bed and placed the cloth on the flower as it endeavored to escape, when lo! the flower became a beautiful damsel—the princess, Bony’s daughter.

“What have you done?” cried the princess. “Why have you brought life back again to me? My betrothed, Prince Unexpected, has forgotten me, and, therefore, life has become distasteful to me.”

“Your betrothed, Prince Unexpected, is going to be married today; the wedding feast is ready, and the guests are beginning to assemble.”

The princess wept, but after awhile dried her tears, dressed herself in frieze, and went into the town like a village girl. She came to the royal kitchen, where there was great noise and bustle. She went up to the clerk of the kitchen with humble and attractive grace, and said in a sweet voice, “Dear sir, do me one favor; allow me to make a wedding-cake for Prince Unexpected.”

Occupied with work, the first impulse of the clerk of the kitchen was to give the girl a rebuff, but when he looked at her, the words died on his lips, and he answered kindly, “Ah, my beauty of beauties! Do what you will; I will hand the prince your cake myself.”

The cake was soon baked, and all the invited guests were sitting at table. The clerk of the kitchen himself placed a huge cake on a silver dish before the prince; but scarce had the prince made a cut in the side of it, when lo an unheard-of marvel displayed itself in the presence of all. A gray tom-pigeon and a white hen-pigeon came out of the cake; the tom-pigeon walked along the table, and the hen-pigeon walked after him, cooing:

Stay, stay, my pigeonet, oh stay!
 Don’t from thy true love flee away;
 My faithless lover I pursue,
 Prince Unexpected like unto,
 Who Bony’s daughter did betray.

Scarcely had Prince Unexpected heard this cooing of the pigeon, when he regained his lost recollection, bounced from the table, rushed to the door, and behind the door the princess, Bony's daughter, took him by the hand; they went together down the corridor, and before them stood a horse saddled and bridled.

Why delay? Prince Unexpected and the princess, Bony's daughter, sprang on the horse, started on the road, and at last arrived happily in the realm of Prince Unexpected's father. The king and queen received them with joy and merriment, and didn't wait long before they prepared them a magnificent wedding, the like of which eye never saw and ear never heard of.

TWARDOWSKI THE MAGICIAN

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Lach-Szyrma, W. S. "Slavonic Folk-Lore." Folk-Lore Record 4 (1881): 59–62.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Poland

National Origin: Poland

---

The following legend turns the historical Polish physician and scientist into a Renaissance Faust. A number of validating devices are utilized to encourage acceptance of the narrative. Locally well-known figures such as the mythical Krakus who rescued the town of Cracow by killing the dragon Smok Wawelski and King Sigismund Augustus and local landmarks such as the silver-mines of Olkusz and Hawk's Rock give an illusion of credibility to the more fantastic elements of the tale.

---

John Twardowski is said to have been a doctor of medicine in the university of Cracow, and probably was a man in advance of his age in knowledge of natural science. He is said to have studied the occult sciences in books of magic, and secretly to have gone forth from the city to Podgorice, where he summoned the demon to his presence. Like Doctor Faust in the legend, and sorcerers in general, he signed a contract with his own blood. The demon was to do everything he was ordered, and have no power over Twardowski until he met him at Rome. It is needless to say that Twardowski never went to Italy afterwards.

Twardowski was wont to perform his magical incantations on the mountains of Krzemionki, or on the tumulus of Krakus, the mythic founder of Cracow. This idea of a supernatural hallow around the mounds or barrows of the prehistoric race is not confined to Eastern Europe. In Cornwall also there is a belief in some of these barrows having a mystical connection and being haunted by spirits. The tomb of Krakus is a large prehistoric mound of great antiquity outside the city, not unlike many of our British barrows. It was, of course, a haunted place.

Twardowski must have given the demon much trouble. He ordered him to collect an enormous quantity of silver and bury it at Olkusz. The silver-mines of Olkusz are evidence of the veracity of this legend. He had to do other hard things. He compelled him to bring a huge rock to Piaskowa, and fix it with the sharp point down. The Hawk's Rock is still pointed at by the peasants as a record of Twardowski's powers.

The art of levitation he understood like most sorcerers. He had a painted horse on which he flew where he would (perhaps a more elegant edition of the broomstick of the British witches. Twardowski was a nobleman, and it would have been undignified doubtless for a noble-man to ride on a broomstick.)

He could go on the Vistula in a boat without sail or oar. (Query, might not this be something more than a folk legend, and Twardowski, who it seems was an able mechanician, have constructed a water velocipede to astonish the people?)

His grandest achievement, which may possibly be an historical event, though it is difficult to believe such credulity in a king of the sixteenth century, was his summoning Queen Barbara Radzivil. King Sigismund Augustus had married this celebrated beauty in 1548, and was devotedly attached to her. But in 1551 Queen Barbara, beloved by the king and nation, only six months after her coronation, died (May 12, 1551). King Augustus was inconsolable, and his terrible loss preyed on his mind. In the delirium of his bereavement he told his courtiers that nothing could console him but the sight of his beloved queen again, or of her spirit. The request was unreasonable, but the nobles humored the royal widower's fancy. He made an offer of five hundred pieces of gold for a sight of Queen Barbara's spirit. The bribe was heavy, but none of the spiritualists or necromancers of the period could earn it.

In his distress Gonska, the king's buffoon, is said to have visited Twardowski, and asked him to relieve the king and earn the five hundred pieces. Twardowski declared his readiness to summon Queen Barbara, even in the palace at Cracow where she had lived. At the appointed night King Sigismund Augustus descended into the palace vaults to behold his loved one. Twardowski, begging him neither to speak nor move, performed some incantations, and then, amidst blue fire, there appeared what seemed Queen Barbara in a white robe. The king was consoled by the vision, and paid Twardowski his fee, which was earned, it is said, by a Miss Przelawska, a Lutheran girl, who had fled from persecution to Twardowski, and who, being very like Queen Barbara, acted the ghost's part.

At length the demon resolved to trap Twardowski. Disguised as a servant he went to the magician asking his help for his master, who was ill. As Twardowski felt himself safe in Gallicia, he went unsuspectingly. He entered an inn in the village to which the messenger conducted him. He never thought of looking at the sign-board, which bore the fatal name of "Rome." A flock of crows and owls, however, gathered on the roof. The demon entered in his best attire, but with horns and hoofs only too imperfectly concealed. Twardowski saw his danger in a moment. Knowing the helplessness of his foe against a baptized child, he snatched from the cradle the innkeeper's innocent babe. Under the babe's defense he foiled his foe for some time, for the fiend could not touch him without hurting the sinless child. At length Twardowski, who was a match for the demon even in the Hotel de Rome, was appealed to by the devil as a man of honor. "Verbum nobile debet esset stabile." Twardowski, bad though he was, could not break his word, even to the "Father of Lies." He put back the baby, and at once went up the chimney. But his honorable conduct was not allowed to be the cause of his final ruin.

As he was borne in the air by the demon over Cracow, the memory of a hymn to the Virgin, which he had composed when a child, came to his mind. He sang it lustily in his dire trial. The fiend was as transfixed over Cracow as over Helston, but he did not drop him on earth. Twardowski remains still there, floating in the air, and the peasants say he may sometimes be seen on a fine night moving between the stars, awaiting his doom.

ROMA

---

JACK AND HIS GOLDEN SNUFF-BOX

Tradition Bearer: John Roberts

Source: Groome, Francis Hindes. Gypsy Folk Tales. London: Hurst & Blackett, 1899, 209–220.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Roma (Welsh)

National Origin: Roma

---

The Roma are an ethnic group, popularly known by the term Gypsies, a term that is now considered derogatory by the Roma (or Romani) people. This widely distributed group is believed to have originated in South Asia before settling throughout Europe, the British Isles, and the Americas. Historically, the Roma have been subjected to discrimination that has ranged from the negative stereotyping that appears in other narratives in this collection (see, for example, “The Three Lemons,” page 130) to campaigns of “ethnic cleansing.” In contrast, “Jack and His Snuff-box” present a diametrically opposed positive image of the Roma. The tale bears some similarities to the South Asian narrative “The Charmed Ring” (Volume 2, page 176), but the Indian tale is a variant of “The Magic Ring” (AT 560). This tale, collected from Welsh Rom (singular of “Roma”) John Roberts, more closely resembles an “Aladdin” tale (AT 561). In addition to its positive depiction of Roma characters, the following tale includes elements of Roma culture, such as the use of unique family whistles by means of which families can identify each other and an example of the Angloromani dialect (for example, Dordi translates to “look-ye”).

---

Once upon a time there was an old man and an old woman, and they had one son, and they lived in a great forest. And their son never saw any other people in his life, but he knew that there was some more in the world besides his own father and mother, because he had lots of books, and he used to read every day about them. And when he read about some pretty young women, he used to go mad to see some of them. Till one day, when his father was out cutting wood, he told his mother that he wished to go away to look for his living in some other country, and to see some other people besides them two. And he said, "I see nothing at all here but great trees around me; and if I stay here, maybe I shall go mad before I see anything."

The young man's father was out all this time, when the conversation was going on between him and his poor old mother.

The old woman begins by saying to her son before leaving, "Well, well, my poor boy, if you want to go, it's better for you to go, and God be with you." (The old woman thought for the best when she said that.) "But stop a bit before you go. Which would you like best for me to make you—a little cake and to bless you, or a big cake and to curse you?"

"Dear! dear!" said he, "make me a big cake. Maybe I shall be hungry on the road."

The old woman made the big cake, and she went on top of the house, and she cursed him as far as she could see him.

He presently meets with his father, and the old man says to him, "Where are you going, my poor boy?" When the son told the father the same tale as he told his mother, "Well," says his father, "I'm sorry to see you going away, but if you've made your mind to go, it's better for you to go."

The poor lad had not gone far, till his father called him back; when the old man drew out of his pocket a golden snuff-box, and said to him, "Here, take this little box, and put it in your pocket, and be sure not to open it till you are near your death."

And away went poor Jack upon his road, and walked till he was tired and hungry, for he had eaten all his cake upon the road; and by this time night was upon him, as he could hardly see his way before him. He could see some light a long way before him, and he made up to it, and found the back door and knocked at it, till one of the maidservants came and asked him what he wanted. He said that night was on him, and he wanted to get some place to sleep. The maidservant called him in to the fire, and gave him plenty to eat, good meat and bread and beer; and as he was eating his refreshments by the fire, there came the young lady to look at him. And she loved him well, and he loved her. And the young lady ran to tell her father, and said there was a pretty young man in the back kitchen. And immediately the gentleman came to him, and questioned him, and asked what work he could do. He said, the silly fellow, that he could do anything. (Jack meant that he could do any foolish bit of work, what would be wanted about the house.)

“Well,” says the gentleman to him, “at eight o’clock in the morning I must have a great lake and some of the largest man-of-war vessels sailing before my mansion, and one of the largest vessels must fire a royal salute, and the last round break the leg of the bed where my young daughter is sleeping on. And if you don’t do that, you will have to forfeit your life.”

“All right,” said Jack. And away he went to his bed, and said his prayers quietly, and slept till it was near eight o’clock, and he had hardly any time to think what he was to do, till all of a sudden he remembered about the little golden box that his father gave him. And he said to himself, “Well, well, I never was so near my death as I am now”; and then he felt in his pocket, and drew the little box out.

And when he opened it, there hopped out three little red men and asked Jack, “What is your will with us?”

“Well,” said Jack, “I want a great lake and some of the largest man-of-war vessels in the world before this mansion, and one of the largest vessels to fire a royal salute, and the last round to break one of the legs of the bed where this young lady is sleeping on.”

“All right,” said the little men; “go to sleep.”

Jack had hardly time to bring the words out of his mouth, to tell the little men what to do, but what it struck eight o’clock, when bang, bang went one of the largest man-of-war vessels; and it made Jack jump out of bed to look through the window. And I can assure you it was a wonderful sight for him to see, after being so long with his father and mother living in a wood. By this time Jack dressed himself, and said his prayers, and came down laughing, because he was proud, he was, because the thing was done so well.

The gentleman comes to him, and says to him, “Well, my young man, I must say that you are very clever indeed. Come and have some breakfast.” And the gentleman tells him, “Now there are two more things you have to do, and then you shall have my daughter in marriage.” Jack gets his breakfast, and has a good squint at the young lady, and also she at him. (However, I must get on again with my dear little story.)

The other thing that the gentleman told him to do was to fell all the great trees for miles around by eight o’clock in the morning; and, to make my long story short, it was done, and it pleased the gentleman well. The gentleman said to him, “The other thing you have to do” (and it was the last thing), “you must get me a great castle standing on twelve golden pillars; and there must come regiments of soldiers, and go through their drill. At eight o’clock the commanding officer must say, ‘Shoulder up’.”

“All right,” said Jack; when the third and last morning came and the three great feats were finished, when he had the young daughter in marriage.

But, oh dear! there is worse to come yet.

The gentleman now makes a large hunting party, and invites all the gentlemen around the country to it, and to see the castle as well. And by this time

Jack has a beautiful horse and a scarlet dress to go with them. On that morning his valet, when putting Jack's clothes by, after changing them to go a-hunting, put his hand in one of Jack's waist-coat pockets and pulled out the little golden snuff-box, as poor Jack left behind in a mistake. And that man opened the little box, and there hopped the three little red men out, and asked him what he wanted with them.

"Well," said the valet to them, "I want this castle to be moved from this place far and far across the sea."

"All right," said the little red men to him, "do you wish to go with it?"

"Yes," said he.

"Well, get up," said they to him; and away they went, far and far over the great sea.

Now the grand hunting party comes back, and the castle upon the twelve golden pillars disappeared, to the great disappointment of those gentleman as did not see it before. That poor silly Jack is threatened by taking his beautiful young wife from him, for taking them in the way he did. But the gentleman is going to make a 'greement with him, and he is to have a twelvemonths and a day to look for it; and off he goes with a good horse and money in his pocket.

Now poor Jack goes in search of his missing castle, over hills, dales, valleys, and mountains, through woolly woods and sheepwalks, farther than I can tell you tonight or ever intend to tell you. Until at last he comes up to the place where lives the King of all the little mice in the world. There was one of the little mice on sentry at the front gate going up to the palace, and did try to stop Jack from going in.

He asked the little mouse, "Where does the King live? I should like to see him." This one sent another with him to show him the place; and when the King saw him, he called him in. And the King questioned him, and asked him where he was going that way. Well, Jack told him all the truth, that he had lost the great castle, and was going to look for it, and he had a whole twelvemonths and a day to find it out.

And Jack asked him whether he knew anything about it; and the King said, "No, but I am the King of all the little mice in the world, and I will call them all up in the morning, and maybe they have seen something of it."

Then Jack got a good meal and bed, and in the morning he and the King went on to the fields; and the King called all the mice together, and asked them whether they had seen the great beautiful castle standing on golden pillars. And all the little mice said, "No, there was none of them had seen it."

The old King said to him that he had two other brothers, "One is the King of all the frogs; and my other brother, who is the oldest, he is the King of all the birds in the world. And if you go there, maybe they know something about it" (the missing castle). The King said to him, "Leave your horse here with me till you come back, and take one of my best horses under you, and give this cake to my brother; he will know then who you got it from. Mind and tell him I am well, and should like dearly to see him."

And then the King and Jack shook hands together. And when Jack was going through the gates, the little mouse asked him should he go with him; and Jack said to him, "No, I shall get myself into trouble with the King."

And the little thing told him, "It will be better for you to have me go with you; maybe I shall do some good to you sometime without you knowing it."

"Jump up, then."

And the little mouse ran up the horse's leg, and made it dance; and Jack put the mouse in his pocket. Now Jack, after wishing good-morning to the King, and pocketing the little mouse which was on sentry, trudged on his way. And such a long way he had to go, and this was his first day. At last he found the place; and there was one of the frogs on sentry, and gun upon his shoulder, and did try to hinder Jack not to go in. And when Jack said to him that he wanted to see the King, he allowed him to pass; and Jack made up to the door. The King came out, and asked him his business; and Jack told him all from beginning to ending.

"Well, well, come in."

He gets good entertainment that night; and in the morning the King made a curious sound, and collected all the frogs in the world. And he asked them, did they know or see anything of a castle that stood upon twelve golden pillars. And they all made a curious sound, Kro-kro, kro-kro, and said, "No."

Jack had to take another horse, and a cake to his brother which is the King of all the fowls of the air. And as Jack was going through the gates, the little frog which was on sentry asked John should he go with him. Jack refused him for a bit; but at last he told him to jump up, and Jack put him in his other waistcoat pocket. And away he went again on his great long journey; it was three times as long this time as it was the first day; however, he found the place, and there was a fine bird on sentry. And Jack passed him, and he never said a word to him. And he talked with the King, and told him everything, all about the castle.

"Well," said the King to him, "you shall know in the morning from my birds whether they know anything or not."

Jack put up his horse in the stable, and then went to bed, after having something to eat. And when he got up in the morning, the King and he went on to some fields, and there the King made some funny noise, and there came all the fowls that were in all the world. And the King asked them, Did they see the fine castle? and all the birds answered, "No."

"Well," said the king, "where is the great bird?"

They had to wait, then, for a long time for eagle to make his appearance, when at last he came all in a perspiration, after sending two little birds high up in the sky to whistle on him to make all the haste he possibly could. The King asked the great bird, Did he see the great castle?

And the bird said, "Yes, I came from there where it now is."

"Well," says the King, "this young gentleman has lost it, and you must go with him back to it. But stop till you get a bit of something to eat first."

They killed a thief, and sent the best part of it to feed the eagle on his journey over the seas, and had to carry Jack on his back. Now, when they came in sight of the castle, they did not know what to do to get the little golden box.

Well, the little mouse said to them, "Leave me down, and I will get the little box for you." So the mouse stole himself in the castle, and had a hold of the box; and when he was coming down the stairs, fell it down, and very near being caught. He came running out with it, laughing his best.

"Have you got it?" Jack said to him.

He said, "Yes"; and off they went back again, and left the castle behind. As they were all of them (Jack, mouse, frog, and eagle) passing over the great sea, they fell to quarreling about which it was that got the little box, till down it slipped into the water. (It was by them looking at it, and handing it from one hand to the other, that they dropped the little box in the bottom of the sea.)

"Well, well," said the frog, "I knew as I would have to do something, so you had better let me go down in the water."

And they let him go, and he was down for three days and three nights; and up he comes, and shows his nose and little mouth out of the water. And all of them asked him, "Did he get it?" and he told them, "No."

"Well, what are you doing there, then?"

"Nothing at all," he said; "only I want my full breath"; and the poor little frog went down the second time, and he was down for a day and a night, and up he brings it.

And away they did go, after being there four days and nights and, after a long tug over seas and mountains, arrive at the old King's palace, who is the master of all the birds in the world. And the King is very proud to see them, and has a hearty welcome and a long conversation. Jack opens the little box, and told the little men to go back and to bring the castle here to them. "And all of you make as much haste back again as you possibly can."

The three little men went off; and when they came near the castle, they were afraid to go to it, till the gentleman and lady and all the servants were gone out to some dance. And there was no one left behind there, only the cook and another maid with her. And it happened to be that a poor Gypsy woman, knowing that the family was going from home, made her way to the castle to try to tell the cook's fortune for a bit of victuals, was there at the time. And the little red men asked her, "Which would she rather—go or stop behind?"

And she said, "I will go with you."

And they told her to run upstairs quick. She was no sooner up and in one of the drawing-rooms than there comes just in sight the gentleman and lady and all the servants. But it was too late. Off they went at full speed, and the Gypsy woman laughing at them through the window, making motion for them to stop, but all to no purpose. They were nine days on their journey, in which they did try to keep the Sunday holy, by one of the little men turned to be priest, the other the clerk, and third presided at the organ, and the three women were the singers (cook, housemaid, and Gypsy woman), as they had a grand chapel in the castle already. Very remarkable, there was a discord made in the music, and one of the little men ran up one of the organ-pipes to see where the bad sound came from, when he found out that it only happened to be that the three women were laughing at the little red man stretching his little legs full length on the bass pipes, also his two arms the same time, with his little red nightcap, what he never forgot to wear, and what they never witnessed before, could not help calling forth some good merriment while on the face of the deep. And, poor things! Through them not going on with what they begun with, they very near came to danger, as the castle was once very near sinking in the middle of the sea.

At length, after merry journey, they come again to Jack and the King. The King was quite struck with the sight of the castle; and going up the golden stairs, wishing to see the inside, when the first one that attracted his attention was the poor Gypsy woman. And he said to her, "How are you, sister?"

She said to him, "I am very well. How are you?"

"Quite well," said he to her; "come into my place, to have a talk with you, and see who you are, and who your people are."

The old Gypsy woman told him that some of her people were some of them from the Lovells, Stanleys, Lees, and I don't know all their names. The King and Jack was very much pleased with the Gypsy woman's conversation, but poor Jack's time was drawing to a close of a twelvemonths and a day. And he, wishing to go home to his young wife, gave orders to the three little men to get ready by the next morning at eight o'clock to be off to the next brother, and to stop there for one night; also to proceed from there to the last or the youngest brother, the master of all the mice in the world, in such place where the castle shall be left under his care until it's sent for. Jack takes a farewell of the King, and thanks him very much for his hospitality, and tells him not to be surprised when he shall meet again in some other country.

Away went Jack and his castle again, and stopped one night in that place; and away they went again to the third place, and there left the castle under his care. As Jack had to leave the castle behind, he had to take to his own horse, which he left there when he first started. The king liked the Gypsy woman well, and told her that he would like if she would stay there with him; and the Gypsy woman did stay with him until she was sent for by Jack.

Now poor Jack leaves his castle behind and faces towards home; and after having so much merriment with the three brothers every night, Jack became sleepy on horseback, and would have lost the road if it was not for the little men a-guiding him. At last he arrives, weary and tired, and they did not seem to receive him with any kindness whatever, because he did not find the stolen castle. And to make it worse, he was disappointed in not seeing his young and beautiful wife to come and meet him, through being hindered by her parents. But that did not stop long. Jack put full power on.

Jack dispatched the little men off to bring the castle from there, and they soon got there; and the first one they seen outside gather sticks to put on the fire was the poor Gypsy woman. And they did whistle to her, when she turned around smartly and said to them, “Dordi! dordi! How are you, comrades? Where do you come from, and where are you going?”

“Well, to tell the truth, we are sent to take this castle from here. Do you wish to stop here or to come with us?”

“I would like better to go with you than to stay here.”

“Well, come on, my poor sister.”

Jack shook hands with the King, and returned many thanks for his kingly kindness. When, all of a sudden, the King, seeing the Gypsy woman, which he fell in so much fancy with, and whom he so much liked, was going to detain the castle until such time he could get her out. But Jack, perceiving his intentions, and wanting the Gypsy woman himself for a nurse, instructed the little men to spur up and put speed on. And off they went, and were not long before they reached their journey’s end, when out comes the young wife to meet him with a fine lump of a young son.

Now, to make my long story short, Jack, after completing what he did, and to make a finish for the poor broken-hearted Gypsy woman, he has the loan of one of his father-in-law’s largest man-of-wars, which is laying by anchor, and sends the three little men in search of her kinsfolk, so as they may be found, and to bring them to her. After long searching they are found and brought back, to the great joy of the woman and delight of his wife’s people-in-law, for after a bit they became very fond of each other. When they came on land, Jack’s people allowed them to camp on their ground near a beautiful river; and the gentlemen and ladies used to go and see for them every day. Jack and his wife had many children, and had some of the Gypsy girls for nurses; and the little children were almost half Gypsies, for the girls continually learning them our language. And the gentleman and the lady were delighted with them. And the last time I was there, I played my harp for them, and got to go again.

MADE OVER TO THE DEVIL

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Groome, Francis Hindes. Gypsy Folk Tales. London: Hurst & Blackett, 1899, 125–128.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Roma (Romania/Ukraine)

National Origin: Roma

---

The following tale was drawn from the section of Eastern Europe formerly known as Burkovina (or Burkowina), an area currently split between Romania and Ukraine. A relatively common feature of oral performance, as distinct from literary texts, is the occasional “omission” of linking details. “Made over to the Devil,” a variant of “The Girl as Helper in the Hero’s Flight” (AT 313), exemplifies this feature. For this reason, it is useful to compare the current version of the tale type with the more detailed Polish variant of the same narrative, “Prince Unexpected” (page 152).

---

There was a rich man, and he went into the forest, and fell into a bog with his carriage. And his wife brought forth a son, and he knew it not. And the Devil came forth, and said, “What will you give me if I pull you out?”

“I will give you what you want.”

“Give me what you have at home.”

“I have horses, oxen.”

“Give me that which you have not seen.”

“I will.”

“Make a covenant with me.”

He made a covenant with him, and the Devil pulled him out of the mud, and the man went home. By the time he got home he had forgotten the covenant.

The boy was twenty years old. “Make me a cake, mother, for I’m off to the place my father pledged me to.” And he went far over the mountains, and came to the Devil’s house. There was an old woman in the house, and a daughter of the Devil’s, and she asked him, “Whither art going, lad?”

“I have come to the lord here, to serve.”

And the girl saw him, and he pleased her. “I may tell you that he is my father. My father will turn himself into a horse, and will tell you to mount him and traverse the world. And do you make yourself an iron club and an iron curry-comb, and hit him with the club, for he will not stoop, and get on his back, and as you go keep hitting him on the head.”

He traversed the world, and came home, put him in the stable, and went to the maiden.

“My father didn’t fling you?”

“No, for I kept hitting him on the head.”

The Devil called him, and took a jar of poppy-seed, and poured it out on the grass, and told him to gather it all up, and fill the jar, for, “If you don’t, I will cut off your head.”

He went to the maiden, and wept.

“What are you weeping for?”

“Your father has told me to fill the jar with poppy-seed; and if I don’t, he will cut off my head.”

She said, “Fear not.” She went outside and gave a whistle, and the mice came as many as all the blades of grass and the leaves.

And they asked, “What do you want, mistress?”

“Gather the poppy-seed and fill the jar.”

And the mice came and picked up the grains of poppy-seed one by one, and filled the jar. The Devil saw it. “You’re a clever chap. Here is one more task for you: drain the marsh, and plough it, and sow it, and tomorrow bring me roasted maize. And if you do not, I shall cut your head off.”

He went to the maiden and wept. “Your father has told me to drain the marsh, and give him roasted maize tomorrow.”

“Fear not.”

She went outside, and took the fiery whip. And she struck the marsh once, and it was dried up; a second time she struck, and it was ploughed; the third time she struck, it was sowed; the fourth time she struck, and the maize was roasted; and in the morning he gave him roasted maize.

She said to him, “We are three maidens. He will make us all alike, will call you to guess which is the eldest, which is the middle one, and which the youngest; and you will not be able to guess, for we shall be all just alike. I shall be at the top, and notice my feet, for I shall keep tapping one foot on the other; the middle one will be in the middle, and the eldest fronting you, and so you will know.”

The Devil said to him, “One more task I will give you. Fell the whole forest, and stack it by tomorrow.”

He went to the maiden, and the maiden asked him, “Have you a father and mother?”

“I have.”

“Ah! let us fly, for my father will kill you. Take the whetstone, and take a comb; I have a towel.”

They set out and fled. The Devil arose, saw that the forest is not felled. “Go and call him to me.”

Ho, ho! there is neither the lad nor the maiden.

“Hah! go after them.”

They went, and the two saw them coming after them. And she said to him, “I will make myself a field of wheat, and do you make yourself to be looking at the wheat, and they will ask you, ‘Didn’t a maiden and a lad pass by?’”

“Bah! they passed when I was sowing the wheat.”

“Go back, for we shall not catch them.”

They went back. “We did not catch them.”

“On the road did not you find anything?”

“We found a field of wheat and a peasant.”

“Go back, for the field of wheat was she, and he was the peasant.”

They saw them again. She said to the lad, "I will turn a somersault and make myself an old church, and do you turn a somersault and make yourself an old monk, and they will ask you, 'Didn't a maiden and a lad pass by?'"

"They passed just as I began the church."

"Ah! go back, for we shall never catch them. When he was beginning the church! It is old now."

"Did you not find anything on the road?"

"We found a church and a monk."

"The church was she, and he was the monk. I will go myself."

They saw him. "Now my father is coming; we shall not escape. Flung the comb."

He flung the comb, and it became a forest from earth to sky. Whilst he was gnawing away the forest, they got a long way ahead. He was catching them up; she cried, "Flung the whetstone."

He flung the whetstone, and it became a rock of stone from earth even to heaven. Whilst he, the Devil, was making a hole in the rock, they got a long way ahead. Again he is catching them up.

"Father is catching us up." She flung the towel, and it became a great water and a mill.

They halted on the bank.

And he cried, "Harlot, how did you cross the water?"

"Fasten the millstone to your neck, and jump into the water."

He fastened the millstone to his neck, and jumped into the water, and was choked.

She said, "Fear not, for my father is choked."

He went to his father with the maiden. His father rejoiced; but the maiden said to the lad, "I will go to expiate my father's sins, for I choked him. I go for three years."

She took her ring, and broke it in half, and gave one half to him. "Keep that, and do not lose it." She departed for three years.

He forgot her, and made preparations to marry. He was holding his wedding. She came, and he knew her not.

"Drink a glass of brandy."

She drank out of his glass, and flung the half of the ring into the glass, and gave it to him. When he drank, he got it into his mouth, and he took it in his hand and looked at it, and he took his half and fitted the two together. "Hah! this is my wife; this one saved me from death."

And he quashed that marriage, and took his first wife and lived with her.

THE VAMPIRE

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Groome, Francis Hindes. Gypsy Folk Tales. London: Hurst & Blackett, 1899, 14–18.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Roma (Romania)

National Origin: Roma

---

Author Francis Hinds Groom glosses the word “bee” as “a species of assembly very popular in Wallachia (modern Romania). If any family has some particular work to do on any particular account, they invite the neighborhood to come and work for them. When the work is completed there is high glee, singing and dancing, and story-telling” (14). Certain elements of the tale are cross-culturally distributed. For example, it is noted that the “old woman saw he [Nita’s suitor] had cock’s feet.” Unusual feet (cock’s feet, hooves, feet turned backwards, for example) are commonly marks of demons, revenants, or other malevolent supernaturals in the world’s folk traditions. The ability to produce a gaze that injures or kills, as the tale notes “Then he looked,” is most familiar as the concept of the “evil eye.” The act of transformation by performing inverted acts (in this case, the flower turning into a girl by turning a somersault) is found in both initiation and in the shape-shifting acts of witches and werewolves, especially in Eastern Europe.

---

There was an old woman in a village. And grown-up maidens met and span, and made a “bee.” And the young sparks [“eligible” young men] came and laid hold of the girls, and pulled them about and kissed them. But one girl had no sweetheart to lay hold of her and kiss her. And she was a strapping lass, the daughter of wealthy peasants; but three whole days no one came near her. And she looked at the big girls, her comrades. And no one troubled himself with her. Yet she was a pretty girl, a prettier was not to be found.

Then came a fine young spark, and took her in his arms and kissed her, and stayed with her until cock-crow. And when the cock crowed at dawn he departed. The old woman saw he had cock’s feet. And she kept looking at the lad’s feet, and she said, “Nita, my lass, did you see anything?”

“I didn’t notice.”

“Then didn’t I see he had cock’s feet?”

“Let be, mother, I didn’t see it.”

And the girl went home and slept; and she arose and went off to the spinning, where many more girls were holding a “bee.” And the young sparks came, and took each one his sweetheart. And they kissed them, and stayed a while, and went home. And the girl’s handsome young spark came and took her in his arms and kissed her and pulled her about, and stayed with her till midnight. And the cock began to crow. The young spark heard the cock crowing, and departed. What said the old woman who was in the hut, “Nita, did you notice that he had horse’s hoofs?”

“And if he had, I didn’t see.”

Then the girl departed to her home. And she slept and arose in the morning, and did her work that she had to do. And night came, and she took her spindle and went to the old woman in the hut. And the other girls came, and the young sparks came, and each laid hold of his sweetheart. But the pretty girl looks at them. Then the young sparks gave over and departed home. And only the girl remained neither a long time nor a short time. Then came the girl’s young spark.

Then what will the girl do? She took heed, and stuck a needle and thread in his back. And he departed when the cock crew, and she knew not where he had gone to. Then the girl arose in the morning and took the thread, and followed up the thread, and saw him in a grave where he was sitting. Then the girl trembled and went back home.

At night the young spark that was in the grave came to the old woman’s house and saw that the girl was not there. He asked the old woman, “Where’s Nita?”

“She has not come.”

Then he went to Nita’s house, where she lived, and called, “Nita, are you at home?”

Nita answered, [“I am”].

“Tell me what you saw when you came to the church. For if you don’t tell me I will kill your father.”

“I didn’t see anything.”

Then he looked, and he killed her father, and departed to his grave.

Next night he came back. “Nita, tell me what you saw.”

“I didn’t see anything.”

“Tell me, or I will kill your mother, as I killed your father. Tell me what you saw.”

“I didn’t see anything.”

Then he killed her mother, and departed to his grave. Then the girl arose in the morning. And she had twelve servants. And she said to them, “See, I have much money and many oxen and many sheep; and they shall come to the twelve of you as a gift, for I shall die tonight. And it will fare ill with you if you bury me not in the forest at the foot of an apple tree.”

At night came the young spark from the grave and asked, “Nita, are you at home?”

“I am.”

“Tell me, Nita, what you saw three days ago, or I will kill you, as I killed your parents.”

“I have nothing to tell you.”

Then he took and killed her. Then, casting a look, he departed to his grave.

So the servants, when they arose in the morning, found Nita dead. The servants took her and laid her out decently. They sat and made a hole in the wall and passed her through the hole, and carried her, as she had bidden, and buried her in the forest by the apple tree.

And half a year passed by, and a prince went to go and course hares with greyhounds and other dogs. And he went to hunt, and the hounds ranged the forest and came to the maiden's grave. And a flower grew out of it, the like of which for beauty there was not in the whole kingdom. So the hounds came on her monument, where she was buried, and they began to bark and scratched at the maiden's grave. Then the prince took and called the dogs with his horn, and the dogs came not. The prince said, "Go quickly thither."

Four huntsmen arose and came and saw the flower burning like a candle. They returned to the prince, and he asked them, "What is it?"

"It is a flower, the like was never seen."

Then the lad heard, and came to the maiden's grave, and saw the flower and plucked it. And he came home and showed it to his father and mother. Then he took and put it in a vase at his bed-head where he slept. Then the flower arose from the vase and turned a somersault, and became a full-grown maiden. And she took the lad and kissed him, and bit him and pulled him about, and slept with him in her arms, and put her hand under his head. And he knew it not. When the dawn came she became a flower again.

In the morning the lad rose up sick, and complained to his father and mother, "Mammy, my shoulders hurt me, and my head hurts me."

His mother went and brought a wise woman and tended him. He asked for something to eat and drink. And he waited a bit, and then went to his business that he had to do. And he went home again at night. And he ate and drank and lay down on his couch, and sleep seized him. Then the flower arose and again became a full-grown maiden. And she took him again in her arms, and slept with him, and sat with him in her arms. And he slept. And she went back to the vase. And he arose, and his bones hurt him, and he told his mother and his father.

Then his father said to his wife, "It began with the coming of the flower. Something must be the matter, for the boy is quite ill. Let us watch tonight, and post ourselves on one side, and see who comes to our son."

Night came, and the prince laid himself in his bed to sleep. Then the maiden arose from the vase, and became there was never anything more fair—as burns the flame of a candle. And his mother and his father, the king, saw the maiden, and laid hands on her. Then the prince arose out of his sleep, and saw the maiden that she was fair. Then he took her in his arms and kissed her, and lay down in his bed, slept till day.

And they made a marriage and ate and drank. The folk marveled, for a being so fair as that maiden was not to be found in all the realm. And he dwelt with her half a year, and she bore a golden boy, two apples in his hand. And it pleased the prince well.

Then her old sweetheart heard it, the vampire who had made love to her, and had killed her. He arose and came to her and asked her, "Nita, tell me, what did you see me doing?"

"I didn't see anything."

"Tell me truly, or I will kill your child, your little boy, as I killed your father and mother. Tell me truly."

"I have nothing to tell you."

And he killed her boy. And she arose and carried him to the church and buried him.

At night the vampire came again and asked her, "Tell me, Nita, what you saw."

"I didn't see anything."

"Tell me, or I will kill the lord whom you have wedded."

Then Nita arose and said, "It shall not happen that you kill my lord. God send you burst."

The vampire heard what Nita said, and burst. Ay, he died, and burst for very rage. In the morning Nita arose and saw the floor swimming two hand's-breadth deep in blood. Then Nita bade her father-in-law take out the vampire's heart with all speed. Her father-in-law, the king, hearkened, and opened him and took out his heart, and gave it into Nita's hand. And she went to the grave of her boy and dug the boy up, applied the heart, and the boy arose. And Nita went to her father and to her mother, and anointed them with the blood, and they arose. Then, looking on them, Nita told all the troubles she had borne, and what she had suffered at the hands of the vampire.

ROMANIA

---

MANOLI

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Mawr, Mrs. E. B. "Manoli: A Legend of the 13th Century." Roumanian Fairy Tales and Legends. London: H. K. Lewis, 1881, 97–105.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Romania

National Origin: Romania

---

Radu the Black, according to Romanian tradition, was the founder of Wallachia (one of the three major principalities that along with Transylvania and Moldavia constitute modern Romania) in the late thirteenth century. The legend of Manoli maintains a dual focus on the dedication to the fidelity of the tragic lovers Manoli and Flora and the ruthless duplicity of Radu.

---

A brilliant cortège winds along the banks of a river; a crowd of powerful nobles respectfully surround their Chief, whose great height and manly expression, seem to indicate him worthy of being the Commander amongst them all. In his immediate neighborhood, nine artisans may be observed; they also yield obedience to a Chief, noted for his superior experience and knowledge.

The river below, the river whose waters roll through a country so wild, here shooting up into cascades, and there falling back murmuring on the pointed rocks worn and sharpened by their beatings; lower down, flowing evenly along—sometimes subdued, sometimes in revolt—emblematic alike of life, will, impatience, and human resignation; this river is the Argis, and the country through which it flows is called Lesser Wallachia.

The Chief whom we see surrounded by his nobles, mounted on their splendid horses, with gorgeous trappings, is Radu the Black, Prince of the country, and founder of the Principality.

This brilliant cavalcade is in reality a pious pilgrimage, in search of a suitable site, to be consecrated by the erection of a Monastery, unequalled for beauty of position, and richness of design.

This is also why, amongst so illustrious a company are to be found the nine masons, headed by the master hand of all the masons—the renowned Manoli.

A young shepherd comes in sight, playing on his flute, a Doïna (National wail) of his country.

“Shepherd,” cried Radu, stopping him, “thou must often with thy flocks have explored the banks of the Argis; tell me, hast thou never seen a wall hidden amongst the green brushwood of the nut trees?”

“Yes, Prince, I have seen a wall which was begun to be built, and my dogs howled at it, as if they had been howling for a death.”

“Right,” said the Prince, with satisfaction, “it is there that our Monastery shall rise”; then calling Manoli and his masons, “Listen,” he said, “I wish you to build me an edifice, so noble and beautiful, that its equal shall never be found, neither in the present nor in the future. I promise to you all, treasures, titles, and estates, which shall make you equals with the Boyards [nobles] of my court. I promise, on the honor of a Prince, and you know you may rely on my promises. Wait I don’t thank me yet! My word is sacred, and again I say, what I promise I always carry out; if you do not succeed, I will have you walled up living, in the foundation of the Monastery, which shall be built by cleverer hands than yours.”

Terror, and ambition, two great incentives for all men! So the masons get quickly to work; they measure the ground; they dig the soil; and soon a majestic wall begins to rise. Satisfied with their work, and certain of success, they fall asleep and dream of the lands, and treasures, and titles, which their skillfulness is to bring them.

Morning comes, the golden rays of the sun dart over the waters of the Argis; the cool morning air, and the desire to continue their work—only interrupted for needful repose—arouse the masons; they seize their tools, and walk quickly to recommence their labors; but, alas! that wall, those solid foundations, all, all, during the night, had crumbled and disappeared.

Instead of sitting down and complaining, the masons recommenced their task; they think of the Prince, and of his oath, and they Work and tremble, and tremble and work. At length, at the end of the day—a long summer’s day, they have repaired the terrible disaster, and when evening comes, they again seek repose.

Again morning, and again sunlight reveals the crumbled walls!

In despair, the workmen recommence; for has not the Prince sworn his terrible oath? But when night comes, they no longer dream of treasures and titles, but of the terrible chastisement which awaits them.

When they again awake, all is ruin, and this happens four times to them.

The fourth night, notwithstanding his anxiety, Manoli sleeps, and he dreams a strange and terrible dream. He awakes, and calls his comrades. "Listen," he says, "to what has been told to me while I was asleep. A voice whispered to me that all our work will be in vain; that each night, the work of each day will be destroyed, unless we wall up, living, in our edifice, the first woman, be she wife or sister, who in the early morning comes to bring our food."

The prospects of the honors which the construction of the Monastery was to bring them; the riches and titles with which their work was to be recompensed—decided the workmen, and they each swore a solemn oath, to wall up while living, be she sister, or wife, the first woman who should come amongst them next day.

Morning arrived, clear and pure, as if it would not light on one despairing heart. Manoli anxiously looks into the distance, his oath strikes him with terror; but he is ambitious, and why should he refuse to sacrifice some one, to insure his own safety, and the success of his labor? Looking at it in this light, the engagement becomes a sacred duty; it is humane even, to secure the safety of several, at the price of one, and Manoli begins to regard the proceeding as heroic. Yet he is restless, and gets on a hillock to look around him, to see still further; he even mounts a scaffolding, and his eyes scan fearfully the surrounding plain.

Distant, far distant, he sees something advancing. Who comes in such haste? In truth, it is a woman, careful and diligent, bringing the early morning meal to the man she loves. See, with light quick step, she comes nearer and nearer, she is recognized. It is the beautiful Flora, the wife of Manoli. Everything disappears from Manoli's sight, the sun is dark, and swollen; instead of light, there is the darkness of the tomb.

He falls on his knees, and, joining his hands, calls, "Oh, Lord, God; open the cataracts of Heaven, shower on the earth torrents of water, turn the streamlets into lakes, oh, Merciful Savior, that my wife may not be able reach me here!" Did God listen to his prayer? Shortly clouds covered the sky, and heavy rain began to fall, but Flora continued her way. Was not her husband waiting? What mattered these obstacles?

Against stream and torrent, she still advances, and Manoli watching her, again kneels, joins his hands, and cries, "Oh, my God, send a wind to twist and tear up the plantains, to overthrow the mountains, and to force my wife to return to the valley!"

The wind rises and whistles in the forest, uproots the plantains, to overthrow mountains, yet Flora only hastens more quickly to reach her husband and at length arrives at the fatal spot. Then the masons tremble at the sight, but tremble with joy.

While Manoli, grief stricken, takes his wife in his arms and says, "Listen, my dear, to amuse ourselves, we are going to pretend to build you up in these walls, it will be I, who will place you there, so remain very quiet."

Flora laughingly consented, for she loved Manoli and had full confidence in him. Manoli sighed heavily, but though sighing, began to build the wall, which already reaches to the ankles of Flora—to her knees—higher and higher. Flora laughs no longer, but, seized with terror, cries, “Manoli, oh, Manoli, leave off this cruel joking, the wall presses on me, it will crush me.”

Manoli is silent, but works on, the wall still rises, and is now level with her waist.

Again she cries, “Manoli! Manoli! stay your hand; soon I shall no longer see you; I love you so; you are sacrificing me, and yet you say you love me too.”

Manoli works on, and to console himself, thinks, “Shortly I shall hear no longer her complaining; suffering is not so bad, when one does not witness it.”

The work proceeds—the wall rises even to her eye-brows—at length she is hid from sight entirely. Manoli moves away, but still hears the faint moaning voice of his wife. “Manoli, Manoli, the wall is pressing on me, and my life is dying out.”

The day was magnificent on which the Prince came to kneel and give thanks at the beautiful Monastery the best proportioned, and the finest in style and grandeur which had ever been built. The master masons, Manoli amongst them, swelling with pride, waited, at the top of the scaffolding, the visit, the praise, and the recompense of Raddi their Prince.

“Well, is it true,” said the Prince, “that you could never imagine, or construct, an edifice more splendid than this? Can no other Sovereign signalize his power and his wealth by a finer building than this?”

The masons inflamed with pride and emulation, cried with a triumphant air, “Know, Prince, that we are the Master Masons, whose science and skill is unrivalled: we might be able, even, to create a greater work than this.”

The Prince turned aside with a wicked smile.

“Wait up here for me,” he said, “I will go down to fully examine the edifice from below, and I will come up again and make my observations to you.” Hurrying from the scaffolding, he gave a quick sign, and command to the people below, who speedily knocked away, props, poles, and planks, and the masons fell from the great height to an instantaneous death. Manoli, alone caught at a projecting carving, and passing from one to another, would soon have reached the ground, but there came from the wall which he was touching, the cry, “Manoli, Manoli, the cold wall is pressing on me, my body is crushed, and my life is dying out.” At this sound, Manoli, turns giddy and faint, and falls to the earth.

On the spot where he fell, there springs a fountain of clear sparkling water, but its taste is salt and bitter, as the tears which are shed in Romania, even now, when any one relates the sorrows and the sacrifice of Flora, the wife of Manoli.

THE FISHERMAN AND THE BOYARD'S DAUGHTER

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Mawr, Mrs. E. B. Roumanian Fairy Tales and Legends. London: H. K. Lewis, 1881, 90–96.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Romania

National Origin: Romania

---

From the mid-fifteenth century to the early twentieth century the noble class (the “boyards” or “boyars”) were the prevailing political force in Romania, particularly in the principalities of Wallachia and Moldavia. The pre-twentieth century nonboyard audiences of the preceding tale would find considerable satisfaction in the fisherman’s gaining the advantage of his noble wife by means of “The Silence Wager” (AT 1351). For the upper class, it undoubtedly functioned as a cautionary tale.

---

Once on a time there was a good-looking fisherman, young and intelligent. Every time that he went through the court of a certain Boyard [nobleman], Mariola, the daughter of this Boyard, would call him to her, purchase his fish, and give him money to ten times its value. So much money did he gain in this way, that he began to be indifferent to its possession and yet each day Mariola would still be a customer.

On one of these occasions, while she was handing him the money, she touched his hand and gave it a squeeze; the fisherman grew as red as a beet-root, and looked down, but regaining confidence, began to give himself airs, and twirl his moustache.

Gradually they entered into conversation, and she learned that he was unmarried, and became altogether charmed with the replies she drew from him. Although he was but a fisherman, she fell desperately in love with him, and giving him a purse of gold, she bade him go and buy clothing suitable for a gentleman, and then to come back to her to shew her if they were becoming to him.

After having bought a caftan, and other things fit for a real Boyard, he dressed himself in them, and came to exhibit himself to Mariola. She almost failed to recognize him, for both his carriage and dress were far above one of his station, and she could no longer restrain the love which she had for him in her heart, and gave him to understand that he might be her husband if he wished. The fisherman hesitated, knowing that he was no match for a Boyard’s daughter; but finding that she still insisted, with much bashfulness, and twirling his caciula (cap) from hand to hand, he eventually consented.

On hearing this astounding intelligence, the Boyard was very angry, saying that a fisherman was no match for his child; but as he loved Mariola so tenderly, and seeing that her heart was set upon the marriage, eventually he consented to her prayer.

Mariola again gave a purse of gold to her intended, bidding him buy wedding garments and all that was necessary. Shortly he presented himself, clad in a rich suit embroidered thickly with gold; Mariola conducted him to her father's presence, and they were at once affianced. Not many days after this, the wedding took place, and they took their seats at the banquet given in honor of the occasion.

There was a rule in those days, that the newly married pair should each eat from one lightly boiled egg; the fisherman cut a thin slice of bread, and was going to dip it into the egg, when Mariola caught his arm, saying, "No! I must eat of it first; I am a Boyard's daughter, and you are only a fisherman."

No reply did he make, but rising quietly from the table, quitted the banquet hall, to the astonishment of many of the guests, who did not know that he had been a fisherman.

The bride was very troubled at the mistake she had made, and sat biting her lips with dismay and chagrin. Being unable to support her position, she withdrew to her bedroom, and locked herself in.

All night long sleep would not come to her, and she could only think of her absent bridegroom. At early morning she went to her father to demand permission to go in search of her husband. Her father tried to dissuade her from taking such a step, but in vain, and she set off on her errand.

She traversed the town, the country, villages, country again—again villages; until at length, in one of these small villages, she saw him meanly dressed, and acting as servant at a wayside inn. Approaching him quickly, she began to address him, but he would not appear to know her, and continued his occupation. She entreated him only to speak one word to her, but he only shrugged his shoulders, and turned away his head.

The master of the inn seeing this interruption, called, "How is it that you interfere with my servant, and prevent his working? Don't you see that he is dumb? If you are as respectable as your appearance would show, I advise you to go away and leave him alone."

"He is not dumb," cried she, "he is my husband, and left me for a simple misunderstanding."

The villagers, who had collected around, were astonished at what she said, for she did not look like one who would be poking fun at them.

The innkeeper was also incredible, saying, that a man who was able to speak, would not remain a whole week without uttering a word. In truth, all around took him to be a mute, and used to converse with him by signs. He had already gained their goodwill, by his usefulness and good temper.

Mariola seeing that no one would believe her story, offered to make a bet, that in three days she would make her husband speak, if she were allowed always to be at his side; that if she did not succeed she would consent to be hung. This bet was accepted and legalized by the Prefect of the village.

The following day was to be the first of the trial the fisherman at the beginning of this, knew nothing of the bet, though later on, he got a whisper of it.

Mariola was constantly entreating for one little word. "My darling," she said, "I have been very wrong; I married you because I loved you, I bind myself never again, in all our life-time, to commit such a fault; soften your heart and speak one word to me." Yet no answer—only a shrug of the shoulders, as if he did not understand what she was saying.

The first day passed—came the second day; that passed too, and yet not a sound.

On the third day, Mariola began to tremble with fear, and followed the fisherman wherever he went, still begging him to speak only one word to her. He, on the other hand, fearing to be overcome by her tears, fled from her presence.

The three days have passed, all the villagers are taken up with the affair of the dumb servant at the inn, and the pretty looking girl, who had mistaken him for some one else, and brought this misfortune on herself.

The scaffold was erected, the people had congregated together to see the end of this tragedy; the officials were there, who, against their will, were bound to carry out the punishment.

The executioner approached Mariola, and led her to the scaffold, saying, that as she had failed to make the dumb man speak, she must accept the forfeit of her life.

Sighing, she turned her head once more towards her impassive husband, but seeing no yielding from him, she prepared herself to die. Loosening her hair, making the sign of the cross, she commended herself in prayer to God. All the spectators were moved at the sight. On the steps of the scaffold, with the Priest at her side, once more she turned towards the fisherman, crying, "My dear husband, pray come to my rescue, one word from you will suffice." Shaking his head, he looked in another direction.

With the noose in his hand, waited the executioner; soon he adjusted it round Mariola's pretty neck—one more minute and all would have been over; but the fisherman, stretching forth his hand, called—"Stop!"

All the people were struck with astonishment, and tears of joy rolled down their cheeks. The executioner withdrew the noose, and the fisherman, looking severely at Mariola, asked, "Will you again taunt me with being a fisherman?"

With great emotion she cried, "Forgive me, my dear husband, I own my fault, and will never wound your feelings again."

"Let her come down," said he, "for she is indeed my wife"; and taking her by the hand, he led her back to their home, where their life was one banquet of happiness and prosperity in future.

THE STORY OF THE SWAN MAIDEN AND THE KING

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Gaster, M. Rumanian Bird and Beast Stories. London: Folk-Lore Society, 1915, 249–254.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Romania

National Origin: Romania

---

The following ordinary folktale embeds the tale type “The Singing Bone” (AT 780) within the framework of “The Swan Maiden” (AT 400). As noted previously (for example, “The Three Lemons,” page 130), a gypsy appears as a malevolent stock figure. In addition, “The Story of the Swan Maiden and the King” provides another instance of the Romanian belief in transformation by means of turning somersaults (discussed in the introduction to “The Vampire,” page 173).

---

Once upon a time a king went out hunting, and after he had been hunting in the forest for a long time without finding anything, he found himself suddenly in an open plain, in which there was a huge lake, and in the midst of the lake he saw there a bird swimming about, the like of which he had never seen before. It was a swan.

Drawing his bow, he wanted to shoot it. To his surprise it spoke to him in a human voice, and said, “Do not kill me.”

So he tried his best to catch it, and succeeded. Pleased with the capture of the bird, he carried it home alive, and gave it to the cook to kill it to make a meal of it for him. The cook was a Gypsy. She whetted her knife and went to the bird to cut its throat, when, to her astonishment, the bird turned three somersaults, and there stood before her a most beautiful maiden, more beautiful than she had ever seen before. So she ran to the king and told him what had happened.

The king, who first thought that the cook was trying to play some trickery with him, did not listen to her, but when she persisted in her tale, the king, driven by curiosity, went into the kitchen, and there he saw a girl more beautiful than any that he had ever yet set his eyes upon. He asked her who she was, and she said she was the swan who was swimming on the lake, that she had willfully gone away from her mother, who lived in the land of fairies, and that she had left two sisters behind. So the king took her into the palace and married her.

The Gypsy, who was a pretty wench, had thought that the king would marry her, and when she saw what had happened, she was very angry. But she managed to conceal her anger, and tried to be kind to the new queen, biding her time all the while.

The king and queen lived on for a while in complete happiness, and after a time a child was born unto her.

It so happened that the king had to go on a long journey, leaving the wife and child in the care of the Gypsy. One day the Gypsy came to the queen, and said to her, "Why do you always sit in the palace? Come, let us walk a little in the garden, to hear the birds singing, and to see the beautiful flowers."

The queen, who had no suspicion, took the advice of the Gypsy, and went with her for a walk into the garden. In the middle of the garden there was a deep well, and the Gypsy said artfully to the young queen, "Just bend over the well, and look into the water below, and see whether your face has remained so beautiful as it was on the first day when you turned into a maiden from being a swan."

The queen bent over the well to look down into the depths, and that was what the Gypsy was waiting for, for no sooner did the queen bend over the well, than, getting hold of her by her legs, she threw her down head foremost into the well and drowned her.

When the king came home and did not find the queen, he asked what had happened, and where she was. The Gypsy, who had meanwhile taken charge of the child, and looked after it very carefully, said to the king that the young queen, pining for her old home, had turned again into a swan and flown away.

The king was deeply grieved when he heard this, but believing what the Gypsy had told him, he thought that nothing could be done, and resigned himself to the loss of his wife. The Gypsy woman looked after the child with great care, hoping thereby that she might win the king's love, and that he would marry her. A month, a year passed, and nothing was heard of the wife. And the king, seeing the apparent affection of the Gypsy for the child, decided at last to marry her, and fixed the day of the wedding.

Out of the fountain into which the queen had been thrown, there grew a willow tree with three branches, one stem in the middle and two branching out right and left. Not far from the garden there lived a man who had a large flock of sheep. One day he sent his boy to lead the sheep to the field. On his way the boy passed the king's garden with the well in the middle of it.

As the boy had left his flute at home, when he saw the willow he thought he would cut one of the branches and make a flute. Going into the garden, he cut the middle stem, and made a flute of it. When he put it to his lips, the flute by itself began to play as follows, "O boy, do not blow too hard, for my heart is aching for my little babe which I left behind in the cradle, and to suckle at the black breast of a Gypsy."

When the boy heard what the flute was playing, not understanding what it meant, he was greatly astonished, and ran home to tell his father what had happened with the flute. The father, angry that he had left the sheep alone, scolded him, and took away the flute. Then he tried to see whether the boy had told the truth. As soon as he put it to his mouth the flute started playing the same tune as when the boy had tried to play it. The father said nothing, and wondering at the meaning of the words he hid the flute away in a cupboard.

When the king's wedding day drew near, all the musicians of the kingdom were invited to come and play at the banquet. Some of them passed the old man's house, and hearing from them that they were going to play at the king's banquet, he remembered the marvelous flute, and asked whether he could not go also, as he could play the flute so wonderfully well. His son—the young boy—had meanwhile gone into the garden in the hope of getting another flute, as the willow had three branches. So he cut one of the branches and made a flute of it. Now this flute did not play at all.

When the old man came to the palace, there was much rejoicing and singing. At last his turn came to play. As soon as he put the flute to his lips, the flute sang, "O man, do not blow so hard, for my heart aches for my little babe left in the cradle to be suckled by a black Gypsy."

The Gypsy, who was the king's bride and sat at the head of the table, at once understood the saying of the flute, although she did not know what the flute had to do with the queen whom she had killed.

The king, who marveled greatly at the flute and at the tune which it was singing, took a gold piece and gave it to the man for the flute, and when he started blowing it, the flute began to sing, "O my dear husband, do not blow so hard, for my heart aches for our little babe whom I left in the cradle to be suckled by the black Gypsy. Quickly, quickly, do away with this cruel Gypsy, as otherwise you will lose your wife."

The guests who were present marveled at the song, and no one understood its meaning. The Gypsy, however, who understood full well what it meant, turning to the king, said, "Illustrious king, do not blow this flute and make yourself ridiculous before your guests. Throw it into the fire."

But the king, who felt offended by the words of the Gypsy, made her take up the flute and blow. With great difficulty she submitted to the order of the king, and she was quite justified in refusing to play it, for no sooner had she put the flute to her lips when it sang, "You enemy of mine, do not blow hard, for my heart aches for my little babe left in the cradle to be suckled by you, you evil-minded Gypsy. You have thrown me into the well, and there put an end to my life, but God had pity on me, and he has preserved me to be again the true wife of this illustrious king."

Furious at these words, the Gypsy threw the flute away with so much force that she thought it would break into thousands of splinters. But it was not to be as she thought, for by this very throw the flute was changed into a beautiful woman, more beautiful, indeed, than any had ever seen before. She was the very queen whom the Gypsy had thrown into the well.

When the king saw her, he embraced her and kissed her, and asked her where she had been such a long time. She told him that she had slept at the bottom of the well, into which she had been thrown by the Gypsy, who had hoped to become the queen, and this would have come to pass had it not been for the boy cutting a flute out of the stem of the willow tree. "And now, punish the Gypsy as she deserves, otherwise your wife must leave you."

When the king heard these words, he called the boy and asked him whether he had cut himself a flute from the stem of the willow tree which had grown out of the well in the garden. "It is so, O illustrious king," said the boy, "and may I be forgiven for the audacity of going into the king's garden. I went and cut for myself a flute from the stem of the willow tree, and when I began to blow it, it played, 'Do not blow so hard,' O boy, for my heart is aching within me, for my little babe which I left behind in the cradle, and to suckle at the black breast of a Gypsy."

Then he told him he had gone back to his father, who instead of praising him for the marvelous flute, gave him a good shaking. He had then gone a second time into the garden, and had cut off one of the branches to make a flute, but this did not play like the first one. The king gave the boy a very rich gift, and he ordered the Gypsy to be killed.

Some time afterwards, the queen came to the king and asked leave to go to her mother to tell her all that had happened to her, and to say good-bye forever now, as she henceforth would live among human beings. The king reluctantly gave way. She then made three somersaults, and again became a swan, as she had been when the king found her for the first time on the waters of the lake.

Spreading her wings she flew far away until she reached the house of her mother, who was quite alone. Her two sisters were not there. They had left her some time ago and no one knew whither they had gone. The young queen did not go into the house. She was probably afraid lest her mother would not let her go back again, so she settled on the roof, and there she sang, "Remain in health, good mother mine, as the joy is no longer granted you to have me with you in your house, for you will only see me again when I lose my kingdom, dear mother mine, not before, and not till then."

And without waiting for the answer of her mother she returned back again to her husband. Sitting on the window sill, she sang again, "Rise up, O husband, open the doors, wake up the servants and let them be a witness of my faithfulness to you, for since I have married you I have left my mother, and my sisters have gone away from me, and from a swan I have become a true wife to live in happiness with you. Henceforth I shall no longer be a swan, but you must take care of me that I do not go hence from you. I do not know whether my fate will be a better one by being a queen in this world. O sweet water, how I long to bathe in you! And my white feathers, they will belong to my sisters. Since I am to leave them forever, and my mother with them, O Lord, what have I done? Shall I be able to live upon the earth, and shall I keep the kingdom? Thou, O

Lord, O merciful, hearken unto me and grant that this kingdom may not be in vain.”

And turning again head over heels, she became a woman as before, and entering the palace she lived there with her husband—the king—and if they have not died since, they are still alive.

THE TWELVE-HEADED GRIFFIN

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Mawr, Mrs. E. B. Roumanian Fairy Tales and Legends. London: H. K. Lewis, 1881, 48–57.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Romania

National Origin: Romania

---

The classic folktale plot labeled as “The Dragon Slayer” (AT 300) provides the core for “The Twelve-Headed Griffin.” The monster defeated by Theodor is called a griffin, a mythical beast with head and wings of an eagle and the body of a lion, only in the title. In the narrative itself, reference is made only to a monster. The bull is not a common animal helper in other variants of this tale type, but the “evil gypsy” is a cliché in the Eastern European folktale corpus.

---

Once upon a time there lived a King and Queen whose greatest blessing from God was an only child of fifteen, named Theodor.

This boy from his childhood had learnt to ride, and to shoot with the bow, and had become a great proficient in both arts.

One day while practicing archery, one of his arrows shot out of sight. The boy having marked the direction which it took, went to his father to request his swiftest horse, and money to go in search of his arrow.

His father gave him money, and permission to take the best horse in his stables.

With joy the boy mounted swiftly, and set off at a gallop.

After riding long and far, so far that the sun was disappearing from the horizon, he found himself in a vast prairie full of flowers. Stopping his horse, standing up in his stirrups, and shading his eyes with his hand, he perceived his arrow sticking in the ground. Dismounting he went quickly to the spot, seized the arrow with both hands, and with difficulty drew it out, leaving a great hole in the earth where it had penetrated. On looking down this hole, he saw at the bottom of it, a fine bull, and on the bull’s back, a sword and a letter.

In great surprise at all these strange surroundings, he opened the letter and read, "Whomsoever will take this bull and will give it three pecks of wheat and a gallon of wine, and continue to do so daily, the bull will have power to bring back to life the man who does this, no matter how many times he may die. This sword will turn into stone any living or inanimate object."

Leading the bull, and strapping on the sword, the boy went on his way.

Towards night he reached a city and asked food and shelter of an old woman whom he met with. For himself a draught of water, for the bull a gallon of wine. The old woman fed him and his animals, and gave the requisite wine to the bull. Water she said she had none, for in the whole city there was but one fountain, and that at the outskirts of the town; and that this fountain was guarded by a twelve-headed monster. Whomsoever needed water must sacrifice a young maiden to his appetite.

She told him that the next day it was the King's turn to give his daughter, and that this said King had made a proclamation to the effect, that whosoever would kill this monster and save his daughter, immense riches, and the hand of his daughter in marriage would be the reward.

The youth hearing all this, requested the old woman to awake him very early next morning, and to give him her water-jars, saying he would fill them without giving anything to the monster. She promised this, and he soon fell into a sound sleep.

According to promise the next morning she aroused him, and taking his sword, his bow and arrows, and the water-jars, set off for the well. Arrived there, he found the King's daughter weeping, and waiting to be eaten by the monster. Said the youth to her, "I have come to deliver you from the fangs of the monster, on one condition, that is, that you let me sit down by your side, lay my head on your lap, and if I should fall asleep, not to awake me until the monster shews himself."

The young girl acquiesced with joy, and sitting down beside her, the youth laid his head on her lap, and soon fell asleep. When the monster made his appearance, the girl was so overwhelmed with terror that she could not awake the youth, but cried so plentifully that the scalding tears fell on his face. Jumping up, he saw the Monster before him. Charging his bow, he placed himself in front of the maiden; the monster seeing this, exclaimed, "Stand aside, and let me take my right," but the youth refused, at the same time drew the string of his bow and sent an arrow into the head which was stretched forth for his destruction.

The monster writhed with pain, and projected a second head, and then began a terrible strife. The youth's only defense was his courage and his bow, but the monster had his twelve heads, and his poisoned breath.

All that long summer's day they fought until evening; as night fell the boy could hardly stand from fatigue, had broken his bow, and had but one arrow in his quiver. But, on the other hand, the monster remained with only one head left out of the twelve.

At length, the youth took from the maiden's head, a long mesh of her rich hair—she, more dead than alive from terror, and with it bound his broken bow together, and the fight recommenced. Eventually the youth was victorious, but fell down faint from loss of blood.

While both these young creatures lay fainting by the well side, there came up a Tzigan [Rom, gypsy], in the service of the King, to fetch water. Seeing the monster annihilated, he sought the young Princess, and finding that she was not dead, but only in a swoon, he threw water over her, and she quickly returned to her senses. The Tzigan enquired of her who had killed the monster, and the maiden pointed to the apparently dead Theodor. Quick as thought the Tzigan seized the youth's sword, and cut his body into hundreds of pieces.

Then, collecting the twelve heads and tongues of the monster, and charging the maiden not to tell to the King who had performed this mighty deed, he accompanied her to her father's palace.

Without the knowledge of the Tzigan, the maid let fall a ring, and a handkerchief, beside the remains of the slaughtered youth.

When the King saw his daughter approach, he was overwhelmed with joy, and demanded the name of her deliverer. "I, mighty King," replied the Tzigan, with pride.

"Can this be true?" enquired the King.

"It is true," said his daughter, tremulously.

Though the King was sorely grieved that the deliverer of his child was a gypsy, and a slave, yet he felt bound to fulfill the promise that she should be given him to wife.

II

While Theodor was lying hewed in morsels, by the side of the well, the old woman, his hostess, went to her stable to feed and give drink to the Bull. On seeing her, he refused all nourishment, telling her that "he was thirsting after water, and not after wine, and that she must lead him to the public well; as now that the monster existed no longer, all the world could drink water in peace." He bade her take with them a lump of salt, and soon they arrived at the well.

When the woman saw the morsels of what had once been the brave youth, she began to cry aloud; but the bull said to her, "Don't distress yourself in that way, but do as I tell you: take up piece by piece, limb by limb, and place them together, as they were in life." Obeying him, she put the different members once more together again. The bull licked well the lump of salt, then breathed over, and licked the youth. Wherever his tongue passed over, the marks of the sword disappeared, and when he once more breathed into his face, Theodor opened his eyes and exclaimed, "Have I slept long?"

"You would have slept longer," said the woman, "if your bull had not brought you to life."

All was as a dream to him, and it was only after the bull had explained all that had occurred, that he understood why the maiden was no longer by his side.

On looking around him he saw the ring and the handkerchief which she had dropped; he took possession of them, and they returned to the old woman's dwelling.

The following day the King caused a proclamation to be issued to the effect that the nuptials of his beloved daughter, with Burcea, the Tzigan, would take place in eight days. Burcea her deliverer, inviting the neighboring Kings and Nobles to come and do honor to the ceremony.

He sent for the court tailor, and commanded for his future son-in-law, clothing befitting his new rank. He ordered his treasurer to pay to Burcea, any sum of money which he might demand.

On the appointed day, the guests were assembled in the Imperial Palace; but all were melancholy, and angry, that an ugly, uneducated gipsy, should have gained such a high-born, lovely bride.

Amongst them all, the King was the most grieved, with the exception, perhaps, of his daughter, who reproached herself for not having told the truth to the King, her father.

Burcea, the Tzigan, alone, was joyful.

In those days, it was the custom at the marriage of a King's daughter, for each subject to offer a present, according to his means; so Theodor begged the old woman to make him a cake, which she should take to the palace as his offering. She willingly agreed, and began to make the cake. When it was ready for the oven, the youth slipped the ring into the middle of the cake, and covered the paste over it.

The cake was baked, and wrapped in a clean napkin, and taken by the old woman to the gate of the palace. Her dress was so old and so patched, that the servants forbade her to enter; but the Princess looking from the window, gave orders that she should be admitted, and brought into her presence.

This was quickly done, and the cake was offered with humble wishes for her future happiness. The Princess took the cake and broke it; imagine her surprise when she found her ring in the middle of it! "Where is the person who put this ring here?" asked she of the old woman.

"It must be the handsome boy that is at my cottage," said she, "he who was hewn to pieces by your slave, and was restored to life and health by his friendly bull."

"Take this purse of money for yourself," said the Princess, "and return quickly to your home, tell my deliverer to come here, for I am awaiting him."

The woman sped swiftly on her errand. Full of joy, the youth seized his sword, and taking the handkerchief, set off for the Imperial palace.

On reaching the reception ball, he saw a crowd of Nobles, and in their center, Burcea the Tzigan, swelling with pride, and thinking himself as powerful as a Grand Vizier.

The youth passed speedily on, until he reached an apartment where the Princess was reclining. Seeing him, she sprang up, and flung herself into his arms, crying out, "this is my deliverer, this is my deliverer."

A crowd quickly surrounded them, and Theodor, in a clear voice, said, "It is true that I am the deliverer of this maiden, who would have been eaten by the monster of the well. I killed him, and she was free; but faint from fatigue and loss of blood, when a slave of the King's, coming to the well, and seeing me in this state, hewed me to pieces with my own sword, and threatened the maiden with death, if she avowed the truth. At the same time he possessed himself with the proofs of the monster's destruction. Had it not been for a bull, endowed with a miraculous power of bringing the dead to life, I should now be ready for my grave. Seeing that many wise men are here, and knowing that there is wisdom in numbers, I entreat all present to judge and condemn the one who is guilty."

"To death! to death!" cried the crowd.

The Emperor, calling his servants, ordered them to bring two horses from his stables, one bred in the mountains, the other bred in the plains, and to tie the limbs of Burcea, the Tzigan, to these two animals; his order was obeyed, the horses were let loose, and setting off in a gallop in different directions, the body of the slave was torn limb from limb.

And now, indeed, there was a real rejoicing; but the marriage, and the court festivities were all postponed, until the arrival of the parents of Theodor, who embraced him, and wept for joy and pride, that he had so nobly distinguished himself.

They built for him, and his young bride, a magnificent palace; at the entrance to the courtyard, there was also a well of purest water, apparently guarded and watched over by a gigantic bull in marble.

RUSSIA

---

THE ROGUIISH PEASANT

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Hodgetts, Edith M. S. Tales and Legends from the Land of the Tzar: A Collection of Russian Stories. New York: Charles E. Merrill and Company, 1892, 256–261.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Russia

National Origin: Russia

---

Spanning Eurasia from Poland in the west to the Bering Sea in the east and from Nordic Finland and Norway to East Asian China and Mongolia, Russia is the largest country in the world. In addition, the prevailing social structure through the Tsarist period of Russian history led to a cultural context that was congenial to the preservation and performance of folklore in the village context. These two factors encouraged the development of a diverse repertoire that persisted into the twentieth century.

Hodgetts, who was born and raised in Russia, does not give a specific source for this tale. In her introduction she states, with reference to her sources, “Some of these tales were dictated in the original Russian at school, others were related to me by my nurse and other servants of my father’s household, while some are translations which I have made from various collections of Russian stories current among the people” (vii). The following narrative is an example of the well-known trickster tale “The Student from Paradise” (AT 1540) and also the Egyptian tale “Gifts for My Son Mohammed” (Volume 1, page 3). The final episode in which the trickster asks his victim to guard an alleged bird under a hat is a variant of “Holding Down the Hat” (AT 1528).

---

Once upon a time there lived in a Russian village an old peasant woman who had two sons. One, however, died; and the other was from home, but was soon expected to return to his native village.

One evening, as the peasant woman was working in her little hut, a soldier walked in at the open door. "Good day, little mother!" he said. "Can I stay here the night?"

"Yes, certainly, with pleasure, little father. But whence come you, and who are you?"

"I am nobody in particular, little mother. I am an emigrant for the next world."

"Ah! My precious soul! One of my sons died a little while ago. Did you happen to come across him?"

"Why, yes, of course! We lived in the same sphere."

"No, really! You don't mean it?"

"He feeds and looks after the young cranes in the next world."

"Oh, my precious soul! But where did he get them?"

"Where did he get them! Why, the young cranes roam about among the sweet-briar!"

"How did he look? What clothes had he on?"

"Clothes! He was all in tatters, and a pair of wings."

"Poor fellow! Well, I have got about forty yards of gray cloth and a ten-ruble note. Take them, good man, and give them to my son."

"With pleasure, little mother."

Next morning the old woman gave the soldier the cloth and the money, and wished him a safe journey back. And she also begged him to come again soon and tell her how her son was getting on.

She waited and waited for many a week, but the soldier did not return. At last the day arrived when her other son was expected home.

"How are you, mother mine?" he exclaimed, coming into the hut and embracing his mother. "Have you any news?"

"Yes, my boy. Not very long ago an emigrant from the other world came to stay the night here, and he brought some news of your brother, for they both lived in the same sphere. But he said that the poor fellow had nothing but a pair of wings, so I gave him forty yards of cloth and ten rubles."

"Good gracious, mother, you have given away everything we had. And for what? Just because that man was artful enough to tell you a lot of lies. It really is most astonishing how confiding some people are! I think I will go into the wide world and tell a lot of lies, and see whether, after cheating everybody, I become a very rich man or not. If I succeed, I shall come home again, and then we can live happily together, and have food and money in plenty ever after."

Next day the son went off to try his luck. He went on and on until he came to an estate belonging to a rich Russian barin or gentleman. He walked up to the lordly mansion and saw, in a garden near the house, a large pig with a number of little ones walking about. A thought struck him, and he went down on his knees before the pigs, and began making most polite bows to them.

Now the mistress of the house, who was looking out of one of the windows, saw the performance, and was greatly amused. "Go," she said to one of her maids, "and ask the mujik [peasant] what he is bowing for."

The maid went up to the peasant, saying, "Little mujik, tell me why you are on your knees before the pigs, and why you are bowing to them? My lady has sent me to ask."

"Tell your mistress, my little dear, that yonder pig is my wife's sister, and my son is going to be married tomorrow, so I am asking her and her young ones to come to the wedding. That is all. And she has consented, on condition that your lady allows them. So go and ask your mistress whether she will let them come with me."

The girl burst out laughing, and went straight to her mistress, who also began laughing heartily when she heard all the peasant had said. "What a donkey!" she cried. "Fancy asking the pigs to his son's wedding! Well, never mind. Let all his friends have a good laugh at him. Yes, he may take the pigs. But first dress them up in my shuba (fur coat), and let the coachman get my own little carriage and team ready, so that the pigs need not go to the wedding on foot."

When the carriage was ready, they dressed the pig up in the lady's fur coat, and placed it in the carriage with the young ones, and gave the reins to the peasant, who at once rode away homewards.

Now the master of the house, who was away shooting at the time, returned home a few minutes after the peasant had left. His wife ran out to meet him, laughing.

"I am so glad you have returned, my dear!" she said, "as I am longing to have someone to laugh with. Such a funny thing happened while you were away. A peasant came here and began kneeling and bowing before our pigs. He declared that one of them was his wife's sister, and he was asking her and the little ones to come to his son's wedding!"

"Yes," the husband replied. "and did you let her go?"

"Of course I did. I even had the pig dressed in my best shuba, and had her put in my own little carriage and team, and let the peasant drive it himself. I think it was nothing but right for me to do so. The peasant was so very polite to the pigs. What do you think, my dear?"

"What did I think? Well this: that the peasant was an ass, and you were another!"

And the good man, like the rest of his sex, thought it was a splendid opportunity for flying into a rage. He told his wife that she had been cheated, and then rushing out of the house, he flung himself upon his horse and galloped off after the peasant, who, when he heard that he was being pursued, conveyed the carriage and team into a dark forest hard by, and then going back, took off his cap, seated himself near the entrance of the forest, put the cap beside him on the ground, and waited until the horseman came up to him.

“Hark you, little father!” cried the barin, “have you seen a peasant drive this way with a carriage and team and a number of pigs in it?”

“See him? I should rather think I did! He rode past a long time ago.”

“In which direction did he drive? How had I better go? Do you think I am likely to overtake him?”

“Yes, you could overtake him, I daresay. But the way he went by has many a turning, and you are sure to lose yourself. Is the road quite unknown to you?”

“Yes, little brother. I think, if you don’t mind, it would be better for you to go in search of him and bring him back to me, for you seem to know the way so well!”

“No, brother, I could not possibly, for I have a falcon under my cap here and must watch it.”

“I can do that for you.”

“No, you are sure to let him out, and the bird is very valuable. Besides, if I lost it my master would never forgive me.”

“But how much is it worth?”

“Three hundred rubles, I should think.”

“Very well then, if I lose the bird I will pay the money.”

“No, brother, if you really want me to go after the peasant, you had better give me the money now, for heaven knows what might happen afterwards. You might lose the bird, and then take your departure too, and I should never see either the falcon or the money!”

“Oh, you incredulous man! Here, take the three hundred rubles anyhow!”

The peasant took the money, and at the barin’s wish mounted his horse and rode off into the forest, leaving the barin to watch over the empty cap.

He waited and waited, but the peasant did not return, which he thought looked rather queer. The sun began to set. Still no peasant.

“Stop!” thought the barin. “Let me look and see whether there really is a falcon under that cap. If there is, then the peasant may possibly return. If not, well, then it is of no use waiting here and wasting my time.” He peeped under the cap, but no falcon was to be seen.

“Ah, the wretch!” he laughed. “I do believe that he was the very same man who cheated my wife out of her carriage and team, her shuba, and the pigs.”

He spat on the ground three times with vexation, and returned home to his wife penitent. Meanwhile our friend the peasant had long since got safely back to his mother with all his treasures. “Well, mother mine!” he cried, “this world of ours can certainly boast of some very good-natured fools. Just look, without any reason whatever, they gave me three horses, a carriage, three hundred rubles, and a pig with her little ones. Now we can live happily for some time at least, thanks to the stupidity of these people. It really is wonderful.

THE SILVER PLATE AND THE TRANSPARENT APPLE

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Hodgetts, Edith M. S. Tales and Legends from the Land of the Tzar: A Collection of Russian Stories. New York: Charles E. Merrill and Company, 1892, 14–20.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Russia

National Origin: Russia

---

In this unusual version of “The Singing Bone” (AT 780), a younger sibling suffers the usual fate of mistreatment and misjudgment. “Simpleton” is revealed as far from simple, though perhaps too forgiving by normal standards.

---

There lived once a peasant with his wife and three daughters. Two of these girls were not particularly beautiful, while the third was sweetly pretty. However, as she happened to be a very good girl, as well as simple in her tastes, she was nicknamed Simpleton, and all who knew her called her by that name, though she was in reality far from being one.

Her sisters thought of nothing but dress and jewelry. The consequence was that they did not agree with their younger sister. They teased her, mimicked her, and made her do all the hard work. Yet Simpleton never said a word of complaint, but was ready to do anything. She fed the cows and the poultry. If anyone asked her to bring anything, she brought it in a moment. In fact, she was a most obliging young person.

One day the peasant had to go to a big fair to sell hay, so he asked his two eldest daughters what he should bring them.

“Bring me some red fustian to make myself a sarafan [coat without sleeves],” said the eldest.

“Buy me some yards of nankeen to make myself a dress,” said the second.

Simpleton meanwhile sat in a corner looking at her sisters with great eagerness. Though she was a simpleton, her father found it hard to go away without asking her what she would like him to bring her, so he asked her too.

“Bring me, dear father,” said she, “a silver plate and a transparent apple to roll about on it.”

The father was rather astonished, but he said nothing and left.

“Whatever made you ask for such rubbish?” asked her sisters laughing.

“You will see for yourselves when my father brings them,” said Simpleton, as she left the room.

The peasant, after having sold his hay, bought his daughters the things they had asked for, and drove home. The two elder girls were delighted with their presents and laughed at Simpleton, waiting to see what she intended doing with the silver plate and transparent apple. Simpleton did not eat the apple, as they at first thought she would, but sat in a corner pronouncing these words, "Roll away, apple, roll away, on this silver plate. Show me different towns, fields, and woods, the seas, the heights of the hills, and the heavens in all their glory." Away rolled the apple, and on the plate became visible, towns, one after another. Ships were seen sailing on the seas. Green fields were seen. The heights of the hills were shown. The beauty of the heavens and the setting of the sun were all displayed most wonderfully.

The sisters looked on in amazement. They longed to have it for themselves and wondered how they could best get it from Simpleton, for she took such great care of it, and would take nothing in exchange.

At last one day the wicked sisters said coaxingly to Simpleton, "Come with us, dear, into the forest and help us pick strawberries."

Simpleton gave the plate and the apple to her father to take care of and joined her sisters. When they arrived at the forest they set to work picking wild strawberries. After some time the two elder sisters suddenly came upon a spade lying on the grass. They seized it, and while Simpleton was not looking they gave her a heavy blow with the spade. She turned ghastly pale, and fell dead on the ground.

They took her up quickly, buried her under a birch tree, and went home late to their parents, saying, "Simpleton has run away from us. We looked for her everywhere but cannot find her. She must have been eaten up by some wild beasts while we were not looking."

The father, who really had a little love for the girl, became very sad, and actually cried. He took the plate and apple and locked them both up carefully in a glass case. The sisters also cried very much and pretended to be very sorry, though the real reason was that they found out that they were not likely to have the transparent apple and plate after all, but would have to do all the hard work themselves.

One day a shepherd, who was minding a flock of sheep, happened to lose one, and went into the forest to look for it, when suddenly he came upon a hillock under a birch tree, round which grew a number of red and blue flowers, and among them a reed.

The young shepherd cut off the reed and made himself a pipe. But what was his astonishment when the moment he put the pipe to his mouth, it began to play by itself, saying, "Play, play, little pipe. Comfort my dear parents, and my sisters, who so cruelly misused me, killed me, and buried me for the sake of my silver plate and transparent apple."

The shepherd ran into the village greatly alarmed, and a crowd of people soon collected round him asking him what had happened. The shepherd again put the pipe to his mouth, and again the pipe began to play of itself.

"Who killed whom, and where, and how?" asked all the people together, crowding round.

“Good people,” answered the shepherd, “I know no more than you do. All I know is that I lost one of my sheep and went in search of it, when I suddenly came upon a hillock under a birch tree with flowers round it, and among them was a reed, which I cut off and made into a pipe, and the moment I put the thing into my mouth it began to play of itself, and pronounce the words which you have just heard.”

It so happened that Simpleton’s father and sisters were among the crowd and heard what the shepherd said.

“Let me try your pipe,” said the father, taking it and putting it into his mouth.

And immediately it began to repeat the words, “Play, play, little pipe. Comfort my dear parents, and my sisters, who misused, killed, and buried me for the sake of the silver plate and transparent apple.”

The peasant made the shepherd take him to the hillock at once. When they got to it they began to dig open the hillock, where they found the dead body of the unfortunate girl. The father fell on his knees before it and tried to bring her back to life, but all in vain.

The people again began asking who it was that killed and buried her, whereupon the pipe replied, “My sisters took me into the forest and slew me for the silver plate and transparent apple. If you want to wake me from this sound slumber, you must bring me the water of life from the royal fountain.”

The two miserable sisters turned pale and wanted to run away, whereupon the people seized them, tied them together, and marched them off to a dark cell, where they locked them up until the king should pronounce judgment on them.

The peasant went to the palace and was brought before the king’s son, and falling upon his knees before the prince, he related the whole story. Whereupon the king’s son told him to take as much of the water of life from the royal fountain as he pleased. “When your daughter is well, bring her to me,” continued the prince, “and also her evil-minded sisters.”

The peasant was delighted. He thanked the young prince and ran to the forest with the water of life. After he had sprinkled the body several times with the water, his daughter woke up and stood before him, prettier than ever. They embraced each other tenderly, while the people rejoiced and congratulated the happy man.

Next morning the peasant went with his three daughters to the palace and was brought before the king’s son.

The young prince, when he beheld Simpleton, was greatly struck with her beauty and asked her at once to show him the silver plate and transparent apple.

“What would your highness like to see?” asked the girl, bringing forward her treasures. “Would you like to know whether your kingdom is in good order, or if your ships are sailing, or whether there is any curious comet in the heavens?”

“Anything you like, sweet maiden.”

Away rolled the apple round about the plate, on which became visible soldiers of different arms, with muskets and flags, drawn up in battle array. The apple rolled on, and waves rose, and ships were seen sailing about like swans, while flags waved in the air. On rolled the apple, and on the plate the glory of the heavens was displayed. The sun, moon, and stars, and various comets were seen.

The king's son was greatly astonished and offered to buy the plate and apple, but Simpleton fell on her knees before him, exclaiming, "Take my silver plate and my apple. I want no money and no gifts for them, if you will only promise to forgive my sisters."

The young prince was so moved by her pretty face and her tears that he at once forgave the two wicked girls. Simpleton was so overjoyed that she threw her arms round their necks and tenderly embraced them.

The king's son took Simpleton by the hand and said, "Sweet maiden, I am so struck by the great kindness you have shown your sisters after their cruel treatment of you, that I have decided (provided you agree to it) to have you for my wife, and you shall be known henceforth as the Benevolent Queen."

"Your highness does me great honor," said Simpleton, blushing. "But it lies in my parents' hand. If they do not object, I will marry you."

It is needless to say that neither parent objected, but gave their consent and blessing.

"I have one more request to ask your highness," said Simpleton, "and that is to let my parents and sisters live with us in the palace."

The young prince made no objection whatever to this proposal (though most probably he felt sorry for it afterwards; however, the story does not say anything about that). The sisters threw themselves at Simpleton's feet, exclaiming that they did not deserve such kindness after all that they had said and done to her.

Next day the marriage was celebrated, and crowds of people ran about everywhere crying out, "Long live our king and queen!"

From that day Simpleton was no more, but the Benevolent Queen reigned in her stead.

IVANOUSHKA THE SIMPLETON

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: De Blumentahal, Verra Xenophontovna Kalamatiano. Folktales from the Russian. Great Neck, NY: Core Collection Books, Inc., 1903, 77–106.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Russia

National Origin: Russia

---

The following tale exemplifies structural pattern of threes common to the ordinary folktale (or märchen): three brothers and tasks in multiples of three, for example. Also typical is the fact that the youngest, least-promising brother triumphs in the end. The plot of the narrative is patterned on “The Princess on the Glass Mountain” (AT 530) and, as a concluding episode, “The Pig with the Golden Bristles” (AT 530A).

---

In a kingdom far away from our country, there was a town over which ruled the Tsar Pea with his Tsaritzza Carrot. He had many wise statesmen, wealthy princes, strong, powerful warriors, and also simple soldiers, a hundred thousand, less one man. In that town lived all kinds of people: honest, bearded merchants, keen and open-handed rascals, German tradesmen, lovely maidens, Russian drunkards; and in the suburbs all around, the peasants tilled the soil, sowed the wheat, ground the flour, traded in the markets, and spent the money in drink.

In one of the suburbs there was a poor hut where an old man lived with his three sons, Thomas, Pakhom, and Ivan. The old man was not only clever, he was wise. He had happened once to have a chat with the devil. They talked together while the old man treated him to a tumbler of wine and got out of the devil many great secrets. Soon after this the peasant began to perform such marvelous acts that the neighbors called him a sorcerer, a magician, and even supposed that the devil was his kin.

Yes, it is true that the old man performed great marvels. Were you longing for love, go to him, bow to the old man, and he would give you some strange root, and the sweetheart would be yours. If there is a theft, again to him with the tale. The old man conjures over some water, takes an officer along straight to the thief, and your lost is found; only take care that the officer steals it not.

Indeed the old man was very wise; but his children were not his equals. Two of them were almost as clever. They were married and had children, but Ivan, the youngest, was single. No one cared much for him because he was rather a fool, could not count one, two, three, and only drank, or ate, or slept, or lay around. Why care for such a person? Every one knows life for some is brighter than for others. But Ivan was good-hearted and quiet. Ask of him a belt, he will give a kaftan also; take his mittens, he certainly would want to have you take his cap with them. And that is why all liked Ivan, and usually called him Ivanoushka the Simpleton; though the name means fool, at the same time it carries the idea of a kind heart.

Our old man lived on with his sons until finally his hour came to die. He called his three sons and said to them, “Dear children of mine, my dying hour is at hand and ye must fulfill my will. Every one of you come to my grave and spend one night with me; thou, Tom, the first night; thou, Pakhom, the second night; and thou, Ivanoushka the Simpleton, the third.” Two of the brothers, as clever people, promised their father to do according to his bidding, but the Simpleton did not even promise; he only scratched his head.

The old man died and was buried. During the celebration the family and guests had plenty of pancakes to eat and plenty of whisky to wash them down. Now you remember that on the first night Thomas was to go to the grave; but he was too lazy, or possibly afraid, so he said to the Simpleton, "I must be up very early tomorrow morning; I have to thresh; go thou for me to our father's grave."

"All right," answered Ivanoushka the Simpleton. He took a slice of black rye bread, went to the grave, stretched himself out, and soon began to snore.

The church clock struck midnight; the wind roared, the owl cried in the trees, the grave opened and the old man came out and asked, "Who is there?"

"I," answered Ivanoushka.

"Well, my dear son, I will reward thee for thine obedience," said the father.

Lo! The cocks crowed and the old man dropped into the grave. The Simpleton arrived home and went to the warm stove.

"What happened?" asked the brothers.

"Nothing," he answered. "I slept the whole night and am hungry now."

The second night it was Pakhom's turn to go to his father's grave. He thought it over and said to the Simpleton, "Tomorrow is a busy day with me. Go in my place to our father's grave."

"All right," answered Ivanoushka. He took along with him a piece of fish pie, went to the grave and slept. Midnight approached, the wind roared, crows came flying, the grave opened and the old man came out.

"Who is there?" he asked.

"I," answered his son the Simpleton.

"Well, my beloved son, I will not forget thine obedience," said the old man.

The cocks crowed and the old man dropped into his grave. Ivanoushka the Simpleton came home, went to sleep on the warm stove, and in the morning his brothers asked, "What happened?"

"Nothing," answered Ivanoushka.

On the third night the brothers said to Ivan the Simpleton, "It is thy turn to go to the grave of our father. The father's will should be done."

"All right," answered Ivanoushka. He took some cookies, put on his sheepskin, and arrived at the grave.

At midnight his father came out. "Who is there?" he asked.

"I," answered Ivanoushka. "Well," said the old father, "my obedient son, thou shalt be rewarded"; and the old man shouted with a mighty voice:

"Arise, bay horse—thou wind-swift steed, Appear before me in my need; Stand tip as in the storm the weed!"

And lo!—Ivanoushka the Simpleton beheld a horse running, the earth trembling under his hoofs, his eyes like stars, and out of his mouth and ears smoke coming in a cloud. The horse approached and stood before the old man.

"What is thy wish?" he asked with a man's voice.

The old man crawled into his left ear, washed and adorned himself, and jumped out of his right ear as a young, brave fellow never seen before.

“Now listen attentively,” he said. “To thee, my son, I give this horse. And thou, my faithful horse and friend, serve my son as thou hast served me.”

Hardly had the old man pronounced these words when the first cock crew and the sorcerer dropped into his grave. Our Simpleton went quietly back home, stretched himself under the icons, and his snoring was heard far around.

“What happened?” the brothers again asked.

But the Simpleton did not even answer; he only waved his hand.

The three brothers continued to live their usual life, the two with cleverness and the younger with foolishness. They lived a day in and an equal day out. But one morning there came quite a different day from all others. They learned that big men were going all over the country with trumpets and players; that those men announced everywhere the will of the Tsar, and the Tsar’s will was this: The Tsar Pea and the Tsaritzza Carrot had an only daughter, the Tsarevna [Princess] Baktriana, heiress to the throne. She was such a beautiful maiden that the sun blushed when she looked at it, and the moon, altogether too bashful, covered itself from her eyes. Tsar and Tsaritzza had a hard time to decide to whom they should give their daughter for a wife. It must be a man who could be a proper ruler over the country, a brave warrior on the battlefield, a wise judge in the council, an adviser to the Tsar, and a suitable heir after his death. They also wanted a bridegroom who was young, brave, and handsome, and they wanted him to be in love with their Tsarevna. That would have been easy enough, but the trouble was that the beautiful Tsarevna loved no one. Sometimes the Tsar mentioned to her this or that one. Always the same answer, “I do not love him.” The Tsaritzza tried, too, with no better result; “I do not like him.”

A day came when the Tsar Pea and his Tsaritzza Carrot seriously addressed their daughter on the subject of marriage and said, “Our beloved child, our very beautiful Tsarevna Baktriana, it is time for thee to choose a bridegroom. Envoys of all descriptions, from kings and tzars and princes, have worn our threshold, drunk dry all the cellars, and thou hast not yet found any one according to thy heart’s wish.”

The Tsarevna answered, “Sovereign, and thou, Tsaritzza, my dear mother, I feel sorry for you, and my wish is to obey your desire. So let fate decide who is destined to become my husband. I ask you to build a hall, a high hall with thirty-two circles, and above those circles a window. I will sit at that window and do you order all kinds of people, tsars, kings, tsarovitchi, korolevitchi, brave warriors, and handsome fellows, to come. The one who will jump through the thirty-two circles, reach my window and exchange with me golden rings, he it will be who is destined to become my husband, son and heir to you.”

The Tsar and Tsaritzza listened attentively to the words of their bright Tsarevna, and finally they said, “According to thy wish shall it be done.”

In no time the hall was ready, a very high hall adorned with Venetian velvets, with pearls for tassels, with golden designs, and thirty-two circles on both sides of the window high above. Envoys went to the different kings and sovereigns, pigeons flew with orders to the subjects to gather the proud and the humble into the town of the Tsar Pea and his Tsaritzza Carrot. It was announced everywhere that the one who could jump through the circles, reach the window and exchange golden rings with the Tsarevna Baktriana, that man would be the lucky one, notwithstanding his rank—tsar or free Cossack, king or warrior, tsarevitch, koro-levitch, or fellow without any kinfolk or country.

The great day arrived. Crowds pressed to the field where stood the newly built hall, brilliant as a star. Up high at the window the tsarevna was sitting, adorned with precious stones, clad in velvet and pearls. The people below were roaring like an ocean. The Tzar with his Tzaritzza was sitting upon a throne. Around them were boyars, warriors, and counselors. The suitors on horseback, proud, handsome, and brave, whistle and ride round about, but looking at the high window their hearts drop. There were already several fellows who had tried. Each would take a long start, balance himself, spring, and fall back like a stone, a laughing stock for the witnesses.

The brothers of Ivanoushka the Simpleton were preparing themselves to go to the field also.

The Simpleton said to them, "Take me along with you."

"Thou fool," laughed the brothers; "stay at home and watch the chickens."

"All right," he answered, went to the chicken yard and lay down. But as soon as the brothers were away, our Ivanoushka the Simpleton walked to the wide fields and shouted with a mighty voice, "Arise, bay horse—they wind-swift steed, Appear before me in my need; Stand up as in the storm the weed!"

The glorious horse came running. Flames shone out of his eyes; out of his nostrils smoke came in clouds, and the horse asked with a man's voice, "What is thy wish?"

Ivanoushka the Simpleton crawled into the horse's left ear, transformed himself and reappeared at the right ear, such a handsome fellow that in no book is there written any description of him; no one has ever seen such a fellow. He jumped onto the horse and touched his iron sides with a silk whip. The horse became impatient, lifted himself above the ground, higher and higher above the dark woods below the traveling clouds. He swam over the large rivers, jumped over the small ones, as well as over hills and mountains. Ivanoushka the Simpleton arrived at the hall of the Tsarevna Baktriana, flew up like a hawk, passed through thirty circles, could not reach the last two, and went away like a whirlwind.

The people were shouting, "Take hold of him! Take hold of him!" The Tsar jumped to his feet, the Tsaritzza screamed. Every one was roaring in amazement.

The brothers of Ivanoushka came home and there was but one subject of conversation—what a splendid fellow they had seen! What a wonderful start to pass through the thirty circles! "Brothers, that fellow was I," said Ivanoushka the Simpleton, who had long since arrived.

“Keep still and do not fool us,” answered the brothers.

The next day the two brothers were going again to the tsarski show and Ivanoushka the Simpleton said again, “Take me along with you.”

“For thee, fool, this is thy place. Be quiet at home and scare sparrows from the pea field instead of the scarecrow.”

“All right,” answered the Simpleton, and he went to the field and began to scare the sparrows. But as soon as the brothers left home, Ivanoushka started to the wide field and shouted out loud with a mighty voice, “Arise, bay horse—thou wind-swift steed, Appear before me in my need; Stand up as in the storm the weed!”

And here came the horse, the earth trembling under his hoofs, the sparks flying around, his eyes like flames, and out of his nostrils smoke curling up. “For what dost thou wish me?” Ivanoushka the Simpleton crawled into the left ear of the horse, and when he appeared out of the right ear, oh, my! what a fellow he was! Even in fairy tales there are never such handsome fellows, to say nothing of everyday life.

Ivanoushka lifted himself on the iron back of his horse and touched him with a strong whip. The noble horse grew angry, made a jump, and went higher than the dark woods, a little below the traveling clouds. One jump, one mile is behind; a second jump, a river is behind; and a third jump and they were at the hall. Then the horse, with Ivanoushka on his back, flew like an eagle, high up into the air, passed the thirty-first circle, failed to reach the last one, and swept away like the wind.

The people shouted, “Take hold of him! Take hold of him!” The Tsar jumped to his feet, the Tsaritzta screamed, the princes and boyars opened their mouths.

The brothers of Ivanoushka the Simpleton came home. They were wondering at the fellow. Yes, an amazing fellow indeed! One circle only was unreached.

“Brothers, that fellow over there was I,” said Ivanoushka to them.

“Keep still in thy own place, thou fool,” was their sneering answer.

The third day the brothers were going again to the strange entertainment of the Tsar, and again Ivanoushka the Simpleton said to them, “Take me along with you.”

“Fool,” they laughed, “there is food to be given to the hogs; better go to them.”

“All right,” the younger brother answered, and quietly went to the back yard and gave food to the hogs. But as soon as his brothers had left home our Ivanoushka the Simpleton hurried to the wide field and shouted out loud, “Arise, bay horse—thou wind-swift steed, Appear before me in my need; Stand up as in the storm the weed!”

At once the horse came running, the earth trembled; where he stepped there appeared ponds, where his hoofs touched there were lakes, out of his eyes shone flames, out of his ears smoke came like a cloud.

“For what dost thou wish me?” the horse asked with a man’s voice.

Ivanoushka the Simpleton crawled into his right ear and jumped out of his left one, and a handsome fellow he was. A young girl could not even imagine such a one. Ivanoushka struck his horse, pulled the bridle tight, and lo! he flew high up in the air. The wind was left behind and even the swallow, the sweet, winged passenger, must not aspire to do the same. Our hero flew like a cloud high up into the sky, his silver-chained mail rattling, his fair curls floating in the wind. He arrived at the Tsarevna’s high hall, struck his horse once more, and oh! how the wild horse did jump!

Look there! The fellow reaches all the circles; he is near the window; he presses the beautiful Tsarevna with his strong arms, kisses her on the sugar lips, exchanges golden rings, and like a storm sweeps through the fields. There, there, he is crushing every one on his way! And the Tsarevna? Well, she did not object. She even adorned his forehead with a diamond star.

The people roared, “Take hold of him!” But the fellow had already disappeared and no traces were left behind.

The Tsar Pea lost his royal dignity. The Tsaritzza Carrot screamed louder than ever and the wise counselors only shook their wise heads and remained silent.

The brothers came home talking and discussing the wonderful matter.

“Indeed,” they shook their heads; “only think of it! The fellow succeeded and our Tsarevna has a bridegroom. But who is he? Where is he?”

“Brothers, the fellow is I,” said Ivanoushka the Simpleton, smiling.

“Keep still, I and I—,” and the brothers almost slapped him.

The matter proved to be quite serious this time, and the Tsar and Tsaritzza issued an order to surround the town with armed men whose duty it was to let every one enter, but not a soul go out. Every one had to appear at the royal palace and show his forehead. From early in the morning the crowds were gathering around the palace. Each forehead was inspected, but there was no star on any. Dinner time was approaching and in the palace they even forgot to cover the oak tables with white spreads. The brothers of Ivanoushka had also to show their foreheads and the Simpleton said to them, “Take me along with you.”

“Thy place is right here,” they answered, jokingly. “But say, what is the matter with thy head that thou hast covered it with cloths? Did somebody strike thee?”

“No, nobody struck me. I, myself, struck the door with my forehead. The door remained all right, but on my forehead there is a knob.”

The brothers laughed and went. Soon after them Ivanoushka left home and went straight to the window of the Tsarevna, where she sat leaning on the window sill and looking for her betrothed.

“There is our man,” shouted the guards, when the Simpleton appeared among them.

“Show thy forehead. Hast thou the star?” and they laughed.

Ivanoushka the Simpleton gave no heed to their bidding, but refused. The guards were shouting at him and the Tsarevna heard the noise and ordered the fellow to her presence. There was nothing to be done but to take off the cloths.

Behold! the star was shining in the middle of his forehead. The Tsarevna took Ivanoushka by the hand, brought him before Tsar Pea, and said, "He it is, my Tsar and father, who is destined to become my groom, thy son-in-law and heir."

It was too late to object. The Tsar ordered preparations for the bridal festivities, and our Ivanoushka the Simpleton was wedded to the Tsarevna Baktriana. The Tsar, the Tsaritzza, the young bride and groom, and their guests, feasted three days. There was fine eating and generous drinking. There were all kinds of amusements also. The brothers of Ivanoushka were created governors and each one received a village and a house.

The story is told in no time, but to live a life requires time and patience. The brothers of Ivanoushka the Simpleton were clever men, we know, and as soon as they became rich every one understood it at once, and they themselves became quite sure about it and began to pride themselves, to boast, and to brag. The humble ones did not dare look toward their homes, and even the boyars had to take off their fur caps on their porches.

Once several boyars [nobles] came to Tsar Pea and said, "Great Tsar, the brothers of thy son-in-law are bragging around that they know the place where grows an apple tree with silver leaves and golden apples, and they want to bring this apple tree to thee."

The Tsar immediately called the brothers before him and bade them bring at once the wonderful tree, the apple tree with silver leaves and golden apples. The brothers had ever so many excuses, but the Tsar would have his way. They were given fine horses out of the royal stables and went on their errand. Our friend, Ivanoushka the Simpleton, found somewhere a lame old horse, jumped on his back facing the tail, and also went. He went to the wide field, grasped the lame horse by the tail, threw him off roughly, and shouted, "You crows and magpies, come, come! There is lunch prepared for you."

This done he ordered his horse, his spirited courser, to appear, and as usual he crawled into one ear, jumped out the other ear and they went—where? Toward the east where grew the wonderful apple tree with silver leaves and golden apples. It grew near silver waters upon golden sand. When Ivanoushka reached the place he uprooted the tree and turned toward home. His ride was long and he felt tired. Before he arrived at his town Ivanoushka pitched his tent and lay down for a rest. Along the same road came his brothers. The two were proud no more, but rather depressed, not knowing what answer to give the Tsar. They perceived the tent with silver top and near by the wonderful apple tree. They came nearer and—"There is our Simpleton!" exclaimed the brothers. Then they awakened Ivanoushka and wanted to buy the apple tree. They were rich and offered three carts filled with silver.

“Well, brothers, this tree, this wonderful apple tree, is not for sale,” answered Ivanoushka, “but if you wish to obtain it you may. The price will not be too high, a toe from each right foot.”

The brothers thought the matter over and finally decided to give the desired price. Ivanoushka cut the toes off, gave them the apple tree, and the happy brothers brought it to the Tsar and there was no end to their bragging.

“Here, all-powerful Tsar,” they said. “We went far, and had many a trouble on our way, but thy wish is fulfilled.”

The Tsar Pea seemed pleased, ordered a feast, commanded tunes to be played and drums beaten, rewarded the two brothers of Ivanoushka the Simpleton, each one with a town, and praised them.

The boyars and warriors became furious.

“Why,” they said to the Tsar, “there is nothing wonderful in such an apple tree with golden apples and silver leaves. The brothers of thy son-in-law are bragging around that they will get thee a pig with golden bristles and silver tusks, and not alone the pig, but also her twelve little ones!”

The Tsar called the brothers before him and ordered them to bring the very pig with her golden bristles and silver tusks and her twelve little ones. The brothers’ excuses were not listened to and so they went. Once more the brothers were traveling on a difficult errand, looking for a golden-bristled pig with silver tusks and twelve little pigs.

At that time Ivanoushka the Simpleton made up his mind to take a trip somewhere. He put a saddle on a cow, jumped up on her back facing the tail, and left the town. He came to a field, grasped the cow by the horns, threw her far on the prairie and shouted, “Come, come, you gray wolves and red foxes! There is a dinner for you!”

Then he ordered his faithful horse, crawled into one ear, and jumped out of the other. Master and courser went on an errand, this time toward the south. One, two, three, and they were in dark woods. In these woods the wished-for pig was walking around, a golden-bristled pig with silver tusks. She was eating roots, and after her followed twelve little pigs.

Ivanoushka the Simpleton threw over the pig a silk rope with a running noose, gathered the little pigs into a basket and went home, but before he reached the town of the Tsar Pea he pitched a tent with a golden top and lay down for a rest. On the same road the brothers came along with gloomy faces, not knowing what to say to the Tsar. They saw the tent, and near by the very pig they were searching for, with golden bristles and silver tusks, was fastened with a silk rope; and in a basket were the twelve little pigs. The brothers looked into the tent. Ivanoushka again! They awakened him and wanted to trade for the pig; they were ready to give in exchange three carts loaded with precious stones.

“Brothers, my pig is not for trade,” said Ivanoushka, “but if you want her so much, well, one finger from each right hand will pay for her.”

The brothers thought over the case for a long while; they reasoned thus, “People live happily without brains, why not without fingers?”

So they allowed Ivanoushka to cut off their fingers, then took the pig to the Tsar, and their bragging had no end.

“Tsar Sovereign,” they said, “we went everywhere, beyond the blue sea, beyond the dark woods; we passed through deep sands, we suffered hunger and thirst; but thy wish is accomplished.”

The Tsar was glad to have such faithful servants. He gave a feast great among feasts, rewarded the brothers of Ivanoushka the Simpleton, created them big boyars and praised them.

The other boyars and different court people said to the Tsar, “There is nothing wonderful in such a pig. Golden bristles, silver tusks, yes, it is fine. But a pig remains a pig forever. The brothers of thy son-in-law are bragging now that they will steal for thee out of the stables of the fiery dragon a mare with golden mane and diamond hoofs.”

The Tsar at once called the brothers of Ivanoushka the Simpleton, and ordered the golden-maned mare with the diamond hoofs. The brothers swore that they never said such words, but the Tsar did not listen to their protests.

“Take as much gold as you want, take warriors as many as you wish, but bring me the beautiful mare with golden mane and diamond hoofs. If you do it my reward will be great; if not, your fate is to become peasants as before.”

The brothers went, two sad heroes. Their march was slow; where to go they did not know. Ivanoushka also jumped upon a stick and went leaping toward the field. Once in the wide, open field, he ordered his horse, crawled into one ear, came out of the other, and both started for a far-away country, for an island, a big island. On that island in an iron stable the fiery dragon was watchfully guarding his glory—the golden-maned mare with diamond hoofs, which was locked under seven locks behind seven heavy doors.

Our Ivanoushka journeyed and journeyed, how long we do not know, until at last he arrived at that island, struggled three days with the dragon and killed him on the fourth day. Then he began to tear down the locks. That took three days more. When he had done this he brought out the wonderful mare by the golden mane and turned homeward.

The road was long, and before he reached his town Ivanoushka, according to his habit, pitched his tent with a diamond top, and laid him down for rest. The brothers came along—gloomy they were, fearing the Tsar’s anger. Lo! they heard neighing; the earth trembled—it was the golden-maned mare! Though in the dusk of evening the brothers saw her golden mane shining like fire. They stopped, awakened Ivanoushka the Simpleton, and wanted to trade for the wonderful mare. They were willing to give him a bushel of precious stones each and promised even more.

Ivanoushka said, “Though my mare is not for trade, yet if you want her I’ll give her to you. And you, do you each give me your right ears.”

The brothers did not even argue, but let Ivanoushka cut off their ears, took hold of the bridle and went directly to the Tsar. They presented to him the golden-maned mare with diamond hoofs, and there was no end of bragging.

“We went beyond seas, beyond mountains,” the brothers said to the Tsar; “we fought the fiery dragon who bit off our ears and fingers; we had no fear, but one desire to serve thee faithfully; we shed our blood and lost our wealth.”

The Tsar Pea poured gold over them, created them the very highest men after himself, and planned such a feast that the royal cooks were tired out with cooking to feed all the people, and the cellars were fairly emptied.

The Tsar Pea was sitting on his throne, one brother on his right hand, the other brother on his left hand. The feast was going on; all seemed jolly, all were drinking, all were noisy as bees in a beehive. In the midst of it a young, brave fellow, Ivanoushka the Simpleton, entered the hall—the very fellow who had passed the thirty-two circles and reached the window of the beautiful Tsarevna Baktriana.

When the brothers noticed him, one almost choked himself with wine, the other was suffocating over a piece of swan. They looked at him, opened wide their eyes, and remained silent.

Ivanoushka the Simpleton bowed to his father-in-law and told the story as the story was. He told about the apple tree, the wonderful apple tree with silver leaves and golden apples; he told about the pig, the golden-bristled pig with silver tusks and her twelve little ones; and finally he told about the marvelous mare with a golden mane and diamond hoofs. He finished and laid out ears, fingers, and toes.

“It is the exchange I got,” said Ivanoushka.

Tsar Pea became furious, stamped his feet, ordered the two brothers to be driven away with brooms. One was sent to feed the pigs, another to watch the turkeys. The Tsar seated Ivanoushka beside himself, creating him the highest among the very high.

The feast lasted a very long time until all were tired of feasting.

Ivanoushka took control of the tsarstvo, ruling wisely and severely. After his father-in-law’s death he occupied his place. His subjects liked him; he had many children, and his beautiful Tsaritzka Baktriana remained beautiful forever.

TSAREVNA FROG

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: De Blumentahal, Verra Xenophontovna Kalamatiano. Folktales from the Russian. Great Neck, NY: Core Collection Books, Inc., 1903, 13–26.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Russia

National Origin: Russia

The following narrative combines the familiar theme of the bride trapped in a nonhuman form with the abducted princess and the external life token. Certain elements, such as a shape-shifter donning the skin of an animal to achieve transformation, are cross-culturally distributed. Others, however, such as the hut on chickens' feet as the habitation for Russian witches, are unique to the traditions of this region.

---

In an old, old Russian tsarstvo [the domain of a tsar], I do not know when, there lived a sovereign prince with the princess his wife. They had three sons, all of them young, and such brave fellows that no pen could describe them. The youngest had the name of Ivan Tsarevitch [Prince Ivan]. One day their father said to his sons, "My dear boys, take each of you an arrow, draw your strong bow and let your arrow fly; in whatever court it falls, in that court there will be a wife for you."

The arrow of the oldest Tsarevitch fell on a boyar-house [house of a noble] just in front of the terem where women live; the arrow of the second Tsarevitch flew to the red porch of a rich merchant, and on the porch there stood a sweet girl, the merchant's daughter. The youngest, the brave Tsarevitch Ivan, had the ill luck to send his arrow into the midst of a swamp, where it was caught by a croaking frog.

Ivan Tsarevitch came to his father, "How can I marry the frog?" complained the son. "Is she my equal? Certainly she is not."

"Never mind," replied his father, "you have to marry the frog, for such is evidently your destiny."

Thus the brothers were married: the oldest to a young boyarishnia, a nobleman's child; the second to the merchant's beautiful daughter, and the youngest, Tsarevitch Ivan, to a croaking frog.

After a while the sovereign prince called his three sons and said to them, "Have each of your wives bake a loaf of bread by tomorrow morning."

Ivan returned home. There was no smile on his face, and his brow was clouded.

"C-R-O-A-K! C-R-O-A-K! Dear husband of mine, Tsarevitch Ivan, why so sad?" gently asked the frog. "Was there anything disagreeable in the palace?"

"Disagreeable indeed," answered Ivan Tsarevitch; "the Tsar, my father, wants you to bake a loaf of white bread by tomorrow."

"Do not worry, Tsarevitch. Go to bed; the morning hour is a better adviser than the dark evening."

The Tsarevitch, taking his wife's advice, went to sleep. Then the frog threw off her frogskin and turned into a beautiful, sweet girl, Vassilissa by name. She now stepped out on the porch and called aloud, "Nurses and waitresses, come to me at once and prepare a loaf of white bread for tomorrow morning, a loaf exactly like those I used to eat in my royal father's palace."

In the morning Tsarevitch Ivan awoke with the crowing cocks, and you know the cocks and chickens are never late. Yet the loaf was already made, and so fine it was that nobody could even describe it, for only in fairyland one finds such marvelous loaves. It was adorned all about with pretty figures, with towns and fortresses on each side, and within it was white as snow and light as a feather.

The Tsar father was pleased and the Tsarevitch received his special thanks.

“Now there is another task,” said the Tsar smilingly. “Have each of your wives weave a rug by tomorrow.”

Tsarevitch Ivan came back to his home. There was no smile on his face and his brow was clouded.

“C-R-O-A-K! C-R-O-A-K! Dear Tsarevitch Ivan, my husband and master, why so troubled again? Was not father pleased?”

“How can I be otherwise? The Tsar, my father, has ordered a rug by tomorrow.”

“Do not worry, Tsarevitch. Go to bed; go to sleep. The morning hour will bring help.” Again the frog turned into Vassilissa, the wise maiden, and again she called aloud. “Dear nurses and faithful waitresses, come to me for new work. Weave a silk rug like the one I used to sit upon in the palace of the king, my father.”

Once said, quickly done. When the cocks began their early “cock-a-doodle-doo,” Tsarevitch Ivan awoke, and lo! there lay the most beautiful silk rug before him, a rug that no one could begin to describe. Threads of silver and gold were interwoven among bright-colored silken ones, and the rug was too beautiful for anything but to admire.

The Tsar father was pleased, thanked his son Ivan, and issued a new order. He now wished to see the three wives of his handsome sons, and they were to present their brides on the next day.

The Tsarevitch Ivan returned home. Cloudy was his brow, more cloudy than before.

“C-R-O-A-K! C-R-O-A-K! Tsarevitch, my dear husband and master, why so sad? Hast thou heard anything unpleasant at the palace?”

“Unpleasant enough, indeed! My father, the Tsar, ordered all of us to present our wives to him. Now tell me, how could I dare go with thee?”

“It is not so bad after all, and might be much worse,” answered the frog, gently croaking. “Thou shalt go alone and I will follow thee. When thou hearest a noise, a great noise, do not be afraid; simply say, ‘There is my miserable froggy coming in her miserable box.’”

The two elder brothers arrived first with their wives, beautiful, bright, and cheerful, and dressed in rich garments. Both the happy bridegrooms made fun of the Tsarevitch Ivan.

“Why alone, brother?” they laughingly said to him. “Why didst thou not bring thy wife along with thee? Was there no rag to cover her? Where couldst thou have gotten such a beauty? We are ready to wager that in all the swamps in the dominion of our father it would be hard to find another one like her.” And they laughed and laughed.

Lo! What a noise! The palace trembled, the guests were all frightened.

Tsarevitch Ivan alone remained quiet and said, “No danger; it is my froggy coming in her box.”

To the red porch came flying a golden carriage drawn by six splendid white horses, and Vassilissa, beautiful beyond all description, gently reached her hand to her husband. He led her with him to the heavy oak tables, which were covered with snow-white linen and loaded with many wonderful dishes such as are known and eaten only in the land of fairies and never anywhere else. The guests were eating and chatting gaily.

Vassilissa drank some wine, and what was left in the tumbler she poured into her left sleeve. She ate some of the fried swan, and the bones she threw into her right sleeve. The wives of the two elder brothers watched her and did exactly the same.

When the long, hearty dinner was over, the guests began dancing and singing. The beautiful Vassilissa came forward, as bright as a star, bowed to her sovereign, bowed to the honorable guests and danced with her husband, the happy Tsarevitch Ivan.

While dancing, Vassilissa waved her left sleeve and a pretty lake appeared in the midst of the hall and cooled the air. She waved her right sleeve and white swans swam on the water. The Tsar, the guests, the servants, even the gray cat sitting in the corner, all were amazed and wondered at the beautiful Vassilissa. Her two sisters-in-law alone envied her. When their turn came to dance, they also waved their left sleeves as Vassilissa had done, and, oh, wonder! they sprinkled wine all around. They waved their right sleeves, and instead of swans the bones flew in the face of the Tsar father. The Tsar grew very angry and bade them leave the palace. In the meantime Ivan Tsarevitch watched a moment to slip away unseen. He ran home, found the frogskin, and burned it in the fire.

Vassilissa, when she came back, searched for the skin, and when she could not find it her beautiful face grew sad and her bright eyes filled with tears.

She said to Tsarevitch Ivan, her husband, “Oh, dear Tsarevitch, what hast thou done? There was but a short time left for me to wear the ugly frogskin. The moment was near when we could have been happy together forever. Now I must bid thee good-bye. Look for me in a far-away country to which no one knows the roads, at the palace of Kostshei the Deathless”; and Vassilissa turned into a white swan and flew away through the window.

Tsarevitch Ivan wept bitterly. Then he prayed to the almighty God, and making the sign of the cross northward, southward, eastward, and westward, he went on a mysterious journey. No one knows how long his journey was, but one day he met an old, old man. He bowed to the old man, who said, “Good-day, brave fellow. What art thou searching for, and whither art thou going?”

Tsarevitch Ivan answered sincerely, telling all about his misfortune without hiding anything.

“And why didst thou burn the frogskin? It was wrong to do so. Listen now to me. Vassilissa was born wiser than her own father, and as he envied his daughter’s wisdom he condemned her to be a frog for three long years. But I pity thee and want to help thee. Here is a magic ball. In whatever direction this ball rolls, follow without fear.”

Ivan Tsarevitch thanked the good old man, and followed his new guide, the ball. Long, very long, was his road. One day in a wide, flowery field he met a bear, a big Russian bear. Ivan Tsarevitch took his bow and was ready to shoot the bear.

“Do not kill me, kind Tsarevitch,” said the bear. “Who knows but that I may be useful to thee?” And Ivan did not shoot the bear.

Above in the sunny air there flew a duck, a lovely white duck. Again the Tsarevitch drew his bow to shoot it. But the duck said to him, “Do not kill me, good Tsarevitch. I certainly shall be useful to thee some day.”

And this time he obeyed the command of the duck and passed by. Continuing his way he saw a blinking hare. The Tsarevitch prepared an arrow to shoot it, but the gray, blinking hare said, “Do not kill me, brave Tsarevitch. I shall prove myself grateful to thee in a very short time.”

The Tsarevitch did not shoot the hare, but passed by. He walked farther and farther after the rolling ball, and came to the deep blue sea. On the sand there lay a fish. I do not remember the name of the fish, but it was a big fish, almost dying on the dry sand.

“O Tsarevitch Ivan!” prayed the fish, “have mercy upon me and push me back into the cool sea.”

The Tsarevitch did so, and walked along the shore. The ball, rolling all the time, brought Ivan to a hut, a queer, tiny hut standing on tiny hen’s feet.

“Izboushka! Izboushka!”—for so in Russia do they name small huts—“Izboushka, I want thee to turn thy front to me,” cried Ivan, and lo! the tiny hut turned its front at once. Ivan stepped in and saw a witch, one of the ugliest witches he could imagine.

“Ho! Ivan Tsarevitch! What brings thee here?” was his greeting from the witch. “O, thou old mischief!” shouted Ivan with anger. “Is it the way in holy Russia to ask questions before the tired guest gets something to eat, something to drink, and some hot water to wash the dust off?”

Baba Yaga, the witch, gave the Tsarevitch plenty to eat and drink, besides hot water to wash the dust off. Tsarevitch Ivan felt refreshed. Soon he became talkative, and related the wonderful story of his marriage. He told how he had lost his dear wife, and that his only desire was to find her.

“I know all about it,” answered the witch. “She is now at the palace of Kotshei the Deathless, and thou must understand that Kotshei is terrible. He watches her day and night and no one can ever conquer him. His death depends on a magic needle. That needle is within a hare; that hare is within a large trunk; that trunk is hidden in the branches of an old oak tree; and that oak tree is watched by Kotshei as closely as Vassilissa herself, which means closer than any treasure he has.”

Then the witch told Ivan Tsarevitch how and where to find the oak tree. Ivan hastily went to the place. But when he perceived the oak tree he was much discouraged, not knowing what to do or how to begin the work. Lo and behold! that old acquaintance of his, the Russian bear, came running along, approached the tree, uprooted it, and the trunk fell and broke. A hare jumped out of the trunk and began to run fast; but another hare, Ivan's friend, came running after, caught it and tore it to pieces. Out of the hare there flew a duck, a gray one which flew very high and was almost invisible, but the beautiful white duck followed the bird and struck its gray enemy, which lost an egg. That egg fell into the deep sea. Ivan meanwhile was anxiously watching his faithful friends helping him. But when the egg disappeared in the blue waters he could not help weeping. All of a sudden a big fish came swimming up, the same fish he had saved, and brought the egg in his mouth. How happy Ivan was when he took it! He broke it and found the needle inside, the magic needle upon which everything depended.

At the same moment Kostshei lost his strength and power forever. Ivan Tsarevitch entered his vast dominions, killed him with the magic needle, and in one of the palaces found his own dear wife, his beautiful Vassilissa. He took her home and they were very happy ever after.

THE WITCH AND HER SERVANTS

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Lang, Andrew. The Yellow Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1894, 161–177.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Russia

National Origin: Russia

---

The following tale combines the success of the younger of three brothers—success by means of magic objects, disguised strangers, and grateful animals—with the abduction of maidens and tasks imposed by a witch. As a result, “The Witch and Her Servants” serves as a virtual encyclopedia of traditional motifs. Also relevant to the tale are Russian folk beliefs regarding the power of dreams and contagious magic (control by possessing something once belonging to an individual—in this case a lock of hair).

---

A long time ago there lived a King who had three sons; the eldest was called Szabo, the second Warza, and the youngest Iwanich. One beautiful spring morning the King was walking through his gardens with these three sons, gazing with admiration at the various fruit trees, some of which were a mass of blossom, whilst others were bowed to the ground laden with rich fruit. During their wanderings they came unperceived on a piece of waste land where three splendid trees grew. The King looked on them for a moment, and then, shaking his head sadly, he passed on in silence.

The sons, who could not understand why he did this, asked him the reason of his dejection, and the King told them as follows. "These three trees, which I cannot see without sorrow, were planted by me on this spot when I was a youth of twenty. A celebrated magician, who had given the seed to my father, promised him that they would grow into the three finest trees the world had ever seen. My father did not live to see his words come true; but on his death-bed he bade me transplant them here, and to look after them with the greatest care, which I accordingly did. At last, after the lapse of five long years, I noticed some blossoms on the branches, and a few days later the most exquisite fruit my eyes had ever seen.

"I gave my head-gardener the strictest orders to watch the trees carefully, for the magician had warned my father that if one unripe fruit were plucked from the tree, all the rest would become rotten at once. When it was quite ripe the fruit would become a golden yellow.

Every day I gazed on the lovely fruit, which became gradually more and more tempting-looking, and it was all I could do not to break the magician's commands.

"One night I dreamt that the fruit was perfectly ripe; I ate some of it, and it was more delicious than anything I had ever tasted in real life. As soon as I awoke I sent for the gardener and asked him if the fruit on the three trees had not ripened in the night to perfection.

"But instead of replying, the gardener threw himself at my feet and swore that he was innocent. He said that he had watched by the trees all night, but in spite of it, and as if by magic, the beautiful trees had been robbed of all their fruit.

"Grieved as I was over the theft, I did not punish the gardener, of whose fidelity I was well assured, but I determined to pluck off all the fruit in the following year before it was ripe, as I had not much belief in the magician's warning.

"I carried out my intention, and had all the fruit picked off the tree, but when I tasted one of the apples it was bitter and unpleasant, and the next morning the rest of the fruit had all rotted away.

"After this I had the beautiful fruit of these trees carefully guarded by my most faithful servants; but every year, on this very night, the fruit was plucked and stolen by an invisible hand, and next morning not a single apple remained on the trees. For some time past I have given up even having the trees watched."

When the King had finished his story, Szabo, his eldest son, said to him, "Forgive me, father, if I say I think you are mistaken. I am sure there are many men in your kingdom who could protect these trees from the cunning arts of a thieving magician; I myself, who as your eldest son claim the first right to do so, will mount guard over the fruit this very night."

The King consented, and as soon as evening drew on Szabo climbed up on to one of the trees, determined to protect the fruit even if it cost him his life. So he kept watch half the night; but a little after midnight he was overcome by an irresistible drowsiness, and fell fast asleep. He did not awake till it was bright daylight, and all the fruit on the trees had vanished.

The following year Warza, the second brother, tried his luck, but with the same result. Then it came to the turn of the third and youngest son.

Iwanich was not the least discouraged by the failure of his elder brothers, though they were both much older and stronger than he was, and when night came climbed up the tree as they had done, The moon had risen, and with her soft light lit up the whole neighborhood, so that the observant Prince could distinguish the smallest object distinctly.

At midnight a gentle west wind shook the tree, and at the same moment a snow-white swan-like bird sank down gently on his breast. The Prince hastily seized the bird's wings in his hands, when, lo! to his astonishment he found he was holding in his arms not a bird but the most beautiful girl he had ever seen.

"You need not fear Militza," said the beautiful girl, looking at the Prince with friendly eyes. "An evil magician has not robbed you of your fruit, but he stole the seed from my mother, and thereby caused her death. When she was dying she bade me take the fruit, which you have no right to possess, from the trees every year as soon as it was ripe. This I would have done tonight too, if you had not seized me with such force, and so broken the spell I was under."

Iwanich, who had been prepared to meet a terrible magician and not a lovely girl, fell desperately in love with her. They spent the rest of the night in pleasant conversation, and when Militza wished to go away he begged her not to leave him.

"I would gladly stay with you longer," said Militza, "but a wicked witch once cut off a lock of my hair when I was asleep, which has put me in her power, and if morning were still to find me here she would do me some harm, and you, too, perhaps."

Having said these words, she drew a sparkling diamond ring from her finger, which she handed to the Prince, saying, "Keep this ring in memory of Militza, and think of her sometimes if you never see her again. But if your love is really true, come and find me in my own kingdom. I may not show you the way there, but this ring will guide you.

"If you have love and courage enough to undertake this journey, whenever you come to a crossroad always look at this diamond before you settle which way you are going to take. If it sparkles as brightly as ever go straight on, but if its luster is dimmed choose another path."

Then Militza bent over the Prince and kissed him on his forehead, and before he had time to say a word she vanished through the branches of the tree in a little white cloud.

Morning broke, and the Prince, still full of the wonderful apparition, left his perch and returned to the palace like one in a dream, without even knowing if the fruit had been taken or not; for his whole mind was absorbed by thoughts of Militza and how he was to find her. As soon as the head-gardener saw the Prince going towards the palace he ran to the trees, and when he saw them laden with ripe fruit he hastened to tell the King the joyful news. The King was beside himself for joy, and hurried at once to the garden and made the gardener pick him some of the fruit. He tasted it, and found the apple quite as luscious as it had been in his dream. He went at once to his son Iwanich, and after embracing him tenderly and heaping praises on him, he asked him how he had succeeded in protecting the costly fruit from the power of the magician.

This question placed Iwanich in a dilemma. But as he did not want the real story to be known, he said that about midnight a huge wasp had flown through the branches, and buzzed incessantly round him. He had warded it off with his sword, and at dawn, when he was becoming quite worn out, the wasp had vanished as suddenly as it had appeared.

The King, who never doubted the truth of this tale, bade his son go to rest at once and recover from the fatigues of the night; but he himself went and ordered many feasts to be held in honor of the preservation of the wonderful fruit.

The whole capital was in a stir, and everyone shared in the King's joy; the Prince alone took no part in the festivities.

While the King was at a banquet, Iwanich took some purses of gold, and mounting the quickest horse in the royal stable, he sped off like the wind without a single soul being any the wiser.

It was only on the next day that they missed him; the King was very distressed at his disappearance, and sent search-parties all over the kingdom to look for him, but in vain; and after six months they gave him up as dead, and in another six months they had forgotten all about him. But in the meantime the Prince, with the help of his ring, had had a most successful journey, and no evil had befallen him.

At the end of three months he came to the entrance of a huge forest, which looked as if it had never been trodden by human foot before, and which seemed to stretch out indefinitely. The Prince was about to enter the wood by a little path he had discovered, when he heard a voice shouting to him, "Hold, youth! Whither are you going?"

Iwanich turned round, and saw a tall, gaunt-looking man, clad in miserable rags, leaning on a crooked staff and seated at the foot of an oak tree, which was so much the same color as himself that it was little wonder the Prince had ridden past the tree without noticing him.

"Where else should I be going," he said, "than through the wood?"

"Through the wood?" said the old man in amazement. "It's easily seen that you have heard nothing of this forest, that you rush so blindly to meet your doom. Well, listen to me before you ride any further; let me tell you that this wood hides in its depths a countless number of the fiercest tigers, hyenas, wolves, bears, and snakes, and all sorts of other monsters. If I were to cut you and your horse up into tiny morsels and throw them to the beasts, there wouldn't be one bit for each hundred of them. Take my advice, therefore, and if you wish to save your life follow some other path."

The Prince was rather taken aback by the old man's words, and considered for a minute what he should do; then looking at his ring, and perceiving that it sparkled as brightly as ever, he called out, "If this wood held even more terrible things than it does, I cannot help myself, for I must go through it."

Here he spurred his horse and rode on; but the old beggar screamed so loudly after him that the Prince turned round and rode back to the oak tree.

"I am really sorry for you," said the beggar, "but if you are quite determined to brave the dangers of the forest, let me at least give you a piece of advice which will help you against these monsters.

"Take this bagful of bread-crumbs and this live hare. I will make you a present of them both, as I am anxious to save your life; but you must leave your horse behind you, for it would stumble over the fallen trees or get entangled in the briars and thorns. When you have gone about a hundred yards into the wood the wild beasts will surround you. Then you must instantly seize your bag, and scatter the bread-crumbs among them. They will rush to eat them up greedily, and when you have scattered the last crumb you must lose no time in throwing the hare to them; as soon as the hare feels itself on the ground it will run away as quickly as possible, and the wild beasts will turn to pursue it. In this way you will be able to get through the wood unhurt."

Iwanich thanked the old man for his counsel, dismounted from his horse, and, taking the bag and the hare in his arms, he entered the forest. He had hardly lost sight of his gaunt grey friend when he heard growls and snarls in the thicket close to him, and before he had time to think he found himself surrounded by the most dreadful-looking creatures. On one side he saw the glittering eye of a cruel tiger, on the other the gleaming teeth of a great she-wolf; here a huge bear growled fiercely, and there a horrible snake coiled itself in the grass at his feet.

But Iwanich did not forget the old man's advice, and quickly put his hand into the bag and took out as many bread-crumbs as he could hold in his hand at a time. He threw them to the beasts, but soon the bag grew lighter and lighter, and the Prince began to feel a little frightened. And now the last crumb was gone, and the hungry beasts thronged round him, greedy for fresh prey. Then he seized the hare and threw it to them.

No sooner did the little creature feel itself on the ground than it lay back its ears and flew through the wood like an arrow from a bow, closely pursued by the wild beasts, and the Prince was left alone. He looked at his ring, and when he saw that it sparkled as brightly as ever he went straight on through the forest.

He hadn't gone very far when he saw a most extraordinary looking man coming towards him. He was not more than three feet high, his legs were quite crooked, and all his body was covered with prickles like a hedgehog. Two lions walked with him, fastened to his side by the two ends of his long beard.

He stopped the Prince and asked him in a harsh voice, "Are you the man who has just fed my body-guard?"

Iwanich was so startled that he could hardly reply, but the little man continued, "I am most grateful to you for your kindness; what can I give you as a reward?"

"All I ask," replied Iwanich, "is, that I should be allowed to go through this wood in safety."

"Most certainly," answered the little man; "and for greater security I will give you one of my lions as a protector. But when you leave this wood and come near a palace which does not belong to my domain, let the lion go, in order that he may not fall into the hands of an enemy and be killed."

With these words he loosened the lion from his beard and bade the beast guard the youth carefully.

With this new protector Iwanich wandered on through the forest, and though he came upon a great many more wolves, hyenas, leopards, and other wild beasts, they always kept at a respectful distance when they saw what sort of an escort the Prince had with him.

Iwanich hurried through the wood as quickly as his legs would carry him, but, nevertheless, hour after hour went by and not a trace of a green field or a human habitation met his eyes. At length, towards evening, the mass of trees grew more transparent, and through the interlaced branches a wide plain was visible.

At the exit of the wood the lion stood still, and the Prince took leave of him, having first thanked him warmly for his kind protection. It had become quite dark, and Iwanich was forced to wait for daylight before continuing his journey.

He made himself a bed of grass and leaves, lit a fire of dry branches, and slept soundly till the next morning.

Then he got up and walked towards a beautiful white palace which he saw gleaming in the distance. In about an hour he reached the building, and opening the door he walked in. After wandering through many marble halls, he came to a huge staircase made of porphyry, leading down to a lovely garden.

The Prince burst into a shout of joy when he suddenly perceived Militza in the center of a group of girls who were weaving wreaths of flowers with which to deck their mistress.

As soon as Militza saw the Prince she ran up to him and embraced him tenderly; and after he had told her all his adventures, they went into the palace, where a sumptuous meal awaited them. Then the Princess called her court together, and introduced Iwanich to them as her future husband.

Preparations were at once made for the wedding, which was held soon after with great pomp and magnificence.

Three months of great happiness followed, when Militza received one day an invitation to visit her mother's sister.

Although the Princess was very unhappy at leaving her husband, she did not like to refuse the invitation, and, promising to return in seven days at the latest, she took a tender farewell of the Prince, and said, "Before I go I will hand you over all the keys of the castle. Go everywhere and do anything you like; only one thing I beg and beseech you, do not open the little iron door in the north tower, which is closed with seven locks and seven bolts; for if you do, we shall both suffer for it."

Iwanich promised what she asked, and Militza departed, repeating her promise to return in seven days.

When the Prince found himself alone he began to be tormented by pangs of curiosity as to what the room in the tower contained. For two days he resisted the temptation to go and look, but on the third he could stand it no longer, and taking a torch in his hand he hurried to the tower, and unfastened one lock after the other of the little iron door until it burst open.

What an unexpected sight met his gaze! The Prince perceived a small room black with smoke, lit up feebly by a fire from which issued long blue flames. Over the fire hung a huge cauldron full of boiling pitch, and fastened into the cauldron by iron chains stood a wretched man screaming with agony.

Iwanich was much horrified at the sight before him, and asked the man what terrible crime he had committed to be punished in this dreadful fashion.

"I will tell you everything," said the man in the cauldron; "but first relieve my torments a little, I implore you."

"And how can I do that?" asked the Prince.

"With a little water," replied the man; "only sprinkle a few drops over me and I shall feel better."

The Prince, moved by pity, without thinking what he was doing, ran to the courtyard of the castle, and filled a jug with water, which he poured over the man in the cauldron.

In a moment a most fearful crash was heard, as if all the pillars of the palace were giving way, and the palace itself, with towers and doors, windows and the cauldron, whirled round the bewildered Prince's head. This continued for a few minutes, and then everything vanished into thin air, and Iwanich found himself suddenly alone upon a desolate heath covered with rocks and stones.

The Prince, who now realized what his heedlessness had done, cursed too late his spirit of curiosity. In his despair he wandered on over the heath, never looking where he put his feet, and full of sorrowful thoughts. At last he saw a light in the distance, which came from a miserable-looking little hut.

The owner of it was none other than the kind-hearted gaunt grey beggar who had given the Prince the bag of bread-crumbs and the hare. Without recognizing Iwanich, he opened the door when he knocked and gave him shelter for the night.

On the following morning the Prince asked his host if he could get him any work to do, as he was quite unknown in the neighborhood, and had not enough money to take him home. "My son," replied the old man, "all this country round here is uninhabited; I myself have to wander to distant villages for my living, and even then I do not very often find enough to satisfy my hunger. But if you would like to take service with the old witch Corva, go straight up the little stream which flows below my hut for about three hours, and you will come to a sand-hill on the left-hand side; that is where she lives."

Iwanich thanked the gaunt grey beggar for his information, and went on his way.

After walking for about three hours the Prince came upon a dreary-looking grey stone wall; this was the back of the building and did not attract him; but when he came upon the front of the house he found it even less inviting, for the old witch had surrounded her dwelling with a fence of spikes, on every one of which a man's skull was stuck. In this horrible enclosure stood a small black house, which had only two grated windows, all covered with cobwebs, and a battered iron door.

The Prince knocked, and a rasping woman's voice told him to enter.

Iwanich opened the door, and found himself in a smoke-begrimed kitchen, in the presence of a hideous old woman who was warming her skinny hands at a fire. The Prince offered to become her servant, and the old hag told him she was badly in want of one, and he seemed to be just the person to suit her.

When Iwanich asked what his work, and how much his wages would be, the witch bade him follow her, and led the way through a narrow damp passage into a vault, which served as a stable. Here he perceived two pitch-black horses in a stall.

"You see before you," said the old woman, "a mare and her foal; you have nothing to do but to lead them out to the fields every day, and to see that neither of them runs away from you. If you look after them both for a whole year I will give you anything you like to ask; but if, on the other hand, you let either of the animals escape you, your last hour is come, and your head shall be stuck on the last spike of my fence. The other spikes, as you see, are already adorned, and the skulls are all those of different servants I have had who have failed to do what I demanded."

Iwanich, who thought he could not be much worse off than he was already, agreed to the witch's proposal.

At daybreak next morning he drove his horses to the field, and brought them back in the evening without their ever having attempted to break away from him. The witch stood at her door and received him kindly, and set a good meal before him.

So it continued for some time, and all went well with the Prince.

Early every morning he led the horses out to the fields, and brought them home safe and sound in the evening.

One day, while he was watching the horses, he came to the banks of a river, and saw a big fish, which through some mischance had been cast on the land, struggling hard to get back into the water.

Iwanich, who felt sorry for the poor creature, seized it in his arms and flung it into the stream. But no sooner did the fish find itself in the water again, than, to the Prince's amazement, it swam up to the bank and said, "My kind benefactor, how can I reward you for your goodness?"

"I desire nothing," answered the Prince. "I am quite content to have been able to be of some service to you."

"You must do me the favor," replied the fish, "to take a scale from my body, and keep it carefully. If you should ever need my help, throw it into the river, and I will come to your aid at once."

Iwanich bowed, loosened a scale from the body of the grateful beast, put it carefully away, and returned home.

A short time after this, when he was going early one morning to the usual grazing place with his horses, he noticed a flock of birds assembled together making a great noise and flying wildly backwards and forwards.

Full of curiosity, Iwanich hurried up to the spot, and saw that a large number of ravens had attacked an eagle, and although the eagle was big and powerful and was making a brave fight, it was overpowered at last by numbers, and had to give in.

But the Prince, who was sorry for the poor bird, seized the branch of a tree and hit out at the ravens with it; terrified at this unexpected onslaught they flew away, leaving many of their number dead or wounded on the battlefield.

As soon as the eagle saw itself free from its tormentors it plucked a feather from its wing, and, handing it to the Prince, said, "Here, my kind benefactor, take this feather as a proof of my gratitude; should you ever be in need of my help blow this feather into the air, and I will help you as much as is in my power."

Iwanich thanked the bird, and placing the feather beside the scale he drove the horses home.

Another day he had wandered farther than usual, and came close to a farmyard; the place pleased the Prince, and as there was plenty of good grass for the horses he determined to spend the day there. Just as he was sitting down under a tree he heard a cry close to him, and saw a fox which had been caught in a trap placed there by the farmer.

In vain did the poor beast try to free itself; then the good-natured Prince came once more to the rescue, and let the fox out of the trap.

The fox thanked him heartily, tore two hairs out of his bushy tail, and said, "Should you ever stand in need of my help throw these two hairs into the fire, and in a moment I shall be at your side ready to obey you."

Iwanich put the fox's hairs with the scale and the feather, and as it was getting dark he hastened home with his horses.

In the meantime his service was drawing near to an end, and in three more days the year was up, and he would be able to get his reward and leave the witch.

On the first evening of these last three days, when he came home and was eating his supper, he noticed the old woman stealing into the stables.

The Prince followed her secretly to see what she was going to do. He crouched down in the doorway and heard the wicked witch telling the horses to wait next morning till Iwanich was asleep, and then to go and hide themselves in the river, and to stay there till she told them to return; and if they didn't do as she told them the old woman threatened to beat them till they bled.

When Iwanich heard all this he went back to his room, determined that nothing should induce him to fall asleep next day. On the following morning he led the mare and foal to the fields as usual, but bound a cord round them both which he kept in his hand.

But after a few hours, by the magic arts of the old witch, he was overpowered by sleep, and the mare and foal escaped and did as they had been told to do. The Prince did not awake till late in the evening; and when he did, he found, to his horror, that the horses had disappeared. Filled with despair, he cursed the moment when he had entered the service of the cruel witch, and already he saw his head sticking up on the sharp spike beside the others.

Then he suddenly remembered the fish's scale, which, with the eagle's feather and the fox's hairs, he always carried about with him. He drew the scale from his pocket, and hurrying to the river he threw it in. In a minute the grateful fish swam towards the bank on which Iwanich was standing, and said, "What do you command, my friend and benefactor?"

The Prince replied, "I had to look after a mare and foal, and they have run away from me and have hidden themselves in the river; if you wish to save my life drive them back to the land."

"Wait a moment," answered the fish, "and I and my friends will soon drive them out of the water." With these words the creature disappeared into the depths of the stream.

Almost immediately a rushing hissing sound was heard in the waters, the waves dashed against the banks, the foam was tossed into the air, and the two horses leapt suddenly on to the dry land, trembling and shaking with fear. Iwanich sprang at once on to the mare's back, seized the foal by its bridle, and hastened home in the highest spirits.

When the witch saw the Prince bringing the horses home she could hardly conceal her wrath, and as soon as she had placed Iwanich's supper before him she stole away again to the stables. The Prince followed her, and heard her scolding the beasts harshly for not having hidden themselves better. She bade them wait next morning till Iwanich was asleep and then to hide themselves in the clouds, and to remain there till she called. If they did not do as she told them she would beat them till they bled.

The next morning, after Iwanich had led his horses to the fields, he fell once more into a magic sleep. The horses at once ran away and hid themselves in the clouds, which hung down from the mountains in soft billowy masses.

When the Prince awoke and found that both the mare and the foal had disappeared, he bethought him at once of the eagle, and taking the feather out of his pocket he blew it into the air.

In a moment the bird swooped down beside him and asked, "What do you wish me to do?"

"My mare and foal," replied the Prince, "have run away from me, and have hidden themselves in the clouds; if you wish to save my life, restore both animals to me."

"Wait a minute," answered the eagle; "with the help of my friends I will soon drive them back to you."

With these words the bird flew up into the air and disappeared among the clouds.

Almost directly Iwanich saw his two horses being driven towards him by a host of eagles of all sizes. He caught the mare and foal, and having thanked the eagle he drove them cheerfully home again.

The old witch was more disgusted than ever when she saw him appearing, and having set his supper before him she stole into the stables, and Iwanich heard her abusing the horses for not having hidden themselves better in the clouds. Then she bade them hide themselves next morning, as soon as Iwanich was asleep, in the King's hen-house, which stood on a lonely part of the heath, and to remain there till she called. If they failed to do as she told them she would certainly beat them this time till they bled.

On the following morning the Prince drove his horses as usual to the fields. After he had been overpowered by sleep, as on the former days, the mare and foal ran away and hid themselves in the royal hen house.

When the Prince awoke and found the horses gone he determined to appeal to the fox; so, lighting a fire, he threw the two hairs into it, and in a few moments the fox stood beside him and asked, "In what way can I serve you?"

"I wish to know," replied Iwanich, "where the King's hen-house is."

"Hardly an hour's walk from here," answered the fox, and offered to show the Prince the way to it.

While they were walking along the fox asked him what he wanted to do at the royal hen-house. The Prince told him of the misfortune that had befallen him, and of the necessity of recovering the mare and foal.

"That is no easy matter," replied the fox. "But wait a moment. I have an idea. Stand at the door of the hen-house, and wait there for your horses. In the meantime I will slip in among the hens through a hole in the wall and give them a good chase, so that the noise they make will arouse the royal hen-wives, and they will come to see what is the matter. When they see the horses they will at once imagine them to be the cause of the disturbance, and will drive them out. Then you must lay hands on the mare and foal and catch them.”

All turned out exactly as the sly fox had foreseen. The Prince swung himself on the mare, seized the foal by its bridle, and hurried home.

While he was riding over the heath in the highest of spirits the mare suddenly said to her rider, “You are the first person who has ever succeeded in outwitting the old witch Corva, and now you may ask what reward you like for your service. If you promise never to betray me I will give you a piece of advice which you will do well to follow.”

The Prince promised never to betray her confidence, and the mare continued. “Ask nothing else as a reward than my foal, for it has not its like in the world, and is not to be bought for love or money; for it can go from one end of the earth to another in a few minutes. Of course the cunning Corva will do her best to dissuade you from taking the foal, and will tell you that it is both idle and sickly; but do not believe her, and stick to your point.”

Iwanich longed to possess such an animal, and promised the mare to follow her advice. This time Corva received him in the most friendly manner, and set a sumptuous repast before him. As soon as he had finished she asked him what reward he demanded for his year’s service.

“Nothing more nor less,” replied the Prince, “than the foal of your mare.”

The witch pretended to be much astonished at his request, and said that he deserved something much better than the foal, for the beast was lazy and nervous, blind in one eye, and, in short, was quite worthless.

But the Prince knew what he wanted, and when the old witch saw that he had made up his mind to have the foal, she said, “I am obliged to keep my promise and to hand you over the foal; and as I know who you are and what you want, I will tell you in what way the animal will be useful to you. The man in the cauldron of boiling pitch, whom you set free, is a mighty magician; through your curiosity and thoughtlessness Militza came into his power, and he has transported her and her castle and belongings into a distant country.

“You are the only person who can kill him; and in consequence he fears you to such an extent that he has set spies to watch you, and they report your movements to him daily.

“When you have reached him, beware of speaking a single word to him, or you will fall into the power of his friends. Seize him at once by the beard and dash him to the ground.”

Iwanich thanked the old witch, mounted his foal, put spurs to its sides, and they flew like lightning through the air.

Already it was growing dark, when Iwanich perceived some figures in the distance; they soon came up to them, and then the Prince saw that it was the magician and his friends who were driving through the air in a carriage drawn by owls.

When the magician found himself face to face with Iwanich, without hope of escape, he turned to him with false friendliness and said, "Thrice my kind benefactor!"

But the Prince, without saying a word, seized him at once by his beard and dashed him to the ground. At the same moment the foal sprang on the top of the magician and kicked and stamped on him with his hoofs till he died.

Then Iwanich found himself once more in the palace of his bride, and Mil-itza herself flew into his arms.

From this time forward they lived in undisturbed peace and happiness till the end of their lives.

The Mediterranean

GREECE

---

HOW THESEUS SLEW THE DEVOURERS OF MEN

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Kingsley, Charles. The Heroes: Or, Greek Fairy Tales for My Children. New York: R. H. Russell, Publisher, 1901, 146–175.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Greece

National Origin: Greece

---

Located on the southern end of the Balkan Peninsula, Greece is a crossroads between Europe, Asia, and Africa. Historically, Greece has been heir to Classical Greek, Byzantine, and Ottoman civilizations. There has been mutual influence extending from and into the Middle East, North Africa, and Western Europe. According to Classical Greek myth, Theseus was the son of the mortal woman Aethra, wife of Aegeus, and Poseidon, god of the sea. When his wife became pregnant, Aegeus left her in her native city of Troezen and returned to Athens. Aegeus left his sandals and sword under a huge rock along with the challenge for his son to prove himself worthy by retrieving these tokens. In later life Theseus, became King of Athens, but in the following narrative, he has just learned the identity of his mortal father and has undertaken the journey to meet Aegeus. Rather than taking the safe sea route to Athens, Theseus goes by a dangerous land route that leads him to confront a series of monstrous outlaws. By defeating them, he cleanses the environment in the fashion of Heracles (or Hercules) the other culture hero to whom he compares himself. Following his reunion, he goes on to defeat the Minotaur, perhaps the best-known of his conquests.

---

So Theseus stood there alone, with his mind full of many hopes. And first, he thought of going down to the harbor and hiring a swift ship, and sailing across the bay to Athens; but even that seemed too slow for him, and he longed for wings to fly across the sea, and find his father. But after a while his heart began to fail him; and he sighed, and said within himself—"What if my father have other sons about him, whom he loves? What if he will not receive me? And what have I done that he should receive me? He has forgotten me ever since I was born: why should he welcome me now?"

Then he thought a long while sadly; and at the last he cried aloud, "Yes! I will make him love me; for I will prove myself worthy of his love. I will win honor and renown, and do such deeds that Ægeus shall be proud of me, though he had fifty other sons! Did not Heracles win himself honor, though he was oppressed, and the slave of Eurystheus? Did he not kill all robbers and evil beasts, and drain great lakes and marshes, breaking the hills through with his club? Therefore it was that all men honored him, because he rid them of their miseries, and made life pleasant to them and their children after them. Where can I go, to do as Heracles has done? Where can I find strange adventures, robbers, and monsters, and the children of hell, the enemies of men? I will go by land, and into the mountains, and round by the way of the Isthmus. Perhaps there I may hear of brave adventures, and do something which shall win my father's love."

So he went by land, and away into the mountains, with his father's sword upon his thigh, till he came to the Spider mountains, which hang over Epidaurus and the sea, where the glens run downward from one peak in the midst, as the rays spread in the spider's web. And he went up into the gloomy glens, between the furrowed marble walls, till the lowland grew blue beneath his feet, and the clouds drove damp about his head.

But he went up and up forever, through the spider's web of glens, till he could see the narrow gulfs spread below him, north and south, and east and west; black cracks half-choked with mists, and above all a dreary down. But over that down he must go, for there was no road right or left; so he toiled on through bog and brake, till he came to a pile of stones.

And on the stones a man was sitting, wrapt in a bear-skin cloak. The head of the bear served him for a cap, and its teeth grinned white around his brows; and the feet were tied about his throat, and their claws shone white upon his chest. And when he saw Theseus he rose, and laughed till the glens rattled.

"And who art thou, fair fly, who hast walked into the spider's web?" But Theseus walked on steadily, and made no answer: but he thought, "Is this some robber? and has an adventure come already to me?" But the strange man laughed louder than ever, and said—"Bold fly, know you not that these glens are the web from which no fly ever finds his way out again, and this down the spider's house, and I the spider who sucks the flies? Come hither, and let me feast upon you; for it is of no use to run away, so cunning a web has my father Hephaistos [blacksmith and “artificer” for the Greek gods] spread for me, when he made these clefts in the mountains, through which no man finds his way home.”

But Theseus came on steadily, and asked, “And what is your name among men, bold spider? and where are your spider’s fangs?”

Then the strange man laughed again, “My name is Periphetes, the son of Hephaistos and Anticleia the mountain nymph. But men call me Corynetes the club-bearer; and here is my spider’s fang.”

And he lifted from off the stones at his side a mighty club of bronze.

“This my father gave me, and forged it himself in the roots of the mountain; and with it I pound all proud flies till they give out their fatness and their sweetness. So give me up that gay sword of yours, and your mantle, and your golden sandals, lest I pound you, and by ill luck you die.”

But Theseus wrapt his mantle round his left arm quickly, in hard folds, from his shoulder to his hand, and drew his sword, and rushed upon the club-bearer, and the club-bearer rushed on him.

Thrice he struck at Theseus, and made him bend under the blows like a sapling; but Theseus guarded his head with his left arm, and the mantle which was wrapped around it. And thrice Theseus sprang upright after the blow, like a sapling when the storm is past; and he stabbed at the club-bearer with his sword, but the loose folds of the bear-skin saved him. Then Theseus grew mad, and closed with him, and caught him by the throat, and they fell and rolled over together; but when Theseus rose up from the ground the club-bearer lay still at his feet.

Then Theseus took his club and his bear-skin, and left him to the kites and crows, and went upon his journey down the glens on the farther slope, till he came to a broad green valley, and saw flocks and herds sleeping beneath the trees.

And by the side of a pleasant fountain, under the shade of rocks and trees, were nymphs and shepherds dancing; but no one piped to them while they danced.

And when they saw Theseus they shrieked; and the shepherds ran off, and drove away their flocks; while the nymphs dived into the fountain like coots, and vanished.

Theseus wondered and laughed, “What strange fancies have folks here who run away from strangers, and have no music when they dance!” But he was tired, and dusty, and thirsty; so he thought no more of them, but drank and bathed in the clear pool, and then lay down in the shade under a plane-tree, while the water sang him to sleep, as it tinkled down from stone to stone.

And when he woke he heard a whispering, and saw the nymphs peeping at him across the fountain from the dark mouth of a cave, where they sat on green cushions of moss. And one said, “Surely he is not Periphetes”; and another, “He looks like no robber, but a fair and gentle youth.”

Then Theseus smiled, and called them, “Fair nymphs, I am not Periphetes. He sleeps among the kites and crows: but I have brought away his bear-skin and his club.”

Then they leapt across the pool, and came to him, and called the shepherds back. And he told them how he had slain the club-bearer: and the shepherds kissed his feet and sang, "Now we shall feed our flocks in peace, and not be afraid to have music when we dance; for the cruel club-bearer has met his match, and he will listen for our pipes no more."

Then they brought him kid's flesh and wine, and the nymphs brought him honey from the rocks; and he ate, and drank, and slept again, while the nymphs and shepherds danced and sang. And when he woke, they begged him to stay; but he would not. "I have a great work to do," he said; "I must be away toward the Isthmus, that I may go to Athens."

But the shepherds said, "Will you go alone toward Athens? None travel that way now, except in armed troops."

"As for arms, I have enough, as you see. And as for troops, an honest man is good enough company for himself. Why should I not go alone toward Athens?"

"If you do, you must look warily about you on the Isthmus, lest you meet Sinis the robber, whom men call Pituocampes the pine-bender; for he bends down two pine trees, and binds all travelers hand and foot between them; and when he lets the trees go again their bodies are torn in sunder."

"And after that," said another, "you must go inland, and not dare to pass over the cliffs of Sciron; for on the left hand are the mountains, and on the right the sea, so that you have no escape, but must needs meet Sciron the robber, who will make you wash his feet; and while you are washing them he will kick you over the cliff, to the tortoise who lives below, and feeds upon the bodies of the dead."

And before Theseus could answer, another cried, "And after that is a worse danger still, unless you go inland always, and leave Eleusis far on your right. For in Eleusis rules Kerkuon the cruel king, the terror of all mortals, who killed his own daughter Alope in prison. But she was changed into a fair fountain; and her child he cast out upon the mountains; but the wild mares gave it milk. And now he challenges all comers to wrestle with him; for he is the best wrestler in all Attica, and overthrows all who come; and those whom he overthrows he murders miserably, and his palace-court is full of their bones."

Then Theseus frowned, and said, "This seems indeed an ill-ruled land, and adventures enough in it to be tried. But if I am the heir of it, I will rule it and right it, and here is my royal scepter." And he shook his club of bronze, while the nymphs and shepherds clung round him, and entreated him not to go.

But on he went, nevertheless, till he could see both the seas and the citadel of Corinth towering high above all the land. And he past swiftly along the Isthmus, for his heart burned to meet that cruel Sinis; and in a pine-wood at last he met him, where the Isthmus was narrowest and the road ran between high rocks. There he sat upon a stone by the wayside, with a young fir tree for a club across his knees, and a cord laid ready by his side; and over his head, upon the fir-tops, hung the bones of murdered men.

Then Theseus shouted to him, "Holla, thou valiant pine-bender, hast thou two fir trees left for me?"

And Sinis leapt to his feet, and answered, pointing to the bones above his head, "My larder has grown empty lately, so I have two fir trees ready for thee." And he rushed on Theseus, lifting his club, and Theseus rushed upon him.

Then they hammered together till the greenwoods rang: but the metal was tougher than the pine, and Sinis' club broke right across, as the bronze came down upon it. Then Theseus heaved up another mighty stroke, and smote Sinis down upon his face; and knelt upon his back, and bound him with his own cord, and said, "As thou hast done to others, so shall it be done to thee." Then he bent down two young fir trees, and bound Sinis between them, for all his struggling and his prayers; and let them go, and ended Sinis, and went on, leaving him to the hawks and crows.

Then he went over the hills toward Megara, keeping close along the Saronic Sea, till he came to the cliffs of Sciron, and the narrow path between the mountain and the sea.

And there he saw Sciron sitting by a fountain, at the edge of the cliff. On his knees was a mighty club; and he had barred the path with stones, so that every one must stop who came up. Then Theseus shouted to him, and said, "Holla, thou tortoise-feeder, do thy feet need washing today?"

And Sciron leapt to his feet, and answered, "My tortoise is empty and hungry, and my feet need washing today." And he stood before his barrier, and lifted up his club in both hands. Then Theseus rushed upon him; and sore was the battle upon the cliff; for when Sciron felt the weight of the bronze club, he dropt his own, and closed with Theseus, and tried to hurl him by main force over the cliff. But Theseus was a wary wrestler, and dropt his own club, and caught him by the throat and by the knee, and forced him back against the wall of stones, and crushed him up against them, till his breath was almost gone. And Sciron cried panting, "Loose me, and I will let thee pass." But Theseus answered, "I must not pass till I have made the rough way smooth"; and he forced him back against the wall till it fell, and Sciron rolled head over heels.

Then Theseus lifted him up all bruised, and said, "Come hither and wash my feet." And he drew his sword, and sat down by the well, and said, "Wash my feet, or I cut you piecemeal." And Sciron washed his feet trembling; and when it was done, Theseus rose, and cried, "As thou hast done to others, so shall it be done to thee. Go feed thy tortoise thyself"; and he kicked him over the cliff into the sea.

And whether the tortoise ate him, I know not; for some say that earth and sea both disdained to take his body, so foul it was with sin. So the sea cast it out upon the shore, and the shore cast it back into the sea, and at last the waves hurled it high into the air in anger; and it hung there long without a grave, till it was changed into a desolate rock, which stands there in the surge until this day.

This at least is true, which Pausanias tells, that in the royal porch at Athens he saw the figure of Theseus modeled in clay, and by him Sciron the robber, falling headlong into the sea. Then he went a long day's journey, past Megara, into the Attic land, and high before him rose the snow-peaks of Cithæron, all cold above the black pine-woods, where haunt the Furies, and the raving Bacchæ, and the nymphs who drive men wild, far aloft upon the dreary mountains, where the storms howl all day long. And on his right hand was the sea always, and Salamis, with its island cliffs, and the sacred strait of the sea-fight, where afterwards the Persians fled before the Greeks. So he went all day until the evening, till he saw the Thriasian plain, and the sacred city of Eleusis, where the Earth-mother's temple stands. For there she met Triptolemus, when all the land lay waste, Demeter the kind Earth-mother, and in her hands a sheaf of corn. And she taught him to plough the fallows, and to yoke the lazy kine; and she taught him to sow the seed-fields, and to reap the golden grain; and sent him forth to teach all nations, and give corn to laboring men. So at Eleusis all men honor her, whosoever tills the land; her and Triptolemus her beloved, who gave corn to laboring men.

And he went along the plain into Eleusis, and stood in the market-place, and cried, "Where is Kerkuon, the king of the city? I must wrestle a fall with him today."

Then all the people crowded round him, and cried, "Fair youth, why will you die? Hasten out of the city, before the cruel king hears that a stranger is here."

But Theseus went up through the town, while the people wept and prayed, and through the gates of the palace yard, and through the piles of bones and skulls, till he came to the door of Kerkuon's hall, the terror of all mortal men.

And there he saw Kerkuon sitting at the table in the hall alone; and before him was a whole sheep roasted, and beside him a whole jar of wine. And Theseus stood and called him, "Holla, thou valiant wrestler, wilt thou wrestle a fall today?"

And Kerkuon looked up and laughed, and answered, "I will wrestle a fall today; but come in, for I am lonely and thou weary, and eat and drink before thou die."

Then Theseus went up boldly, and sat down before Kerkuon at the board; and he ate his fill of the sheep's flesh, and drank his fill of the wine; and Theseus ate enough for three men, but Kerkuon ate enough for seven.

But neither spoke a word to the other, though they looked across the table by stealth; and each said in his heart, "He has broad shoulders; but I trust mine are as broad as his."

At last, when the sheep was eaten and the jar of wine drained dry, King Kerkuon rose, and cried, "Let us wrestle a fall before we sleep."

So they tossed off all their garments, and went forth in the palace-yard; and Kerkuon bade strew fresh sand in an open space between the bones. And there the heroes stood face to face, while their eyes glared like wild bulls'; and all the people crowded at the gates to see what would befall.

And there they stood and wrestled, till the stars shone out above their heads; up and down and round, till the sand was stamped hard beneath their feet. And their eyes flashed like stars in the darkness, and their breath went up like smoke in the night air; but neither took nor gave a footstep, and the people watched silent at the gates.

But at last Kerkuon grew angry, and caught Theseus round the neck, and shook him as a mastiff shakes a rat; but he could not shake him off his feet.

But Theseus was quick and wary, and clasped Kerkuon round the waist, and slipped his loin quickly underneath him, while he caught him by the wrist; and then he hove a mighty heave, a heave which would have stirred an oak, and lifted Kerkuon, and pitched him, right over his shoulder on the ground.

Then he leapt on him, and called, "Yield, or I kill thee!" but Kerkuon said no word; for his heart was burst within him, with the fall, and the meat, and the wine.

Then Theseus opened the gates, and called in all the people; and they cried, "You have slain our evil king; be you now our king, and rule us well."

"I will be your king in Eleusis, and I will rule you right and well; for this cause I have slain all evil-doers—Sinis, and Sciron, and this man last of all."

Then an aged man stepped forth, and said, "Young hero, hast thou slain Sinis? Beware then of Ægeus, king of Athens, to whom thou goest, for he is near of kin to Sinis."

"Then I have slain my own kinsman," said Theseus, "though well he deserved to die. Who will purge me from his death, for rightfully I slew him, unrighteous and accursed as he was?"

And the old man answered, "That will the heroes do, the sons of Phytalus, who dwell beneath the elm tree in Aphidnai, by the bank of silver Cephisus; for they know the mysteries of the Gods. Thither you shall go and be purified, and after you shall be our king."

So he took an oath of the people of Eleusis, that they would serve him as their king, and went away next morning across the Thriasian plain, and over the hills toward Aphidnai, that he might find the sons of Phytalus.

And as he was skirting the Vale of Cephisus, along the foot of lofty Parnes, a very tall and strong man came down to meet him, dressed in rich garments. On his arms were golden bracelets, and round his neck a collar of jewels; and he came forward, bowing courteously, and held out both his hands, and spoke, "Welcome, fair youth, to these mountains; happy am I to have met you! For what greater pleasure to a good man, than to entertain strangers? But I see that you are weary. Come up to my castle, and rest yourself awhile."

"I give you thanks," said Theseus; "but I am in haste to go up the valley, and to reach Aphidnai in the Vale of Cephisus."

"Alas! you have wandered far from the right way, and you cannot reach Aphidnai tonight, for there are many miles of mountain between you and it, and steep passes, and cliffs dangerous after nightfall. It is well for you that I met you; for my whole joy is to find strangers, and to feast them at my castle, and hear tales from them of foreign lands. Come up with me, and eat the best of venison, and drink the rich red wine; and sleep upon my famous bed, of which all travelers say that they never saw the like. For whatsoever the stature of my guest, however tall or short, that bed fits him to a hair, and he sleeps on it as he never slept before." And he laid hold on Theseus' hands, and would not let him go.

Theseus wished to go forwards: but he was ashamed to seem churlish to so hospitable a man; and he was curious to see that wondrous bed; and beside, he was hungry and weary: yet he shrank from the man, he knew not why: for, though his voice was gentle and fawning, it was dry and husky like a toad's; and though his eyes were gentle, they were dull and cold like stones. But he consented, and went with the man up a glen which led from the road toward the peaks of Parnes, under the dark shadow of the cliffs.

And as they went up, the glen grew narrower, and the cliffs higher and darker, and beneath them a torrent roared, half seen between bare limestone crags. And around there was neither tree nor bush, while from the white peaks of Parnes the snow-blasts swept down the glen, cutting and chilling, till a horror fell on Theseus, as he looked round at that doleful place. And he asked at last, "Your castle stands, it seems, in a dreary region."

"Yes, but once within it, hospitality makes all things cheerful. But who are these?" and he looked back, and Theseus also; and far below, along the road which they had left, came a string of laden asses, and merchants walking by them, watching their ware.

"Ah, poor souls!" said the stranger. "Well for them that I looked back and saw them! And well for me too, for I shall have the more guests at my feast. Wait awhile till I go down and call them, and we will eat and drink together the livelong night. Happy am I, to whom Heaven sends so many guests at once!"

And he ran back down the hill, waving his hand and shouting to the merchants, while Theseus went slowly up the steep pass.

But as he went up he met an aged man, who had been gathering driftwood in the torrent-bed. He had laid down his faggot in the road, and was trying to lift it again to his shoulder. And when he saw Theseus, he called to him, and said, "O fair youth, help me up with my burden; for my limbs are stiff and weak with years."

Then Theseus lifted the burden on his back. And the old man blest him, and then looked earnestly upon him, and said, "Who are you, fair youth, and wherefore travel you this doleful road?"

"Who I am my parents know: but I travel this doleful road because I have been invited by a hospitable man, who promises to feast me, and to make me sleep upon I know not what wondrous bed."

Then the old man clapped his hands together and cried, "O house of Hades, man-devouring; will thy maw never be full? Know, fair youth, that you are going to torment and to death; for he who met you (I will requite your kindness by another) is a robber and a murderer of men. Whatsoever stranger he meets he entices him hither to death; and as for this bed of which he speaks, truly it fits all comers, yet none ever rose alive off it save me.”

“Why?” asked Theseus, astonished.

“Because, if a man be too tall for it, he lops his limbs till they be short enough, and if he be too short, he stretches his limbs till they be long enough: but me only he spared, seven weary years ago; for I alone of all fitted his bed exactly, so he spared me, and made me his slave. And once I was a wealthy merchant, and dwelt in brazen-gated Thebes; but now I hew wood and draw water for him, the torment of all mortal men.”

Then Theseus said nothing; but he ground his teeth together.

“Escape, then,” said the old man, “for he will have no pity on thy youth. But yesterday he brought up hither a young man and a maiden, and fitted them upon his bed: and the young man’s hands and feet he cut off; but the maiden’s limbs he stretched until she died, and so both perished miserably—but I am tired of weeping over the slain. And therefore he is called Procrustes the stretcher, though his father called him Damastes. Flee from him: yet whither will you flee? The cliffs are steep, and who can climb them? And there is no other road.”

But Theseus laid his hand upon the old man’s mouth, and said, “There is no need to flee”; and he turned to go down the pass.

“Do not tell him that I have warned you, or he will kill me by some evil death”; and the old man screamed after him down the glen; but Theseus strode on in his wrath.

And he said to himself, “This is an ill-ruled land; when shall I have done ridding it of monsters?” And as he spoke, Procrustes came up the hill, and all the merchants with him, smiling and talking gaily. And when he saw Theseus, he cried, “Ah, fair young guest, have I kept you too long waiting?”

But Theseus answered, “The man who stretches his guests upon a bed and hews off their hands and feet, what shall be done to him, when right is done throughout the land?”

Then Procrustes’ countenance changed, and his cheeks grew as green as a lizard, and he felt for his sword in haste; but Theseus leapt on him, and cried, “Is this true, my host, or is it false?” and he clasped Procrustes’ round waist and elbow, so that he could not draw his sword.

“Is this true, my host, or is it false?” But Procrustes answered never a word.

Then Theseus flung him from him, and lifted up his dreadful club; and before Procrustes could strike him he had struck, and felled him to the ground.

And once again he struck him; and his evil soul fled forth, and went down to Hades squeaking, like a bat into the darkness of a cave.

Then Theseus stript him of his gold ornaments, and went up to his house, and found there great wealth and treasure, which he had stolen from the passers by. And he called the people of the country, whom Procrustes had spoiled a long time, and parted the spoil among them, and went down the mountains, and away.

And he went down the glens of Parnes, through mist, and cloud, and rain, down the slopes of oak, and lentisk, and arbutus, and fragrant bay, till he came to the Vale of Cephissus, and the pleasant town of Aphidnai, and the home of the Phytalid heroes, where they dwelt beneath a mighty elm.

And there they built an altar, and bade him bathe in Cephissus, and offer a yearling ram, and purified him from the blood of Sinis, and sent him away in peace.

And he went down the valley by Acharnai, and by the silver-swirling stream, while all the people blessed him, for the fame of his prowess had spread wide, till he saw the plain of Athens, and the hill where Athené dwells.

So Theseus went up through Athens, and all the people ran out to see him; for his fame had gone before him and every one knew of his mighty deeds. And all cried, "Here comes the hero who slew Sinis, and Phaia the wild sow of Crommyon, and conquered Kerkuon in wrestling, and slew Procrustes the pitiless." But Theseus went on sadly and steadfastly; for his heart yearned after his father; and he said, "How shall I deliver him from these leeches who suck his blood?"

So he went up the holy stairs, and into the Acropolis, where Ægeus' palace stood; and he went straight into Ægeus' hall, and stood upon the threshold, and looked round.

And there he saw his cousins sitting about the table, at the wine; many a son of Pallas, but no Ægeus among them. There they sat and feasted, and laughed, and passed the wine-cup round; while harpers harped, and slave girls sang, and the tumblers showed their tricks.

Loud laughed the sons of Pallas, and fast went the wine-cup round; but Theseus frowned, and said under his breath, "No wonder that the land is full of robbers, while such as these bear rule."

Then the Pallantids saw him, and called to him, half-drunk with wine, "Holla, tall stranger at the door, what is your will today?"

"I come hither to ask for hospitality."

"Then take it, and welcome. You look like a hero and a bold warrior; and we like such to drink with us."

"I ask no hospitality of you; I ask it of Ægeus the king, the master of this house."

At that some growled, and some laughed, and shouted, "Heyday! We are all masters here."

"Then I am master as much as the rest of you," said Theseus, and he strode past the table up the hall, and looked around for Ægeus; but he was nowhere to be seen.

The Pallantids looked at him, and then at each other, and each whispered to the man next him, "This is a forward fellow; he ought to be thrust out at the door." But each man's neighbor whispered in return, "His shoulders are broad; will you rise and put him out?" So they all sat still where they were.

Then Theseus called to the servants, and said, "Go tell King Ægeus, your master, that Theseus of Trœzene is here, and asks to be his guest awhile."

A servant ran and told Ægeus, where he sat in his chamber within, by Medeia the dark witch-woman, watching her eye and hand. And when Ægeus heard of Trœzene he turned pale and red again; and rose from his seat trembling, while Medeia watched him like a snake.

“What is Trœzene to you?” she asked.

But he said hastily, “Do you not know who this Theseus is? The hero who has cleared the country from all monsters; but that he came from Trœzene, I never heard before. I must go out and welcome him.”

So Ægeus came out into the hall; and when Theseus saw him, his heart leapt into his mouth, and he longed to fall on his neck and welcome him; but he controlled himself, and said, “My father may not wish for me, after all. I will try him before I discover myself”; and he bowed low before Ægeus, and said, “I have delivered the king’s realm from many monsters; therefore I am come to ask a reward of the king.”

And old Ægeus looked on him, and loved him, as what fond heart would not have done? But he only sighed, and said, “It is little that I can give you, noble lad, and nothing that is worthy of you; for surely you are no mortal man, or at least no mortal’s son.”

“All I ask,” said Theseus, “is to eat and drink at your table.”

“That I can give you,” said Ægeus, “if at least I am master in my own hall.”

Then he bade them put a seat for Theseus, and set before him the best of the feast; and Theseus sat and ate so much, that all the company wondered at him: but always he kept his club by his side.

But Medeia the dark witch-woman had been watching him all the while. She saw how Ægeus turned red and pale, when the lad said that he came from Trœzene. She saw, too, how his heart was opened toward Theseus; and how Theseus bore himself before all the sons of Pallas, like a lion among a pack of curs. And she said to herself, “This youth will be master here; perhaps he is nearer to Ægeus already than mere fancy. At least the Pallantids will have no chance by the side of such as he.”

Then she went back into her chamber modestly, while Theseus ate and drank; and all the servants whispered, “This, then, is the man who killed the monsters! How noble are his looks, and how huge his size! Ah, would that he were our master’s son!”

But presently Medeia came forth, decked in all her jewels, and her rich Eastern robes, and looking more beautiful than the day; so that all the guests could look at nothing else. And in her right hand she held a golden cup, and in her left a flask of gold; and she came up to Theseus, and spoke in a sweet, soft, winning voice, “Hail to the hero, the conqueror, the unconquered, the destroyer of all evil things! Drink, hero, of my charmed cup, which gives rest after every toil, which heals all wounds, and pours new life into the veins. Drink of my cup, for in it sparkles the wine of the East, and Nepenthe, the comfort of the Immortals.”

And as she spoke, she poured the flask into the cup; and the fragrance of the wine spread through the hall, like the scent of thyme and roses.

And Theseus looked up in her fair face, and into her deep dark eyes. And as he looked, he shrank and shuddered; for they were dry like the eyes of a snake. And he rose, and said, "The wine is rich and fragrant, and the wine-bearer as fair as the Immortals; but let her pledge me first herself in the cup, that the wine may be the sweeter from her lips."

Then Medeia turned pale, and stammered, "Forgive me, fair hero; but I am ill, and dare drink no wine."

And Theseus looked again into her eyes, and cried, "Thou shalt pledge me in that cup, or die." And he lifted up his brazen club, while all the guests looked on aghast.

Medeia shrieked a fearful shriek, and dashed the cup to the ground, and fled; and where the wine flowed over the marble pavement, the stone bubbled, and crumbled, and hissed, under the fierce venom of the draught.

But Medeia called her dragon chariot, and sprang into it and fled aloft, away over land and sea, and no man saw her more.

And Ægeus cried, "What hast thou done?"

But Theseus pointed to the stone. "I have rid the land of an enchantment: now I will rid it of one more."

And he came close to Ægeus, and drew from his bosom the sword and the sandals, and said the words which his mother bade him.

And Ægeus stepped back a pace, and looked at the lad till his eyes grew dim; and then he cast himself on his neck and wept, and Theseus wept on his neck, till they had no strength left to weep more.

Then Ægeus turned to all the people, and cried, "Behold my son, children of Cecrops, a better man than his father was before him."

Who, then, were mad but the Pallantids, though they had been mad enough before? And one shouted, "Shall we make room for an upstart, a pretender, who comes from we know not where?" And another, "If he be one, we are more than one; and the stronger can hold his own." And one shouted one thing, and one another; for they were hot and wild with wine: but all caught swords and lances off the wall, where the weapons hung around, and sprang forward to Theseus, and Theseus sprang forward to them.

And he cried, "Go in peace, if you will, my cousins; but if not, your blood be on your own heads." But they rushed at him; and then stopped short and railed him, as curs stop and bark when they rouse a lion from his lair.

But one hurled a lance from the rear rank, which passed close by Theseus' head; and at that Theseus rushed forward, and the fight began indeed. Twenty against one they fought, and yet Theseus beat them all; and those who were left fled down into the town, where the people set on them, and drove them out, till Theseus was left alone in the palace, with Ægeus his new-found father. But before nightfall all the town came up, with victims, and dances, and songs; and they offered sacrifices to Athené, and rejoiced all the night long, because their king had found a noble son, and an heir to his royal house.

So Theseus stayed with his father all the winter; and when the spring equinox drew near, all the Athenians grew sad and silent, and Theseus saw it, and asked the reason; but no one would answer him a word.

Then he went to his father, and asked him: but Ægeus turned away his face and wept. “Do not ask, my son, beforehand, about evils which must happen: it is enough to have to face them when they come.”

And when the spring equinox came, a herald came to Athens, and stood in the market, and cried, “O people and King of Athens, where is your yearly tribute?” Then a great lamentation arose throughout the city. But Theseus stood up to the herald, and cried, “And who are you, dog-faced, who dare demand tribute here? If I did not reverence your herald’s staff, I would brain you with this club.”

And the herald answered proudly, for he was a grave and ancient man, “Fair youth, I am not dog-faced or shameless; but I do my master’s bidding, Minos, the King of hundred-cities Crete, the wisest of all kings on earth. And you must be surely a stranger here, or you would know why I come, and that I come by right.”

“I am a stranger here. Tell me, then, why you come?”

“To fetch the tribute which King Ægeus promised to Minos, and confirmed his promise with an oath. For Minos conquered all this land, and Megara which lies to the east, when he came hither with a great fleet of ships, enraged about the murder of his son. For his son Androgeos came hither to the Panathenaic games, and overcame all the Greeks in the sports, so that the people honored him as a hero. But when Ægeus saw his valor, he envied him, and feared lest he should join the sons of Pallas, and take away the scepter from him. So he plotted against his life, and slew him basely, no man knows how or where. Some say that he waylaid him by Oinoe, on the road which goes to Thebes; and some that he sent him against the bull of Marathon, that the beast might kill him. But Ægeus says that the young men killed him from envy, because he had conquered them in the games. So Minos came hither and avenged him, and would not depart till this land had promised him tribute—seven youths and seven maidens every year, who go with me in a black-sailed ship, till they come to hundred-cities Crete.”

And Theseus ground his teeth together, and said, “Wert thou not a herald I would kill thee, for saying such things of my father: but I will go to him, and know the truth.” So he went to his father, and asked him; but he turned away his head and wept, and said, “Blood was shed in the land unjustly, and by blood it is avenged. Break not my heart by questions; it is enough to endure in silence.”

Then Theseus groaned inwardly, and said, “I will go myself with these youths and maidens, and kill Minos upon his royal throne.”

And Ægeus shrieked, and cried, “You shall not go, my son, the light of my old age, to whom alone I look to rule this people after I am dead and gone.

You shall not go, to die horribly, as those youths and maidens die; for Minos thrusts them into a labyrinth, which Daidalos made for him among the rocks,

Daidalos the renegade, the accursed, the pest of this his native land. From that labyrinth no one can escape, entangled in its winding ways, before they meet the Minotaur, the monster who feeds upon the flesh of men. There he devours them horribly, and they never see this land again.”

Then Theseus grew red, and his ears tingled, and his heart beat loud in his bosom. And he stood awhile like a tall stone pillar, on the cliffs above some hero’s grave; and at last he spoke, “Therefore all the more I will go with them, and slay the accursed beast. Have I not slain all evil-doers and monsters, that I might free this land? Where are Periphetes, and Sinis, and Kerkuon, and Phaia the wild sow? Where are the fifty sons of Pallas? And this Minotaur shall go the road which they have gone, and Minos himself, if he dare stay me.”

“But how will you slay him, my son? For you must leave your club and your armor behind, and be cast to the monster, defenseless and naked like the rest.”

And Theseus said, “Are there no stones in that labyrinth; and have I not fists and teeth? Did I need my club to kill Kerkuon, the terror of all mortal men?”

Then Ægeus clung to his knees; but he would not hear; and at last he let him go, weeping bitterly, and said only this one word, “Promise me but this, if you return in peace, though that may hardly be: take down the black sail of the ship, (for I shall watch for it all day upon the cliffs,) and hoist instead a white sail, that I may know afar off that you are safe.”

And Theseus promised, and went out, and to the market-place where the herald stood, while they drew lots for the youths and maidens, who were to sail in that doleful crew. And the people stood wailing and weeping, as the lot fell on this one and on that: but Theseus strode into the midst, and cried, “Here is a youth who needs no lot. I myself will be one of the seven.”

And the herald asked in wonder, “Fair youth, know you whither you are going?”

And Theseus said, “I know. Let us go down to the black-sailed ship.”

So they went down to the black-sailed ship, seven maidens, and seven youths, and Theseus before them all, and the people following them lamenting. But Theseus whispered to his companions, “Have hope, for the monster is not immortal. Where are Periphetes, and Sinis, and Sciron, and all whom I have slain?” Then their hearts were comforted a little: but they wept as they went on board, and the cliffs of Sunium rang, and all the isles of the Ægean Sea, with the voice of their lamentation, as they sailed on toward their deaths in Crete.

ALCESTIS

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Menzies, Louisa. Lives of the Greek Heroines. London: George Bell and Sons, 1880, 14–31.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Greece

National Origin: Greece

---

This Greek myth provided the prototype for “Alcestis” (AT 899). The narrative also inspired a play by the Greek dramatist Euripides (480 B.C.E.–406 B.C.E.).

---

In ancient days, when the life of men upon earth was simple, and when war and the chase were the occupation of the young, and the words of the aged were hearkened to like the oracles of the gods, there reigned in Iolchos a haughty king—Pelias, the son of Kretheus and Tyro—whose court became famous among the neighbor princes for his four fair daughters, Peisidike, Pelopeia, Hippothoe, and Alcestis. Of all the four by far the loveliest was Alcestis, for she was not only beautiful in form and face like her sisters, but so sweet a soul dwelt in her that her natural beauty was made ten times greater by the light that streamed forth from within. The king, Pelias, loved all his daughters, but to Alcestis, the youngest, his heart clung with the tenderest affection, for she was the crown and comfort of his age, abundant in love and tender care for him; so that Pelias, unable to bear the thought of parting with her, declared that he would give her in marriage to no one who did not come to claim her in a chariot drawn by boars and lions.

Lovely as Alcestis was, this haughty mandate had the effect of keeping many a gallant chief away, for who was so wise or so strong as to tame the lion and make him run obedient to the rein as a yoke fellow to the tusked boar? But there was one who had gazed upon Alcestis until the thought of her was present to him night and day, and to want her seemed as bad as to want the light and air of heaven, Admetus, the son of Pheres, King of Pherae, who had stood by Meleager when he smote the Kalydonian boar, and had sailed with Jason into the Black Euxine in search of the golden fleece; but now he cared no longer for the chase or travel, all he wished for was to rest in his father’s house and rule his people, if only he could win Alcestis to be his wife. Day and night the thought of her troubled him, so that his sleep departed from him, and all the business and pleasure of his life seemed unprofitable and dull.

“O thou Far-darter,” he prayed, stretching out his hands to the sun-god [Apollo], when his first beams smote the earth, “thou who hast thyself sorrowed for thy lost Daphne, thou who sendest hope and joy to men, be thou my helper, and teach me how to obey the mandate of the haughty king, or thyself take away this life which is bitter to me!”

Thus he prayed in his chamber when there was none but Phoebus [an epithet of Apollo meaning “radiant one”] to hearken; thus he prayed at midday aloud in the temple, amid the savor of burnt sacrifices, and the son of Latina heard him as he sat in the groves of his beloved Cynthus—heard him and pitied him. And he taught him how to win the noble nature of the lion to accept the guidance of his hand, and gave him a subtle charm to tame the fierce anger of the boar, so that the two princes of the forest submitted to be yoked to the polished chariot, and bore the son of Pheres on his happy journey through the flowery Thessalian land, obedient to his word and hand as well trained horses.

King Pelias was much amazed to be informed that a suitor had come to seek the princess Alcestis, driving in his chariot a lion and a boar; but when he came forth and beheld the brave Admetus, a neighbor prince and an honored friend, he was well content, and, dearly as he loved Alcestis, he gave her with a good grace to the wooer, who had proved his courage and his skill, and, what was better yet in the eyes of a loving father, whom the gods who live forever honored with their counsel and help.

The nuptials were celebrated with joy and feasting, and Pelias bade adieu to his beloved child whom he was never to behold again; for before a year was over the happiness of Admetus and Alcestis was broken by the terrible news that Medeia, the dark-browed wife whom Jason had brought home from Kolchis, having by her magic restored youth to Aeson, the father of Jason, had been entreated by the daughters of Pelias to bestow the same boon upon their father; but the cruel woman, having made the credulous girls slay their father, with a view to raising him again in all his youthful vigor, forsook them, and, mocking their agony, left them to weep in vain over the mangled corpse.

This bitter sorrow was for many years the only trouble that darkened the life of Alcestis; in all else she was blessed beyond the common lot of women. Admetus loved her as a husband, and he trusted her as a friend. Two happy, healthy children were the crown of their wedded lives, and in house and field all went well with them.

Now there came to Pherae a stranger, noble in face and bearing, but clad like a poor countryman, who begged of Admetus to give him shelter and employment among his flocks and herds for a season, during which a stern fate compelled him to live an exile from his home. Admetus was too noble to ask him any question, he knew that some calamity was the cause—some homicide, perhaps for in those stormy days, when weapons were forever in the hands of men, it was no strange thing for the life of a hero to be darkened by the slaughter of a friend or kinsman in sudden anger or even by mischance, and he would fain have made much of the stranger, and kept him in his own palace and at his own table; but he chose rather to dwell in the fields among the quiet cattle, and to hide the sorrow that was darkening his life from the eyes of men. Then all things prospered more than ever at Pherae, and such a splendid race of horses grew up in the royal pastures that men began to wonder at the strange shepherd, and to whisper to each other that never man nor hero had such creative power as to make out of common horses creatures so divine that, but for the lack of wings, they might have matched with Pegasus himself, and that the strains of music that came from the fields where the shepherd dwelt were sweeter and purer than any music which mortal bard could make.

The strange shepherd was in good sooth no other than the mighty Phoebus himself, banished from Olympus for seven long years because he had slain the Cyclops who had forged the thunderbolt with which Jove had slain his dear son, Aesculapius; but although he went in and out among men in the guise of a servant, he had not ceased to commune with the heavenly beings. His brother, Hermes, especially—perhaps not without the will of Jove—came to him often as he sat among the sheep in the Thessalian valleys, and through him it came to the knowledge of Phoebus that a calamity overhung the house of Admetus, which even he could not turn aside. The Moirae [Fates] in their dark counsels had decreed the death of the King himself, the day, the very hour was appointed, and he must quit wife and house and lands for the sunless regions of the dead.

Then was Phoebus very sorrowful—as sorrowful as the immortals who know the present, the past, and the future can be—and he sought the Moirae in their sanctuary at Thebes, and there, with all his divine eloquence, he plied them that he might wrest from them deliverance for Admetus—at least, as long as he himself should sojourn upon earth. But the Moirae were stern; what had once passed their lips could not be recalled. Only this much did the power of the sun-god wring from them: that if another head from the house of Admetus—a head as royal as his—were yielded to Thanatos [Death] instead of his, the span of his life might be lengthened. With this favor Phoebus was fain at length to return, nor did the condition seem very hard to him, for in the house of Admetus still dwelt Pheres and Periklymene, father and mother of the king, old folk worn with age and weakness, who often seemed wearying for the Lethe stream, and who would surely vie with each other as to which should pass into the house of Hades for the sake of their son. But Phoebus, wise and all-seeing though he was, knew not yet how dull and timorous old age is, and the proposal, though made with all the god's wisdom, sounded harsh and cruel to the old folk. "I have yielded to my son the scepter of my fathers, ever imperishable," said Pheres, impatiently tapping the earth with his staff; "I have endowed him in my lifetime with cities and treasures is it not enough? Does he grudge me the few days I have to live?"

"I risked my life for him once," cried Periklymene, weeping; "nor did I grudge, as mothers often do who wear a queenly crown, to nourish him, a helpless infant, at my breast. Have I not loved him enough? How can he ask me, weak and ill as I am, to bear more pain for him? I must have a little peace before I die. Alas! Who knows what he shall meet in the dusky house of Hades?"

And the old people, in their displeasure, failed not to murmur to the queen Alcestis at the strange shepherd and at his unreasonable talk. They wist not that it was Phoebus, the mighty sun-god, who was dwelling with them in a lowly disguise. When Alcestis at length understood, amid their complaints, that great and sudden evil was said to threaten her husband, her heart was consumed with anxiety. She hastened to seek the shepherd, and she found him under a laurel shade, crooning softly to himself a hymn to one beloved and dead. It was, indeed, to the spirit of his dear son, the hero Aesculapius, but this the queen knew not; only as she drew near, the tender grief of the singer, and the sweet, soft strains of the lyre caused her to stop and, full of trouble as she was, to hearken and to shed tears for a grief that was not her own. And so she stood silent and awe-struck, what was divine in her soul causing her to recognize the divinity in the poorly clad shepherd, until Phoebus saw her, and, ceasing from his song, he rose up and stood humbly before her, as it becomes a shepherd to stand before an honored queen.

“O wondrous stranger!” said Alcestis; “for I dare not call thee shepherd, though now thou dwellest for a while in the pastures of Admetus—what are these strange tidings that have troubled the minds of Pheres and Periklymene? Is it indeed divine truth that the life of the noble Admetus is in danger, and that he, young and gracious as he is, is threatened with destruction? Speak, friend, for I know that the days of thy prince are precious in thine eyes, and that thou wilt tell no idle tale to fright us.”

“Alas! madam, it is true.”

“And is there no escape, no possibility of delay?”

“None, for neither father nor mother will die for him.”

“If Pheres or Periklymene would have entered the house of Hades in his stead, might Admetus have lived?”

“Ay, madam; so much did Phoebus, who cares for Admetus, obtain from the Moirae.”

“Blessed be he of the silver bow!” exclaimed the queen. “Never shall his shrine want for garlands, or his altar for burnt sacrifice! But if the Moirae would have taken the life of the aged Pheres or the feeble Periklymene for that of the blameless Admetus, the evil cannot be past cure. I will die for him, and it cannot be but that Thanatos will receive my life instead of that of the poor old folk who are ready to drop like ripe grain into his hands.”

At these words of the queen a divine beauty shone like a halo from the face of the disguised god, but he controlled himself.

“Hast thou well considered what it is that thou proposest to thyself?” he said. “Thou art still young and fair, a mother of dear children; how wilt thou endure to pass from the warmth of life and love into the sunless tracts of those below?”

“This house would be cold and sunless to me if Admetus were away; besides, it is the bounden duty of the wife to suffer all things for her husband.”

“But to leave thy dear children to the will of an unjust stepmother?”

A sadness passed across the brow of Alcestis at these words of the god tempting her; but it was like the shadow of a summer cloud thrown on a great corn-field, which passes swiftly, leaving the golden grain brighter than before.

“Admetus will care for the children,” she said, “and if he give them a step-mother, the gods will put it into her heart to be gentle to them for the sake of my act; but be that as it may, but for Admetus, the children would never have lain in my bosom. It would be hard, indeed, if they should be a hindrance to his safety.”

“Noble art thou among women!” exclaimed the approving god. “Do what is in thine heart, and be a blessed name among the nations, even to the islands of the furthest west.”

When Admetus learnt, as he did from Phoebus himself, how his wife had chosen to give her life for his, he would gladly have borne the fate appointed for him by the Moirae, and have died at the due time; but the will of the goddesses and the love of Alcestis overbore all opposition, and with tortured heart he awaited the fatal day.

At length it dawned, and Phoebus himself shrunk away into the glades of Pelion at the presence of the dusky Thanatos, who came duly to claim his prize. A mortal weakness seized the failing queen; her spirit, obedient to the summons, followed the irresistible king, and her sweet body lay silent and cold in the arms of her weeping women.

Hardly was the parting agony over, while the funeral rites were preparing, lo! there came to the palace gates a traveler in sore need of food and rest, and according to the pious custom of those ancient days the need of the wayfarer was attended to before all else. Had he come at another time, how welcome would this traveler have been; for it was no other than the mighty Herakles on his way to Thrace, whither he had been sent by his tyrant Eurystheus to fetch the fire-breathing horses of Diomedes. Even as it was, in such honor did Admetus hold the hero, that he bade his attendants suspend their lamentations, and conduct the preparations for the funeral in a part of the palace where no sounds of woe would reach the great hall where the feast for the guest would be spread, and himself, with feigned cheerfulness, went to greet his friend. The kindly hero, however, was at once struck by the fact that Admetus had his hair clipped short in the fashion of a mourner, and he asked the reason.

Admetus replied that there was a funeral that day, which he would be obliged to attend. “The gods forbid,” cried Herakles, anxiously, “that any evil may have befallen either of thy children?”

“My children,” returned Admetus, “both live and are well.”

“If thou mournest for thy father,” questioned Herakles again, “he must be now well on in years.”

“My father and my mother are both alive, Herakles.”

“It cannot be Alcestis, thy wife?” exclaimed the hero in dismay.

Then Admetus put great force upon himself; for he knew how Herakles honored the noble Alcestis, and that if he knew what the sorrow was that brooded over his house, he would, weary as he was, trudge onward, with spent strength and sorrowing heart, rather than give any trouble in the house, bereaved of its mistress. So he said that the dead was indeed a woman—a foreign woman—one who had dwelt long under his roof, and very dear to them all. Then Herakles would have gone onward to seek hospitality elsewhere, but this Admetus would not hear of. He conducted him into the great hall, and charging his steward and his principal attendants to supply him with all he could desire, himself withdrew for awhile to direct the funeral rites and give way to his natural sorrow.

Herakles had fasted long and traveled far, and sweet was the rest, and the bowl of warm water for his feet, and the tender hands of the careful old woman who chafed and dried them; but most sweet the steaming flesh of sheep and oxen, and the fine white bread, and the honey-sweet wine which crowned his bowl. Royally the lusty hero ate and drank, but there was one hindrance to his comfort, which pressed upon him more as his hunger and thirst began to be appeased.

Though Admetus had charged his people on no account to let Herakles see that they were in trouble, they were not able to control altogether their grief, and, indeed, were not a little concerned at what seemed to them want of proper respect to their dear mistress, whose gracious kindness had made their lives pleasant to them, and many a time and oft had turned aside their master's wrath. Now Herakles feared not man nor beast. He could slay a hydra or face a fire-breathing horse, but he could not endure a clouded countenance or a dull, unsympathetic manner, and considering the steward's grief out of bounds for an event so common as death—the death of a slave, however faithful and however honored—he bade him quaff a goblet of wine to rouse his dull spirits, and to crown his head with a chaplet of fresh leaves. "For," added he, cheerily, "wist thou not that we are all to die? Is it not common sense, then, to accept death with a good courage? If a man indulges in gloom and melancholy, life is not life, but a calamity."

"I know that right well," replied the steward, the tears standing in his eyes; "but it is not in the power of all the laughter and jollity in the world to drown the memory of the grief which now compasseth us about."

"A woman of a strange land is dead—so much the worse for her; but when your king and his house are well"

"Our king and his house!" exclaimed the steward, "Alas! Sir, you know not the grief under which we groan."

"Can it be that your lord has deceived me?" cried Herakles, in alarm.

"Admetus holds the rites of hospitality in such honor that he would sacrifice everything to them. It is, indeed, a woman of a strange country who dead, but no slave, alas!"

"Could it be," said Herakles, "that Admetus was really in bitter grief himself, yet hid it from me?"

"Yes, for he would not sadden thee. But seest thou not how our heads are shaven, and what black robes we wear? No common grief, no servile mourning this."

"Who, then, is dead?" impatiently exclaimed the hero.

“The wife of Admetus, guest-friend!” cried the steward; and he hid his face in his mantle, unable longer to control his tears.

“And yet ye received me and made me a feast?”

“Yes, for it was his will; he honors Zeus Zenius too much to thrust thee away.” “Poor prince! What a wife to lose!”

“Ay, sir, we are all undone; she was the light and comfort of the house.”

“I saw,” said Herakles, “that as he spoke to me his eyes were full of tears—I saw his mourning garments and his shaven head; but I believed what he told me of a foreign woman who was to be buried—a foreign woman indeed was the matchless Alcestis, but who so near and dear? A voice within me warned me that I should turn aside from the house, but I would not hearken to it. To think that I should have drunk and feasted in the house of a man so overwhelmed with sorrow! Tell me, man, tell me where he has buried her, that I too may mourn over her.”

Then the steward’s tongue was loosened and he told to Herakles the whole story of the fate that had threatened Admetus, and how the Moirae had been won to accept another life, as noble, instead of his, and how Alcestis, gaining knowledge of this, had given her own life for his, “as noble a life,” said the weeping steward, “as ever was lived upon this earth.” Herakles listened without a word to all the story, moved to the bottom of his great soul at the virtue of Alcestis, and stung with shame at his own dullness in not searching more deeply into the source of the sorrow in the house, and there entered into his heart a wonderful resolution, even to enter once more realms of Hades, whence he had already dragged three-headed Cerberus for Eurystheus to see, and wrest the newly flown spirit from the grasp of Thanatos. Such seemed to him the only fit compensation he could make to her or to Admetus for breaking upon them in their sorrow. So without more delay hastened to the tomb—now richly spread with honey cakes, and silent—and lay in wait until, as he expected Thanatos came to regale himself on the offerings; then he rushed out upon him, and grasping him in his arms would by no means let him go until he promised bring back the queen alive to the earth.

Admetus meanwhile was so overwhelmed with sorrow that he could not gather courage to return to his widowed home: the tender memories of his wedded life came back to him, and in his loneliness he envied her who was dead, thinking that he would gladly have leapt into the pit where her body was laid, and been covered up with her out of the sight of men.

While he still lingered outside the palace, he was surprised to behold the guest, whom he believed to be resting safely in his guest-chamber, approach him leading by the hand a veiled woman. Herakles at once and frankly reproached him for leaving him in ignorance of so momentous a truth as the death of his wife, since between friends all speech should be free and open; but he said that though he had just cause complaint against him, he would not add to his sorrow but would show him the trust he still placed in his friendship by giving into his charge a lady, the captive of his spear, whom he had much reason to honor dearly. "Do thou, Admetus," he said, "take her under thy roof, while I go to this fierce Thracian, whose horses I must needs have; and well I wot that he will not give them to me without a struggle, in which either he or I must fall. Should he be the conqueror—which the gods avert!—I make thee a present of this fair prize, won not without strain of nerve and sinew! Let her well in thine house for my sake."

"Noble Herakles," replied Admetus, "forgive me that I hid my grief from thee. How could I let thee, wayworn and weary as thou wert, toil onward in search of food and rest, and so lose to my poor house the honor of sheltering once more the first of heroes? But as to this lady, I beg thee seek entertainment for her elsewhere; there are many in Pherae who would gladly pay her all honor, to be accounted thy guest-friend. As for me, the sight of a lady about the house would move me to endless weeping, my trouble is new and heavy upon me. Your prize is young and fair—one can see that even under her veil—she would need some kindly woman to care for and to guide her. Alas! Even now she reminds me of her who is dead. For the sake of all the gods, noble Herakles, take her from my sight. When I look at her my heart leaps and the fountains of my tears are broken up; for even so did Alcestis stand, so did she move!"

"Would that Jove would give thee back thy wife, poor friend!" said Herakles.

"A vain wish, noble son of Alkmene, seeing that the dead return not to dwell in their earthly homes."

Then Herakles strove to cheer him, telling him that the time would come when the thought of second nuptials would not be painful to him; at mention of which the soul of Admetus flamed out in anger. Then Herakles again pressed him to take the strange lady into his house, and Admetus was at length persuaded to take her by the hand to conduct her into the palace, that she might abide there until he should return to reclaim her. "But," said the son of Alkmene, "before thou dost lead her in, draw aside her veil, and behold if this stranger resemble not thine own wife in feature and in complexion, as well as in height and gait, and if great and abundant joy be not prepared for thee instead of overwhelming grief."

Scarce comprehending the words of Herakles, Admetus with a trembling hand drew aside the veil that hid the countenance of the stranger, and beheld, O miracle! the true face of his beloved wife, pale indeed, but smiling on him with incomparable love. Who can tell the joy of that hour when the dear wife and mother was given back in a manner so unlooked for, and the house of mourning was turned into a house of joy?

For three days—such test the infernal gods required—Alcestis uttered no sound; but when the rites to Proserpina were duly paid and the lustral sacrifices offered, she was again the tender wife and mother, the gracious queen and mistress, full of thought and care for all, from the royal Admetus to the poor slave, who swept the chambers. Honor first to Him of the silver bow, the ever-present honor and protection of the house, honor and love to the much-enduring Herakles, and safe end to his hard labors!

Alcestis beheld her children, Eumelus and Perimele, grow up under her kindly care to be a noble man and woman; and when at length she passed away, full of years, her passage to the realms of Hades was swift and easy as the sleep of the wayfarer weary with long travel.

THE SEVEN-HEADED SERPENT

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Lang, Andrew. The Yellow Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1894, 60–63.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Greece

National Origin: Greece

---

“The Seven-Headed Serpent” modifies the basic structure of the familiar “Dragon-Slayer” (AT 300) tale type. As in “The Dragon Slayer,” the hero is assisted by a horse with whom he was born and kills the serpent by use of a magic sword. The motivation for the hero’s quest is provided by an episode based on “King of the Snakes” (AT 300B), and as in “The Three Stolen Princesses” (AT 301), the hero is engendered by his mother’s eating a piece of fruit (Motif F611.1.10). It is possible that the motif of the ship with black sails is inspired by the myth of Theseus (see “How Theseus Slew the Devourers of Men,” page 231). This tale is unusual in that the helpful agents are a convent of nuns and their abbess rather than the usual non-Christian supernatural figures of European folklore. The apple of conception and the serpent are tinged with Christian symbolism, also. Conspicuously absent from the tale is the common concluding episode of the hero’s marriage with a princess or female helper.

---

Once upon a time there was a king who determined to take a long voyage. He assembled his fleet and all the seamen, and set out. They went straight on night and day, until they came to an island which was covered with large trees, and under every tree lay a lion. As soon as the King had landed his men, the lions all rose up together and tried to devour them. After a long battle they managed to overcome the wild beasts, but the greater number of the men were killed. Those who remained alive now went on through the forest and found on the other side of it a beautiful garden, in which all the plants of the world flourished together.

There were also in the garden three springs: the first flowed with silver, the second with gold, and the third with pearls. The men unbuckled their knapsacks and filled them with those precious things. In the middle of the garden they found a large lake, and when they reached the edge of it the Lake began to speak, and said to them, "What men are you, and what brings you here? Are you come to visit our king?" But they were too much frightened to answer.

Then the Lake said, "You do well to be afraid, for it is at your peril that you are come hither. Our king, who has seven heads, is now asleep, but in a few minutes he will wake up and come to me to take his bath! Woe to anyone who meets him in the garden, for it is impossible to escape from him. This is what you must do if you wish to save your lives. Take off your clothes and spread them on the path which leads from here to the castle. The King will then glide over something soft, which he likes very much, and he will be so pleased with that that he will not devour you. He will give you some punishment, but then he will let you go."

The men did as the Lake advised them, and waited for a time. At noon the earth began to quake, and opened in many places, and out of the openings appeared lions, tigers, and other wild beasts, which surrounded the castle, and thousands and thousands of beasts came out of the castle following their king, the Seven-headed Serpent. The Serpent glided over the clothes which were spread for him, came to the Lake, and asked it who had strewed those soft things on the path? The Lake answered that it had been done by people who had come to do him homage. The King commanded that the men should be brought before him. They came humbly on their knees, and in a few words told him their story. Then he spoke to them with a mighty and terrible voice, and said, "Because you have dared to come here, I lay upon you the punishment. Every year you must bring me from among your people twelve youths and twelve maidens, that I may devour them. If you do not do this, I will destroy your whole nation."

Then he desired one of his beasts to show the men the way out of the garden, and dismissed them. They then left the island and went back to their own country, where they related what had happened to them. Soon the time came round when the king of the beasts would expect the youths and maidens to be brought to him. The King therefore issued a proclamation inviting twelve youths and twelve maidens to offer themselves up to save their country; and immediately many young people, far more than enough, hastened to do so. A new ship was built, and set with black sails, and in it the youths and maidens who were appointed for the king of the beasts embarked and set out for his country. When they arrived there they went at once to the Lake, and this time the lions did not stir, nor did the springs flow, and neither did the Lake speak. So they waited then, and it was not long before the earth quaked even more terribly than the first time. The Seven-headed Serpent came without his train of beasts, saw his prey waiting for him, and devoured it at one mouthful. Then the ship's crew returned home, and the same thing happened yearly until many years had passed.

Now the King of this unhappy country was growing old, and so was the Queen, and they had no children. One day the Queen was sitting at the window weeping bitterly because she was childless, and knew that the crown would therefore pass to strangers after the King's death. Suddenly a little old woman appeared before her, holding an apple in her hand, and said, "Why do you weep, my Queen, and what makes you so unhappy?"

"Alas, good mother," answered the Queen, "I am unhappy because I have no children."

"Is that what vexes you?" said the old woman. "Listen to me. I am a nun from the Spinning Convent, and my mother when she died left me this apple. Whoever eats this apple shall have a child."

The Queen gave money to the old woman, and bought the apple from her. Then she peeled it, ate it, and threw the rind out of the window, and it so happened that a mare that was running loose in the court below ate up the rind. After a time the Queen had a little boy, and the mare also had a male foal. The boy and the foal grew up together and loved each other like brothers. In course of time the King died, and so did the Queen, and their son, who was now nineteen years old, was left alone. One day, when he and his horse were talking together, the Horse said to him, "Listen to me, for I love you and wish for your good and that of the country. If you go on every year sending twelve youths and twelve maidens to the King of the Beasts, your country will very soon be ruined. Mount upon my back: I will take you to a woman who can direct you how to kill the Seven-headed Serpent."

Then the youth mounted his horse, who carried him far away to a mountain which was hollow, for in its side was a great underground cavern. In the cavern sat an old woman spinning. This was the cloister of the nuns, and the old woman was the Abbess. They all spent their time in spinning, and that is why the convent has this name. All round the walls of the cavern there were beds cut out of the solid rock, upon which the nuns slept, and in the middle a light was burning. It was the duty of the nuns to watch the light in turns, that it might never go out, and if anyone of them let it go out the others put her to death.

As soon as the King's son saw the old Abbess spinning he threw himself at her feet and entreated her to tell him how he could kill the Seven-headed Serpent.

She made the youth rise, embraced him, and said, "Know, my son, that it is I who sent the nun to your mother and caused you to be born, and with you the horse, with whose help you will be able to free the world from the monster. I will tell you what you have to do. Load your horse with cotton, and go by a secret passage which I will show you, which is hidden from the wild beasts, to the Serpent's palace. You will find the King asleep upon his bed, which is all hung round with bells, and over his bed you will see a sword hanging. With this sword only it is possible to kill the Serpent, because even if its blade breaks a new one will grow again for every head the monster has. Thus you will be able to cut off all his seven heads. And this you must also do in order to deceive the King: you must slip into his bed-chamber very softly, and stop up all the bells which are round his bed with cotton. Then take down the sword gently, and quickly give the monster a blow on his tail with it. This will make him waken up, and if he catches sight of you he will seize you. But you must quickly cut off his first head, and then wait till the next one comes up. Then strike it off also, and so go on till you have cut off all his seven heads.”

The old Abbess then gave the Prince her blessing, and he set out upon his enterprise, arrived at the Serpent’s castle by following the secret passage which she had shown him, and by carefully attending to all her directions he happily succeeded in killing the monster. As soon as the wild beasts heard of their king’s death, they all hastened to the castle, but the youth had long since mounted his horse and was already far out of their reach. They pursued him as fast as they could, but they found it impossible to overtake him, and he reached home in safety. Thus he freed his country from this terrible oppression.

THE GOLDEN CRAB

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Lang, Andrew. The Yellow Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1894, 26–31.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Schmidt, Bernard. “Prinz Krebs.” In Griechische Märchen.

National Origin: Greece

---

Unlike the previous Greek ordinary folktale, “The Seven-Headed Serpent” (page 253), “The Golden Crab” does not adopt Christianity as a vehicle for the miraculous deeds that transpire. Instead the core of this tale is a more straightforward variant of the tale type “The Search for the Lost Husband” (AT 425).

---

Once upon a time there was a fisherman who had a wife and three children. Every morning he used to go out fishing, and whatever fish he caught he sold to the King. One day, among the other fishes, he caught a golden crab. When he came home he put all the fishes together into a great dish, but he kept the Crab separate because it shone so beautifully, and placed it upon a high shelf in the cupboard. Now while the old woman, his wife, was cleaning the fish, and had tucked up her gown so that her feet were visible, she suddenly heard a voice, which said, “Let down, let down thy petticoat, That lets thy feet be seen.”

She turned round in surprise, and then she saw the little creature, the Golden Crab. "What! You can speak, can you, you ridiculous crab?" she said, for she was not quite pleased at the Crab's remarks. Then she took him up and placed him on a dish.

When her husband came home and they sat down to dinner, they presently heard the Crab's little voice saying, "Give me some too." They were all very much surprised, but they gave him something to eat. When the old man came to take away the plate which had contained the Crab's dinner, he found it full of gold, and as the same thing happened every day he soon became very fond of the Crab.

One day the Crab said to the fisherman's wife, "Go to the King and tell him I wish to marry his younger daughter."

The old woman went accordingly, and laid the matter before the King, who laughed a little at the notion of his daughter marrying a crab, but did not decline the proposal altogether, because he was a prudent monarch, and knew that the Crab was likely to be a prince in disguise. He said, therefore, to the fisherman's wife, "Go, old woman, and tell the Crab I will give him my daughter if by tomorrow morning he can build a wall in front of my castle much higher than my tower, upon which all the flowers of the world must grow and bloom."

The fisherman's wife went home and gave this message.

Then the Crab gave her a golden rod, and said, "Go and strike with this rod three times upon the ground on the place which the King showed you, and tomorrow morning the wall will be there."

The old woman did so and went away again.

The next morning, when the King awoke, what do you think he saw? The wall stood there before his eyes, exactly as he had bespoken it!

Then the old woman went back to the King and said to him, "Your Majesty's orders have been fulfilled."

"That is all very well," said the King, "but I cannot give away my daughter until there stands in front of my palace a garden in which there are three fountains, of which the first must play gold, the second diamonds, and the third brilliants."

So the old woman had to strike again three times upon the ground with the rod, and the next morning the garden was there. The King now gave his consent, and the wedding was fixed for the very next day.

Then the Crab said to the old fisherman, "Now take this rod; go and knock with it on a certain mountain; then a black man (a Moor) will come out and ask you what you wish for. Answer him thus, 'Your master, the King, has sent me to tell you that you must send him his golden garment that is like the sun.' Make him give you, besides, the queenly robes of gold and precious stones which are like the flowery meadows, and bring them both to me. And bring me also the golden cushion."

The old man went and did his errand. When he had brought the precious robes, the Crab put on the golden garment and then crept upon the golden cushion, and in this way the fisherman carried him to the castle, where the Crab presented the other garment to his bride. Now the ceremony took place, and when the married pair were alone together the Crab made himself known to his young wife, and told her how he was the son of the greatest king in the world, and how he was enchanted, so that he became a crab by day and was a man only at night; and he could also change himself into an eagle as often as he wished. No sooner had he said this than he shook himself, and immediately became a handsome youth, but the next morning he was forced to creep back again into his crab-shell. And the same thing happened every day. But the Princess's affection for the Crab, and the polite attention with which she behaved to him, surprised the royal family very much. They suspected some secret, but though they spied and spied, they could not discover it. Thus a year passed away, and the Princess had a son, whom she called Benjamin. But her mother still thought the whole matter very strange. At last she said to the King that he ought to ask his daughter whether she would not like to have another husband instead of the Crab? But when the daughter was questioned she only answered, "I am married to the Crab, and him only will I have."

Then the King said to her, "I will appoint a tournament in your honor, and I will invite all the princes in the world to it, and if any one of them pleases you, you shall marry him."

In the evening the Princess told this to the Crab, who said to her, "Take this rod, go to the garden gate and knock with it, then a black man will come out and say to you, 'Why have you called me, and what do you require of me?' Answer him thus, 'Your master the King has sent me hither to tell you to send him his golden armor and his steed and the silver apple.' And bring them to me."

The Princess did so, and brought him what he desired.

The following evening the Prince dressed himself for the tournament. Before he went he said to his wife, "Now mind you do not say when you see me that I am the Crab. For if you do this evil will come of it. Place yourself at the window with your sisters; I will ride by and throw you the silver apple. Take it in your hand, but if they ask you who I am, say that you do not know." So saying, he kissed her, repeated his warning once more, and went away.

The Princess went with her sisters to the window and looked on at the tournament. Presently her husband rode by and threw the apple up to her. She caught it in her hand and went with it to her room, and by-and-by her husband came back to her. But her father was much surprised that she did not seem to care about any of the Princes; he therefore appointed a second tournament.

The Crab then gave his wife the same directions as before, only this time the apple which she received from the black man was of gold. But before the Prince went to the tournament he said to his wife, "Now I know you will betray me today."

But she swore to him that she would not tell who he was. He then repeated his warning and went away.

In the evening, while the Princess, with her mother and sisters, was standing at the window, the Prince suddenly galloped past on his steed and threw her the golden apple.

Then her mother flew into a passion, gave her a box on the ear, and cried out, "Does not even that prince please you, you fool?"

The Princess in her fright exclaimed, "That is the Crab himself!"

Her mother was still more angry because she had not been told sooner, ran into her daughter's room where the crab-shell was still lying, took it up and threw it into the fire. Then the poor Princess cried bitterly, but it was of no use; her husband did not come back.

Now we must leave the Princess and turn to the other persons in the story. One day an old man went to a stream to dip in a crust of bread which he was going to eat, when a dog came out of the water, snatched the bread from his hand, and ran away. The old man ran after him, but the dog reached a door, pushed it open, and ran in, the old man following him. He did not overtake the dog, but found himself above a staircase, which he descended. Then he saw before him a stately palace, and, entering, he found in a large hall a table set for twelve persons. He hid himself in the hall behind a great picture, that he might see what would happen. At noon he heard a great noise, so that he trembled with fear. When he took courage to look out from behind the picture, he saw twelve eagles flying in. At this sight his fear became still greater. The eagles flew to the basin of a fountain that was there and bathed themselves, when suddenly they were changed into twelve handsome youths. Now they seated themselves at the table, and one of them took up a goblet filled with wine, and said, "A health to my father!" And another said, "A health to my mother!" and so the healths went round.

Then one of them said, "A health to my dearest lady, Long may she live and well! But a curse on the cruel mother, That burnt my golden shell!"

And so saying he wept bitterly. Then the youths rose from the table, went back to the great stone fountain, turned themselves into eagles again, and flew away.

Then the old man went away too, returned to the light of day, and went home. Soon after he heard that the Princess was ill, and that the only thing that did her good was having stories told to her. He therefore went to the royal castle, obtained an audience of the Princess, and told her about the strange things he had seen in the underground palace. No sooner had he finished than the Princess asked him whether he could find the way to that palace.

"Yes," he answered, "certainly."

And now she desired him to guide her thither at once. The old man did so, and when they came to the palace he hid her behind the great picture and advised her to keep quite still, and he placed himself behind the picture also. Presently the eagles came flying in, and changed themselves into young men, and in a moment the Princess recognized her husband amongst them all, and tried to come out of her hiding-place; but the old man held her back. The youths seated themselves at the table; and now the Prince said again, while he took up the cup of wine, "A health to my dearest lady, Long may she live and well! But a curse on the cruel mother That burnt my golden shell!"

Then the Princess could restrain herself no longer, but ran forward and threw her arms round her husband. And immediately he knew her again, and said, "Do you remember how I told you that day that you would betray me? Now you see that I spoke the truth. But all that bad time is past. Now listen to me: I must still remain enchanted for three months. Will you stay here with me till that time is over?"

So the Princess stayed with him, and said to the old man, "Go back to the castle and tell my parents that I am staying here."

Her parents were very much vexed when the old man came back and told them this, but as soon as the three months of the Prince's enchantment were over, he ceased to be an eagle and became once more a man, and they returned home together. And then they lived happily, and we who hear the story are happier still

ITALY

---

THE CRYSTAL CASKET

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Crane, Thomas Frederick. Italian Popular Tales. New York: Houghton, Mifflin and Co., 1885, 326–331.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Italy

National Origin: Italy

---

Italy includes not only the southern European Italian peninsula, but also the two large islands of Sardinia and Sicily located in the Mediterranean Sea between continental Africa and the European mainland. As a consequence, Italy exhibits considerable cultural diversity throughout its history. The following folktales, however, are drawn from variants of European tales collected from the Renaissance (late thirteenth century) to the nineteenth century. In the following variant of “Snow White” (AT 709), the heroine, Ermellina, is portrayed as bringing on many of her own difficulties. In addition, her animal benefactor, after rescuing her and transporting her to the castle of fairies, sets in motion the stepmother’s schemes for revenge. The tale differs profoundly from those versions of the tale popularized in contemporary media.

---

There was once a widower who had a daughter. This daughter was between ten and twelve years old. Her father sent her to school, and as she was all alone in the world commended her always to her teacher. Now, the teacher, seeing that the child had no mother, fell in love with the father, and kept saying to the girl, “Ask your father if he would like me for a wife.”

This she said to her every day, and at last the girl said, "Papa, the school-mistress is always asking me if you will marry her."

The father said, "Eh! My daughter, if I take another wife, you will have great troubles." But the girl persisted, and finally the father was persuaded to go one evening to the school-mistress' house. When she saw him she was well pleased, and they settled the marriage in a few days. Poor child! How bitterly she had to repent having found a stepmother so ungrateful and cruel to her! She sent her every day out on a terrace to water a pot of basil, and it was so dangerous that if she fell she would go into a large river.

One day there came by a large eagle, and said to her, "What are you doing her?" She was weeping because she saw how great the danger was of falling into the stream. The eagle said to her, "Get on my back, and I will carry you away, and you will be happier than with your new mamma."

After a long journey they reached a great plain, where they found a beautiful palace all of crystal; the eagle knocked at the door and said, "Open, my ladies, open! For I have brought you a pretty girl." When the people in the palace opened the door, and saw that lovely girl, they were amazed, and kissed and caressed her. Meanwhile the door was closed, and they remained peaceful and contended.

Let us return to the eagle, who thought she was doing a spite to the stepmother. One day the eagle flew away to the terrace where the stepmother was watering the basil. "Where is your daughter?" asked the eagle.

"Eh!" she replied, "perhaps she fell from this terrace and went into the river; I have not heard from her in ten days."

The eagle answered, "What a fool you are! I carried her away; seeing that you treated her so harshly I carried her away to my fairies, and she is very well." Then the eagle flew away.

The stepmother, filled with rage and jealousy, called a witch from the city, and said to her, "You see my daughter is alive, and is in the house of some fairies of an eagle which often comes upon my terrace; now you must do me the favor to find some way to kill this stepdaughter of mine, for I am afraid that some day or other she will return, and my husband, discovering this matter, will certainly kill me."

The witch answered, "Oh, you need not be afraid of that; leave it to me."

What did the witch do? She had made a little basketful of sweetmeats, in which she put a charm; then she wrote a letter, pretending that it was her father, who, having learned where she was, wished to make her this present, and the letter pretended that her father was so glad to hear that she was with the fairies.

Let us leave the witch who is arranging all this deception, and return to Ermellina (for so the young girl was named). The fairies had said to her, "See, Ermellina, we are going away, and shall be absent four days; now in this time take good care not to open the door to anyone, for some treachery is being prepared for you by your stepmother."

She promised to open the door to no one, “Do not be anxious, I am well off, and my stepmother has nothing to do with me.”

But it was not so. The fairies went away, and the next day when Ermellina was alone, she heard a knocking at the door, and said to herself, “Knock away! I don’t open to anyone.”

But meanwhile the blows redoubled, and curiosity forced her to look out of the window. What did she see? She saw one of the servant girls of her own home (for the witch had disguised herself as one of her father’s servants). “O my dear Ermellina,” she said, “your father is shedding tears of sorrow for you, because he really believed you were dead, but the eagle which carried you off came and told him the good news that you were here with the fairies. Meanwhile your father, not knowing what civility to show you, for he understands very well that you are in need of nothing, has thought to send you this little basket of sweetmeats.”

Ermellina had not yet opened the door; the servant begged her to come down and take the basket and the letter, but she said, “No, I wish nothing!” but finally, since women, and especially young girls, are fond of sweetmeats, she descended and opened the door.

When the witch had given her the basket, she said, “Eat this,” and broke off for her a piece of the sweetmeats which she had poisoned. When Ermellina took the first mouthful the old woman disappeared. Ermellina had scarcely time to close the door, when she fell down on the stairs.

When the fairies returned they knocked at the door, but no one opened it for them; then they perceived that there had been some treachery, and began to weep. Then the chief of the fairies said, “We must break open the door,” and so they did, and saw Ermellina dead on the stairs.

Her other friends who loved her so dearly begged the chief of the fairies to bring her to life, but she would not, “for,” she said, “she has disobeyed me.” But one and the other asked her until she consented; she opened Ermellina’s mouth, took out a piece of the sweetmeat which she had not yet swallowed, raised her up, and Ermellina came to life again.

We can imagine what a pleasure it was for her fiends; but the chief of the fairies reproved her for her disobedience, and she promised not to do so again.

Once more the fairies were obliged to depart. Their chief said, “Remember, Ermellina: The first time I cured you, but the second I will have nothing to do with you.”

Ermellina said they need not worry, that she would not open to anyone. But it was not so; for the eagle, thinking to increase her stepmother’s anger, told her again that Ermellina was alive. The stepmother denied it all to the eagle, but she summoned anew the witch, and told her that her stepdaughter was still alive, saying, “Either you will really kill her, or I will be avenged on you.”

The old woman, finding herself caught, told her to buy a very handsome dress, one of the handsomest she could find, and transformed herself into a tailoress belonging to the family, took the dress, departed, went to poor Ermellina, knocked at the door and said, "Open, open, for I am your tailoress."

Ermellina looked out of the window and saw her tailoress; and was, in truth, a little confused (indeed, anyone would have been so).

The tailoress said, "Come down, I must fit a dress on you."

She replied, "No, no; for I have been deceived once."

"But I am not the old woman," replied the tailoress, "you know me, for I have always made your dresses."

Poor Ermellina was persuaded, and descended the stairs; the tailoress took to flight while Ermellina was yet buttoning up the dress, and disappeared. Ermellina closed the door, and was mounting the stairs; but it was not permitted her to go up, for she fell down dead.

Let us return to the fairies, who came home and knocked at the door; but what good did it do to knock! There was no longer anyone there. They began to weep. The chief of the fairies said, "I told you that she would betray me again; but now I will have nothing more to do with her."

So they broke open the door, and saw the poor girl with the beautiful dress on; but she was dead. They all wept, because they really loved her. But there was nothing to do; the chief struck her enchanted wand, and commanded a beautiful rich casket all covered with diamonds and other precious stones to appear; then the others made a beautiful garland of flowers and gold, put it on the young girl, and then laid her in the casket, which was so rich and beautiful that it was marvelous to behold. Then the old fairy struck her wand as usual and commanded a handsome horse, the like of which not even the king possessed. Then they took the casket, put it on the horse's back, and led him into the public square of the city, and the chief of the fairies said, "Go, and do not stop until you find someone who says to you, 'Stop, for pity's sake, for I have lost my horse for you.'"

Now let us leave the afflicted fairies, and turn our attention to the horse, which ran away at full speed. Who happened to pass at that moment? The son of a king (the name of this king is not known); and saw this horse with that wonder on its back. Then the king began to spur his horse, and rode him so hard that he killed him, and had to leave him dead in the road; but the king kept running after the other horse. The poor king could endure it no longer; he saw himself lost, and exclaimed, "Stop, for pity's sake, for I have lost my horse for you!"

Then the horse stopped (for those were the words). When the king saw that beautiful girl dead in the casket, he thought no more about his own horse, but took the other to the city. The king's mother knew that her son had gone hunting; when she saw him returning with this loaded horse, she did not know what to think. The son had no father, wherefore he was all powerful. He reached the palace, had the horse unloaded, and the casket carried to his chamber; then he called his mother and said, "Mother, I went hunting, but I have found a wife."

"But what is it? A doll? A dead woman?"

“Mother,” replied her son, “don’t trouble yourself about what it is, it is my wife.”

His mother began to laugh, and withdrew to her own room (what could she do, poor mother?).

Now this poor king no longer went hunting, took no diversion, did not even go to the table, but ate in his own room. By a fatality it happened that war was declared against him, and he was obliged to depart. He called his mother, and said, “Mother, I wish two careful chambermaids, whose business it shall be to guard this casket; for if on my return I find that anything has happened to my casket, I shall have the chambermaids killed.”

His mother, who loved him, said, “Go, my son, fear nothing, for I myself will watch over your casket.”

He wept several days at being obliged to abandon this treasure of his, but there was no help for it, he had to go. After his departure he did nothing but commend his wife (so he called her) to his mother in his letters.

Let us return to the mother, who no longer thought about the matter, not even to have the casket dusted; but all at once there came a letter which informed her that the king had been victorious, and should return to his palace in a few days. The mother called the chambermaids, and said to them, “Girls, we are ruined.”

They replied, “Why, Highness?”

“Because my son will be back in a few days, and how have we taken care of the doll?”

They answered, “True, true; now let us go and wash the doll’s face.”

They went to the king’s room and saw that the doll’s face and hands were covered with dust and fly specks, so they took a sponge and washed her face, but some drops of water fell on her dress and spotted it. The poor chambermaids began to weep, and went to the queen for advice.

The queen said, “Do you know what to do! Call a tailoress, and have a dress precisely like this bought, and take off this one before my son comes.”

They did so, and the chambermaids went to the room and began to unbutton the dress. The moment that they took off the first sleeve, Ermellina opened her eyes. The poor chambermaids sprang up in terror, but one of the most courageous said, “I am a woman, and so is this one; she will not eat me.”

To cut the matter short, she took off the dress, and when it was removed Ermellina began to get out of the casket to walk about and see where she was. The chambermaids fell on their knees before her and begged her to tell them who she was. She, poor girl, told them the whole story. Then she said, “I wish to know where I am.”

Then the chambermaids called the king’s mother to explain it to her. The mother did not fail to tell her everything, and she, poor girl, did nothing but weep penitently, thinking of what the fairies had done for her.

The king was on the point of arriving, and his mother said to the doll, “Come here; put on one of my best dresses.” In short, she arrayed her like a queen. Then came her son. They shut the doll up in a small room, so that she could not be seen. The king came with great joy, with trumpets blowing, and banners flying for the victory. But he took no interest in all this, and ran at once to his room to see the doll; the chambermaids fell on their knees before him saying that the doll smelled so badly that they could not stay in the palace, and were obliged to bury her.

The king would not listen to this excuse, but at once called two of the palace servants to erect the gallows. His mother comforted him in vain, "My son, it was a dead woman."

"No, no, I will not listen to any reasons; dead or alive, you should have left it for me."

Finally, when his mother saw that he was in earnest about the gallows, she rang a little bell, and there came forth no longer the doll, but a very beautiful girl, whose like was never seen.

The king was amazed, and said, "What is this!"

Then his mother, the chambermaids, and Ermellina were obliged to tell him all that had happened.

He said, "Mother, since I adored her when dead, and called her my wife, now I mean her to be my wife in truth."

"Yes, my son," replied his mother, "do so, for I am willing."

They arranged the wedding, and in a few days were man and wife.

THE CRUMB IN THE BEARD

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Crane, Thomas Frederick. Italian Popular Tales. New York: Houghton, Mifflin and Co., 1885, 110–114.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Italy

National Origin: Italy

---

A variant of the tale included in Jacob and Wilhelm Grimm's folktale corpus as "King Thrushbeard" (AT 900, Grimm 52), "A Crumb in the Beard" focuses on the elaborate scheme devised by a handsome suitor to avenge a slight by an overly critical princess. In the process, she is both educated and wed.

---

There was once a king who had a daughter whose name was Stella. She was indescribably beautiful, but was so whimsical and hard to please that she drove her father to despair.

There had been princes and kings who had sought her in marriage, but she had found defects in them all and would have none of them. She kept advancing in years, and her father began to despair of knowing to whom he should leave his crown. So he summoned his council, and discussed the matter, and was advised to give a great banquet, to which he should invite all the princes and kings of the surrounding countries, for, as they said, there cannot fail to be among so many, someone who should please the princess, who was to hide behind a door, so that she could examine them all as she pleased.

When the king heard this advice, he gave the order necessary for the banquet, and then called his daughter, and said, "Listen, my little Stella, I have thought to do so and so, to see if I can find anyone to please you. Behold, my daughter, my hair is white, and I must have someone to leave my crown to."

Stella bowed her head, saying that she would take care to please him.

Princes and kings then began to arrive at the court, and when it was time for the banquet, they all seated themselves at the table. You can imagine what sort of a banquet that was, and how the hall was adorned: Gold and silver shone from all their necks. In the four corners of the room were four fountains, which continually sent forth wine and the most exquisite perfumes.

While the gentlemen were eating, Stella was behind a door, as has been said, and one of her maids, who was nearby, pointed out to her now this one, now that one. "See, your majesty, what a handsome youth that is there."

"Yes, but he has too large a nose."

"And the one near your father?"

"He has eyes that look like saucers."

"And that other at the head of the table?"

"He has too large a mouth. He looks as if he liked to eat."

In short, she found fault with all but one, who, she said, pleased her, but that he must be a very dirty fellow, for he had a crumb on his beard after eating. The youth heard her say this, and swore vengeance. You must know that he was the son of the King of the Green Hill, and the handsomest youth that could be seen.

When the banquet was finished and the guests had departed, the king called Stella and asked, "What news have you, my child?"

She replied, that the only one who pleased her was the one with the crumb in his beard, but that she believed him to be a dirty fellow and did not want him.

"Take care, my daughter, you will repent it," answered her father, and turned away.

You must know that Stella's chamber looked into a courtyard into which opened the shop of a baker. One night, while she was preparing to retire, she heard, in the room where they sifted the meal, someone singing so well and with so much grace that it went to her heart. She ran to the window and listened until he finished. Then she began to ask her maid who the person with the beautiful voice could be, saying she would like to know.

“Leave it to me, your majesty,” said the maid. “I will inform you tomorrow.”

Stella could not wait for the next day; and, indeed, early the next day she learned that the one who sang was the sifter. That evening she heard him sing again, and stood by the window until everything became quiet. But that voice had so touched her heart that she told her maid that the next day she would try and see who had that fine voice. In the morning she placed herself by the window, and soon saw the youth come forth. She was enchanted by his beauty as soon as she saw him, and fell desperately in love with him.

Now you must know that this was none other than the prince who was at the banquet, and whom Stella had called “dirty.” So he had disguised himself in such a way that she could not recognize him, and was meanwhile preparing his revenge. After he had seen her once or twice he began to take off his hat and salute her. She smiled at him, and appeared at the window every moment. Then they began to exchange words, and in the evening he sang under her window. In short, they began to make love in good earnest, and when he learned that she was free, he began to talk about marrying her. She consented at once, but asked him what he had to live on.

“I haven’t a penny,” said he. “The little I earn is hardly enough to feed me.”

Stella encouraged him, saying she would give him all the money and things he wanted.

To punish Stella for her pride, her father and the prince’s father had an understanding, and pretended not to know about this love affair, and let her carry away from the palace all she owned. During the day Stella did nothing but make a great bundle of clothes, of silver, and of money, and at night the disguised prince came under the balcony, and she threw it down to him. Things went on in this manner some time, and finally one evening he said to her, “Listen. The time has come to elope.”

Stella could not wait for the hour, and the next night she quietly tied a cord about her and let herself down from the window. The prince aided her to the ground, and then took her arm and hastened away. He led her a long way to another city, where he turned down a street and opened the first door he met. They went down a long passage. Finally they reached a little door, which he opened, and they found themselves in a hole of a place which had only one window, high up. The furniture consisted of a straw bed, a bench, and a dirty table. You can imagine that when Stella saw herself in this place she thought she should die.

When the prince saw her so amazed, he said, “What is the matter? Does the house not please you? Do you not know that I am a poor man? Have you been deceived?”

“What have you done with all the things I gave you?”

“Oh, I had many debts, and I have paid them, and then I have done with the rest what seemed good to me. You must make up your mind to work and gain your bread as I have done. You must know that I am a porter of the king of this city, and I often go and work at the palace. Tomorrow, they have told me, the washing is to be done, so you must rise early and go with me there. I will set you to work with the other women, and when it is time for them to go home to dinner, you will say that you are not hungry, and while you are alone, steal two shirts, conceal them under your skirt, and carry them home to me.”

Poor Stella wept bitterly, saying it was impossible for her to do that.

But her husband replied, “Do what I say, or I shall beat you.”

The next morning her husband rose with the dawn, and made her get up, too. He had bought her a striped skirt and a pair of coarse shoes, which he made her put on, and then took her to the palace with him, conducted her to the laundry and left her, after he had introduced her as his wife, saying that she should remember what awaited her at home.

Meanwhile poor Stella did as her husband had commanded, and stole the shirts.

As she was leaving the palace, she met the king, who said, “Pretty girl, you are the porter’s wife, are you not?” Then he asked her what she had under her skirt, and shook her until the shirts dropped out, and the king cried, “See there! The porter’s wife is a thief. She has stolen some shirts.”

Poor Stella ran home in tears, and her husband followed her when he had put on his disguise again. When he reached home Stella told him all that had happened and begged him not to send her to the palace again. But he told her that the next day they were to bake, and she must go into the kitchen and help, and steal a piece of dough. Everything happened as on the previous day. Stella’s theft was discovered, and when her husband returned he found her crying like a condemned soul, and swearing that she had rather be killed than go the palace again. He told her, however, that the king’s son was to be married the next day, and that there was to be a great banquet, and she must go into the kitchen and wash the dishes. He added that when she had the chance she must steal a pot of broth and hide it about her so that no one should see it.

She had to do as she was told, and had scarcely concealed the pot when the king’s son came into the kitchen and told his wife she must come to the ball that had followed the banquet. She did not wish to go, but he took her by the arm and led her into the midst of the festival. Imagine how the poor woman felt at the ball, dressed as she was, and with the pot of broth! The king began to poke his sword at her in jest, until he hit the pot, and all the broth ran on the floor. Then all began to jeer her and laugh, until poor Stella fainted away from shame, and they had to go and get some vinegar to revive her.

At last the king’s mother came forward and said, “Enough. You have revenged yourself sufficiently.” Then turning to Stella, “Know that this is your mother, and that he has done this to correct your pride and to be avenged on you for calling him dirty.”

Then she took her by the arm and led her to another room, where her maids dressed her as a queen. Her father and mother then appeared and kissed and embraced her. Her husband begged her pardon for what he had done, and they made peace and always lived in harmony. From that day on she was never haughty, and had learned to her cost that pride is the greatest fault.

CINDERELLA

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Crane, Thomas Frederick. Italian Popular Tales. New York: Houghton, Mifflin and Co., 1885, 42–47.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Italy

National Origin: Italy

---

This variant of the “Cinderella” tale (AT 510A) lacks the typical feature of the persecuting stepmother and stepsisters. Supernatural assistance is provided by a pet bird in a more benign version of the classic narrative.

---

Once upon a time there was a man who had three daughters. He was once ordered to go away to work, and said to them, “Since I am about making a journey, what do you want me to bring you when I return?”

One asked for a handsome dress; the other, a fine hat and a beautiful shawl. He said to the youngest, “And you, Cinderella, what do you want?” They called her Cinderella because she always sat in the chimney corner.

“You must buy me a little bird Verdeliò.”

“The simpleton! She does not know what to do with the bird! Instead of ordering a handsome dress, a fine shawl, she takes a bird. Who knows what she will do with it!”

“Silence!” she says. “It pleases me.”

The father went, and on his return brought the dress, hat, and shawl for the two sisters, and the little bird for Cinderella.

The father was employed at the court, and one day the king said to him, “I am going to give three balls; if you want to bring your daughters, do so; they will amuse themselves a little.”

“As you wish,” he replies, “thanks!” and accepts.

He went home and said, “What do you think, girls? His majesty wishes you to attend his ball.”

“There, you see, Cinderella, if you had only asked for a handsome dress! This evening we are going to the ball.”

She replied, “It matters nothing to me! You go; I am not coming.”

In the evening, when the time came, they adorned themselves, saying to Cinderella, "Come along, there will be room for you, too."

"I don't want to go; you go; I don't want to."

"But," said their father, "let us go, let us go! Dress and come along; let her stay."

When they had gone, she went to the bird and said, "O Bird Verdeliò, make me more beautiful than I am!"

She became clothed in a sea green dress, with so many diamonds that it blinded you to behold her. The bird made ready two purses of money, and said to her, "Take these two purses, enter your carriage, and away!"

She set out for the ball, and left the bird Verdeliò at home. She entered the ballroom. Scarcely had the gentlemen seen this beautiful lady (she dazzled them on all sides), when the king, just think of it, began to dance with her the whole evening. After he had danced with her all the evening, his majesty stopped, and she stood by her sisters. While she was at her sisters' side, she drew out her handkerchief, and a bracelet fell out.

"Oh, Signora," said the eldest sister, "you have dropped this."

"Keep it for yourself," she said.

"Oh, if Cinderella were only here, who knows what might not have happened to her?"

The king had given orders that when this lady went away they should find out where she lived. After she had remained a little she left the ball. You can imagine whether the servants were on the lookout! She entered her carriage and away! She perceives that she is followed, takes the money and begins to throw it out of the window of the carriage. The greedy servants, I tell you, seeing all that money, thought no more of her, but stopped to pick up the money. She returned home and went upstairs.

"O Bird Verdeliò, make me homelier than I am!" You ought to see how ugly, how horrid, she became, all ashes.

When the sisters returned, they cried, "Cin-der-ella!"

"Oh, leave her alone," said her father. "She is asleep now, leave her alone!"

But they went up and showed her the large and beautiful bracelet. "Do you see, you simpleton? You might have had it."

"It matters nothing to me."

Their father said, "Let us go to supper, you little geese."

Let us return to the king, who was awaiting his servants, who had not the courage to appear, but kept away. He calls them, "How did the matter go?"

They fall at his feet. "Thus and thus! She threw out so much money!"

"Wretches, you are nothing else," he said. "Were you afraid of not being rewarded? Well! tomorrow evening, attention, under pain of death."

The next evening the usual ball. The sisters say, "Will you come this evening, Cinderella?"

"Oh," she says, "don't bother me! I don't want to go."

Their father cries out to them, "How troublesome you are! Let her alone!"

So they began to adorn themselves more handsomely than the former evening, and departed. "Good-bye, Cinderella!"

When they had gone, Cinderella went to the bird and said, "Little Bird Verdeliò, make me more beautiful than I am!" Then she became clothed in sea green, embroidered with all the fish of the sea, mingled with diamonds more than you could believe.

The bird said, "Take these two bags of sand, and when you are followed, throw it out, and so they will be blinded."

She entered her carriage and set out for the ball. As soon as his majesty saw her he began to dance with her and danced as long as he could. After he had danced as long as he could (she did not grow weary, but he did), she placed herself near her sisters, drew out her handkerchief, and there fell out a beautiful necklace all made of coal.

The second sister said, "Signora, you have dropped this."

She replied, "Keep it for yourself."

"If Cinderella were here, who knows what might not happen to her! Tomorrow she must come!"

After a while she leaves the ball. The servants (just think, under pain of death!) were all on the alert, and followed her. She began to throw out all the sand, and they were blinded. She went home, dismounted, and went upstairs.

"Little Bird Verdeliò, make me homelier than I am!" She became frightfully homely.

When her sisters returned they began from below, "Cin-der-ella! if you only knew what that lady gave us!"

"It matters nothing to me!"

"Yes, yes! You would have had it!"

The father says, "Let us go to supper and let her alone; you are really silly!"

Let us return to his majesty, who was waiting for his servants to learn where she lived. Instead of that they were all brought back blinded, and had to be accompanied. "Rogue!" he exclaimed, "either this lady is some fairy or she must have some fairy who protects her."

The next day the sisters began, "Cinderella, you must go this evening! Listen; it is the last evening; you must come."

The father, "Oh let her alone! You are always teasing her!"

Then they went away and began to prepare for the ball. When they were all prepared, they went to the ball with their father.

When they had departed, Cinderella went to the bird, "Little Bird Verdeliò, make me more beautiful than I am!" Then she was dressed in all the colors of the heavens; all the comets, the stars, and moon on her dress, and the sun on her brow. She enters the ballroom. Who could look at her! For the sun alone they lower their eyes, and are all blinded. His majesty began to dance, but he could not look at her, because she dazzled him. He had already given orders to his servants to be on the lookout, under pain of death, not to go on foot, but to mount their horses that evening.

After she had danced longer than on the previous evenings she placed herself by her father's side, drew out her handkerchief, and there fell out a snuffbox of gold, full of money.

"Signora, you have dropped this snuffbox."

"Keep it for yourself!"

Imagine that man. He opens it and sees it full of money. What a joy!

After she had remained a time she went home as usual. The servants followed her on horseback, quickly, at a distance from the carriage; but on horseback that was not much trouble.

She perceived that she had not prepared anything to throw that evening.

"Oh!" she cried. "What shall I do?" She left the carriage quickly, and in her haste lost one of her slippers. The servants picked it up, took the number of the house, and went away.

Cinderella went upstairs and said, "Little Bird Verdeliò, make me more homely than I am!"

The bird does not answer. After she had repeated it three or four times, it answered, "Rogue! I ought not to make you more homely, but ..." and she became homely and the bird continued, "What are you going to do now? You are discovered."

She began to weep in earnest. When her sisters returned they cried, "Cinder-ella!" You can imagine that she did not answer them this evening. "See what a beautiful snuffbox. If you had gone you might have had it."

"I do not care! Go away!"

Then their father called them to supper.

Let us now turn to the servants who went back with the slipper and the number of the house.

"Tomorrow," said his majesty, "as soon as it is day, go to that house, take a carriage, and bring that lady to the palace."

The servants took the slipper and went away. The next morning they knocked at the door.

Cinderella's father looked out and exclaimed, "Oh heavens! It is his majesty's carriage. What does it mean?" They open the door and the servants ascend. "What do you want of me?" asked the father.

"How many daughters have you?"

"Two."

"Well, show them to us."

The father made them come in there.

"Sit down," they said to one of them. They tried the slipper on her; it was ten times too large for her. The other one sat down; it was too small for her. "But tell me, good man, have you no other daughters? Take care to tell the truth! because majesty wishes it, under pain of death!"

“Gentlemen, there is another one, but I do not mention it. She is all in the ashes, the coals. If you should see her! I do not call her my daughter from shame.”

“We have not come for beauty, or for finery; we want to see the girl!”

Her sisters began to call her, “Cin-der-ella!” but she did not answer.

After a time she said, “What is the matter?”

“You must come down! There are some gentlemen who wish to see you.”

“I don’t want to come.”

“But you must come, you see!”

“Very well; tell them I will come in a moment.” She went to the little bird, “Ah little Bird Verdeliò, make me more beautiful than I am!” Then she was dressed as she had been the last evening, with the sun, and moon, and stars, and in addition, great chains all of gold everywhere about her.

The bird said, “Take me away with you! Put me in your bosom!” She puts the bird in her bosom and begins to descend the stairs.

“Do you hear her?” said the father. “Do you hear her? She is dragging with her the chains from the chimney corner. You can imagine how frightful she will look!”

When she reached the last step, and they saw her, “Ah!” they exclaimed, and recognized the lady of the ball. You can imagine how her father and sisters were vexed. They made her sit down, and tried on the slipper, and it fitted her. Then they made her enter the carriage, and took her to his majesty, who recognized the lady of the other evenings. And you can imagine that, all in love as her was, he said to her, “Will you really be my wife?”

You may believe she consents. She sends for her father and sisters, and makes them all come to the palace. They celebrate the marriage. Imagine what fine festivals were given at this wedding! The servants who had discovered where Cinderella lived were promoted to the highest positions in the palace as a reward.

KING PIG

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Sources: Straparola, Giovanni Francesco. The Facetious Nights, trans. W. G. Waters.

London: Privately printed for members of the Society of Bibliophiles, 1901, Volume I, 133–150; Ashliman, D. L. “King Pig.” Folktexts: A Library of Folktales, Folklore, Fairy Tales and Mythology. <http://www.pitt.edu/~dash/hog.html#straparola> (July 21, 2007).

Date: ca. 1550

Original Source: Italy

National Origin: Italy

---

Giovanni Francesco Straparola (1480–1557) based the work in which “King Pig” is included, The Facetious Nights, on Giovanni Boccaccio’s (1313–1375) Decameron. Both were works in which a frame tale served to organize a series of individual narratives. Straparola made extensive use of folktales in the Nights. Therefore, his work may be compared to the Arabian classic One Thousand and One Nights (see “The Fisherman and the Jinn,” Volume 1, page 220 for a discussion of that work and an example of the tales included therein); Twenty-Two Goblins (see “The Prince’s Elopement,” Volume 2, page 184, and “The Father and Son Who Married Mother and Daughter,” Volume 2, page 191); and Vikram and the Vampire (see “A Man Deceives a Woman,” Volume 2, page 203, “Many Wise Fools,” Volume 2, page 221, and “The Vampire Puzzles Raja Vikram,” Volume 2, page 233). The following tale is a variant of “Hans my Hedgehog” (AT 441). Also see “Jack My Hedge Hog” for Andrew Lang’s version of this tale (page 85).

---

Fair ladies, if man were to spend a thousand years in rendering thanks to his creator for having made him in the form of a human and not of a brute beast, he could not speak gratitude enough. This reflection calls to mind the story of one who was born as a pig, but afterwards became a comely youth. Nevertheless, to his dying day he was known to the people over whom he ruled as King Pig.

You must know, dear ladies, that Galeotto, King of Anglia, was a man highly blest in worldly riches, and in his wife Ersilia, the daughter of Matthias, King of Hungary, a princess who, in virtue and beauty, outshone all the other ladies of the time. And Galeotto was a wise king, ruling his land so that no man could hear complaint against him. Though they had been several years married they had no child, wherefore they both of them were much aggrieved. While Ersilia was walking one day in her garden she felt suddenly weary, and remarking hard by a spot covered with fresh green turf, she went up to it and sat down thereon, and, overcome with weariness and soothed by the sweet singing of the birds in the green foliage, she fell asleep. And it chanced that while she slept there passed by three fairies who held mankind somewhat in scorn, and these, when they beheld the sleeping queen, halted, and gazing upon her beauty, took counsel together how they might protect her and throw a spell upon her.

When they were agreed, the first cried out, “I will that no man shall be able to harm her, and that, the next time she lie with her husband, she may be with child and bear a son who shall not have his equal in all the world for beauty.”

Then said the second, “I will that no one shall ever have power to offend her, and that the prince who shall be born of her shall be gifted with every virtue under the sun.”

And the third said, “And I will that she shall be the wisest among women, but that the son whom she shall conceive shall be born in the skin of a pig, with a pig’s ways and manners, and in this state he shall be constrained to abide till he shall have three times taken a woman to wife.”

As soon as the three fairies had flown away Ersilia awoke, and straightway arose and went back to the palace, taking with her the flowers she had plucked. Not many days had passed before she knew herself to be with child, and when the time of her delivery was come, she gave birth to a son with members like those of a pig and not of a human being.

When tidings of this prodigy came to the ears of the king and queen they lamented sore treatment, and the king, bearing in mind how good and wise his queen was, often felt moved to put this offspring of hers to death and cast it into the sea, in order that she might be spared the shame of having given birth to him. But when he debated in his mind and considered that this son, let him be what he might, was of his own begetting, he put aside the cruel purpose which he had been harboring, and, seized with pity and grief, he made up his mind that the son should be brought up and nurtured like a rational being and not as a brute beast.

The child, therefore, being nursed with the greatest care, would often be brought to the queen and put his little snout and his little paws in his mother's lap, and she, moved by natural affection, would caress him by stroking his bristly back with her hand, and embracing and kissing him as if he had been of human form. Then he would wag his tail and give other signs to show that he was conscious of his mother's affection.

The pigling, when he grew older, began to talk like a human being, and to wander abroad in the city, but whenever he came near to any mud or dirt he would always wallow therein, after the manner of pigs, and return all covered with filth. Then, when he approached the king and queen, he would rub his sides against their fair garments, defiling them with all manner of dirt, but because he was indeed their own son they bore it all.

One day he came home covered with mud and filth, as was his wont, and lay down on his mother's rich robe, and said in a grunting tone, "Mother, I wish to get married."

When the queen heard this, she replied, "Do not talk so foolishly. What maid would ever take you for a husband, and think you that any noble or knight would give his daughter to one so dirty and ill-savored as you?"

But he kept on grunting that he must have a wife of one sort or another. The queen, not knowing how to manage him in this matter, asked the king what they should do in their trouble, "Our son wishes to marry, but where shall we find anyone who will take him as a husband?"

Every day the pig would come back to his mother with the same demand, "I must have a wife, and I will never leave you in peace until you procure for me a certain maiden I have seen today, who pleases me greatly."

It happened that this maiden was a daughter of a poor woman who had three daughters. When the queen heard this, she had brought before her the poor woman and her eldest daughter, and said, "Good mother, you are poor and burdened with children. If you will agree to what I shall say to you, you will be rich. I have this son who is, as you see, in form a pig, and I would fain marry him to your eldest daughter. Do not consider him, but think of the king and of me, and remember that your daughter will inherit this whole kingdom when the king and I shall be dead." When the young girl listened to the words of the queen she was greatly disturbed in her mind and blushed red for shame, and then said that on no account would she listen to the queen's proposition; but the poor mother besought her so pressingly that at last she yielded.

When the pig came home one day, all covered with dirt as usual, his mother said to him, "My son, we have found for you the wife you desire." And then she caused to be brought in the bride, who by this time had been robed in sumptuous regal attire, and presented her to the pig prince. When he saw how lovely and desirable she was he was filled with joy, and, all foul and dirty as he was, jumped round about her, endeavoring by his pawing and nuzzling to show some sign of his affection.

But she, when she found he was soiling her beautiful dress, thrust him aside; whereupon the pig said to her, "Why do you push me thus? Have I not had these garments made for you myself?"

Then she answered disdainfully, "No, neither you nor any other of the whole kingdom of hogs has done this thing."

And when the time for going to bed was come the young girl said to herself, "What am I to do with this foul beast? This very night, while he lies in his first sleep, I will kill him."

The pig prince, who was not far off, heard these words, but said nothing, and when the two retired to their chamber he got into the bed, stinking and dirty as he was, and defiled the sumptuous bed with his filthy paws and snout. He lay down by his spouse, who was not long in falling to sleep, and then he struck her with his sharp hoofs and drove them into her breast so that he killed her.

The next morning the queen went to visit her daughter-in-law, and to her great grief found that the pig had killed her; and when he came back from wandering about the city he said, in reply to the queen's bitter reproaches, that he had only wrought with his wife as she was minded to deal with him, and then withdrew in an ill humor.

Not many days had passed before the pig prince again began to beseech the queen to allow him to marry one of the other sisters, and because the queen at first would not listen to his petition he persisted in his purpose, and threatened to ruin everything in the place if he could not have her to wife. The queen, when she heard this, went to the king and told him everything, and he made answer that perhaps it would be wiser to kill their ill-fated offspring before he might work some fatal mischief in the city.

But the queen felt all the tenderness of a mother toward him, and loved him very dearly in spite of his brutal person, and could not endure the thought of being parted from him; so she summoned once more to the palace the poor woman, together with her second daughter, and held a long discourse with her, begging her the while to give her daughter in marriage.

At last the girl assented to take the pig prince for a husband; but her fate was no happier than her sister's, for the bridegroom killed her, as he had killed his other bride, and then fled headlong from the palace.

When he came back dirty as usual and smelling so foully that no one could approach him, the king and queen censured him gravely for the outrage he had wrought; but again he cried out boldly that if he had not killed her she would have killed him.

As it had happened before, the pig in a very short time began to importune his mother again to let him have to wife the youngest sister, who was much more beautiful than either of the others; and when this request of his was refused steadily, he became more insistent than ever, and in the end began to threaten the queen's life in violent and bloodthirsty words, unless he should have given to him the young girl for his wife.

The queen, when she heard this shameful and unnatural speech, was well-nigh broken hearted and like to go out of her mind; but, putting all other considerations aside, she called for the poor woman and her third daughter, who was named Meldina, and thus addressed her, "Meldina, my child, I should be greatly pleased if you would take the pig prince for a husband; pay no regard to him, but to his father and to me; then, if you will be prudent and bear patiently with him, you may be the happiest woman in the world."

To this speech Meldina answered, with a grateful smile upon her face, that she was quite content to do as the queen bade her, and thanked her humbly for deigning to choose her as a daughter-in-law; for, seeing that she herself had nothing in the world, it was indeed great good fortune that she, a poor girl, should become the daughter-in-law of a potent sovereign. The queen, when she heard this modest and amiable reply, could not keep back her tears for the happiness she felt; but she feared all the time that the same fate might be in store for Meldina as her sisters.

When the new bride had been clothed in rich attire and decked with jewels, and was awaiting the bridegroom, the pig prince came in, filthier and more muddy than ever; but she spread out her rich gown and besought him to lie down by her side. Whereupon the queen bade her to thrust him away, but to this she would not consent, and spoke thus to the queen, "There are three wise sayings, gracious lady, which I remember to have heard. The first is that it is folly to waste time in searching for that which cannot be found. The second is that we should believe nothing we may hear, except those things which bear the marks of sense and reason. The third is that, when once you have got possession of some rare and precious treasure, prize it well and keep a firm hold upon it."

When the maiden had finished speaking, the pig prince, who had been wide awake and had heard all that she had said, got up, kissed her on the face and neck and bosom and shoulders with his tongue, and she was not backward in returning his caresses; so that he was fired with a warm love for her.

As soon as the time for retiring for the night had come, the bride went to bed and awaited her unseemly spouse, and, as soon as he came, she raised the coverlet and bade him lie near to her and put his head upon the pillow, covering him carefully with the bedclothes and drawing the curtains so that he might feel no cold.

When morning had come the pig got up and ranged abroad to pasture, as was his wont, and very soon after the queen went to the bride's chamber, expecting to find that she had met with the same fate as her sisters; but when she saw her lying in the bed, all defiled with mud as it was, and looking pleased and contented, she thanked God for this favor, that her son had at last found a spouse according to his liking.

One day, soon after this, when the pig prince was conversing pleasantly with his wife, he said to her, "Meldina, my beloved wife, if I could be fully sure that you could keep a secret, I would now tell you one of mine; something I have kept hidden for many years. I know you to be very prudent and wise, and that you love me truly; so I wish to make you the sharer of my secret."

"You may safely tell it to me, if you will," said Meldina, "for I promise never to reveal it to anyone without your consent."

Whereupon, being now sure of his wife's discretion and fidelity, her straight-way shook off from his body the foul and dirty skin of the pig, and stood revealed as a handsome and well shaped young man, and all that night rested closely folded in the arms of his beloved wife. But he charged her solemnly to keep silence about this wonder she had seen, for the time had not yet come for his complete delivery from this misery. So when he left the bed he donned the dirty pig's hid once more. I leave you to imagine for yourselves how great was the great joy of Meldina when she discovered that, instead of a pig, she had gained a handsome and gallant young prince for a husband.

Not long after this she proved to with child, and when the time her delivery came she gave birth to a fair and shapely boy. The joy of the king and queen was unbounded, especially when they found that the newborn child had the form of a human being and not that of a beast. But the burden of the strange and weighty secret which her husband had confided to her pressed heavily upon Meldina, and one day she went to her mother-in-law and said, "Gracious queen, when first I married your son I believed I was married to a beast, but not I find that you have given me the comeliest, the worthiest, and the most gallant young man ever born into the world to be my husband. For know that when he comes into my chamber to lie by my side, he casts off his dirty hide and leaves it on the ground, and is changed into a graceful handsome youth. No one could believe this marvel save they saw it with their own eyes."

When the queen heard these words she deemed that her daughter-in-law must be jesting with her, but Meldina still persisted that what she said was true.

And when the queen demanded to know how she might witness with her own eyes the truth of this thing, Meldina replied, “Come to my chamber tonight, when we shall be in our first sleep; the door will be open, and you will find that what I tell you is the truth.”

That same night, when the looked-for time had come, and all were gone to rest, the queen let some torches be kindled and went, accompanied by the king, to the chamber of her son, and when she had entered she saw the pig’s skin lying on the floor in the corner of the room, and having gone to the bedside, found therein a handsome young man in whose arms Meldina was lying. And when they saw this, the delight of the king and queen was very great, and the king gave order that before anyone should leave the chamber the pig’s hide should be torn to shreds. So great was their joy over the recovery of their son that they well-nigh died thereof.

And King Galeotto, when he saw that he had so fine a son, and a grandchild likewise, laid aside his diadem and his royal robes, and advanced to his place his son, whom he let be crowned with the greatest pomp, and who was ever afterwards known as King Pig. Thus, to the great contentment of all the people, the young king began his reign, and he lived long and happily with Meldina his beloved wife.

HOW THE DEVIL MARRIED THREE SISTERS

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Crane, Thomas Frederick. Italian Popular Tales. New York: Houghton, Mifflin and Co., 1885, 78–81.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Italy

National Origin: Italy

---

As is the case in many tales of marriage to a demonic spouse, this variant of “Rescue by the Sister” (AT 311) describes punishment for too little curiosity regarding a potential mate’s background and too much curiosity regarding a forbidden room. The motif of rescue by a younger sibling is retained in the Italian tale, as well.

---

Once upon a time the devil was seized with a desire to marry. He therefore left Hell, took the form of a handsome young man, and built a fine large house. When it was completed and furnished in the most fashionable style he introduced himself to a family where there were three pretty daughters, and paid his addresses to the eldest of them. The handsome man pleased the maiden, her parents were glad to see a daughter so well provided for, and it was not long before the wedding was celebrated.

When he had taken his bride home, he presented her with a very tastefully arranged bouquet, led her through all the rooms of the house, and finally to a closed door. "The whole house is at your disposal," said he, "only I must request one thing of you; that is, that you do not on any account open this door."

Of course the young wife promised faithfully; but equally, of course, she could scarcely wait for the moment to come when she might break her promise. When the devil had left the house the next morning, under pretence of going hunting, she ran hastily to the forbidden door, opened it, and saw a terrible abyss full of fire that shot up towards her, and singed the flowers on her bosom. When her husband came home and asked her whether she had kept her promise, she unhesitatingly said, "Yes." But he saw by the flowers that she was telling a lie, and said, "Now I will not put your curiosity to the test any longer. Come with me. I will show you myself what is behind the door." Thereupon he led her to the door, opened it, gave her such a push that she fell down into Hell, and shut the door again.

A few months after he wooed the next sister for his wife, and won her; but with her everything that had happened with the first wife was exactly repeated.

Finally he courted the third sister. She was a prudent maiden, and said to herself, "He has certainly murdered my two sisters; but then it is a splendid match for me, so I will try and see whether I cannot be more fortunate than they." And accordingly she consented. After the wedding the bridegroom gave her a beautiful bouquet, but forbade her, also, to open the door which he pointed out.

Not a whit less curious than her sisters, she, too, opened the forbidden door when the devil had gone hunting, but she had previously put her flowers in water. Then she saw behind the door the fatal abyss and her sisters therein. "Ah!" she exclaimed, "poor creature that I am; I thought I had married an ordinary man, and instead of that he is the devil! How can I get away from him?" She carefully pulled her two sisters out of Hell and hid them. When the devil came home he immediately looked at the bouquet, which she again wore on her bosom, and when he found the flowers so fresh he asked no questions; but reassured as to his secret, he now, for the first time, really loved her.

After a few days she asked him if he would carry three chests for her to her parents' house, without putting them down or resting on the way. "But," she added, "you must keep your word, for I shall be watching you."

The devil promised to do exactly as she wished. So the next morning she put one of her sisters in a chest, and laid it on her husband's shoulders. The devil, who is very strong, but also very lazy and unaccustomed to work, soon got tired of carrying the heavy chest, and wanted to rest before he was out of the street on which he lived; but his wife called out to him, "Don't put it down; I see you!"

The devil went reluctantly on with the chest until he had turned the corner, and then said to himself, "She cannot see me here; I will rest a little."

But scarcely had he begun to put the chest down when the sister inside cried out, "Don't put it down; I see you still!" Cursing, he dragged the chest on into another street, and was going to lay it down on a doorstep, but he again heard the voice, "Don't lay it down, you rascal; I see you still!"

"What kind of eyes must my wife have," he thought, "to see around corners as well as straight ahead, and through walls as if they were made of glass!" and thus thinking he arrived, all in a perspiration and quite tired out, at the house of his mother-in-law, to whom he hastily delivered the chest, and then hurried home to strengthen himself with a good breakfast.

The same thing was repeated the next day with the second chest. On the third day she herself was to be taken home in the chest. She therefore prepared a figure which she dressed in her own clothes, and placed on the balcony, under the pretext of being able to watch him better; slipped quickly into the chest, and had the maid put it on the devil's back. "The deuce!" said he; "this chest is a great deal heavier than the others; and today, when she is sitting on the balcony, I shall have so much the less chance to rest." So by dint of the greatest exertions he carried it, without stopping, to his mother-in-law, and then hastened home to breakfast, scolding, and with his back almost broken.

But quite contrary to custom, his wife did not come out to meet him, and there was no breakfast ready. "Margerita, where are you?" he cried, but received no answer. As he was running through the corridors, he at length looked out of a window and saw the figure on the balcony. "Margerita, have you gone to sleep? Come down. I am as tired as a dog, and as hungry as a wolf." But there was no reply. "If you do not come down instantly I will go up and bring you down," he cried, angrily; but Margerita did not stir. Enraged, he hastened up to the balcony, and gave her such a box on the ear that her head flew off, and he saw that the head was nothing but a milliner's form, and the body, a bundle of rags. Raging, he rushed down and rummaged through the whole house, but in vain; he found only his wife's empty jewel box. "Ha!" he cried; "she has been stolen from me and her jewels, too!" and he immediately ran to inform her parents of the misfortune.

But when he came near the house, to his great surprise he saw on the balcony above the door all three sisters, his wives, who were looking down on him with scornful laughter. Three wives at once terrified the devil so much that he took his flight with all possible speed. Since that time he has lost his taste for marrying.

The Nordic Countries

DENMARK

---

PETER OX

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Grundtvig, Sven. Danish Fairy Tales, trans. J. Grant Cramer. Boston: Four Seas Company, 1919, 9–14.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Denmark

National Origin: Denmark

---

Located north of Germany, Denmark is the southernmost country of the Nordic region. Before modernization in the nineteenth century, Denmark's economy was based on farming and maritime occupations. The rural setting of "Peter Ox" (AT 1675) reflects the traditional lifeways of the Danes. The following tale is classified, according to the classic Aarne-Thompson genres, as an anecdote. It builds its plot on the benevolent naiveté of a farm couple and the avarice of the local church sexton. In its initial stages the tale is reminiscent of "The Jackal as Schoolmaster" (AT 56C). Also see the San "The Lion and the Jackal," Volume 1, page 144, for an example of the latter tale type. The innocence and goodness of the farmer allows him to prosper by the conclusion of the tale, however.

---

There were once upon a time a peasant and his wife who lived in Jutland [a region of Denmark that is located on continental Europe], but they had no children. They often lamented that fact and were also sad to think that they had no relatives to whom to leave their farm and other possessions. So the years went by and they became richer and richer, but there was no one to inherit their wealth.

One year the farmer bought a fine calf which he called Peter, and it was really the finest animal that he had ever seen, and so clever that it seemed to understand nearly everything that one said to it. It was also very amusing and affectionate, so that the man and his wife soon became as fond of it as if it were their own child.

One day the farmer said to his wife, "Perhaps the sexton of our church could teach Peter to talk then we could not do better than to adopt him as our child, and he could then inherit all our property."

"Who can tell?" said the wife, "Our sexton is a learned man and perhaps he might be able to teach Peter to talk, for Peter is really very clever. Suppose you ask the sexton."

So the farmer went over to the sexton and asked him whether he did not believe that he could teach his calf to talk, because he wanted to make the animal his heir. The crafty sexton looked around to see that no one was near, and then said that he thought he could do so. "Only you must not tell anybody," he said, "for it must be a great secret, and the minister in particular must not know anything about it, or I might get into serious trouble as such things are strictly forbidden. Moreover it will cost a pretty penny as we shall need rare and expensive books." The farmer said that he did not mind, and handing the sexton a hundred dollars to buy books with, promised not to say a word about the arrangement to anyone.

That evening the man brought his calf to the sexton who promised to do his best. In about a week the farmer returned to see how his calf was getting on, but the sexton said that he did not dare let him see the animal, else Peter might become homesick and forget all that he had already learned. Otherwise he was making good progress, but the farmer must pay another hundred dollars, as Peter needed more books. The peasant happened to have the money with him, so he gave it to the sexton and went home filled with hope and pleasant anticipations.

At the end of another week the man again went to make inquiry about Peter, and was told by the sexton that he was doing fairly well. "Can he say anything?" asked the farmer.

"Yes, he can say 'ma'," answered the sexton.

"The poor animal is surely ill," said the peasant, "and he probably wants mead. I will go straight home and bring him a jug of it." So he fetched a jug of good, old mead and gave it to the sexton for Peter. The sexton, however, kept the mead and gave the calf some milk instead.

A week later the farmer came again to find out what Peter could say now. "He still refuses to say anything but 'ma'," said the sexton.

"Oh! he is a cunning rogue"; said the peasant, "so he wants more mead, does he? Well, I'll get him some more, as he likes it so much. But what progress has he made?"

"He is doing so well," answered the sexton, "that he needs another hundred dollars' worth of books, for he cannot learn anything more from those that he has now."

“Well then, if he needs them he shall have them.” So that same day the farmer brought another hundred dollars and a jug of good, old mead for Peter.

Now the peasant allowed a few weeks to elapse without calling on Peter, for he began to be afraid that each visit would cost him a hundred dollars. In the meantime the calf had become as fat as he would ever be, so the sexton killed him and sold the meat carefully at a distance from the village. Having done that he put on his black clothes and went to call on the farmer and his wife. As soon as he had bid them good day he asked them whether Peter had reached home safe and sound.

“Why no,” said the farmer, “he has not run away, has he?”

“I hope,” said the sexton, “that after all the trouble I have taken he has not been so tricky as to run away and to abuse my confidence so shamefully. For I have spent at least a hundred dollars of my own money to pay for books for him. Now Peter could say whatever he wanted, and he was telling me only yesterday that he was longing to see his dear parents. As I wanted to give him that pleasure, but feared that he would not be able to find his way home alone, I dressed myself and started out with him. We were hardly in the street when I suddenly remembered that I had left my stick at home, so I ran back to get it. When I came out of the house again, I found that Peter had run on alone. I thought, of course, that he had gone back to your house. If he is not there, I certainly do not know where he can be.”

Then the people began to weep and lament that Peter was lost, now especially when they might have had such pleasure with him, and after paying out so much money for his education. And the worst of it was that they were again without an heir. The sexton tried to comfort them and was also very sorry that Peter had deceived them so. But perhaps he had only lost his way, and the sexton promised that he would ask publicly in church next Sunday whether somebody had not seen the calf. Then he bade the farmer and his wife good-bye and went home and had some good roast veal for dinner.

One day the sexton read in the paper that a new merchant, named Peter Ox, had settled in the neighboring town. He put the paper into his pocket and went straight to the farmer and read this item of news to him. “One might almost believe,” he said, “that this is your calf.”

“Why yes,” said the farmer, “who else should it be?” Then his wife added, “Yes father, go at once to see him, for I feel sure that it can be no other than our dear Peter. But take along plenty of money for he probably needs it now that he has become a merchant.”

On the following morning the farmer put a bag of money on his shoulder, took with him some provisions, and started to walk to the town where the merchant lived. Early next morning he arrived there and went straight to the merchant’s house. The servants told the man that the merchant had not gotten up yet. “That does not make any difference for I am his father; just take me up to his room.”

So they took the peasant up to the bedroom where the merchant lay sound asleep. And as soon as the farmer saw him, he recognized Peter. There were the same thick neck and broad forehead and the same red hair, but otherwise he looked just like a human being. Then the man went to him and bade him good morning and said, "Well, Peter, you caused your mother and me great sorrow when you ran away as soon as you had learned something. But get up now and let me have a look at you and talk with you."

The merchant, of course, believed that he had a crazy man to deal with, so he thought it best to be careful. "Yes I will get up," he said, and jumped out of bed into his clothes as quickly as possible.

"Ah!" said the peasant, "now I see what a wise man our sexton was; he has brought it to pass that you are like any other man. If I were not absolutely certain of it, I should never dream that you were the calf of our red cow. Will you come home with me?" The merchant said that he could not as he had to attend to his business. "But you could take over my farm and I would retire. Nevertheless if you prefer to stay in business, I am willing. Do you need any money?"

"Well," said the merchant, "a man can always find use for money in his business."

"I thought so," said the farmer, "and besides you had nothing to start with, so I have brought you some money." And with that he poured out on the table the bright dollars that covered it entirely.

When the merchant saw what kind of a man his new found acquaintance was, he chatted with him in a very friendly manner and begged him to remain with him for a few days.

"Yes indeed," said the farmer, "but you must be sure to call me father from now on."

"But I have neither father nor mother living," answered Peter Ox.

"That I know perfectly well," the peasant replied, "for I sold your real father in Copenhagen last Michaelmas, and your mother died while calving. But my wife and I have adopted you as our child and you will be our heir, so you must call me father."

The merchant gladly agreed to that and kept the bag of money; and before leaving town the farmer made his will and bequeathed all his possessions to Peter after his death. Then the man went home and told his wife the whole story, and she was delighted to learn that the merchant Peter Ox was really their own calf.

"Now you must go straight over to the sexton and tell him what has happened"; she said, "and be sure to refund to him the hundred dollars that he paid out of his own pocket for Peter, for he has earned all that we have paid him, because of the joy that he has caused us in giving us such a son and heir."

Her husband was of the same opinion and went to call on the sexton, whom he thanked many times for his kindness and to whom he also gave two hundred dollars.

Then the farmer sold his farm, and he and his wife moved into the town where the merchant was, and lived with him happily until their death.

THE SUITOR

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Bay, J. Christian. Danish Folk Tales. New York: Harper and Brothers Publishers, 1899, 23–27.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Denmark

National Origin: Denmark

---

The following tale draws on plots categorized in the Aarne-Thompson system as “Looking for a Wife.” Specifically, the suitor’s (Tom) first venture into courtship is unsatisfactory because of the potential brides’ speech impediments (AT 1457). His second prospect fails her bride test due to her laziness (AT 1453). His final attempt at finding a bride finds both the girl and her parents fretting over details of a wedding dress before the proposal has taken place (AT 1450).

---

There was once a handsome young fellow by the name of Tom. From an old, wealthy uncle he had inherited a fine farm, and being well established in life, he determined to seek a wife. As he was quite wealthy, he considered himself able to afford a little more than ordinary people in this direction, for the wives of wealthy men must always be prettier and wiser than those of the poor, as we all know.

So Tom wanted a wife who was handsome and industrious, wise and good, and of course it would not be out of the way if she possessed some property.

One day he rode over to a rich farmer who lived in the neighborhood and who had three daughters, all of whom were ready to be married at once. He had seen, although he had never talked with, them, and thought well of all three.

Now these girls, who were otherwise pretty and good, had one great fault: namely, that they could not talk distinctly. When Tom came riding into the yard the farmer received him kindly and conducted him into the room where the three girls sat spinning diligently.

They nodded kindly to him and smiled, but did not utter a sound, as their mother had strictly forbidden them to do so. The farmer led the talking, while his wife waited on them with good food and drinks. The girls spun, and looked at the young man at the table, and glanced at each other and at the ceiling and out of the windows, but none of them spoke.

At length the one happened to break her yarn. “My ‘arn bote!” exclaimed she.

“Tie it adain,” advised her sister.

“Mamma told us we say no’tin’, and now we t’ant teep ‘till!” broke in the third one. When Tom heard these grown girls talk like babies he hurried away, utterly shocked. A wife who could not speak distinctly he had no use for at all.

He proceeded to another farm, where they had a daughter who was said to be a very fine girl in all respects. Tom went into the house and saw her. If the first three ones had been too silent, this one talked, however, more fluently and volubly than any girl whom he had ever met. She talked like a house on fire, while her spinning wheel went more rapidly than any engine. “How long does it take you to use up such a head of flax?” asked the young man, pointing to the rock [distaff].

“Oh,” she said, “I use up a couple of them every day.”

While she left the room a few minutes to look after the servants, Tom seized a key from a drawer of a bureau in the room and stuffed it into the head of flax. When she returned they finished their conversation; whereupon he bid her parents and herself good-bye, promising to call again in a week.

On the appointed day Tom returned. The girl and her parents expected him to talk this time of his errand. When he came into the room the girl was busy with her rock, as before. She bid him welcome, and invited him to sit down.

“How unfortunate!” began she. “We have been missing the key of that bureau ever since you were here. We are unable to find it, and I cannot reach any of my things. It never happened before.”

On hearing this, Tom went over and pulled the key out of the head of flax. It was the same key, and, still worse, the very same head of flax that he had seen a week before. Thus he knew her word could not be depended upon; and bidding her good-bye he left at once, richer in experience than before.

Some time afterwards he heard of a girl who was very pretty and good, but especially wise and thoughtful in all practical matters. Her parents were said to be the same. Tom saddled his horse and rode over to see her.

The whole family was at home and received the young man very kindly. While the men drifted into a talk about the weather and crops, the women placed before them the best that the house could afford.

“Go into the cellar and fetch a bottle of wine,” said the woman to her daughter. The girl went into the cellar, but was so busy thinking what pattern she might choose for a wedding dress that she sat down on the floor, lost in reflection upon this important subject, and the wine was entirely forgotten. After she had left the room, the parents told Tom of their daughter’s many good qualities; how industrious she was, how thoughtful, and so on. The young man thought that she would be exactly such a wife as he wished. But as the girl did not appear with the wine, her mother went to see what had become of her.

When she came into the cellar and found her daughter sitting on the floor, she asked, “Why do you sit there, instead of bringing the wine?”

“Well,” was the answer, “I am thinking that if I marry Tom I must make a careful choice of the pattern for my wedding gown. The question is, what pattern would do best?”

“Yes, indeed,” answered her mother, “which pattern will be the most suitable?” She sat down by her daughter, pondering over this important question.

“I wonder what has become of them both!” at length exclaimed the man, referring to his wife and daughter. “I must look after them.”

He went into the cellar, and when he saw both women sitting on the floor he cried, “Why are you both sitting here? You have kept us waiting for over an hour!”

“We are thinking,” replied his wife, “of the pattern for the wedding gown. If she is to marry Tom, the gown must, of course, be a pretty one, and the choice of the right pattern is, indeed, an important matter.”

“To be sure!” answered her husband, seating himself on the floor beside them to consider the same subject.

As at length Tom grew tired of waiting, he went himself into the cellar to see if anything unusual had happened. He found the whole family sitting on the floor and looking extremely thoughtful.

“Why do you all sit here?” he asked. At length the farmer, aroused from his reverie, proceeded to relate the difficult question which had caught their attention.

“Yes, indeed,” answered Tom. “Which will be the most suitable pattern? You may think of that until I return, and in the meantime I will do the same. Good-bye to you!”

Mounting his horse, he rode home as rapidly as the steed would carry him, and if he has not found another and less thoughtful girl, he is yet a bachelor.

But the three people may yet be sitting on the cellar floor, thinking of the pattern for the bridal gown, for all that I know!

ICELAND

---

THE PROSE EDDA

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Sturluson, Snorri. The Prose Edda, trans. Arthur Gilchrist Brodeur. New York: The American Scandinavian Foundation, 1916, 3–12, 70–73.

Date: ca. 1200

Original Source: Iceland

National Origin: Iceland

---

Iceland, a country of northwestern Europe, consists of the island of Iceland and adjacent islets in the North Atlantic Ocean. In the late ninth century, Norwegian immigrants permanently settled on the island. Until the twentieth century, farming and maritime occupations provided the livelihood for the population. The following narrative is drawn from The Prose Edda written by Snorri Sturluson (1178–1241), an Icelandic historian, poet, and politician. The Prose Edda consists of a “Prologue” (given in its entirety below) that is Snorri’s attempt to explain the origins of Norse mythology by recourse to historical events. The second section, the “Gylfaginning” (“Tricking of Gylfi”) recounts the myths of Norse tradition (“The Death of Baldr” from the “Gylfaginning,” is given below). Section Three consists of the “Skáldskaparmál,” a dialogue between Ægir (Norse god of the sea) and Bragi (Norse god of poetry) that interweaves myth and poetic theory. The last section, the “Háttatal,” illustrates the verse forms of Old Norse poetry. Although Snorri was a Christian and his work was written two centuries after the introduction of Christianity to Iceland, he provides a classic source for Norse mythology in The Prose Edda.

---

In the Beginning

In the beginning God created heaven and earth and all those things which are in them; and last of all, two of human kind, Adam and Eve, from whom the races are descended. And their offspring multiplied among themselves and were scattered throughout the earth. But as time passed, the races of men became unlike in nature: some were good and believed on the right; but many more turned after the lusts of the world and slighted God's command. Wherefore, God drowned the world in a swelling of the sea, and all living things, save them alone that were in the ark with Noah. After Noah's flood eight of mankind remained alive, who peopled the earth; and the races descended from them. And it was even as before: when the earth was full of folk and inhabited of many, then all the multitude of mankind began to love greed, wealth, and worldly honor, but neglected the worship of God. Now accordingly it came to so evil a pass that they would not name God; and who then could tell their sons of God's mighty wonders? Thus it happened that they lost the name of God; and throughout the wide-ness of the world the man was not found who could distinguish in aught the trace of his Creator. But not the less did God bestow upon them the gifts of the earth: wealth and happiness, for their enjoyment in the world; He increased also their wisdom, so that they knew all earthly matters, and every phase of whatsoever they might see in the air and on the earth.

One thing they wondered and pondered over: what it might mean, that the earth and the beasts and the birds had one nature in some ways, and yet were unlike in manner of life. In this was their nature one: that the earth was cleft into lofty mountain-peaks, wherein water spurted up, and it was not needful to dig longer for water there than in the deep valleys; so it is also with beasts and birds: it is equally far to the blood in the head and the feet. Another quality of the earth is, that in each year grass and flowers grow upon the earth, and in the same year all that growth falls away and withers; it is even so with beasts and birds: hair and feathers grow and fall away each year. This is the third nature of the earth, that when it is opened and dug up, the grass grows straightway on the soil which is uppermost on the earth. Boulders and stones they likened to the teeth and bones of living beings. Thus they recognized that the earth was quick, and had life with some manner of nature of its own; and they understood that she was wondrous old in years and mighty in kind: she nourished all that lived, and she took to herself all that died.

Therefore they gave her a name, and traced the number of their generations from her. The same thing, moreover, they learned from their aged kinsmen: that many hundreds of years have been numbered since the same earth yet was, and the same sun and stars of the heavens; but the courses of these were unequal, some having a longer course, and some a shorter.

From things like these the thought stirred within them that there might be some governor of the stars of heaven: one who might order their courses after his will; and that he must be very strong and full of might. This also they held to be true: that if he swayed the chief things of creation, he must have been before the stars of heaven; and they saw that if he ruled the courses of the heavenly bodies, he must also govern the shining of the sun, and the dews of the air, and the fruits of the earth, whatsoever grows upon it; and in like manner the winds of the air and the storms of the sea. They knew not yet where his kingdom was; but this they believed: that he ruled all things on earth and in the sky, the great stars also of the heaven, and the winds of the sea. Wherefore, not only to tell of this fittingly, but also that they might fasten it in memory, they gave names out of their own minds to all things. This belief of theirs has changed in many ways, according as the peoples drifted asunder and their tongues became severed one from another. But all things they discerned with the wisdom of the earth, for the understanding of the spirit was not given to them; this they perceived, that all things were fashioned of some essence.

II

The world was divided into three parts: from the south, extending into the west and bordering on the Mediterranean Sea, all this part was called Africa, the southern quarter of which is hot, so that it is parched with the sun. The second part, from west to north and bordering on the ocean, is called Európa or Eneá; its northern part is so cold that no grass grows upon it, and no man dwells there. From the north and all down over the eastern part, even to the south, is called Asia. In that region of the world is all fairness and pride, and the fruits of the earth's increase, gold and jewels. There also is the center of the earth; and even as the land there is lovelier and better in every way than in other places, so also were the sons of men there most favored with all goodly gifts: wisdom, and strength of the body, beauty, and all manner of knowledge.

III

Near the earth's center was made that goodliest of homes and haunts that ever have been, which is called Troy, even that which we call Turkland. This abode was much more gloriously made than others, and fashioned with more skill of craftsmanship in manifold wise, both in luxury and in the wealth which was there in abundance. There were twelve kingdoms and one High King, and many sovereignties belonged to each kingdom; in the stronghold were twelve chieftains.

These chieftains were in every manly part greatly above other men that have ever been in the world. One king among them was called Múnón or Mennón; and he was wedded to the daughter of the High King Priam, her who was called Tróán; they had a child named Trór, whom we call Thor. He was fostered in Thrace by a certain war-duke called Lórikus; but when he was ten winters old he took unto him the weapons of his father. He was as goodly to look upon, when he came among other men, as the ivory that is inlaid in oak; his hair was fairer than gold. When he was twelve winters old he had his full measure of strength; then he lifted clear of the earth ten bear-skins all at one time; and then he slew Duke Lórikus, his foster-father, and with him his wife Lórá, or Glórá, and took into his own hands the realm of Thrace, which we call Thrúdheim. Then he went forth far and wide over the lands, and sought out every quarter of the earth, overcoming alone all berserks and giants, and one dragon, greatest of all dragons, and many beasts.

In the northern half of his kingdom he found the prophetess that is called Síbil, whom we call Sif, and wedded her. The lineage of Sif I cannot tell; she was fairest of all women, and her hair was like gold. Their son was Lóridi, who resembled his father; his son was Einridi, his son Vingethor, his son Vingener, his son Móda, his son Magi, his son Seskef, his son Bedvig, his son Athra (whom we call Annarr), his son Ítermann, his son Heremód, his son Skjaldun (whom we call Skjöld), his son Bjáf (whom we call Bjárr), his son Ját, his son Gudólfr, his son Finn, his son Fríallaf (whom we call Fridleifr); his son was he who is named Vóden, whom we call Odin: he was a man far-famed for wisdom and every accomplishment. His wife was Frígídá, whom we call Frigg.

IV

Odin had second sight, and his wife also; and from their foreknowledge he found that his name should be exalted in the northern part of the world and glorified above the fame of all other kings. Therefore, he made ready to journey out of Turkland, and was accompanied by a great multitude of people, young folk and old, men and women; and they had with them much goods of great price. And wherever they went over the lands of the earth, many glorious things were spoken of them, so that they were held more like gods than men. They made no end to their journeying till they were come north into the land that is now called Saxland; there Odin tarried for a long space, and took the land into his own hand, far and wide.

In that land Odin set up three of his sons for land-wardens. One was named Vegdeg: he was a mighty king and ruled over East Saxland; his son was Vitgils; his sons were Vitta, Heingistr's father, and Sigarr, father of Svebdeg, whom we call Svipdagr. The second son of Beldeg, whom we call Baldr: he had the land which is now called Westphalia. His son was Brandr, his son Frjódigar (whom we call Fródi), his son Freóvin, his son Uvigg, his son Gevis (whom we call Gave). Odin's third son is named Sigi, his son Rerir. These the forefathers ruled over what is now called Frankland; and thence is descended the house known as Völsungs. From all these are sprung many and great houses.

Then Odin began his way northward, and came into the land which they called Reidgothland; and in that land he took possession of all that pleased him. He set up over the land that son of his called Skjöldr, whose son was Fridleifr; and thence descends the house of the Skjöldungs: these are the kings of the Danes. And what was then called Reidgothland is now called Jutland [an area of modern Denmark].

V

After that he went northward, where the land is called Sweden; the king there was named Gylfi. When the king learned of the coming of those men of Asia, who were called Æsir, he went to meet them, and made offer to them that Odin should have such power in his realm as he himself wielded. And such well-being followed ever upon their footsteps, that in whatsoever lands they dwelt were good seasons and peace; and all believed that they caused these things, for the lords of the land perceived that they were unlike other men whom they had seen, both in fairness and also in wisdom.

The fields and the choice lands in that place seemed fair to Odin, and he chose for himself the site of a city which is now called Sigtún. There he established chieftains in the fashion which had prevailed in Troy; he set up also twelve head-men to be doomsmen over the people and to judge the laws of the land; and he ordained also all laws as, there had been before, in Troy, and according to the customs of the Turks. After that he went into the north, until he was stopped by the sea, which men thought lay around all the lands of the earth; and there he set his son over this kingdom, which is now called Norway. This king was Sæmingr; the kings of Norway trace their lineage from him, and so do also the jarls [Scandinavian medieval nobleman] and the other mighty men, as is said in the Háleygjatal. Odin had with him one of his sons called Yngvi, who was king in Sweden after him; and those houses come from him that are named Ynglings. The Æsir took wives of the land for themselves, and some also for their sons; and these kindreds became many in number, so that throughout Saxland, and thence all over the region of the north, they spread out until their tongue, even the speech of the men of Asia, was the native tongue over all these lands. Therefore men think that they can perceive, from their forefathers' names which are written down, that those names belonged to this tongue, and that the Æsir brought the tongue hither into the northern region, into Norway and into Sweden, into Denmark and into Saxland. But in England there are ancient lists of land-names and place-names which may show that these names came from another tongue than this.

Death of Baldr

Hárr made answer, "The beginning of the story is this, that Baldr the Good [Norse god of innocence, beauty, joy, purity, and peace] dreamed great and perilous dreams touching his life. When he told these dreams to the Æsir, then they took counsel together: and this was their decision: to ask safety for Baldr from all kinds of dangers. And Frigg [supreme goddess of the Norse pantheon] took oaths to this purport, that fire and water should spare Baldr, likewise iron and metal of all kinds, stones, earth, trees, sicknesses, beasts, birds, venom, serpents.

And when that was done and made known, then it was a diversion of Baldr's and the Æsir, that he should stand up in the Thing [the assembly], and all the others should some shoot at him, some hew at him, some beat him with stones; but whatsoever was done hurt him not at all, and that seemed to them all a very worshipful thing.

“But when Loki Laufeyarson [trickster who was actually a giant but associated with the Æsir, the Norse gods] saw this, it pleased him ill that Baldr took no hurt. He went to Fensalir [Frigg's palace] to Frigg, and made himself into the likeness of a woman. Then Frigg asked if that woman knew what the Æsir did at the Thing. She said that all were shooting at Baldr, and moreover, that he took no hurt. Then said Frigg, ‘Neither weapons nor trees may hurt Baldr: I have taken oaths of them all.’ Then the woman asked, ‘Have all things taken oaths to spare Baldr?’ and Frigg answered, ‘There grows a tree-sprout alone westward of Valhall: it is called Mistletoe; I thought it too young to ask the oath of.’ Then straightway the woman turned away; but Loki took Mistletoe and pulled it up and went to the Thing.

“Hödr [Baldr's brother] stood outside the ring of men, because he was blind. Then spake Loki to him, ‘Why dost thou not shoot at Baldr?’ He answered, ‘Because I see not where Baldr is; and for this also, that I am weaponless.’ Then said Loki, ‘Do thou also after the manner of other men, and show Baldr honor as the other men do. I will direct thee where he stands; shoot at him with this wand.’ Hödr took Mistletoe and shot at Baldr, being guided by Loki: the shaft flew through Baldr, and he fell dead to the earth; and that was the greatest mischance that has ever befallen among gods and men.

“Then, when Baldr was fallen, words failed all the, Æsir, and their hands likewise to lay hold of him; each looked at the other, and all were of one mind as to him who had wrought the work, but none might take vengeance, so great a sanctuary was in that place. But when the Æsir tried to speak, then it befell first that weeping broke out, so that none might speak to the others with words concerning his grief. But Odin [supreme god of the Norse pantheon] bore that misfortune by so much the worst, as he had most perception of how great harm and loss for the Æsir were in the death of Baldr.

“Now when the gods had come to themselves, Frigg spake, and asked who there might be among the Æsir who would fain have for his own all her love and favor: let him ride the road to Hel [Norse goddess of the dead and daughter of Loki; also, Land of the Dead], and seek if he may find Baldr, and offer Hel a ransom if she will let Baldr come home to Ásgard. And he is named Hermódr the Bold, Odin's son, who undertook that embassy. Then Sleipnir was taken, Odin's steed, and led forward; and Hermódr mounted on that horse and galloped off.

“The Æsir took the body of Baldr and brought it to the sea. Hringhorni is the name of Baldr's ship: it was greatest of all ships; the gods would have launched it and made Baldr's pyre thereon, but the ship stirred not forward. Then word was sent to Jötunheim after that giantess who is called Hyrrokkin.

When she had come, riding a wolf and having a viper for bridle, then she leaped off the steed; and Odin called to four berserks [“beserkers,” Norse warriors who fought in an uncontrollable state of frenzy] to tend the steed; but they were not able to hold it until they had felled it. Then Hyrrokkin went to the prow of the boat and thrust it out at the first push, so that fire burst from the rollers, and all lands trembled. Thor became angry and clutched his hammer, and would straightway have broken her head, had not the gods prayed for peace for her.

“Then was the body of Baldr borne out on shipboard; and when his wife, Nanna the daughter of Nep, saw that, straightway her heart burst with grief, and she died; she was borne to the pyre, and fire was kindled. Then Thor stood by and hallowed the pyre with Mjöllnir [Thor’s hammer]; and before his feet ran a certain dwarf which was named Litri; Thor kicked at him with his foot and thrust him into the fire, and he burned. People of many races visited this burning: First is to be told of Odin, how Frigg and the Valkyrs went with him, and his ravens; but Freyr drove in his chariot with the boar called Gold-Mane, or Fearful-Tusk, and Heimdallr rode the horse called Gold-Top, and Freyja drove her cats. Thither came also much people of the Rime-Giants and the Hill-Giants. Odin laid on the pyre that gold ring which is called Draupnir; this quality attended it, that every ninth night there dropped from it eight gold rings of equal weight. Baldr’s horse was led to the bale-fire with all his trappings.”

THOR IN PERIL

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Mackenzie, Donald A. Teutonic Myth and Legend. London: Gresham Publications, 1912, 126–134.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: The Poetic Edda from the Icelandic Codex Regius.

National Origin: Iceland

---

The following episodes from Norse mythology depict the relationship between Loki (“Loke,” in this translation) the trickster and Thor the god of lightning and thunder. Thor’s hammer Mjolner was made for him by a pair of dwarves Brok and Eitri, whose trade was the manufacture of magical objects for the gods. Thor threw his hammer to create lightning as he rode in his chariot pulled by a pair of goats, but the hammer returned to the iron glove he wore on his right hand. Thor’s hammer had served as his weapon in battles against the frost giants. For this reason, Thrym used it to barter with the god and Geirrod wanted him stripped of the weapon before confronting him. Loke uses his cunning and skill at shape-shifting both to aid and undermine Thor, according to the trickster's self-interest. Ragnarok, alluded to in the second episode of "Thor in Peril," is the end of the universe in Norse mythology. After this apocalypse, a new utopia will rise from the sea. Yggdrasil is a giant ash tree that forms a framework that links the worlds of the Norse mythic cosmos.

---

Now there was a king of giants whose name was Thrym, and he desired to have Freyja, the beautiful Asa-goddess, for his bride. A deep plot he laid, nor did the gods become aware of it until a grievous misfortune befell Thor. He was returning with Loke from Jotun-heim, and together they lay down to sleep. In great wrath was the thunder-god [that is, Thor] when he awoke because he could find not his hammer, Mjolner. He grasped his red beard and shook it, and fear crept over him as he searched around and about, because without his hammer he was powerless to contend against the giants.

When the other awoke, Thor spoke to him, saying, "Listen to me, and I shall tell thee what is known not in heaven nor upon earth—Mjolner is stolen!"

Speedily they took flight towards high Asgard, and to the dwelling of Freyja went they. Thor spake abruptly, and said, "Wilt thou lend thy falcon-guise to me, for my hammer hath been stolen, and I would fain find it."

"Gladly shall I give it thee, O Thor," Freyja answered, "even although it were made of silver; yea, if it were of fine gold thou wouldst have it without delay."

To Loke gave Thor the falcon-guise, and he flew speedily from Asgard to the northern coasts of distant Jotun-heim. Nor did he pause or stay until he reached a high mountain on which sat Thrym, king of giants, twisting bands of gold for his dogs, and anon smoothing the gold mane of his horse.

When he beheld Loke in falcon-guise he said, "How fare the gods, and how fare the elves? Why dost thou come alone unto these shores?"

Loke answered, "Ill fares it with gods and ill fares it with the elves. Hast thou hidden the hammer of Thor?"

Thrym answered boldly and with gladness, "I have indeed done so. Nine miles below the ground have I buried Mjolner. Nor shall it ever be recovered or returned unto Thor until I am given the goddess Freyja for my bride."

Having spoken thus he smoothed leisurely the golden mane of his fleet-footed steed, and Loke flew back towards Asgard.

Thor awaited him on the battlements, and when the falcon drew nigh he cried, "Hast thou indeed performed thy mission, O Loke? Tell me what thou knowest ere thou dost descend. What is spoken by one who sits is often of small worth. He who reclines is prone to utter what is untrue."

Loke answered and said, "I have discovered all that needs be known. Thy hammer hath been stolen by Thrym, King of Jotuns, and he hath buried it nine miles down below the mountains. Nor will he deliver it to thee again until Freyja is given him to be his bride."

Then Thor and Loke went unto Freyja and told her what the giant had said. Impatient, indeed, was the thunder-god, for he feared that if it became known to the Frost-giants that his hammer was lost they would fall upon Asgard and overcome the gods.

“Right speedily thou must don thy bridal attire, O Freyja,” Thor exclaimed, “and together shall we hasten unto Jotun-heim.”

Freyja was filled with anger, and as she raged she broke her flashing necklace that gave her great beauty. “A love-sick maid, indeed, I would be,” she exclaimed, “ere I would hasten to King Thrym.”

To the high Thingstead [Assembly] of Asgard went Thor, and the gods assembled there to hold counsel one with another and decide how the hammer should be recovered. To the hall Vingolf went the goddesses, to consult regarding the fate of Freyja.

In the Thingstead, Heimdal, the wise Van, the shining god, spake with foreknowledge and cunning, and thus he advised, “Let Thor be dressed in the bridal robes of Freyja, and let him also don her sparkling necklace, which gives its wearer great beauty. In a woman’s dress let Thor go forth, with keys jingling at his waist. His hair must be pleated, and on his breast must be fixed great brooches.”

But Thor made protest, and declared that the gods would mock him if he were attired in woman’s dress. Ill-pleased was he with Heimdal’s words. “Be silent, Thor,” Loke exclaimed; “thou knowest well that if thy hammer is found not the Frost-giants will come speedily hither and build over Asgard a dome of ice.”

The other gods spake likewise, and Thor consented to be attired as a bride. When this was done, Loke was dressed, at his own desire, as a maid attendant, and together they went forth from Asgard in Thor’s sublime car. The mountains thundered and fire swept from the heavens over Midgard as Thor journeyed to Jotun-heim.

Thrym was sitting on the mountain top, and to the Jotuns about him he spoke, when he beheld Thor in female-guise coming nigh, saying, “Arise, O giants! Let the feast be spread, for Freyja comes hither to be my bride.”

Then were driven before him into his yard his red cows with golden horns, and his great black oxen.

“I have great wealth indeed,” the king exclaimed; “all that I desire is mine. I lack naught save Freyja.”

The feast was made ready, and at the board sat Thor, whom Thrym deemed to be Freyja, and Loke, who was “maid attendant.”

Thor had great hunger, and he ate an ox, eight salmon, and all the sweets which had been made ready for the giantesses. Then he drank three great barrels of ancient mead.

Wondering, Thrym sat and watched him. Then he cried, “Hath anyone ever beheld a bride so hungry? Never have I known a maid who ate as Freyja hath eaten, or a woman who ever drank so great a quantity of mead.”

Loke, the cunning one, fearing that Thor would be discovered, said, "For eight days hath Freyja fasted, so greatly did she long to come unto Jotun-heim."

Thrym was well pleased to hear what Loke said, and he rose and went towards Thor. He lifted the veil he wore and sought to kiss, but he shrank back suddenly. Indeed he retreated to the hall end, where he cried, "Why are the eyes of Freyja so bright and so fierce? They seem to glow like hot embers."

Then spake cunning Loke again, and said, "Alas! O Thrym, for eight nights Freyja hath slept not, for she longed to be here with thee in Jotun-heim. Thus are her eyes a-fire." Thrym's sister then entered, and she went towards Thor humbly and with due respect, and asked to be given golden bridal rings from his fingers.

"Thou shalt gift them to me," she said, "if thou desirest to have my friendship and my love."

But naught did she receive from the angry and impatient god of thunder.

Thrym then desired that the wedding ceremony should be held, but Loke asked that as proof of his friendship, and to complete the bargain the giant had made, Thor's hammer should be laid upon the maiden's lap.

Then did Thrym order that Mjolner be lifted from its hiding place deep in the bowels of the earth.

In Thor's heart there was great laughter when Thrym spoke thus, yet was his mind solemn, and he waited anxiously until Mjolner was laid upon his knees.

A servant came forward with it, and Thor clutched the handle right eagerly. Then he tore off the bridal veil from his face and the woman's dress from about his knees, and sprang upon King Thrym, whom he killed with a single blow. Around the feasting board he went, slaying the guests, nor one would he permit to escape from the hall, so fierce was he with long-restrained wrath.

Thrym's sister, who had begged from Thor the bridal rings, he slew with the others. A blow she received from the hammer instead of golden treasure.

Cunning Loke watched with pleasure the devastation accomplished by the fierce thunder-god as he raged round the hall and through the castle, wreaking his fierce vengeance on the whole clan of Thrym.

Then together hastened they to where the goats were bound at the home of Orvandel, nor did they pause to rest. Across the heavens was speedily driven the black sublime car. Swiftly o'er mountain and sea it went, blotting out the sparkling stars. Mountains thundered and the wide ocean trembled with fear as the car rolled on. The earth was filled with fire.

Thus did Thor return in triumph unto Asgard, because Mjolner was recovered and the King of Mountain Giants was slain.

But although Loke had served Thor well when his hammer was stolen by Thrym, there came a time when he brought the god of thunder nigh to great misfortune. It was in the days ere the winter war was waged between the Asa-gods and the sons of Ivalde, and the cunning artisans were yet friendly with the dwellers in Asgard.

Loke had gone forth in the falcon-guise of Freyja to pry round Jotun-heim, and especially the castle of King Geirrod, whose daughter he desired for a bride. He flew towards a window, and sat in it while he listened to the words that were being spoken, and surveyed the guests who were there. A servant beheld him with curious eyes, and perceived that he was not a real falcon. So, making cautious approach, he seized Loke and brought him before the king. The eyes of the falcon were still the cunning eyes of Loke, and he was recognized by Geirrod, who demanded ransom ere he would release him. In vain did Loke endeavor to escape. He flapped his wings, he pecked with his beak, but the servant held his claws securely.

Silent was he before Geirrod, and no answer would he make when he was addressed. So to punish him the giant locked him in a chest, in which he was kept for three months. Then was Loke taken forth, and ready indeed was he to speak. To Geirrod he confessed who he was, and the giant constrained him to promise, by swearing a binding oath, that he would bring Thor to Jotun-heim and unto that strong castle without his hammer or his belt or his iron gloves. For greatly sought the giant to have the thunder-god in his power.

Loke then flew back to Asgard, and with great cunning he addressed Thor, so that he secured his consent to visit the castle of Geirrod without taking with him his hammer and gloves and his strong belt. For Loke assured Thor that the castle stood on a green and level plain, and that they were invited to attend together a feast of friends.

Thor set forth, and Loke went with him. All day they traveled on their way until they came to the borders of Elivagar in Alf-heim, where dwelt the sons of Ivalde.

There dwelt also in that realm and in the midst of a deep wood a giantess who was friendly towards the gods. Her name was Grid. She was the mother of Odin's son Vidar, the Silent One, whose strength was so mighty that none save Thor was his equal. A great shoe he had; its sole was hard as iron, for it was formed of the cast-off leather scraps of every shoe that was ever made. This son of Grid was born to avenge his father's death. When Odin is slain at Ragnarok, then shall Vidar combat with the wolf Fenrer and tear its jaws asunder. Nor shall Surtur destroy him with his firebrands, for the wood-god perishes never in Nature's deep solitudes.

Now Grid, mother of Vidar, had power to work magic spells, and she possessed a magic rowan wand which was named Gridarvold. When she beheld Thor going unarmed towards Geirrod's castle, she warned him that the giant was as cunning and treacherous as a wolf-dog, and dangerous to meet without weapons. So to Thor she gave her magic staff, her belt of strength, and her iron gloves, and when he set out he took with him the sons of Ivalde. Together they traveled in safety until they came to Vimur, which is the greatest of the rivers Elivagar. The clouds drove heavily above them, and hailstones fell around. Wild and mountainous was the country which Loke had said was green and level. There were swift and treacherous eddies in the swollen waters.

But Thor put on the belt of strength which Grid had given him, and in his hand he took her magic staff. Rapidly did the river rise as he entered it with his men. From the mountains icy torrents poured down with increasing strength, and the sons of Ivalde were soon in great peril. They thrust their spears into the shingle as they tried to ford the river, and the clinking of the steel mingled with the sharp screams of the waters. When they were but halfway across a high wave burst out from a great mountain torrent, and the waters rose to Thor's shoulder. The others were swept down towards him; for, perceiving their peril and desiring to be a protection to them, he had chosen the deepest part through which to wade. Orvandel leapt upon Thor's shoulder, and there stood, bending his bow. Loke and the others clung to the belt of Grid, which was about Thor's body. Towards the bank the thunder-god labored, and when he came nigh to it he beheld, at the torrent's source a daughter of Geirrod, whose name was Gjalp. It was she who, standing high on the hillside, caused the river to increase so that Thor and his followers might be drowned. The angry god seized a boulder and flung it towards her. Sure was his aim, for it struck her heavily, so that her back was broken. Thus was the Hag overcome and the torrent stayed.

Then did Thor seize a rowan-tree branch which overhung the river, and with its aid he pulled himself up the bank. Thus had its origin the ancient proverb, "Thor's salvation, the rowan."

Up the steep mountain did the thunder-god climb with all his men. Against them came the giants who sought to destroy Ygdrasil, "the World-tree." Bravely fought Thor, and the arrows of Orvandel sped fast until the horde of giants were put to flight. Speedily did the heroes follow them. They pressed onward and reached Geirrod's castle amidst the clamor and the howling of the storm-giants and the giants that dwell within the caves of the mountains.

When Thor entered Geirrod's hall the giant king cast at him a red-hot flaming javelin from behind a great pillar of wood. But with Grid's iron gloves Thor caught it, and past Orvandel's head he flung it back, so that it went through the pillar and through Geirrod, who was slain; and it passed through the wall of his castle ere it sank deep into the earth.

Then loudly thundered the din of battle in Geirrod's hall, which was shaken to its foundations. With slings and boulders did the giants contend, but from Thor and his men they received their deathblows.

Thus was Geirrod and his clan overcome in dread conflict.

FROM "GISLI THE OUTLAW"

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Dasent, George Webb. Gisli the Outlaw. Edinburgh: Edmonston and Douglas, 1866, 1-19.

Date: ca. 1200 C.E.

Original Source: Iceland

National Origin: Iceland

---

The action of this saga of revenge, the toll blood feuds take on those involved, and the helplessness of individuals in the face of fate, is set in mid-tenth century Iceland and Norway. Harold Fairhair reigned as the first King of Norway from 850–933 C.E. The Bearsarks were warriors who forsook armor to wear bear skins (bear sarks) in battle and fought with furious intensity. The following chapters set the fate of Gisli in motion with the curse laid on his uncle Gisli the Elder for the theft of a sword and the murder of its owner.

---

The Thrall's Curse

At the end of the days of Harold Fairhair there was a mighty lord in Norway whose name was Thorkel Goldhelm, and he dwelt in Surnadale in North Mæren. He had a wedded wife, and three sons by her. The name of the eldest was Ari, the second was called Gisli, and the third Thorbjorn. They were all young men of promise. There was a man too, named Isi, who ruled over the Fjardarfolk. His daughter's name was Ingibjorga, and she was the fairest of women. Ari, Thorkel's son, asked her to wife, and she was wedded to him. He got a great dower with her, and amongst the rest that she brought with her from her home was a man named Kol: he was of high degree, but he had been taken captive in war, and was called a Thrall. So he came with Ingibjorga to Surnadale. Thorkel gave over to his son Ari a rich farm up in the dale, and there he set up his abode, and was looked on as a most rising man.

But now our story goes on to tell of a man named Bjorn, nicknamed Bjorn the Black. He was a Bearsark, and much given to duels. Twelve men went at his heel, and besides he was skilled in the black art, and no steel could touch his skin. No wonder he was unbeloved by the people, for he turned aside as he listed into the houses of men, and took a way their wives and daughters, and kept them with him as long as he liked. All raised an outcry when he came, and all were fain when he went away. Well, as soon as this Bjorn heard that Ari had brought home a fair wife with a rich dower, he thought he would have a finger in that pie. So he turned his steps thither with his crew, and reached the house at eventide. As soon as Ari and Bjorn met, Bjorn told him that he wanted to play the master in that house, and that Ingibjorga, the housewife, should be at his beck and call whenever he chose. As for Ari, he said he might please himself, go away or stay, so he let Bjorn have his will. But Ari said he would not go away, nor would he let him play the master there.

"Very well!" says Bjorn, "thou shalt have another choice. I will challenge thee to fight on the island, if thou darest, three days from this, and then we will try whose Ingibjorga shall be; and he, too, shall take all the other's goods who wins the day. Now, mind, I will neither ransom myself with money, nor will I suffer any one else to ransom himself. One shall conquer and the other die."

Ari said he was willing enough to fight; so the Bearsarks went their way and busked them to battle. To make a long story short, they met on the island, and the end of their struggle was, that Ari fell; but the Bearsark was not wounded, for no steel would touch him.

Now Bjorn thought he had won wife, and land, and goods, and he gave out that he meant to go at even to Ari's house to claim his own. Then Gisli, Ari's brother, answered and said, "It will soon be all over with me and mine if this disgrace comes to pass, that this ruffian tramples us under foot. But this shall never be, for I will challenge thee at once to battle tomorrow morning. I would far rather fall on the island than bear this shame."

"Well and good," says Bjorn; "thou and thy kith and kin shall all fall one after the other, if ye dare to fight with me."

After that they parted, and Gisli went home to the house that Ari had owned. Now the tidings were told of what had happened on the island, and of Ari's death, and all thought that a great blow to the house. But Gisli goes to Ingibjorga, and tells her of Ari's fall, and how he had challenged Bjorn to the island, and how they were to fight the very next morning.

"That is a bootless undertaking," said Ingibjorga, "and I fear it will not turn out well for thee, unless thou hast other help to lean on."

"Ah!" said Gisli, "then I beg that thou and all else who are likeliest to yield help will do their best that victory may seem more hopeful than it now looks."

"Know this," says Ingibjorga, "that I was not so very fond of Ari that I would not rather have had thee. There is a man," She said, "who, methinks, is likeliest to be able to help in this matter, so that it may be well with thee."

"Who is that?" asks Gisli.

"It is Kol, my foster-father," was the answer; "for I ween he has a sword that is said to be better than most others, though he seems to set little store by it, for he calls it his 'Chopper'; but whoever wields that sword wins the day."

So they sent for Kol, and he came to meet Gisli and Ingibjorga.

"Hast thou ever a good sword?" asked Gisli.

"My sword is no great treasure," answers Kol; "but yet there are many things in the churl's cot which are not in the king grange."

"Wilt thou not lend me the sword for my duel with Bjorn?" said Gisli.

"Ah!" said Kol, "then will happen what ever happens with those things that are treasures—you will never wish to give it up. But for all that, I tell thee now that this sword will bite whatever its blow falls on, be it iron or aught else; nor can its edge be deadened by spells, for it was forged by the Dwarves, and its name is 'Graysteel.' And now make up thy mind that I shall take it very ill if I do not get the sword back. when I claim it."

“It were most unfair,” says Gisli, “that thou shouldst not get back the sword after I have had the use of it in my need.”

Now Gisli takes the sword, and the night glides away, Next morn, ere they went from home to the duel, Thorbjorn called out to Gisli his brother, and said, “Which of us twain now shall fight with the Bearsark today, and which of us shall slaughter the calf?”

“My counsel,” said Gisli, “is, that thou shalt slaughter the calf while I and Bjorn try our strength.” He did not choose the easiest task.

So they set off to the island, and Gisli and Bjorn stood face to face on it. Then Gisli bade Bjorn strike the first blow. “No one has ever made me that offer before,” said Bjorn; “indeed no one has ever challenged me before this day save thou.” So Bjorn made a blow at Gisli, but Gisli threw his shield before him, and the sword hewed off from the shield all that it smote from below the handle. Then Gisli smote at Bjorn in his turn, and the stroke fell on the tail of the shield and shore it right off, and then passed on and struck off his leg below the knee. One other stroke he dealt him and took off his head. Then he and his men turned on Bjorn’s followers, and some are slain and some chased away into the woods.

After that Gisli goes home and got good fame for this feat, and then he took the farm as his heritage after Ari his brother; and he got Ingibjorga also to wife, for he would not let a good woman go out of the family. And time rolls on, but he did not give up the good sword, nor had Kol ever asked for it.

One day they two met out of doors, and Gisli had “Graysteel” in his hand, and Kol had an axe. Kol asked whether he thought the sword had stood him in good stead, and Gisli was full of its praises. “Well now” said Kol, “I should like to have it back if thou thinkest it has done thee good service in thy need.”

“Wilt thou sell it?” says Gisli.

“No,” says Kol.

“I will give thee thy freedom and goods, so that thou mayest fare whither thou wilt with other men.”

“I will not sell it,” says Kol.

“Then I will give thee thy freedom, and lease or give thee land, and besides I will give thee sheep and cattle and goods as much as thou needest.”

“I will not sell it a whit more for that,” says Kol.

“Indeed,” says Gisli, “thou art too willful to cling to it thus. Put thine own price on it—any sum thou chooseth in money—and be sure I will not stand at trifles if thou wilt come to terms in some way. Besides, I will give thee thy freedom and a becoming match if thou hast any liking for any one.”

“There is no use talking about it,” says Kol; “I will not sell it whatsoever thou offerest. But now it just comes to what I feared at first, when I said it was not sure whether thou wouldest be ready to give the sword up if thou knewest what virtue was in it.”

"And I too"; says Gisli, "will say what will happen. Good will befall neither of us, for I have not the heart to give up the sword, and it shall never come into any other man's hand than mine if I may have my will."

Then Kol lifts up his axe, while Gisli brandished "Graysteel" and each smote at the other. Kol's blow fell on Gisli's head, so that it sank into the brain, but the sword fell on Kol's head, and did not bite; but still the blow was so stoutly dealt that the skull was shattered and the sword broke asunder. Then Kol said, "It had been better now that I had got back my sword when I asked for it; and yet this is but the beginning of the ill-luck which it will bring on thy kith and kin." Thus both of them lost their lives.

Kolbein's Killing

Now after that Ingibjorga longed to get away from Surnadale, and went home to her father with her goods. As for Thorbjorn, he looked about for a wife, and went east across the Keel to Fressey, and wooed a woman named Iserda, and got her. After that he went back home to Surnadale and set up housekeeping with his father. Thorkel Goldhelm lived but a little while afterwards ere he fell sick and died, and Thorbjorn took all the heritage after his father. He was afterwards called Thorbjorn Soursop, and he dwelt at Stock in Surnadale. He and Iserda had children. Their eldest son was Thorkel, the second Gisli, and the third Ari, but he was sent at once to be fostered at Fressey, and he is little heard of in this story. Their daughter's name was Thordisa. She was their eldest child. Thorkel was a tall man and fair of face, of huge strength, and the greatest dandy. Gisli was swarthy of hue, and as tall as the tallest: 'twas hard to tell how strong he was. He was a man who could turn his hand to anything, and was ever at work—mild of temper too. Their sister Thordisa was a fair woman to look on, high-minded, and rather hard of heart. She was a dashing, forward woman.

At that time there were two young men in Surnadale, whose names were Bard and Kolbein. They were both well-to-do, and though they were not akin, they had each a little before lost their father on a cruise to England. Hella was the name of Bard's house, and Granskeid was where Kolbein dwelt. They were much about the same age as Thorbjorn's sons, and they were all full of mirth and frolic. This was just about the time when Hacon Athelstane's foster-child was King of Norway.

Well, we must go on to say that this Kolbein, of whom we have spoken, grew very fond of coming to Thorbjorn's house, and when there thought it best sport of all to talk with Thordisa. Before long other folk began to talk about this; and so much was said about it that it came to her father's ears, and he thought he saw it all as clear as day. Then Thorbjorn spoke to his sons, and bade them find a cure for this. Gisli said it was easy enough to cure things in which there was no harm.

"If we are to speak, don't say things which seem as though you wanted to pick a quarrel."

“I see,” said Thorbjorn, “that this has got wind far too widely, and that it will be out of our power to smother it. Nevertheless, too, it seems much more likely that thou and thy brother are cravens, with little or no feeling of honor.”

Gisli went on to say, “Don’t fret thyself, father, about his coming. I will speak to him to stop his visits hither.”

“Ah!” cried out Thorbjorn, “thou art likelier to go and beg and pray him not to come hither, and be so eager as even to thank him for so doing, and to show thyself a dastard in every way, and after all to do nothing if he does not listen to thy words!”

Now Gisli goes away, and he and his father stayed their talk; but the very next time that Kolbein came thither, Gisli went with him on his way home when he left, and spoke to him, and says he will not suffer him to come thither any longer; “for my father frets himself about thy visits: for folks say that thou beguilest my sister Thordisa, and that is not at all to my father’s mind. As for me, I will do all I can, if thou dost as I wish, to bring mirth and sport into thy house.”

“What’s the good?”; said Kolbein, “of talking of things which thou knowest can never be? I know not whether is more irksome to me, thy father’s fretfulness, or the thought of giving way to his wish. ‘Verily the words of the weak are little worth’.”

“That is not the way to take it,” answers Gisli. “The end of this will be, that at last when it comes to the push I will set most store by my father’s will. Me thought now it was worth trying whether thou wouldest do this for my word’s sake; then thou mightest have asked as much from me another time; but I am afraid that we shall not like it, if thou art bent on being cross-grained.”

To that Kolbein said little, and so they parted. Then Gisli went home, and so things rested for a while, and Kolbein’s visits were somewhat fewer and farther between than they had been. At last he thinks it dull at home, and goes oftener to Thorbjorn’s house. So one day when he had come thither Gisli sat in the hall and smithied, and his father and his brother and sister were there too. Thorkel was the cheeriest towards Kolbein; and these three—Thorkel, and Thordisa, and Kolbein—all sat on the cross-bench. But when the day was far spent, and evening fell, they rose up and went out. Thorbjorn and Gisli were left behind in the hall, and Thorbjorn began to say, “Thy begging and praying has not been worth much; for both thy undertaking was girlish, and indeed I can scarce say whether I am to reckon thee and thy brother as my sons or my daughters. ‘Tis hard to learn, when one is old, that one has sons who have no more manly thoughts than women had in olden times, and ye two are utterly unlike my brothers Gisli and Ari.”

“Thou hast no need,” answered Gisli, “to take it so much to heart; for no one can say how a man will behave till he is tried.”

With this Gisli could not bear to listen longer to his father’s gibes, and went out. Just then Thorkel and Kolbein were going out at the gate, and Thordisa had turned back for the hall. Gisli went out after them, and so they all walked along together. Again Gisli besought Kolbein to cease his visits, but Kolbein said he weened that no good would come of that. Then Gisli said, "So you set small store by my words, and now we shall lay down our companionship in a worse way than I thought."

"I don't see how I can help that," said Kolbein.

"Why," said Gisli, "one of two things must happen: either that thou settest some store by my words, or if thou dost not, then I will forsake all the friendship that has been between us."

"Thou must settle that as thou pleasest," says Kolbein; "but for all that I cannot find it in my heart to break off my visits."

At that Gisli drew his sword and smote at him, and that one stroke was more than enough for Kolbein.

Thorkel was very vexed at the deed, but Gisli bade his brother be soothed. "Let us change swords," he said; "and take thou that with the keenest edge." This he said, mocking; but Thorkel was soothed, and sate down by Kolbein.

Then Gisli went home to his father's hall, and Thorbjorn asked, "Well, how has thy begging and praying sped?"

"Well," says Gisli, "I think I may say that it has well sped; because we settled ere we parted just now that Kolbein should cease his visits, that they might not anger thee."

"That can only be," said Thorbjorn, "if he be dead."

"Then be all the better pleased," says Gisli, "that thy will hath been done in this matter."

"Good luck to thy hand," said Thorbjorn. "Maybe after all that I have not daughters alone to my children."

The Burning of the Old House

As for Thorkel, who had been Kolbein's greatest friend, he could not bear to be at home, nor would he change swords with Gisli, but went his way to a man called Dueling Skeggi, in the isle of Saxa. He was near akin to Kolbein, and in his house Thorkel stayed. In a little while Thorkel egged Skeggi on to avenge his kinsman, and at the same time to woo his sister Thordisa. So they went to Stock—for that was the name of Thorbjorn's farm—twenty of them together; and when they came to the house, Skeggi began to talk of King Thorbjorn's son-in-law, and of having Thordisa to wife. But Thorbjorn would not hear of the match. The story went that Bard, Kolbein's friend, had settled it all with Thordisa; and, at any rate, Skeggi made up his mind that Bard was to blame for the loss of the match. So he set off to find Bard, and challenged him to fight on the isle of Saxa. Bard said he would be sure to come; he was not worthy to have Thordisa if he did not dare to fight for her with Skeggi. So Thorkel and Skeggi set out for Saxa with twenty-one men in all, and waited for the day fixed for the duel. But when three nights had come and gone, Gisli went to find Bard, and asks whether he were ready for the combat. Bard says, Yes; and asked whether, if he fought, he should have the match.

“Twill be time to talk of that afterwards,” says Gisli.

“Well,” says Bard, “methinks I had better not fight with Skeggi.”

“Out on thee for a dastard!” says Gisli; “but though thou broughtest us all to shame, still for all that I will go myself.”

Now Gisli goes to the isle with eleven men. Meantime Skeggi had come to the isle and staked out the lists for Bard, and laid down the law of the combat, and after all saw neither him nor any one to fight on the isle in his stead. There was a man named Fox, who was Skeggi’s Smith; and Skeggi bade Fox to carve likenesses of Gisli and Bard, “And see,” he said, “that one stands just behind the back of the other, and this laughingstock shall stand for aye to put them to shame.”

These words Gisli heard in the wood, and called out, “Thy house-carles shall have other handier work to do. Here behold a man who dares to do battle with thee!”

Then they stepped on the isle and fought, and each bore his own shield before him. Skeggi had a sword called “Warflame,” and with it he smote at Gisli till the blade sang again, and Skeggi chanted:

Warflame fierce flickered,
Flaring on Saxa.

But Gisli smote back at him with his battle-axe, and took off the tail of his shield, and Skeggi’s leg along with it; and as he smote he chanted:

Grimly grinned Ogremaw,
Gaping at Skeggi.

As for Skeggi, he ransomed himself from the island, and went ever after on a wooden leg. But Thorkel went home with his brother Gisli, and now their friendship was pretty good, and Gisli was thought to have grown a great man by these dealings.

That same winter Einar and Sigurd, the sons of Skeggi, set off from their house at Flydroness, with nigh forty men, and marched till they came in the night to Surnadale. They went first to Bard’s house at Hella, and seized all the doors. Two choices were given him: the first, that he should lose his life; the other, that he should go with them against Thorbjorn and his sons. Bard said there were no ties between him and Thorbjorn and his sons. “I set most store on my life,” he says; “as for the other choice, I think nothing of doing it.”

So he set out with them, and ten men followed him. They were then in all fifty men. They come unawares on Thorbjorn’s house at Stock. His men were so arranged that some of them were in the hall and some in the store-room. This store-room Gisli had built some years before, and made it in such wise that every plank had been cut asunder, and a loose panel left in the middle, and on the outside they were all fitted together, while within they were held by iron bolts and bars, and yet on the outside the planks looked as if they were all one piece. The weather that night was in this wise: the air was thick, and the wind sharp; and the blast stood right on to the store-room. Einar and Sigurd heaped a pile of wood both before the hall and the store-room, and set fire to them. But when those in the store-room were ware of this, they threw open the outer door. By the entry stood two large pails or casks of whey, and they took the whey in goat-skins and threw it on the fire, and quenched it thrice. But the foe made the pile up again a little way from the door on either side, and then the fire soon began to catch the beams of the house.

The heads of the household were all in that store-room—Thorbjorn, and Thorkel, and Gisli, and Isgerda, and Thordisa. Then Gisli stole away from the doorway to the gable-end, and pushed back the bolts, and thrust out a plank. After that he passed out there, and all the others after him. No men were on the watch there, for they were all guarding the door to see that none came out; but no man was ware of what was happening. Gisli and his kindred followed the smoke away from the house, and so got to the woods, and when they got so far they, turned and looked back, and saw that the hall and the whole homestead were ablaze. Then Gisli chaunted—

Flames flare fierce o'er roof and rafter,
 High the hubbub, loud the laughter;
 Hist with croak, and bark with howl,
 Ravens flit and gray wolves prowl:
 Father mine, for lesser matter
 Erst I fleshed my maiden steel
 Hear me swear amid this clatter,
 Soon our foes my sword shall feel.

Now these are there in the waste, but their house burns to cold ashes. Those brothers, Einar and Sigurd, never left the spot till they made up their minds that Thorbjorn and his sons, and all his household, had been burnt inside. They were thirty souls who were burnt inside the hall. So wherever those brothers went they told this story, that Thorbjorn was dead and all his household. But Gisli and his kindred never showed themselves till the others were well away.

Then they got force together by stealth, and afterwards they fare by night to Bard's house, and set fire to the homestead, and burnt it up, and the men who were inside it. When they had done that deed, they went back and set about rebuilding their house. All at once Gisli took himself off, and no man knew what had become of him; but when spring came he came with it.

Then they set to work and sold their lands secretly, but their goods and chattels they carried off. Now it was plain that Thorbjorn and his sons meant to change their abode and leave Norway; and that was why Gisli had gone away, that he might be busy building their ship. And all this was done so silently that few knew they had broken up their household before they had gone on ship-board, thirty men told, besides women. After that they hold on their course for the sea, and lay to in a haven under the lee of an island, and meant to wait there for a fair wind.

One day when the weather was good Gisli and his brother got into their boats. Ten men stayed behind with their ship, and ten got into each of the boats; but Thorbjorn stayed by the ship. Gisli and his brother row north along the land, and steer for Flydroness; for Gisli says he wishes to look those brothers up ere he leaves Norway for good and all. But when they got to Flydroness they hear that Einar and Sigurd had gone from home to gather King Hacon's dues. So Gisli and his men turned after them, and lay in wait for them in the path which they knew they must take. Those brothers were fifteen in all, and so they met, and there was a hard light. The end of it was that Einar and Sigurd fell, and all their followers. Gisli slew five men and Thorkel three. When the fight was over, Gisli says he has got an errand to do up at the farm. And Gisli went up to the farm, and into the hall, and sees where Skeggi lies, and comes on him, and hews off his head. They sacked the house, and behaved as much like enemies as they could, and took all they could carry with them. After that they row to their ships, and landed on the island, and made a great sacrifice, and vowed vows for a fair wind, and the wind comes. So they put to sea, and have Iceland in their mind's eye.

SAMI

---

HOW SOME WILD ANIMALS BECAME TAME ONES

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Lang, Andrew. The Brown Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1904, 197–201.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Poestion, J. C. Lappländische Märchen.

National Origin: Sami

---

The Sami are the indigenous cultures of the Nordic region of Finland, Norway, Russia, and Sweden. Historically, the Sami subsisted by fishing, trapping, hunting, and herding. They have been particularly associated with reindeer herding. Shamanism continues to play a role in the Sami belief system, and references to shamans (usually labeled “wise men” or “wise women”) abound in their oral tradition. Sami lifestyle and belief shares common traits with other circumpolar culture areas such as Siberia and native North America. Although the following animal tale describes the transition from feral to domestic of animal species that are central to Sami culture, the narrative functions more as a fable that warns against ignoring good advice rather than as a myth of origin.

---

Once upon a time there lived a miller who was so rich that, when he was going to be married, he asked to the feast not only his own friends but also the wild animals who dwelt in the hills and woods round about. The chief of the bears, the wolves, the foxes, the horses, the cows, the goats, the sheep, and the reindeer, all received invitations; and as they were not accustomed to weddings they were greatly pleased and flattered, and sent back messages in the politest language that they would certainly be there.

The first to start on the morning of the wedding-day was the bear, who always liked to be punctual; and, besides, he had a long way to go, and his hair, being so thick and rough, needed a good brushing before it was fit to be seen at a party. However, he took care to awaken very early, and set off down the road with a light heart. Before he had walked very far he met a boy who came whistling along, hitting at the tops of the flowers with a stick.

“Where are you going?” said he, looking at the bear in surprise, for he was an old acquaintance, and not generally so smart.

“Oh, just to the miller’s marriage,” answered the bear carelessly. “Of course, I would much rather stay at home, but the miller was so anxious I should be there that I really could not refuse.”

“Don’t go, don’t go!” cried the boy. “If you do you will never come back! You have got the most beautiful skin in the world—just the kind that everyone is wanting, and they will be sure to kill you and strip you of it.”

“I had not thought of that,” said the bear, whose face turned white, only nobody could see it. “If you are certain that they would be so wicked—but perhaps you are jealous because nobody has invited you?”

“Oh, nonsense!” replied the boy angrily, “do as you see. It is your skin, and not mine; I don’t care what becomes of it!” And he walked quickly on with his head in the air.

The bear waited until he was out of sight, and then followed him slowly, for he felt in his heart that the boy’s advice was good, though he was too proud to say so.

The boy soon grew tired of walking along the road, and turned off into the woods, where there were bushes he could jump and streams he could wade; but he had not gone far before he met the wolf.

“Where are you going?” asked he, for it was not the first time he had seen him.

“Oh, just to the miller’s marriage,” answered the wolf, as the bear had done before him. “It is rather tiresome, of course—weddings are always so stupid; but still one must be good-natured!”

“Don’t go!” said the boy again. “Your skin is so thick and warm, and winter is not far off now. They will kill you, and strip it from you.”

The wolf’s jaw dropped in astonishment and terror. “Do you really think that would happen?” he gasped.

“Yes, to be sure, I do,” answered the boy. “But it is your affair, not mine. So good-morning,” and on he went. The wolf stood still for a few minutes, for he was trembling all over, and then crept quietly back to his cave.

Next the boy met the fox, whose lovely coat of silvery grey was shining in the sun.

“You look very fine!” said the boy, stopping to admire him, “are you going to the miller’s wedding too?”

“Yes,” answered the fox; “it is a long journey to take for such a thing as that, but you know what the miller’s friends are like—so dull and heavy! It is only kind to go and amuse them a little.”

“You poor fellow,” said the boy pityingly. “Take my advice and stay at home. If you once enter the miller’s gate his dogs will tear you in pieces.”

“Ah, well, such things have occurred, I know,” replied the fox gravely. And without saying any more he trotted off the way he had come.

His tail had scarcely disappeared, when a great noise of crashing branches was heard, and up bounded the horse, his black skin glistening like satin.

“Good-morning,” he called to the boy as he galloped past, “I can’t wait to talk to you now. I have promised the miller to be present at his wedding-feast, and they won’t sit down till I come.”

“Stop! stop!” cried the boy after him, and there was something in his voice that made the horse pull up. “What is the matter?” asked he.

“You don’t know what you are doing,” said the boy. “If once you go there you will never gallop through these woods any more. You are stronger than many men, but they will catch you and put ropes round you, and you will have to work and to serve them all the days of your life.”

The horse threw back his head at these words, and laughed scornfully.

“Yes, I am stronger than many men,” answered he, “and all the ropes in the world would not hold me. Let them bind me as fast as they will, I can always break loose, and return to the forest and freedom.”

And with this proud speech he gave a whisk of his long tail, and galloped away faster than before.

But when he reached the miller’s house everything happened as the boy had said. While he was looking at the guests and thinking how much handsomer and stronger he was than any of them, a rope was suddenly flung over his head, and he was thrown down and a bit thrust between his teeth. Then, in spite of his struggles, he was dragged to a stable, and shut up for several days without any food, till his spirit was broken and his coat had lost its gloss. After that he was harnessed to a plough, and had plenty of time to remember all he had lost through not listening to the counsel of the boy.

When the horse had turned a deaf ear to his words the boy wandered idly along, sometimes gathering wild strawberries from a bank, and sometimes plucking wild cherries from a tree, till he reached a clearing in the middle of the forest. Crossing this open space was a beautiful milk-white cow with a wreath of flowers round her neck.

“Good-morning,” she said pleasantly, as she came up to the place where the boy was standing.

“Good-morning,” he returned. “Where are you going in such a hurry?”

“To the miller’s wedding; I am rather late already, for the wreath took such a long time to make, so I can’t stop.”

“Don’t go,” said the boy earnestly; “when once they have tasted your milk they will never let you leave them, and you will have to serve them all the days of your life.”

“Oh, nonsense; what do you know about it?” answered the cow, who always thought she was wiser than other people. “Why, I can run twice as fast as any of them! I should like to see anybody try to keep me against my will.” And, without even a polite bow, she went on her way, feeling very much offended.

But everything turned out just as the boy had said. The company had all heard of the fame of the cow’s milk, and persuaded her to give them some, and then her doom was sealed. A crowd gathered round her, and held her horns so that she could not use them, and, like the horse, she was shut in the stable, and only let out in the mornings, when a long rope was tied round her head, and she was fastened to a stake in a grassy meadow.

And so it happened to the goat and to the sheep.

Last of all came the reindeer, looking as he always did, as if some serious business was on hand.

“Where are you going?” asked the boy, who by this time was tired of wild cherries, and was thinking of his dinner.

“I am invited to the wedding,” answered the reindeer, “and the miller has begged me on no account to fail him.”

“O fool!” cried the boy, “have you no sense at all? Don’t you know that when you get there they will hold you fast, for neither beast nor bird is as strong or as swift as you?”

“That is exactly why I am quite safe,” replied the reindeer. “I am so strong that no one can bind me, and so swift that not even an arrow can catch me. So, good-bye for the present, you will soon see me back.”

But none of the animals that went to the miller’s wedding ever came back. And because they were self-willed and conceited, and would not listen to good advice, they and their children have been the servants of men to this very day.

HOW THE STALOS WERE TRICKED

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Lang, Andrew. The Orange Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1904, 319–328.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Poestion, J. C. Lappländische Märchen.

National Origin: Sami

---

The Stalo (or Staaloo) is a massive anthropomorphic being who always carries with it a bag of silver and a knife. The Staaloo is accompanied by a dog. Tales often depict the Staaloo challenging humans to a duel, but losing because of its stupidity. In most tales involving this antagonist, human tricksters repeatedly take advantage of the Staaloo’s dull wits. In some tales, the Stalo takes a human wife. The cannibalism mentioned in the following tale is not a necessary attribute of the ogre, however.

---

“Mother, I have seen such a wonderful man,” said a little boy one day, as he entered a hut in Lapland, bearing in his arms the bundle of sticks he had been sent out to gather.

“Have you, my son; and what was he like?” asked the mother, as she took off the child’s sheepskin coat and shook it on the doorstep.

“Well, I was tired of stooping for the sticks, and was leaning against a tree to rest, when I heard a noise of ‘sh-’sh, among the dead leaves. I thought perhaps it was a wolf, so I stood very still. But soon there came past a tall man—oh! twice as tall as father—with a long red beard and a red tunic fastened with a silver girdle, from which hung a silver-handled knife. Behind him followed a great dog, which looked stronger than any wolf, or even a bear. But why are you so pale, mother?”

“It was the Stalo,” replied she, her voice trembling; “Stalo the man-eater! You did well to hide, or you might never had come back. But, remember that, though he is so tall and strong, he is very stupid, and many a Lapp has escaped from his clutches by playing him some clever trick.”

Not long after the mother and son had held this talk, it began to be whispered in the forest that the children of an old man called Patto had vanished one by one, no one knew whither. The unhappy father searched the country for miles round without being able to find as much as a shoe or a handkerchief, to show him where they had passed, but at length a little boy came with news that he had seen the Stalo hiding behind a well, near which the children used to play. The boy had waited behind a clump of bushes to see what would happen, and by-and-by he noticed that the Stalo had laid a cunning trap in the path to the well, and that anybody who fell over it would roll into the water and drown there.

And, as he watched, Patto’s youngest daughter ran gaily down the path, till her foot caught in the strings that were stretched across the steepest place. She slipped and fell, and in another instant had rolled into the water within reach of the Stalo.

As soon as Patto heard this tale his heart was filled with rage, and he vowed to have his revenge. So he straightway took an old fur coat from the hook where it hung, and putting it on went out into the forest. When he reached the path that led to the well he looked hastily round to be sure that no one was watching him, then laid himself down as if he had been caught in the snare and had rolled into the well, though he took care to keep his head out of the water. Very soon he heard a ‘sh-’sh of the leaves, and there was the Stalo pushing his way through the undergrowth to see what chance he had of a dinner. At the first glimpse of Patto’s head in the well he laughed loudly, crying, “Ha! ha! This time it is the old ass! I wonder how he will taste?" And drawing Patto out of the well, he flung him across his shoulders and carried him home. Then he tied a cord round him and hung him over the fire to roast, while he finished a box that he was making before the door of the hut, which he meant to hold Patto's flesh when it was cooked. In a very short time the box was so nearly done that it only wanted a little more chipping out with an axe; but this part of the work was easier accomplished indoors, and he called to one of his sons who were lounging inside to bring him the tool.

The young man looked everywhere, but he could not find the axe, for the very good reason that Patto had managed to pick it up and hide it in his clothes.

"Stupid fellow! What is the use of you?" grumbled his father angrily; and he bade first one and then another of his sons to fetch him the tool, but they had no better success than their brother.

"I must come myself, I suppose!" said Stalo, putting aside the box. But, meanwhile, Patto had slipped from the hook and concealed himself behind the door, so that, as Stalo stepped in, his prisoner raised the axe, and with one blow the ogre's head was rolling on the ground. His sons were so frightened at the sight that they all ran away.

And in this manner Patto avenged his dead children.

But though Stalo was dead, his three sons were still living, and not very far off either. They had gone to their mother, who was tending some reindeer on the pastures, and told her that by some magic, they knew not what, their father's head had rolled from his body, and they had been so afraid that something dreadful would happen to them that they had come to take refuge with her. The ogress said nothing. Long ago she had found out how stupid her sons were, so she just sent them out to milk the reindeer, while she returned to the other house to bury her husband's body.

Now, three days' journey from the hut on the pastures two brothers Sodno dwelt in a small cottage with their sister Lyma, who tended a large herd of reindeer while they were out hunting. Of late it had been whispered from one to another that the three young Stalos were to be seen on the pastures, but the Sodno brothers did not disturb themselves, the danger seemed too far away.

Unluckily, however, one day, when Lyma was left by herself in the hut, the three Stalos came down and carried her and the reindeer off to their own cottage. The country was very lonely, and perhaps no one would have known in which direction she had gone had not the girl managed to tie a ball of thread to the handle of a door at the back of the cottage and let it trail behind her. Of course the ball was not long enough to go all the way, but it lay on the edge of a snowy track which led straight to the Stalos' house.

When the brothers returned from their hunting they found both the hut and the sheds empty. Loudly they cried, "Lyma! Lyma!" But no voice answered them; and they fell to searching all about, lest perchance their sister might have dropped some clue to guide them. At length their eyes dropped on the thread which lay on the snow, and they set out to follow it.

On and on they went, and when at length the thread stopped the brothers knew that another day's journey would bring them to the Stalos' dwelling. Of course they did not dare to approach it openly, for the Stalos had the strength of giants, and besides, there were three of them; so the two Sodnos climbed into a big bushy tree which overhung a well.

"Perhaps our sister may be sent to draw water here," they said to each other.

But it was not till the moon had risen that the sister came, and as she let down her bucket into the well, the leaves seemed to whisper, "Lyma! Lyma!"

The girl started and looked up, but could see nothing, and in a moment the voice came again.

"Be careful—take no notice, fill your buckets, but listen carefully all the while, and we will tell you what to do so that you may escape yourself and set free the reindeer also." So Lyma bent over the well lower than before, and seemed busier than ever.

"You know," said her brother, "that when a Stalo finds that anything has been dropped into his food he will not eat a morsel, but throws it to his dogs. Now, after the pot has been hanging some time over the fire, and the broth is nearly cooked, just rake up the log of wood so that some of the ashes fly into the pot. The Stalo will soon notice this, and will call you to give all the food to the dogs; but, instead, you must bring it straight to us, as it is three days since we have eaten or drunk. That is all you need do for the present."

Then Lyma took up her buckets and carried them into the house, and did as her brothers had told her. They were so hungry that they ate the food up greedily without speaking, but when there was nothing left in the pot, the eldest one said, "Listen carefully to what I have to tell you. After the eldest Stalo has cooked and eaten a fresh supper, he will go to bed and sleep so soundly that not even a witch could wake him. You can hear him snoring a mile off, and then you must go into his room and pull off the iron mantle that covers him, and put it on the fire till it is almost red hot. When that is done, come to us and we will give you further directions."

"I will obey you in everything, dear brothers," answered Lyma; and so she did. It had happened that on this very evening the Stalos had driven in some of the reindeer from the pasture, and had tied them up to the wall of the house so that they might be handy to kill for next day's dinner. The two Sodnos had seen what they were doing, and where the beasts were secured; so, at midnight, when all was still, they crept down from their tree and seized the reindeer by the horns which were locked together. The animals were frightened, and began to neigh and kick, as if they were fighting together, and the noise became so great that even the eldest Stalo was awakened by it, and that was a thing which had never occurred before. Raising himself in his bed, he called to his youngest brother to go out and separate the reindeer or they would certainly kill themselves.

The young Stalo did as he was bid, and left the house; but no sooner was he out of the door than he was stabbed to the heart by one of the Sodnos, and fell without a groan. Then they went back to worry the reindeer, and the noise became as great as ever, and a second time the Stalo awoke.

“The boy does not seem to be able to part the beasts,” he cried to his second brother; “go and help him, or I shall never get to sleep.” So the brother went, and in an instant was struck dead as he left the house by the sword of the eldest Sodno. The Stalo waited in bed a little longer for things to get quiet, but as the clatter of the reindeer’s horns was as bad as ever, he rose angrily from his bed muttering to himself, “It is extraordinary that they cannot unlock themselves; but as no one else seems able to help them I suppose I must go and do it.”

Rubbing his eyes, he stood up on the floor and stretched his great arms and gave a yawn which shook the walls. The Sodnos heard it below, and posted themselves, one at the big door and one at the little door at the back, for they did not know what their enemy would come out at. The Stalo put out his hand to take his iron mantle from the bed, where it always lay, but the mantle was not there. He wondered where it could be, and who could have moved it, and after searching through all the rooms, he found it hanging over the kitchen fire. But the first touch burnt him so badly that he let it alone, and went with nothing, except a stick in his hand, through the back door.

The young Sodno was standing ready for him, and as the Stalo passed the threshold struck him such a blow on the head that he rolled over with a crash and never stirred again. The two Sodnos did not trouble about him, but quickly stripped the younger Stalos of their clothes, in which they dressed themselves. Then they sat still till the dawn should break and they could find out from the Stalos’ mother where the treasure was hidden.

With the first rays of the sun the young Sodno went upstairs and entered the old woman’s room. She was already up and dressed, and sitting by the window knitting, and the young man crept in softly and crouched down on the floor, laying his head on her lap. For a while he kept silence, then he whispered gently:

“Tell me, dear mother, where did my eldest brother conceal his riches?”

“What a strange question! Surely you must know,” answered she.

“No, I have forgotten; my memory is so bad.”

“He dug a hole under the doorstep and placed it there,” said she. And there was another pause.

By-and-by the Sodno asked again, “And where may my second brother’s money be?”

“Don’t you know that either?” cried the mother in surprise.

“Oh, yes; I did once. But since I fell upon my head I can remember nothing.”

“It is behind the oven,” answered she. And again was silence.

“Mother, dear mother,” said the young man at last, “I am almost afraid to ask you; but I really have grown so stupid of late. Where did I hide my own money?”

But at this question the old woman flew into a passion, and vowed that if she could find a rod she would bring his memory back to him. Luckily, no rod was within her reach, and the Sodno managed, after a little, to coax her back into good humor, and at length she told him that the youngest Stalo had buried his treasure under the very place where she was sitting.

“Dear mother,” said Lyma, who had come in unseen, and was kneeling in front of the fire. “Dear mother, do you know who it is you have been talking with?”

The old woman started, but answered quietly, “It is a Sodno, I suppose?”

“You have guessed right,” replied Lyma.

The mother of the Stalos looked round for her iron cane, which she always used to kill her victims, but it was not there, for Lyma had put it in the fire.

“Where is my iron cane?” asked the old woman.

“There!” answered Lyma, pointing to the flames.

The old woman sprang forwards and seized it, but her clothes caught fire, and in a few minutes she was burned to ashes.

So the Sodno brothers found the treasure, and they carried it, and their sister and the reindeer, to their own home, and were the richest men in all Lapland.

ANDRAS BAIVE

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Lang, Andrew. The Orange Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1904, 329–334.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Poestion, J. C. Lappländische Märchen.

National Origin: Sami

---

Vadso, the setting of this narrative, is a city in northeast Norway. Among the Nordic peoples, the Sami have long had a reputation for the practice of magic. That ability comes to the fore in this tale. The bailiff's ability to change his appearance first into a Staalo, then river wreckage, and then a range of other phenomena reveals that he was a “wiseman” (the title commonly bestowed on shamans by the Sami). Andras, in turn, battles him with his own magic. “How the Stalos Were Tricked” (page 316) provides additional information on these supernatural beings.

---

Once upon a time there lived in Lapland a man, a bailiff, who was so very strong and swift of foot that nobody in his native town of Vadso could come near him if they were running races in the summer evenings. The people of Vadso were very proud of their champion, and thought that there was no one like him in the world, till, by-and-by, it came to their ears that there dwelt among the mountains a Lapp, Andras Baive by name, who was said by his friends to be even stronger and swifter than the bailiff. Of course not a creature in Vadso believed that, and declared that if it made the mountaineers happier to talk such nonsense, why, let them!

The winter was long and cold, and the thoughts of the villagers were much busier with wolves than with Andras Baive, when suddenly, on a frosty day, he made his appearance in the little town of Vadso. The bailiff was delighted at this chance of trying his strength, and at once went out to seek Andras and to coax him into giving proof of his vigor. As he walked along his eyes fell upon a big eight-oared boat that lay upon the shore, and his face shone with pleasure.

"That is the very thing," laughed he, "I will make him jump over that boat." Andras was quite ready to accept the challenge, and they soon settled the terms of the wager. He who could jump over the boat without so much as touching it with his heel was to be the winner, and would get a large sum of money as the prize. So, followed by many of the villagers, the two men walked down to the sea.

An old fisherman was chosen to stand near the boat to watch fair play, and to hold the stakes, and Andras, as the stranger was told to jump first. Going back to the flag which had been stuck into the sand to mark the starting place, he ran forward, with his head well thrown back, and cleared the boat with a mighty bound. The lookers-on cheered him, and indeed he well deserve it; but they waited anxiously all the same to see what the bailiff would do. On he came, taller than Andras by several inches, but heavier of build. He too sprang high and well, but as he came down his heel just grazed the edge of the boat. Dead silence reigned amidst the townsfolk, but Andras only laughed and said carelessly, "Just a little too short, bailiff; next time you must do better than that."

The bailiff turned red with anger at his rival's scornful words, and answered quickly, "Next time you will have something harder to do." And turning his back on his friends, he went sulkily home. Andras, putting the money he had earned in his pocket, went home also.

The following spring Andras happened to be driving his reindeer along a great fiord to the west of Vadso. A boy who had met him hastened to tell the bailiff that his enemy was only a few miles off; and the bailiff, disguising himself as a Stalo, or ogre, called his son and his dog and rowed away across the fiord to the place where the boy had met Andras.

Now the mountaineer was lazily walking along the sands, thinking of the new hut that he was building with the money that he had won on the day of his lucky jump. He wandered on, his eyes fixed on the sands, so that he did not see the bailiff drive his boat behind a rock, while he changed himself into a heap of wreckage which floated in on the waves. A stumble over a stone recalled Andras to himself, and looking up he beheld the mass of wreckage. "Dear me! I may find some use for that," he said; and hastened down to the sea, waiting till he could lay hold of some stray rope which might float towards him. Suddenly—he could not have told why—a nameless fear seized upon him, and he fled away from the shore as if for his life. As he ran he heard the sound of a pipe, such as only ogres of the Stalo kind were wont to use; and there flashed into his mind what the bailiff had said when they jumped the boat, "Next time you will have something harder to do." So it was no wreckage after all that he had seen, but the bailiff himself.

It happened that in the long summer nights up in the mountain, where the sun never set, and it was very difficult to get to sleep, Andras had spent many hours in the study of magic, and this stood him in good stead now. The instant he heard the Stalo music he wished himself to become the feet of a reindeer, and in this guise he galloped like the wind for several miles. Then he stopped to take breath and find out what his enemy was doing. Nothing he could see, but to his ears the notes of a pipe floated over the plain, and ever, as he listened, it drew nearer.

A cold shiver shook Andras, and this time he wished himself the feet of a reindeer calf. For when a reindeer calf has reached the age at which he begins first to lose his hair he is so swift that neither beast nor bird can come near him. A reindeer calf is the swiftest of all things living. Yes; but not so swift as a Stalo, as Andras found out when he stopped to rest, and heard the pipe playing!

For a moment his heart sank, and he gave himself up for dead, till he remembered that, not far off, were two little lakes joined together by a short though very broad river. In the middle of the river lay a stone that was always covered by water, except in dry seasons, and as the winter rains had been very heavy, he felt quite sure that not even the top of it could be seen. The next minute, if anyone had been looking that way, he would have beheld a small reindeer calf speeding northwards, and by-and-by giving a great spring, which landed him in the midst of the stream. But, instead of sinking to the bottom, he paused a second to steady himself, then gave a second spring which landed him on the further shore. He next ran on to a little hill where he saw down and began to neigh loudly, so that the Stalo might know exactly where he was.

"Ah! There you are," cried the Stalo, appearing on the opposite bank; "for a moment I really thought I had lost you."

"No such luck," answered Andras, shaking his head sorrowfully. By this time he had taken his own shape again.

"Well, but I don't see how I am to get to you!" said the Stalo, looking up and down.

"Jump over, as I did," answered Andras; "it is quite easy."

"But I could not jump this river; and I don't know how you did," replied the Stalo.

"I should be ashamed to say such things," exclaimed Andras. "Do you mean to tell me that a jump, which the weakest Lapp boy would make nothing of, is beyond your strength?"

The Stalo grew red and angry when he heard these words, just as Andras meant him to do. He bounded into the air and fell straight into the river. Not that that would have mattered, for he was a good swimmer; but Andras drew out the bow and arrows which every Lapp carries, and took aim at him. His aim was good, but the Stalo sprang so high into the air that the arrow flew between his feet. A second shot, directed at his forehead, fared no better, for this time the Stalo jumped so high to the other side that the arrow passed between his finger and thumb. Then Andras aimed his third arrow a little over the Stalo's head, and when he sprang up, just an instant too soon, it hit him between the ribs.

Mortally wounded as he was, the Stalo was not yet dead, and managed to swim to the shore. Stretching himself on the sand, he said slowly to Andras, "Promise that you will give me an honorable burial, and when my body is laid in the grave go in my boat across the fiord, and take whatever you find in my house which belongs to me. My dog you must kill, but spare my son, Andras."

Then he died; and Andras sailed in his boat away across the fiord and found the dog and boy. The dog, a fierce, wicked-looking creature, he slew with one blow from his fist, for it is well known that if a Stalo's dog licks the blood that flows from his dead master's wounds the Stalo comes to life again. That is why no REAL Stalo is ever seen without his dog; but the bailiff, being only half a Stalo, had forgotten him, when he went to the little lakes in search of Andras. Next, Andras put all the gold and jewels which he found in the boat into his pockets, and bidding the boy get in, pushed it off from the shore, leaving the little craft to drift as it would, while he himself ran home.

With the treasure he possessed he was able to buy a great herd of reindeer; and he soon married a rich wife, whose parents would not have him as a son-in-law when he was poor, and the two lived happy forever after.

SISTER OF THE SUN

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Lang, Andrew. The Brown Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1904, 215–232.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Poestion, J. C. Lappländische Märchen.

National Origin: Sami

---

In contrast to tales such as "How the Stalos Were Tricked" (page 316) or "Andras Baive" (page 321) that are highly contextualized in the Sami culture and physical environment, the following ordinary folktale cannot be characterized as unique to the group from which it was collected. Instead, there are familiar structural elements, such as the recurrence of similar episodes three times, and cross-culturally occurring tale types, such as “The Judge Appropriates the Object of Dispute” (AT 926D). While the fox does serve as a trickster in other Sami narratives (see, for example, “The Fox and the Lapp,” page 334), the fox or its relatives (for example, coyote) acts in a similar capacity in many traditions.

---

A long time ago there lived a young prince whose favorite playfellow was the son of the gardener who lived in the grounds of the palace. The king would have preferred his choosing a friend from the pages who were brought up at court; but the prince would have nothing to say to them, and as he was a spoilt child, and allowed his way in all things, and the gardener’s boy was quiet and well-behaved, he was suffered to be in the palace, morning, noon, and night.

The game the children loved the best was a match at archery, for the king had given them two bows exactly alike, and they would spend whole days in trying to see which could shoot the highest. This is always very dangerous, and it was a great wonder they did not put their eyes out; but somehow or other they managed to escape.

One morning, when the prince had done his lessons, he ran out to call his friend, and they both hurried off to the lawn which was their usual playground. They took their bows out of the little hut where their toys were kept, and began to see which could shoot the highest. At last they happened to let fly their arrows both together, and when they fell to earth again the tail feather of a golden hen was found sticking in one. Now the question began to arise whose was the lucky arrow, for they were both alike, and look as closely as you would you could see no difference between them. The prince declared that the arrow was his, and the gardener’s boy was quite sure it was HIS—and on this occasion he was perfectly right; but, as they could not decide the matter, they went straight to the king.

When the king had heard the story, he decided that the feather belonged to his son; but the other boy would not listen to this and claimed the feather for himself. At length the king’s patience gave way, and he said angrily, “Very well; if you are so sure that the feather is yours, yours it shall be; only you will have to seek till you find a golden hen with a feather missing from her tail. And if you fail to find her your head will be the forfeit.”

The boy had need of all his courage to listen silently to the king’s words. He had no idea where the golden hen might be, or even, if he discovered that, how he was to get to her. But there was nothing for it but to do the king’s bidding, and he felt that the sooner he left the palace the better. So he went home and put some food into a bag, and then set forth, hoping that some accident might show him which path to take.

After walking for several hours he met a fox, who seemed inclined to be friendly, and the boy was so glad to have anyone to talk to that he sat down and entered into conversation.

“Where are you going?” asked the fox.

“I have got to find a golden hen who has lost a feather out of her tail,” answered the boy; “but I don’t know where she lives or how I shall catch her!”

“Oh, I can show you the way!” said the fox, who was really very good-natured. “Far towards the east, in that direction, lives a beautiful maiden who is called ‘The Sister of the Sun.’ She has three golden hens in her house. Perhaps the feather belongs to one of them.”

The boy was delighted at this news, and they walked on all day together, the fox in front, and the boy behind. When evening came they lay down to sleep, and put the knapsack under their heads for a pillow.

Suddenly, about midnight, the fox gave a low whine, and drew nearer to his bedfellow. “Cousin,” he whispered very low, “there is someone coming who will take the knapsack away from me. Look over there!” And the boy, peeping through the bushes, saw a man.

“Oh, I don’t think he will rob us!” said the boy; and when the man drew near, he told them his story, which so much interested the stranger that he asked leave to travel with them, as he might be of some use. So when the sun rose they set out again, the fox in front as before, the man and boy following.

After some hours they reached the castle of the Sister of the Sun, who kept the golden hens among her treasures. They halted before the gate and took counsel as to which of them should go in and see the lady herself.

“I think it would be best for me to enter and steal the hens,” said the fox; but this did not please the boy at all.

“No, it is my business, so it is right that I should go,” answered he.

“You will find it a very difficult matter to get hold of the hens,” replied the fox.

“Oh, nothing is likely to happen to me,” returned the boy.

“Well, go then,” said the fox, “but be careful not to make any mistake. Steal only the hen which has the feather missing from her tail, and leave the others alone.”

The man listened, but did not interfere, and the boy entered the court of the palace. He soon spied the three hens strutting proudly about, though they were really anxiously wondering if there were not some grains lying on the ground that they might be glad to eat. And as the last one passed by him, he saw she had one feather missing from her tail.

At this sight the youth darted forward and seized the hen by the neck so that she could not struggle. Then, tucking her comfortably under his arm, he made straight for the gate. Unluckily, just as he was about to go through it he looked back and caught a glimpse of wonderful splendors from an open door of the palace. “After all, there is no hurry,” he said to himself; “I may as well see something now I AM here,” and turned back, forgetting all about the hen, which escaped from under his arm, and ran to join her sisters.

He was so much fascinated by the sight of all the beautiful things which peeped through the door that he scarcely noticed that he had lost the prize he had won; and he did not remember there was such a thing as a hen in the world when he beheld the Sister of the Sun sleeping on a bed before him.

For some time he stood staring; then he came to himself with a start, and feeling that he had no business there, softly stole away, and was fortunate enough to recapture the hen, which he took with him to the gate. On the threshold he stopped again. "Why should I not look at the Sister of the Sun?" he thought to himself; "she is asleep, and will never know." And he turned back for the second time and entered the chamber, while the hen wriggled herself free as before. When he had gazed his fill he went out into the courtyard and picked up his hen who was seeking for corn. As he drew near the gate he paused. "Why did I not give her a kiss?" he said to himself; "I shall never kiss any woman so beautiful." And he wrung his hands with regret, so that the hen fell to the ground and ran away.

"But I can do it still!" he cried with delight, and he rushed back to the chamber and kissed the sleeping maiden on the forehead. But, alas! When he came out again he found that the hen had grown so shy that she would not let him come near her. And, worse than that, her sisters began to cluck so loud that the Sister of the Sun was awakened by the noise. She jumped up in haste from her bed, and going to the door she said to the boy, "You shall never, never, have my hen till you bring me back my sister who was carried off by a giant to his castle, which is a long way off."

Slowly and sadly the youth left the palace and told his story to his friends, who were waiting outside the gate, how he had actually held the hen three times in his arms and had lost her.

"I knew that we should not get off so easily," said the fox, shaking his head; "but there is no more time to waste. Let us set off at once in search of the sister. Luckily, I know the way." They walked on for many days, till at length the fox, who, as usual, was going first, stopped suddenly.

"The giant's castle is not far now," he said, "but when we reach it you two must remain outside while I go and fetch the princess. Directly I bring her out you must both catch hold of her tight, and get away as fast as you can; while I return to the castle and talk to the giants—for there are many of them—so that they may not notice the escape of the princess."

A few minutes later they arrived at the castle, and the fox, who had often been there before, slipped in without difficulty. There were several giants, both young and old, in the hall, and they were all dancing round the princess. As soon as they saw the fox they cried out, "Come and dance too, old fox; it is a long time since we have seen you."

So the fox stood up, and did his steps with the best of them; but after a while he stopped and said, "I know a charming new dance that I should like to show you; but it can only be done by two people. If the princess will honor me for a few minutes, you will soon see how it is done."

“Ah, that is delightful; we want something new,” answered they, and placed the princess between the outstretched arms of the fox. In one instant he had knocked over the great stand of lights that lighted the hall, and in the darkness had borne the princess to the gate. His comrades seized hold of her, as they had been bidden, and the fox was back again in the hall before anyone had missed him. He found the giants busy trying to kindle a fire and get some light; but after a bit someone cried out, “Where is the princess?”

“Here, in my arms,” replied the fox. “Don’t be afraid; she is quite safe.” And he waited until he thought that his comrades had gained a good start, and put at least five or six mountains between themselves and the giants. Then he sprang through the door, calling, as he went, “The maiden is here; take her if you can!”

At these words the giants understood that their prize had escaped, and they ran after the fox as fast as their great legs could carry them, thinking that they should soon come up with the fox, who they supposed had the princess on his back. The fox, on his side, was far too clever to choose the same path that his friends had taken, but would in and out of the forest, till at last even HE was tired out, and fell fast asleep under a tree. Indeed, he was so exhausted with his day’s work that he never heard the approach of the giants, and their hands were already stretched out to seize his tail when his eyes opened, and with a tremendous bound he was once more beyond their reach. All the rest of the night the fox ran and ran; but when bright red spread over the east, he stopped and waited till the giants were close upon him. Then he turned, and said quietly, “Look, there is the Sister of the Sun!”

The giants raised their eyes all at once, and were instantly turned into pillars of stone. The fox then made each pillar a low bow, and set off to join his friends.

He knew a great many short cuts across the hills, so it was not long before he came up with them, and all four traveled night and day till they reached the castle of the Sister of the Sun. What joy and feasting there was throughout the palace at the sight of the princess whom they had mourned as dead! And they could not make enough of the boy who had gone through such dangers in order to rescue her. The golden hen was given to him at once, and, more than that, the Sister of the Sun told him that, in a little time, when he was a few years older, she would herself pay a visit to his home and become his wife. The boy could hardly believe his ears when he heard what was in store for him, for his was the most beautiful princess in all the world; and however thick the darkness might be, it fled away at once from the light of a star on her forehead.

So the boy set forth on his journey home, with his friends for company; his heart full of gladness when he thought of the promise of the princess. But, one by one, his comrades dropped off at the places where they had first met him, and he was quite alone when he reached his native town and the gates of the palace. With the golden hen under his arm he presented himself before the king, and told his adventures, and how he was going to have for a wife a princess so wonderful and unlike all other princesses, that the star on her forehead could turn night into day. The king listened silently, and when the boy had done, he said quietly, "If I find that your story is not true I will have you thrown into a cask of pitch."

"It is true—every word of it," answered the boy; and went on to tell that the day and even the hour were fixed when his bride was to come and seek him.

But as the time drew near, and nothing was heard of the princess, the youth became anxious and uneasy, especially when it came to his ears that the great cask was being filled with pitch, and that sticks were laid underneath to make a fire to boil it with. All day long the boy stood at the window, looking over the sea by which the princess must travel; but there were no signs of her, not even the tiniest white sail. And, as he stood, soldiers came and laid hands on him, and led him up to the cask, where a big fire was blazing, and the horrid black pitch boiling and bubbling over the sides. He looked and shuddered, but there was no escape; so he shut his eyes to avoid seeing.

The word was given for him to mount the steps which led to the top of the cask, when, suddenly, some men were seen running with all their might, crying as they went that a large ship with its sails spread was making straight for the city. No one knew what the ship was, or whence it came; but the king declared that he would not have the boy burned before its arrival, there would always be time enough for that.

At length the vessel was safe in port, and a whisper went through the watching crowd that on board was the Sister of the Sun, who had come to marry the young peasant as she had promised. In a few moments more she had landed, and desired to be shown the way to the cottage which her bridegroom had so often described to her; and whither he had been led back by the king's order at the first sign of the ship.

"Don't you know me?" asked the Sister of the Sun, bending over him where he lay, almost driven out of his senses with terror.

"No, no; I don't know you," answered the youth, without raising his eyes.

"Kiss me," said the Sister of the Sun; and the youth obeyed her, but still without looking up.

"Don't you know me NOW?" asked she.

"No, I don't know you—I don't know you," he replied, with the manner of a man whom fear had driven mad.

At this the Sister of the Sun grew rather frightened, and beginning at the beginning, she told him the story of his meeting with her, and how she had come a long way in order to marry him. And just as she had finished in walked the king, to see if what the boy had said was really true. But hardly had he opened the door of the cottage when he was almost blinded by the light that filled it; and he remembered what he had been told about the star on the forehead of the princess. He staggered back as if he had been struck, then a curious feeling took hold of him, which he had never felt before, and falling on his knees before the Sister of the Sun, he implored her to give up all thought of the peasant boy, and to share his throne. But she laughed, and said she had a finer throne of her own, if she wanted to sit on it, and that she was free to please herself, and would have no husband but the boy whom she would never have seen except for the king himself.

“I shall marry him tomorrow,” ended she; and ordered the preparations to be set on foot at once.

When the next day came, however, the bridegroom’s father informed the princess that, by the law of the land, the marriage must take place in the presence of the king; but he hoped his majesty would not long delay his arrival. An hour or two passed, and everyone was waiting and watching, when at last the sound of trumpets was heard and a grand procession was seen marching up the street. A chair covered with velvet had been made ready for the king, and he took his seat upon it, and, looking round upon the assembled company, he said, “I have no wish to forbid this marriage; but, before I can allow it to be celebrated, the bridegroom must prove himself worthy of such a bride by fulfilling three tasks. And the first is that in a single day he must cut down every tree in an entire forest.”

The youth stood aghast as the king’s words. He had never cut down a tree in his life, and had not the least idea how to begin. And as for a whole forest! But the princess saw what was passing in his mind, and whispered to him, “Don’t be afraid. In my ship you will find an axe, which you must carry off to the forest. When you have cut down one tree with it just say, ‘So let the forest fall,’ and in an instant all the trees will be on the ground. But pick up three chips of the tree you felled, and put them in your pocket.”

And the young man did exactly as he was bid, and soon returned with the three chips safe in his coat.

The following morning the princess declared that she had been thinking about the matter, and that, as she was not a subject of the king, she saw no reason why she should be bound by his laws; and she meant to be married that very day. But the bridegroom’s father told her that it was all very well for her to talk like that, but it was quite different for his son, who would pay with his head for any disobedience to the king’s commands. However, in consideration of what the youth had done the day before, he hoped his majesty’s heart might be softened, especially as he had sent a message that they might expect him at once. With this the bridal pair had to be content, and be as patient as they could till the king’s arrival.

He did not keep them long, but they saw by his face that nothing good awaited them. “The marriage cannot take place,” he said shortly, “till the youth has joined to their roots all the trees he cut down yesterday.”

This sounded much more difficult than what he had done before, and he turned in despair to the Sister of the Sun.

“It is all right,” she whispered encouragingly. “Take this water and sprinkle it on one of the fallen trees, and say to it, ‘So let all the trees of the forest stand upright,’ and in a moment they will be erect again.”

And the young man did what he was told, and left the forest looking exactly as it had done before.

Now, surely, thought the princess, there was no longer any need to put off the wedding; and she gave orders that all should be ready for the following day. But again the old man interfered, and declared that without the king’s permission no marriage could take place. For the third time his majesty was sent for, and for the third time he proclaimed that he could not give his consent until the bridegroom should have slain a serpent which dwelt in a broad river that flowed at the back of the castle. Everyone knew stories of this terrible serpent, though no one had actually seen it; but from time to time a child strayed from home and never came back, and then mothers would forbid the other children to go near the river, which had juicy fruits and lovely flowers growing along its banks.

So no wonder the youth trembled and turned pale when he heard what lay before him. “You will succeed in this also,” whispered the Sister of the Sun, pressing his hand, “for in my ship is a magic sword which will cut through everything. Go down to the river and unfasten a boat which lies moored there, and throw the chips into the water. When the serpent rears up its body you will cut off its three heads with one blow of your sword. Then take the tip of each tongue and go with it tomorrow morning into the king’s kitchen. If the king himself should enter, just say to him, ‘Here are three gifts I offer you in return for the services you demanded of me!’ and throw the tips of the serpent’s tongues at him, and hasten to the ship as fast as your legs will carry you. But be sure you take great care never to look behind you.”

The young man did exactly what the princess had told him. The three chips which he flung into the river became a boat, and, as he steered across the stream, the serpent put up its head and hissed loudly. The youth had his sword ready, and in another second the three heads were bobbing on the water. Guiding his boat till he was beside them, he stooped down and snipped off the ends of the tongues, and then rowed back to the other bank. Next morning he carried them into the royal kitchen, and when the king entered, as was his custom, to see what he was going to have for dinner, the bridegroom flung them in his face, saying, “Here is a gift for you in return for the services you asked of me.” And, opening the kitchen door, he fled to the ship. Unluckily he missed the way, and in his excitement ran backwards and forwards, without knowing whither he was going. At last, in despair, he looked round, and saw to his amazement that both the city and palace had vanished completely. Then he turned his eyes in the other direction, and, far, far away, he caught sight of the ship with her sails spread, and a fair wind behind her.

This dreadful spectacle seemed to take away his senses, and all day long he wandered about, without knowing where he was going, till, in the evening, he noticed some smoke from a little hut of turf near by. He went straight up to it and cried, "O mother, let me come in for pity's sake!" The old woman who lived in the hut beckoned to him to enter, and hardly was he inside when he cried again, "O mother, can you tell me anything of the Sister of the Sun?"

But the woman only shook her head. "No, I know nothing of her," said she.

The young man turned to leave the hut, but the old woman stopped him, and, giving him a letter, begged him to carry it to her next eldest sister, saying, "If you should get tired on the way, take out the letter and rustle the paper."

This advice surprised the young man a good deal, as he did not see how it could help him; but he did not answer, and went down the road without knowing where he was going. At length he grew so tired he could walk no more; then he remembered what the old woman had said. After he had rustled the leaves only once all fatigue disappeared, and he strode over the grass till he came to another little turf hut.

"Let me in, I pray you, dear mother," cried he. And the door opened in front of him. "Your sister has sent you this letter," he said, and added quickly, "O mother! can you tell me anything of the Sister of the Sun?"

"No, I know nothing of her," answered she. But as he turned hopelessly away, she stopped him.

"If you happen to pass my eldest sister's house, will you give her this letter?" said she. "And if you should get tired on the road, just take it out of your pocket and rustle the paper." So the young man put the letter in his pocket, and walked all day over the hills till he reached a little turf hut, exactly like the other two.

"Let me in, I pray you, dear mother," cried he. And as he entered he added, "Here is a letter from your sister and—can you tell me anything of the Sister of the Sun?"

"Yes, I can," answered the old woman. "She lives in the castle on the Banka. Her father lost a battle only a few days ago because you had stolen his sword from him, and the Sister of the Sun herself is almost dead of grief. But, when you see her, stick a pin into the palm of her hand, and suck the drops of blood that flow. Then she will grow calmer, and will know you again. Only, beware; for before you reach the castle on the Banka fearful things will happen."

He thanked the old woman with tears of gladness for the good news she had given him, and continued his journey. But he had not gone very far when, at a turn of the road, he met with two brothers, who were quarreling over a piece of cloth.

"My good men, what are you fighting about?" said he. "That cloth does not look worth much!"

"Oh, it is ragged enough," answered they, "but it was left us by our father, and if any man wraps it round him no one can see him; and we each want it for our own."

"Let me put it round me for a moment," said the youth, "and then I will tell you whose it ought to be!"

The brothers were pleased with this idea, and gave him the stuff; but the moment he had thrown it over his shoulder he disappeared as completely as if he had never been there at all.

Meanwhile the young man walked briskly along, till he came up with two other men, who were disputing over a table-cloth.

“What is the matter?” asked he, stopping in front of them.

“If this cloth is spread on a table,” answered they, “the table is instantly covered with the most delicious food; and we each want to have it.”

“Let me try the table-cloth,” said the youth, “and I will tell you whose it ought to be.”

The two men were quite pleased with this idea, and handed him the cloth. He then hastily threw the first piece of stuff round his shoulders and vanished from sight, leaving the two men grieving over their own folly.

The young man had not walked far before he saw two more men standing by the road-side, both grasping the same stout staff, and sometimes one seemed on the point of getting it, and sometimes the other.

“What are you quarreling about? You could cut a dozen sticks from the wood each just as good as that!” said the young man. And as he spoke the fighters both stopped and looked at him.

“Ah! you may think so,” said one, “but a blow from one end of this stick will kill a man, while a touch from the other end will bring him back to life. You won’t easily find another stick like that!”

“No; that is true,” answered the young man. “Let me just look at it, and I will tell you whose it ought to be.”

The men were pleased with the idea, and handed him the staff.

“It is very curious, certainly,” said he; “but which end is it that restores people to life? After all, anyone can be killed by a blow from a stick if it is only hard enough!” But when he was shown the end he threw the stuff over his shoulders and vanished.

At last he saw another set of men, who were struggling for the possession of a pair of shoes.

“Why can’t you leave that pair of old shoes alone?” said he. “Why, you could not walk a yard in them!”

“Yes, they are old enough,” answered they; “but whoever puts them on and wishes himself at a particular place, gets there without going.”

“That sounds very clever,” said the youth. “Let me try them, and then I shall be able to tell you whose they ought to be.”

The idea pleased the men, and they handed him the shoes; but the moment they were on his feet he cried, “I wish to be in the castle on the Banka!” And before he knew it, he was there, and found the Sister of the Sun dying of grief. He knelt down by her side, and pulling a pin he stuck it into the palm of her hand, so that a drop of blood gushed out. This he sucked, as he had been told to do by the old woman, and immediately the princess came to herself, and flung her arms round his neck. Then she told him all her story, and what had happened since the ship had sailed away without him. “But the worst misfortune of all,” she added, “was a battle which my father lost because you had vanished with his magic sword; and out of his whole army hardly one man was left.”

“Show me the battle-field,” said he. And she took him to a wild heath, where the dead were lying as they fell, waiting for burial. One by one he touched them with the end of his staff, till at length they all stood before him. Throughout the kingdom there was nothing but joy; and THIS time the wedding was REALLY celebrated. And the bridal pair lived happily in the castle on the Banka till they died.

THE FOX AND THE LAPP

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Lang, Andrew. The Brown Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1904, 245–246.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Poestion, J. C. Lappländische Märchen.

National Origin: Sami

---

The curious, cunning nature of fox in Sami folk narrative is revealed in the first sentence of this animal tale. In the following variant of “The Theft of Fish” (AT 1), similar portraits of the opportunistic trickster find not only fox but, among others, rabbit, hare, and coyote in other cultural settings employing similar strategies to exploit their fellows.

---

Once upon a time a fox lay peeping out of his hole, watching the road that ran by at a little distance, and hoping to see something that might amuse him, for he was feeling very dull and rather cross. For a long while he watched in vain; everything seemed asleep, and not even a bird stirred overhead. The fox grew crosser than ever, and he was just turning away in disgust from his place when he heard the sound of feet coming over the snow.

He crouched eagerly down at the edge of the road and said to himself, “I wonder what would happen if I were to pretend to be dead! This is a man driving a reindeer sledge; I know the tinkling of the harness. And at any rate I shall have an adventure, and that is always something!” So he stretched himself out by the side of the road, carefully choosing a spot where the driver could not help seeing him, yet where the reindeer would not tread on him; and all fell out just as he had expected. The sledge driver pulled up sharply, as his eyes lighted on the beautiful animal lying stiffly beside him, and jumping out he threw the fox into the bottom of the sledge, where the goods he was carrying were bound tightly together by ropes. The fox did not move a muscle though his bones were sore from the fall, and the driver got back to his seat again and drove on merrily.

But before they had gone very far, the fox, who was near the edge, contrived to slip over, and when the Laplander saw him stretched out on the snow he pulled up his reindeer and put the fox into one of the other sledges that was fastened behind, for it was market day at the nearest town, and the man had much to sell.

They drove on a little further, when some noise in the forest made the man turn his head, just in time to see the fox fall with a heavy thump onto the frozen snow.

“That beast is bewitched!” he said to himself, and then he threw the fox into the last sledge of all, which had a cargo of fishes. This was exactly what the cunning creature wanted, and he wriggled gently to the front and bit the cord which tied the sledge to the one before it so that it remained standing in the middle of the road.

Now there were so many sledges that the Lapp did not notice for a long while that one was missing. Indeed, he would have entered the town without knowing if snow had not suddenly begun to fall. Then he got down to secure more firmly the cloths that kept his goods dry, and going to the end of the long row, discovered that the sledge containing the fish and the fox was missing. He quickly unharnessed one of his reindeer and rode back along the way he had come, to find the sledge standing safe in the middle of the road; but as the fox had bitten off the cord close to the noose there was no means of moving it away.

The fox meanwhile was enjoying himself mightily. As soon as he had loosened the sledge, he had taken his favorite fish from among the piles neatly arranged for sale, and had trotted off to the forest with it in his mouth.

Western Europe

BASQUE

---

ROLDAN'S BUGLE HORN

Tradition Bearer: Mariana Monteiro

Source: Monteiro, Mariana. Legends and Popular Tales of the Basque People. London: Fisher Unwin, 1887, 125–149.

Date: 1829

Original Source: Basque

National Origin: Basque

---

The Basques are indigenous to the western Pyrenees Mountains on the northeastern border of Spain and southwestern border of France. The Basques have maintained a strong sense of identity that is reflected in the legend of their resistance to the forces of Charlemagne, “Roldan’s Bugle Horn.” The legend that forms the core of the personal experience narrative recounted below is the Basque account of the Battle of Roncevaux Pass (given the Spanish spelling of Roncesvalles in the following narrative) in 778 C.E., in which the rearguard of Charlemagne’s forces was ambushed by Basque guerillas and wiped out entirely. Among Charlemagne’s Frankish forces was Hruodland, or Roland (Roldan in the Basque oral tradition). The event was romanticized through oral retellings and eventually entered print as “The Song of Roland.” By this point, the force opposing Charlemagne’s army had been transformed from Basque Christians to Saracen Muslims. The concept of the unquiet and vengeful dead is central to the folk beliefs inspired by the legend of Roldan.

---

When I heard this legend for the first time I was a youth. The circumstances which preceded and followed its narrative deserve to be mentioned, although they have no relation to the legend itself, but they were of such a nature that they will never be effaced from my mind, and I think will impart a greater interest to the tale.

The winter of 1829 was one of the most severe seasons known in this century. In Spain, snow fell all over the country, and even in the southern provinces, where a fall of snow, is quite a phenomenon, seen perhaps once in a century, the ground was covered by deep beds of snow, to the great amazement of their happy dwellers. But naturally where the rigor of the winter was felt more keenly was in the Basque Provinces. The roads from town to town and from valley to valley were impassable, and many houses were buried beneath the snow for days. The few travelers who were compelled to traverse the mountains encountered fearful dangers—of being lost in the drifts, or of falling into chasms, or, in truth, of being attacked by packs of famished wolves which, forsaking their usual haunts in the woods, prowled around the habitations.

On this occasion I was in Goizueta, a town of the mountains of Navarre, enjoying the delicious hams of the country which supplied the table of my uncle, the cura of that place, who was an indefatigable huntsman. The great snowstorm, which fell without intermission, did not permit us to leave the bounds of the dwelling-houses, and we eagerly awaited the weather to break up a little to enable us to go to the neighboring mountains to hunt the deer and wild boars which abounded.

At the beginning of January the sky began to clear up, and one evening, as we were consulting together on the practicability of starting on the following morning, a stalwart Basque presented himself as the bearer of a letter from the prior of the monastery of Roncesvalles. This letter was addressed to my uncle, and in it the prior besought him in the name of their long friendship to come and pay a visit to the abbey, and bring a good pack of hounds to hunt an enormous black bear which had appeared in the neighborhood, and which was devouring every living creature it could find.

At daydawn on the following morning we started for the abbey to the number of fourteen huntsmen and twenty dogs, the pick of the bloodhounds and mastiffs of the mountains of Navarre. At nightfall of the subsequent day we reached our destination, after traversing the picturesque valley of Baztein, the bounds of Eugui, and the plain called the Prado de Roldan ["Roldan's Meadow"], the water and snow reaching in many parts nearly to our waists.

II

On reaching the Abbey of Roncesvalles we were received by the prior and his monks, excellent men whose lives were passed in tranquil magnificence.

When I descried the lofty towers of that monastery, and beheld the strong walls which surrounded it—on seeing the houses of the inhabitants of that small town grouped around the immense extent of the monastic dwelling, it seemed to me that I was transported to other ages; and to my imagination, carried back seven centuries, the whole rose up before me as the work of a still more remote age—in one word, I found myself in the Middle Ages.

And in truth this idea was reasonable enough when I looked at our pack of hounds, on the robes in which we were dressed, on the two monks who had come forth to receive us, and on beholding the group of country people who attentively examined us, and saluted respectfully the venerable prior who was bestowing his blessing upon them with a benevolent fatherly smile, and whom the people loved as a true father. In truth, their affection for him was well merited, as they never had recourse to him in their troubles or difficulties without being relieved and comforted.

The massive doors of the monastery closed upon us, and we traversed the immense cloisters, preceded by servants bearing torches of pitched tow to light the way to the roomy, comfortable cell of the prior, where we could rest our wearied limbs and dry our soaked garments.

All this was a new scene to me, and I derived an immense pleasure in giving full play to my imagination, and allowing full scope to the ideas which continually presented themselves.

“That one is the noble lord of this fortress,” I thought to myself, as I looked at the prior, who was seated close to the hearth upon which burned huge blocks of wood; “further on are his principal men; we ourselves are. The retinue of the other feudal baron, coming to form some alliance with his neighbor. I, the shield-bearer, he who removes the hood from the favorite falcon, the one who holds the bridle of the horse of the lady of the castle, he who carries the shield and the standard of its lord on the day of battle. This one—his ranger, he who arranges the hunt, who sounds the Alhali when the noble deer dashes out of its cover; this other—”

My soliloquy was interrupted by the ringing of the bell which announced that supper was ready. We all rose up on hearing the welcome sound, and departed to the private refectory of the prior. Another surprise awaited me in harmony with the thoughts which had been suggested to me by the scenes before me. A table of colossal dimensions groaned beneath huge haunches of venison and quarters of wild boar smoking in great dishes of pewter. Further on were dozens of trout in bright copper casseroles. Large flagons of yellow sweet Peralta, of red Tudela wine and cider, flanked this enormous supper. It was truly one of those Homeric suppers the memory of which has reached even down to our days. Yet, in spite of the abundance of food, the haunches and quarters and dozens of fish were fast disappearing, and the dishes remained empty as though by enchantment; wines and liqueurs also were consumed with incredible rapidity, and I must confess that I was one of those who most contributed to their prodigious disappearance.

During supper the whole conversation turned on the object of our journey, and the prior informed us that the bear we had come from such a distance to hunt was so formidable an animal that no one dared to venture far from the dwellings through fear of being devoured.

“We shall bring you that bear tomorrow,” said my uncle, who awaited the coming hunt with all the impatience of an enthusiastic huntsman.

“Be careful what you do, my friends,” replied the prior; “I am told that it is an enormous animal, very agile and exceedingly ferocious.”

“Believe me, you need have no fear; and I promise you that his skin shall keep your feet warm this winter,” rejoined my uncle.

“Would to God you did destroy him! For I assure you that there will be many to thank you, since the poor carriers and muleteers are quite cowed with the beast who persists in following them.”

“Towards what part is the animal more frequently seen?”

“On the road which leads to the gate of France.”

“What! On the path of Roldan?”

“Yes; it is about that district that he has been seen.”

“Tis well; now, gentlemen, let us retire to rest, as it will be necessary to rise early tomorrow.”

The prior recited the Benedicite, and the servants appeared with lights, and each guest betook himself to the room assigned to him. It was eleven o'clock, for the supper had lasted long.

My cousin Francisco and myself occupied a small apartment which had two long, narrow windows, from which could be descried a portion of the neighboring forest.

I could not resist gazing on the weird scene before me: the moon was illuminating with her cold white beams the landscape covered with snow, and not the smallest cloud could be perceived on the horizon to obscure her pure light. I opened a window and stood contemplating the spectacle before me. If on reaching the monastery I had formed to myself the illusion that I was visiting one of the feudal castles of the Middle Ages, full of pages, ladies, and knights, that illusion began to assume a greater reality the moment I found myself at the Gothic window. In front of me lay a vast field mantled by hard snow, which beneath the moonbeams appeared like a spotless white carpet, the congealed icicles glistening in the moonlight as though the ground were studded with brilliants, topazes, and emeralds. Further on, half hidden by a slight mist, could be seen the houses of the town of Burgete. To the right rose up the lofty peaks of the Iru and other mountains which form that severe cordillera, until they were lost in the deep blue of the atmosphere. To the left the scene was still more surprising. Immense aged oaks, pines of many years' growth, stripped of leaves, could be seen moving their snow-laden tops at the weak breath of the icy breeze. Their black trunks stood out in relief against the white background of the snowy plains, while their gigantic branches appeared like the unearthly arms of some colossal phantom.

In the midst of the sepulchral silence of night, broken only by the distant noise of the running streams, my ears perceived some unfamiliar sounds, which, though weak and far distant at first, began to swell; and that singular sound which had so struck me continued to increase—was it an illusion? Perchance it was. My heated imagination conjured up before me that heroic combat of the armies of Charlemagne against the dwellers of the mountains of Navarre. I heard the clashing of lances, the neighing of the horses, the pelting noise of stones as they struck the steel armor of the horsemen, the whizzing of the arrows as they flew across the air, the cries of the conquerors, the sighs of the wounded, the groaning of the dying; the cause of this unwonted noise was duly explained!

I was about to close the window and retire to rest when I heard truly a clear ringing cry, penetrative—a cry which was echoed by the adjoining rocks and chasms, this cry being repeated and prolonged and echoed over and over again.

“Francisco!” I cried, “Tell me what this means?”

My cousin woke up, and at that moment the weird sound was repeated.

“Oh!” replied, rising up and approaching the window, “I know what it is. It is Roldan, who is blowing his horn, asking for help.”

“And who is this Roldan?” I asked.

“Do you not know? Well, he is one of the twelve, peers of France who died at the boundary,” he replied, going back to bed.

I could not help bursting out laughing, but Francisco grew very wrathful at my incredulity, as he was a firm believer in ghosts, phantoms, and apparitions.

“You unbelieving Jew!” he cried, in anger; “is that all they teach you at the universities? Are there no witches? Do you not believe that the spirits appear of those who have died and were left unburied? Go to ‘Aquelarre’ on some Saturday night, and on the next morning you will tell me what you have seen; go now, this very moment, to take a walk in that wood which lies before us, and I promise you that ere you have walked fifty paces you will meet with Bassa Jauna.”

“Come, cousin, do not take it so to heart,” I replied, as I am in total ignorance of all that passes here.”

Five minutes later I was in bed and fast asleep.

III

When the first rays of the dawn were touching the tops of the mountains which surrounded the monastery, the pack of hounds were gathered in the wide courtyard, their barking awaking the huntsmen. The yelping of the impatient dogs, the blowing of the hunting horns, the voices of those who had risen early, produced such a din, that I was forced to rise against my will and descend to join them. My uncle the cura, with his merry, happy face, breathing health, through every pore, was awaiting us surrounded by huntsmen and followed by the prior, who did not cease to enjoin us to be careful, and to take ever precaution against being suddenly assailed by the fierce beast we were going to encounter.

We joined the group, and bade the prior farewell, his parting words being, “Now, boys, keep together, and above all aim right; may you have a good day’s sport; and now I shall go and celebrate mass.”

Within a quarter of an hour after leaving the monastery we had lost sight of its walls, and had interned ourselves in the forest. We divided the party into couples, the better to scour the forest. We formed a wide semicircle as in guerilla warfare, and placed the dogs between the distances. In this way we proceeded to search high and low, leaving no defile unexplored, nor rock or mountain unscoured—but all in vain. The bear did not show an appearance, nor could we find the smallest trace which could afford us any clue to its haunts. In this bootless search we continued until three o'clock in the day, when it was judged prudent to return to the monastery before the night, should overtake us, wandering about those solitary places covered by snow and frost.

I was exceedingly tired from ascending and descending the rocks and mountain parts, as I was little accustomed to this kind of exercise, and my hands were raw from grasping the thorny bushes and briars when scaling the rocks and climbing up the hillsides. I threw myself down, resting against a rock; Francisco sat down by my side, and Tigre, our good dog, lay at our feet licking my hands. The other huntsmen were preparing for their return home.

“Come,” I said, “let us drink a draught of wine, and then tell me something about Roldan’s bugle-horn.”

“Ah,” my cousin replied, in a grave tone, “if you had passed whole weeks as I have, in the forests and woods, with no other companion but a dog and a gun, you would then know a great many things which you know nothing of. Get up and follow me, since you still wish me to tell you something concerning this French knight, and I will tell you what I have heard, but it must be related on the very spot where that brave fell and died.”

I rose up, and we both proceeded to the eminence pointed out by Francisco. Nothing more grand could be imagined than the view commanded from this eminence; the virgin luxuriance of the Basque mountains, with their trees of immense height, their huge broken chasms and rocks contemporary with the creation, their tops covered with the snows of centuries, and the torrents below of turbid waters which have been flowing on from the beginning of the world. The heights on which we stood was a broken point, and on the opposite side to this division there was a huge gap, and this opening is the boundary or gate which divides it from France.

We reached the spot where Roldan died, and from whence, it is said, he still blows his horn. It is related that whenever the blast of his horn is heard the rocks fall to pieces, the mountains catch fire, and homesteads disappear by fierce storms.

“Tell me, pray tell me all about this.”

“Well, then, listen.”

“There was in France an emperor or king who went on from conquest to conquest, working his way towards the North. In his incursions he was accompanied by some barons of his realm, who were exceedingly brave and daring, among the number being Roldan, and he was distinguished above them all, like the tops of a beech tree rising above the other trees of the forests. Wearied of always proceeding towards the North, where he only found snow and ice, he returned to his own kingdom, and, after making some preparations, he sallied out to conquer the South. Do you see that mountain yonder, so high that its top is nearly lost in the clouds? From that mountain up to Elizondo nothing was seen but soldiers; the ground shook beneath the weight of that concourse of men covered with steel, at the head of which went Roldan. No resistance could we offer them because we were totally unprepared. They went on and reached Pamplona and conquered it; they spread themselves along the shores and they became the masters. Inebriated with such signal success, they returned to France, leaving their strongholds garrisoned. Nevertheless in that retreat there awaited them the punishment to their ambition. The whole army passed along that road covered with snow, towards where you are looking. The multitude of soldiers resembled a long serpent, whose head, led by the emperor, was concealed in Oleron, and the tail, at which stood Roldan, reached to the walls of the holy monastery of Roncesvalles. All the cliffs and chasms repeated the echoes a thousand times over, the noise of the songs, and the clamping of the horses' hoofs. Roldan had already reached to the summit of the pine plantation, which from hence looks as small as the lime tree; he was conversing cheerfully with his soldiers, when a horrible stampede was heard on the winds. They looked up in terror and saw huge masses bounding down the slopes in fearful leaps and awe-inspiring roar, and falling like hail on the troops, crushing them to the ground like so many reptiles."

"And what was that which was flying in space?" I asked, deeply interested with this picturesque narrative.

"Pieces of rock of the size of these we are sitting upon," he replied. "A fearful cry was heard in that defile. The troops mustered together, and with their shields endeavored to offer an opposition to that shower of broken rocks, but the resistance was too weak to be able to repulse projectiles of this description. Their arms were broken, their bodies trampled, and men, guns, vehicles, and horses were crushed down, and, before many minutes had elapsed, all that road was covered over with dead bodies, broken corselets, and shields. Roldan was the only one who had been untouched by the missiles; he blew his horn asking for help, and the fierce, terrible irrinzi, or war-whoop, of the Basques was the response he received.

"All those mountain tops and heights were crowned, with Basques, who were hurling down broken rocks flying arrows, and even throwing huge balls of hard snow. They were commanded by Count Lobo. The count witnessed all this terrible slaughter, seated on the very spot which you are occupying. Roldan made strenuous efforts to reunite his men, and, by scaling the mountain sides, to cast the enemy from the heights. Several times did he reach as far as that break which lies two yards from your feet; but the trunk of a tree which rolled down the cliff, and other projectiles, arrested his venture.

"At length, wearied by so much wrestling, he formed a rampart with the bodies of his soldiers, and in this manner, behind this defense, he blew his horn and cursed his cousin the emperor. The sounds from his trumpet grew weaker and weaker, and as a last effort of his death agony he took his sword by the blade and cast it far from him. The sword struck this very spot, and was buried up to the hilt. The horn was silenced.

“Roldan died pierced by arrows, and surrounded by the dead bodies of his soldiers. His shadow, nevertheless, wanders about these solitary places; armed to the teeth, he is seen on the heights flinging down enormous rocks to obstruct the passage, the silent proof of his rout. At times, when some catastrophe threatens the land, the sound of his horn is distinctly heard, announcing by those blasts the misfortune which is threatened. And when the anticipated calamity takes place, there are seen about these localities during the night long lines of armed men dancing to the measure of the strange music which their chieftain executes. Hapless indeed is the Basque muleteer who happens to pass at that moment.”

“What happens then?” I asked.

“He will die broken to pieces against the rocks.”

“So that, should these ill-omened fellows appear at this moment—”

“We should be instantly killed,” replied Francisco.

“Hum, hum! I am not afraid of the dead,” I replied, smiling. “I am more impressed by the presence of two living men than by all the dead bodies of Roldan and his soldiers.”

“Afraid of the living?” he replied, with a contemptuous sneer. “When I have my gun loaded I fear none who may stand before me!”

I was about to reply, and perhaps start a discussion, when we heard close to us the same strange noise and ringing cry which had reached us on the previous night.

“That is your Roldan, who no doubt is coming to tear us to pieces,” I said, laughing, little thinking what was the actual cause of that cry.

But I was astonished to witness the terror and ashy pallor of the countenance of my cousin, who with finger on his lips was indicating to me to keep silence. Tigre had pricked up his ears, and was uttering sinister growls.

Suddenly Francisco cried, “I have lost my bugle-horn.”

“What is the matter?”

“Why, look to the right; do you not hear?”

I could certainly hear the crackling sound of dry branches as they broke under the heavy muffled tread of some one slowly advancing, but I did not apprehend what it was.

“Is it, perhaps, Roldan who is approaching?” I asked, half convinced that this supposition might be a true one.

“Who knows? Silence! Quiet, Tigre!” he whispered, menacing the dog which at once lay down at my feet.

The night was fast closing in, and the mists were descending from the mountains over the valleys. All at once throughout space resounded a ringing cry far more piercing than any we had yet heard, and on turning round in the direction from whence it proceeded, we beheld in astonishment a formidable black bear about thirty paces from us, and which stood still to look at us. When I saw him, I felt the blood freezing in my veins, and almost mechanically I raised my gun to aim but Francisco cried out, as he grasped my gun, to lower it. "Do not fire, else we are lost!"

The animal was slowly advancing, growling with pleasure on seeing his coveted prey so near to him, and which he felt sure of obtaining. The beast was a huge one, and his paws, with their sharp curved claws, were truly monstrous.

"Let us prepare for a hand-to-hand fight," said Francisco, on perceiving that the animal was beginning to agitate himself. "Were I alone," he added, drawing out his long woodman's knife—

"What would you do?" I asked.

"I would lodge a shot in his body, and then pierce him through with this knife."

"Shoot him then, and if you do not succeed in killing him I will fire also."

"It is impossible," he replied, "because, should I not kill him, he would attack us and although, were I alone, I could easily defend myself, yet I could not do so with you."

"Let us run for it, then," I said.

"Run from him?" he replied, looking at me from head to foot. "You are tired out, and before we should have departed twenty paces you would feel his claws clutching at your neck. No, let us do something else."

"Let us fight him to death," I rejoined.

The bear uttered a deep growl and dashed at us. Quick as thought my cousin leaped to the front and placed his body between me and the beast. The eyes of Francisco were gleaming with a strange light, his right hand grasped the long knife, and a feverish tremor betrayed his extraordinary resolve. That wrestling would have proved an unequal one, had not another combatant appeared on the field, when the bear was at a short distance from us. The dog Tigre, which had been hitherto only yelping and watching, now leaped on to the beast with the strength and agility of dogs of his breed, and, catching him by the neck, turned him over and both rolled to the ground. The rage of the bear was something terrible: he growled savagely, and set at the dog; but the latter, being agile and trained, parried the attacks of the beast with surprising skill.

"We are saved!" cried Francisco.

"Let us fire at him!" I said, preparing my gun.

"Keep quiet, for heaven's sake!" he exclaimed. "Don't you see that, should we not kill him, he would turn his attacks from the dog and direct his fury towards us? Let us reserve our shot for the end."

Meantime the bear was vainly trying to catch the dog, but every time that he renewed the attack the dog would fly at him, and dig its teeth into the bear, forcing him to roar furiously.

My cousin then began to call at the top of his voice to summon the other huntsmen, if he could make himself heard by them, and they in their turn were already very anxious because we had not rejoined them. At last, after a quarter of an hour of anxious waiting, we heard the blasting of the hunting horns, the yelping of dogs, and the answering cries of our companions announcing their arrival.

When the bear heard all that noise he began to retire very slowly: we then fired two shots, and he disappeared in the wood. The huntsmen hastened up to us, nearly exhausted with fatigue, and fearful that some misfortune had happened to us.

“Pepe! Pepe! Where is Pepe?” cried my uncle, in terror and out of breath.

“Here we are, uncle,” I replied.

“Are you unhurt?”

“Yes, thank God; but had it not been for Francisco the bear would have torn me to pieces.”

“Mercy upon us!” exclaimed all the huntsmen in one voice. “Have you seen the bear?”

“Yes, as surely as I see you!” I replied.

“Where is Francisco?” they asked.

At that moment we heard the report of a gun in the wood, followed by a fierce growl. We all ran towards the spot whence came the noise, and we found Francisco raising his gun to fire with the greatest coolness.

“I have wounded the beast,” he said, as soon as he saw us coming; “if we follow the track the bear will be ours.”

“But, gentlemen,” said one of the huntsmen, “it is almost night.”

“What does it matter?” replied Francisco, as he shouldered his gun and started in pursuit.

We all followed him, and on the snow we could plainly see the spots of blood from the wounded animal.

“He is certainly wounded,” said my uncle; “therefore let us proceed cautiously. Pepe,” he added, addressing me, “come close to me, do not linger behind nor separate yourself from our party.”

“Come along with me!” cried Francisco, as he grasped my hand in an affectionate manner; “before the bear touches a thread of your coat he will have to tear me to pieces.”

Deeply touched at this proof of his friendship I returned his grasp in silence. The pack of dogs were leashed together, setting Tigre foremost, and we joined ourselves together in a close column, and, preparing our weapons, we followed for a considerable distance the track of the animal. The night quite closed in, but we were able to continue our search, thanks to, the reflection cast up from the whiteness of the untrodden snow. The footprints and occasional spots of blood from the wounded animal served as a guide, but on reaching a plain, encircled by high rocks like gradients in an amphitheatre, the trace of footprints and the drops of blood ceased.

From this we inferred that the bear's den must be in some opening of the rocks standing before us, so we decided to encamp on the snow, taking all necessary precautions to spend the night in security and all possible comfort. With a quantity of dry branches we kindled a fire, fastened the dogs in couples, refreshed ourselves with food and wine, and settled to sleep. Some of the keepers took their turn to watch, and formed a sort of mounted guards. In spite of the piercing cold, somewhat modified by the heat of the fire, we soon fell fast asleep.

IV

At daydawn we were up and commenced anew our search. We found deeply impressed footprints of the beacon the snow, and followed the track which led us to the further end of this natural amphitheater of rocks. At the base of a high cliff we discovered an opening curtained by overhanging branches and much tangled growth, and none doubted that this opening led to the den of our enemy. We carefully examined the surroundings of this mountain, in order to discover whether there existed any other opening to this cave, but to our great satisfaction we found none. We then held a sort of council of war, to discuss the best means possible to dislodge the animal from his lair, and after some animated discussion the proposal suggested by my cousin was unanimously adopted. This was simply to place the huntsmen on the heights which surrounded the plain for safety, and the keepers with the dogs leashed together to stand at the entrance of the plain. Then to collect some branches, pile them up at the mouth of the cave and set fire to them, and by this means smoke out the beast from his lair. We accordingly perched ourselves all along the heights of the rocks, and my cousin, armed with his long knife, and followed by some of the men carrying wood, gently approached the cavern, covered up the entrance with the branches, and set fire to them. My curiosity was at its highest point, and the eyes of all were fixed on the bonfire, which was beginning to cast vivid flames and dense columns of smoke. Francisco stood on my right, and the dog Tigre on the left. Ten minutes elapsed without anything taking place, and we were beginning to think we had after all missed our mark, when we perceived the ignited branches flying in the air, and scattered about on all sides under the vigorous kicks of the bear. He appeared on the scene uttering fearful growls, and casting fiery glances around at us. When the animal found himself enclosed within that narrow circle, his fury knew no bounds. He made towards the dogs, which were all let loose together, and a terrible fight ensued. The bloodhounds covered the bear with their tawny bodies; the beast lacerating all those he could bite at with his long teeth, and in a short time out of that rolling heap of bodies came forth indescribable cries of pain, and blood flowed. Thirteen dogs fell victims, either killed or wounded, in that fight, and the rest withdrew at the call of their keepers. The bear, now fairly exhausted, sat on his haunches, unable to move, his jaws wide open, and his tongue hanging out like a sheet of red-hot iron.

"Fire altogether!" cried my uncle, and five balls entered the animal's body.

The bear gave a tremendous leap on finding himself wounded; he reared on his hind legs, gazed upon the scene around him, and with desperate bounds, horrible growls, and grinding his teeth in a fearful manner, covered with blood and froth, he dashed in the direction where Francisco and I were standing to attack us. In order to reach to where we stood, it was necessary for the animal to clamber a cliff of about sixteen feet high, upon one of the crevices of which we had taken our position. The other huntsmen did not dare to fire through fear of wounding us; nor were they able to render us any assistance, as it was too late to prevent the attack or divert the beast. Meanwhile the bear was with surprising agility clambering up, and we almost felt the hot breath of his nostrils. The huntsmen were terror-stricken: my poor uncle endeavored to encourage us with cheering words, while a cold perspiration overspread my face. I trembled from head to foot, and I knew not what to do. I turned towards my cousin, who gave me a grasp of the hand, and, turning deadly pale, murmured, "The bugle-horn of Roldan!" The critical moment had arrived. Flight was now impossible. The bear advanced, and had already raised his huge paws to pounce upon us. Francisco leaped forward, made the sign of the cross, raised his gun, took aim, and fired. I closed my eyes. A cry of joy resounded in that enclosed plain on seeing the beast roll over, down the broken cliff, and Tigre with him. Francisco uttered an irrinzi of triumph, and, swiftly following the animal, he leaped down and stuck his long knife into the breast of the bear.

Three hours later, we entered the walls of the monastery bringing the dead body of the black bear, the terror of the adjacent mountains. From his body was extracted about twenty pounds of fat, and his handsome skin covered for some years the prioral couch of Roncesvalles.

For a considerable time after this event I used to dream very frequently about Roldan's bugle-horn; and whenever I was troubled with these dreams I would awaken as in a fright and start up nervously, believing myself caught in the clutches of a black bear.

THE GRATEFUL TARTARO AND THE HEREN-SUGE

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Webster, Wentworth. Basque Legends: Collected Chiefly in the Labourd. London: Griffith and Farran, 1879, 20–32.

Date: ca. 1879

Original Source: Basque

National Origin: Basque

---

The Tartaro of Basque folklore is commonly described as a giant cyclops. In some cases, the description is so vague that the Tartaro is no more than an ogre or monstrous animal. Often, the Basque tales cast it in the role of the stupid ogre (for example, AT 1000-1181). In his variant of “The Dragon-Slayer” (AT 300), however, the Tartaro returns the hero’s kindness by advice and magical assistance in saving his own life, defeating the seven-headed serpent, and winning a princess. The opening episode is a variant of “The Helpful Horse” (AT 532) with the Tartaro assuming the role played by the horse elsewhere.

---

Like many of us who are, have been, and shall be in the world, there was a king, and his wife, and three sons. The king went out hunting one day, and caught a Tartaro. He brings him home, and shuts him up in prison in a stable, and proclaims, by sound of trumpet, that all his court should meet the next day at his house, that he would give them a grand dinner, and afterwards would show them an animal such as they had never seen before.

The next day the two sons of the king were playing at ball against (the wall of) the stable where the Tartaro was confined, and the ball went into the stable. One of the boys goes and asks the Tartaro, “Throw me back my ball, I beg you.”

He says to him, “Yes, if you will deliver me.”

He replies, “Yes, yes,” and he threw him the ball.

A moment after, the ball goes again to the Tartaro. He asks for it again; and the Tartaro says, “If you will deliver me, I will give it you.”

The boy says, “Yes, yes,” takes his ball, and goes off.

The ball goes there for the third time, but the Tartaro will not give it before he is let out.

The boy says that he has not the key. The Tartaro says to him, “Go to your mother, and tell her to look in your right ear, because something hurts you there. Your mother will have the key in her left pocket, and take it out.”

The boy goes, and does as the Tartaro had told him. He takes the key from his mother, and delivers the Tartaro. When he was letting him go, he said to him, “What shall I do with the key now? I am undone.”

The Tartaro says to him, “Go again to your mother, and tell her that your left ear hurts you, and ask her to look, and you will slip the key into her pocket.”

The Tartaro tells him, too, that he will soon have need of him, and that he will only have to call him, and he will be his servant forever.

He puts the key back; and everyone came to the dinner. When they had eaten well, the king said to them that they must go and see this curious thing. He takes them all with him. When they are come to the stable, he finds it empty. Judge of the anger of this king, and of his shame. He said, “I should like to eat the heart, half cooked, and without salt, of him who has let my beast go.”

Some time afterwards the two brothers quarreled in presence of their mother, and one said to the other, “I will tell our father about the affair of the Tartaro.”

When the mother heard that, she was afraid for her son, and said to him, "Take as much money as you wish."

And she gave him the Fleur-de-lis [a mark alleged by the narrator to be tattooed on the chest of royalty]. "By this you will be known everywhere as the son of a king."

Petit Yorge [Little George] goes off, then, far, far, far away. He spends and squanders all his money, and does not know what to do more. He remembers the Tartaro, and calls him directly. He comes, and Petit Yorge tells him all his misfortunes; that he has not a penny left, and that he does not know what will become of him. The Tartaro says to him, "When you have gone a short way from here you will come to a city. A king lives there. You will go to his house, and they will take you as gardener. You will pull up everything that there is in the garden, and the next day everything will come up more beautiful than before. Also, three beautiful flowers will spring up, and you will carry them to the three daughters of the king, and you will give the most beautiful to the youngest daughter."

He goes off, then, as he had told him, and he asks them if they want a gardener. They say, "Yes, indeed, very much." He goes to the garden, and pulls up the fine cabbages, and the beautiful leeks as well. The youngest of the king's daughters sees him, and she tells it to her father, and her father says to her, "Let him alone, we will see what he will do afterwards." And, indeed, the next day he sees cabbages and leeks such as he had never seen before. Petit Yorge takes a flower to each of the young ladies.

The eldest said, "I have a flower that the gardener has brought me, which has not its equal in the world."

And the second says that she has one, too, and that no one has ever seen one so beautiful. And the youngest said that hers was still more beautiful than theirs, and the others confess it, too.

The youngest of the young ladies found the gardener very much to her taste. Every day she used to bring him his dinner. After a certain time she said to him, "You must marry me."

The lad says to her, "That is impossible. The king would not like such a marriage."

The young girl says, too, "Well, indeed, it is hardly worthwhile. In eight days I shall be eaten by the serpent."

For eight days she brought him his dinner again. In the evening she tells him that it is for the last time that she brought it. The young man tells her, "No," that she will bring it again; that somebody will help her.

The next day Petit Yorge goes off at eight o'clock to call the Tartaro. He tells him what has happened. The Tartaro gives him a fine horse, a handsome dress, and a sword, and tells him to go to such a spot, and to open the carriage door with his sword, and that he will cut off two of the serpent's heads. Petit Yorge goes off to the said spot. He finds the young lady in the carriage. He bids her open the door. The young lady says that she cannot open it—that there are seven doors, and that he had better go away; that it is enough for one person to be eaten.

Petit Yorge opens the doors with his sword, and sat down by the young lady's side. He tells her that he has hurt his ear, and asks her to look at it; and at the same time he cuts off seven pieces of the seven robes which she wore, without the young lady seeing him. At the same instant comes the serpent, and says to him, "Instead of one, I shall have three to eat."

Petit Yorge leaps on his horse, and says to him, "You will not touch one; you shall not have one of us."

And they begin to fight. With his sword he cuts off one head, and the horse with his feet another; and the serpent asks quarter till the next day. Petit Yorge leaves the young lady there. The young lady is full of joy; she wishes to take the young man home with her. He will not go by any means (he says); that he cannot; that he has made a vow to go to Rome; but he tells her that "tomorrow my brother will come, and he will be able to do something, too." The young lady goes home, and Petit Yorge to his garden. At noon she comes to him with the dinner, and Petit Yorge says to her, "You see that it has really happened as I told you—he has not eaten you."

"No, but tomorrow he will eat me. How can it be otherwise?"

"No, no! Tomorrow you will bring me my dinner again. Some help will come to you."

The next day Petit Yorge goes off at eight o'clock to the Tartaro, who gives him a new horse, a different dress, and a fine sword. At ten o'clock he arrives where the young lady is. He bids her open the door. But she says to him that she cannot in any way open fourteen doors; she is there, and that she cannot open them, and he should go away; that it is enough for one to be eaten; that she is grieved to see him there. As soon as he has touched them with his sword, the fourteen doors fly open. He sits down by the side of the young lady, and tells her to look behind his ear, for it hurts him. At the same time he cuts off fourteen bits of the fourteen dresses she was wearing. As soon as he had done that, the serpent comes, saying joyfully, "I shall eat not one, but three."

Petit Yorge says to him, "Not even one of us."

He leaps on his horse, and begins to fight with the serpent. The serpent makes some terrible bounds. After having fought a long time, at last Petit Yorge is the conqueror. He cuts off one head, and the horse another with his foot. The serpent begs quarter till the next day. Petit Yorge grants it, and the serpent goes away.

The young lady wishes to take the young man home, to show him to her father; but he will not go by any means.

He tells her that he must go to Rome, and set off that very day; that he has made a vow, but that tomorrow he will send his cousin, who is very bold, and is afraid of nothing.

The young lady goes to her father's, Petit Yorge to his garden. Her father is delighted, and cannot comprehend it at all. The young lady goes again with the dinner. The gardener says to her, "You see you have come again today, as I told you. Tomorrow you will come again, just the same."

"I should be very glad of it."

On the morrow Petit Yorge went off at eight o'clock to the Tartaro. He said to him that the serpent had still three heads to be cut off, and that he had still need of all his help. The Tartaro said to him, "Keep quiet, keep quiet; you will conquer him."

He gives him a new dress, finer than the others, a more spirited horse, a terrible dog, a sword, and a bottle of good scented water. He said to him, "The serpent will say to you, 'Ah! if I had a spark between my head and my tail, how I would burn you and your lady, and your horse and your dog.' And you, you will say to him then, 'I, if I had the good-scented water to smell, I would cut off a head from thee, the horse another, and the dog another.' You will give this bottle to the young lady, who will place it in her bosom, and, at the very moment you shall say that she must throw some in your face, and on the horse and on the dog as well."

He goes off then without fear, because the Tartaro had given him this assurance. He comes then to the carriage. The young lady says to him, "Where are you going? The serpent will be here directly. It is enough if he eats me."

He says to her, "Open the door."

She tells him that it is impossible; that there are twenty-one doors. This young man touches them with his sword, and they open of themselves. This young man says to her, giving her the bottle, "When the serpent shall say, 'If I had a spark between my head and my tail, I would burn you,' I shall say to him, 'If I had a drop of the good-scented water under my nose'; you will take the bottle, and throw some over me in a moment."

He then makes her look into his ear, and, while she is looking, he cuts off twenty-one pieces from her twenty-one dresses that she was wearing. At the same moment comes the serpent, saying, with joy, "Instead of one, I shall have four to eat."

The young man said to him, "And you shall not touch one of us, at any rate."

He leaps on his spirited horse, and they fight more fiercely than ever. The horse leaped as high as a house, and the serpent, in a rage, says to him, "If I had a spark of fire between my tail and my head, I would burn you and your lady, and this horse and this terrible dog."

The young man says, "I, if I had the good-scented water under my nose, I would cut off one of your heads, and the horse another, and the dog another."

As he said that, the young lady jumps up, opens the bottle, and very cleverly throws the water just where it was wanted. The young man cuts off a head with his sword, his horse another, and the dog another; and thus they make an end of the serpent. This young man takes the seven tongues with him, and throws away the heads. Judge of the joy of this young lady. She wanted to go straight to her father with her preserver (she says), that her father must thank him too; that he owes his daughter to him. But the young man says to her that it is altogether impossible for him; that he must go and meet his cousin at Rome; that they have made a vow, and that, on their return, all three will come to her father's house.

The young lady is vexed, but she goes off without losing time to tell her father what has happened. The father is very glad that the serpent was utterly destroyed; and he proclaims in all the country that he who has killed the serpent should come forward with the proofs of it.

The young lady goes again with the dinner to the gardener. He says to her, "I told you true, then, that you would not be eaten? Something has, then, killed the serpent?"

She relates to him what had taken place.

But, lo! Some days afterwards there appeared a black charcoal-burner, who said that he had killed the serpent, and was come to claim the reward. When the young lady saw the charcoal-burner, she said immediately, that most certainly it was not he; that it was a fine gentleman, on horseback, and not a pest of a man like him. The charcoal-burner shows the heads of the serpent; and the king says that, in truth, this must be the man. The king had only one word to say, she must marry him. The young lady says, she will not at all, and the father began to compel her, (saying) that no other man came forward. But, as the daughter would not consent, to make a delay, the king proclaims in all the country, that he who killed the serpent would be capable of doing something else, too, and that, on such a day, all the young men should assemble, that he would hang a diamond ring from a bell, and that whosoever riding under it should pierce the ring with his sword, should certainly have his daughter.

From all sides arrive the young men. Our Petit Yorge goes off to the Tartaro, and tells him what has happened, and that he has again need of him. The Tartaro gives him a handsome horse, a superb dress, and a splendid sword. Equipped thus, Petit Yorge goes with the others. He gets ready. The young lady recognizes him immediately, and says so to her father. He has the good luck to carry off the ring on his sword; but he does not stop at all, but goes off galloping as hard as his horse can go. The king and his daughter were in a balcony, looking on at all these gentlemen. They saw that he still went on. The young lady says to her father, "Papa, call him!"

The father says to her, in an angry tone, "He is going off, because apparently he has no desire to have you." And he hurls his lance at him. It strikes him on the leg. He still rides on. You can well imagine what chagrin for the young lady.

The next day she goes with the gardener's dinner. She sees him with his leg bandaged. She asks him what it is.

The young lady begins to suspect something, and goes to tell to her father how the gardener had his leg tied up, and that he must go and ask him what is the matter. That he had told her that it was nothing.

The king did not want to go, (and said) that she must get it out of the gardener; but to please his daughter, he says he will go there. He goes then, and asks him, "What is the matter?" He tells him that a blackthorn has run into him. The king gets angry, and says, "that there is not a blackthorn in all his garden, and that he is telling him a lie."

The daughter says to him, "Tell him to show it us."

He shows it to them, and they are astonished to see that the lance is still there. The king did not know what to think of it all. This gardener has deceived him, and he must give him his daughter. But Petit Yorge, uncovering his bosom, shows the "fleur-de-lis" there. The king did not know what to say; but the daughter said to him, "This is my preserver, and I will marry no one else than him."

Petit Yorge asks the king to send for five dressmakers, the best in the town, and five butchers. The king sends for them.

Petit Yorge asks the dressmakers if they have ever made any new dresses which had a piece out; and on the dressmakers saying, "No," he counts out the pieces and gives them to the dressmakers, asking if it was like that that they had given the dresses to the princess. They say, "Certainly not."

He goes, then, to the butchers, and asks them, if they have ever killed animals without tongues? They say, "No!" He tells them, then, to look in the heads of the serpent. They see that the tongues are not there, and then he takes out the tongues he has.

The king, having seen all that, has nothing more to say. He gives him his daughter. Petit Yorge says to him, that he must invite his father to the wedding, but on the part of the young lady's father; and that they must serve him up at dinner a sheep's heart, half cooked, and without salt. They make a great feast, and place this heart before this father. They make him carve it himself, and he is very indignant at that. The son then says to him, "I expected that"; and he adds, "Ah! My poor father, have you forgotten how you said that you wished to eat the heart, half cooked, and without salt, of him who let the Tartaro go? That is not my heart, but a sheep's heart. I have done this to recall to your memory what you said, and to make you, recognize me."

They embrace each other, and tell each other all their news, and what services the Tartaro had done him. The father returned happy to his house, and Petit Yorge lived very happily with his young lady at the king's house; and they wanted nothing, because they had always the Tartaro at their service.

THE WITCH AND THE NEW BORN INFANT

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Webster, Wentworth. Basque Legends: Collected Chiefly in the Labourd. London: Griffith and Farran, 1879, 69–72.

Date: ca. 1879

Original Source: Basque

National Origin: Basque

---

The following narrative, a supernatural legend, although the setting is Basque, embodies folk beliefs that have international circulation. Witches have the power of shape-shifting in Native American, African, and European traditions. Likewise hair clippings, blood, scraps of clothing, and nail pairings are cross-culturally employed for supernatural purposes. Finally, crossroads are widely accepted as points of intersection between the human and the supernatural realms and are especially associated with pacts between human and superhuman entities.

---

Like many others in the world, there was a man and woman, laborers, who lived by their toil. They had a mule, and the man lived by his mule carrying wine. Sometimes he was a week away from home. He always went to the same inn, where there was a woman and her daughter. One day the laborer sets off with his loaded mule, and his wife was very near her confinement. She was expecting it hourly; but, as he had orders upon orders, he was obliged to set off. He goes then, and comes to this inn. It was a market-day, and they had not kept a bedroom for him as usual, because there were so many people there, and he is put into a dark room without windows near the kitchen. He had not yet gone to sleep, when he hears the woman say to her daughter,

“You are not aware that the wife of the man who is there is confined? Go and see if he is asleep.”

When the man heard that, he began to snore; and when the young girl heard through a slit in the door that he was snoring, she said to her mother,

“Yes, yes, he is asleep.”

The mother said to her then (you may guess whether he was listening), “I must go and charm this newly born infant.”

She takes up a stone under the hearth, and takes from under it a saucepan, in which there was an ointment. She takes a brush, and well rubs herself over her whole body, saying, “Under all the clouds and over all the hedges, half an hour on the road, another half-hour there, and another to return.”

As soon as she had said that, off she went. When the man saw that she was gone, he comes out of his room. He had seen what she did. He anoints himself like her, and says,

“Over the clouds, and under the hedges” (he made a blunder there) “a quarter of an hour to go there, half an hour to stop, and a quarter of an hour for the return.”

He arrives at his house, but torn to pieces by the thorns, and his clothes in strips, but that was all the same to him; he places himself behind the door of his wife's bedroom with a big stick. There comes a great white cat, "Miau, miau!" When the man heard that, he goes out of the place where he was hiding, and with his stick he almost killed this cat, and set out directly afterwards for the inn, but not easily, under all the hedges. In spite of that, he arrives at the woman's house. He goes to bed quickly. The next day, when he gets up, he sees only the daughter. He asks her where her mother is. "She is ill, and you must pay me."

"No! I prefer to see your mother."

He goes to the mother, and finds her very ill. From this day he goes no more to that inn. When he gets home, he tells his wife what had happened, and how he had saved the child. But all was not ended there. They had misfortune upon misfortune. All their cows died, and all their other animals too. They were sinking into the deepest misery. They did not know what would become of them. This man was brooding sadly in thought, when he met an old woman, who asked him what was the matter with him. He told her all his troubles, how many misfortunes they had had all his cows lost. He had bought others, and they too had died directly. He is charmed by witches.

"If you are like that you have only to put a consecrated taper under the peck measure, in the stable, and you will catch her."

He does as the old woman told him, and hides himself in the manger. At midnight she comes under the form of a cat, and gets astride the ox, saying, "The others before were fine, but this is very much finer."

When our man heard that he comes out from where he was hiding, and with his stick he leaves her quite dead; although when he had done that our man was without any resources; (he had) neither bread, nor maize, nor cows, nor pigs, and his wife and children were starving.

He goes off to see if he can do anything. There meets him a gentleman, who says to him, "What is the matter, man, that you are so sad?"

"It is this misery that I am in that torments me so."

"If you have only that, we will arrange all that if you like. I will give you as much money as you wish, if at the end of the year you can guess, and if you tell me with what the devil makes his chalice; and if you do not guess it then your soul shall be for us."

When our man has got his money, he goes off home without thinking at all of the future. He lived happily for some time with his wife and child; but as the time approached he grew sad, and said nothing to his wife. One day he had gone a long way, wishing and trying to find out his secret, and the night overtakes him.

He stops at crossroads, and hides himself. (You know that the witches come to the crossroads to meet together.) They come then, "hushta" from one side, "fushta" from the other, dancing. When they had well amused themselves like that, they begin to tell each other the news.

One says, "You do not know, then, such a man has sold his head to the devil; certainly he will not guess with what the devil makes his chalice. I do not know myself; tell it me."

“With the parings of the finger-nails which Christians cut on the Sunday.”

Our man with difficulty, with great difficulty, kept from showing himself, through his joy and delight. As soon as the day appeared all the witches went off to their homes, and our man too went off to his. He was no more sad. He waited till the day arrived, and went to the crossroads.

This gentleman was already there, come with a lot of devils, thinking that he would be for hell. He asks him, “You know what the devil makes his chalice of?”

“I do not know, but I will try. With the parings of the finger-nails which Christians cut on Sundays?”

As soon as he heard that, the devil goes off with all the others in fire and flame to the bottom of hell. Our man went off home, and lived a long time with his wife and daughter. If they had lived well, they would have died well too.

FRANCE

---

BLUEBEARD

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Lang, Andrew. The Blue Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1889, 290–295.

Date: 1889

Original Source: Perrault, Charles. Histoires ou contes du temps passé, avec des moralités: Contes de ma mère l'Oye. Paris, 1697.

National Origin: France

---

Sharing borders with Belgium, German, Italy, Luxembourg, Monaco, Spain, and Switzerland, and only 21 miles from Great Britain across the English Channel, the various regional cultures of France have had the opportunity to assimilate and adapt a range of European folk traditions in their specific repertoires. Along with those tales that have a unique Basque or Breton essence, France developed literary versions of traditional tales. These narratives, which are now more widely known than their folk models, came to be called fairy tales. Charles Perrault (1628–1703) is the French author who is credited with having established this genre, as well as creating the literary device of “Mother Goose” (mère l’Oye). Despite Perrault’s literary recasting of the plot, the “Bluebeard” tale (AT 312) is an internationally distributed narrative. See, for example, the African American variant “The Bride of the Evil One” (Volume 4, page 193) and the closely related Efik (Nigeria) tale “The Disobedient Daughter Who Married a Skull” (Volume 1, page 85). The motivation for the universal appeal of such narratives is likely to be the apprehension traditionally surrounding the act of marriage. Oral tradition frequently takes such anxieties as the core around which traditional fictions are constructed.

---

There was once a man who had fine houses, both in town and country, a deal of silver and gold plate, embroidered furniture, and coaches gilded all over with gold. But this man was so unlucky as to have a blue beard, which made him so frightfully ugly that all the women and girls ran away from him.

One of his neighbors, a lady of quality, had two daughters who were perfect beauties. He desired of her one of them in marriage, leaving to her choice which of the two she would bestow on him. Neither of them would have him, and they sent him backwards and forwards from one to the other, not being able to bear the thoughts of marrying a man who had a blue beard. Adding to their disgust and aversion was the fact that he already had been married to several wives, and nobody knew what had become of them.

Bluebeard, to engage their affection, took them, with their mother and three or four ladies of their acquaintance, with other young people of the neighborhood, to one of his country houses, where they stayed a whole week.

The time was filled with parties, hunting, fishing, dancing, mirth, and feasting. Nobody went to bed, but all passed the night in rallying and joking with each other. In short, everything succeeded so well that the youngest daughter began to think that the man's beard was not so very blue after all, and that he was a mighty civil gentleman.

As soon as they returned home, the marriage was concluded. About a month afterwards, Bluebeard told his wife that he was obliged to take a country journey for six weeks at least, about affairs of very great consequence. He desired her to divert herself in his absence, to send for her friends and acquaintances, to take them into the country, if she pleased, and to make good cheer wherever she was.

"Here," said he, "are the keys to the two great wardrobes, wherein I have my best furniture. These are to my silver and gold plate, which is not everyday in use. These open my strongboxes, which hold my money, both gold and silver; these my caskets of jewels. And this is the master key to all my apartments. But as for this little one here, it is the key to the closet at the end of the great hall on the ground floor. Open them all; go into each and every one of them, except that little closet, which I forbid you, and forbid it in such a manner that, if you happen to open it, you may expect my just anger and resentment."

She promised to observe, very exactly, whatever he had ordered. Then he, after having embraced her, got into his coach and proceeded on his journey.

Her neighbors and good friends did not wait to be sent for by the newly married lady. They were impatient to see all the rich furniture of her house, and had not dared to come while her husband was there, because of his blue beard, which frightened them. They ran through all the rooms, closets, and wardrobes, which were all so fine and rich that they seemed to surpass one another.

After that, they went up into the two great rooms, which contained the best and richest furniture. They could not sufficiently admire the number and beauty of the tapestry, beds, couches, cabinets, stands, tables, and looking glasses, in which you might see yourself from head to foot; some of them were framed with glass, others with silver, plain and gilded, the finest and most magnificent that they had ever seen.

They ceased not to extol and envy the happiness of their friend, who in the meantime in no way diverted herself in looking upon all these rich things, because of the impatience she had to go and open the closet on the ground floor. She was so much pressed by her curiosity that, without considering that it was very uncivil for her to leave her company, she went down a little back staircase, and with such excessive haste that she nearly fell and broke her neck.

Having come to the closet door, she made a stop for some time, thinking about her husband's orders, and considering what unhappiness might attend her if she was disobedient; but the temptation was so strong that she could not overcome it. She then took the little key, and opened it, trembling. At first she could not see anything plainly, because the windows were shut. After some moments she began to perceive that the floor was all covered over with clotted blood, on which lay the bodies of several dead women, ranged against the walls. (These were all the wives whom Bluebeard had married and murdered, one after another.) She thought she should have died for fear, and the key, which she, pulled out of the lock, fell out of her hand.

After having somewhat recovered her surprise, she picked up the key, locked the door, and went upstairs into her chamber to recover; but she could not, so much was she frightened. Having observed that the key to the closet was stained with blood, she tried two or three times to wipe it off; but the blood would not come out; in vain did she wash it, and even rub it with soap and sand. The blood still remained, for the key was magical and she could never make it quite clean; when the blood was gone off from one side, it came again on the other.

Bluebeard returned from his journey the same evening, saying that he had received letters upon the road, informing him that the affair he went about had concluded to his advantage. His wife did all she could to convince him that she was extremely happy about his speedy return.

The next morning he asked her for the keys, which she gave him, but with such a trembling hand that he easily guessed what had happened.

"What!" said he, "is not the key of my closet among the rest?"

"I must," said she, "have left it upstairs upon the table."

"Fail not," said Bluebeard, "to bring it to me at once."

After several goings backwards and forwards, she was forced to bring him the key. Bluebeard, having very attentively considered it, said to his wife, "Why is there blood on the key?"

"I do not know," cried the poor woman, paler than death.

"You do not know!" replied Bluebeard. "I very well know. You went into the closet, did you not? Very well, madam; you shall go back, and take your place among the ladies you saw there."

Upon this she threw herself at her husband's feet, and begged his pardon with all the signs of a true repentance, vowing that she would never more be disobedient. She would have melted a rock, so beautiful and sorrowful was she; but Bluebeard had a heart harder than any rock!

"You must die, madam," said he, "at once."

"Since I must die," answered she (looking upon him with her eyes all bathed in tears), "give me some little time to say my prayers."

"I give you," replied Bluebeard, "half a quarter of an hour, but not one moment more."

When she was alone she called out to her sister, and said to her, "Sister Anne" (for that was her name), "go up, I beg you, to the top of the tower, and look if my brothers are not coming. They promised me that they would come today, and if you see them, give them a sign to make haste."

Her sister Anne went up to the top of the tower, and the poor afflicted wife cried out from time to time, "Anne, sister Anne, do you see anyone coming?"

And sister Anne said, "I see nothing but a cloud of dust in the sun, and the green grass."

In the meanwhile Bluebeard, holding a great saber in his hand, cried out as loud as he could bawl to his wife, "Come down instantly, or I shall come up to you."

"One moment longer, if you please," said his wife; and then she cried out very softly, "Anne, sister Anne, do you see anybody coming?"

And sister Anne answered, "I see nothing but a cloud of dust in the sun, and the green grass."

"Come down quickly," cried Bluebeard, "or I will come up to you."

"I am coming," answered his wife; and then she cried, "Anne, sister Anne, do you not see anyone coming?"

"I see," replied sister Anne, "a great cloud of dust approaching us."

"Are they my brothers?"

"Alas, no my dear sister, I see a flock of sheep."

"Will you not come down?" cried Bluebeard.

"One moment longer," said his wife, and then she cried out, "Anne, sister Anne, do you see nobody coming?"

"I see," said she, "two horsemen, but they are still a great way off."

"God be praised," replied the poor wife joyfully. "They are my brothers. I will make them a sign, as well as I can for them to make haste."

Then Bluebeard bawled out so loud that he made the whole house tremble. The distressed wife came down, and threw herself at his feet, all in tears, with her hair about her shoulders.

"This means nothing," said Bluebeard. "You must die!" Then, taking hold of her hair with one hand, and lifting up the sword with the other, he prepared to strike off her head. The poor lady, turning about to him, and looking at him with dying eyes, desired him to afford her one little moment to recollect herself.

"No, no," said he, "commend yourself to God," and was just ready to strike.

At this very instant there was such a loud knocking at the gate that Bluebeard made a sudden stop. The gate was opened, and two horsemen entered. Drawing their swords, they ran directly to Bluebeard. He knew them to be his wife's brothers, one a dragoon, the other a musketeer; so that he ran away immediately to save himself; but the two brothers pursued and overtook him before he could get to the steps of the porch. Then they ran their swords through his body and left him dead. The poor wife was almost as dead as her husband, and had not strength enough to rise and welcome her brothers.

Bluebeard had no heirs, and so his wife became mistress of all his estate. She made use of one part of it to marry her sister Anne to a young gentleman who had loved her a long while; another part to buy captains' commissions for her brothers, and the rest to marry herself to a very worthy gentleman, who made her forget the ill time she had passed with Bluebeard.

THE STORY OF PRETTY GOLDBLOCKS

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Lang, Andrew. The Blue Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1889, 193–205.

Date: 1889

Original Source: d'Aulnoy, Madame (Marie-Catherine). La Belle aux Cheveux d'Or, Les Contes des Fées (Fairy Tales), 1697.

National Origin: France

---

The following narrative is in most of its particulars a variant of “Ferdinand the True and Ferdinand the False” (AT 531). The tale, however, shares many motifs with “The Grateful Animals” (AT 554). Just as Charles Perrault is credited with establishing the major features of the fairy tale, the French author Marie-Catherine Le Jumel de Barneville, Baronne d'Aulnoy (1650/1651–1705) Madame d'Aulnoy, is credited with coining the term “fairy tale” for this genre.

---

Once upon a time there was a princess who was the prettiest creature in the world. And because she was so beautiful, and because her hair was like the finest gold, and waved and rippled nearly to the ground, she was called Pretty Goldilocks. She always wore a crown of flowers, and her dresses were embroidered with diamonds and pearls, and everybody who saw her fell in love with her.

Now one of her neighbors was a young king who was not married. He was very rich and handsome, and when he heard all that was said about Pretty Goldilocks, though he had never seen her, he fell so deeply in love with her that he could neither eat nor drink. So he resolved to send an ambassador to ask her in marriage. He had a splendid carriage made for his ambassador, and gave him more than a hundred horses and a hundred servants, and told him to be sure and bring the Princess back with him. After he had started nothing else was talked of at Court, and the King felt so sure that the Princess would consent that he set his people to work at pretty dresses and splendid furniture, that they might be ready by the time she came. Meanwhile, the ambassador arrived at the Princess's palace and delivered his little message, but whether she happened to be cross that day, or whether the compliment did not please her, is not known. She only answered that she was very much obliged to the King, but she had no wish to be married. The ambassador set off sadly on his homeward way, bringing all the King's presents back with him, for the Princess was too well brought up to accept the pearls and diamonds when she would not accept the King, so she had only kept twenty-five English pins that he might not be vexed.

When the ambassador reached the city, where the King was waiting impatiently, everybody was very much annoyed with him for not bringing the Princess, and the King cried like a baby, and nobody could console him. Now there was at the Court a young man, who was more clever and handsome than anyone else. He was called Charming, and everyone loved him, excepting a few envious people who were angry at his being the King's favorite and knowing all the State secrets. He happened to one day be with some people who were speaking of the ambassador's return and saying that his going to the Princess had not done much good, when Charming said rashly, "If the King had sent me to the Princess Goldilocks I am sure she would have come back with me."

His enemies at once went to the King and said, "You will hardly believe, sire, what Charming has the audacity to say—that if HE had been sent to the Princess Goldilocks she would certainly have come back with him. He seems to think that he is so much handsomer than you that the Princess would have fallen in love with him and followed him willingly." The King was very angry when he heard this.

"Ha, ha!" said he; "does he laugh at my unhappiness, and think himself more fascinating than I am? Go, and let him be shut up in my great tower to die of hunger."

So the King's guards went to fetch Charming, who had thought no more of his rash speech, and carried him off to prison with great cruelty. The poor prisoner had only a little straw for his bed, and but for a little stream of water which flowed through the tower he would have died of thirst.

One day when he was in despair he said to himself, "How can I have offended the King? I am his most faithful subject, and have done nothing against him."

The King chanced to be passing the tower and recognized the voice of his former favorite. He stopped to listen in spite of Charming's enemies, who tried to persuade him to have nothing more to do with the traitor. But the King said, "Be quiet, I wish to hear what he says."

And then he opened the tower door and called to Charming, who came very sadly and kissed the King's hand, saying, "What have I done, sire, to deserve this cruel treatment?"

"You mocked me and my ambassador," said the King, "and you said that if I had sent you for the Princess Goldilocks you would certainly have brought her back."

"It is quite true, sire," replied Charming; "I should have drawn such a picture of you, and represented your good qualities in such a way, that I am certain the Princess would have found you irresistible. But I cannot see what there is in that to make you angry."

The King could not see any cause for anger either when the matter was presented to him in this light, and he began to frown very fiercely at the courtiers who had so misrepresented his favorite.

So he took Charming back to the palace with him, and after seeing that he had a very good supper he said to him, "You know that I love Pretty Goldilocks as much as ever, her refusal has not made any difference to me; but I don't know how to make her change her mind; I really should like to send you, to see if you can persuade her to marry me."

Charming replied that he was perfectly willing to go, and would set out the very next day.

"But you must wait till I can get a grand escort for you," said the King. But Charming said that he only wanted a good horse to ride, and the King, who was delighted at his being ready to start so promptly, gave him letters to the Princess, and bade him good speed. It was on a Monday morning that he set out all alone upon his errand, thinking of nothing but how he could persuade the Princess Goldilocks to marry the King. He had a writing-book in his pocket, and whenever any happy thought struck him he dismounted from his horse and sat down under the trees to put it into the harangue which he was preparing for the Princess, before he forgot it.

One day when he had started at the very earliest dawn, and was riding over a great meadow, he suddenly had a capital idea, and, springing from his horse, he sat down under a willow tree which grew by a little river. When he had written it down he was looking round him, pleased to find himself in such a pretty place, when all at once he saw a great golden carp lying gasping and exhausted upon the grass. In leaping after little flies she had thrown herself high upon the bank, where she had lain till she was nearly dead. Charming had pity upon her, and, though he couldn't help thinking that she would have been very nice for dinner, he picked her up gently and put her back into the water. As soon as Dame Carp felt the refreshing coolness of the water she sank down joyfully to the bottom of the river, then, swimming up to the bank quite boldly, she said, "I thank you, Charming, for the kindness you have done me. You have saved my life; one day I will repay you.” So saying, she sank down into the water again, leaving Charming greatly astonished at her politeness.

Another day, as he journeyed on, he saw a raven in great distress. The poor bird was closely pursued by an eagle, which would soon have eaten it up, had not Charming quickly fitted an arrow to his bow and shot the eagle dead. The raven perched upon a tree very joyfully.

“Charming,” said he, “it was very generous of you to rescue a poor raven; I am not ungrateful, some day I will repay you.”

Charming thought it was very nice of the raven to say so, and went on his way.

Before the sun rose he found himself in a thick wood where it was too dark for him to see his path, and here he heard an owl crying as if it were in despair.

“Hark!” said he, “that must be an owl in great trouble, I am sure it has gone into a snare”; and he began to hunt about, and presently found a great net which some bird-catchers had spread the night before.

“What a pity it is that men do nothing but torment and persecute poor creatures which never do them any harm!” said he, and he took out his knife and cut the cords of the net, and the owl flitted away into the darkness, but then turning, with one flicker of her wings, she came back to Charming and said, “It does not need many words to tell you how great a service you have done me. I was caught; in a few minutes the fowlers would have been here—without your help I should have been killed. I am grateful, and one day I will repay you.”

These three adventures were the only ones of any consequence that befell Charming upon his journey, and he made all the haste he could to reach the palace of the Princess Goldilocks.

When he arrived he thought everything he saw delightful and magnificent. Diamonds were as plentiful as pebbles, and the gold and silver, the beautiful dresses, the sweetmeats and pretty things that were everywhere quite amazed him; he thought to himself, “If the Princess consents to leave all this, and come with me to marry the King, he may think himself lucky!”

Then he dressed himself carefully in rich brocade, with scarlet and white plumes, and threw a splendid embroidered scarf over his shoulder, and, looking as gay and as graceful as possible, he presented himself at the door of the palace, carrying in his arm a tiny pretty dog which he had bought on the way. The guards saluted him respectfully, and a messenger was sent to the Princess to announce the arrival of Charming as ambassador of her neighbor the King.

“Charming,” said the Princess, “the name promises well; I have no doubt that he is good looking and fascinates everybody.”

“Indeed he does, madam,” said all her maids of honor in one breath. “We saw him from the window of the garret where we were spinning flax, and we could do nothing but look at him as long as he was in sight.”

“Well to be sure,” said the Princess, “that’s how you amuse yourselves, is it? Looking at strangers out of the window! Be quick and give me my blue satin embroidered dress, and comb out my golden hair. Let somebody make me fresh garlands of flowers, and give me my high-heeled shoes and my fan, and tell them to sweep my great hall and my throne, for I want everyone to say I am really 'Pretty Goldilocks'."

You can imagine how all her maids scurried this way and that to make the Princess ready, and how in their haste they knocked their heads together and hindered each other, till she thought they would never have done. However, at last they led her into the gallery of mirrors that she might assure herself that nothing was lacking in her appearance, and then she mounted her throne of gold, ebony, and ivory, while her ladies took their guitars and began to sing softly. Then Charming was led in, and was so struck with astonishment and admiration that at first not a word could he say. But presently he took courage and delivered his harangue, bravely ending by begging the Princess to spare him the disappointment of going back without her.

"Sir Charming," answered she, "all the reasons you have given me are very good ones, and I assure you that I should have more pleasure in obliging you than anyone else, but you must know that a month ago as I was walking by the river with my ladies I took off my glove, and as I did so a ring that I was wearing slipped off my finger and rolled into the water. As I valued it more than my kingdom, you may imagine how vexed I was at losing it, and I vowed to never listen to any proposal of marriage unless the ambassador first brought me back my ring. So now you know what is expected of you, for if you talked for fifteen days and fifteen nights you could not make me change my mind."

Charming was very much surprised by this answer, but he bowed low to the Princess, and begged her to accept the embroidered scarf and the tiny dog he had brought with him. But she answered that she did not want any presents, and that he was to remember what she had just told him. When he got back to his lodging he went to bed without eating any supper, and his little dog, who was called Frisk, couldn't eat any either, but came and lay down close to him. All night Charming sighed and lamented.

"How am I to find a ring that fell into the river a month ago?" said he. "It is useless to try; the Princess must have told me to do it on purpose, knowing it was impossible." And then he sighed again.

Frisk heard him and said, "My dear master, don't despair; the luck may change, you are too good not to be happy. Let us go down to the river as soon as it is light."

But Charming only gave him two little pats and said nothing, and very soon he fell asleep.

At the first glimmer of dawn Frisk began to jump about, and when he had waked Charming they went out together, first into the garden, and then down to the river's brink, where they wandered up and down. Charming was thinking sadly of having to go back unsuccessful when he heard someone calling, "Charming, Charming!" He looked all about him and thought he must be dreaming, as he could not see anybody. Then he walked on and the voice called again, "Charming, Charming!"

"Who calls me?" said he. Frisk, who was very small and could look closely into the water, cried out, "I see a golden carp coming." And sure enough there was the great carp, who said to Charming, "You saved my life in the meadow by the willow tree, and I promised that I would repay you. Take this, it is Princess Goldilock's ring." Charming took the ring out of Dame Carp's mouth, thanking her a thousand times, and he and tiny Frisk went straight to the palace, where someone told the Princess that he was asking to see her.

"Ah! poor fellow," said she, "he must have come to say good-bye, finding it impossible to do as I asked."

So in came Charming, who presented her with the ring and said, "Madam, I have done your bidding. Will it please you to marry my master?" When the Princess saw her ring brought back to her unhurt she was so astonished that she thought she must be dreaming.

"Truly, Charming," said she, "you must be the favorite of some fairy, or you could never have found it."

"Madam," answered he, "I was helped by nothing but my desire to obey your wishes."

"Since you are so kind," said she, "perhaps you will do me another service, for till it is done I will never be married. There is a prince not far from here whose name is Galifron, who once wanted to marry me, but when I refused he uttered the most terrible threats against me, and vowed that he would lay waste my country. But what could I do? I could not marry a frightful giant as tall as a tower, who eats up people as a monkey eats chestnuts, and who talks so loud that anybody who has to listen to him becomes quite deaf. Nevertheless, he does not cease to persecute me and to kill my subjects. So before I can listen to your proposal you must kill him and bring me his head."

Charming was rather dismayed at this command, but he answered, "Very well, Princess, I will fight this Galifron; I believe that he will kill me, but at any rate I shall die in your defense."

Then the Princess was frightened and said everything she could think of to prevent Charming from fighting the giant, but it was of no use, and he went out to arm himself suitably, and then, taking little Frisk with him, he mounted his horse and set out for Galifron's country. Everyone he met told him what a terrible giant Galifron was, and that nobody dared go near him; and the more he heard, the more frightened he grew. Frisk tried to encourage him by saying, "While you are fighting the giant, dear master, I will go and bite his heels, and when he stoops down to look at me you can kill him."

Charming praised his little dog's plan, but knew that this help would not do much good.

At last he drew near the giant's castle, and saw to his horror that every path that led to it was strewn with bones. Before long he saw Galifron coming. His head was higher than the tallest trees, and he sang in a terrible voice, "Bring out your little boys and girls, Pray do not stay to do their curls, For I shall eat so very many, I shall not know if they have any."

Thereupon Charming sang out as loud as he could to the same tune, "Come out and meet the valiant Charming who finds you not at all alarming; Although he is not very tall, He's big enough to make you fall."

The rhymes were not very correct, but you see he had made them up so quickly that it is a miracle that they were not worse; especially as he was horribly frightened all the time. When Galifron heard these words he looked all about him, and saw Charming standing, sword in hand this put the giant into a terrible rage, and he aimed a blow at Charming with his huge iron club, which would certainly have killed him if it had reached him, but at that instant a raven perched upon the giant's head, and, pecking with its strong beak and beating with its great wings so confused and blinded him that all his blows fell harmlessly upon the air, and Charming, rushing in, gave him several strokes with his sharp sword so that he fell to the ground. Whereupon Charming cut off his head before he knew anything about it, and the raven from a tree close by croaked out, "You see I have not forgotten the good turn you did me in killing the eagle. Today I think I have fulfilled my promise of repaying you."

"Indeed, I owe you more gratitude than you ever owed me," replied Charming. And then he mounted his horse and rode off with Galifron's head.

When he reached the city the people ran after him in crowds, crying, "Behold the brave Charming, who has killed the giant!" And their shouts reached the Princess's ear, but she dared not ask what was happening, for fear she should hear that Charming had been killed. But very soon he arrived at the palace with the giant's head, of which she was still terrified, though it could no longer do her any harm.

"Princess," said Charming, "I have killed your enemy; I hope you will now consent to marry the King my master."

"Oh dear! no," said the Princess, "not until you have brought me some water from the Gloomy Cavern.

"Not far from here there is a deep cave, the entrance to which is guarded by two dragons with fiery eyes, who will not allow anyone to pass them. When you get into the cavern you will find an immense hole, which you must go down, and it is full of toads and snakes; at the bottom of this hole there is another little cave, in which rises the Fountain of Health and Beauty. It is some of this water that I really must have: everything it touches becomes wonderful. The beautiful things will always remain beautiful, and the ugly things become lovely. If one is young one never grows old, and if one is old one becomes young. You see, Charming, I could not leave my kingdom without taking some of it with me."

"Princess," said he, "you at least can never need this water, but I am an unhappy ambassador, whose death you desire. Where you send me I will go, though I know I shall never return."

And, as the Princess Goldilocks showed no sign of relenting, he started with his little dog for the Gloomy Cavern. Everyone he met on the way said, "What a pity that a handsome young man should throw away his life so carelessly! He is going to the cavern alone, though if he had a hundred men with him he could not succeed. Why does the Princess ask impossibilities?" Charming said nothing, but he was very sad. When he was near the top of a hill he dismounted to let his horse graze, while Frisk amused himself by chasing flies. Charming knew he could not be far from the Gloomy Cavern, and on looking about him he saw a black hideous rock from which came a thick smoke, followed in a moment by one of the dragons with fire blazing from his mouth and eyes. His body was yellow and green, and his claws scarlet, and his tail was so long that it lay in a hundred coils. Frisk was so terrified at the sight of it that he did not know where to hide. Charming, quite determined to get the water or die, now drew his sword, and, taking the crystal flask which Pretty Goldilocks had given him to fill, said to Frisk,

"I feel sure that I shall never come back from this expedition; when I am dead, go to the Princess and tell her that her errand has cost me my life. Then find the King my master, and relate all my adventures to him."

As he spoke he heard a voice calling, "Charming, Charming!"

"Who calls me?" said he; then he saw an owl sitting in a hollow tree, who said to him,

"You saved my life when I was caught in the net, now I can repay you. Trust me with the flask, for I know all the ways of the Gloomy Cavern, and can fill it from the Fountain of Beauty." Charming was only too glad to give her the flask, and she flitted into the cavern quite unnoticed by the dragon, and after some time returned with the flask, filled to the very brim with sparkling water. Charming thanked her with all his heart, and joyfully hastened back to the town.

He went straight to the palace and gave the flask to the Princess, who had no further objection to make. So she thanked Charming, and ordered that preparations should be made for her departure, and they soon set out together. The Princess found Charming such an agreeable companion that she sometimes said to him, "Why didn't we stay where we were? I could have made you king, and we should have been so happy!"

But Charming only answered, "I could not have done anything that would have vexed my master so much, even for a kingdom, or to please you, though I think you are as beautiful as the sun."

At last they reached the King's great city, and he came out to meet the Princess, bringing magnificent presents, and the marriage was celebrated with great rejoicings. But Goldilocks was so fond of Charming that she could not be happy unless he was near her, and she was always singing his praises.

"If it hadn't been for Charming," she said to the King, "I should never have come here; you ought to be very much obliged to him, for he did the most impossible things and got me water from the Fountain of Beauty, so I can never grow old, and shall get prettier every year."

Then Charming's enemies said to the King, "It is a wonder that you are not jealous, the Queen thinks there is nobody in the world like Charming. As if anybody you had sent could not have done just as much!"

"It is quite true, now I come to think of it," said the King. "Let him be chained hand and foot, and thrown into the tower."

So they took Charming, and as a reward for having served the King so faithfully he was shut up in the tower, where he only saw the jailer, who brought him a piece of black bread and a pitcher of water every day.

However, little Frisk came to console him, and told him all the news.

When Pretty Goldilocks heard what had happened she threw herself at the King's feet and begged him to set Charming free, but the more she cried, the more angry he was, and at last she saw that it was useless to say any more; but it made her very sad. Then the King took it into his head that perhaps he was not handsome enough to please the Princess Goldilocks, and he thought he would bathe his face with the water from the Fountain of Beauty, which was in the flask on a shelf in the Princess's room, where she had placed it that she might see it often. Now it happened that one of the Princess's ladies in chasing a spider had knocked the flask off the shelf and broken it, and every drop of the water had been spilt. Not knowing what to do, she had hastily swept away the pieces of crystal, and then remembered that in the King's room she had seen a flask of exactly the same shape, also filled with sparkling water. So, without saying a word, she fetched it and stood it upon the Queen's shelf.

Now the water in this flask was what was used in the kingdom for getting rid of troublesome people. Instead of having their heads cut off in the usual way, their faces were bathed with the water, and they instantly fell asleep and never woke up any more. So, when the King, thinking to improve his beauty, took the flask and sprinkled the water upon his face, HE fell asleep, and nobody could wake him.

Little Frisk was the first to hear the news, and he ran to tell Charming, who sent him to beg the Princess not to forget the poor prisoner. All the palace was in confusion on account of the King's death, but tiny Frisk made his way through the crowd to the Princess's side, and said,

"Madam, do not forget poor Charming."

Then she remembered all he had done for her, and without saying a word to anyone went straight to the tower, and with her own hands took off Charming's chains. Then, putting a golden crown upon his head, and the royal mantle upon his shoulders, she said, "Come, faithful Charming, I make you king, and will take you for my husband."

Charming, once more free and happy, fell at her feet and thanked her for her gracious words.

Everybody was delighted that he should be king, and the wedding, which took place at once, was the prettiest that can be imagined, and Prince Charming and Princess Goldilocks lived happily ever after.

RICKY OF THE TUFT

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Ashliman, D. L. "Ricky of the Tuft." Folktexts: A Library of Folktales, Folklore, Fairy Tales and Mythology. <http://www.pitt.edu/~dash/perrault07.html> (July 21, 2007).

Date: Unavailable

Original Sources: Johnson, A. E., trans. Old-Time Stories Told by Master Charles Perrault. New York: Dodd Mead and Company, 1921. Morals are from Littlewood, S. R., trans. Perrault's Fairy Tales. London: Herbert and Daniel, 1912.

National Origin: France

---

"Ricky of the Tuft" is a variant of "The Beautiful and the Ugly Twin" (AT 711). A common version of the tale focuses on a childless woman's pact with a supernatural figure to bear a child. When conditions of the agreement are violated, twins are born: one ugly but clever, the other beautiful but inept. Rather than outshining her beautiful sister, the ugly twin assists her. This variant, however, focuses on the relationship between the beautiful sister and a deformed suitor to extol the virtues of both love and sensibility.

---

Once upon a time there was a queen who bore a son so ugly and misshapen that for some time it was doubtful if he would have human form at all. But a fairy who was present at his birth promised that he should have plenty of brains, and added that by virtue of the gift which she had just bestowed upon him he would be able to impart to the person whom he should love best the same degree of intelligence which he possessed himself.

This somewhat consoled the poor queen, who was greatly disappointed at having brought into the world such a hideous brat. And indeed, no sooner did the child begin to speak than his sayings proved to be full of shrewdness, while all that he did was somehow so clever that he charmed everyone.

I forgot to mention that when he was born he had a little tuft of hair upon his head. For this reason he was called Ricky of the Tuft, Ricky being his family name.

Some seven or eight years later the queen of a neighboring kingdom gave birth to twin daughters. The first one to come into the world was more beautiful than the dawn, and the queen was so overjoyed that it was feared her great excitement might do her some harm. The same fairy who had assisted at the birth of Ricky of the Tuft was present, and in order to moderate the transports of the queen she declared that this little princess would have no sense at all, and would be as stupid as she was beautiful. The queen was deeply mortified, and a moment or two later her chagrin became greater still, for the second daughter proved to be extremely ugly.

“Do not be distressed, Madam,” said the fairy. “Your daughter shall be recompensed in another way. She shall have so much good sense that her lack of beauty will scarcely be noticed.”

“May Heaven grant it!” said the queen. “But is there no means by which the elder, who is so beautiful, can be endowed with some intelligence?”

“In the matter of brains I can do nothing for her, Madam,” said the fairy, “but as regards beauty I can do a great deal. As there is nothing I would not do to please you, I will bestow upon her the power of making beautiful any person who shall greatly please her.”

As the two princesses grew up their perfections increased, and everywhere the beauty of the elder and the wit of the younger were the subject of common talk.

It is equally true that their defects also increased as they became older. The younger grew uglier every minute, and the elder daily became more stupid. Either she answered nothing at all when spoken to, or replied with some idiotic remark. At the same time she was so awkward that she could not set four china vases on the mantelpiece without breaking one of them, nor drink a glass of water without spilling half of it over her clothes.

Now although the elder girl possessed the great advantage which beauty always confers upon youth, she was nevertheless outshone in almost all company by her younger sister. At first everyone gathered round the beauty to see and admire her, but very soon they were all attracted by the graceful and easy conversation of the clever one. In a very short time the elder girl would be left entirely alone, while everybody clustered round her sister.

The elder princess was not so stupid that she was not aware of this, and she would willingly have surrendered all her beauty for half her sister’s cleverness. Sometimes she was ready to die of grief for the queen, though a sensible woman, could not refrain from occasionally reproaching her for her stupidity.

The princess had retired one day to a wood to bemoan her misfortune, when she saw approaching her an ugly little man, of very disagreeable appearance, but clad in magnificent attire.

This was the young prince Ricky of the Tuft. He had fallen in love with her portrait, which was everywhere to be seen, and had left his father’s kingdom in order to have the pleasure of seeing and talking to her.

Delighted to meet her thus alone, he approached with every mark of respect and politeness. But while he paid her the usual compliments he noticed that she was plunged in melancholy.

“I cannot understand, madam,” he said, “how anyone with your beauty can be so sad as you appear. I can boast of having seen many fair ladies, and I declare that none of them could compare in beauty with you.”

“It is very kind of you to say so, sir,” answered the princess; and stopped there, at a loss what to say further.

“Beauty,” said Ricky, “is of such great advantage that everything else can be disregarded; and I do not see that the possessor of it can have anything much to grieve about.”

To this the princess replied, “I would rather be as plain as you are and have some sense, than be as beautiful as I am and at the same time stupid.”

“Nothing more clearly displays good sense, madam, than a belief that one is not possessed of it. It follows, therefore, that the more one has, the more one fears it to be wanting.”

“I am not sure about that,” said the princess; “but I know only too well that I am very stupid, and this is the reason of the misery which is nearly killing me.”

“If that is all that troubles you, madam, I can easily put an end to your suffering.”

“How will you manage that?” said the princess.

“I am able, madam,” said Ricky of the Tuft, “to bestow as much good sense as it is possible to possess on the person whom I love the most. You are that person, and it therefore rests with you to decide whether you will acquire so much intelligence. The only condition is that you shall consent to marry me.”

The princess was dumfounded, and remained silent.

“I can see,” pursued Ricky, “that this suggestion perplexes you, and I am not surprised. But I will give you a whole year to make up your mind to it.”

The princess had so little sense, and at the same time desired it so ardently, that she persuaded herself the end of this year would never come. So she accepted the offer which had been made to her. No sooner had she given her word to Ricky that she would marry him within one year from that very day, than she felt a complete change come over her. She found herself able to say all that she wished with the greatest ease, and to say it in an elegant, finished, and natural manner. She at once engaged Ricky in a brilliant and lengthy conversation, holding her own so well that Ricky feared he had given her a larger share of sense than he had retained for himself.

On her return to the palace amazement reigned throughout the court at such a sudden and extraordinary change. Whereas formerly they had been accustomed to hear her give vent to silly, pert remarks, they now heard her express herself sensibly and very wittily. The entire court was overjoyed. The only person not too pleased was the younger sister, for now that she had no longer the advantage over the elder in wit, she seemed nothing but a little fright in comparison.

The king himself often took her advice, and several times held his councils in her apartment.

The news of this change spread abroad, and the princes of the neighboring kingdoms made many attempts to captivate her. Almost all asked her in marriage. But she found none with enough sense, and so she listened to all without promising herself to any.

At last came one who was so powerful, so rich, so witty, and so handsome, that she could not help being somewhat attracted by him. Her father noticed this, and told her she could make her own choice of a husband. She had only to declare herself. Now the more sense one has, the more difficult it is to make up one's mind in an affair of this kind. After thanking her father, therefore, she asked for a little time to think it over. In order to ponder quietly what she had better do she went to walk in a wood—the very one, as it happened, where she had encountered Ricky of the Tuft.

While she walked, deep in thought, she heard beneath her feet a thudding sound, as though many people were running busily to and fro. Listening more attentively she heard voices. "Bring me that boiler," said one; then another, "Put some wood on that fire!"

At that moment the ground opened, and she saw below what appeared to be a large kitchen full of cooks and scullions, and all the train of attendants which the preparation of a great banquet involves. A gang of some twenty or thirty spit-turners emerged and took up their positions round a very long table in a path in the wood. They all wore their cook's caps on one side, and with their basting implements in their hands they kept time together as they worked, to the lilt of a melodious song.

The princess was astonished by this spectacle, and asked for whom their work was being done.

"For Prince Ricky of the Tuft, madam," said the foreman of the gang. "His wedding is tomorrow."

At this the princess was more surprised than ever. In a flash she remembered that it was a year to the very day since she had promised to marry Prince Ricky of the Tuft, and was taken aback by the recollection. The reason she had forgotten was that when she made the promise she was still without sense, and with the acquisition of that intelligence which the prince had bestowed upon her, all memory of her former stupidities had been blotted out.

She had not gone another thirty paces when Ricky of the Tuft appeared before her, gallant and resplendent, like a prince upon his wedding day.

"As you see, madam," he said, "I keep my word to the minute. I do not doubt that you have come to keep yours, and by giving me your hand to make me the happiest of men."

"I will be frank with you," replied the princess. "I have not yet made up my mind on the point, and I am afraid I shall never be able to take the decision you desire."

"You astonish me, madam," said Ricky of the Tuft.

"I can well believe it," said the princess, "and undoubtedly, if I had to deal with a clown, or a man who lacked good sense, I should feel myself very awkwardly situated. 'A princess must keep her word,' he would say, 'and you must marry me because you promised to!' But I am speaking to a man of the world, of the greatest good sense, and I am sure that he will listen to reason. As you are aware, I could not make up my mind to marry you even when I was entirely without sense; how can you expect that today, possessing the intelligence you bestowed on me, which makes me still more difficult to please than formerly, I should take a decision which I could not take then? If you wished so much to marry me, you were very wrong to relieve me of my stupidity, and to let me see more clearly than I did."

"If a man who lacked good sense," replied Ricky of the Tuft, "would be justified, as you have just said, in reproaching you for breaking your word, why do you expect, madam, that I should act differently where the happiness of my whole life is at stake? Is it reasonable that people who have sense should be treated worse than those who have none? Would you maintain that for a moment—you, who so markedly have sense, and desired so ardently to have it? But, pardon me, let us get to the facts. With the exception of my ugliness, is there anything about me which displeases you? Are you dissatisfied with my breeding, my brains, my disposition, or my manners?"

"In no way," replied the princess. "I like exceedingly all that you have displayed of the qualities you mention."

"In that case," said Ricky of the Tuft, "happiness will be mine, for it lies in your power to make me the most attractive of men."

"How can that be done?" asked the princess.

"It will happen of itself," replied Ricky of the Tuft, "if you love me well enough to wish that it be so. To remove your doubts, madam, let me tell you that the same fairy who on the day of my birth bestowed upon me the power of endowing with intelligence the woman of my choice, gave to you also the power of endowing with beauty the man whom you should love, and on whom you should wish to confer this favor."

"If that is so," said the princess, "I wish with all my heart that you may become the handsomest and most attractive prince in the world, and I give you without reserve the boon which it is mine to bestow."

No sooner had the princess uttered these words than Ricky of the Tuft appeared before her eyes as the handsomest, most graceful and attractive man that she had ever set eyes on.

Some people assert that this was not the work of fairy enchantment, but that love alone brought about the transformation. They say that the princess, as she mused upon her lover's constancy, upon his good sense, and his many admirable qualities of heart and head, grew blind to the deformity of his body and the ugliness of his face; that his humpback seemed no more than was natural in a man who could make the courtliest of bows, and that the dreadful limp which had formerly distressed her now betokened nothing more than a certain diffidence and charming deference of manner. They say further that she found his eyes shine all the brighter for their squint, and that this defect in them was to her but a sign of passionate love; while his great red nose she found naught but martial and heroic.

However that may be, the princess promised to marry him on the spot, provided only that he could obtain the consent of her royal father.

The king knew Ricky of the Tuft to be a prince both wise and witty, and on learning of his daughter's regard for him, he accepted him with pleasure as a son-in-law.

The wedding took place upon the morrow, just as Ricky of the Tuft had foreseen, and in accordance with the arrangements he had long ago put in train.

Moral:

Here's a fairy tale for you,
Which is just as good as true.
What we love is always fair,
Clever, deft, and debonair.

Another Moral:

Nature oft, with open arms,
Lavishes a thousand charms;
But it is not these that bring
True love's truest offering.
'Tis some quality that lies
All unseen to other eyes—
Something in the heart or mind.

SEPHARDIM

---

THE SARAGOSSAN PURIM

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Hanauer, James Edward. Folklore of the Holy Land: Moslem, Christian and Jewish. London: Duckworth and Company, 1907, 124–126.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Spain

National Origin: Sephardim

---

The Sephardim are the descendants of Jews whose origins are in Portugal or Spain, including those who were expelled from these countries by royal decrees in the late fifteenth century C.E. See “The Weight before the Door” (Volume 1, page 14) for additional discussion of the Sephardic Diaspora, after the Iberian expulsion. Purim is a Jewish festival that commemorates their deliverance from a plot by Persian noble Haman (ca. sixth century B.C.E.) to exterminate all the Jews in the Persian Empire. The following legend explains the origin of the “Saragossan Purim” festival and cautions against enemies both within and outside of the group.

---

A few of the Jews resident at Jerusalem celebrate, beside the usual Jewish feasts of Passover, Pentecost, Tabernacles, etc., a yearly anniversary which they call “the Saragossan Purim,” in order to commemorate the deliverance of the Jews of Saragossa, the capital of the former kingdom of Arragon, from a great peril. The story of this escape, as recorded in certain small parchment scrolls or Megilloth written in the style and evident imitation of the Roll of Esther, is read in public at each celebration. I had heard of the custom a good many years ago, but on February 13, 1906, having been informed that the festival had been held two days before, I obtained the loan, through a friend, of a copy of the roll. It was, of course, in Hebrew, and on parchment. The narrative is, briefly, as follows:

About the year 1420, in the reign of Alphonso V of Arragon, there were in the city of Saragossa twelve handsome synagogues supported by as many congregations of prosperous and influential Jews, who were so well treated by the Government that, whenever the king came to Saragossa, all the rabbis went out in procession to honor him, each carrying, in its case, the Roll of the Law belonging to his synagogue. People objected that it was dishonor for the Sacred Rolls to be carried out to flatter the vanity of a Gentile; and so the rabbis, possibly glad of an excuse not to carry the heavy manuscripts, got in the habit of leaving the scrolls at the synagogues on such occasions, and going out with the empty cases.

Now a certain Jew, named Marcus of Damascus, turned Christian, and in his zeal as a new convert became the deadly enemy of his own race. When the king one day was praising the loyalty of his Jewish subjects, this renegade, who was among the courtiers, replied that his majesty was being grossly deceived. The loyalty of the Jews was a sham, he averred, like their carrying empty cases before the king when pretending to bear the rolls of their respective synagogues.

At this the king was angered against the Jews, but would not punish them until he had ascertained the truth of the charge. He set out at once (Shebat 17th [fifth month of the Jewish civil calendar, eleventh month of the religious calendar]) for Saragossa, with Marcus in his train; and the latter was in high spirits, thinking he had ruined the Jews. But that night an aged man roused the servant of each synagogue, and told him how the king intended to surprise the rabbis. So when the noise of the king's coming went abroad next morning, and they went out to meet him as usual, they were not unprepared. Alphonso did not return their greetings but, frowning, ordered the cases to be opened. His command was obeyed very cheerfully, and every case was found to contain its scroll of the Pentateuch. The king then turned his anger upon Marcus, who was hanged from the nearest tree.

To commemorate this event the Jews of Saragossa instituted an annual feast, observed even after subsequent persecutions had driven them from Spain, and still, as we have seen, celebrated by their descendants on the 17th of Shebat.

THE SLAVE'S FORTUNE

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Landa, Gertrude. Jewish Fairy Tales and Legends. New York: Bloch Publishing Co., Inc., 1919, 225–233.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Unavailable

National Origin: Sephardim

---

In the years following the Reconquest of Spain from the Moors and the subsequent expulsion of the Jewish Spaniards in 1492, many of these Sephardim fled the Inquisition to settle in North Africa and the Middle East under the more tolerant Islamic rulers. As the following narrative attests, many became valued members of their communities where they prospered as traders and intellectuals. The plot of the following tale tests the quality of the education Ahmed received from his Jewish mentor. Had the rabbi instilled wisdom along with religious instruction?

---

Ahmed was the only child of the wealthiest merchant in Damascus. His father devoted his days to doing everything possible to anticipate his wishes. The boy returned his father's love with interest, and the two lived together in the utmost happiness. They were seldom apart, the father curtailing his business journeys so that he could hastily return to Damascus, and finally restricting his affairs to those which he could perform in his own home.

For safety's sake, Ahmed, whenever he was out of his father's sight, was attended by a big negro slave, Pedro, an imposing looking person, richly attired as befitted his station and duties.

Pedro was a faithful servant, and he and Ahmed were the firmest friends.

When Ahmed grew up to be a youth, his father decided to send him to Jerusalem to be educated. He did so reluctantly, knowing, however, that it was the wisest course to adopt,

Gently he broke the news to Ahmed, for he knew the latter would dislike to leave home.

Ahmed was truly sorry to have to be parted from his father, but he kept back his tears and said bravely, "It is thy wish, father, therefore I question it not. I know that thou desirest only my welfare."

"Well spoken, my son," said his father.

"May I take Pedro with me?" asked Ahmed.

"Nay, that would not be seemly," answered his father, gently. "It would make thee appear anxious to display thy wealth. Such ostentation will induce people to regard thee and thy father as foolish persons, possessed of more wealth than is good for the exercise of wisdom. Also, my son, thy future teaching must be not confined to the learning that wise men can impart unto thee. Thou art going to the great city to learn the ways of the world, to train thyself in self-reliance, and to prepare thyself for all the duties of manhood."

The youth was somewhat disappointed to hear this. It was the first occasion, as far as his memory served him, that his father had failed to grant his wish; but he was nevertheless flattered by the prospect of quickly becoming a man, and he answered, "I bow to thy wisdom, my father."

He left for Jerusalem, after bidding the merchant an affectionate farewell, and in the Holy City he applied himself diligently to his studies. He delighted his teachers with his cheerful attention to his lessons, and discovered a new source of happiness in learning things for himself from observation. Also, it was a pleasant sensation to conduct his own affairs, and in the great city, with its busy narrow thoroughfares and its wonderful buildings, he daily grew less homesick. Regularly he received letters by messengers from his father, and dutifully he returned, by the same means, long epistles, setting out all the big and little things that made up his life.

A year passed, and one day the usual message that Ahmed expected came to him in a strange hand-writing.

He opened it hastily, with a foreboding of evil and alarm. The writer of the letter was one of the merchant's closest friends. He said, "O worthy son of a most worthy father, greeting to thee, and may God give thee strength to hear the terrible and sad tidings which it is my sorrowful duty to convey unto thee. Know then that it hath pleased God in his wisdom to call from this earth thy saintly father, to sit with the righteous ones in Heaven. Here in the city of Damascus there is great weeping, for thy honored father was the most upright of men, a friend to all in distress, a man whose bounteous charity to the poor and unfortunate was unsurpassed. But our grief, deep and heartfelt as it is, cannot be compared to thine. We have all lost a wise counselor, a trusty friend, a guide in all things. But thou hast lost more. Thou hast lost a father. Thou art his only son, and on thee his duties will now devolve. Know then thy profound grief we share with thee. We tender to thee our sincere sympathy, and eagerly do we await thy coming. Thou hast a noble position to occupy and a tradition to continue. We, thy father's friends and thine, O Ahmed, will assist thee."

The young man was dumbfounded when he gathered the purport of the letter. For some moments he spoke not, but sat on the ground, weeping silently. Then, remembering his father's admonitions, he promptly took up the task of settling his affairs in Jerusalem prior to his departure for Damascus.

"I will take with me," he said, "the good rabbi who has been my religious instructor, for I am not fully prepared to undertake all the duties that will fall to my lot and need some strengthening counsel."

On arrival at Damascus he was greeted by a large concourse of people who expressed their sympathy with him and spoke in terms of highest praise of his father's benevolence.

After the funeral, Ahmed called the leading townspeople together to hear his father's will read, for he was certain that many gifts to charities would be announced. Such was the case, and there were subdued murmurs of applause when the amounts were read forth.

Then suddenly the friend who had written to the young man and was reading the will, paused.

"I fear there must be a mistake," he said, in a whisper to Ahmed.

"Go on," urged the assembled people, and the man read in a strange voice, "And now, having as I hope, faithfully performed my duty to the poor, I bequeath the rest of my possessions unto my devoted negro slave, Pedro."

"Pedro!" cried the astonished crowd.

They looked at the massive figure of the black attendant, but he stood motionless and impassive, betraying no sign whatsoever of joy or surprise.

Ahmed could not conceal his bewilderment. "Is naught left unto me?" he managed to ask.

"Yes," returned his friend, and amid a sudden silence, he continued to read, "This bequest is subject to the following proviso: that one thing be given to my son before the division of my property, the same to be selected by him within twenty-four hours of the reading of this will unto him."

The crowd melted away with mutterings of sympathy mingled with astonishment, but out of earshot of Ahmed, all said the merchant must have been mad to draw up so absurd a testament. Ahmed himself could hardly realize the great blow that had befallen him. He consulted with his father's friend and the rabbi, but, although they re-read the document many times, they could find no fault or flaw in it.

"Legally, this is correct and in perfect order and cannot be altered," said the friend.

"My father must have made a foolish mistake and must have misplaced the two words 'son' and 'slave,'" said Ahmed, bitterly.

"That does not so appear," said the rabbi; "thy father was a scholar and wise man. Speak not hastily, and above all act not rashly without thought. I would counsel thee to sleep over this matter, and in the morning we shall solve this puzzle."

Ahmed, who was exhausted with grief and rage and surprise, soon fell into a deep sleep, and when he awoke the rabbi was reciting his morning prayers.

"It is a beautiful day," he said, when he had finished. "The sun shines on thy happiness, Ahmed."

Ahmed was too depressed to make any comment, nor was he completely satisfied when the rabbi assured him all would be well.

"I have pondered deeply and long over thy father's words," he said. "I sat up through the night until the dawn, and I have been impelled to the conclusion that thy father was truly a wise man."

Ahmed interrupted with a gesture of disapproval. The rabbi took no notice but proceeded quietly, "Thy father must have feared that in thy absence after his death and pending thy possible delay in returning hither, slaves and others might rob thee of thy inheritance. Pedro, I have discovered, knew of the terms of the will. By informing him and making his strange will, thy father, O fortunate Ahmed, made sure of thy inheritance unto thee."

“I understand not,” muttered Ahmed.

“It is perfectly clear,” said the rabbi. “As soon as thou art ready, thou shalt make thy choice of one thing. Do as I bid thee, and thou shalt see thy father’s wisdom.”

Ahmed had no option but to agree. He could find no solution himself, and wretched though he felt, reason told him that his father loved him and that the rabbi was renowned for shrewdness.

The townspeople gathered early to hear Ahmed make his choice of one thing—and one only—from his father’s possessions. Ahmed looked less troubled than they expected, the rabbi wore his most benign expression, and Pedro stationed himself in his usual place at the door, statuesque, obedient, and expressionless as ever.

Ahmed held up his hand to obtain silence. “Acting under the terms of my father’s will,” he said, solemnly, “at this moment when all, before division, belongs to his estate, I choose but one of my father’s possessions—Pedro, the black slave.”

Then everybody saw the wisdom of the strange will, for with Pedro, Ahmed became possessed of his father’s vast wealth.

To Pedro, who still stood motionless, Ahmed said, “And thou, my good friend, shalt have thy freedom and possessions sufficient to keep thee in comfort for the rest of thy days.”

“I desire naught but to serve thee,” Pedro answered, “I wish to remain the faithful attendant of one who will follow nobly in the footsteps of thy father.”

So everybody was satisfied.

SPAIN

---

THE KNIGHTS OF THE FISH

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Lang, Andrew. The Brown Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1904, 343–350.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Caballero, Fernán (Cecilia Francisca Josefa de Arrom). Cuentos, Oraciones, Adivinas.

National Origin: Spain

---

Occupying most of the Iberian Peninsula of Europe, Spain was conquered by North African Muslims (Berbers) early in the eighth century. Although the Moors were a diminishing presence from the eleventh century, Muslim dominance existed in some areas until the late fifteenth century. Thus, Spanish folktales are heirs to both European Christian traditions and North African Islamic traditions. In this Spanish variant of “The Twins or Blood-Brothers” (AT 303), the heroes are brought to life by magic and reunited by the magical resuscitation of the slain brother by his twin. The name of the murderous witch, “Berberisca” (Berber) may signify the embodiment in folklore of a lingering resentment directed toward the Moorish colonization of Andalusia, the autonomous community in the kingdom of Spain in which de Arrom, the collector of “The Knights of the Fish,” spent most of her life.

---

Once upon a time there lived an old cobbler who worked hard at his trade from morning till night, and scarcely gave himself a moment to eat. But, industrious as he was, he could hardly buy bread and cheese for himself and his wife, and they grew thinner and thinner daily.

For a long while they pretended to each other that they had no appetite, and that a few blackberries from the hedges were a great deal nicer than a good strong bowl of soup. But at length there came a day when the cobbler could bear it no longer, and he threw away his last, and borrowing a rod from a neighbor he went out to fish.

Now the cobbler was as patient about fishing as he had been about cobbling. From dawn to dark he stood on the banks of the little stream, without hooking anything better than an eel, or a few old shoes, that even he, clever though he was, felt were not worth mending. At length his patience began to give way, and as he undressed one night he said to himself, "Well, I will give it one more chance; and if I don't catch a fish tomorrow, I will go and hang myself."

He had not cast his line for ten minutes the next morning before he drew from the river the most beautiful fish he had ever seen in his life. But he nearly fell into the water from surprise, when the fish began to speak to him, in a small, squeaky voice, "Take me back to your hut and cook me; then cut me up, and sprinkle me over with pepper and salt. Give two of the pieces to your wife, and bury two more in the garden."

The cobbler did not know what to make of these strange words; but he was wiser than many people, and when he did not understand, he thought it was well to obey. His children wanted to eat all the fish themselves, and begged their father to tell them what to do with the pieces he had put aside; but the cobbler only laughed, and told them it was no business of theirs. And when they were safe in bed he stole out and buried the two pieces in the garden.

By and by two babies, exactly alike, lay in a cradle, and in the garden were two tall plants, with two brilliant shields on the top.

Years passed away, and the babies were almost men. They were tired of living quietly at home, being mistaken for each other by everybody they saw, and determined to set off in different directions, to seek adventures.

So, one fine morning, the two brothers left the hut, and walked together to the place where the great road divided. There they embraced and parted, promising that if anything remarkable had happened to either, he would return to the cross roads and wait till his brother came.

The youth who took the path that ran eastwards arrived presently at a large city, where he found everybody standing at the doors, wringing their hands and weeping bitterly, "What is the matter?" asked he, pausing and looking round. And a man replied, in a faltering voice, that each year a beautiful girl was chosen by lot to be offered up to a dreadful fiery dragon, who had a mother even worse than himself, and this year the lot had fallen on their peerless princess.

"But where is the princess?" said the young man once more, and again the man answered him, "She is standing under a tree, a mile away, waiting for the dragon."

This time the Knight of the Fish did not stop to hear more, but ran off as fast as he could, and found the princess bathed in tears, and trembling from head to foot.

She turned as she heard the sound of his sword, and removed her handkerchief from his eyes.

“Fly,” she cried; “fly while you have yet time, before that monster sees you.”

She said it, and she meant it; yet, when he had turned his back, she felt more forsaken than before. But in reality it was not more than a few minutes before he came back, galloping furiously on a horse he had borrowed, and carrying a huge mirror across its neck.

“I am in time, then,” he cried, dismounting very carefully, and placing the mirror against the trunk of a tree.

“Give me your veil,” he said hastily to the princess. And when she had unwound it from her head he covered the mirror with it.

“The moment the dragon comes near you, you must tear off the veil,” cried he; “and be sure you hide behind the mirror. Have no fear; I shall be at hand.”

He and his horse had scarcely found shelter amongst some rocks, when the flap of the dragon’s wings could be plainly heard. He tossed his head with delight at the sight of her, and approached slowly to the place where she stood, a little in front of the mirror. Then, still looking the monster steadily in the face, she passed one hand behind her back and snatched off the veil, stepping swiftly behind the tree as she did so.

The princess had not known, when she obeyed the orders of the Knight of the Fish, what she expected to happen. Would the dragon with snaky locks be turned to stone, she wondered, like the dragon in an old story her nurse had told her; or would some fiery spark dart from the heart of the mirror, and strike him dead? Neither of these things occurred, but, instead, the dragon stopped short with surprise and rage when he saw a monster before him as big and strong as himself. He shook his mane with rage and fury; the enemy in front did exactly the same. He lashed his tail, and rolled his red eyes, and the dragon opposite was no whit behind him. Opening his mouth to its very widest, he gave an awful roar; but the other dragon only roared back. This was too much, and with another roar which made the princess shake in her shoes, he flung himself upon his foe. In an instant the mirror lay at his feet broken into a thousand pieces, but as every piece reflected part of himself, the dragon thought that he too had been smashed into atoms.

It was the moment for which the Knight of the Fish had watched and waited, and before the dragon could find out that he was not hurt at all, the young man’s lance was down his throat, and he was rolling, dead, on the grass.

Oh what shouts of joy rang through the great city, when the youth came riding back with the princess sitting behind him, and dragging the horrible monster by a cord! Everybody cried out that the king must give the victor the hand of the princess; and so he did, and no one had ever seen such balls and feasts and sports before. And when they were all over the young couple went to the palace prepared for them, which was so large that it was three miles round.

The first wet day after their marriage the bridegroom begged the bride to show him all the rooms in the palace, and it was so big and took so long that the sun was shining brightly again before they stepped on to the roof to see the view.

“What castle is that out there,” asked the knight; “it seems to be made of black marble?”

“It is called the castle of Albatroz,” answered the princess. “It is enchanted, and no one that has tried to enter it has ever come back.”

Her husband said nothing, and began to talk of something else; but the next morning he ordered his horse, took his spear, called his bloodhound, and set off for the castle.

It needed a brave man to approach it, for it made your hair stand on end merely to look at it; it was as dark as the night of a storm, and as silent as the grave. But the Knight of the Fish knew no fear, and had never turned his back on an enemy; so he drew out his horn, and blew a blast.

The sound awoke all the sleeping echoes in the castle, and was repeated now loudly, now softly; now near, and now far. But nobody stirred for all that.

“Is there anyone inside?” cried the young man in his loudest voice; “anyone who will give a knight hospitality? Neither governor, nor squire, not even a page?”

“Not even a page!” answered the echoes. But the young man did not heed them, and only struck a furious blow at the gate.

Then a small grating opened, and there appeared the tip of a huge nose, which belonged to the ugliest old woman that ever was seen.

“What do you want?” said she.

“To enter,” he answered shortly. “Can I rest here this night? Yes or No?”

“No, No, No!” repeated the echoes.

Between the fierce sun and his anger at being kept waiting, the Knight of the Fish had grown so hot that he lifted his visor, and when the old woman saw how handsome he was, she began fumbling with the lock of the gate.

“Come in, come in,” said she, “so fine a gentleman will do us no harm.”

“Harm!” repeated the echoes, but again the young man paid no heed.

“Let us go in, ancient dame,” but she interrupted him.

“You must call me the Lady Berberisca,” she answered, sharply; “and this is my castle, to which I bid you welcome. You shall live here with me and be my husband.” But at these words the knight let his spear fall, so surprised was he.

“I marry YOU? why you must be a hundred at least!” cried he. “You are mad! All I desire is to inspect the castle and then go.” As he spoke he heard the voices give a mocking laugh; but the old woman took no notice, and only bade the knight follow her.

Old though she was, it seemed impossible to tire her. There was no room, however small, she did not lead him into, and each room was full of curious things he had never seen before.

At length they came to a stone staircase, which was so dark that you could not see your hand if you held it up before your face.

"I have kept my most precious treasure till the last," said the old woman; "but let me go first, for the stairs are steep, and you might easily break your leg." So on she went, now and then calling back to the young man in the darkness. But he did not know that she had slipped aside into a recess, till suddenly he put his foot on a trap door which gave way under him, and he fell down, down, as many good knights had done before him, and his voice joined the echoes of theirs.

"So you would not marry me!" chuckled the old witch. "Ha! ha! Ha! ha!"

Meanwhile his brother had wandered far and wide, and at last he wandered back to the same great city where the other young knight had met with so many adventures. He noticed, with amazement, that as he walked through the streets the guards drew themselves up in line, and saluted him, and the drummers played the royal march; but he was still more bewildered when several servants in livery ran up to him and told him that the princess was sure something terrible had befallen him, and had made herself ill with weeping. At last it occurred to him that once more he had been taken for his brother. "I had better say nothing," thought he; "perhaps I shall be able to help him after all."

So he suffered himself to be borne in triumph to the palace, where the princess threw herself into his arms.

"And so you did go to the castle?" she asked.

"Yes, of course I did," answered he.

"And what did you see there?"

"I am forbidden to tell you anything about it, until I have returned there once more," replied he.

"Must you really go back to that dreadful place?" she asked wistfully. "You are the only man who has ever come back from it."

"I must," was all he answered. And the princess, who was a wise woman, only said, "Well, go to bed now, for I am sure you must be very tired."

But the knight shook his head. "I have sworn never to lie in a bed as long as my work in the castle remains standing." And the princess again sighed, and was silent.

Early next day the young man started for the castle, feeling sure that some terrible thing must have happened to his brother.

At the blast of his horn the long nose of the old woman appeared at the grating, but the moment she caught sight of his face, she nearly fainted from fright, as she thought it was the ghost of the youth whose bones were lying in the dungeon of the castle.

"Lady of all the ages," cried the new comer, "did you not give hospitality to a young knight but a short time ago?"

"A short time ago!" wailed the voices.

"And how have you ill-treated him?" he went on.

"Ill-treated him!" answered the voices. The woman did not stop to hear more; she turned to fly; but the knight's sword entered her body.

"Where is my brother, cruel hag?" asked he sternly.

“I will tell you,” said she; “but as I feel that I am going to die I shall keep that piece of news to myself, till you have brought me to life again.”

The young man laughed scornfully. “How do you propose that I should work that miracle?”

“Oh, it is quite easy. Go into the garden and gather the flowers of the everlasting plant and some of dragon’s blood. Crush them together and boil them in a large tub of water, and then put me into it.”

The knight did as the old witch bade him, and, sure enough, she came out quite whole, but uglier than ever. She then told the young man what had become of his brother, and he went down into the dungeon, and brought up his body and the bodies of the other victims who lay there, and when they were all washed in the magic water their strength was restored to them.

And, besides these, he found in another cavern the bodies of the girls who had been sacrificed to the dragon, and brought them back to life also.

As to the old witch, in the end she died of rage at seeing her prey escape her; and at the moment she drew her last breath the castle of Albatroz fell into ruins with a great noise.

THE WHITE SLIPPER

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Lang, Andrew. The Orange Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1904, 335–348.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Ceballos Quintana, Enrique. Capullos de Rosa.

National Origin: Spain

---

In most cases, the folktales describe cures such as those classified by Aarne-Thompson as “Magic Remedies” (AT 610–619). In the present narrative, science—specifically, chemistry—rather than any occult remedy, provides the means by which a king is cured and the hero wins the hand of a princess. Any explanation for this deviation from the general rule is speculative, but under Muslim rule, cities such as Cordoba became centers of learning nurturing Christian, Jewish, and Islamic scholars in equal measure.

---

Once upon a time there lived a king who had a daughter just fifteen years old. And what a daughter!

Even the mothers who had daughters of their own could not help allowing that the princess was much more beautiful and graceful than any of them; and, as for the fathers, if one of them ever beheld her by accident he could talk of nothing else for a whole day afterwards.

Of course the king, whose name was Balancin, was the complete slave of his little girl from the moment he lifted her from the arms of her dead mother; indeed, he did not seem to know that there was anyone else in the world to love.

Now Diamantina, for that was her name, did not reach her fifteenth birthday without proposals for marriage from every country under heaven; but be the suitor who he might, the king always said him nay.

Behind the palace a large garden stretched away to the foot of some hills, and more than one river flowed through. Hither the princess would come each evening towards sunset, attended by her ladies, and gather herself the flowers that were to adorn her rooms. She also brought with her a pair of scissors to cut off the dead blooms, and a basket to put them in, so that when the sun rose next morning he might see nothing unsightly. When she had finished this task she would take a walk through the town, so that the poor people might have a chance of speaking with her, and telling her of their troubles; and then she would seek out her father, and together they would consult over the best means of giving help to those who needed it.

“But what has all this to do with the White Slipper?” my readers will ask.

“Have patience, and you will see.”

Next to his daughter, Balancin loved hunting, and it was his custom to spend several mornings every week chasing the boars which abounded in the mountains a few miles from the city. One day, rushing downhill as fast as he could go, he put his foot into a hole and fell, rolling into a rocky pit of brambles. The king’s wounds were not very severe, but his face and hands were cut and torn, while his feet were in a worse plight still, for, instead of proper hunting boots, he only wore sandals, to enable him to run more swiftly.

In a few days the king was as well as ever, and the signs of the scratches were almost gone; but one foot still remained very sore, where a thorn had pierced deeply and had festered. The best doctors in the kingdom treated it with all their skill; they bathed, and poulticed, and bandaged, but it was in vain. The foot only grew worse and worse, and became daily more swollen and painful.

After everyone had tried his own particular cure, and found it fail, there came news of a wonderful doctor in some distant land who had healed the most astonishing diseases. On inquiring, it was found that he never left the walls of his own city, and expected his patients to come to see him; but, by dint of offering a large sum of money, the king persuaded the famous physician to undertake the journey to his own court.

On his arrival the doctor was led at once into the king’s presence, and made a careful examination of his foot.

“Alas! your majesty,” he said, when he had finished, “the wound is beyond the power of man to heal; but though I cannot cure it, I can at least deaden the pain, and enable you to walk without so much suffering.”

“Oh, if you can only do that,” cried the king, “I shall be grateful to you for life! Give your own orders; they shall be obeyed.”

“Then let your majesty bid the royal shoemaker make you a shoe of goat-skin very loose and comfortable, while I prepare a varnish to paint over it of which I alone have the secret!” So saying, the doctor bowed himself out, leaving the king more cheerful and hopeful than he had been for long.

The days passed very slowly with him during the making of the shoe and the preparation of the varnish, but on the eighth morning the physician appeared, bringing with him the shoe in a case. He drew it out to slip on the king’s foot, and over the goat-skin he had rubbed a polish so white that the snow itself was not more dazzling.

“While you wear this shoe you will not feel the slightest pain,” said the doctor. “For the balsam with which I have rubbed it inside and out has, besides its healing balm, the quality of strengthening the material it touches, so that, even were your majesty to live a thousand years, you would find the slipper just as fresh at the end of that time as it is now.”

The king was so eager to put it on that he hardly gave the physician time to finish. He snatched it from the case and thrust his foot into it, nearly weeping for joy when he found he could walk and run as easily as any beggar boy.

“What can I give you?” he cried, holding out both hands to the man who had worked this wonder. “Stay with me, and I will heap on you riches greater than ever you dreamed of.” But the doctor said he would accept nothing more than had been agreed on, and must return at once to his own country, where many sick people were awaiting him. So king Balancin had to content himself with ordering the physician to be treated with royal honors, and desiring that an escort should attend him on his journey home.

For two years everything went smoothly at court, and to king Balancin and his daughter the sun no sooner rose than it seemed time for it to set. Now, the king’s birthday fell in the month of June, and as the weather happened to be unusually fine, he told the princess to celebrate it in any way that pleased her. Diamantina was very fond of being on the river, and she was delighted at this chance of delighting her tastes. She would have a merry-making such as never had been seen before, and in the evening, when they were tired of sailing and rowing, there should be music and dancing, plays and fireworks. At the very end, before the people went home, every poor person should be given a loaf of bread and every girl who was to be married within the year a new dress.

The great day appeared to Diamantina to be long in coming, but, like other days, it came at last. Before the sun was fairly up in the heavens the princess, too full of excitement to stay in the palace, was walking about the streets so covered with precious stones that you had to shade your eyes before you could look at her. By-and-by a trumpet sounded, and she hurried home, only to appear again in a few moments walking by the side of her father down to the river. Here a splendid barge was waiting for them, and from it they watched all sorts of races and feats of swimming and diving. When these were over the barge proceeded up the river to the field where the dancing and concerts were to take place, and after the prizes had been given away to the winners, and the loaves and the dresses had been distributed by the princess, they bade farewell to their guests, and turned to step into the barge which was to carry them back to the palace.

Then a dreadful thing happened. As the king stepped on board the boat one of the sandals of the white slipper, which had got loose, caught in a nail that was sticking out, and caused the king to stumble. The pain was great, and unconsciously he turned and shook his foot, so that the sandals gave way, and in a moment the precious shoe was in the river.

It had all occurred so quickly that nobody had noticed the loss of the slipper, not even the princess, whom the king's cries speedily brought to his side.

"What is the matter, dear father?" asked she. But the king could not tell her; and only managed to gasp out, "My shoe! my shoe!" While the sailors stood round staring, thinking that his majesty had suddenly gone mad.

Seeing her father's eyes fixed on the stream, Diamantina looked hastily in that direction. There, dancing on the current, was the point of something white, which became more and more distant the longer they watched it. The king could bear the sight no more, and, besides, now that the healing ointment in the shoe had been removed the pain in his foot was as bad as ever; he gave a sudden cry, staggered, and fell over the bulwarks into the water.

In an instant the river was covered with bobbing heads all swimming their fastest towards the king, who had been carried far down by the swift current. At length one swimmer, stronger than the rest, seized hold of his tunic, and drew him to the bank, where a thousand eager hands were ready to haul him out. He was carried, unconscious, to the side of his daughter, who had fainted with terror on seeing her father disappear below the surface, and together they were placed in a coach and driven to the palace, where the best doctors in the city were awaiting their arrival.

In a few hours the princess was as well as ever; but the pain, the wetting, and the shock of the accident, all told severely on the king, and for three days he lay in a high fever. Meanwhile, his daughter, herself nearly mad with grief, gave orders that the white slipper should be sought for far and wide; and so it was, but even the cleverest divers could find no trace of it at the bottom of the river.

When it became clear that the slipper must have been carried out to sea by the current, Diamantina turned her thoughts elsewhere, and sent messengers in search of the doctor who had brought relief to her father, begging him to make another slipper as fast as possible, to supply the place of the one which was lost. But the messengers returned with the sad news that the doctor had died some weeks before, and, what was worse, his secret had died with him.

In his weakness this intelligence had such an effect on the king that the physicians feared he would become as ill as before. He could hardly be persuaded to touch food, and all night long he lay moaning, partly with pain, and partly over his own folly in not having begged the doctor to make him several dozens of white slippers, so that in case of accidents he might always have one to put on. However, by-and-by he saw that it was no use weeping and wailing, and commanded that they should search for his lost treasure more diligently than ever.

What a sight the river banks presented in those days! It seemed as if all the people in the country were gathered on them. But this second search was no more fortunate than the first, and at last the king issued a proclamation that whoever found the missing slipper should be made heir to the crown, and should marry the princess.

Now many daughters would have rebelled at being disposed of in the manner; and it must be admitted that Diamantina's heart sank when she heard what the king had done. Still, she loved her father so much that she desired his comfort more than anything else in the world, so she said nothing, and only bowed her head.

Of course the result of the proclamation was that the river banks became more crowded than before; for all the princess's suitors from distant lands flocked to the spot, each hoping that he might be the lucky finder. Many times a shining stone at the bottom of the stream was taken for the slipper itself, and every evening saw a band of dripping downcast men returning homewards. But one youth always lingered longer than the rest, and night would still see him engaged in the search, though his clothes stuck to his skin and his teeth chattered.

One day, when the king was lying on his bed racked with pain, he heard the noise of a scuffle going on in his antechamber, and rang a golden bell that stood by his side to summon one of his servants.

"Sire," answered the attendant, when the king inquired what was the matter, "the noise you heard was caused by a young man from the town, who has had the impudence to come here to ask if he may measure your majesty's foot, so as to make you another slipper in place of the lost one."

"And what have you done to the youth?" said the king.

"The servants pushed him out of the palace, and, added a few blows to teach him not to be insolent," replied the man.

"Then they did very ill," answered the king, with a frown. "He came here from kindness, and there was no reason to maltreat him."

"Oh, my lord, he had the audacity to wish to touch your majesty's sacred person—he, a good-for-nothing boy, a mere shoemaker's apprentice, perhaps! And even if he could make shoes to perfection they would be no use without the soothing balsam."

The king remained silent for a few moments, then he said, "Never mind. Go and fetch the youth and bring him to me. I would gladly try any remedy that may relieve my pain."

So, soon afterwards, the youth, who had not gone far from the palace, was caught and ushered into the king's presence.

He was tall and handsome and, though he professed to make shoes, his manners were good and modest, and he bowed low as he begged the king not only to allow him to take the measure of his foot, but also to suffer him to place a healing plaster over the wound.

Balancin was pleased with the young man's voice and appearance, and thought that he looked as if he knew what he was doing. So he stretched out his bad foot which the youth examined with great attention, and then gently laid on the plaster.

Very shortly the ointment began to soothe the sharp pain, and the king, whose confidence increased every moment, begged the young man to tell him his name.

"I have no parents; they died when I was six, sire," replied the youth, modestly. "Everyone in the town calls me Gilguerillo [linnet], because, when I was little, I went singing through the world in spite of my misfortunes. Luckily for me I was born to be happy."

"And you really think you can cure me?" asked the king.

"Completely, my lord," answered Gilguerillo.

"And how long do you think it will take?"

"It is not an easy task; but I will try to finish it in a fortnight," replied the youth.

A fortnight seemed to the king a long time to make one slipper. But he only said,

"Do you need anything to help you?"

"Only a good horse, if your majesty will be kind enough to give me one," answered Gilguerillo. And the reply was so unexpected that the courtiers could hardly restrain their smiles, while the king stared silently.

"You shall have the horse," he said at last, "and I shall expect you back in a fortnight. If you fulfill your promise you know your reward; if not, I will have you flogged for your impudence."

Gilguerillo bowed, and turned to leave the palace, followed by the jeers and scoffs of everyone he met. But he paid no heed, for he had got what he wanted.

He waited in front of the gates till a magnificent horse was led up to him, and vaulting into the saddle with an ease which rather surprised the attendant, rode quickly out of the town amidst the jests of the assembled crowd, who had heard of his audacious proposal. And while he is on his way let us pause for a moment and tell who he is.

Both father and mother had died before the boy was six years old; and he had lived for many years with his uncle, whose life had been passed in the study of chemistry. He could leave no money to his nephew, as he had a son of his own; but he taught him all he knew, and at his death Gilguerillo entered an office, where he worked for many hours daily. In his spare time, instead of playing with the other boys, he passed hours poring over books, and because he was timid and liked to be alone he was held by everyone to be a little mad. Therefore, when it became known that he had promised to cure the king's foot, and had ridden away—no one knew where—a roar of laughter and mockery rang through the town, and jeers and scoffing words were sent after him.

But if they had only known what were Gilguerillo's thoughts they would have thought him madder than ever.

The real truth was that, on the morning when the princess had walked through the streets before making holiday on the river Gilguerillo had seen her from his window, and had straightway fallen in love with her. Of course he felt quite hopeless. It was absurd to imagine that the apothecary's nephew could ever marry the king's daughter; so he did his best to forget her, and study harder than before, till the royal proclamation suddenly filled him with hope. When he was free he no longer spent the precious moments poring over books, but, like the rest, he might have been seen wandering along the banks of the river, or diving into the stream after something that lay glistening in the clear water, but which turned out to be a white pebble or a bit of glass.

And at the end he understood that it was not by the river that he would win the princess; and, turning to his books for comfort, he studied harder than ever.

There is an old proverb which says, "Everything comes to him who knows how to wait." It is not all men who know how to wait, any more than it is all men who can learn by experience; but Gilguerillo was one of the few and instead of thinking his life wasted because he could not have the thing he wanted most, he tried to busy himself in other directions. So, one day, when he expected it least, his reward came to him.

He happened to be reading a book many hundreds of years old, which told of remedies for all kinds of diseases. Most of them, he knew, were merely invented by old women, who sought to prove themselves wiser than other people; but at length he came to something which caused him to sit up straight in his chair, and made his eyes brighten. This was the description of a balsam—which would cure every kind of sore or wound—distilled from a plant only to be found in a country so distant that it would take a man on foot two months to go and come back again.

When I say that the book declared that the balsam could heal every sort of sore or wound, there were a few against which it was powerless, and it gave certain signs by which these might be known. This was the reason why Gilguerillo demanded to see the king's foot before he would undertake to cure it; and to obtain admittance he gave out that he was a shoemaker. However, the dreaded signs were absent, and his heart bounded at the thought that the princess was within his reach.

Perhaps she was; but a great deal had to be accomplished yet, and he had allowed himself a very short time in which to do it.

He spared his horse only so much as was needful, yet it took him six days to reach the spot where the plant grew. A thick wood lay in front of him, and, fastening the bridle tightly to a tree, he flung himself on his hands and knees and began to hunt for the treasure. Many time he fancied it was close to him, and many times it turned out to be something else; but, at last, when light was fading, and he had almost given up hope, he came upon a large bed of the plant, right under his feet! Trembling with joy, he picked every scrap he could see, and placed it in his wallet. Then, mounting his horse, he galloped quickly back towards the city.

It was night when he entered the gates, and the fifteen days allotted were not up till the next day. His eyes were heavy with sleep, and his body ached with the long strain, but, without pausing to rest, he kindled a fire on his hearth, and quickly filling a pot with water, threw in the herbs and left them to boil. After that he lay down and slept soundly.

The sun was shining when he awoke, and he jumped up and ran to the pot. The plant had disappeared and in its stead was a thick syrup, just as the book had said there would be. He lifted the syrup out with a spoon, and after spreading it in the sun till it was partly dry, poured it into a small flask of crystal. He next washed himself thoroughly, and dressed himself, in his best clothes, and putting the flask in his pocket, set out for the palace, and begged to see the king without delay.

Now Balancin, whose foot had been much less painful since Gilguerillo had wrapped it in the plaster, was counting the days to the young man's return; and when he was told Gilguerillo was there, ordered him to be admitted at once. As he entered, the king raised himself eagerly on his pillows, but his face fell when he saw no signs of a slipper.

"You have failed, then?" he said, throwing up his hands in despair.

"I hope not, your majesty; I think not," answered the youth. And drawing the flask from his pocket, he poured two or three drops on the wound.

"Repeat this for three nights, and you will find yourself cured," said he. And before the king had time to thank him he had bowed himself out.

Of course the news soon spread through the city, and men and women never tired of calling Gilguerillo an impostor, and prophesying that the end of the three days would see him in prison, if not on the scaffold. But Gilguerillo paid no heed to their hard words, and no more did the king, who took care that no hand but his own should put on the healing balsam.

On the fourth morning the king awoke and instantly stretched out his wounded foot that he might prove the truth or falsehood of Gilguerillo's remedy. The wound was certainly cured on that side, but how about the other? Yes, that was cured also; and not even a scar was left to show where it had been!

Was ever any king so happy as Balancin when he satisfied himself of this?

Lightly as a deer he jumped from his bed, and began to turn head over heels and to perform all sorts of antics, so as to make sure that his foot was in truth as well as it looked. And when he was quite tired he sent for his daughter, and bade the courtiers bring the lucky young man to his room.

“He is really young and handsome,” said the princess to herself, heaving a sigh of relief that it was not some dreadful old man who had healed her father; and while the king was announcing to his courtiers the wonderful cure that had been made, Diamantina was thinking that if Gilguerillo looked so well in his common dress, how much improved by the splendid garments of a king’ son. However, she held her peace, and only watched with amusement when the courtiers, knowing there was no help for it, did homage and obeisance to the chemist’s boy.

Then they brought to Gilguerillo a magnificent tunic of green velvet bordered with gold, and a cap with three white plumes stuck in it; and at the sight of him so arrayed, the princess fell in love with him in a moment. The wedding was fixed to take place in eight days, and at the ball afterwards nobody danced so long or so lightly as king Balancin.

Glossary

---

anecdote: Originally, a short, humorous tale. Now, the term commonly refers to single-episode narratives, regarded as true and commonly concentrating on an individual.

animal tales: Narratives told as conscious fictions in which the characters, though they speak and behave like human beings, are animals. These animal characters are commonly stock types. For example, in many Native American traditions, coyote is regarded as an exploitive, impulsive manipulator. In African American tales, rabbit is type cast in the same role. The tales are most often moralistic (“don’t be greedy”) or etiological (why the frog has no tail) in intent.

belief tales: Legends or personal experience narratives that are told with the purpose of validating a particular folk belief.

cautionary tales: Narratives whose plots embody a message cautioning against the consequences of particular kinds of behavior.

culture hero: Character in myth who finishes the work that brings technology (usually symbolized as fire), laws, religion, and other elements of culture to humans. Culture heroes may take over the business of creating order out of chaos where a Supreme Creator left off. The culture hero serves as a secondary creator or transformer of the universe. He/she transforms the universe by means of his gifts into a universe in which humans can live. In some myths, the culture hero cleanses the universe of things that threaten human existence: monsters, cannibals, or meteorological phenomena.

cumulative tale: A tale that begins with an incident, action, or phrase and adds a succession of elements to create a lengthy chain of events.

cycle: A group of tales that focuses on a central character, plot, or theme.

fable: Fictional narrative ending with a didactic message that is often couched in the form of a “moral” or proverb.

fairy tale: See ordinary folktale.

family saga: Chronologically and often thematically linked collection of legends constituting the folk history of a particular family, usually over several generations. The term was coined by folklorist Mody C. Boatright.

folk history: Accounts based on perceptions of historical events rather than on written documentation or similar media.

- formula/formulaic element: Conventional elements that recur in folk narrative. For example, clichés, structural patterns, stock characters, or situations.
- framing: The act of setting apart a traditional performance from other types of activity by words, occasions of performance or other distinguishing features.
- genre: Type, category.
- legend: Narrative told as truth, set in the historical past, and that does not depart from the present reality of the members of the group.
- local legend: Legends derived from and closely associated with specific places and events believed to have occurred in those locales.
- märchen: See ordinary folktale.
- motif: Small element of traditional narrative content, such as an event, object, concept, or pattern.
- myth: Narratives that explain the will (the intent) and the workings (the orderly principles) of a group's major supernatural figures. Myth is set in a world that predates the present reality.
- natural context: Setting, in all its elements, in which a performance would ordinarily take place.
- novelle: Romantic tale.
- numskull: Character who behaves in an absurdly ignorant fashion, also called "noodle."
- ordinary folktale: Highly formulaic and structured fictional narrative that is popularly referred to as "fairytale" and designated by folklorists as märchen or "wonder tale." Term coined by folklorist Stith Thompson.
- personal experience narrative: Narrative intended as truth performed in the first person by the individual to whom the described events happened.
- personal legend: Narrative intended as truth told about a specific (usually well-known) individual.
- resource person: The bearer of a particular tradition, such as the performer of a folktale.
- stock character: Recurrent narrative character who invariably plays a stereotyped role such as trickster or fool.
- tale type: Standard, recurrent folk narrative plot.
- tall tale: Fictional narrative often told as a firsthand experience, which gradually introduces hyperbole until the audience realizes by the conclusion that the tale is a lie.
- trickster: Character who defies the limits of propriety and often gender and species. Trickster lives on the margins of his world by his wits and is often regarded as possessing supernatural power. Often a mythic figure such as a coyote or hare will function as both culture hero and trickster.
- validating device: Any element occurring within a traditional narrative that is intended to convince listeners that the tale is true.
- variant: Version of a standard tale type.

Bibliography to Volume 3

---

- Ashliman, D. L. "King Pig." Folktexts: A Library of Folktales, Folklore, Fairy Tales and Mythology. <http://www.pitt.edu/~dash/perrault07.html> (July 21, 2007).
- Ashliman, D. L. "Ricky of the Tuft." Folktexts: A Library of Folktales, Folklore, Fairy Tales and Mythology. <http://www.pitt.edu/~dash/hog.html#straparola> (July 21, 2007).
- Bay, J. Christian. Danish Folk Tales. New York: Harper and Brothers Publishers, 1899.
- Brzozowska-Krajka, Anna. "Poland." The Greenwood Encyclopedia of World Folklore and Folklife, ed. William Clements. Vol. 3. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2006.
- Crane, Thomas Frederick. Italian Popular Tales. New York: Houghton, Mifflin and Co., 1885, 326–331.
- Dasent, George Webb. Gisli the Outlaw. Edinburgh: Edmonston and Douglas, 1866.
- De Blumentahal, Verra Xenophontovna Kalamatiano. Folktales from the Russian. Great Neck, New York: Core Collection Books, Inc., 1903.
- Gaster, M. Rumanian Bird and Beast Stories. London: Folk-Lore Society, 1915, 249–254.
- Gaster, M. "Székeley Tales." Folklore 4 (1893): 328–344.
- Gomme, A. B. "The Green Lady: A Folktale from Hertfordshire." Folklore 7 (1896): 411–415.
- Gregory, Lady Isabella Augusta Persse. Cuchulain of Muirthemne: The Story of the Men of the Red Branch of Ulster. London: John Murray, 1902.
- Groome, Francis Hindes. Gypsy Folk Tales. London: Hurst & Blackett, 1899.
- Grundtvig, Sven. Danish Fairy Tales, trans. J. Grant Cramer. Boston: Four Seas Company, 1919
- Hanauer, James Edward. Folklore of the Holy Land: Moslem, Christian and Jewish. London: Duckworth and Company, 1907.
- Hartland, Edwin Sidney. English Fairy and Other Folktales. London: Walter Scott, 1890.
- Hodgetts, Edith M. S. Tales and Legends from the Land of the Tzar: A Collection of Russian Stories. New York: Charles E. Merrill and Company, 1892.
- Kingsley, Charles. The Heroes: Or, Greek Fairy Tales for My Children. New York: R. H. Russell, Publisher, 1901.

Bibliography to Volume 3

- Lach-Szyrma, W. S. "Slavonic Folk-Lore." Folk-Lore Record 4 (1881): 52–70.
- Landa, Gertrude. Jewish Fairy Tales and Legends. New York: Bloch Publishing Co., Inc., 1919.
- Lang, Andrew. The Blue Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1889.
- Lang, Andrew. The Brown Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1904.
- Lang, Andrew. The Crimson Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1903.
- Lang, Andrew. The Green Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1892.
- Lang, Andrew. The Orange Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1904.
- Lang, Andrew. The Red Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1890.
- Lang, Andrew. The Yellow Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1894.
- "The Legend of Savaddan Lake." Folklore 19 (1908): 459–463.
- MacBain, Alexander, and W. A. Clouston. "'The Baker of Beauty': A Highland Version of the Tale of 'The Three Precepts'." Folklore 3 (1892): 183–192.
- Mackenzie, Donald A. Teutonic Myth and Legend. London: Gresham Publications, 1912.
- Mawr, Mrs. E. B. Roumanian Fairy Tales and Legends. London: H. K. Lewis, 1881.
- Menzies, Louisa. Lives of the Greek Heroines. London: George Bell and Sons, 1880, 14–31.
- Michaelis, Kate Woodbridge. "An Irish Folk-Tale." Journal of American Folklore 23 (1910): 425–428.
- Monteiro, Mariana. Legends and Popular Tales of the Basque People. London: Fisher Unwin, 1887.
- Newell, W. W. "Lady Featherflight." Journal of American Folklore 6 (1893): 54–62.
- Polacheck, Hilda. Chicago Folklore. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers' Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC, June 10, 2007.
- Roth, Terry, and Sam Schwartz. Interview of Mr. Wollman. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers' Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC. <http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/wpaintro/wpahome.html> (October 16, 2005).
- Straparola, Giovanni Francesco. The Facetious Nights, trans. W. G. Waters. Vol. 1. London: Privately printed for members of the Society of Bibliophiles, 1901.
- Sturluson, Snorri. The Prose Edda, trans. Arthur Gilchrist Brodeur. New York: The American Scandinavian Foundation, 1916.
- "Three Folktales from Old Meldrum, Aberdeenshire." Folk-Lore Journal 2 (1884): 68–74.
- Verschleiser, Emanuel. Interview of H. Kleinfeld. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers' Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC, June 10, 2007.
- Webster, Wentworth. Basque Legends: Collected Chiefly in the Labourd. London: Griffith and Farran, 1879.
- Wratislaw, A. H. Sixty Folk-Tales from Exclusively Slavonic Sources. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin and Co., 1890.
- Wright, Thomas. "The Miller at the Professor's Examination." Folk-Lore Record 2 (1879): 173–176.

Cumulative Index

---

Boldface numbers refer to volume numbers.

1: Africa, The Middle East,
Australia, and Oceania
2: Asia
3: Europe
4: North and South America

- Abandonment, 1:36, 2:167
Abduction: maidens, 3:216; rescue
from supernatural, 2:24; rival ethnic group, 3:216; supernatural
bridegroom, 1:420
Aborigines, 1:297, 2:152
Absaroka (tribe), 4:67–69
Abu'n-Nuwâ's, 1:251
"Abu-Nowâs," 1:9–11
Acceptance, 3:67, 3:160, 4:110
Acoma Pueblo, 4:3–12, 4:102,
4:106
"The Adams Diggins," 4:267–72
Adlet, 4:72
"The Adventures of Kororo-
manna," 4:322
"Adventures of the Tuglay,"
2:388–95
"Advice of the Fox," 3:54
Africa: Central, 1:61–134; Eastern,
1:27–58; Northern, 1:1–25,
1:14, 3:385; Southern, 1:135–65;
Western, 1:61–134, 4:163
African American folktales,
4:159–208; Anansi tales, 4:326;
"The Bride of the Evil One,"
3:360; Cajun folktales, 4:209;
Creek tale, 4:65; rabbits, 4:415;
sources, 1:130–34; Southern tricksters, 4:45; trickster figure,
1:61
African Americans, 1:78, 4:63
African Caribbean, 4:403–40
African Diaspora, 1:57, 1:61,
1:126, 1:129
African folktales, 1:1–165; audience, 1:126; Bluebeard plot,
3:360; Malabasy influence, 1:33;
maroons, 4:324; old story as,
4:422; supernatural medicine,
1:87; Surinam maroons, 4:324
Afterlife, 2:83, 3:144, 4:185
Aggies, 4:220
Agha, 1:201
Agricultural lifestyle, 1:29, 1:98
Ainu, 2:3–27
"The Ai'wan Shamans," 2:50–58
Akan ethnic groups, 1:61, 1:96
"Aki Gahuk, the Father of the Crocodiles," 2:311–13
Akuapem, 1:61–64
Alabama (tribe), 4:13–18
Aladdin tales, 3:163
"Alcestis," 3:244–53
Aleut people, 4:19–24
Algonquin cultures, 4:124
"Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves,"
2:419
Allegory, 1:253
Alligator, 4:65
Ama-terasu, 2:59
Ambition, 2:123
America, 3:49
Amorality, 1:70
Amulets, 1:3, 1:49–52, 1:319,
4:95, 4:172
Anaconda, 4:448
Analogy, 2:301
"Ananse Buys the Town," 1:62–63
Anansi, 1:61, 1:96, 4:124, 4:163,
4:324, 4:326, 4:329–30, 4:424,
4:425–28, 4:429; Nancy, 4:405;
'tory, 4:324–29
"Anansi and the Lady in the Well," 4:429–30
"Anansi Eats Mutton,"
4:325–27
Anasazi, 4:124
Ancelet, Barry Jean, 4:220
Ancestors, 1:29, 2:59, 4:140
Ancestral ghosts, 1:333
Andalusia, 3:385
"Andras Baive," 3:321–24, 3:324
Anecdote, 3:285, 4:252
Angami, 2:261, 2:263, 2:264
Angels, 1:264
Angulimala, 2:156
"Animal Allows Himself to Be Tied to Another for Safety,"
2:121
Animal gratitude, 2:268, 2:429,
2:436, 3:364; lack of, 2:277;
repayment, 3:113; rescue from death, 2:176; snake, 4:329–30
Animal guardians, 4:98
Animal helpers: abusive family,
3:59; antelopes, 4:102; bulls,
3:185; quest role, 2:359; serpent,

Cumulative Index

- 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania
2: Asia
3: Europe
4: North and South America
- 4:309; Snow White, 3:261; unseen, 4:98–101
“The Animal Languages,” 2:295, 2:301, 3:109
Animals: clan totems, 4:89; dwarves, 3:81; folk tale characters, 1:64; grateful, 1:242; guise for spirit helpers, 4:327; hero transformation, 3:139; possessing spirits, 4:447; taming of wild, 3:313; tricksters, 2:328, 2:333; weak and larger, 2:121; witches as, 4:284; world vs. humans, 3:352
“Animals Grateful for Rescue from Peril of Death,” 2:176
Animal skin, 3:212
Animal spouse: husband, 3:86; justice, 4:255; lizard husband, 2:362; transformation, 2:320, 2:323; wife, 1:265, 4:431
Animal tales, 1:35, 4:329; African American and Caribbean sources, 1:130–34; Bantu, 1:31; cat and mouse, 2:128; Creek and African American, 4:63; danger descriptions, 1:149; fable function, 1:66, 2:126; fable trickster/culture hero, 4:161; fox nature in, 3:334; konehu cycle, 4:343; moral lesson, 4:110; moral precepts, 1:116; myth combination, 1:303, 1:306; Naga, 2:265–67; narrative functions, 3:313; origins explanation, 1:306; plot features, 1:57; question-and-answer pattern, 2:152; self-serving characters, 1:35. See also Trickster
Animism, 2:3; environmental elements, 2:14; shape-shifting, 2:17; Tibetan, 2:113
“Annancy and the Yam Hill,” 1:61, 4:424–25
Ann Nancy, 4:163–64
“The Antelope Boy,” 4:102–5
Anthropomorphic animals, 4:415; bears, 4:89; spider, 4:324
Anthropomorphic beings, 1:67, 1:353, 3:316
Antigua, 4:405–13
Anti-Semitism, 3:379
Anxieties, 3:360, 4:76
Apache, 4:25–32, 4:273
Ape, 2:365–66
Appalachian folktales, 4:225–43
Arabian Peninsula, 1:179
Arabic folk tradition, 1:220, 2:83
Arab influence, 1:12, 1:49
Arabs, 1:260
Arahat (people), 2:156
Arawak (people), 4:297–98, 4:443–52
Archetype tales, 3:67
Arctic, 4:72, 4:74
Arctic peoples. See Circumpolar cultures; Eskimo
Aristocracy, 1:98
Arizona (Native Americans), 4:285, 4:291
Arjuna, 2:142
Armenia, 1:169–79
Ascetics, 2:92
Ashanti, 1:61
Ashkenazim, 3:141–48, 3:147
Asia: East, 2:1–130; Malabasy influence, 1:33; South, 2:131–303; Southeast, 2:305–438
Assassination, 2:64
Assimilation, 1:201
Asuang, 2:429
Ataro, 1:333, 1:341
Athabascans, 4:72
Athletic competition, 4:95
Audience, 1:126, 1:176
Aurohuac, 4:297–98
Australia, 1:297–327
Autobiography, 4:258
Avenger, 1:240, 4:19
“Awa-Wanga Animal Fables,” 1:30
Axaiacatzin, 4:400
Aymara (people), 4:299–305
Aztec, 4:393
Babalawo, 1:129
“Baboon Disguises Himself and Becomes a Farmer,” 1:56–57
“The Babracote and the Camundi,” 4:448–49
Baca, Elfego, 4:275–79
Badger, 2:97
Baghdad, 1:10
Bagobo (people), 2:388
Bahamas, 4:414–22
Bajau, 2:307
“The Baker of Beauty,” 3:54–58
Ball games, 4:364
Bands of families, 4:74
Bantu, 1:29, 1:30–31, 1:49, 1:58, 1:64, 1:68
Banyan, 1:52
Bards, 2:74
Basque, 3:339–59
Batak (people), 2:338
Bats, 4:341
Battles, 2:74, 2:383, 3:54, 3:339
Baule (people), 1:61
Bear, 3:81, 4:40, 4:89; Brer, 4:161–62; fox and, 1:133–34; John the, 4:376; as maiden, 4:136–39; Mouse Deer and, 2:333; origin, 4:39–42; women lover, 4:118–20
“The Bear and the Fox,” 1:133–34
Beards, 3:81
“Bear Maiden,” 4:136–39
“The Beautiful and the Ugly Twin,” 3:373
“Beauty and the Beast,” 2:362
Beckwith, Martha Warren, 1:380, 4:420, 4:425, 4:426, 4:430
Bedouin, 1:179–80
Bee, 3:174
“The Beginning,” 2:307–8
Beliefs: animistic, 2:3; Bön, 2:113; indigenous, 2:307; shape-shifting, 2:17
Belief tale: hag legend, 4:199; spirit possession, 4:203; white deer, 4:228; witch identity, 4:284
Bell, Robert, 4:57
Bella Bella, 4:72
Benevolence, 1:216–17; ancestral ghosts, 1:333; fallen angles, 1:264; ironic, 4:89; naiveté,

- 3:285; protectors, 4:43; serpent, 4:309; skull, 1:92; validation, 1:92
- “Benevolence,” 1:216–17
- Benin, 1:124
- Berberisca, 3:385
- Berbers, 1:12
- Bering Strait, 2:40
- Betel nut, 1:343
- Betrothal, 1:313
- “The Bewitched Wives,” 4:70–71
- Bewitching: culpability, 4:255; female jinn, 1:24; medicine, 4:85; wives, 4:70–71
- Bharata, 2:142
- Biblical narrative, 1:42–43, 1:181, 1:196
- “Big Bad Wolf,” 4:186
- “Big Man-eater,” 4:16–18
- “The Big Worm,” 4:421–22
- “The Billy Goat and the King,” 2:295–97, 2:301, 3:109
- Billy the Kid, 4:258
- Birds, 1:297, 2:266–67; assistance of pet, 3:270; mythic, 2:359; ordinary folktale roles, 3:67; tengu, 2:92; trickster sparrow, 1:291; willy-wagtail, 1:303
- “The Birds and the Snakes,” 2:266–67
- “Bird’s Pea Gets Stuck in Socket of Mill-handle,” 2:291
- “The Bird That Made Milk,” 1:158, 1:161–65
- Birth, 3:21, 4:112, 4:364
- Black, 3:253
- “The Black Dragon and the Red Dragon,” 1:267–73
- Blame shifting, 1:72, 1:223, 4:165
- “Blessing from the Owl God,” 2:3–13
- Blind, 2:74, 3:113
- Blocking characters, 1:6
- Blood feuds, 3:304
- “Bluebeard,” 3:34, 3:360–64
- Boas, Franz, 4:367, 4:380
- Boccaccio, Giovanni, 3:274–75
- Boer, 1:144
- “The Boiled Crab,” 2:266
- Bolivia, 4:299
- Bön, 2:113, 2:123
- Bones, 4:412–13
- Bonney, William H., 4:258
- Book of Jasher*, 1:181
- Booky, 4:418
- “The Borah of Byamee,” 1:313–19
- Borneo, 2:307–37
- Bornu (people), 1:98
- Born with caul, 4:203
- Borrowings: American ethnic group, 4:174; American south, 4:209; Cinderella variant, 4:382; from Maroons, 4:343; setting adaptation, 4:380
- Boston, 1:251, 1:253
- “Boudreaux and the Cottonmouth,” 4:219–20
- Bouqui, 4:209–15
- Bourke, John G., 4:281
- Boys, 3:21; culture hero, 4:112; initiation ceremony, 1:313, 1:322; leadership test, 3:96; orphan, 2:263; trickster, 2:263, 4:102. See also Brothers
- “The Boy Who Could Keep a Secret,” 3:96–103
- Brahma, 2:133
- “The Brahman, the Tiger, and the Six Judges,” 2:152–56, 2:277
- Brahmans, 2:152
- “The Brave Tailor,” 1:287, 4:232
- Brazil, 4:306
- Brer Bear, 4:161–62
- Brer Dog, 4:175–79
- Brer Rabbit, 4:45, 4:166–89
- “Brer Rabbit’s Cool Air Swing,” 4:170–71
- Brer Squirrel, 4:170–71
- Brer Turkey, 4:179–82
- Brer Wolf, 4:168–70, 4:170–71, 4:186
- “The Briar-Patch Punishment for Rabbit,” 1:152, 2:415, 4:121, 4:415
- Bribri, 4:351–56
- Bride: cannibal spirits, 1:92; courtship, 3:289; of demons, 4:193–98; of evil one, 1:85, 2:172, 3:360; hero winning, 3:295; husband abduction rescues, 2:24; nonhuman form, 3:212; price customs, 1:82; to spirit, 1:92; substitute, 1:260; test, 1:47–48, 3:289; underworld, 1:353, 1:372–80
- “The Bride from the Underworld,” 1:353, 1:372–80
- Bridegroom abduction by supernatural, 1:420
- “The Bride of the Evil One,” 1:85, 3:360, 4:193–98
- “The Bride Rescues Her Husband,” 2:24–27
- “The Bride Test,” 1:47
- Britain, 3:1–64
- Brother Abraham Jasper, 4:185
- “The Brother and the Sister,” 1:260–64
- “Brother Elephant and Brother Whale,” 4:417–18
- Brotherhood of Penitents, 4:279
- “Brother Rabbit, Brother Booky, and Brother Cow,” 4:418–20
- “Brother Rabbit an’ Brother Tar-Baby,” 1:152, 2:156, 4:121, 4:209, 4:414–17
- Brothers, 4:380; culture heroes, 1:324; tame and wild, 4:33–34; twin, 3:385, 4:148; younger, 2:245–47, 3:201–2, 3:216
- Buchanan, George, 4:440
- Buddha, 2:156
- Buddhism, 2:83, 2:92
- Buffalo, 4:50, 4:116–18, 4:264
- Bullroarer, 1:313
- Bulls, 3:185
- Bulu, 1:64–77
- Bunda, 1:303
- Bunyip, 1:310
- Burkovina, 3:171
- Burma, 2:261
- “The Burning of the Old House,” 3:309–12
- Bushmen. See San
- Bush spirits, 4:332, 4:338
- Buso, 2:388
- Buzzard, 4:163–64, 4:182
- Byamee, 1:313
- Caingang, 4:306–8
- “Cajun Cockfight,” 4:220–21
- Cajun folktales, 4:45, 4:209–21
- Calabar, 1:80

Cumulative Index

- |                                                       |
|-------------------------------------------------------|
| 1: Africa, The Middle East,Australia, and Oceania |
| 2: Asia                                               |
| 3: Europe                                             |
| 4: North and South America                            |
- Calabash tree, 4:364–66, 4:397
“The Calabash Tree,” 4:364–66
“The Cannibal and the Pig Who Ate Human Flesh,” 1:347–49
Cannibalism, 1:347–49, 3:231,
3:317, 4:16–18; Adlet, 4:72;
Caribbean peoples, 4:448;
children, 1:158–61; evil spirits,
2:105; ghosts, 2:83; giants, 4:16;
hunting of heads, 2:309; mother,
1:158; Native American tales,
4:16; preternatural stupidity,
1:55; supernatural power, 2:429
“The Cannibal Mother and Her Children,” 1:158–61
Cannibal spirits, 1:92
“A Cannibal Story,” 1:324–27,
1:347
Carib, 4:448, 4:450, 4:453–58
Caribbean, 4:164, 4:403–58; animal tale sources, 1:130–34; Ann
Nancy/Anansi, 4:163; Cajuns,
4:209
Caribbean folktales: Anansi, 4:326; maxims, 4:425; serpent helper,
4:309
“The Carpenter and the Amulet,”
1:49–52
Caste system, 2:152
“The Cat and the Mice,” 2:128–30
“The Cat as Sham Holy Man,”
2:128
Cats, 2:100, 2:128, 4:409
“The Cat’s Elopement,” 2:100–102
Cautionary tales: dog control, 4:50;
drowning, 3:92; enemies, 3:379;
good advice, 3:313; natural gifts,
1:393; social norms, 2:262;
social transgressions, 3:28; upper classes, 3:182
Central Africa, 1:61–134
Central America, 4:349–401
Central Europe, 3:65–138
Ceylon. See Sri Lanka
Chakana, 4:315
Champions, 2:142
Chaos, 2:28
Chapbooks, 3:3–4, 3:21
Characters: conventional, 2:427;
predators/prey, 2:128;
self-serving, 1:35; stock, 1:5,
2:128, 3:130, 3:185, 4:167,
4:215, 4:220; Two-Faces, 4:53;
untrustworthy, 1:35. See also
Culture hero; Trickster
Charlemagne, 3:339
“The Charmed Ring,” 2:176–81,
3:163
Cherokee nation, 4:33–49,
4:94–98
Cheyenne tribe, 4:50–56
Chicken feet, 3:212
Chih Nü, 2:30
Children, 3:67, 3:141; abandoned,
2:167; of animals and humans,
4:376; bearing supernatural agreement, 3:373; cannibals,
1:55–56, 1:158–61; of deities,
1:55, 1:398, 3:231, 4:301,
4:319, 4:456; of deities and humans, 3:231; lost and animal guardian, 4:89; neglected, 4:429; orphan, 2:263; orphans, 2:262;
trickster, 2:318–19, 2:319; twins,
3:373, 3:385, 4:34, 4:83, 4:84,
4:105–10, 4:148–55, 4:359,
4:364, 4:456
“The Children and the Cannibal,”
1:55–56
“The Children of the Sun,” 4:301,
4:319
Chile, 4:309–14
China, 1:223, 2:28–35
Chinese philosophy, 2:28
Chipmunk, 4:84
Choctaw tribe, 4:13
Choruses, 1:126
Christian influence, 1:179, 3:253,
4:374, 4:389
Christians, 1:223, 1:331, 2:399
Chukchee, 2:36–58, 2:105
Churinga, 1:319, 1:3038
Cigarettes, 4:102
“Cinderella,” 2:419, 3:58–59, 3:77,
3:270–74, 4:382
“Cinder Mary,” 4:382–84
Circumpolar cultures, 2:36, 2:40,
3:313
Cities, 1:3, 1:10, 1:14, 1:16,
1:124, 3:390
City dwellers, 1:3
City-states, 1:98, 1:124
Clan: ancestor, 4:140; animal helpers, 4:98; lineage, 4:3–4, 4:79, 4:140; membership, 1:42; totem
animals, 4:89
Cleansing environment: culture hero, 1:324, 3:231, 4:359; twin hero, 4:84, 4:148
“A Clever Hunter and a Bird,”
1:116, 1:117–18
Cleverness, 1:31, 2:319, 4:53,
4:232, 4:415
“The Clever Orphan,” 2:263–64
Climate: arctic, 4:74; exaggeration,
4:285, 4:291; tropical, 1:78
Closings, 1:106, 1:291, 4:409
“Clothing Caught in a Graveyard,”
4:252
Clubhouses, 1:345
Coastal dwellers: Chukchee,
2:36–58
Coastal trade, 1:64
Coats-of-arms, 4:79
Cock fighting, 4:220–21
Cockroach, 4:430
“Cock’s Breakfast,” 4:430–31
Colonialism, 2:367
Comic fiction, 1:291
Comic misunderstandings, 1:223
Comic narrative, 3:143, 4:423
Comic tales, 1:3, 1:6, 1:218
Community: survival of, 1:238,
4:72; trickster role, 1:80, 4:162,
4:172
Competition, 4:188
Competitors, 1:64, 1:71, 1:345
Complexion of spirits, 1:333
Comrade Lapin, 4:45
Conclusions, 4:425
Congo, 1:78–79
Conjuration, 4:172, 4:200, 4:203
Conjurer, 1:431
Contagion, 4:227
“Contempt for His Torturers,”
3:147–48

- "Coon in the Box," 2:247, 4:183–85
 Cooperation, 4:162
 Corn, 4:33
 Cornwall, 3:3
 "The Corpse Killed Five Times," 1:223
 Corpses, 1:341
 Cosmology, 1:396, 3:299; humanity, 1:396; primal chaos, 1:353
 Cosquin, Emmanuel, 1:242
 Côte d'Ivoire, 1:61
 Courtship, 2:398–99, 3:289, 4:188
 Cow, 4:418
 Co-wives, 1:106
 Coyote, 2:128, 4:110–11, 4:116, 4:284
 "Coyote and the Buffalo," 4:116–18
 "The Coyote and the Woodpecker," 4:29, 4:110–11
 Crabs, 2:266, 2:334, 3:256
 Crazy-Dogs-Wishing-to-Die, 4:67
 "The Creation," 1:431–32, 4:299, 4:301, 4:315, 4:357–58
 Creation myth, 1:353, 1:396, 2:338, 4:423; Bagobo, 2:396; death, 2:307; dividing and ordering, 2:28; Haggada narrative, 1:185; Japanese, 2:62; Maya, 4:357–66; Navajo, 4:124–29
 "Creation of Heaven and Earth," 1:396–98, 1:398, 1:431
 "The Creation of the World," 1:184–95, 1:196
 Creators: anthropomorphic, 1:300; lata, 1:331; male and female, 4:50; raven, 4:140; Viracocha, 4:299, 4:304, 4:315; wrath, 4:357
 Creek Nation, 4:13, 4:57–62, 4:63–66
 Crests, 4:79
 Criminals, 1:24
 Crimination, 1:14
 Crocodile, 2:311–13, 2:335–36, 2:366–67
 "The Crocodile and the Dog," 1:33–34
 "Crocodile's Treason," 1:148–52
 Cross-cultural categories, 1:87
 Cross-cultural distribution: animal tales, 1:31; borrowing, 4:209; bride of demons, 4:194; "Brother Rabbit an' the Tar-baby," 4:414; ghost obligation fulfillment, 2:86; Hansel and Grettel variants, 3:67; magic swords, 3:96; motifs, 1:45; night hag, 4:225; obstacle flight, 4:118; omen origin, 4:354–55; setting adaptation, 4:380; shape-shifters, 3:212; sibling rivalry, 1:106; signs of tragic events, 4:448; titan in origin myth, 2:28; tricksters, 1:154, 2:430–31; trickster traits, 2:415; unnatural suitor, 1:85; vampire characteristics, 3:174; variant transformations, 2:298
 Cross-cultural elements: duendes, 4:387; hero, 2:383; supernatural, 3:357
 Cross-cultural influence, 4:382
 Cross-cultural phenomenon: hag experience, 4:199; shamanism, 2:36
 Crow tribe, 4:67–69
 Cruel stepmother, 1:119, 1:260, 2:167, 3:18
 "The Crumb in the Beard," 3:266–70
 "The Crystal Casket," 3:261–66
 "The Crystal Coffin," 3:72–77
 Cuchulain, 3:39
 Cultural complexity: food supply, 4:145; living by rule, 4:393; Nahua and Aztec, 4:393; Natchez, 4:145
 Culture: Armenia, 1:169; Australian aboriginal, 1:297; clashes, 4:273; Efik tales, 1:82; mixture, 1:49; perpetuation, 3:141; pig significance, 1:347; Southwest region Spanish, 4:281
 Culture hero: animal fables, 4:161–62; anthropomorphic, 1:300; characteristics, 1:398; cleansing environment, 1:324, 3:231, 4:84, 4:148, 4:359; divine ancestors, 1:29; fire theft, 4:27, 4:64; fox, 4:27; Hercules, 3:231; Manabozho, 4:124; mina birds, 1:297; monster-slayers, 1:120; pair, 4:304; raven, 2:40, 4:75; raven/El, 4:140; stone boy, 4:112; Theseus, 3:231; totemic clans, 1:301; trickster, 1:353, 3:3; twins, 1:347, 4:84, 4:359, 4:364; Viracocha, 4:299. See also Trickster
 Cumulative tale, 2:291
 "Cunnie-More-than-Father," 4:425–28
 "Cupid and Psyche," 1:242
 "Curanderas and Brujas," 4:280–82
 Curiosity, 3:280
 Curses, 2:295, 3:304
 Cycles: Anansi, 1:61–63, 4:426; animal tricksters, 2:328–29; Brer Rabbit, 4:45, 4:166–89; death-bed promises, 1:242; Jack tales, 4:229; John and Master, 4:183; Kampuaa myths, 1:380; Konehu, 4:343; Lapin and Bouqui, 4:209; mouse deer, 2:364; night hag legends, 4:225; Phoebe Ward witch, 4:225; rabbit-big man-eater, 4:18; rabbit tales, 4:367; Raja Rasalu legend, 2:268; tale names explanation, 1:61–62; Ulster myths, 3:39
 Cyclops, 3:350
 Dance: death sentence, 1:147; goddess of, 1:361; Shinto rites, 2:59; warrior culture, 4:95
 Dangers, 1:149, 1:369
 Darkness, 4:332
 "The Darkness and the Cleaving-Together," 1:353–57
 Date palm, 2:298
 Daughter, 2:191–95, 3:120
 Dead: appropriation of living, 2:86; communication with, 1:238; helpful, 2:268, 2:436; spirits, 1:67; unquiet, 3:339
 "Dead Man as Helper," 2:436
 Deans, James, 4:79
 Death: animal gratitude, 2:176; entry into world, 1:431; facing to win bride, 2:195; haunting and untimely, 4:251; of hero, 3:39; imposition of, 2:62; myths, 1:396; occupations and social

Cumulative Index

- 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania
2: Asia
3: Europe
4: North and South America
- class, 2:70; outwitting of, 2:133; overcoming, 1:341; personal attack causation, 4:47; portent, 4:341; revival from, 1:343; shaman powers, 2:36; trickster bringing of, 1:398; water of, 1:242
 “The Death and Burial of the Poor Hen-Sparrow,” 2:281–88, 2:291
 Deathbed promises, 1:242
 “Death of Baldr,” 3:296–98
 “Death of Cuchulain,” 3:39–48
 “The Death of the Little Hen,” 2:281
 Death sentences, 1:147
 Deceit, 2:203
 Deception: courting trick, 4:188; Jack-O’-My-Lanterns, 4:206; of women, 2:203–21
 “Deceptive Tug-of-War,” 4:417
 Decorum, 1:82
 Deer, 4:29, 4:45, 4:173–75, 4:228
 De Fábrega, H. Pittier, 4:354
 Deification: creation myth, 1:396; of wind, 4:25; Yoruba myth, 1:124
 Deities: akua, 1:369; Ama-terasu, 2:59; disguised, 4:315; genealogical linkage to humans, 1:417; good and evil, 4:353; rampaging, 1:347; romance with mortals, 2:30; sky, 2:62; snake, 2:123
 Deluge, 1:181, 4:306
 “The Deluge,” 4:301, 4:306–8
 “The Demon Lover,” 1:85, 4:194
 Demons, 2:156, 2:329, 4:193–98
 “The Demon with the Matted Hair,” 2:156–59
 Denmark, 3:285–91
 Dervishes, 1:216
 Descendants, 1:29
 “The Descendants of Fanga,” 1:353, 1:417–19
 Destruction: all-encompassing, 3:61; in deluge, 4:306; twin culture heroes, 4:359
 Deuteronomy, 1:181
 Devices: frame tales, 2:184–85 (See also Formulaic devices); “Mother Goose,” 3:360 (See also Linking devices; Rhetorical devices; Validating devices). See also Frame story
 Devil, 2:113–16, 4:65, 4:389, 4:436; Jack-O’-My-Lanterns, 4:206; marriage to, 3:280; selling soul to, 4:186
 “Diamond Cut Diamond,” 2:254–60, 2:255
 Dieri (people), 1:300, 1:322
 Dilemma of gift as curse, 2:295
 “Dinewan the Emy, and Goomblebuggon the Bustard,” 1:305–8
 Discord in creation, 1:431
 Disease causation, 4:47
 Disguise: failure, 1:57; fallen angels, 1:264; trickster, 1:72, 4:407–8. See also Shape-shifter; Shape-shifting
 Dishonesty, 2:430
 “The Disobedient Daughter Who Married a Skull,” 1:85–87, 1:92, 3:360
 Distribution: Indo-European tradition, 2:167; Rabbit’s [Hare’s] triumph, 1:152
 “To Divide Presents and Strokes,” 1:6
 Divination, 1:129, 2:113
 Divine ancestor, 1:29
 Divine conflicts, 1:361
 Divine essence, 1:124, 2:3
 Division of labor, 1:158, 1:161
 Dogs, 1:33–34, 1:398, 4:50, 4:67; Brer, 4:175–79; tanuki, 2:95
 Domestic strife, 1:5
 Donkey, 4:191–93
 “The Doom of the Katt-a-quins,” 4:145–47
 Double Faces, 4:34, 4:53
 Double man, 4:95
 Double spirits, 4:202
 “Dr. Know-All,” 2:247, 4:184
 “The Dragon Prince and the Stepmother,” 1:282–87
 Dragons, 2:80, 2:116, 3:160; helpfulness, 1:268
 “The Dragon-Slayer,” 3:185, 3:253, 3:351
 Dravidian (people), 2:298
 Dreams: power of, 3:216; prophetic, 4:327; seeking women in, 4:385
 Drowning, 3:92
 Ducks, 4:218
 Duelist mentality, 2:333
 Duendes, 4:387, 4:391
 Dusun, 2:307, 2:309, 2:319
 Dutch East Indies, 2:367–82
 Dutch Guiana. See Suriname
 Dwarfs, 2:32, 3:81
 “The Dybbuk of Bunker Street,” 3:143–47
 Dyerwine, 1:303
 Earth gods, 1:369
 East Asia, 2:1–130
 Eastern Africa, 1:27–58
 Eastern Europe, 3:139–228
 Eating fruit motif, 3:253
 Economy, 1:61, 1:80
 Edge of world, 4:76
 Education, 3:381, 3:390
 Edwards, Charles, 4:420
 Eel, 1:353
 Efik, 1:80–95, 3:360
 Egypt, 1:3–12, 1:42
 “Eight Brothers,” 2:245–47
 Eight (sacred number), 2:388
 “El: The Myth of the Raven,” 4:140–45
 Elders, 4:102
 “The Election of the King of the Animals,” 1:130
 “The Elephant and the Rooster,” 1:131
 “The Elephant and the Tortoise,” 1:80–82
 Elephants, 1:13, 1:80, 4:417
 “Elfego Baca,” 4:275–79
 Elijah, 1:240
 El Salvador, 4:397
 Elves, 4:387
 Emotions, 1:300
 Enemies of group, 3:379

- England, 3:3–38
 English influence, 4:229, 4:440
 “Enmity of Fowl and Cockroach,” 4:430
 Environment: animistic beliefs, 2:14; arctic, 4:72, 4:74; Australian Aborigines, 1:297; cleansing by culture hero, 1:324, 3:231, 4:84, 4:148, 4:359; culture heroes, 1:398; explanation, 1:393, 3:351, 3:352; plot modification, 4:410
 Epics, 2:142, 2:268
Er tin tin, 4:324
 Eskimo, 4:70–78
 Ethics, 2:277, 4:3–4
 Ethnic groups: Appalachian region, 4:229; Aztec sacred history, 4:393; Borneo, 2:307; conflict, 4:450; Congo, 1:78; Jewish communities, 3:141. See also names of specific groups
 Euripides, 3:245
 Europe, 3:1–398
 European influence: Brer Rabbit trick, 4:188; Central American folklore, 4:367; Cheyenne, 4:54; Creek tale, 4:65; Efik, 1:80; Natchez, 4:121; tale elements, 4:136–37; West African trade, 1:64
 Evil, 1:264, 4:389
 Evil eye, 3:174
 Evil one, 4:193–98
 Evil spirits, 2:105
 Exaggeration, 4:285, 4:291
 Exchanges of eyes, 1:80
 Excommunication rites, 3:28
 “An Exile’s Revenge,” 1:345–47
 Explanation, 2:80, 2:261, 4:423; animal nature, 1:80; animal tale mythic, 1:303; animal tales, 1:31, 1:35; emergence from underworld, 4:302; fable moralization, 1:112; historical enmity, 4:450; justice, 4:409; local features, 3:28; Muslim prohibitions, 1:12; origins, 1:306; prayer wand, 2:14; rational in legend, 4:301; relationships with other peoples, 2:309; sacred objects, 1:308; taboo adherence, 1:67; tattooing, 1:425
 “The Exploits of Koneho,” 4:342–48
 Explorer accounts, 4:291
 “Exposure in a Boat,” 2:383
 Expulsion, 1:260
 Eyamba, 1:87
 Eyes: animal, 1:80–82; closing, 2:128; evil, 3:174; exchanges of, 1:80
 “The Fable of the Leopard and Hyena,” 1:31
 Fables, 1:112; admonition, 1:121; animal tale, 1:66, 2:126, 2:265, 3:313, 4:161; animal tricksters, 1:76; Bulu, 1:64; envy, 2:102; moralizing, 1:33, 1:112; personified morals, 2:436; trickster/culture hero, 4:161
 Fábrega, H. Pittier de, 4:353
The Facetious Nights (Straparola), 3:275
 Facts, 2:67
 Fairies, 4:247
 Fair tales, 3:360, 3:364
 Fairy queen, 3:21
 “Faithful John,” 2:159
 Fallen angels, 1:264
 Fall from grace, 1:196, 4:453
 Falling fruit, 1:169, 1:176
 “The Fall of Man and the Punishment of the Serpent,” 1:196–200
 False bride, 1:87
 Falsehood, 2:435–38
 Family: animal helpers, 3:59; bands, 4:74; divine lineage, 2:59; escape of abusive, 3:59; ghosts as guardian, 1:333; human and divine, 1:417; property reclamation, 4:189; relationships, 4:448
 Family sagas, 4:159
 Family trees, 1:353
 “Famine,” 4:67–69
 “The Famine and the Spider,” 1:132–33
 Fang (people), 1:64
 “Fangono,” 1:419–25
 Fantastic animals, 1:36
 Fante, 1:61, 1:96–97
 Far away land, 2:13
 Farmers, 2:262; Angami, 2:261; good, 3:285–88; origin myth, 4:3; Pueblo practices, 4:102; rain-bringing, 4:83
 Fate of warrior, 3:304
 “The Father and Son Who Married Mother and Daughter,” 2:184, 2:191–95, 3:275
 Fathers: jealousy of sons, 4:426; marriage, 2:191–95; sibling rivalry, 1:106; unkind sister partiality, 3:18
 Fathers-in-law, 1:322
 Fattening houses, 1:82–83
 Faust legends, 3:160
 “Fear,” 1:257–60
 Fear of night hag, 4:225
 Fellahin, 1:3–4
 Female beauty, 1:82
 Female creator, 4:332
 Female figures, 2:40
 Female jinn, 1:24
 Female protagonists, 3:34, 4:255
 Females, 4:3–4, 4:83
 Female spirits, 2:40, 4:74
 “Ferdinand the True and Ferinand the False,” 3:364
 Feudal lords, 2:70
 Fez, 1:16
 “The Fifty-One Thieves,” 2:424–27
 Figonas, 1:335–41, 1:339
 Fin-back whale, 4:79
 Fire, 1:319; acquisition, 1:398; gift of, 1:29; making motif, 4:13; theft, 4:27, 4:64
 Fire Dragaman, 4:16, 4:236–40
 “The First People,” 2:62–63
 First person myths, 2:13, 2:16
 “The First Village,” 2:338–42
 Fish, 4:420
 “The Fisher and His Wife,” 2:102
 “The Fisherman and the Boyard’s Daughter,” 3:182–84
 “The Fisherman and the Jinn,” 1:220–23, 2:184, 3:275
 “The Fish Lover,” 4:420
 “The Fish Peri,” 1:176, 1:264–67, 1:268
 “The Flight,” 4:436

Cumulative Index

- 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania
2: Asia
3: Europe
4: North and South America
- Flight by heroes: girl helpers, 3:125, 3:152, 3:171, 4:248, 4:435–36
 “The Flood,” 4:124–36
 “The Fly and the Ant,” 1:134
 Folk beliefs: animal shape-shifters, 2:95; Basque, 3:357; devil in Mexican, 4:389; hag identification, 4:199; hoodoo, 4:203–5; Russian, 3:216; unquiet dead, 3:339
 Folk history, 4:400
 Folk medicine, 4:248
 Folktale: classification, 1:158; fair tales, 3:360; Indo-European central tale types, 2:167; myth distinction, 4:89; traditions, 1:47
 Folk traditions: pow-wow doctors, 4:244
 Folly, 3:36, 4:215
 Food, 1:319, 4:145; fruit, 1:169, 1:176, 3:253
 Fool Dog, 4:67
 Foolishness: fox as trickster, 4:29; husband-wife misunderstanding, 4:411; numskull tale, 2:288; stereotype, 4:220
 Fools: Buchanan, George, 4:440; Jean Sot, 4:215, 4:217, 4:218; trickster success, 4:168; wise, 2:221–33
 Foragers, 1:313
 Forbidden rooms, 3:280
 Forces, 2:28
 Foreign rulers, 1:3
 Forest demon, 2:329
 Forest spirits, 4:453
 “The Forgotten Fiancée,” 4:436
 Forgotten fiancée motif, 3:12
 Formulaic devices, 1:169; closing, 1:106, 1:291; composition, 1:106; endings, 1:176, 4:229; openings, 1:106, 1:274, 4:324, 4:327, 4:415; question-and-answer pattern, 2:152, 2:250
 Formulaic usage: four in Native American groups, 4:124; Polish märchens, 3:139; sacred, 4:40, 4:47
 Fornander, Abraham, 1:380
 “The Forsaken Fiancée: Service as Menial,” 3:77
 Fortune, 4:215
 Fortune telling, 4:183–84
 “The Forty Thieves,” 2:424
 Four (sacred number), 4:3, 4:124, 4:354–55
 Fox, 2:97, 2:126–28, 3:325, 3:334, 4:29–32, 4:182–83; fire-stealer, 4:27
 “Fox and Deer,” 4:29
 “Fox and Kingfisher,” 4:29, 4:30–31, 4:110
 “Fox and Mountain Lion,” 4:29, 4:31
 “Fox and Rabbit,” 4:31–32
 “The Fox and the Lapp,” 3:325
 Foxes, 2:95, 4:284
 Frame story: devices, 1:220–38, 2:203; linking in, 1:228; Sanskrit, 2:184; tall tales, 4:291
 France, 3:360–78, 4:209
 “Frau Hölle,” 3:90, 4:434
 Freedom, 1:147
 Frog god, 1:380–85
 “The Frog Prince,” 2:298–301, 2:298–303
 Frogs, 2:116, 2:121–22, 3:211, 4:456
 “From ‘Gisli the Outlaw,’” 3:303–12
 Fruit: eating piece, 3:253; falling, 1:169, 1:176
 Fugitive accountability, 2:359
 Fuseli, John Henry, 4:199

 Gamblers, 4:124–29
 Gambling for life, 2:268
 Game-cock, 2:367–82
 “Ga’na’a’s Adventures Among the Cherokee,” 4:94–98
 Gardner, Emelyn, 4:253
 Garuda, 2:359
 Gaster, M., 1:242
 Gazelle, 1:78
 Gender, 1:161

 Genealogy: Bantugan, 2:399; mythological, 1:417; mythology role, 1:353; rider claims, 1:372
 Generations, 2:123
 Genesis, 1:42–43, 1:181, 1:196
 “The Genius,” 3:104–9
 Genre: legends. See Animal tales; Fables; Fair tales; Myth; Ordinary folktales
 Geographic features, 3:28
 Geological features, 1:361, 1:393
 Gergasi, 2:329
 “Gerhajis and Arab,” 1:42–43
 German influence, 4:244–57
 Germany, 3:67–95
 Ghana, 1:96; Yoruba culture, 1:124
 “Ghost Legends of the Blue Mountains,” 4:247–48
 “Ghost of the Violet Well,” 2:70–74
 “The Ghost Penitente,” 4:279–80
 Ghosts: corpse seeking, 2:83; obligation fulfillment motif, 2:86; Penitente, 4:279
 Ghouls, 2:83
 “Giant of the Flood,” 1:181–84
 Giants, 3:298; biblical deluge extrapolation, 1:181; cannibal figure, 4:16; cyclops, 3:350; slaying, 3:3; zimwi, 1:55
 “A Giant’s Rock-Throwing,” 1:393–95
 Gift, 1:3, 1:5; animal languages, 3:109; curse of, 2:295; natural, 1:393
 “A Gift for the Sultan,” 1:4–6
 “Gifts for My Son Mohammed,” 1:3–4, 1:5, 3:194
 “The Gifts of the Little People,” 2:32
 Gilbert Islands, 1:353
 “Ginas and the Rajah,” 2:318–20
 Ginzberg, Louis, 1:185
 “The Girl and the Fish,” 4:420–21
 Girls, 1:43–44, 2:250–57, 4:248–51; bewitchment removal, 4:70; helper of hero’s flight, 3:125, 3:152, 3:171, 4:248, 4:435–36; kind/unkind, 1:121, 2:315, 3:18,

- 3:90, 4:434; two, 3:81; waxgirl, 1:78
 "The Girl Without Legs," 1:43–44
 Gladden, George, 4:258
 "The Glass Axe," 3:124–30, 3:125
 Gluttony, 1:80
 Goats, 2:295, 3:109
 Goblins, 2:186–91
 Goblins apparitions, 4:206
 Goblin tales, 2:184
 "God," 4:379–82
 Gods/goddesses: birth of first, 2:62; child of human and underworld, 1:398; creation myth, 1:396; creator, 1:431; Hawaiian nature, 1:369; Hiiaka, 1:361; Lata, 1:331; marriage worthiness, 2:320; mortal women and, 3:231; offspring, 1:380; Pele, 1:361; shape-shifting, 2:17. See also Creators; Deities
 Gold Coast, 1:61
 "The Golden Crab," 3:256–60
 "The Golden Hairpin," 2:86–91
 "The Golden Spinster," 3:120–24
 Golden staffs, 4:315
 Gold mines, 4:268
 Gold trade, 1:61
 "The Good Serpent," 4:309–14
 "The Grain of Corn," 2:291–95
 "Grandfather's Escape to Free Haven," 4:159–61
 "Granny Steel," 4:251
 Grass-cutting sword, 2:64
 Grateful animals. See Animal gratitude
 "The Grateful Animals," 2:195, 3:364
 "The Grateful Beasts," 3:113–19
 "The Grateful Dead," 3:139
 "The Grateful Tartaro and the Heren-suge," 3:350–56
 "The Great Fire Bird," 1:297–99
 Greece, 3:231–60
 Greed, 2:83, 2:264–65, 4:167
 Greek myth, 1:120, 3:231, 3:245
 Greeley, Horace, 4:185
 "The Green Lady," 3:18–21
 Griffin, 3:185
 Grimm, Jacob, 3:67
 Grimm, Wilhelm, 3:67
 Groom, Francis Hinds, 3:174
 Guaraauano. See Warrau
 Guardians, 1:14
 Guardian spirits, 4:98
 "Guarding the Door," 4:411
 Guatemala, 4:357
 Guile, 1:70, 4:206
 Gullibility, 4:168
 Gunfighters of American west, 4:258, 4:275
 "Gylaginning," 3:292
 Gypsies, 3:163, 3:185
 Habitat abandonment, 1:36
 Hag-craft, 4:199
 Hags. See Night hag
 Haida, 4:79–82
 Hair, 1:333
 "Haliwari and the Wonderful Tree," 4:443–46, 4:448
 Hammer, 3:298
 Hanauer, James, 1:241
 Hani al-Hakami, Abu-Nuwas al-Hasan ben, 1:10
 "Hansel and Grettel," 3:67–72, 4:16
 "Hans My Hedgehog," 3:86, 3:275
 Hare, 1:58, 1:68; Japanese folklore, 2:97. See also Rabbit
 "Harisarmen," 2:247–50
 Harris, Joel Chandler, 1:130, 1:152, 4:186, 4:414
 Hartman, C. V., 4:364
 "Háttatal," 3:292
 Haunting, 4:251
 Hausa, 1:98–115
 Hawaii, 1:331, 1:361–96
 Head hunting, 2:309
 Healers: curandero/a, 4:283; magical-religious cures, 4:200; pi'ai, 4:443; pow-wow doctors, 4:244; shaman, 4:338; witch doctors, 4:227
 Heart, 1:300
 Hebrew traditional tale, 1:181–200
 "The Hedgehog and the Rat," 1:35–36
 Hedgehogs, 3:86
 "Hello, house!": Cave Call," 4:367
 Helpers: Anansi, 4:429; animal, 2:359, 3:59, 3:185, 3:261, 4:98–101, 4:102, 4:309; dead men, 2:268, 2:436; girls, 3:125, 3:152, 3:171, 3:435–36, 4:248, 4:435–36; name, 3:120; nuns as, 3:253; ogres, 3:130; spirits in animal guise, 4:327; witches, 3:130
 "Help from Elijah," 1:240
 "The Helpful Horse," 1:45, 3:351
 Hen-sparrow, 2:281–88
 Hercules, 3:231
 Herders, 2:36–58
 Hermit crabs, 2:334
 "Hero Comes into Ogre's Power," 4:436
 Heroes: Bantugan, 2:398–99; cross-cultural motifs, 2:383; Cuchulain, 3:39; dragon-slayer tale type, 3:253; external transformation, 2:107; girl helpers, 3:125, 3:152, 3:171, 4:248, 4:435–36; identity and transformation, 3:139; promised to supernatural figures, 3:125; Raja Rasalu, 2:268; rescue of princess, 2:100; Roldan, 3:339; winning bride, 2:195. See also Culture hero
 "Hero is Driven from Home by His Stepmother," 1:45
 "The Hero Twins," 4:105–10
 Heym, Paul, 4:248
 Hierarchy of powers, 4:374
 Hiiaka, 1:361
 Hina, 1:380
 Hindu influence, 2:342–43
 Hinduism, 2:142
 Hindu theology, 2:133
 Historical accounts, 4:258; Elfego Baca, 4:275; folk history, 4:400; "Victorio's Raid," 4:272–75
 Historical events, 3:292, 4:400
 Historical figures, 1:10; Efik tales, 1:87; Ildris I, 1:16; Omar ibn el Khattâb, 1:213
 Historical narrative, 2:64
 Historical past, 2:16, 3:3
 History: oral transmission, 4:159; sacred, 4:393; shamans and band enmity, 2:51; warring factions, 2:142

Cumulative Index

1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania
2: Asia
3: Europe
4: North and South America

- "History of a Buffalo Hunter," 4:264–67
 "The History of Tom Thumb," 3:21–28
 Hobley, C. W., 1:31
 Hodgetts, Edith M. S., 3:194
 "Holding Down the Hat," 3:194
 "Holding up the Rock," 4:367
 Holy Land. See Palestine
 Holy man, 1:313, 2:203, 4:443
 Honor, 2:70
 Hoodoo, 4:172, 4:200, 4:203–5, 4:258
 Hopi, 4:83–88
 Horokaruru, 2:13
 "On Horseback," 4:214–15
 "The House Carpenter," 1:85, 4:194
 "How a Fox Fell Vicim to His Own Deceit," 2:126–28
 "How Ananse Tales Got Their Name," 1:61–62, 4:405
 "How a Small Kamak Was Transformed into a Harpoon Line," 2:105–7
 "How Brer Fox Dream He Eat Possum," 4:165, 4:409
 "How Brer Rabbit Brings Dust Out of the Rock," 4:187–89
 "How Brer Rabbit Practice Medicine," 4:168–70, 4:209
 "How Brothers and Sisters Came to Quarrel," 1:106–8
 "How Come Brer Bear Sleeps in the Winter," 4:161–62
 "How Come Mr. Buzzard to Have a Bald Head," 1:61, 4:163–64, 4:405
 "How Come Pigs Can See the Wind," 4:186–87
 "How Jáburu Ate the Seed of Our Kin," 3:353–54
 "How Man Made Woman Respect Him," 4:324–25
 "How Pain, Misery, and Death Came into the World," 4:448, 4:453–54
 "How Rabbi Joshua Went to Paradise Alive," 3:142–43
 "How Shango Hanged Himself and What Resulted," 1:124–26
 "How Sibû Killed Sórkura," 4:354–56
 "How Some Wild Animals Became Tame Ones," 3:313–16
 "How the Deer Obtained His Horns," 4:45–47
 "How the Devil Married Three Sisters," 3:280–82
 "How the Elves Punished a Quarrelsome Man," 4:387–89
 "How the Elves Put a Holy Father and His Sacristan to Flight," 4:391–92
 "How the First Bribri Indians Were Born," 4:351–52
 "How the Man Fooled the Tiger," 4:454–55
 "How the Raja's Son Won the Princess Labam," 2:195–202
 "How Theseus Slew the Devourers of Men," 1:120, 3:231–44, 3:253
 "How the Stalos Were Tricked," 3:316–21, 3:324
 "How the Twins Killed the Giant Elk," 4:84–85
 "How the Twins Visited the Sun," 4:83–84
 "How the Whites Became Rich," 4:54–56
 "How the Wicked Tankuki Was Punished," 2:94–96
 "How Thunder Came for the First Time," 1:126–28
 "How Tiyo Punished Man-Eagle," 4:85–88
 "How to Choose a Wife," 1:47–48
 "How Turtle Deceived Leopard into Eating His Own Mother," 1:74–75
 "How Turtle Inherited Leopard's Goods," 1:71–72
 "How Turtle's Greed Brought Him to a Sad End," 1:75–77
 "How We Beat the Caribs," 4:450–51
 Hufford, David, 4:199
 Human beings: animal disguise, 1:57; animal metamorphosis, 4:447; animal tricksters, 1:75; bears, 4:89; birth of first, 2:62; children by gods, 3:231; children of animals, 4:376; fire acquisition, 1:297; hunting of heads, 2:309; immortals and, 4:43; instruction by culture hero, 4:304; kinship to bears, 4:40; linkage to gods, 1:417; non-human boundary, 4:89; opposed by animal world, 3:352; origin, 2:40, 2:261, 3:351; pacts with superhuman, 3:357; spirits of deceased, 1:67; tricksters, 3:316
 Human flesh, 2:83, 2:105
 Humanity, 1:396, 4:353
 Human persistence, 1:108
 Human relationships, 4:25
 Humor, 1:218, 3:36
 Hunchbacks, 1:223
 Hungary, 3:96–138
 Hunger, 2:128
 Hunters, 4:57; animals granting success, 4:40; kindness repayment, 4:330; relationship with wolf, 4:33; white deer legend, 4:228
 Hunting, 2:262; animal competitors, 1:64; buffalo, 4:264; luck, 4:232; tall tale, 4:240
 Hunting and gathering: Ainu, 2:3; Australian Aborigines, 1:297; dog use, 4:50; life-way information, 1:313; Warrau, 4:50
 Husbands: animal, 2:362, 3:86; animal wife motif, 2:320; cruel, 4:448; foolish misunderstanding, 4:411; gender differences, 4:423; respect for, 4:324; saving life of, 2:133; supernatural abduction, 2:24; treacherous, 4:450
 Huts of witches, 3:212
 Hutton, H., 2:263
 Hyena, 1:108
 Ianu, 2:14
 Iberian Peninsula, 1:14
 Iceland, 3:292–312

- Identity: Basque, 3:339; devil, 4:389; heroes transformation, 3:139
- Idris ibn 'Abd Allah ibn Hassan II, 1:16
- Idrisid Dynasty, 1:16
- "Ifa," 1:129–30
- Ile Ife, 1:124
- Illanun, 2:307
- Ill omens, 4:354–55
- Immigrants: detached souls
functions, 3:144; Irish, 3:49;
tradition preservation, 1:251
- Impiety: afterlife punishment, 2:83;
all-encompassing destruction,
3:61; consequences of, 2:311
- Inca, 4:299, 4:301, 4:304, 4:315–23
- Incantations, 4:41–42
- Incarnations, 2:156
- India, 2:133–260; Nagaland,
2:261–67
- Indian Ocean, 1:56–57
- Indigenous categories, 1:87
- Indirect direction, 4:170, 4:212;
rhetorical device, 4:170
- Indo-European folktales, 1:43,
1:169, 2:167
- Indonesia, 2:338–82; Madagascar,
1:33
- Inference strategy, 2:301
- Infidelity, 2:110
- Initiation ceremony, 1:313, 1:322
- In-laws, 2:186–91
- Innocence, 3:285
- Innocent parties, 2:336, 2:430
- Integrity: gratitude repayment,
3:113; husband demonstration,
2:320; reward for, 2:191
- Intelligence, 1:253, 4:188, 4:417
- Intentional fictions, 1:33
- International distribution: hero winning bride, 2:195; legend motifs, 2:268; sham wise man,
2:247
- "In the Beginning," 2:28–30,
3:293–96
- Inuit, 4:70
- Ireland, 3:39–53
- Iroquois bird, 1:126
- Iroquois League, 4:89–101
- Irving, Washington, 4:247
- Ishhak, 1:42
- Islam, 2:307; Bedouin culture,
1:179; Hausa people, 1:98; Indonesia, 2:342–43; Morocco, 1:12;
political structures, 1:45; power structure, 1:5; scholarship,
3:390; Somalia, 1:42
- Islamic folktales, 1:42; Nasrudin,
1:7; Palestinian, 1:213–37
- Islamic influence: Borneo, 2:307;
Mindanao, 2:398–99; Philippines, 2:419; Spain, 3:385; Swa-
hili people, 1:49
- Islamic scholars, 1:216
- Islands, 2:156
- Isleta Pueblo, 4:102–11
- "The Isolated Island," 2:66–69
- Israel, 1:181–200
- Italy, 3:261–82
- "Ivanoushka the Simpleton,"
3:201–11
- Izanagi, 2:62
- Jack, 4:232
- Jackal, 1:58, 1:144, 1:149, 2:152,
2:267, 2:301
- "The Jackal as Schoolmaster,"
3:285
- "Jack and His Golden Snuff-box,"
3:163–70
- "Jack and the Bean-pole," 4:16,
4:189–91
- "Jack and the Beanstalk," 3:12,
4:189
- "Jack and the Devil Errant,"
4:435–39
- "Jack and the Fire Dragaman,"
4:16, 4:236–40
- "Jack My Hedge Hog," 3:85–89,
3:275
- "Jack-O'-My-Lantern," 4:205–8
- "Jack's Hunting Trip," 4:240–43
- Jack (slave), 4:183–84
- Jack tales, 4:188, 4:229
- "Jack the Giant-killer," 3:3–12
- Jade Emperor, 2:30
- Jaguar, 4:376, 4:446–47, 4:455
- "Jake Strauss," 4:251–52
- Jamaica, 4:405, 4:423–40
- "James Harris," 1:85, 4:194
- Japan, 2:3, 2:59–104
- "Jauw's Dream," 4:327–29
- Java, 2:342–43
- Jean Sot, 4:215, 4:218
- "Jean Sot and the Cowhide,"
4:215–17
- "Jean Sot Feeds Cows Needles,"
4:217–18
- "Jean Sot Kills the Duck," 4:218–19
- Jellyfish, 2:80–83
- Jenks, Albert Ernest, 4:136–37
- Jewish folktales: Ashkenazim,
3:141–48; Sephardim, 3:379–84
- Jewish quarter, 1:16
- Jews, 1:14, 1:45, 1:223, 1:238
- Jicarilla Apache, 4:25–32
- "Jikininki," 2:83–86
- Jinn, 1:24, 1:220, 1:268
- "The Jinns," 1:24–25
- John and Master cycle, 4:183
- Johnson, Robert, 4:186
- "John the Bear," 4:376
- John the Fool, 4:215
- "John Tiger," 4:376–79
- Jokes: pretentiousness, 4:391;
regional stereotypes, 4:220–21;
romantic rivals, 4:174; stock
character, 4:220; trickster,
3:148, 4:219
- Journeys to underworld, 2:62,
4:380, 4:443
- Juan Puson, 2:427
- "Juan Pusong," 2:430–35
- "Juan the Fool," 2:427–28
- Judaism, 1:179
- "The Judge Appropriates the Object of Dispute," 2:195, 3:325
- Judges, 2:152–56, 4:330
- "Judgments of Karakash," 1:218–20
- Justice: bone searching out, 4:412–
13; explanatory plots, 4:409;
murder victim, 2:181; outwitting
of, 2:133; poetic, 4:191; raven as agent of, 4:145; secret societies,
1:83; traditional peoples, 4:19;
trickster success, 4:168; when bewitched, 4:255
- Kabbala, 1:238
- "Kadiwonkuru: A Legend of the Yaurokya," 1:319–21
- Kaingag. See Caingang
- Kalahari Desert, 1:137

Cumulative Index

- |                                                    |
|----------------------------------------------------|
| 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania |
| 2: Asia                                            |
| 3: Europe                                          |
| 4: North and South America                         |
- Kamak, 2:105
 “Kampuaa Legends: Legends of the Hog God,” 1:380–93
 “Kampuaa on Oahu and Kauai,” 1:385–89
 “Kanati and Selu: The Origin of Corn and Game,” 4:33–39, 4:45
 “Kantjil the Mouse Deer,” 2:364–67
 “Karamunagau,” 1:339–41
 “Kara Mustapha the Hero,” 1:287–91
 Karna, 2:142
 Kashgar, 1:223
 Kauravas, 2:142
 Kenharingan, 2:307
 Kenya, 1:49
 “The Kind and the Unkind Girls,” 1:121, 2:315, 3:18, 3:90, 4:434
 Kindness sibling motif, 2:313, 2:315
 Kind/unkind, 1:121, 3:18, 3:90, 4:434
 King, 2:184–85; animal speech, 3:109; billy goats, 3:109; curing of, 3:390; pig, 3:274–80; of snakes, 3:253; swab maiden, 3:185–89
 “The King and the Four Girls,” 2:250–57
 “The King and the Ju Ju Tree,” 1:92–95
 Kingfisher, 4:30
 “King of the Snakes,” 3:253
 “King Pig,” 3:274–80
 Kings, 2:152, 2:295
 “King Thunderbeard,” 3:266
 “The King Who Learned the Speech of Animals,” 2:301–3, 3:109
 Kinship: Bantugan, 2:399; bears to humans, 4:40; bond violation, 1:35–36; female lineage, 4:3–4; in-law roles, 1:322; legends, 2:67; maternal uncles, 1:345
 Kintyèli, 4:124
 Kiribati, 1:353–57
 “The Knights of the Fish,” 3:385–90
 “Kolbein’s Killing,” 3:307–9
 “Komatari, the First Medicine Man,” 4:338–41
 Kôn, 1:67
 Konehu cycle, 4:343
 Koryak, 2:105–12
 Kroeber, A. L., 4:54
 Kshatriyas, 2:152
 Kurdistan, 1:201
 Kurds, 1:201–13
 Kusanagi-no-Tsurgi (sword), 2:59
 Kuyimokuna, 1:300–301

 Labeled pointing attacks, 1:300
 “La Belle aux Cheveux d’Or,” 1:242
 “The Lad Who Knew Everything,” 3:109–13
 “Lady Featherflight,” 3:12–18
 Lake Titicaca, 4:301
 Lakota, 4:112–20
 Làloména, 1:36
 “Lame Habiyo,” 1:45
 Land of dead. See Underworld
 “Langaon,” 2:323–28
 Language of animals, 2:295, 2:301, 3:109
 Lapin, 4:209, 4:212, 4:214
 Lapin and Bouqui cycle, 4:209
 Lapland, 3:321–24
 “Lata and Sinota,” 1:331–32
 Law, 2:133, 4:19
 Lebanon, 1:213
 Legal system, 1:218
 “The Legend of Maui,” 1:398–416
 “The Legend of Savaddan Lake,” 3:61–63
 “Legend of the Breadfruit Tree,” 1:368–72
 Legends, 1:313, 4:301; animal world, 4:448; Arabic origin, 1:12; Arawak-Carib enmity, 4:450; Baca, Elfego, 4:275; boy initiation, 1:313, 1:322; classification, 2:16; colonial enmity, 2:367; common functions, 3:28; duende behavior, 4:391; environmental features, 1:393; Faust, 3:160; functions of, 2:66–67; ghost, 4:247–48; hag belief, 4:199; haunting, 4:251; human-supernatural intersection, 3:357; Jewish Middle Easterners, 1:238; Kurdish tradition, 1:201; local, 4:252; lost islands, 2:66; lost treasure and gold mines, 4:268; narrative of origin, 4:13; night hag cycle, 4:225; northwest native people crests, 4:79; origin narrative, 4:13; prophet in, 4:297; Raja Rasalu in, 2:268; regional rivalries, 2:367; resistance to foreign forces, 3:339; selling soul to devil, 4:186; spirits of deceased, 1:67; supernatural, 1:24, 1:310, 2:16, 2:70, 2:74, 2:86, 3:357, 4:387; survival, 3:147; sword, 2:64; tale classification, 1:87; tale time, 4:89; tragic lovers, 3:178; trickster, 1:241; unseen animal helpers, 4:98–101; Victorio raid, 4:273; witchcraft and curing, 4:281; witch practices, 4:227
 Le Jumel de Barneville, Marie-Catherine, 3:364
 Leopard, 1:70–77, 1:144
 “The Leopard in the Maize Farm,” 1:78–79
 Liars, 4:285, 4:291
 Lies, 4:291
 Life: gambling for, 2:268; saving of husband’s, 2:133; seed origins of, 4:353; water of, 1:242
 “Ligat Liou,” 2:313, 2:315–18
 Lineage: clan, 4:3–4, 4:79, 4:140; family divine, 2:59; female, 4:3–4; hereditary, 4:79; Luo myth, 1:29; Somalia, 1:42
 Lines of descent, 1:345
 Linguistic relationships, 1:30–31
 Linking devices, 1:228
 “The Lion and the Jackal,” 1:144–46, 3:285, 4:343
 “The Lion and the Unicorn,” 1:287, 4:232–36
 Lions, 4:232–36
 “Little-Bird-Man and Raven-Man,” 2:107–10
 “Little Brother and Little Sister,” 1:260

- “The Little Hunchback,” 1:223–28
 Little John, 4:219
 “Little One Left Alive (Che-Che-Puy-Ew-Tis),” 4:57–62
 “The Little Red Ox,” 3:58
 Living and dead, 2:86
 Lizard, 1:319, 1:353
 “The Lizard Husband,” 2:361–64
 Localization: Cinderella variant, 4:382; folktale variant, 4:189; foreign tales, 1:176; legend acceptance, 3:160; märchen plot, 4:236; supernatural legends, 2:86
 Local legends, 4:252
 Lockheart, Sol, 4:200
 Lodges, 4:112
 Loki, 3:298–99
 “The Long-Legs,” 4:374–75
 Longley, Bill, 4:258
 Los Hermanos Penitente, 4:279
 Loss of innocence, 1:196
 Lost children, 4:89
 Lost islands, 2:66
 Lost love, 1:282
 Lost siblings, 2:359
 Lost treasure, 4:268
 Louisiana, 4:209
 Love: quest for women, 1:420; separation and true, 2:100; suitor sensibility and, 3:373
 Lovers, 3:178, 4:118–20
 Luck, 4:229, 4:232, 4:425
 “Lucky Jack,” 4:229–32
 “The Lucky Shot,” 4:240
 Luguna Pueblo, 4:106
 Luhya, 1:29–32
 Lummis, Charles, 4:106
 Luxman, 2:159–67

 Macaw, 4:358–64
 Madagascar, 1:33–41
 “Made Over to the Devil,” 3:170–73
 “Mafua,” 1:428–30
 Magic, 2:383; contagious, 3:216; creator gods, 1:431; healer cures, 4:200; Kabbala, 1:238; Sami people, 3:321–24; saving from wild, 2:262; of song, 4:431; sympathetic, 4:227
 Magical devices: fiddles, 1:147; singing, 1:158; swords, 3:96; tricksters, 1:78
 Magical objects, 2:268; acquisition, 2:116; hero use, 2:195
 Magical powers: restoration, 1:43; resuscitation, 3:385; transformations, 1:310
 “The Magic Fiddle,” 2:181–84
 Magicians, 3:21
 “The Magic Object is Stolen from the Hero but He Forces Its Return,” 2:176
 Magic-religious practice, 4:283
 Magic remedies, 3:390
 “The Magic Ring,” 2:176, 3:104
 Magpie Man, 2:110–12
 Magyars, 3:96
The Mahabharata (scripture), 2:133, 2:142
 Maidens, 3:216, 4:76, 4:136–37
 Majapahit Empire, 2:342
 “Making a Rope of Sand,” 2:319, 3:28
 Makunaima, 4:456
 Malabasy culture, 1:33
 Malaysia, 2:383–86
 Male creator, 4:332
 Malevolent beings, 1:310, 1:319
 Malice, 3:81
 Malicious spirits, 1:24
 Malignant spirit, 1:333
 Manabozho, 4:124
 “Manco Capac,” 4:301–2, 4:302
 “A Man Deceives a Women,” 2:185, 2:203–21, 3:275
 Mandra-mankana, 1:301
 “Mandra-Mankana, Also Called Bakuta-Terkana-Tarana or Kantayulkana,” 1:301–3
 Man-eagle, 4:85–88
 Man-eater, 3:231, 4:16–18
 Manhood initiation, 1:313, 1:322
 “The Man in the Moon,” 2:13, 2:14–15
 “Manoli,” 3:178–81
 “The Man Persecuted Because of His Beautiful Wife,” 1:265
 Mantis, 1:154
 “The Mantis Assumes the Form of a Hartebeest,” 1:137, 1:154–57

 “The Man Who Flew Like a Bird and Swam Like a Fish,” 3:139
 “A Man with a Wife Who Could Change Herself into a Wild Animal,” 1:119–20
 “Many Wise Fools,” 2:185, 2:203, 2:221–33, 3:275
 Maori, 1:396
 Märchen, 4:236, 4:415
 Marginality, 4:4, 4:33–34, 4:102
 Maritine trade, 1:56–57
 Maroons, 4:324–31, 4:343
 Marriage: to animals, 1:57; Bluebeard plot, 3:360; conclusion merger, 2:419; devil, 3:280; Efik customs, 1:82–83; father/son to mother/daughter, 2:191–95; female deity, 2:30; magical restoration, 1:43; strife, 1:5; trickster, 4:75–76
 Mason County War, 4:258
 Masquerade figure, 1:83
 Massachusetts, 1:176
 Matthews, Washington, 4:124
 Maui, 1:398
 Maxims, 4:425
 Maya, 4:357–66, 4:397
 “The Maya Creation,” 4:357–58
 Medicine: knowledge, 4:85–86; pow-wowing, 4:248
 Mediterranean Europe, 3:229–82
 Melanesia, 1:329–49
 Men, 1:158, 2:92
 “The Merchant of Venice,” 1:52
 Merchants: tale telling, 1:52
 Merlin, 3:21
 Metamorphosis: animal/human/animal, 4:447
 “Meteor Hell! Cicero Done It,” 4:285–90
 Mexico, 4:349–401, 4:367–92
 Mice, 2:128–30
 Micronesia, 1:351–57
 Middle East, 1:49, 1:167–293, 1:223, 1:251
 Migration: Carib, 4:453; Navajo to Southwest, 4:124; ocean, 1:396; Pipil oral history, 4:397; Plains natives, 4:112
 Military epics, 2:74
 “The Miller at the Professor’s Examination,” 3:35–38

Cumulative Index

- |                                                    |
|----------------------------------------------------|
| 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania |
| 2: Asia                                            |
| 3: Europe                                          |
| 4: North and South America                         |
- Mina, 1:297
Mindanao, 2:398–99
Minotaur, 3:231
Miracle worker, 1:240
“A Miraculous Sword,” 2:59, 2:64–66
“Miti’ and Magpie Man,” 2:110–12
Mizrahim, 1:238
Modernization of folktales, 4:189
Moldavia, 3:178
Mole, 4:86
Money, 3:54
Monkey, 2:267, 2:428–30, 4:405
“The Monkey and the Jackal,” 2:267
“The Monkey and the Jellyfish,” 2:80–83
“The Monkey and the Tortoise,” 2:415–19
“The Monkey’s Fiddle,” 1:147–48
“Monkey Who Left His Heart at Home,” 2:80
Monks, 2:184–85
Monsters, 1:282; cleansing environment of, 1:324, 4:124; garuda, 2:359; griffin, 3:185; man-eagle, 4:85; slaying of, 4:34; stupid, 3:316–17, 3:351; trickster skills over, 4:53; twins cleansing from, 4:84, 4:148; wit over, 1:282
Monster-slayer: tricksters, 4:16–17; twins, 4:84, 4:148; youthful, 1:120
Moon, 2:97, 4:385
Mooney, James, 4:47
Moon gods, 4:359
Moralistic tales, 4:380
Morality: comic misunderstanding, 1:223; Pueblo view, 4:110
Moral lessons, 2:203
Morals: code synthesis, 2:343; fable personifications, 2:436; fables, 1:112; goals, 2:396; origin explanations, 1:306; precepts, 1:33, 1:116
“More Cunning than Father,” 4:425–28
Morocco, 1:12–25
“The Mosquito’s Village,” 2:313–14
Mother, 1:106, 1:158; boasting, 3:120; eating of fruit, 3:253; marriage, 2:191–95. See also Stepmother
“Mother Goose,” 3:360
“Mother Holle,” 3:89–92, 4:253
Mothers-in-law, 1:322
Motif, 2:359; animal gratitude, 2:176, 2:268, 2:277, 2:429, 2:436, 3:113, 3:364, 4:329–30; black ship sails, 3:253; cleansing of world, 1:324, 3:231, 4:84, 4:124, 4:148, 4:359; combinations, 4:385; concealing murder, 4:343; creation myth, 2:62; cross-cultural, 1:45; cruel stepmother, 1:119, 1:260, 2:167, 3:18; “Dead Man as Helper,” 2:436; defiance by young women, 4:76; devil’s questions test, 4:194; disguise and trickery, 1:57; disguised deities, 4:315; divided villages, 4:148; eating fruit, 3:253; “Enmity of Fowl and Cockroach,” 4:430; exchanges, 4:121–22; “Exposure in a Boat,” 2:383; expulsion by stepmother, 1:45; fire making, 4:13; folly turned to fortune, 4:215; forgotten fiancée, 3:12; ghost obligation fulfillment, 2:86; “The Girl as Helper in the Hero’s Flight,” 3:12, 3:125, 3:152, 3:171, 4:248, 4:435–36; human/animal spouse transformation, 2:320; Indo-European central, 2:167; legend international, 2:268; lost islands, 2:66; magic power of song, 4:431; magic sword, 3:96; obstacle flight, 2:62, 2:298, 4:118, 4:194, 4:385; ocean migration, 4:13; rescue from supernatural abduction, 2:24; tale classification, 1:87; theft of food, 4:409; tragic event signs, 4:448; transformation into stones, 4:319; treacherous husband, 4:450; trickster cousins, 3:49; trickster shape-shifting, 4:170; twin, 1:347, 4:456; two siblings, 2:313; underworld symbolism, 3:152; unnatural suitor, 1:85; weak animal deceives larger, 2:121; “What Is in the Dish: Poor Crab,” 4:184; witch, 3:216; younger brothers, 2:245
Motivations: Anansi, 4:429; stupidity, 4:218; tricksters, 2:329, 4:175, 4:214
Mountain lion, 4:31
“Mountain of the Bell,” 1:179–80
Mountain spirits, 4:247
Mount Yoshino, 2:70
Mouse, 2:128
Mouse deer, 2:328–37, 2:364–67
“The Mouse Deer and Crocodile,” 2:366–67
“The Mouse Deer and the Bear,” 2:333
“The Mouse Deer and the Crocodile,” 2:335–36
“The Mouse Deer and the Giant,” 2:328–32
“The Mouse Deer and the Hermit Crab,” 2:334–35
“The Mouse Deer and the Tiger,” 2:332–33, 2:364–65
“The Mouse Deer in a Hole,” 2:336–37
“The Mouse Deer, Tiger, and Ape,” 2:365–66
Mozambique: Swahili people, 1:49
“Mr. Deer’s My Riding Horse,” 4:173–75, 4:214
“Mr. Hard Time,” 4:411–12
Much Ado About Nothing (Shakespeare), 3:34
Mules, 4:212–14
Mullah, 1:42
Mullah Nasrudin, 1:6–9
Münchhausen, Karl Friedrich Hieronymus von, 4:291
Munsumundok, 2:307
Mura-mura, 1:300, 1:301, 1:319
“The Mura-Mura Darana,” 1:308–9
Murder: avengers and justice, 4:19; bone accusation, 4:412–13; curse for, 3:304; justice, 2:181; trickster concealment, 4:343

- Musician: unclean occupation, 2:181
 Muslim prohibitions, 1:12
 Muslims, 1:241
 Myanmar, 2:261
 "My Son Ali," 1:176–78
 "The Mysterious Deer," 4:228–29
 Mystical figures, 1:216
 Myth, 1:125, 1:158, 2:261, 4:297, 4:301; Ananse characteristics, 1:96; anthropomorphic culture hero, 1:300; birth from spittle, 4:364; cosmological, 1:396; creation, 2:307, 2:338, 4:124–29, 4:357; creators, 1:301; criteria, 3:3; deity-herdsman marriage, 2:30; deluge, 4:306; divided vil-lages, 4:148; divination systems, 1:129; earliest times, 2:388, 2:396; environmental features, 1:393; events time making, 1:324; evil spirits, 2:105; fire acquisition, 1:297, 4:64; folktale distinction, 4:89; Haggada and biblical, 1:196; hunting rituals, 4:40; impiety, 2:311; infidelity and spousal revenge, 2:110; jour-ney to underworld, 1:372; line-age, 1:417; lodge rites, 4:112; Luo, 1:29; Native American, 4:67; northwest native people, 4:79; omen origins, 4:354–55; origin, 1:29, 1:137, 1:353, 2:28, 2:40, 4:3, 4:13, 4:25, 4:73, 4:302, 4:341, 4:351; plant life, 4:353; power of holy men/ healers, 4:443; prayer wand, 2:14; rabbit-big man-eater, 4:18; ritual preparation for, 4:33; ruler genealogy, 1:372; sacred history, 4:393; sacred plants, 4:397; searching for sun, 4:76; self-brought-up-man, 2:13; shaman rituals, 4:338; spirit origin, 1:335, 1:339; subsistence staples, 1:161; sword, 2:59, 2:64; tale classification, 1:87, 4:423; tattoo origins, 1:425; trickster, 1:303, 2:107, 4:45–47; turtle messen-gers, 2:80; twin culture heroes, 4:106, 4:359, 4:456; volcanic activity, 1:361; world view, 3:352
 Mythical creatures, 3:185, 4:387
 Mythology, 1:380; cosmological, 1:396; dividing and ordering process, 2:309; genealogy, 1:353, 1:417; Greek, 1:120, 3:231, 3:245; Hindu, 2:133–44; Norse, 3:292, 3:298–99; Polynesian, 1:417; Yoruba, 1:124. See also Creation myth; Origin myths
 Na Areean, 1:353
 Naga, 2:261–67
 Nagas, 2:116
 Naiveté, 3:285
 "The Name of the Helper," 3:120
 Names of stock characters, 1:5
 Naming of species, 4:304
 Nancy, 4:405, 4:407, 4:429
 "Nancy and the Honey Tree," 1:61, 4:405–7
 "Nancy Fools His Wife," 1:61, 4:326, 4:407–8
 Narrative, 1:345, 2:80; allegorical class, 1:253; animal husband, 2:362; animal tale functions, 3:313; fairy tales as literary, 3:360; faithful servant, 2:159; frame tales, 2:184–85; god first person usage, 2:17; historical, 4:400; historical and shamanic, 2:51; infidelity and spousal revenge, 2:110; legends, 1:241; localization, 1:176; location, 2:13; origin, 4:25; origins, 4:13; personal experience, 3:141, 3:144, 3:339; plot amalga-mation, 1:242; question-and-answer pattern, 2:250; religious fiction, 1:223; sacred songs, 2:3; sacred sword, 2:64; spirits and shamans, 2:36; supernatural beings in, 1:268; traditional rites, 2:59; trickster role reversal, 2:97
 Narrator, 1:169, 4:285; first person, 2:13, 2:16
 Narwhal, 4:72
 Nasrudin, 1:6–7
 Natchez, 4:121–23
 Native Caribbeans, 4:441–51
 Native North America, 4:1–155
 Native North American influence, 4:327
 Native North Americans: hunting by Plains, 4:50; tame and wild brother narratives, 4:33–34; transvestites, 4:13; Two-Faces character, 4:53; Yoruba culture, 1:124
 Native North American traditions: bears in, 4:89; youthful monster-slayers, 1:120
 Natural forces, 1:124, 2:17
 Natural order adherence, 4:420
 Natural phenomenon, 1:369
 Nature spirits, 2:59
 Navajo, 4:124–29
 Negev, Israel, 1:179
 Netherlands, 2:367
 "Never Tell the Things of Taboo You Happen to See," 1:67–68
 Newell, William Wells, 4:206, 4:247
 New Zealand, 1:396–416
 Nezahualpilli, 4:400
 Nicholas, Francis C., 4:297
 Nigeria, 1:87
 Night hag, 4:199, 4:225
 "The Night Owl and His Bat Brothers-in-law," 4:341–42
Nights with Uncle Remus (Chandler), 4:186
 Nikitine, B., 1:201
 "The Nix of the Mill Pond," 3:92
 "The Nixy," 3:92–95
 Nkondi, 1:78
 Nobility: boyard, 3:182; clan divi-sion, 1:42; clans and crests, 4:79
 Nomadic peoples: Australian, 1:297; Bedoin, 1:179; Caingang, 4:306–8; Cheyenne, 4:54; Chuk-chee, 2:36; Crow, 4:67; Lakota, 4:112; San, 1:137; Warrau, 4:332
 Nonhuman-human boundary, 4:89
 Nonsense phrases, 1:291
 "Noqoilpi, the Gambler: A Navajo Myth," 4:124–29
 Nordic countries, 3:283–335
 Norse mythology, 3:292, 3:298–99
 North America, 4:1–294; ethnic borrowing, 4:174; non-native ethnic cultures, 4:157–221

Cumulative Index

- |                                                    |
|----------------------------------------------------|
| 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania |
| 2: Asia                                            |
| 3: Europe                                          |
| 4: North and South America                         |
- North Carolina, 4:163
 Northeastern Woodlands, 4:124
 Northern Africa, 1:1–25, 3:385; Sephardim, 1:14
 Northwest Coast native cultures, 4:79–82, 4:140
 Norway, 3:304, 3:321–24
 Novella, 1:43, 1:420
 Nubians, 1:5
 Nuhua, 4:393–401
 “Numskulls Unable to Count Their Own Number,” 2:288
 Numskull tale, 2:288–90; Aggies, 4:220; Boudreaux, 4:220; Jean Sot, 4:215, 4:217; Juan Puson, 2:427
 “Numskull Talks to Himself and Frightens Robbers Away,” 4:215
 Núnñē’hi, 4:43
 Nuns, 3:253

 Oath of secrecy, 2:320, 4:447
 Obligations and generational tension, 2:123
 Obstacle flight, 2:62, 2:298, 4:118, 4:194, 4:385
 Occult, 1:24, 4:172
 Occupations, 2:70, 2:181
 Oceania, 1:295–432, 1:331
 Ocean migration, 4:13
 ‘Off with the rat’s head,’ 1:106
 Og, 1:181
 “Ogre Carries Sham Dead Man,” 4:455
 Ogres, 3:317; cautionary tales, 2:262; folktale classification, 1:158; helper role, 3:130; hospitality to, 4:236; stupid, 3:350–51
 “The Ogre’s Tasks,” 4:436
 Ojibwa, 4:130–39
 “The Old Bride Chosen,” 4:436
 Old people, 2:388, 2:396
 Old stories, 4:422
 Old women, 4:199

 Omar ibn el Khattāb, 1:213
 Omens, 4:354–55
One Thousand and One Nights, 1:10, 1:220, 2:184, 2:419, 3:275
 “One Thousand Rubles,” 3:148
 Onondaga, 4:89
 Openings, 1:106, 1:274, 2:329, 2:338, 4:324, 4:327, 4:415
 Opportunism, 3:334
 Oral histories of families, 4:159
 Oral performance, 3:171
 Oral tradition: anxieties, 3:360; epic transmission, 2:74; formulaic composition, 1:106; Haggada creation narrative, 1:185; Hausa people, 1:98; lost islands, 2:66; Pipil migration, 4:397
 “The Order of the Hideous Masked Persons, and How They Met Their Fate,” 1:120–21
 Ordinary folktales, 4:253, 4:255, 4:367, 4:376, 4:385, 4:435–39; allegorical class, 1:253; blind learns secrets, 3:113; “The Cannibal Mother and Her Children,” 1:158; complexity and episodes, 2:383; contrasts and parallelism, 3:67; cross-cultural motif, 1:45; dwarf’s gift, 2:32; faithful servant, 2:159; “The Fish Lover,” 4:420; formulaic devices, 1:169; genre elements, 4:253; justice not done, 4:255; “The Kind and Unkind Girls,” 2:315; learning fear variant, 1:257; localization and modernization, 4:189; multiepisodic, 2:274; plot amalgamation, 1:242; plot inversion, 2:298; pre-Columbian/European blend, 4:309; prisoner freedom, 1:147; rescue from supernatural abduction, 2:24; social status elevation, 3:73; stolen magic objects and return, 2:176; threes in, 3:201; transformation in, 3:185; trickster perseverance, 1:251
 Origin: of human beings, 2:261; of predators, 2:311; of sacred objects, 1:308; of sacred plants, 4:397; of sea mammals, 4:74; of serpent figonas, 1:335, 1:339; of social practices, 1:303; of species characteristics, 1:303; of women, 4:423
 Origin myths: Birbri, 4:351; deluge, 4:306; foces, 2:28; Norse, 3:293–96; old people in, 2:388; raven as self-created one, 2:40; San, 1:137; Warrau, 4:341
 “Origin of Acoma,” 1:324, 4:3–12, 4:34, 4:102
 “Origin of Fire,” 4:27–28
 “Origin of Tattooing,” 1:428
 “Origin of the Adlet and the Whiteman,” 4:73–75
 “Origin of the Alabama Indians,” 4:13–16
 “Origin of the Apaches,” 4:25–27
 “The Origin of the Calabash Tree and the Tobacco Plant,” 4:397–98
 “Origin of the Ja-Luo,” 1:29–30
 “The Origin of the Narwhal,” 4:72–73
 “Origin of the Spider,” 1:108–11
 “The Origin of Woman,” 4:423–24
 “Origins,” 1:137–43
 Orphans, 2:262
 Otohime, 2:80
 Ottoman Empire, 1:238, 3:96
 Outcasts, 2:70
 Outlaw hero, 4:162
 “Outwitting the King,” 1:251–53, 1:253
 “The Owl,” 2:3, 2:13–14
 Owl god, 2:3
 Owls, 4:284, 4:341

 Pacts with devil, 4:186
 Padamelon, 1:303
 Pakistan, 2:268–90
 Palestine, 1:181; Islamic, 1:213–37; Jewish, 1:238–50
 Pandavas, 2:142
 P’an Ku, 2:28
 Papa, 1:369
 Papa-tu-a-nuku, 1:398
 Paradise, 2:338
 Parent defiance, 4:76
 Parodies, 1:218
 Parrot, 2:167
 “Paul Heym, the Wizard of Lebanon,” 4:248

- Peach Tree villages, 4:13
 Peasant trickster, 3:194
 Pele, 1:361
 "Pele and Kamapuaa," 1:309–93
 "Pele's Long Sleep," 1:361–68
 Pennsylvania German folktales, 4:244–57
 Performance: cumulative tale, 2:291; formulaic closing, 1:176; narration devices, 1:176; values of folk, 1:33
 Peris, 1:282
 Perrault, Charles, 3:360, 3:364
 Perseverance, 1:251, 3:77
 Persia, 1:220, 1:264, 3:379
 Persian origins, 1:5
 Personal experience narratives: battle legends, 3:339; buffalo hunting, 4:264; classification, 2:16; cultural traditions, 3:141; detached souls, 3:144; goblin apparitions, 4:206; religious, 4:200; root/two-headed doctors, 4:202–3; Southwest gun-fighters, 4:258; tall tales, 4:240; witch, 4:244
 Personality traits, 4:174
 Personal narratives, 4:159
 Personal protectors, 2:16
 Personification, 2:62, 2:436
 Peru, 4:299
 "Peter Ox," 3:285–88
 Philippines, 2:388–438
 "Phoebe Ward, Witch," 4:225–26
 Physical strength, 1:310
 Pia, 4:456
 Piai, 4:443
 Pigs, 1:347, 3:274–80, 4:186
 "The Pig with the Golden Bristles," 3:202
 Pipil, 4:397
 Plains native culture, 4:50, 4:112
 Plandok, 2:328–37, 2:364–67
 Plants, 1:319, 4:3, 4:397
 "Playing Godfather," 4:164–66, 4:409
 "Playing Mourner," 4:408–10
 "Playing the Godfather," 4:168
 Play-on-words, 2:263
 Plot: amalgamated, 1:242; animal tales, 1:57; benevolent naïveté, 3:285; biblical variant, 1:42, 1:181; bone leading to murderer, 4:412–13; boundary crossing, 4:194; "Cinderella" extension, 2:419; explanatory justice, 4:409; fable admonition, 1:121; frame tale resolution, 2:184–85; "Girl as Helper in the Hero's Flight," 4:435–36; granting wishes, 2:102; Indian frame tale conclusions, 2:233; ironic, 4:89; Jack tales, 4:229; looking for wife, 3:289; märchen, 4:236; numskull, 2:288; resemblance, 1:43; revenge justice, 4:19; shape-shifting spouses, 1:119; "The Singing Bone," 2:181; social justice for wife, 4:19; stolen magic ring, 2:176; true love and separation, 2:100; twist and revenge, 1:6; "Unjust Umpire Misappropriates Disputed Goods," 2:116; unnatural suitors, 1:85
 Poetry, 2:3
 Poland, 3:139–62
 Political systems, 1:45, 1:61; colonialism, 2:367
 Polygamy, 1:106
 Polynesia, 1:359–432
 Polynesian mythology, 1:417
 "Poor Little Maria," 2:419–24
Popol Vuh, 4:357
 Popular culture, 4:264; chapbooks, 3:3–4; tengu in, 2:92
 Porcupine, 4:89
 Porter, Ralph S., 2:399
 Portugal, 3:379
 Portuguese–West African trade, 1:116
 "Possessed of Two Spirits," 4:202–5
 Possum, 4:165
 "A Pound of Flesh," 1:52
 Power: dreams, 3:216; hierarchy of, 4:374; holy men/healers, 4:443; Islam structure, 1:5; magic song, 4:431; ogres, 4:436; shaman, 2:36, 2:51, 4:70; superficial appearance, 2:16; supernatural, 1:369, 2:36–58, 2:429, 4:40, 4:124; weak trickster, 2:121; witch social, 1:253; words variants, 4:405; word use, 4:405
 Powers: magical, 1:43, 1:310, 3:385; shaman, 4:70
 Pow-wow doctors, 4:244, 4:248
 Pow-wowing, 4:248
 Prayer wands, 2:14
 Preacher, 4:167
 Pre-Columbian culture: ball game, 4:364; Incas, 4:315
 Predators, 2:128, 2:311
 Presentation, 2:3
 Preservation of traditions, 1:251
 Pretension, 3:36, 4:391
 Preternatural beings, 1:55
 Prey, 2:128
 "The Priest and the Devil," 4:389–91
 Priests, 1:129, 1:341, 2:152, 4:389
 Primal chaos, 1:353
 Prince, 2:116–20, 2:184–85, 2:298; five weapons, 2:156; folly exposure, 2:221; monster guise, 1:282
 "Prince Fickle and Fair Helena," 3:77–80
 "The Prince's Elopement," 2:184–91, 3:275
 Princess, 4:209–12; criticism of suitors, 3:266; Labam, 2:195–202; rescue, 2:100; as reward, 3:390
 "The Princess on the Glass Mountain," 3:202
 "The Princess with Golden Hair," 1:241–50
 "Prince Unexpected," 3:152–60, 3:171
 Prisoner freedom, 1:147
 Prophetic dreams, 4:327
 Prophets, 4:297
 "The Prose Edda," 3:292–98
 Prosperity, 3:285
 Protagonists: female, 3:34, 4:255; maternal uncles, 1:345; wit over monsters, 1:282
 Protectors, 2:16, 4:43
 Protestant religions, 4:200
 Protest tales: racial discrimination, 4:185
 Proverb: diamond cut diamond, 2:255; kinship bonds, 1:36
 Pseudo-verification: tall tales, 4:285
 Psycho-physiological phenomenon: hag experience, 4:199

Cumulative Index

- 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania
2: Asia
3: Europe
4: North and South America
- Pueblo: Acoma, 4:3; influence, 4:25; Isleta, 4:102–11
“Punchkin,” 2:167–76
Punishment: in afterlife, 2:83;
agents of fall, 1:196; curiosity
and, 3:280; profane touch, 1:369
Punjab, 2:255, 2:268, 2:291–97
Puns, 4:179; orphan boy trickster,
2:263
Punt, 1:42
Purim, 3:379
“Puss in Boots,” 2:429
- “The Queen with a Hundred
Lovers,” 4:400
Quest: lost love, 1:282; lost siblings, 2:359; lover for beloved,
1:420; wife recovery, 2:320
“Quest for Lost Sister,” 1:274
Question-and-answer pattern,
2:152, 2:250
“Quetzalcoatl and Tezcatliopca,”
4:393–96
- Rabbi, 3:143, 3:381
“The Rabbi Extracts a Confession,”
1:240–41
“The Rabbi Kolonimos,” 1:238–39
Rabbit, 4:45, 4:63, 4:65, 4:367,
4:410, 4:414, 4:418; African American traditions, 4:415;
blame shifting, 4:165; Brer, 4:45,
4:166–89; Cajun folktales,
4:209; fox, 4:31; konehu, 4:343;
romantic rival humiliation,
4:173; tar baby, 4:121–23; trickster and Anansi, 1:61; trickster/culture hero, 4:16–17, 4:162. See
also Hare
“Rabbit and Big Man-Eater,”
4:17–18
“Rabbit and Coyote,” 4:367
“The Rabbit and the Python,”
1:116–17
“Rabbit Fools Alligator,” 4:65–66,
4:343
Rabbit foot amulet, 4:172
“Rabbit Gets a Turkey for Wildcat,” 4:63–64, 4:343
“Rabbit Kills Big Man-Eater,”
4:16–17
“Rabbit Rides Fox A-Courting,”
4:174
“Rabbit Steals Fire,” 4:64–65,
4:343
“Rabbit’s Triumph,” 1:152–54
“Race Won by Deception,” 2:334
Racial discrimination: protest tale,
4:185
Rain, 4:83
Rainbows, 1:333
Rain-bringing, 1:308, 4:102
Rainstorms, 1:333
“Raja Donan,” 2:383–86
“Raja Rasalu,” 2:268–76
“Rakian,” 2:320–23, 2:323
“Rama and Luxman,” 2:159–67
“Range Life in Texas,” 4:258–64
Rascals, 2:255
Rat, 4:409
“The Rat Princess and the Greedy
Man,” 2:264–65
“The Rattlesnake’s Vengeance,”
4:42–43
Raven, 2:40, 2:105, 4:75–76,
4:140–45, 4:145–47
Raven-Man, 2:107–10
“The Raven Mocker,” 4:47–49
“Raven’s Creation,” 2:39–43
“The Reason for Abstaining from Wine and Pork,” 1:12–14
Rebirth, 2:36, 4:112
Reconstruction period, 4:258
“Recovering the Sun,” 4:76–78
“The Red Calf,” 3:58–60
Reece, Harry, 4:291
Reef Islands, 1:331
Regional rivalries, 2:367
Religion: healer magic cures,
4:200; Hopi practices, 4:83;
Shinto, 2:59
Religious authorities, 1:24, 1:216,
3:28, 4:102
Religious beliefs, 4:297
Religious devotions, 3:143
Religious experiences, 4:200
Religious factions, 1:223
Religious instruction, 3:381
Religious societies, 4:279
Reptiles, 2:116
Rescue: by bridegroom, 1:420; from death, 2:176; from supernatural
abductions, 2:24
“Rescue by the Sister,” 3:280
Resistance legends, 3:339
Retribution, 1:43
“Return of a Cantonist,” 3:141–42
“Return of Siegfried,” 4:247–48
Revenge: creator role, 1:301; curse,
3:304; myth and spousal, 2:110;
plot twist, 1:6; social justice,
4:19; stepmother scheme, 3:261;
trickster, 2:415, 4:163; vampire
bats, 4:341; witches, 4:227
Rewards, 2:191, 2:315
Rhetorical devices, 2:281, 2:291,
4:170
Rhyme, 2:281, 2:291
“The Rich and the Poor Peasant,”
2:245
“Ricky of the Tuft,” 3:373–78
Rings, 2:176–81
“Rip Van Winkle” (Irving), 4:247
Rituals: calling game, 4:33; daily
affairs, 2:181; dance, 2:59; hunting success, 4:40; magic, 4:227;
preparation for hearing myth,
4:33; shaman healing, 4:338;
shamanic, 2:51; sun deity, 4:319;
warrior cultures, 4:95; warrior
preparation, 4:95
Ritual songs, 4:40, 4:42, 4:355
“The Robber Bridegroom,” 3:34–35
“Robbers Smuggled into House in Food Containers,” 2:424
Roberts, John, 3:163
Robertson, Steve, 4:285, 4:291
Robinson, Braziel, 4:203
“The Rogish Peasant,” 3:194–97
Roland, 3:339
“Roldan’s Bugle Horn,” 3:339–50
Roma, 3:130, 3:163–77
Roman Catholicism, 4:279
Romania, 3:178–93
“Roostam the Game-Cock,”
2:367–82

- Rooster feet, 4:389
 Root doctors, 4:203–5
 “Royal Rivals: The Pandavas and Kauravas,” 2:133, 2:141–53, 2:142
 Rulers, 1:372, 4:319
 “Rumpelstiltskin,” 3:120
 “Runaway Scrape,” 4:13
 Rural culture, 1:3
 Russia, 2:3, 3:141, 3:194–228
 “The Sack of Peas and the Mule,” 4:212–14
 Sacred formulas, 4:47
 Sacred history, 4:393
 Sacred objects: origins, 1:308; swords, 2:64; taboos, 1:369
 Sacred songs, 2:3, 2:16, 4:39
 Sacred texts, 1:185
 Sacrifice: community and self-, 1:238; of innocents, 2:336, 2:430
 Sailors, 1:345
 Saka, 2:268
 Sami (people), 3:313–35
 Samoa, 1:417–30
 Samurai class, 2:70
 “Samyekukuru and His Sister,” 2:17–19
 San (people), 1:137–57
 San Cristoval, 1:333, 1:335
 Santals, 2:181
 “The Saragossan Purim,” 3:379–80
 Satan, 4:186
 Savitri, 2:133–44
 “The Scabby Shaman,” 2:43–50
 Scheherazade, 1:220
 Scheltema, J. F., 2:367
 Science: magic remedies, 3:390
 Scotland, 3:54–60
 Scottish Irish, 4:229
 Scythians, 2:268
 Sea, 2:13
 Seafaring: dangers and rewards, 2:67
 Sea-lions, 4:124
 “Seal Island,” 2:15–17
 “The Search for the Lost Husband,” 3:256
 Seasons: arctic, 4:74; motifs interpretation, 3:152
 Sea spirits: Eskimo female, 4:74
 “The Secret Room,” 4:255–57
 Secrets: blind learning of, 3:113
 Secret societies: justice enforcement, 1:83
 Seeds, 4:353
 Self-brought up-man, 2:13
 Self-brought-up-Man, 2:16, 2:17
 Self-created one, 2:40
 Self-interest: trickster, 3:299
 Self-sacrifice: community, 1:238
 Self-serving characters: animal tales, 1:35
 Semang (people), 2:383
 Semidivine beings, 2:388
 Seneca tribe, 4:95–101
 Sephardim, 1:14, 1:16, 1:238, 3:379–84
 Serpents, 2:277
 Serpent, 1:196, 1:335, 1:339, 2:100; horned, 4:50; seven-headed, 3:253–56, 3:351
 Serpents, 4:309
 Servant: faithful, 2:159
 Servants, 1:5
 Settings: medieval, 1:45
 Settlements: Tlingit, 4:145
 “The Seven-headed Serpent,” 3:253–56
 “The Seven Wise Men of Buneyr,” 2:288–90
 Shahryar, 1:220
 Shakespeare, William, 1:52, 3:34
 Shaman, 4:338; curative powers, 4:70; divination, 2:113; power and rituals, 2:51; powers, 2:36, 2:43; sea spirit visitation, 4:74; shape-shifting, 3:321
 Shamanism, 2:113, 3:313, 4:338
 Shango, 1:124–29
 Shape-shifter: Anansi, 4:326; asuang, 2:429; Brer Rabbit, 4:170; daughter of underworld lord, 3:152; god-human offspring, 1:380; Japanese animal, 2:95; night hag, 4:225; nixies, 3:92; omens, 4:354–55; rabbit, 4:121; shaman divination, 2:113; Spider-Woman, 4:85–86; wife in animal guise, 1:265; wisemen-shaman, 3:321; Yurokons, 4:453
 Shape-shifting, 1:333; acts, 3:174; animal skin transformation, 3:212; animistic beliefs, 2:17; evil spirits, 2:105; pow-wow doctor, 4:248; spouses, 1:119; trickster, 4:407–8; trickster monster-slayer, 4:17; tricksters, 1:72, 1:154; witches, 4:284. See also Transformation
 “The Shepherd and the Daughter of the Sun,” 4:319–23
 Shinto, 2:59, 2:62
 Shiva, 2:191
 “A Short History, Purporting to Give the Origin of the Hausa Nation and the Story of Their Conversion to the Mohammedan Religion,” 1:98–105
 Siberia, 2:36–58, 2:105–12
 Siblings: abandonment and community, 4:72; beautiful/ugly twins, 3:373; kind/rude motif, 2:313, 2:315; quest for lost, 2:359; younger, 3:198, 4:137. See also Brothers; Sisters; Twins
 Signs of tragic events, 4:354, 4:448
 Sikes, W. Wirt, 4:206
 “The Silence Wager,” 1:5, 3:182
 “The Silver Plate and the Transparent Apple,” 3:198–201
 Simpletons, 3:198, 3:201
 Sinai Peninsula, 1:179
 Singing, 1:126, 1:158
 “The Singing Bone,” 1:106, 2:181, 3:185, 3:198, 4:412
 Sioux. See Lakota
 Sis Pig, 4:186
 “Sister of the Sun,” 3:324–34
 Sisters: marriage to devil, 3:280; unkind, 3:18, 3:90
 “Skáldskaparmál,” 3:292
 Skin: animal, 3:212; changing, 4:121, 4:225; having two, 1:87–92; metamorphosis, 4:447
 Skunk, 4:354–55
 Sky deity, 2:62
 Slavery, 4:186
 Slaves, 1:5, 1:61, 1:80; Bahamas, 4:414; maroons in Suriname, 4:324
 “The Slave’s Fortune,” 3:380–84

Cumulative Index

- |                                                    |
|----------------------------------------------------|
| 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania |
| 2: Asia                                            |
| 3: Europe                                          |
| 4: North and South America                         |
- “The Slaying of the Tanuki,” 2:97–100
 “Sleeping Beauty,” 3:73
 Smoking: rain-bringing, 4:102
 Snake, 1:324, 2:116, 2:123, 2:266, 4:42, 4:124, 4:330, 4:448
 “Snake and Hunter,” 4:329–31
 “The Snake Helper,” 4:309
 Snorri Strurluson, 3:292
 Snowbird, 4:75–76
 “Snow-White,” 3:261
 “Snow-White and Rose-Red,” 3:81–85
 Soane, E. B., 1:201
 Social class: caste divisions, 2:152; cautionary tale, 3:182; status legend, 2:70; wit not distinguishing, 1:253
 Social conditions: humor, 1:218; protest tale, 4:185
 Social hierarchy, 2:67, 2:152
 Social norms, 2:262
 Social order, 1:16, 3:28, 4:387
 Social organization, 1:179
 Social power, 1:253
 Social practices, 1:303
 Social relations: clans, 1:42; cumulative tale, 2:291; Jews and Muslims, 1:241; trickster motivations, 4:175
 Social status: animal language gift, 3:109; blind, 3:113; elevation, 3:73; marriage, 1:43
 Social truths, 1:33
 Society: customary law, 4:19; subsistence and stability, 4:79
 “Sol Lockheart’s Call,” 4:200–202
 Solomon Islands, 1:331–49
 Somalia, 1:42–58, 1:421; Swahili people, 1:49
 Somersaults, 3:174, 3:185
 “The Song of Roland,” 3:339
 “The Song of the Coffee Pot,” 1:253–56
 Songs: magic, 4:431; ritual, 4:40, 4:42, 4:355; sacred, 2:3, 2:16, 4:39; transformation power, 4:431; trickster use, 1:73
 “The Son of the Hunter,” 1:169
 Sons: father jealousy of, 4:426; of human and animal, 4:376; marriage, 2:191–95; winning princess, 2:195–202
 Sorcerers, 2:167
 Sórkura, 4:354
 Soul, 3:144, 4:186
 South America, 4:295–348
 South Asia influence: Indonesia, 2:359
 Southeast Asia, 2:305–438
 Southern Africa, 1:135–65
 Southern plains, 4:148
 Southern U.S., 4:164; Aggies and Cajuns, 4:220–21; cross-cultural borrowing, 4:209; fool motifs, 4:215; Southern tricksters, 4:45
 Southwestern U.S.: Aggies, 4:220
 Southwestern U.S. folktales, 4:258–94
 Southwestern U.S. native peoples, 4:124
 Spain, 3:385–98; conquest of Mexico, 4:367; duendes, 4:387; Jews, 3:381; Sephardim, 3:379
 Spanish influence, 2:419
 Sparrow, 1:291
 Spider, 1:87, 1:96, 4:324, 4:429; anthropomorphic trickster, 4:163; tricksters, 1:108; West African trickster, 1:61
 Spider-Woman, 2:40, 4:83, 4:85–86
 “The Spirit of a Buried Man,” 3:149–52
 “The Spirit of Defenders of Nikäi,” 4:43–45
 Spirits: animals possessing, 4:447; bush, 4:332, 4:338; daily affairs, 2:181; of dead, 1:67; double, 4:202; evil, 2:105; forest, 4:453; guardian animal, 4:98; haunting, 4:251; helpers in animal guise, 4:327; mountain, 4:247; mythic origin, 1:335; nature, 2:59; shaman powers, 2:36; water, 3:92; wish granting, 2:102
 Spiritual essence, 2:17
 Spirituality in warfare, 4:95
 Spouse: animal, 1:265, 2:362, 3:86, 4:255, 4:431; demonic, 3:280; extraordinary tasks, 4:137; infidelity and revenge myth, 2:110; shape-shifting, 1:119; transformation, 2:167, 2:320, 2:323. See also Husbands; Wife
 Sri Lanka, 2:298–303
 “Sry Nagasary,” 2:342–59
 Stalo, 3:316, 3:321
 Stars, 4:148–55, 4:456
 Steiner, Roland, 4:200
 Stepdaughter, 1:282
 Stepmother: cruel, 1:119, 1:260, 2:167, 3:18; revenge schemes, 3:261; wicked, 1:176, 2:122, 2:268; witch parallelism, 3:67
 “Stepmother Demands Bull’s Blood,” 1:45
 Stereotypes: Aggies and Cajuns, 4:220–21; foolishness, 4:220; regional jokes, 4:220–21
 Stock characters: Boudreaux, 4:220; gypsy, 3:130, 3:185; Jean Sot, 4:215; mutes, 4:220; names, 1:5; preacher, 4:167
 Stone, 4:112, 4:319
 “The Stone Boy,” 4:112–15
 “The Stonecutter,” 2:102–4
 “Stonger and Strongest,” 2:102
 “The Storm Fiend,” 1:274–82
 Storm god, 2:59
 “A Story About a Giant, and the Cause of Thunder,” 1:111–15
 “Story of a Tengu,” 2:92–94
 “The Story of Bantugan,” 2:398–415
 “De Story of de Man and Six Poached Eggs,” 4:439–40
 “The Story of Hok Lee and the Dwarfs,” 2:32–35
 “The Story of Ibonía,” 1:36
 “The Story of Juan and the Monkey,” 2:428–30
 “The Story of Lodge Boy, After-Birth Boy and Double-Face,” 4:34
 “Story of Lumbart and Wari,” 2:395–98
 “The Story of Mini-Nashi-Hoichi,” 2:74–80
 “The Story of Mr. Fox,” 3:34–35

- “Story of Savitri,” 2:133–41
 Story of Tangi-nui, 1:398
 “The Story of the Buffalo and the Lion,” 1:32
 “The Story of the Children and the Zimwi,” 1:55
 “Story of the Fin-back Crest,” 4:79–82
 “The Story of the Flesh of the Thigh,” 1:52–54
 “The Story of the Kite and the Mole,” 1:32
 “The Story of the Pretty Goldilocks,” 3:364–72
 “The Story of the Prince’s Friend,” 2:116–20, 2:121, 2:123
 “The Story of the Rat and the Cat,” 1:31–32
 “The Story of the Sun and the Moon,” 4:384–87
 “The Story of the Swan Maiden and the King,” 3:185–89
 “The Story of the Two Devils,” 2:113–16, 2:123
 “The Story of the Vizir Who Was Punished,” 1:228–37
 Strangers, 2:315
 Straparola, Giovanni Francesco, 3:274–75
 Strategy, 2:301, 4:162
 “Stronger and Strongest,” 2:265, 4:374
 “Student of Paradise,” 1:4
 Stupidity: Jean Sot, 4:218; monster, 3:316–17, 3:351; preternatural, 1:55; puns, 4:217. See also Fools
 “Stupid Stories Depending on a Pun,” 4:217
 Subsistence: Ainu, 2:3; Australian Aborigines, 1:297; Borneo, 2:307; labor division, 1:158; myth, 1:161; myths, 1:161; predictability, 4:79; Sami people, 3:313; tales recalling, 1:56
 Sudras, 2:152
 Sufism, 1:7, 1:216
 Suicide, 2:70
 “The Suitor,” 3:289–91
 Suitors: admirable shape shifting, 1:265; avenging slight, 3:266; courtship attempts, 3:289; curiosity about, 3:280; love and sensibility, 3:373; unnatural, 1:85
 Sun, 2:107, 4:76–78, 4:83, 4:385, 4:456
 “The Sun, the Frog, and the Firesticks,” 4:456–58
 Sun deity, 4:319; Vukub-Cakix, 4:359
 Sun goddess, 2:59
 “The Sun Goddess and the Storm God,” 2:59–62
 “Sunrise,” 2:359–61
 Sunshowers, 1:333
 Superficial appearance, 2:16
 Supernatural: assistance, 3:270; bridegroom, 1:420; creation myths, 2:338; flight, 4:389; two-headed doctors, 4:203
 Supernatural assault, 1:300; night hag, 4:199, 4:227; shaman powers, 4:70
 Supernatural beings, 2:388; Bagobo myths, 2:388; snakes, 4:42; workings of, 1:268
 Supernatural belief, 1:341
 Supernatural figures, 3:125
 Supernatural head of society, 1:83
 Supernatural legend: duendes role, 4:387; female jinn, 1:24; human-supernatural intersection, 3:357; manhood initiation ceremony, 1:313; military epic, 2:74; Self-brought-up-Man, 2:16; social class status, 2:70; validating devices, 2:86
 Supernaturally-caused affliction, 1:92
 Supernatural medicine, 1:87
 Supernatural power: acquired by cannibalism, 2:429; incantations, 4:40; Manabozho, 4:124; taboo objects, 1:369
 Supernatural presence, 2:3
 Superstitions, 4:252
 “The Surety,” 1:213–16
 Surfboard, 1:372
 Suriname, 4:324
 Suriname Maroon, 4:324–31
 “Suto and Tato,” 1:201–13
 Swahili, 1:49–58
 “The Swallow and the Tortoise,” 1:116, 1:118–19
 Swords: drawing of, 3:96; sacred Japanese, 2:59, 2:64; theft-murder curse, 3:304
 Symbolism: cockfighting, 2:367; seasonal and solar motifs, 3:152
 Sympathetic magic, 4:227
 Syria, 1:251–55
 Székeley, 3:104
 Ta’aroa, 1:431
 “The Table, the Ass, and the Stick,” 2:427, 4:191
 “Tablecloth, Donkey, and Club,” 4:191–93
 Taboo, 1:67, 1:369
 Taboo words, 4:425
 “Tach the Prophet,” 4:297–98
 Tagalog, 2:424
 Tahiti, 1:431–32
 “The Tail-fisher,” 4:410
 Taino (people), 4:443
 Tale: cumulative, 2:281; generational tension, 2:123; linking of series, 1:228; myth classification, 1:87, 4:423; numskull, 2:288; performance, 1:42
 “Tale of a Lantern,” 1:16–22, 1:45
 “The Tale of an Ogress,” 2:262–63
 “A Tale of a Snake,” 2:266
 “The Tale of Our Dying Away,” 3:352–53
The Tale of the Heike (military epic), 2:74
 “Tale of the Rabbit,” 4:367–73
 “Tales of Fox,” 4:29–32
 Tale type: “The Cat as Sham Holy Man,” 2:128; death sentence revocation, 1:147; domestic strife, 1:5; “Dragon-Slayer,” 3:253; “The Fox Persuades the Cock to Crow with Closed Eyes,” 2:128; “The Grateful Dead,” 3:139; hero winning bride, 2:195; Indo-European central, 2:167; “The Judge Appropriates the Object of Dispute,” 3:325; multiepisodic Turkish, 1:274; rabbit cycle, 4:367; “The Search for the Lost Husband,” 3:256; “The Singing Bone,” 4:412; “Theft of Butter (Honey)

Cumulative Index

- |                                                    |
|----------------------------------------------------|
| 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania |
| 2: Asia                                            |
| 3: Europe                                          |
| 4: North and South America                         |
- by Playing Godfather," 4:164; ungrateful animals, 2:277
- Tall tales, 4:240, 4:285, 4:291
- Tangaroa, 1:431
- Tanuki, 2:95–96, 2:97–100
- Tanzania, 1:49
- Taoism, 2:28
- "Taraematawa," 1:341–43
- Taranga, 1:398
- Tar baby, 1:78, 2:156, 4:121–23, 4:209–12, 4:367, 4:414
- "The Tar Baby," 4:121–23, 4:414
- "The Tarbaby and the Rabbit," 2:156, 4:367
- Tartaro, 3:350–51
- Tasks to win spouse, 2:195, 4:137
- "Tattoo," 1:425–30
- Technology: creation myth, 2:338; fire, 4:64; gift of Africa, 1:29
- Temptation, 1:36
- Tengu, 2:92–94
- Tensions, 2:123
- Territorial rights, 3:351
- Tests: bride, 1:47, 3:289; child trickster, 2:319; by devil, 4:194; drawing of sword, 3:96; sincerity, 3:148; wife, 1:66
- Tetragrammaton, 1:238
- Texas, 4:258
- Texas A&M University students, 4:220
- Texas Revolution of 1836, 4:13
- Theft: of fire, 4:27, 4:64; of food, 3:334, 4:409; of sword, 3:304
- "Theft of Butter (Honey) by Playing Godfather," 4:164, 4:409
- "The Theft of Fish," 3:334
- "Them Petrified Buzzards," 4:285, 4:290–94
- Theseus, 3:231
- Thomas, Mary, 4:159
- Thompson, Stith, 1:420, 4:110
- "Thor in Peril," 3:298–303
- "The Thrall's Curse," 3:304–7
- "Three Animals as Brothers-in-law," 1:274
- "The Three Golden Sons," 2:419
- "The Three Lemons," 3:130–38, 3:163, 3:185
- "Three Little Pigs and the Big Bad Wolf," 4:186
- "Three Men of Galway," 3:49–53
- "The Three Precepts," 3:54
- "The Three Rajahs," 2:308–11
- Three (sacred number), 3:201
- "The Three Stolen Princesses," 3:253
- Tibet, 2:113–30
- Tiger, 2:152–56, 2:332, 2:364–65
- "The Tiger and the Frog," 2:121–22
- "The Tiger Changed into a Woman," 4:446–48
- "Tiger Softens His Voice," 4:431–34
- Ti Jean, 4:219
- "Ti Jean Cannot Tell a Lie," 4:219
- Time: mythic events, 1:324; story classification, 4:89
- Tiruray tribe, 2:399
- Titans: myth of, 2:28
- Tiyo, 4:85–88
- Tlingit (people), 4:140–45, 4:140–47
- Tobacco, 4:338, 4:397
- Togo: Yoruba culture, 1:124
- Tolba, 1:24
- Toltecs, 4:393
- "Tom Thumb," 3:3, 3:21
- Tone: revealing content, 2:221
- Tools: culture hero, 1:398
- Tortoise, 1:68–77, 1:80, 1:82–85, 1:152, 2:415–19
- "The Tortoise and the Elephant," 1:68–70
- "The Tortoise and the Hare," 2:334
- "The Tortoise with a Beautiful Daughter," 1:82–85
- Totem animals, 4:89
- Totemic clans: culture heroes, 1:301
- Toyotomi Hidetsugu, 2:67
- Toyotomi Hideyoshi, 2:67
- Trade: Efik-European, 1:80; West African, 1:116
- Trade routes: morality on, 1:223
- Traders, 2:152
- Tradition: immigrant community preservation, 1:251
- Traditional arts, 4:253
- Traditional healers: roles and methods, 1:92
- Tradition bearers, 4:253
- Trances, 4:338
- Transformation, 1:310; act inversion, 3:174; animal spouse, 2:320, 2:323; anthropomorphic to wild, 4:415; external, 2:107; heroes into stars, 4:148–55; plot inversion, 2:298; somersaults, 3:185; song power of, 4:431; spouse, 2:167; into stones, 4:319; twins in stars, 4:456. See also Shape-shifting
- Transformation tales: hero identity, 3:139
- Transvestites: Native Americans, 4:13
- Transylvania, 3:104, 3:178
- Trapping, 4:57
- "Trapping a Hag," 4:198–99
- Traps: magical, 1:78
- Travel between worlds, 2:43
- "The Treacherous Jackal," 1:57–58
- Treasure: dwarves, 3:81; lost, 4:268
- Trees, 3:299
- Trials: siblings in arctic communities, 4:72
- "Tricking of Gylfi," 3:292
- Trickster: Abu'n-Nuwa's, 1:251; African animal tales, 1:68; Algonquin cultures, 4:124; amorality and guile, 1:70; Anansi, 1:61, 1:96, 4:163, 4:324, 4:326, 4:329–30, 4:425–30; animal fables, 1:76; animal myth, 1:303; animal tales, 1:57, 1:80, 2:328, 4:161–62; Ann Nancy, 4:163; Bantu tales, 1:68–77; being tricked, 4:410; Big Raven, 2:105; blame shifting, 1:72, 4:165; Boudreaux, 4:220; Brer Rabbit, 4:45, 4:166–89, 4:170; buzzard, 4:182; cat, 2:128; cockroach, 4:430; community interest, 4:172; community service, 1:80; cousins bested, 3:49;

- cowardly, 1:144; coyote, 4:116; cross-cultural characteristics, 2:430–31; culture hero function, 3:3; cunning amorality, 1:71; drunken success, 4:455; dual nature, 1:6; duelist mentality, 2:333; Egypt, 1:3; exploitation, 4:174; exposure, 2:107; extraordinary nature, 2:318–19; fire theft, 4:64; fox, 3:325, 4:27, 4:29; frog, 2:121–22; gazelle, 1:78; human, 3:316; imitation, 4:110; Jack, 4:229; jackal, 1:58, 1:144, 2:152; Japanese animal, 2:97; Jewish legends, 1:241; jokes, 3:148; Juan Puson, 2:427, 2:430–31; konehu, 4:343; Kororomanna, 4:332; Lapin, 4:209; Lata, 1:331; Loki, 3:298–99; loss by, 2:334; Maori, 1:3.98; marginality, 4:102; mole, 4:86; motivations, 4:175, 4:214; mouse deer cycle, 2:328–37, 2:364; opportunistic nature, 3:334; orphan boy, 2:263; peasant, 3:194; poets, 1:10; popular African, 1:152; precocious child, 2:318–19; puns against, 4:179; rabbi, 3:143; rabbit, 4:16–17, 4:45, 4:65, 4:121, 4:415; raven, 2:40, 4:75, 4:140; sacrifice of innocents, 2:336, 2:430; scatology, 2:415; Self-brought-up-Man, 2:17; serpent, 1:196; shape-shifting, 1:72, 1:154; skills over monsters, 4:53; sparrow, 1:291; spider, 1:353; strategy, 2:301, 4:162; tanuki, 2:95; theft of food, 4:409; Ti Jean, 4:219; traits, 1:68; twins, 4:84; ungrateful animals, 2:277; wallaroo, 1:303; West African, 1:108; younger brothers, 2:245. See also Culture hero
- “The Trickster and the Sultan,” 1:6–9
- “Trouble (Rabbit Loses His Tail),” 4:179–82
- “The True Sweetheart,” 3:77
- Truth, 2:435–38
- “Truth and Falsehood,” 2:435–38
- Tsamba tormas, 2:123
- “Tsarevna Frog,” 3:211–16
- Tuglay, 2:388–95
- Tuglibung, 2:388
- Turkey, 1:257–93
- Turkish narratives, 1:176
- Turks, 1:3
- Turtle, 1:72–77, 1:333, 2:80
- “Turtle Deceives Zoe, Giving Leopard the Blame for Stealing Zoe’s Daughter,” 1:72–74
- “Turtle Drinks at the Expense of the Other Beasts,” 1:70–71
- “Turtle Surpasses Man in Ingenuity,” 1:75
- “Twardowski the Magician,” 3:160–62
- “The Twelve-Headed Griffin,” 3:185
- Twenty-Two Goblins*, 2:184, 2:233, 3:275
- Twins: children of sun, 4:456; culture hero, 4:359, 4:364; heroes, 4:105–10; magical resuscitation, 3:385; Native American motif, 4:34, 4:148–55; sun visited by, 4:83; trickster cleansing, 4:84, 4:148
- “The Twins or Blood-Brothers,” 3:385
- “Two Boys and Their Grandmothers,” 1:121–23
- “The Two Boys Who Slew the Monsters and Became Stars,” 1:120, 1:324, 4:34, 4:53, 4:57, 4:106, 4:148–55, 4:456
- “Two-Faces,” 4:53–54, 4:57
- “Two Girls, the Bear and the Dwarf,” 3:81
- Two-headed doctors, 4:203
- “The Two Hunchbacks,” 1:64–66
- “Two Sons of the Creator,” 4:304–5, 4:319
- “The Two Sons of the Creator,” 4:315
- Tyrants, 4:162
- Uganda, 1:29
- Ukraine, 3:171
- Ulster myth cycle, 3:39
- Unclean occupations, 2:181
- Underground world, 4:3, 4:25, 4:86
- “Under the Green Old Oak Tree,” 2:181, 4:412–13
- Underworld, 1:398; bride, 1:353, 1:372–80; child with god of, 1:398; emergence from, 4:302; gods of, 1:369; journey to, 1:372, 2:62, 4:380; revival from, 1:343; symbolism, 3:152
- “The Ungrateful Serpent Returned to Captivity,” 2:152, 2:277, 4:329
- Unicorn, 4:232–36
- United Kingdom, 3:3, 3:54
- United States, 1:176
- Universe: creation, 1:396, 1:431, 2:28, 2:338; description, 2:43; ordering, 1:324, 2:309
- “Unjust Umpire Misappropriates Disputed Goods,” 2:116
- Unkind/kind. See Kind/unkind
- Unkind sibling motif, 2:315
- Unnatural suitors: motifs of, 1:85
- “The Unseen Helpers,” 4:98–101
- Untrustworthy characters, 1:35
- Upper classes, 3:182
- Urban cultures, 1:3
- Urban–rural dichotomy, 1:3
- Uzume, 2:59
- Vaiyas, 2:152
- Validating devices: facts, 2:67; foreign tales, 1:176; localization, 2:86, 3:160, 4:387; naming, 4:387; tall tales, 4:285
- Vampire: bats, 4:341; folly exposure, 2:221; frame tale, 2:203; frame tale by captured, 2:203
- “The Vampire,” 3:173–77, 3:185
- “The Vampire Puzzles Raja Vikram,” 2:203, 2:233–44, 3:275
- “The Vampire” Puzzles Raja Vikram,” 2:185
- Variants: “Animal Allows Himself to Be Tied to Another for Safety,” 2:121; “The Animal Languages,” 2:295, 2:301, 3:109; “The Beautiful and the Ugly Twin,” 3:373; biblical, 1:42; “Bird’s Pea Gets Stuck in Socket

Cumulative Index

1: Africa, The Middle East,
Australia, and Oceania
2: Asia
3: Europe
4: North and South America

of Mill-Handle," 2:291; "The Brave Tailor," 1:287, 4:232; "Cinderella," 2:419, 3:58, 3:270, 4:382; "Deceptive Tug-of-War," 4:417; deity-herdsman marriage, 2:30; domestic strife, 1:5; "The Dragon-Slayer," 3:351; "Ferdinand the True and Ferdinand the False," 3:364; formulaic devices, 1:169; "The Forty Thieves," 2:424; "The Gifts of the Little People," 2:32; "The Girl as Helper in the Hero's Flight," 3:125, 3:152, 3:171; "Guarding the Door," 4:411; "Hansel and Gretel," 3:67; "Hans my Hedgehog," 3:275; "The Helpful Horse," 3:351; Indian frame tale conclusions, 2:233; Italian tales, 3:261; "Jack and the Beanstalk," 4:189; "John the Bear," 4:376; "The Kind and the Unkind Girls," 3:18, 3:90, 4:434; "The King's New Clothes," 2:250; "King Thunderbeard," 3:266; "Little Brother and Little Sister," 1:260; "The Lucky Shot," 4:240; "The Magic Ring," 2:176, 3:104, 3:163; "Monkey Who Left His Heart at Home," 2:80; moral code synthesis, 2:343; "The Name of the Helper," 3:120; plot inversion, 2:298; power words, 4:405; predators/prey characters, 2:128; "Puss in Boots," 2:429; Rabbit's / Hare's triumph, 1:152; "Rescue by the Sister," 3:280; "The Rich and the Poor Peasant," 2:245; "Robbers Smuggled into House in Food Containers," 2:424; "The Search for the Lost Husband," 3:256; "The Singing Bone," 2:181, 4:412; "Sleeping

Beauty," 3:73; "Snow-White," 3:261; storylines, 1:4; "Stronger and Strongest," 2:265, 4:374-75; "Stupid Stories Depending on a Pun," 4:217; "The Table, the Ass, and the Stick," 4:191-93; tar baby, 4:121; "Theft of Butter (Honey) by Playing Godfather," 4:409; "The Theft of Fish," 3:334; "The Three Golden Sons," 2:419; "The Three Oranges," 3:130-38; "The Three Precepts," 3:54; "Tom Thumb," 3:21; "The Twins or Blood-Brothers," 3:385; "Two Girls, the Bear and the Dwarf," 3:81; "Ungrateful Serpent Returned to Captivity," 2:277; "The Ungrateful Serpent Returned to Captivity," 4:329; "The Watcher Blinded," 4:182; "The Youth Who Wanted to Learn What Fear Is," 1:257
Vasques, Manuel Jesus, 4:264
Veddah, 2:298
Verse, 2:268, 3:21
"Victorio's Raid," 4:272-75
Vikram and the Vampire, 2:185, 2:203, 2:233, 3:275
Villages: divided, 4:148; Isleta Pueblo, 4:102; justice enforcement, 1:83; Native American, 4:13
Viracocha, 4:299, 4:304, 4:309
"Viracocha," 4:315-19
Virgins of the sun, 4:319
Virtue-reward tale type plots, 3:77
Visayas, 2:430
Visions, 4:200
Viziers, 1:216
Volcanoes, 1:361
Vows, 2:399
"Vukub-Cakix, the Great Macaw," 4:358-64, 4:364

"Waipumaremare," 1:343-45
Wakea, 1:369
Wales, 3:61-63
"Walking from Magical Forgetfulness," 4:436
Wallachia, 3:178
Wallachia language, 3:174
Wallaroo, 1:303
"The Wallaroo and the Willy-Wagtail," 1:303-5, 1:306
Walt Disney, 1:152
"Walutahanga," 1:335-39
Warfare, 4:95
Warrau, 4:332-48
Warriors, 2:152, 3:304, 4:95
Wars, 4:258, 4:273
"Warungarce," 1:333-35
"The Watcher Blinded," 4:182
"The Watcher Tricked," 4:182-83
Water of life and death, 1:242
Waters (tabooed), 1:372
Water spirits, 3:92
Waxgirl, 1:78
"The Way in which Andrianoro Obtained a Wife from Heaven," 1:36-41
Weak animals, 2:121
Weapons: prince of five, 2:156; sword myth, 2:59, 2:64; tests, 3:96; theft-murder curse, 3:304
"The Weaver Maiden and the Herdsman," 2:30-32
"The Weight before the Door," 1:14-16, 1:45, 1:238
Werewolves, 3:174
Western Africa, 1:61-134; Ann Nancy/Anansi, 4:163
Western Europe, 3:337-98
Westervelt, W. D., 1:380
West Indies, 4:405
Whales, 4:79, 4:417
"What Happens to Wives When They Think More Highly of Anything Else Than Their Husbands," 1:6-67
"What Is in the Dish: Poor Crab," 4:184
"When Brer Rabbit Help Brer Terrapin," 4:200
"When Brer Rabbit Saw Brer Dog's Mouth So Brer Dog Can Whistle," 4:175-79
"When Brer Rabbit Was Presidin' Elder," 4:166-67
"When Raven Wanted to Marry Snowbird and Fly with the Geese," 4:75-76, 4:140

- “The White Slipper,” 3:390–98
 “Why Ananse Lives in the Ceiling,” 1:96–97
 “Why Men and Tigers Are Enemies,” 2:261–62
 “Why Rabbit Has a Short Tail,” 4:410–11
 “Why the People Tote Brer Rabbit Foot in Their Pocket,” 4:172–73, 4:175
 “Why the Worms Are Blind and Why the Elephant Has Small Eyes,” 1:80–82
 Wichita, 4:148–55
 “The Wicked Sparrow,” 1:291–93
 “The Wicked Stepmother,” 1:176, 2:122–26
 Wife, 1:106; animal guise, 1:265, 2:320, 2:323; animals seeking human, 4:431; cruelty to, 4:448; deception of, 4:407; dwellings, 1:106; foolish misunderstanding, 4:411; gender differences, 4:423; infidelity, 4:443; looking for, 3:289; metamorphosed tiger, 4:447; saving husband’s life, 2:133; social justice plot, 4:19; traded for mule, 4:212
 “The Wild Cat and the Rat,” 1:34–35
 Wildness, 4:415
 Willy-wagtail, 1:303
 Wilson, Howard Barrett, 1:253
 Windigo, 4:16
 “The Wine, the Farm, the Princess and the Tarbaby,” 4:209–12
 Winged men, 2:92
 Winter, 4:161–62
 Wisdom: choice over money, 3:54; decorum, 1:82; trickster, 1:82, 4:172
 Wise fools, 1:7, 2:221–33
 Wisemen, 2:247, 3:321
 Wishes, 2:102
 “The Witch and Her Servants,” 3:216–28
 “The Witch and the Boiler,” 4:226–28
 “The Witch and the New Born Infant,” 3:356–59
 “The Witch at Bosen Corner,” 2:315, 4:434–35
 Witchcraft, 4:283; skin taking, 4:121; Southwest region Spanish culture, 4:281
 Witch doctors, 4:227
 Witches: Berberisca, 3:385; bruja/brujo, 4:283; brujas, 4:281; elders opposition to, 4:102; helper role, 3:130; huts, 3:212; legends, 4:227; motif range, 3:216; night-goer, 4:47; night hag, 4:225; possessing two hearts, 4:83; shape-shifting, 3:174, 3:357, 4:85–86, 4:284; social power, 1:253; stepmother parallelism, 3:67; trickster action against, 4:172
 “Witches Discovered,” 4:281, 4:284–85
 “Witch Flights,” 4:281, 4:283–84, 4:389
 Wits, 1:72
 “The Witty Exploits of Mr. George Buchanan the King’s Fool,” 4:440
 Wolf, 4:33, 4:98, 4:209, 4:248–51
 Wolf clan, 4:140–45
 “The Wolf Dives into the Water for Reflected Cheese,” 4:367
 “Wolf of the Greenwood,” 4:248–51
 “The Woman Who Was Fond of Intestines,” 4:19–24
 “The Woman with a Bear Lover,” 4:118–20
 “The Woman with Two Skins,” 1:87–92
 Women: bear as lover, 4:118–20; children by gods, 3:231; child with underworld god, 1:398; clan lineage, 4:3–4; creator of human, 4:332; deception by man, 2:203–21; dream appearance, 4:385; gardening, 2:3; hunter-gatherer society value, 1:313; marriage to disguised animals, 1:57; origin, 4:423; parent defied by young, 4:76; stealing of, 4:450; subsistence labor, 1:158; suicide, 2:70; supernatural bridegroom abduction, 1:420; supernatural child bearing agreement, 3:373; treatment of husband, 4:324; warrior, 3:39. See also Bride; Wife
 Women-spirit, 4:70
 “The Wonderful Tar-Baby Story” (Harris), 1:152, 4:414
 Woodpecker, 4:110–11
 Words, 4:405, 4:425
 World, 2:156–59, 4:76
 “The Worship of the Thunderbolt: A Story of Shango,” 1:128–29
 Wrenchall, Leitia Humphreys, 4:244
 Writing systems, 4:33, 4:357

 Xhosa (people), 1:158–65

 Yama, 2:133
 Yamato-dake no Mikoto, 2:64
 Yoruba, 1:124–34
 Yoshino Yama, 2:70
 Younger brothers, 2:245, 3:216
 Younger siblings, 2:167, 3:198
 “The Young Man and the Snake,” 2:276–81
 “Young Men Who Killed the Horned Serpent and Released the Buffalo,” 4:50–53
 “Your Horse Stays Outside,” 4:185–86
 “The Youth in the Land of Cheaters,” 2:255
 “The Youth Who Received Supernatural Powers from the Ke’let,” 2:36–58, 2:105
 “The Youth Who Wanted to Learn What Fear Is,” 1:257
 Yu-Huan, 2:30
 Yukara, 2:3
 Yupik (people), 4:70
 “The Yuri-Ulu,” 1:321–24
 Yurokons (people), 4:453

 Zimwi, 1:55
 Zuni Pueblo, 4:124

About the Editor

THOMAS A. GREEN is Associate Professor of Anthropology at Texas A&M University. His many books include The Greenwood Library of American Folktales (Greenwood, 2006), and Martial Arts in the Modern World (Praeger, 2003).

The Greenwood Library of

world folktales

STORIES FROM THE GREAT COLLECTIONS

volume four

North and South America

EDITED BY THOMAS A. GREEN

The Greenwood Library
of
World Folktales

The Greenwood Library of World Folktales

---

Stories from the Great Collections

VOLUME 4

North and South America

Edited by Thomas A. Green

Jack Zipes, Advisory Editor

GREENWOOD PRESS
Westport, Connecticut • London

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

The Greenwood library of world folktales : stories from the great collections / edited by Thomas A. Green.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 978-0-313-33783-3 ((set) : alk. paper) — ISBN 978-0-313-33784-0
((v. 1) : alk. paper) — ISBN 978-0-313-33785-7 ((v. 2) : alk. paper) —
ISBN 978-0-313-33786-4 ((v. 3) : alk. paper) — ISBN 978-0-313-33787-1
((v. 4) : alk. paper)

1. Tales. 2. Folklore. I. Green, Thomas A., 1944-

GR74.G74 2008

398.2—dc22 2007041323

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data is available.

Copyright © 2008 by Thomas A. Green

All rights reserved. No portion of this book may be reproduced, by any process or technique, without the express written consent of the publisher.

Library of Congress Catalog Card Number: 2007041323

ISBN: 978-0-313-33783-3 (set)

978-0-313-33784-0 (vol. 1)

978-0-313-33785-7 (vol. 2)

978-0-313-33786-4 (vol. 3)

978-0-313-33787-1 (vol. 4)

First published in 2008

Greenwood Press, 88 Post Road West, Westport, CT 06881

An imprint of Greenwood Publishing Group, Inc.

www.greenwood.com

Printed in the United States of America

The paper used in this book complies with the Permanent Paper Standard issued by the National Information Standards Organization (Z39.48-1984).

10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

Contents

---

VOLUME 4

Introduction to Volume 4	xiii
North America	1
Native North American	1
Acoma	3
Origin of Acoma	3
Alabama	13
Origin of the Alabama Indians	13
Rabbit Kills Big Man-eater	16
Rabbit and Big Man-eater	17
Aleut	19
The Woman Who Was Fond of Intestines	19
Apache	25
Origin of the Apaches	25
Origin of Fire	27
Tales of Fox	29
Cherokee	33
Kanati and Selu: The Origin of Corn and Game	33
Origin of the Bear: The Bear Songs	39
The Rattlesnake's Vengeance	42
The Spirit Defenders of Nikwäsi'	43
How the Deer Obtained His Horns	45
The Raven Mocker	47

Contents

Cheyenne	50
Young Men Who Killed the Horned Serpent and Released the Buffalo	50
Two-Faces	53
How the Whites Became Rich	54
Cree	57
Little One Left Alive (Che-che-puy-ew-tis)	57
Creek	63
Rabbit Gets a Turkey for Wildcat	63
Rabbit Steals Fire	64
Rabbit Fools Alligator	65
Crow	67
Famine	67
Eskimo	70
The Bewitched Wives	70
The Origin of the Narwhal	72
Origin of the Adlet and the Whiteman	73
When Raven Wanted to Marry Snowbird and Fly with the Geese	75
Recovering the Sun	76
Haida	79
Story of the Fin-Back Crest	79
Hopi	83
How the Twins Visited the Sun	83
How the Twins Killed the Giant Elk	84
How Tiyo Punished Man-Eagle	85
Iroquois	89
Grandmother O-ne-ha-tah, Mother Oo-kwa-e, and the Lost Boy	89
Ga'na'a's Adventures among the Cherokee	94
The Unseen Helpers	98
Isleta	102
The Antelope Boy	102
The Hero Twins	105
The Coyote and the Woodpecker	110

Lakota	112
The Stone Boy	112
Coyote and the Buffalo	116
The Woman with a Bear Lover	118
Natchez	121
The Tar Baby	121
Navajo	124
Noqoilpi, the Gambler: A Navajo Myth	124
Ojibwa	130
The Flood	130
Bear Maiden	136
Tlingit	140
El: The Myth of Raven	140
The Doom of the Katt-a-quins	145
Wichita	148
The Two Boys Who Slew the Monsters and Became Stars	148
Non-Native Cultures	157
Ethnic	157
African American	159
Grandfather's Escape to Free Haven	159
How Come Brer Bear Sleep in the Winter	161
How Come Mr. Buzzard to Have a Bald Head	163
Playing Godfather	164
When Brer Rabbit Was Presidin' Elder	166
How Brer Rabbit Practice Medicine	168
Brer Rabbit's Cool Air Swing	170
Why the People Tote Brer Rabbit Foot in Their Pocket	172
Mr. Deer's My Riding Horse	173
When Brer Rabbit Saw Brer Dog's Mouth So Brer Dog Can Whistle	175
How Brer Fox Dream He Eat Brer Possum	177
Trouble (Rabbit Loses His Tail)	179
When Brer Rabbit Help Brer Terrapin	180
The Watcher Tricked	182
'Coon in the Box	183
Your Horse Stays Outside	185

Contents

How Come Pigs Can See the Wind	186
How Brer Rabbit Bring Dust Out of the Rock	187
Jack and the Bean-Pole	189
Tablecloth, Donkey, and Club	191
The Bride of the Evil One	193
Trapping a Hag	198
Sol Lockheart's Call	200
Possessed of Two Spirits	202
Jack-O'-My-Lantern	205
Cajun	209
The Wine, the Farm, the Princess and the Tarbaby	209
The Sack of Peas and the Mule	212
On Horseback	214
Jean Sot and the Cowhide	215
Jean Sot Feeds Cows Needles	217
Jean Sot Kills the Duck	218
Ti Jean Cannot Tell a Lie	219
Boudreaux and the Cottonmouth	219
Cajun Cockfight	220
Regional	223
Appalachian	225
Phoebe Ward, Witch	225
The Witch and the Boiler	226
The Mysterious Deer	228
Lucky Jack	229
The Lion and the Unicorn	232
Jack and the Fire Dragaman	236
Jack's Hunting Trip	240
Pennsylvania German	244
Cures of a Maryland Witch	244
Ghost Legends of the Blue Mountains	247
Wolf of the Greenwood	248
Granny Steel	251
Jake Strauss	251
Lazy Maria	252
The Secret Room	255

Southwest	258
Range Life in Texas	258
History of a Buffalo Hunter	264
The Adams Diggings	267
Victorio's Raid	272
Elfego Baca	275
The Ghost Penitente	279
Curanderas and Brujas	280
Witch Flights	283
Witches Discovered	284
Meteor Hell! Cicero Done It	285
Them Petrified Buzzards	290
South America	295
Aurohuac (Colombian Arawak)	297
Tach the Prophet	297
Aymara	299
The Creation	299
Manco Capac	301
The Children of the Sun	302
Two Sons of the Creator	304
Caingang (Kaingang)	306
The Deluge	306
Chile	309
The Good Serpent	309
Inca	315
Viracocha	315
The Shepherd and the Daughter of the Sun	319
Suriname Maroon	324
How Man Made Woman Respect Him	324
Anansi Eats Mutton	325
Jauw's Dream	327
Snake and Hunter	329
Warrau	332
The Adventures of Kororomanna	332
Komatari, The First Medicine Man	338

Contents

The Night Owl and His Bat Brothers-in-Law	341
The Exploits of Koneho	342
Mexico and Central America	349
Bribri	351
How the First Bribri Indians Were Born	351
The Tale of Our Dying Away	352
How Jáburu Ate the Seed of Our Kin	353
How Sibû Killed Sórkura	354
Maya	357
The Maya Creation	357
Vukub-Cakix, the Great Macaw	358
The Calabash Tree	364
Mexico	367
Tale of the Rabbit	367
The Long-Legs	374
John Tiger	376
God	379
Cinder Mary	382
The Story of the Sun and the Moon	384
How the Elves Punished a Quarrelsome Man	387
The Priest and the Devil	389
How the Elves Put a Holy Father and His Sacristan to Flight	391
Nahua	393
Quetzalcoatl and Tezcatlipoca	393
The Origin of the Calabash Tree and the Tobacco Plant	397
The Queen with a Hundred Lovers	399
Caribbean	403
African Caribbean	403
Antigua	405
Nancy and the Honey Tree	405
Nancy Fools His Wife	407
Playing Mourner	408
Why Rabbit Has a Short Tail	410
Mr. Hard Time	411
Under the Green Old Oak Tree	412

Bahamas	414
Brother Rabbit an' Brother Tar-Baby	414
Brother Elephant and Brother Whale	417
Brother Rabbit, Brother Booky, and Brother Cow	418
The Girl and the Fish	420
The Big Worm	421
Jamaica	423
The Origin of Woman	423
Annancy and the Yam Hills	424
Cunnie-More-Than-Father	425
Anansi and the Lady in the Well	429
Cock's Breakfast	430
Tiger Softens His Voice	431
The Witch at Bosen Corner	434
Jack and the Devil Errant	435
De Story of de Man and Six Poached Eggs	439
Native Caribbean	441
Arawak	443
Hariwali and the Wonderful Tree	443
The Tiger Changed into a Woman	446
The Babracote and the Camudi	448
How We Beat the Caribs	450
Carib	453
How Pain, Misery, and Death Came into the World	453
How the Man Fooled the Tiger	454
The Sun, the Frog, and the Firesticks	456
Glossary	459
Bibliography to Volume 4	461
General Bibliography	467
Cumulative Index	477

Introduction to Volume 4

---

North America encompasses the United States and Canada. The vast territorial scope, ecological variety, and ethnic diversity of the continent compel selective rather than comprehensive coverage of narrative traditions. The two primary divisions utilized for North America are Native American and non-Native American.

Native American cultures from which narratives are drawn are arranged alphabetically. They are politically, socially, and economically diverse. Among the indigenous North American cultures are hunters and gathers, agriculturalists, mariners, small band societies, and theocracies with elaborate hierarchies. The major regions of the Northeast, the South, the Plains, the Southwest, the West, and the Northwest Coast are represented, and the locations of the groups and the lifestyles developed within these regions are presented in the headnotes to individual tales.

Non-Native American tales are classified as either ethnic or regional traditions. The former are labeled according to an ascribed ethnic affiliation, which may or may not exist within exclusively racial parameters. The latter traditions find a focus in social contexts and lifestyles that are peculiar to a given geographic location.

Ethnic traditions in North America are represented in this volume by the African American and the Cajun traditions. Both groups have maintained strong ethnic bonds while influencing and responding to the lore of their cultural neighbors.

Although by no means did all people of African descent in the Americas arrive as a result of slavery, the enslavement and importation of Africans into the American hemisphere provided a major African influence. This was especially true in the coastal states of the South with the development of a plantation economy. A similar expansion of the commerce in African slaves in the Caribbean had a similar impact as discussed later in this volume (page xvii). In spite of skewed social relationships, however, African and European expressive culture met and produced new products that bore the marks of both worlds. See, for example, “How Brer Rabbit Bring Dust Out of the Rock” (page 187), a tale in which European and European American “Jack tale” motifs and plot structures converge with the African American trickster Brer Rabbit.

Cajuns are the descendents of Europeans of French ancestry who were exiled from Acadia (now Nova Scotia, Canada) when the British began a systematic program of deportation in 1755. Some of this population sought refuge in the French Caribbean. Others settled in territory inhabited primarily by Native Americans, which may account for the shared tales among the Cajun corpus and the repertoires of Native Americans in the southeastern United States. The largest and historically the most identifiable Cajun population, however, settled in what was then the Louisiana Territory. Maintaining a separate identity, these southern Cajuns held on to French narratives featuring Jean Sot (Foolish John) as in “Jean Sot Feeds Cows Needles” (page 217) and “Jean Sot Kills the Duck” (page 218). The preservation of identity, however, does not entail neither insulation from neighbors occupying the same region nor stagnation of the tale repertoire. The tales of Lapin and Bouqui provide particularly useful examples of borrowing between the Cajun and the African American communities. Particular tales such as “The Wine, the Farm, the Princess and the Tarbaby” (page 209) survived in both ethnic traditions. Moreover, the name given to the comic foil for trickster Lapin (rabbit), Bouqui, in the Cajun cycle of trickster tales owes a debt to Africa. The accepted origin of the name Bouqui lies in the Wolof (West African) word for hyena, and this character under a variety of spellings is found not only in the United States, but in the Caribbean as well. See, for example, “Brother Rabbit, Brother Booky, and Brother Cow” (page 418). Moreover, ample evidence of sharing among Cajun and African Americans is provided by a comparison of the Cajun tale “On Horseback” (page 214) to the African American “Mr. Deer’s My Riding Horse” (page 173).

Regional traditions provide a further means of classifying North American folktales. Ecology, history, and social conditions of a given locale often give rise to narrative responses to these factors. Conversely, ethnic and regional identities are not hermetically from each other. They often interact.

Pennsylvania German traditions, in fact, are on the cusp of the ethnic and the regional. The so-called Pennsylvania Dutch (actually the Pennsylvania Germans) are descendants of German-speaking immigrants who came to Pennsylvania from various parts of southwest Germany, Alsace, and Switzerland. Their migrations took them into several colonies in addition to Pennsylvania as early as the seventeenth century, although by 1776 they composed a third of the population of that state. Most eventually came to live in the southeastern region of the state. This population concentration notwithstanding, there were infusions from related Old World traditions and colonial settlements.

For example, the Dutch East India Company established trading posts on the Hudson River, claiming to the territory between the Connecticut and Delaware Rivers, an area including the contemporary Connecticut, New York, and part of Pennsylvania. Between 1609 and 1664, 8,000 Dutch settlers inhabited the New Netherlands (contemporary New York and New Jersey). Among the areas populated early on by the Dutch was modern Schoharie County, a sub-region in which both Dutch and German immigrants came to live as neighbors. With time, distinctions as to national origin of tales became blurred. Migration between the two areas further blended the folklore of the communities. In one instance, in 1723, some thirty-three Palatine families migrated from Schoharie, New York, to Tulpehocken, Berks County, Pennsylvania, where other Palatines had settled previously. For purposes of the present collection, the German-descended traditions that developed within the coastal states mentioned above and Pennsylvania constitute a regional folk tradition.

Appalachian culture, similarly, displays both regional and ethnic allegiances. The southern Appalachian region encompasses West Virginia, large areas of North and South Carolina, Kentucky, Tennessee and Virginia, and portions of Alabama, Georgia, and Mississippi. The European ethnic makeup of the region is historically northern English and Scottish Irish who had been settled in Ulster during the early seventeenth century. By the late eighteenth century, many had immigrated to the American colonies and pushed westward into the Appalachian region from 1718–1775. Later, settlers from the southern Appalachian region moved on to the Ozarks, limited here to the northern Arkansas-southern Missouri area. These immigrants, though not the first of European descent to settle there eventually became the largest faction. As a result, they became the dominant influence on traditional narratives in the area. The relative isolation of the rural communities in the southern highlands encouraged the preservation of archaic British dialect features as well as various genres of folklore and folk-life. For example, localized versions of English folktales such as “The Brave Tailor” (AT 1640) and “The Lion and the Unicorn” (page 232) were collected in the early decades of the twentieth century along with personal experience narratives and legends of witchcraft and hauntings, as in “The Mysterious Deer” (page 228) and “The Witch and the Boiler” (page 226).

The Southwest as a regional tradition is limited, for the purpose of this collection, to Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona. The landscape of these states varies from thickly forested areas of East Texas to cedar and oak as one moves further into the state or into the mountains of New Mexico. The Gulf Coast of Texas is contrasted with the deserts to New Mexico and Arizona. With its dramatic extremes of blasting heat, which can range as high as 125 degrees Fahrenheit in the Sonoran desert and bitter cold in the higher elevations of the Rocky Mountains in Arizona and New Mexico, the climate itself has inspired the folk imagination—particularly tall tales. The southwestern region’s ecology has given rise in turn to a variety of occupations and the lifestyles attendant upon them. Farming, commercial and subsistence fishing, gathering, ranching, mining, subsistence hunting, and—before the virtual extermination of the great bison herds—hide hunting were supported by fertile flatlands and river bottoms, the coasts, the open plains, and mountain ranges. Each of these vocations has left its trail in oral tradition. Although it is an extreme oversimplification, particularly in the twenty-first century, to ignore the presence and contributions of an extraordinary range of cultures to the Southwest region, two non-Native cultures, the Hispanic and the Anglo American, traditionally have been recognized as having exerted early and profound influence on the region.

South America extends from Venezuela in the north to Chile and Argentina in the south. As has been noted for most of the other continents whose traditions are covered in The Greenwood Library of World Folktales, the geographic and cultural diversity of the region make generalizations impossible. The continent is noteworthy as the home of some of the earliest and most highly developed of the indigenous civilizations in the Americas. By the end of the fifteenth century, the continent became the object of colonial struggles, introducing first Spanish and Portuguese influences into the area and later, to a lesser degree, other European traditions. European mercantilism also introduced a profound and enduring African presence in the wake of the slave trade. Brazil, alone, imported almost 40 percent of the African slaves that were brought into the Americas. In the twenty-first century, many South American nations continue to sustain a significant African American population. Suriname, for example, is home to the largest Maroon population (see Suriname Maroon, pages 324–331) in the Western hemisphere; these people have preserved and disseminated their culture throughout the region. The folktales of Native South Americans are categorized under the indigenous name for each group (for example, Aymara, Inca) or, in the case of those tales that have been perpetuated within a European-descended tradition, under the name of the nation that provided the most immediate source for the narrative (for example, Chile). This principle applies to the tales from Mexico and Central America and the Caribbean.

Mexico and Central America comprises the region extending from the southern border of the United States through Mexico, into Belize, Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and Panama. Historically, certain native cultures of the region such as the Aztecs, the Olmecs, and the Maya were noted for the development of societies that created sophisticated aesthetic, theological, and scientific systems. Simultaneously, there existed in the region groups who based their subsistence on hunting and gathering, fishing, and small-scale horticulture. A significant number of the latter ethnic groups, many of whom were related culturally and linguistically to the empire builders, persist into the twenty-first century. Early in the sixteenth century, Spain invaded the area and established three centuries of Spanish rule. The effects on the culture of Mexico and Central America appear in the folktales in the form of a strong current of Roman Catholicism as well as in the persistence of European tale types and motifs.

Caribbean indigenous cultures, as is the case elsewhere in the Western hemisphere, provided the baseline in the area. At the time of European contact, the Caribbean was inhabited by cultures that had migrated from the South American mainland. The primary groups at the time of European contact were identified as the Taino, and the Carib from whom the name for the area was derived. A combination of military action beginning in the late fifteenth century and diseases brought first from Europe and later from Africa via the slave trade decimated the native population of the islands. As a result, the impact of Native Caribbean oral traditions on the folktale corpus was minimal compared with either the European or African traditions. Spanish influence arrived in the late fifteenth century, and the British established their Caribbean colonies in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries, and in the Caribbean during the same period. The French became a factor in the Caribbean in the middle of the seventeenth century. The enslavement and importation of Africans into the Caribbean beginning in the late sixteenth century eventually resulted in a major African influence throughout the islands.

NORTH AMERICA

Native North American

ACOMA

---

ORIGIN OF ACOMA

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Stirling, Matthew W. Origin Myth of Acoma and Other Records. Smithsonian Institution, Bureau of American Ethnology, Bulletin 135. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1942, 1–10.

Date: 1928

Original Source: Acoma Pueblo, New Mexico

National Origin: Native American

---

As with all myths of origin, this one from Acoma Pueblo details the ways in which the orderly universe develops from primal chaos. The physical environment and its life forms are created, as are technology, religious practice, and elements of the social structure. The residents of Acoma were traditionally farmers who relied on the meager New Mexico rainfall rather than on irrigation as did the Pueblos further to the east. The image used to depict the development of the current order suggests maturation and emergence from an underground world and, as such, is derived from the model of the growing corn plant, the primary Acoma crop, and, therefore, the basis of traditional subsistence. The central place of the plant in practical and ceremonial life and the role of the Sun in nurturing the plant is given charter in the myth. The kiva, the underground site of Pueblo religious life, recreates Shipapu, which is identified in this narrative as the original source of life. The primacy of the sacred number “four” is reflected in four directions, four kinds of pine trees, four seeds, and four mountains, for example. The Acoma, like the rest of the Western Pueblos, emphasize clans related through the female line and both houses and gardens are owned by women. The female gender of the primal pair establishes these kinship and ownership patterns. The two sisters embody messages concerning traditional ethics and morality as well. Iatiku's altruistic behavior is regarded as more appropriately Pueblo than is Nautsiti's self-absorption and hoarding. Thus, in a later myth, Nautsiti—whose behavior becomes increasingly less appropriate by Western Pueblo standards—eventually “disappears into the East,” while Iatiku remains to establish clans, ceremonies, and other features of Acoma culture.

---

In the beginning two female human beings were born. These two children were born underground at a place called Shipapu. As they grew up, they began to be aware of each other. There was no light and they could only feel each other. Being in the dark they grew slowly. After they had grown considerably, a Spirit whom they afterward called Tsichtinako spoke to them, and they found that it would give them nourishment. After they had grown large enough to think for themselves, they spoke to the Spirit when it had come to them one day and asked it to make itself known to them and to say whether it was male or female, but it replied only that it was not allowed to meet with them. They then asked why they were living in the dark without knowing each other by name, but the Spirit answered that they were nuk'timi (under the earth); but they were to be patient in waiting until everything was ready for them to go up into the light. So they waited a long time, and as they grew they learned their language from Tsichtinako. When all was ready, they found a present from Tsichtinako, two baskets of seeds and little images of all the different animals (there were to be) in the world. The Spirit said they were sent by their father. They asked who was meant by their father, and Tsichtinako replied that his name was Ūch'tsiti and that he wished them to take their baskets out into the light, when the time came. Tsichtinako instructed them, “You will find the seeds of four kinds of pine trees, lā'khok, gēi'etsu (dyai'its), wanūka, and lā'nye, in your baskets. You are to plant these seeds and will use the trees to get up into the light.” They could not see the things in their baskets but feeling each object in turn they asked, “Is this it?” until the seeds were found. They then planted the seeds as Tsichtinako instructed. All of the four seeds sprouted, but in the darkness the trees grew very slowly and the two sisters became very anxious to reach the light as they waited this long time. They slept for many years as they had no use for eyes. Each time they awoke they would feel the trees to see how they were growing. The tree lanye grew faster than the others and after a very long time pushed a hole through the earth for them and let in a very little light. The others stopped growing, at various heights, when this happened.

The hole that the tree lanye made was not large enough for them to pass through, so Tsichtinako advised them to look again in their baskets where they would find the image of an animal called dyu'pi (badger) and tell it to become alive. They told it to live, and it did so as they spoke, exclaiming, “A'uha! Why have you given me life?" They told it not to be afraid nor to worry about coming to life. "We have brought you to life because you are to be useful." Tsichtinako spoke to them again, instructing them to tell Badger to climb the pine tree, to bore a hole large enough for them to crawl up, cautioning him not to go out into the light, but to return, when the hole was finished. Badger climbed the tree and after he had dug a hole large enough, returned saying that he had done his work. They thanked him and said, "As a reward you will come up with us to the light and thereafter you will live happily. You will always know how to dig and your home will be in the ground where you will be neither too hot nor too cold."

Tsichtinako now spoke again, telling them to look in the basket for Tāwāi'nū (locust), giving it life and asking it to smooth the hole by plastering. It too was to be cautioned to return. This they did and Locust smoothed the hole but, having finished, went out into the light. When it returned reporting that it had done its work, they asked it if it had gone out. Locust said no, and every time he was asked he replied no, until the fourth time when he admitted that he had gone out. They asked Locust what it was like outside. Locust replied that it was just tsī'īī (laid out flat). They said, "From now on you will be known as Tsi:k'ā. You will also come up with us, but you will be punished for disobedience by being allowed out only a short time. Your home will be in the ground and you will have to return when the weather is bad. You will soon die but you will be reborn each season."

The hole now let light into the place where the two sisters were, and Tsichtinako spoke to them, "Now is the time you are to go out. You are able to take your baskets with you. In them you will find pollen and sacred corn meal. When you reach the top, you will wait for the sun to come up and that direction will be called ha'nami (east). With the pollen and the sacred corn meal you will pray to the Sun. You will thank the Sun for bringing you to light, ask for a long life and happiness, and for success in the purpose for which you were created." Tsichtinako then taught them the prayers and the creation song, which they were to sing. This took a long while, but finally the sisters followed by Badger and Locust, went out into the light, climbing the pine tree. Badger was very strong and skillful and helped them. On reaching the earth, they set down their baskets and saw for the first time what they had. The earth was soft and spongy under their feet as they walked, and they said, "This is not ripe." They stood waiting for the sun, not knowing where it would appear. Gradually it grew lighter and finally the sun came up. Before they began to pray, Tsichtinako told them they were facing east and that their right side, the side their best aim was on, would be known as kū'āimē (south) and the left ti dyami (north) while behind at their backs was the direction pūna'me (west) where the sun would go down. They had already learned while underground the direction nūk'ūmi (down) and later, when they asked where their father was, they were told tyunami (four skies above).

And as they waited to pray to the Sun, the girl on the right moved her best hand and was named Iatiku which meant “bringing to life.” Tsichtinako then told her to name her sister, but it took a long time. Finally Tsichtinako noticed that the other had more in her basket, so Tsichtinako told Iatiku to name her thus, and Iatiku called her Nautsiti which meant “more of everything in the basket.”

They now prayed to the Sun as they had been taught by Tsichtinako, and sang the creation song. Their eyes hurt for they were not accustomed to the strong light. For the first time they asked Tsichtinako why they were on earth and why they were created. Tsichtinako replied, “I did not make you. Your father, Uchtsiti made you, and it is he who has made the world, the sun which you have seen, the sky, and many other things which you will see. But Uchtsiti says the world is not yet completed, not yet satisfactory, as he wants it. This is the reason he has made you. You will rule and bring to life the rest of the things he has given you in the baskets.” The sisters then asked how they themselves had come into being. Tsichtinako answered saying, “Uchtsiti first made the world. He threw a clot of his own blood into space and by his power it grew and grew until it became the earth. Then Uchtsiti planted you in this and by it you were nourished as you developed. Now that you have emerged from within the earth, you will have to provide nourishment for yourselves. I will instruct you in this.” They then asked where their father lived and Tsichtinako replied, “You will never see your father, he lives four skies above, and has made you to live in this world. He has made you in the image of himself.” So they asked why Tsichtinako did not become visible to them, but Tsichtinako replied, “I don’t know how to live like a human being. I have been asked by Uchtsiti to look after you and to teach you. I will always guide you.” And they asked again how they were to live, whether they could go down once more under the ground, for they were afraid of the winds and rains and their eyes were hurt by the light. Tsichtinako replied that Uchtsiti would take care of that and would furnish them means to keep warm and change the atmosphere so that they would get used to it.

At the end of the first day, when it became dark they were much frightened, for they had not understood that the sun would set and thought that Tsichtinako had betrayed them. “Tsichtinako! Tsichtinako! You told us we were to come into the light,” they cried, “why, then, is it dark?” So Tsichtinako explained, “This is the way it will always be. The sun will go down and the next day come up anew in the east. When it is dark you are to rest and sleep as you slept when all was dark.” So they were satisfied and slept. They rose to meet the sun, praying to it as they had been told, and were happy when it came up again, for they were warm and their faith in Tsichtinako was restored.

Tsichtinako next said to them, “Now that you have your names, you will pray with your names and your clan names so that the Sun will know you and recognize you.” Tsichtinako asked Nautsiti which clan she wished to belong to.

Nautsiti answered, "I wish to see the sun, that is the clan I will be." The spirit told Nautsiti to ask Iatiku what clan she wanted. Iatiku thought for a long time but finally she noticed that she had the seed from which sacred meal was made in her basket and no other kind of seeds. She thought, "With this name I shall be very proud, for it has been chosen for nourishment and it is sacred." So she said, "I will be Corn clan." They then waited for the sun to come up. When it appeared, Tsichtinako once more advised them to sing the first song and to pray, not forgetting their name and their clan name in starting their prayer. After the prayer they were to sing the second song.

When the sun appeared it was too bright for Iatiku and it hurt her eyes. She wondered if Nautsiti's eyes hurt her, too, so she put her head down and sideways, letting her hair fall, and looked at Nautsiti. By doing this the light did not strike her squarely in the face and her hair cast a shade. Tsichtinako said, "Iatiku, the sun has not appeared for you. Look at Nautsiti, see how strongly the light is striking her. Notice how white she looks." And although Iatiku turned to the sun, it did not make her as white as Nautsiti, and Iatiku's mind was slowed up while Nautsiti's mind was made fast. But both of them remembered everything and did everything as they were taught.

When they had completed their prayers to the sun, Tsichtinako said, "You have done everything well and now you are both to take up your baskets and you must look to the north, west, south, and east, for you are now to pray to the Earth to accept the things in the basket and to give them life. First you must pray to the north, at the same time lift up your baskets in that direction. You will then do the same to the west, then to the south and east." They did as they were told and did it well. And Tsichtinako, said to them, "From now on you will rule in every direction, north, west, south, and east."

They now questioned Tsichtinako again so that they would understand more clearly why they were given the baskets and their contents, and Tsichtinako, replied, "Everything in the baskets is to be created by your word, for you are made in the image of Uchtsiti and your word will be as powerful as his word. He has created you to help him complete the world. You are to plant the seeds of the different plants to be used when anything is needed. I shall always be ready to point out to you the various plants and animals."

The sisters did not realize that they were not taking food and did not understand when Tsichtinako told them they were to plant seeds to give them nourishment. But they were always ready to do as Tsichtinako, asked, and she told them to plant first that which would maintain life, grains of corn. "When this plant grows," said Tsichtinako, "it will produce a part which I will point out to you. This will be taken as food." Everything in the basket was in pairs and the sisters planted two of each kind of corn.

The corn grew very slowly so Tsichtinako told them to plant ısthě (the earliest plant to come up in the spring; gray with a small white flower; dies quickly) and to transmit its power of early ripening to the corn.

They were very interested in the corn and watched it every day as it grew. Tsichtinako showed them where the pollen came out. “That you will call kū’āch’tīmu,” she said, “there the pollen will appear. When the pollen is plentiful, you will gather it, and with it and corn meal you will pray to the rising sun each morning.” This they did always, but Nautsiti was sometimes a little lazy. After some time the corn ripened. Tsichtinako told them to look at it and to gather some. They saw that the corn was hard and they picked four ears. Iatiku took two ears carefully without hurting the plant, but Nautsiti jerked hers off roughly. Iatiku noticed this and cautioned her sister not to ruin the plants. They took the ears of corn to Tsichtinako saying, “We have brought the corn, it is ripe.” Tsichtinako agreed and explained that the corn ears when cooked would be their food. They did not understand this and asked what they would cook with. Tsichtinako then told them that Uchtsiti would give them fire. That night as they sat around they saw a red light drop from the sky. After they had seen it, Tsichtinako told them it was fire, and that they were to go over and get some of it. They asked with what, and she told them to get it with a flat rock because it was very hot and they could not take it in their hands. After getting it with a rock, they asked what they were to do with it, and were told they were to make a fire, to go to the pine tree they had planted, to break off some of the branches and put them in the fire. They went to the tree and broke some of the twigs from it. When they got back to the fire, they were told to throw the twigs down. They did so and a large pile of wood appeared there. Tsichtinako told them this wood would last many years till there was time for trees to grow, and showed them how to build a fire. She told them that with the flames from the fire they would keep warm and would cook their food.

Tsichtinako next taught them how to roast the corn. “When it is cooked,” she explained, “you are to eat it. This will be the first time you have eaten, for you have been fasting for a long time and Uchtsiti has been nourishing you. You will find salt in your baskets; with this you will season the corn.” They began to look for this and Tsichtinako pointed it out to them. As soon as they were told this, Nautsiti grabbed some corn and salt. She was the first to taste them and exclaimed that they were very good, but Iatiku was slower. After Nautsiti had eaten part, she gave it to Iatiku to taste. When both had eaten, Tsichtinako told them that this was the way they were going to live, and be nourished. They were very thankful, saying, “You have treated us well,” They asked if this would be their only food. Tsichtinako said, “No, you have many other things in your baskets; many seeds and images of animals, all in pairs. Some will be eaten and taken for nourishment by you.” After they had used the salt, they were asked by Tsichtinako to give life to this salt by praying to the Earth, first in the North direction, then in the West, then in the South, and then in the East. And when they did so, salt appeared in each of these directions. Tsichtinako then instructed them to take always the husks from the corn carefully and to dry them. They were then instructed to plant hā’mi (tobacco).

When the plant matured, they were taught how to roll the leaves in corn husks and to smoke it. (Even now in ceremonies the corn husks must be torn with the fingers and tied in the center with a little strip of corn husk. It may not be cut by artificial means. You smoke in order to make your prayers merge into the minds of the gods to whom prayer is addressed. This will also compel obedience. If a man smokes when a request is made of him, he must obey that request.) They were then told to place the tobacco with the pollen and the corn meal and to remember that these three were always to be together, and to be used in making prayers.

Now they were told that they were to give life to an animal whose flesh they were going to use for food. Tsichtinako named this animal as Ba'shya (kangaroo mouse) and also taught them the first song to be sung to animals. She told them to sing this song in order to make the images alive, and pointed out the images to them in the basket.

They did everything as they were taught. They sang the song to the image and with the word, "Come to life, Bashya," it came to life. As it did so it asked, "Why have I come to life?" Tsichtinako told it not to ask any questions because, "It is you that is going to give life to other life." After this was done, Nautsiti and Iatiku, told this animal that it was going to live on the ground and said to it, "Go now and increase." After the animal increased, Tsichtinako told the sisters to kill one of the animals. "Now eat the two together, the corn and the field mouse, and also the salt to see how it tastes." She had already told them never to let out the fire which had been given to them. They acted according to Tsichtinako's instructions. They roasted their corn and roasted the flesh of the field mouse with some salt on it. After it was cooked, Tsichtinako told them to pray with the food, not with all of it, but with little pieces from each—corn, flesh, and salt. Each sister did this and prayed to Uchtsiti, the creator of the world, who lives up in the fourth sky. Tsichtinako told them they were to do this always before eating. After this they ate the food. There was not very much of the meat, but it was good. They did not know that there were to be bones but these were not hard and they broke them with their teeth. They liked the flesh so well that they asked Tsichtinako if they might have something larger that would yield more flesh. Tsichtinako answered that they would find other things in their baskets. They went back to them, and Tsichtinako said they would find Tsū'na (rat) and another animal Katsa (mole) and also Nite (prairie dog). "Go, make these images alive," said Tsichtinako, pointing them out according to their names. They were to do this in the same way as with Bashya. Tsichtinako also told them that these animals were to be used as food and that they must tell each of these animals to live in the ground because as yet there was no shade on earth to live in. "But before you give life to them," said Tsichtinako, "it is necessary that you plant seeds of grass which will be the food for them." Tsichtinako pointed out the seeds they were to plant, and they took the seeds of the grasses and scattered them first to the North, next to the West, then some to the South, and then to the East. And immediately grass covered the ground. They then took the images and prayed to the cardinal points, and, according to the instructions of Tsichtinako, gave life to all of these animals, giving them names as they came to life. Each one as it came to life asked why it had come to life but Tsichtinako told them not to ask questions, that they would give life to other life. As before, the sisters told the animals to increase. After all of this was done, they proceeded to eat the new animals after praying with them, doing just as they did before. The two sisters were now very happy, they had plenty and some to spare. "It is not yet time for the larger animals to be given life," said Tsichtinako, "first the world must have sufficient plants and small animals to feed them."

After a long time, Tsichtinako spoke to them, "What we are going to do now concerns the earth. We are going to make the mountains." She told them to remember the words she was going to say. They were to say, "Kaweshtima kōti (North Mountain), appear in the north, and we will always know you to be in that direction." Tsichtinako also pointed out an article in the basket that she named ya'ōni (stone) and instructed them to throw the stone to the North direction as they spoke the words. When they did so, a big mountain appeared in the North. After they had done this, Tsichtinako instructed them to do the same thing in the West, but to name this mountain Tsipīna koti, and in the South, naming it Da'ōtyuma koti, and in the East, naming it G'ūchana koti.

After all this was done, Tsichtinako spoke again and told them, "Now that you have all the mountains around you with plains, mesas, and canyons, you must make the growing things of these places." Tsichtinako told them to go back to the trees which they had planted underground, lakhok, geietsu, wanuka, and lanye. She told them to take the seeds from these trees, and they did so. Following her instructions they spread some to each of the four directions, naming the mountains in each direction, and saying, "Grow in North Mountain, grow in West Mountain, etc." Tsichtinako said to them, "These are going to be tall trees; from them you will get logs. Later you will build houses and will use these." They asked if that was all that was going to grow on the mountains, and Tsichtinako said, "No, there are many other seeds left in your baskets. You have seeds of trees which are going to yield food. You will find dyai'its (pinon tree), sē'isha (kind of cedar), hapani (oak, acorn) and maka'yawi (walnut)." She again instructed them what to do and taught them the prayer to use, which was, "From now on, grow in this mountain and yield fruit which will be used as food. Your places are to be in the mountains. You will grow and be useful." When everything had been done well, Tsichtinako told (them) that there were many smaller seeds left in the baskets and she gave a name to each, telling them to fill the rest of the land. These seeds were planted on every one of the four mountains and in the rest of the world. Tsichtinako spoke to the sisters again and told them, "You still have seeds in your baskets which you will know as scuts'ōibewi (wild fruits). These trees you will grow around you and care for." But they mistook the instructions and instead of instructing them to grow nearby, they named the mountains, and that is where they grew. But there were also some that grew close around. It is not known how long they had to wait for these things to happen, but it was a very long time. They noticed that the wild plants grew very fast and produced much fruit, but Tsichtinako had not told them whether or not to eat these, so they left them alone.

They saw that there were still seeds and images in their baskets, and asked Tsichtinako how many more kinds there were. Tsichtinako, said there were yet many other seeds which would also be important food. They would grow quickly and easily and she named them squash and beans. They were instructed to act with them as with the other seeds, and these also grew into plants. After a time, when they were ripe, Tsichtinako pointed out the parts of the plants which they, were to use as food.

Iatiku later asked Tsichtinako, "What remains in my basket?" and she was answered, "You have still many animals; these will be multiplied to populate the mountains." And as the two grew larger, they required more food. Tsichtinako saw this and told them that they were now to bring to life larger animals. She said they would find in their baskets cottontails, jack rabbits, antelope, and water deer. They were told to give life to these animals and to send them into the open plains. Everything was done as before, and when they killed the animals for food they were always careful to pray to their father as before. As they again asked Tsichtinako what remained in their baskets, Tsichtinako said, "You have images of the still bigger game. You will find deer, elk, mountain sheep, and bison." Iatiku asked where these animals were to be told to live and Tsichtinako told them that the elk and deer were to live in the lower mountains and the mountain sheep higher and in the rougher places. The bison, however, were to live on the plains. They followed the instructions and gave life to these animals and told them to go to these places to live and multiply. They again tried all these different animals for food. Their flesh was very good and always they prayed to Uchtsiti before tasting them.

In Nautsiti's basket there were many more things left than in Iatiku's. Nautsiti was selfish and hoarded her images, but Iatiku was ready to let her seeds and images be used. She was more interested in seeing things grow. They again asked what remained, and Tsichtinako replied, "You will find lion, wolf, wildcat and bear. These are strong beasts; they are going to use as food the same game that you also use. There is now game enough for them." When all these had been selected they were brought to life in the same manner as before.

The sisters again asked what was in their baskets, and they were told, "You will find birds which will fly in the air. These birds will also use small game for their food. You will find in the basket the eagles and the hawks." Tsichtinako pointed these out to them and they brought them to life. The birds flew up into the high mountains and over the plains. The sisters told the birds to use small game for food, and again Iatiku asked what was in the basket. Tsichtinako pointed out smaller birds which would populate the country, each living in a different kind of region. They were then given life, as the animals before them. The birds were of many and bright colors, some were blue. The wild turkey was among them and they were instructed to tell it not to fly easily like the others. They were told to tell these birds that their food was to be the different seeds on the mountains and the plains. And all these, animals were sampled for food after they had been given life. Again Iatiku asked what remained in the baskets, because she found things there that were thorny. Tsichtinako told them their names. They were the various cacti and were said to be very good for food. But Tsichtinako explained that most were intended for animals to eat. All these were planted as before and tried for food, and they found that some tasted good. After they asked again what was left, Tsichtinako pointed out to them that there were still fish, water snakes, and turtles, of which there were many kinds of each. They gave life to them as before and told them all to live in the water as instructed. Tsichtinako pointed out several that were to be used for food. They tried them all for food, and they found that some were good, and others poor, but offered prayers to all and gave thanks to Uchtsiti. So it happened that many animals came alive in the world and they all increased.

ALABAMA

---

ORIGIN OF THE ALABAMA INDIANS

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Swanton, John R. Myths and Tales of the Southeastern Indians. Smithsonian Institution, Bureau of American Ethnology, Bulletin 88. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1929, 118–121.

Date: 1929

Original Source: Alabama

National Origin: Native American

---

Initially, the following narrative has traits of myth in its motifs of migration across a great ocean and the invention of weapons and the means to make fire. For the most part, however, plausible events are set in the historical past leading to the tale's classification as a legend. Actual events and names are used in the narrative. The Alabama and the Coushatti with whom they eventually became affiliated were members of the Creek Confederacy in what eventually became Alabama. At this time in their history, they fought the Choctaw mentioned in the "Origin of the Alabama Indians." The berdache mentioned in the narrative was a male transvestite who acted socially as a woman; the role was neither uncommon nor maligned in many Native American cultures. By the early nineteenth century, they had moved to Texas and established several villages, the most prominent of which was Peach Tree Village, where they relied primarily on hunting and gathering and horticulture. The episode in which the Alabama befriended and fed white refugees seems based on the "Runaway Scrape" and other events of the Texas Revolution of 1836.

---

Formerly the ocean was not as large as it is today, and at that time the Alabama Indians, who lived upon the other side, came westward across it in canoes. When they had gotten about halfway over they came upon an island where they rested and fished. Then they resumed their journey and presently reached this land.

At first they lived upon acorns, and they also roasted and ate cane sprouts. Later they made bows and arrows with which to kill deer, and having nothing with which to cut up the meat they used sharp rocks. They also had to learn how to kindle a fire. To accomplish this they used as a drill the stem of a weed called “plant-with-which-to-make-fire” which is like sassafras and the wood of a tree called bass for a base stick.

Traveling inland, they established their village near a river and lived there for a long time. Presently they came in contact with the Choctaw and warred against them, almost destroying one Choctaw town, so that the Choctaw became disheartened and wanted to make peace. For this purpose they selected a poor man, promising that, if he were successful, they would give him the two daughters of a certain prominent woman. They gave him a white deerskin shirt and white deerskin leggings and moccasins, put a string of white beads about his neck and a rattle in his hand.

Thus provided, the man crossed to the first Alabama village shaking his rattle and singing as he went. When the Alabama heard him they came out, took hold of him, and accompanied him back. On coming near the town they raised him on their backs and entered the place in this manner, singing continually. They set him down and he talked to them for a long time, laying down one string of white beads as he did so. Then he set out for another village, accompanied as before. On the way one of them seized a gun and shot under him. Another ran toward him and discharged a gun near his ear. At the next village he made another long talk and laid out a second string of white beads. He did the same at the third village. Then he returned to his people and they gave him the girls as they had promised, but soon afterwards he lay down and died.

One summer a man said he wanted to go west and several wished to accompany him, but a berdache (“half-man”) tried to stop them. “Why are you going?” he said. “I am going in order to kill and eat turkey, deer, and other game animals; after that I will return.”

“There are plenty of turkey and deer here,” said the berdache, but the other persisted in his plan and after they had disputed for some time the berdache said, “You are a man but you want to run away. I will not run. I will not run, although my grandfather used to say that the English, Álâta, and French are all hard fighters. When they come, I will take a knife, lie down under the bed, and keep striking at them until they kill me.”

Nevertheless the man and his friends started off. They came to a river, made canoes, and proceeded along it a great distance until they finally reached a Choctaw settlement. They stopped for a while, thinking that these people were friends, but presently they observed that they were making arrows, so they became frightened and reentered their canoes.

Following the river, they came upon many bear swimming across and some wanted to kill them, but others said, "Don't shoot," and they kept on. Presently they heard the sound of firearms behind and said to one another, "People are following us." Not long afterwards they came upon a creek emptying into the river, its mouth almost obscured by canes, and they shoved their canoes into it and waited. After a while they heard the Choctaw canoes pass on up, so they remained where they were all that night. When it was nearly day they heard the sound of returning paddles and after they had died away they continued their journey.

After they had gone on for some time the Alabama came to the house of a white man. He exchanged corn for venison and told them that the route by the river which they had intended to take was very long, so he tied oxen to their canoes and dragged them across a narrow place. Then they paddled along for some time and reached a trading house belonging to a white blacksmith. They procured from him old knives and axes in exchange for venison. Some Choctaw lived there who said to them, "There is no war here. There is peace. We are friends of the Alabama." Afterwards, however, some of both tribes got drunk on whisky obtained at the store and wanted to fight. But the Alabama who had remained sober took their friends down to the canoes, put them in, and started along.

As they pushed off the Choctaw stood near the shore and shot at them until they got out into the middle of the river. Later they went back to the store and found that the Choctaw were all gone, so they had the blacksmith make knives for them and sharpen their old axes.

The white people came from the other side of the ocean long after the Alabama had crossed and tried to buy land from them. They would get the Indians drunk, and when they had become sober they would find bags of money hung to their necks in payment for land. It was after they had sold their lands in this way that they came westward.

After leaving the blacksmith the Alabama came to Bayou Boeuf. Later they moved to Opelousas, Louisiana, and still later to Tyler County, Texas. Afterwards they settled Peach-tree village. There were many Alabama at that time and they separated into a number of villages. One was north of North Woodville and was called "Cane Island" and afterwards simply island, because some canes were found near the creek. They were living in these towns when the Mexican War broke out.

When the Mexicans were here the white men came and built a town, putting up stores. After a while they heard that the Mexicans and whites were coming to fight with each other, and the people all ran off. They left their stores and went away. While they were moving on without stopping, it rained and the white girls walked along with their dresses half soaked. Some were weeping. Continuing on in this way they passed through Peach-tree village. Some of them were perishing with hunger and asked the Indians for food. Then they gave them milk, but instead of drinking it they gave it to the children.

Just after the whites had left, the Mexicans came to this town, and their soldiers opened the stores which they had abandoned and used the goods. By and by they wanted to cross a big river there and threw bales of cotton into the water and crossed upon them. When they got over they found that the Indians had a camp on this side. They did not like them and wanted to kill them. But instead of killing them they drove them back and made them stay on the other side of the river. The Indians walked while two Mexicans rode on each horse.

After that the white people came to fight. Some of them went round the town and broke down a bridge over a bad creek, so that when the Mexicans arrived they could not cross and all were killed.

Their general Santa Anna, escaped alone on his horse. He fell down in a swampy place but got up and ran on and lay down in a thicket. While he lay there two deer whistled, and the whites came up and captured him. Then they demanded his land of him, and he left the people, got into a boat, and went away.

Another party of whites reached that town and the Mexicans all ran off. Some Mexicans who were drunk remained walking about holding each other up, and the whites throw them down and stabbed them. When the Mexicans ran off they had just been cooking and left earthen pots full of peas mixed with red peppers on the fire. When the white men saw the Indians there they recognized them and had them recross the river. "Hang up something white and stay by it," they said, "lest those coming after us make trouble." So they hung up a white cloth and remained by it.

RABBIT KILLS BIG MAN-EATER

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Swanton, John R. Myths and Tales of the Southeastern Indians. Smithsonian Institution, Bureau of American Ethnology, Bulletin 88. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1929, 161.

Date: 1929

Original Source: Alabama

National Origin: Native American

---

Big Man-eater appears in a number of traditional tales from the Native American Southeast. The cannibal figure strikes at a particularly fearful element in the human psyche and is found in such widely dispersed forms as the Windigo figure of the subarctic, the giant at the top of Jack's beanstalk (see "Jack and the Bean-Pole," page 189), Hansel and Gretel's witch, and the Fire Dragaman of the southern highlands ("Jack and the Fire Dragaman," page 236). Rabbit exercises his deceptions in this narrative to play the role of culture hero, the life-enhancing persona of trickster. Although the culture hero brings technology and social order in many traditions, his role as monster slayer who cleanses the natural order making the universe safe for humanity is well-represented as well. In typical fashion, rabbit changes shapes and even gender to gain the advantage over his monstrous adversary.

---

Big Man-eater lived with his wife at a certain place and wanted to kill human beings. People heard of it and said, “They want to kill us,” and all were afraid.

Then Rabbit said, “Give me an old dress,” and they gave it to him. He said, “Give me an old blanket,” and they gave that to him. Then he put on the dress, wrapped up his head in the old blanket, and started off.

When he reached the place and stood in the yard Big Man-eater’s wife saw him and came out, and asked who he was. “I am your youngest aunt who has traveled to this place,” he said. “Come in,” said Big Man-eater’s wife, so he started to go in. “Sit down,” she said, and down he sat. Then they gave the supposed aunt some hard deer meat to eat, but he said, “I can’t eat that, because I have no teeth. I need a hatchet, for I can’t eat that [as it is].” So they gave him a hatchet and he chopped the dry venison into small pieces and ate them. Then he said, “That is the way I always eat it.”

Now Big Man-eater lay down but the two women sat still by the fire. Rabbit said to Big Man-eater’s wife, “When your husband is asleep what kind of noise does he make?”

“When he is not sleeping very soundly he makes a noise like ‘sololon sololon.’ When he makes a noise like ‘soloñ soloñ’ he is very sound asleep.”

“I will stay all night with you; in the morning I will start on,” said Rabbit. So Big Man-eater’s wife lay down and Rabbit lay down close to the fire. As he lay there he listened to the noises Big Man-eater was making. Then he slept and made a noise like “sololon sololon.” After some time he made a noise like “soloñ soloñ.” Then Rabbit took the hatchet and, after he had sat close to Big Man-eater for a while listening, he struck him with it in the neck and cut his head off. Then he threw off his old dress and blanket, shouted, jumped up and down several times, went out of the house, and ran off.

RABBIT AND BIG MAN-EATER

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Swanton, John R. Myths and Tales of the Southeastern Indians. Smithsonian Institution, Bureau of American Ethnology, Bulletin 88. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1929, 160.

Date: 1929

Original Source: Alabama

National Origin: Native American

---

The following myth is another in the cycle of adventures of rabbit and Big Man-eater (see the introductory remarks to the preceding narrative “Rabbit Kills Big Man-eater”).

---

Big Man-eater traveled along until he came to a town where he killed and ate all of the people. On the way to another town he met Rabbit, who said, “At this town all the people have run off. I kill and eat people and here are their bones.” When he met Big Man-eater he carried over his shoulder a child with a stick run through it. Then they sat down beside the trail to defecate. Both shut their eyes, and when they defecated Big Man-eater evacuated bones while Rabbit passed only grass. Rabbit opened his eyes, picked up Big Man-eater’s excrement and put it under himself and took his own and placed it under Big Man-eater. When both finally opened their eyes, Big Man-eater said, “I never passed anything like this before.” The next time both defecated with their eyes open and Rabbit passed nothing but grass while Big Man-eater defecated bones.

After that they struck up a friendship. Rabbit said, “Let us go to Tree-falling-down Camp.” So they set out. When they arrived Rabbit said, “Wait right here while I hunt for a good camping place.” He went on until he saw a tree that shook and was ready to fall, when he called his companion. “Over here there is a good place,” he said and Big Man-eater went there.

When night came, both lay down, and, while Big Man-eater slept, Rabbit awoke and pushed the tree down upon him. Then he threw small limbs upon himself and made a noise as if he had been hurt. Big Man-eater pushed the tree away and woke up. “This camp is always like that,” said Rabbit.

Next time Rabbit said, “Let us go to Ashes-thrown-on Camp,” and they started off. When they got there and had made camp Rabbit picked up a quantity of wood, kindled it, and made a big fire. But after the two had lain down Rabbit awoke, gathered up a lot of hot ashes on some bark with which he had provided himself, and threw them on Big Man-eater. On himself he threw cold ashes. Big Man-eater was badly hurt.

In the morning Rabbit said, “Let us go to Jumping-bluff Creek,” and they started on. After they had traveled for a while they reached the place and went down the creek. “Let us jump across it and back four times,” said Rabbit. Rabbit jumped first four times. When Big Man-eater prepared to jump Rabbit held for him the bag he was carrying. Before Big Man-eater had jumped four times he fell from the bluff into the water. The water rose and Big Man-eater went down into it. “My friend is gone; he is going far out into the sea,” said Rabbit. Rabbit, however, took Big Man-eater’s bag and started home.

ALEUT

---

THE WOMAN WHO WAS FOND OF INTESTINES

Tradition Bearer: Mrs. C. A. Anderson

Source: Golder, F. A. "Aleutian Stories." Journal of American Folklore 18 (1905): 215–220.

Date: 1905

Original Source: Aleut

National Origin: Native American

---

Historically, law among the Inuit (or Eskimo), Aleuts, and many other societies was customary law; it rested on custom, tradition, and taboo. The society at large would not move to settle grievances, rather it was the parties involved who sought justice. Just as the society would not act to ensure justice, neither would it come between disputants. In the case of murder, the family of the victim sought revenge, as in the following narrative. While the avengers in this tale use supernatural power to convert themselves into wild animals, the major focus of the plot is on social justice for the wronged wife.

---

Once there lived an Aleut with his wife and little boy. The wife was very fond of intestines, and early each morning the husband would go out in his bidark (kayak) hunting, and return in the evening with a boat full of intestines which he gave to his wife, telling her to keep what she wanted for herself, and distribute the rest among her neighbors.

The wife was somewhat puzzled by the husband's actions; she could not understand why he went so early in the morning, where he got so many intestines, or his reasons for wishing to have them distributed among the villagers.

She, of course, did not know that her husband had a mistress in the village whom he went to see while his wife was asleep, and that he desired the intestines distributed in order that his wife's rival might have a share.

All of a sudden, without explanations, the man ceased going out early, and when he did go, he came back but lightly loaded. This did not in the least clear up the mystery to the wife. But one day, when he had gone somewhat later than usually, his mistress called on his wife, whom she found busy sewing a kamalayka [waterproof shirt] out of the intestines her husband brought. The two got into a conversation, and, among other questions, the mistress asked, "Does your husband love you?"

"Yes."

"Do you love him?"

"Yes."

"Do you know where he gets all the intestines?"

"No."

"Can you guess why he has them distributed over the village?"

"No."

"I will tell you," said the mistress, "but you must not tell him I told you. Every day your husband goes to the village where your parents and relatives live and where you lived before your marriage, and kills the people there and brings their intestines to you. Yesterday there were but five people remaining in the village: your mother, your two sisters, and two brothers. He killed your mother and sisters yesterday, and today he went to bring the intestines of your brothers. He is in love with another woman of this village, whom he visits nightly when you have fallen asleep."

With this parting shot she left the house, leaving the poor wife weeping so bitterly that the kamalayka was hot from her tears. For the rest of the day she did not stir from the house, but sat lamenting and sewing. Towards evening her little boy rushed in announcing the approach of his father, which she generally anticipated with pleasure, and always went down to the beach to meet him; but this time she neither answered nor made the least motion. A few minutes later the little son came again saying, "Father is here," but all the reply he got was a new outburst of weeping.

Missing the usual meeting and greeting of his wife, the father asked the little boy where his mother was, and when told of the state she was in, he hastened to the house, where he found her on the floor shedding bitter tears and sewing the kamalayka.

"Why do you weep? has some one offended you?"

"No one has offended me."

"Why then this lamentation?"

"I was thinking of my mother, sisters, and brothers, and my other relatives in my native village, and I wondered how they were getting along, and this made me weep."

He did not attempt to cheer her, but after a pause he said, "I did not kill many animals today—two only."

This enraged her so that she jumped up from the floor, picked up the little boy, who was near her, and threw him at him, saying, "If my two brothers do not satisfy you, take him also." The boy's forehead came in contact with the edge of a sharp knife on the father's breast, making quite a gash from which the blood flowed freely. This the mother noticed before escaping out of the house.

Putting aside the boy, the man made a dash for the woman, but she got out of his reach, and being the better runner of the two he did not succeed in laying hands on her. She would let him come up quite close to her, and then dash away again until he saw the hopelessness of the chase and gave it up.

In a short time the boy's wound healed, but it left a very noticeable scar. Now that his mother was gone, his father placed him in the care of his sister, with instructions that he should under no circumstances be allowed to go very far from home. In this manner he passed a few years longer, until he became the proud possessor of a bow and arrows, with which he often amused himself.

One day, while indulging in his favorite sport, he began to wonder why his father and aunt forbade his going far from the house; and the more he thought about it the more anxious did he become to go, until he finally concluded "to go just a little distance beyond that hill to see what is there." On the way he noticed a hillock just ahead of him, at which he discharged his arrow, then ran and got it, aimed at another and another, and became so absorbed in this amusement that he did not observe how far from home it was taking him.

One hillock somewhat different from the others especially attracted his attention as offering a good mark. He took aim and sent his arrow flying right into the center of it; but what was his surprise on approaching the supposed hillock to discover that it was a barrabara [dwelling], and that the arrow had gone inside through the hole in the top. When he peeped in, he was frightened at the sight of a very wild-looking woman who stared at him, and he began to cry.

"Why do you cry?" the woman asked.

"I want my arrow."

"Come in and get it," the woman invited. But he was too scared to do that; he however got up courage enough to stick his foot in, hoping to draw it out that way, and he had nearly succeeded when he heard the woman move. At this he ran away in tears.

The woman called him back, saying, "Do not be afraid of me. I am your mother. It is I who threw you at your father, making the scar on your forehead. Come in, I will not harm you." When he saw that it was really his mother, he went to her and remained with her two days. During that time she told him his father's wicked deeds, how he mistreated and neglected her for another, and finally wrought on him so that he swore he would revenge her wrongs. She bade him go home, but attempt nothing for the present, and make no mention of what he had seen and heard.

During the boy's absence the father was away hunting, but the aunt was quite worked up over the long absence, and ran about the fields looking for him. When he returned she asked him all sorts of questions as to his whereabouts, but all the satisfaction she got from him was that he had lost his way and could not get back. She offered him food, which he refused to touch, and finally refused to answer her when spoken to.

Toward evening of the same day his father returned, and, when told that the boy would neither eat nor drink, asked what was the matter with him; but for an answer the boy turned his back on him and went to sleep. The father then inquired of the aunt whether anything unusual had occurred and whether the boy had been far from home, and to all this she replied that all during his (father's) absence the boy's life had gone on as ordinarily, and that he was not out of sight of the house the whole time.

As the boy grew older he avoided his father more and more, and when he reached early manhood the father lost control over him and actually feared him. One day, while the older man was away hunting, the young man took his bow and arrows, some food and water, and set out to see his mother. Before going, he told his aunt that he intended going quite a distance from home, and not to be, therefore, uneasy over his long absence. He went to the place where he had last seen his mother, and, as she was not there, he wandered on until on the following day he came in sight of some barrabaras [native dwellings] and two men. They answered him when he spoke to them, but when he wished to enter into one of the barrabaras they barred his way. While they were thus disputing, his mother appeared on the scene and motioned to the men to let him pass.

When he came inside he was greatly surprised at the quantity of furs that was lying about in great disorder, and at the abundance of meats and other eatables that he found there. He was certain he had never seen anything like it before. After eating, his mother told him to spend the night there, and in the morning take as many of the best furs as he could carry and go back to the village of his father, in order to tempt him and his relatives to come hunting in this neighborhood, which would offer an opportunity to repay him for what he had done. The boy did as he was told, took with him a heavy load of precious furs, and started back.

In his absence, the mother and the people with whom she was living made elaborate and crafty preparations for the reception of the expected guests. In the large barrabara, where the feasts and dances were always held and where visitors were generally received, quantities of oil were sprinkled about and covered up with grass. Along the walls seal-bladders full of oil were concealed, and screened with straw mats. And in this place the visitors were to be received. The young man's father was home on his return, and received the present of furs which his son made him with much pleasure, for the boy seemed so kindly disposed that the father hoped that his natural affection for his parent had returned. He inquired the whereabouts of the hunting grounds where the son had secured these skins, and the latter told him that it was not very far, and that it was very rich, and that he planned to go back the next day to the same place, and if he and his men cared to accompany him, he would be glad to show them the way. His offer was accepted, and the following morning a large party left the village for the hunting ground. Some of the people of the mother's village had been on the look-out, and when they saw the large party approaching, they changed themselves into wild beasts: bears, wolves, foxes, etc. The hunters marked them and shot at them, but it had no other result than to drive the beasts nearer and nearer to the village. These tactics the men-beasts repeated until the hunters were decoyed into the village. Seeing so many barrabaras, the men asked the boy who the people were that lived in them.

"They are friendly people," he replied, "with whom I spent the night the last time I was in this neighborhood. Tomorrow morning we will go to the other side of the village, where there is a great deal of game."

The people of the village greeted them very cordially, and assigned a place for the night to each one of them; the father and son were given the barrabara where the latter had been entertained on his previous visit. Although the mother was in the same room with them they were not aware of it, for she had concealed herself. Everywhere about them were scattered the richest furs, and the food before them was the choicest and best, and so much of it that it rather made the older man uneasy, for, though an old hunter, he had never seen anything like it before.

In the evening all the people of the village, including the guests, went to the large dance-hall, where the formal reception was held and the guests entertained as was customary. One by one they descended through the hole in the roof, the only entrance there was. The interior was lighted up by two rows of stone lamps filled with oil, and grass wicks. On one side of the room sat the local men, while the visitors faced them from the other; the center was occupied by the women, and on the two sides sat seven or eight men with drums in their hands, on which they played and accompanied their singing. They would take turns; first the local men would sing their local songs, and then the visitors sang theirs. To this music the women danced with men whom they invited from either side.

Everything moved along smoothly and joyfully until the father recognized his wife among the women. She was dancing and moving towards him. At this sight he turned pale and looked for away to get out, but the ladder had been removed. The woman moved up to him, grasped his hand, and dragged him to dance, but he resisted. The boy, who sat near, urged him and pushed him on, but all in vain.

Then the woman began to sing him a song in which she went over all his misdeeds, his unfaithfulness, his cruelties, his falsehoods, as well as many of his other shortcomings, and concluded with these words, "You and your men shall never leave this place alive."

When she had said this, all the local people, including the mother and son, were turned into birds or flying insects and flew out through the hole in the roof. The visitors, unable to follow them, remained behind.

On the outside grass and wood were ignited and thrown in, which set on fire the grass and oil inside. Then the smoke hole was stopped up, and in this way all those who were inside were smothered to death. A few days later the son went to his father's village, destroying it as completely as his father had destroyed his mother's. He spared, however, his aunt, whom he brought back with him.

APACHE

---

ORIGIN OF THE APACHES

Tradition Bearer: Laforia

Source: Russell, Frank. "Myths of the Jicarilla Apaches." Journal of American Folklore 11 (1898): 253–254.

Date: ca. 1898

Original Source: Jicarilla Apache (New Mexico)

National Origin: Native American

---

Although this narrative references physical features of the Jicarilla world and the deification of wind, the primary concern of this narrative is on human relations, ranging from the evil caused by witchcraft to the scattering of the original people into the various Apache bands and the distinct languages associated with each. The emergence of the people from an underground world may result from the influence of the neighboring Pueblo cultures (compare this myth to "Origin of Acoma," page 3).

---

In the under-world, Un-go-ya-yen-ni, there was no sun, moon, or light of any kind, except that emanating from large eagle feathers which the people carried about with them. This method of lighting proved unsatisfactory, and the head men of the tribe gathered in council to devise some plan for lighting the world more brightly.

One of the chiefs suggested that they make a sun and a moon. A great disk of yellow paint was made upon the ground, and then placed in the sky. Although this miniature creation was too small to give much light, it was allowed to make one circuit of the heavens ere it was taken down and made larger. Four times the sun set and rose, and four times it was enlarged, before it was "as large as the earth and gave plenty of light."

In the underworld dwelt a wizard and a witch, who were much incensed at man's presumption, and made such attempts to destroy the new luminaries that both the sun and the moon fled from the lower world, leaving it again in darkness, and made their escape to this earth, where they have never been molested, so that, until the present time, they continue to shine by night and by day.

The loss of the sun and moon brought the people together, that they might take council concerning the means of restoring the lost light. Long they danced and sang, and made medicine. At length it was decided that they should go in search of the sun.

The Indian medicine-men caused four mountains to spring up, which grew by night with great noise, and rested by day. The mountains increased in size until the fourth night, when they nearly reached the sky.

Four boys were sent to seek the cause of the failure of the mountains to reach the opening in the sky, through which the sun and moon had disappeared. The boys followed the tracks of two girls who had caused the mountains to stop growing, until they reached some burrows in the side of the mountain, where all trace of the two females disappeared.

When their story was told to the people, the medicine-men said, "You who have injured us shall be transformed into rabbits, that you may be of some use to mankind; your bodies shall be eaten," and the rabbit has been used for food by the human race down to the present day.

All then journeyed to the tops of the mountains, where a ladder was built which reached the aperture in the sky or roof of the under-world. The badger was then sent out to explore the earth above; the messenger soon returned, and reported water everywhere except around the margin of the opening. The legs of the badger were covered with mud, which accounts for their dark color at the present day. Four days later, the turkey was sent to see if the waters had subsided. The turkey reported no land yet to be seen above. As the turkey came in contact with the foam of the flood surrounding the opening, his tail became wet and heavy; in shaking this he scattered filmy drops upon his wings, and that is why the feathers of the turkey to the present day present an iridescent play of colors.

Then the Wind came to the anxious people and said, "If you will ask me to help you, I will drive back the water for you." Thus the first prayers came to be addressed to the Wind, which yet remains a powerful deity.

When the Wind had rolled back the waters to the limits of the present ocean, the Indians began to ascend the ladder; four times the ladder broke with them, and four times it was replaced by a new one.

All the people reached the new world except one old woman, too old and infirm to climb the ladder, who said to them, "I do not wish to leave the land of my youth. Go your way and leave me here; you will come back to join me when you die. You have forgotten one thing; you will soon discover what it is."

For four days after their emergence no one could sleep; then the people remembered the warning of the old woman, and two boys were sent down to the under-world to learn what it was that had been forgotten.

The old woman said in reply to their question, “You forgot to take lice with you; without them you cannot sleep.” She took two black ones from her hair and two white ones from her body, saying, “These will be all you will need, for they will increase night and day.” So it has happened that the Apaches sleep well to this day because they harbor these parasites upon their bodies.

So well had the Wind performed his task of drying up the waters, that none remained for the people to drink; but prayers addressed to that deity were answered by the appearance of the present springs and rivers. The few lakes that occur in the Apache country are remnants of the primeval ocean. All the inhabitants of the earth were then Apaches, but the Cheyennes and Utes were soon created from willows.

The supreme god, Yi-na-yes-gon-i, directed the people westward; as they journeyed, small parties became separated, and settled by the wayside. These were given different names and languages.

ORIGIN OF FIRE

Tradition Bearer: Laforia

Source: Russell, Frank. “Myths of the Jicarilla Apaches.” Journal of American Folklore 11 (1898): 261–262.

Date: ca. 1898

Original Source: Jicarilla Apache (New Mexico)

National Origin: Native American

---

Fox is given the role of culture hero in the following myth. In contrast to some manifestations of the culture hero, the fox maintains more of the qualities of trickster. He tries to acquire the cry and flying ability of the geese, but he is unable to exercise sufficient restraint to do so. This inventiveness, coupled with deceit fueled by curiosity that is a cross-cultural combination in trickster figures, allows him to successfully steal fire. His theft, however, seems little more than a prank, particularly in contrast to other mythological fire-stealers such as the Greek Prometheus.

---

At that early day the trees could talk, but the people could not burn them, as they were without fire. Fire was at length obtained through the instrumentality of the Fox.

One day Fox went to visit the geese whose cry he wished to learn. They promised to teach him, but it would be necessary for him to accompany them in their flights, in order to receive instruction. They gave him wings with which to fly, but cautioned him not to open his eyes while using them.

When the geese rose in flight Fox flew with them. As darkness came on, they passed over the enclosure where the fire-flies lived. Some gleams from their flickering fires penetrated the eyelids of Fox, causing him to open his eyes.

His wings at once failed to support him, and he fell within the walls of the corral in which were pitched the tents of the fireflies. Two flies went to see the fallen Fox, who gave each a necklace of juniper berries to induce them to tell him where he could pass the wall which surrounded them.

The fireflies showed Fox a cedar tree which would bend down at command and assist any one to pass over the wall. In the evening Fox went to the spring where the fireflies obtained water, and found colored earths suitable for paint, with which he gave himself a coat of white.

Returning to the camp, he told the fireflies that they ought to have a feast; they should dance and make merry, and he would give them a new musical instrument. They agreed to his proposal, and gathered wood for a great camp-fire, which they ignited by their own glow.

Before the ceremonies began, Fox tied shreds of cedar bark to his tail, and then made a drum, the first ever constructed, which he beat for some time. Tired of beating the drum, he gave it to one of the fireflies and moved nearer the fire, into which he thrust his tail, in opposition to the advice of those about him, who said it would surely burn.

“I am a medicine-man,” said Fox, “and my tail will not burn.” However, he kept a close watch upon it, and when the bark was burning well he said, “It is too warm for me here; stand aside and let me go where it is cooler.”

Fox ran away with tail blazing, followed by the fireflies, who cried, “Stop, you do not know the road; come back.”

Straight to the cedar tree Fox ran, and called, “Bend down to me, my tree, bend down.” The tree lifted him out of the enclosure, and on he ran, still pursued by the fire-flies. As he passed along, the brush and wood on either side was ignited by the sparks which fell from the burning cedar, and fire was widely spread over the earth.

Fox became fatigued from running, and gave the firebrand to the hawk, which carried it on, and finally delivered it to the brown crane. This bird flew far southward, but not so far but that one tree was not reached, and it will not burn to this day.

The fireflies pursued Fox to his burrow and informed him that, as punishment for having stolen fire from them and spread it abroad over the land, he should never be permitted to use it himself.

TALES OF FOX

Tradition Bearer: Laforia

Source: Russell, Frank. "Myths of the Jicarilla Apaches." Journal of American Folklore 11 (1898): 265–268.

Date: ca. 1898

Original Source: Jicarilla Apache (New Mexico)

National Origin: Native American

---

Fox is the Jicarilla trickster. His reputation as a trickster with potentially fatal weaknesses precedes him, leading both deer and rabbit to exploit his foolish nature. The cruel results of their pranks may seem unmotivated, but practical jokes with sadistic results are common in trickster tales. So, too, are explanations of features such as the fox's characteristic cry and eye color. "Fox and Kingfisher" portrays coyote trying to play the host in an episode reminiscent of "The Coyote and the Woodpecker" (page 110). Fox's invitations and imitations, in that episode and in "Fox and Mountain Lion," are motivated more by the desire to impress than to be hospitable. The final "tar baby" episode is only the most obvious of many borrowed features in the tale.

---

Fox and Deer

As Fox was going along he met a Deer with two spotted fawns beside her. "What have you done," said he, "to make your children spotted like that?"

"I made a big fire of cedar wood and placed them before it. The sparks thrown off burned the spots which you see," answered the Deer.

Fox was pleased with the color of the fawns, so he went home and told his children to gather cedar wood for a large fire. When the fire was burning well, he put the young foxes in a row before the fire, as he supposed the Deer had done. When he found that they did not change color, he pushed them into the fire and covered them with ashes, thinking he had not applied sufficient heat at first.

As the fire went out, he saw their white teeth gleaming where the skin had shriveled away and exposed them. "Ah, you will be very pretty now," said he. Fox pulled his offspring from the ashes, expecting to find them much changed in color, and so they were—black, shriveled, and dead.

Fox next thought of revenge upon the Deer, which he found in a grove of cottonwoods. He built a fire around them, but they ran through it and escaped. Fox was so disappointed that he set up a cry of woe, a means of expression which he has retained from that day to this.

Fox and Kingfisher

As Fox went on his way he met Kingfisher, whom he accompanied to his home. Kingfisher said that he had no food to offer his visitor, so he would go and catch some fish for Fox. He broke through six inches of ice on the river and caught two fish, which he cooked and set before his guest. Fox was pleased with his entertainment, and invited the Kingfisher to return the call.

In due time the Kingfisher came to the home of the Fox, who said, "I have no food to offer you"; then he went down to the river, thinking to secure fish in the same manner as the Kingfisher had done.

Fox leaped from the high bank, but instead of breaking through the ice he broke his head and killed himself. Kingfisher went to him, caught him up by the tail, and swung Fox around to the right four times, thereby restoring him to life. Kingfisher caught some fish, and they ate together. "I am a medicine-man," said Kingfisher; "that is why I can do these things. You must never try to catch fish in that way again."

After the departure of Kingfisher, Fox paid a visit to the home of Prairie-dog, where he was cordially received. Prairie-dog put four sticks, each about a foot in length, in the ashes of the camp-fire; when these were removed, they proved to be four nicely roasted prairie-dogs, which were served for Fox's dinner.

Fox invited the Prairie-dog to return the visit, which in a short time the latter did. Fox placed four sticks in the fire to roast, but they were consumed by it, and instead of palatable food to set before his guest he had nothing but ashes.

Prairie-dog said to Fox, "You must not attempt to do that. I am a medicine-man; that is why I can transform the wood to flesh." Prairie-dog then prepared a meal as he done before, and they dined.

Fox went to visit Buffalo, who exclaimed, "What shall I do? I have no food to offer you." Buffalo was equal to the emergency, however; he shot an arrow upward, which struck in his own back as it returned. When he pulled this out, a kidney and the fat surrounding it came out also. This he cooked for Fox, and added a choice morsel from his own nose. As usual, Fox extended an invitation to his host to return the visit.

When Buffalo came to call upon Fox, the latter covered his head with weeds in imitation of the head of the Buffalo. Fox thought he could provide food for their dinner as the Buffalo had done, so fired an arrow into the air; but when it came close to him on its return flight, he became frightened and ran away. Buffalo then furnished meat for their meal as on the previous occasion. "You must not try this," said he; "I am a medicine-man; that is why I have the power."

Some time afterward, as Fox was journeying along, he met an Elk, lying beside the trail. He was frightened when he saw the antlers of the Elk moving, and jumped to avoid what seemed to be a falling tree. "Sit down beside me," said the Elk. "Don't be afraid."

“The tree will fall on us,” replied Fox. “Oh, sit down; it won’t fall. I have no food to offer you, but I will provide some.” The Elk cut steaks from his own quarter, which the Fox ate, and before leaving Fox invited the Elk to return the visit.

When Elk came to see Fox, the latter tried unsuccessfully to cut flesh from his own meager flanks; then he drove sharpened sticks into his nose, and allowed the blood to run out upon the grass. This he tried in vain to transform into meat, and again he was indebted to his guest for a meal.

“I am a medicine-man; that is why I can do this,” said Elk.

Fox and Mountain Lion

Fox could find nothing to eat for a long time, so that he grew weak and thin. While on a journey in search of food he met the Mountain Lion, who, taking pity upon his unhappy condition, said, “I will hunt for you, and you shall grow fat again.”

The Fox agreed to this, and they went on together to a much frequented spring. Mountain Lion told Fox to keep watch while he slept if a cloud of dust was to be seen arising from the approach of animals Fox was to waken him. Fox presently beheld the dust caused by the approach of a drove of horses.

Fox wakened Mountain Lion, who said, “Just observe how I catch horses.” As one of the animals went down to the spring to drink, he sprang upon it, and fastened his fangs in its throat, clawing its legs and shoulders until it fell dying at the water’s edge. Mountain Lion brought the horse up to the rock, and laid it before the Fox. Stay here, eat, drink, and grow fat,” said he.

Fox thought he had learned how to kill horses, so when the Coyote came along he volunteered to secure one for him. Fox jumped upon the neck of the horse, as Mountain Lion had done, but became entangled in its mane and was killed.

Fox and Rabbit

Fox one day met a Rabbit who was sewing a sack. “What do you intend to do with that sack?” asked he.

“I am making this coat to protect myself from being killed by the hard hail which we are going to have today,” replied Rabbit.

“My friend, you know how to make them; give me this coat and make another for your-self.” Rabbit agreed to this, and Fox put on the sack over his head.

Rabbit then hung him on a limb and pelted him with stones, while Fox, thinking it was hail striking him, endured the punishment as long as he could, but finally fell nearly dead from the tree, and looked out, to see no signs of hail, but discovered the Rabbit running away.

Fox wished to avenge himself by killing Rabbit, and set off in pursuit of him. When overtaken Rabbit was chewing soft gum with which to make spectacles.

Fox's curiosity was stronger than his passion for revenge. "What are you making those for?" said he.

"It is going to be very hot, and I am making them to protect my eyes," answered Rabbit.

"Let me have this pair; you know how to make them and can make yourself another pair."

"Very well," said Rabbit, and he put the eye-shields on Fox, who could then see nothing, as the gum was soft and filled his eyes. Rabbit set fire to the brush all around Fox, who was badly singed in running through it. The gum melted in the fire, and yet remains as the dark rings around his eyes.

Fox again started on the trail of Rabbit, with the determination of eating him as soon as he saw him. He found Rabbit sitting beside the opening of a beehive. "I am going to eat you," said Fox; "you have tried to kill me."

"You must not kill me," replied Rabbit. "I am teaching these children," and he closed the opening of the hive, so that Fox could not see what was inside. Fox desired very much to see what was in the hive making such a noise.

"If you wish to see, stay here and teach them while I rest. When it is dinner time, strike them with a club," said Rabbit, who then ran away.

Fox patiently awaited the dinner hour, and then struck the hive with such force that he broke into it. The bees poured out and stung him until he rolled in agony. "When I see you again, I will kill you before you can say a word," declared he, as he started after Rabbit again.

Fox tracked the Rabbit to a small hole in the fence around a field of watermelons belonging to a Mexican. The Rabbit had entered to steal, and was angered at sight of the gum figure of a man which the owner of the field had placed beside the path. "What do you desire from me?" he cried, as he struck at the figure with his fore-foot, which stuck fast in the soft gum. He struck at the gum with every foot, and even his head was soon stuck in the gum.

Thus Fox found him. "What are you doing here?" he asked.

"They put me in here because I would not eat chicken for them," said Rabbit.

"I will take your place," said Fox; "I know how to eat chicken."

The Mexican found him in the morning and skinned him, and then let him go, still on the trail of the Rabbit, who had so frequently outwitted him.

CHEROKEE

---

KANATI AND SELU: THE ORIGIN OF CORN AND GAME

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Mooney, James. "Myths of the Cherokees." Journal of American Folklore 1 (1888): 98–106.

Date: 1887

Original Source: Cherokee

National Origin: Native American

---

The Cherokee, along with the Chickasaw, Choctaw, Creek, and Seminoles, were one of the "Five Civilized Tribes." At various points in their history, the Cherokee resided in Alabama, Georgia, Kentucky, North and South Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia, and West Virginia. The Cherokee were the most numerous native culture in the southeastern part of the United States and ultimately the most influential. They created a nation modeled on the governmental structure of the United States. They adopted a syllabary for writing their language created by Sequoia. The following myth required anyone who heard it to fast and take a ritual bath presided over by a holy man. Connected to this myth is a series of events occurring later in the first age of the Cherokee in which the people, starving from a lack of game, sent for the brothers who returned and gave them the rituals to use for calling game. This myth alludes to a range of esoteric knowledge shared by the traditional Cherokee. For example, the myth establishes the intimate relationship between Kanati (representative of hunters in general) and the wolf, thus establishing the animal's protected status among any Cherokee desiring a successful hunt. Similar narratives focused on two brothers—one who is "tame" and the other who is "wild" and lives on the margins of society and at the edge of the social order—are distributed widely in Native American tradition. “The Story of Lodge Boy, After-Birth Boy and Double-Face” among the Omaha is one such closely related example. As other examples of the twin motif, see “Origin of Acoma” (page 3) and “The Two Boys Who Slew the Monsters and Became Stars” (page 148) in this volume.

---

When I was a boy, this is what the old men told me they had heard when they were boys.

Long ages ago, soon after the world was made, a hunter and his wife lived at Looking-glass Mountain, with their only child, a little boy. The father’s name was Kanati, “The Lucky Hunter,” and his wife was called Selu, “Corn.” No matter when Kanati went into the woods, he never failed to bring back a load of game, which his wife cut up and prepared, washing the blood from the meat in the river near the house. The little boy used to play down by the river every day, and one morning the old people thought they heard laughing and talking in the bushes, as though there were two children there. When the boy came home at night, his parents asked who had been playing with him all day. “He comes out of the water,” said the boy, and he calls himself my elder brother. He says his mother was cruel to him, and threw him into the river.” Then they knew that the strange boy had sprung from the blood of the game which Selu had washed off at the river’s edge.

Every day, when the little boy went out to play, the other would join him; but, as he always went back into the water, the old people never had a chance to see him. At last, one evening, Kanati said to his son, “Tomorrow, when the other boy comes to play with you, get him to wrestle with you, and when you have your arms around him hold on to him and call for us.” The boy promised to do as he was told; so the next day, as soon as his playmate appeared, he challenged him to a wrestling-match. The other agreed at once, but as soon as they had their arms around each other Kanati’s boy began to scream for his father. The old folks at once came running down, and when the wild boy saw them he struggled to free himself, and cried out, “Let me go! You threw me away!” But his brother held on until his parents reached the spot, when they seized the wild boy and took him home with them. They kept him in the house until they had tamed him, but he was always wild and artful in his disposition, and was the leader of his brother in every mischief. Before long the old people discovered that he was one of those persons endowed with magic powers, and they called him, “He who grew up Wild.”

Whenever Kanati went into the mountains he always brought back a fat buck or doe, or may be a couple of turkeys. One day the wild boy said to his brother, “I wonder where our father gets all that game; let’s follow him next time, and find out.” A few days afterward, Kanati took a bow and some feathers in his hand, and started off. The boys waited a little while, and then started after him, keeping out of sight, until they saw their father go into a swamp where there were a great many of the reeds that hunters use to make arrow-shafts. Then the wild boy changed himself into a puff of bird's down, which the wind took up and carried until it alighted upon Kanati's shoulder just as he entered the swamp, but Kanati knew nothing about it. The hunter then cut reeds, fitted the feathers to them, and made some arrows, and the wild boy—in his other shape—thought, "I wonder what those things are for." When Kanati had his arrows finished, he came out of the swamp and went on again. The wind blew the down from his shoulder; it fell in the woods, when the wild boy took his right shape again, and went back and told his brother what he had seen. Keeping out of sight of their father, they followed him up the mountain until he stopped at a certain place and lifted up a large rock. At once a buck came running out, which Kanati shot, and then, lifting it upon his back, he started home again. "Oho!" said the boys, "he keeps all the deer shut up in that hole, and whenever he wants venison he just lets one out, and kills it with those things he made in the swamp." They hurried and reached home before their father, who had the heavy deer to carry, so that he did not know they had followed him.

A few days after, the boys went back to the swamp, cut some reeds and made seven arrows, and then started up the mountain to where their father kept the game. When they got to the place they lifted up the rock, and a deer came running out. Just as they drew back to shoot it, another came out, and then another, and another, until the boys got confused and forgot what they were about. In those days all the deer had their tails hanging down, like other animals, but, as a buck was running past, the wild boy struck its tail with his arrow so that it stood straight out behind. This pleased the boys, and when the next one ran by, the other brother struck his tail so that it pointed upward. The boys thought this was good sport, and when the next one ran past, the wild boy struck his tail so that it stood straight up, and his brother struck the next one so hard with his arrow that the deer's tail was curled over his back. The boys thought this was very pretty, and ever since the deer has carried his tail over his back.

The deer continued to pass until the last one had come out of the hole and escaped into the forest. Then followed droves of raccoons, rabbits, and all the other four-footed animals. Last came great flocks of turkeys, pigeons, and partridges that darkened the air like a cloud, and made such a noise with their wings that Kanati, sitting at home, heard the sound like distant thunder on the mountains, and said to himself, "My bad boys have got into trouble. I must go and see what they are doing."

So Kanati went up the mountain, and when he came to the place where he kept the game he found the two boys standing by the rock, and all the birds and animals were gone. He was furious, but, without saying a word, he went down into the cave and kicked the covers off four jars in one corner, when out swarmed bed-bugs, fleas, lice, and gnats, and got all over the boys. They screamed with pain and terror, and tried to beat off the insects; but the thousands of insects crawled over them, and bit and stung them, until both dropped down nearly dead from exhaustion. Kanati stood looking on until he thought they had been punished enough, when he brushed off the vermin, and proceeded to give the boys a lecture. "Now, you rascals," said he, "you have always had plenty to eat, and never had to work for it. Whenever you were hungry, all I had to do was to come up here and get a deer or a turkey, and bring it home for your mother to cook. But now you have let out all the animals, and after this, when you want a deer to eat, you will have to hunt all over the woods for it, and then may be not find one. Go home now to your mother, while I see if I can find something to eat for supper."

When the boys reached home again they were very tired and hungry, and asked their mother for something to eat. "There is no meat," said Selu, "but wait a little while, and I will get you some-thing." So she took a basket and started out to the provision-house.... This provision-house was built upon poles high up from the ground, to keep it out of the reach of animals, and had a ladder to climb up by, and one door, but no other opening. Every day, when Selu got ready to cook the dinner, she would go out to the provision-house with a basket, and bring it back full of corn and beans. The boys had never been inside the provision-house, and wondered where all the corn and beans could come from, as the house was not a very large one; so, as soon as Selu went out of the door, the wild boy said to his brother, "Let's go and see what she does." They ran around and climbed up at the back of the provision-house, and pulled out a piece of clay from between the logs, so that they could look in. There they saw Selu standing in the middle of the room, with the basket in front of her on the floor. Leaning over the basket, she rubbed her stomach—so—and the basket was half-full of corn. Then she rubbed under her armpits—so—and the basket was full to the top with beans. The brothers looked at each other, and said, "This will never do; our mother is a witch. If we eat any of that it will poison us. We must kill her."

When the boys came back into the house, Selu knew their thoughts before they spoke? "So you are going to kill me!" said Selu. "Yes," said the boys; "you are a witch."

"Well," said their mother, "when you have killed me, clear a large piece of ground in front of the house, and drag my body seven times around the circle.

"Then drag me seven times over the ground inside the circle, and stay up all night and watch, and in the morning you will have plenty of corn." Then the boys killed her with their clubs, and cut off her head, and put it up on the roof of the house, and told it to look for her husband. Then they set to work to clear the ground in front of the house, but, instead of clearing the whole piece, they cleared only seven little spots. This is the reason why corn now grows only in a few places instead of over the whole world. Then they dragged the body of Selu around the circles, and wherever her blood fell on the ground the corn sprang up. But, instead of dragging her body seven times across the ground, they did this only twice, which is the reason why the Indians still work their crop but twice. The two brothers sat up and watched their corn all night, and in the morning it was fully grown and ripe.

When Kanati came home at last, he looked around, but could not see Selu anywhere, so he asked the boys where their mother was. "She was a witch, and we killed her," said the boys; "there is her head up there on top of the house." When Kanati saw his wife's head on the roof he was very angry, and said, "I won't stay with you any longer. I am going to the ... [Wolf] people." So he started off, but, before he had gone far, the wild boy changed himself again to a tuft of down, which fell on Kanati's shoulder.

When Kanati reached the settlement of the Wolf people, they were holding a council in the town-house. He went in and sat down, with the tuft of bird's down on his shoulder. When the Wolf chief asked him his business, he said, "I have two bad boys at home, and I want you to go in seven days from now and play against them." Kanati spoke as though he wanted them to play a game of ball, but the wolves knew that he meant for them to come and kill the two boys. The wolves promised to go. Then the bird's down blew off from Kanati's shoulder, and the smoke carried it up through the hole in the roof of the town-house. When it came down on the ground outside, the wild boy took his right shape again, and went home and told his brother all that he had heard in the town-house. When Kanati left the Wolf people, he did not return home, but went on farther.

The boys then began to get ready for the wolves, and the wild boy—the magician—told his brother what to do. They ran around the house in a wide circle until they had made a trail all around it, excepting on the side from which the wolves would come, where they left a small open space. Then they made four large bundles of arrows, and placed them at four different points on the outside of the circle, after which they hid themselves in the woods and waited for the wolves. On the appointed day a whole army of wolves came and surrounded the house, to kill the boys. The wolves did not notice the trail around the house, because they came in where the boys had left the opening, but the moment they were inside the circle the trail changed to a high fence, and shut them in. Then the boys on the outside took their arrows and began shooting them down, and, as the wolves could not jump over the fence, they were all killed excepting a few, which escaped through the opening into a great swamp close by. Then the boys ran around the swamp, and a circle of fire sprang up in their tracks, and set fire to the grass and bushes, and burned up nearly all the other wolves. Only two or three got away, and these were all the wolves which were left in the whole world.

Soon afterward some strangers from a distance, who heard that the brothers had a wonderful grain from which they made bread, came to ask for some; for none but Selu and her family had ever known corn before. The boys gave them seven grains of corn, which they told them to plant the next night on their way home, sitting up all night to watch the corn, which would have seven ripe ears in the morning. These they were to plant the next night, and watch in the same way; and so on every night until they reached home, when they would have corn enough to supply the whole people. The strangers lived seven days' journey away. They took the seven grains of corn, and started home again. That night they planted the seven grains, and watched all through the darkness until morning, when they saw seven tall stalks, each stalk bearing a ripened ear. They gathered the ears with gladness, and went on their way. The next night they planted all their corn, and guarded it with wakeful care until daybreak, when they found an abundant increase. But the way was long and the sun was hot, and the people grew tired. On the last night before reaching home they fell asleep, and in the morning the corn they had planted had not even sprouted. They brought with them to their settlement what corn they had left, and planted it, and with care and attention were able to raise a crop. But ever since the corn must be watched and tended through half the year, which before would grow and ripen in a night.

As Kanati did not return, the boys at last concluded to go and see if they could find him. The wild boy got a wheel and rolled it toward the direction where it is always night? In a little while the wheel came rolling back, and the boys knew their father was not there. Then the wild boy rolled it to the south and to the north, and each time the wheel came back to him, and they knew their father was not there. Then he rolled it toward the Sun Land, and it did not return.

"Our father is there," said the wild boy, "let us go and find him." So the two brothers set off toward the east, and after traveling a long time they came upon Kanati, walking along, with a little dog by his side. "You bad boys," said their father, "have you come here?"

"Yes," they answered; "we always accomplish what we start out to do, we are men!"

"This dog overtook me four days ago," then said Kanati; but the boys knew that the dog was the wheel which they had sent after him to find him. "Well," said Kanati, "as you have found me, we may as well travel together, but I will take the lead."

Soon they came to a swamp, and Kanati told them there was a dangerous thing there, and they must keep away from it. Then he went on ahead, but as soon as he was out of sight the wild boy said to his brother, "Come and let us see what is in the swamp." They went in together, and in the middle of the swamp they found a large panther, asleep. The wild boy got out an arrow, and shot the panther in the side of the head. The panther turned his head, and the other boy shot him on that side. He turned his head away again, and the two brothers shot together ... But the panther was not hurt by the arrows, and paid no more attention to the boys. They came out of the swamp, and soon overtook Kanati, waiting for them. "Did you find it?" asked Kanati. "Yes," said the boys,

“we found it, but it never hurt us. We are men” Kanati was surprised, but said nothing, and they went on again.

After a while Kanati turned to them, and said, “Now you must be careful. We are coming to a tribe called the ‘Cookers’ [that is, Cannibals], and if they get you they will put you in a pot and feast on you.” Then he went on ahead. Soon the boys came to a tree which had been struck by lightning, and the wild boy directed his brother to gather some of the splinters from the tree, and told him what to do with them. In a little while they came to the settlement of the cannibals, who, as soon as they saw the boys, came running out, crying, and “Good! Here are two nice, fat strangers. Now we’ll have a grand feast!” They caught the boys and dragged them into the town-house, and sent word to all the people of the settlement to come to the feast. They made up a great fire, filled a large pot with water and set it to boiling, and then seized the wild boy and threw him into the pot, and put the lid on it. His brother was not frightened in the least, and made no attempt to escape, but quietly knelt down and began putting the splinters into the fire, as if to make it burn better. When the cannibals thought the meat was about ready, they lifted the lid from the pot, and that instant a blinding light filled the town-house, and the lightning began to dart from one side to the other, beating down the cannibals until not one of them was left alive. Then the lightning went up through the smoke-hole, and the next moment there were the two boys standing outside the town-house as though nothing had happened. They went on, and soon met Kanati, who seemed much surprised to see them, and said, “What! Are you here again?”

“Oh, yes, we never give up. We are great men!”

“What did the cannibals do to you?”

“We met them, and they brought us to their town-house, but they never hurt us.” Kanati said nothing more, and they went on. Kanati soon got out of sight of the boys, but they kept on until they came to the end of the world, where the sun comes out. The sky was just coming down when they got there, but they waited until it went up again, and then they went through and climbed up on the other side.

There they found Kanati and Selu sitting together. The old folks received them kindly, and were glad to see them, and told them they might stay there a while, but then they must go to live where the sun goes down. The boys stayed with their parents seven days, and then went on toward the sunset land, where they are still living.

ORIGIN OF THE BEAR: THE BEAR SONGS

Tradition Bearer: Ayûn’inî (Swimmer)

Source: Mooney, James. Myths of the Cherokee. Nineteenth Annual Report of the Bureau of American Ethnology, 1897–1898, Part I. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1900, 325–326.

Date: 1897–1898

Original Source: Cherokee

National Origin: Native American

---

In the Cherokee worldview, the bear maintained a kinship to humans by virtue of having been descended from one of their clans during the mythic period. The widely held Native American belief that animals grant success to hunters who follow the proper rituals of respect is apparent in this myth of the origin of bears and the songs used to call them forth to be hunted. Like Cherokee sung incantations in general, the Bear Songs, when repeated precisely, have an ability to focus supernatural power and bring about a desired end. This myth explaining the origin of the bear and the sacred formulas used to appeal to bears are especially valuable by virtue of the fact that they were transcribed by Cherokee ritual expert Swimmer using the syllabary invented by Sequoia. Thus, there is far less of an opportunity for “interference” (extrapolation and reinterpretation) from the collector than was usually the case in the fieldwork context.

---

Long ago there was a Cherokee clan called the Ani'-Tsâ'gûhî, and in one family of this clan was a boy who used to leave home and be gone all day in the mountains. After a while he went oftener and stayed longer, until at last he would not eat in the house at all, but started off at daybreak and did not come back until night. His parents scolded, but that did no good, and the boy, still went every day until they noticed that long brown hair was beginning to grow out all over his body. Then they wondered and asked him why it was that he wanted to be so much in the woods that he would not even eat at home. Said the boy, “I find plenty to eat there, and it is better than the corn and beans we have in the settlements, and pretty soon I am going into the woods to stay all the time.” His parents were worried and begged him not to leave them, but he said, “It is better there than here, and you see I am beginning to be different already, so that I can not live here any longer. If you will come with me, there is plenty for all of us and you will never have to work for it; but if you want to come you must first fast seven days.”

The father and mother talked it over and then told the headmen of the clan. They held a council about the matter and after everything had been said they decided, “Here we must work hard and have not always enough. There he says there is always plenty without work. We will go with him.” So they fasted seven days, and on the seventh morning all the Ani'-Tsâ'gûhî left the settlement and started for the mountains as the boy led the way.

When the people of the other towns heard of it they were very sorry and sent their headmen to persuade the Ani'-Tsâ'gûhî to stay at home and not go into the woods to live. The messengers found them already on the way, and were surprised to notice that their bodies were beginning to be covered with hair like that of animals, because for seven days they had not taken human food and their nature was changing. The Ani'-Tsâ'gûhî would not come back, but said, "We are going where there is always plenty to eat. Hereafter we shall be called bears, and when you yourselves are hungry come into the woods and call us and we shall come to give you our own flesh. You need not be afraid to kill us, for we shall live always." Then they taught the messengers the songs with which to call them, and the bear hunters have these songs still. When they had finished the songs the Ani'-Tsâ'gûhî started on again and the messengers turned back to the settlements, but after going a little way they looked back and saw a drove of bears going into the woods.

First Bear Song

He-e! Ani'-Tsâ'gûhî, Ani'-Tsâ'gûhî, akwandu'li e'lanti' ginûn'ti,
 Ani'-Tsâ'gûhî, Ani'-Tsâ'gûhî, akwandu'li e'lanti' ginûn'ti—Yû!
 He-e! The Ani'-Tsâ'gûhî, the Ani'-Tsâ'gûhî, I want to lay them low on the ground,
 The Ani'-Tsâ'gûhî, the Ani'-Tsâ'gûhî, I want to lay them low on the ground—Yû!

The bear hunter starts out each morning fasting and does not eat until near evening. He sings this song as he leaves camp, and again the next morning, but never twice the same day.

Second Bear Song

This song also is sung by the bear hunter, in order to attract the bears, while on his way from the camp to the place where he expects to hunt during the day. The melody is simple and plaintive.

He-e! Hayuya'haniwä', hayuya'haniwä', hayuya'haniwä', hayuya'haniwä',
 Tsistuyi' nehandu'yanû', Tsistuyi' nehandu'yanû'—Yoho-o!
 He-e! Hayuya'haniwä', hayuya'haniwä', hayuya'haniwä', hayuya'haniwä',
 Kuwâhi' nehandu'yanû', Kuwâhi' nehandu'yanû'—Yoho-o!
 He-e! Hayuya'haniwä', hayuya'haniwä', hayuya'haniwä', hayuya'haniwä',
 Uyâhye' nehandu'yanû', Uyâhye' nehandu'yanû'—Yoho-o!
 He-e! Hayuya'haniwä', hayuya'haniwä', hayuya'haniwä', hayuya'haniwä',
 Gâte'gwâ' nehandu'yanû', Gâte'gwâ' nehandu'yanû'—Yoho-o!
 (Recited) Ûlë-nû' asëhî' tadeyâ'statakûhî' gûñ'näge astû' tsiki'
 He! Hayuya'haniwä' (four times),
 In Tsistu'yî you were conceived (two times)—Yoho!
 He! Hayuya'haniwä' (four times),

In Kuwâ'hî you were conceived (two times)—Yoho!
He! Hayuya'haniwâ' (four times),
In Uyâ'hye you were conceived (two times)—Yoho!
He! Hayuya'haniwâ' (four times),
In Gâte'gwâ you were conceived (two times)—Yoho!

And now surely we and the good black things, the best of all, shall see each other.

THE RATTLESNAKE'S VENGEANCE

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable (perhaps Swimmer, see page 39)

Source: Mooney, James. Myths of the Cherokee. Nineteenth Annual Report of the Bureau of American Ethnology, 1897–1898, Part I. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1900, 306.

Date: 1898

Original Source: Cherokee

National Origin: Native American

---

According to Cherokee tradition, snakes were supernatural beings possessing power over meteorological phenomena as well as over other plant and animal life. The narrative traditions contain an extensive selection of myths and legends devoted to natural and mythic snakes. Snakes are the focus of prayers and rituals, and rattlesnakes are invested with particular power. While killing them is an invitation to disaster as in the following myth, holy persons who are trained in the appropriate rites, songs, and prayers may kill them to obtain teeth, rattles, flesh, or oil for medicinal or religious purposes. “The Rattlesnake’s Vengeance” reveals the character of this animal and relates the origin of one of the ritual songs associated with the feared and venerated rattlesnake.

---

One day in the old times when we could still talk with other creatures, while some children were playing about the house, their mother inside heard them scream. Running out she found that a rattlesnake had crawled from the grass, and taking up a stick she killed it. The father was out hunting in the mountains, and that evening when coming home after dark through the gap he heard a strange wailing sound. Looking about he found that he had come into the midst of a whole company of rattlesnakes, which all had their mouths open and seemed to be crying. He asked them the reason of their trouble, and they told him that his own wife had that day killed their chief, the Yellow Rattlesnake, and they were just now about to send the Black Rattlesnake to take revenge.

The hunter said he was very sorry, but they told him that if he spoke the truth he must be ready to make satisfaction and give his wife as a sacrifice for the life of their chief. Not knowing what might happen otherwise, he consented. They then told him that the Black Rattlesnake would go home with him and coil up just outside the door in the dark. He must go inside, where he would find his wife awaiting him, and ask her to get him a drink of fresh water from the spring. That was all.

He went home and knew that the Black Rattlesnake was following. It was night when he arrived and very dark, but he found his wife waiting with his supper ready. He sat down and asked for a drink of water. She handed him a gourd full from the jar, but he said he wanted it fresh from the spring, so she took a bowl and went out of the door. The next moment he heard a cry, and going out he found that the Black Rattlesnake had bitten her and that she was already dying. He stayed with her until she was dead, when the Black Rattlesnake came out from the grass again and said his tribe was now satisfied.

He then taught the hunter a prayer song, and said, "When you meet any of us hereafter sing this song and we will not hurt you; but if by accident one of us should bite one of your people then sing this song over him and he will recover." And the Cherokee have kept the song to this day.

THE SPIRIT DEFENDERS OF NĬKWÄSĬ'

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Mooney, James. Myths of the Cherokee. Nineteenth Annual Report of the Bureau of American Ethnology, 1897–1898, Part I. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1900, 336–337.

Date: 1898

Original Source: Cherokee

National Origin: Native American

---

The Nūñnē'hī ("the immortals"), in Cherokee belief, were a spirit race who lived much as humans did. They were invisible, except when they wanted to be seen. In traditional narrative, they are depicted as benevolent protectors of the Cherokee.

---

Long ago a powerful unknown tribe invaded the country from the southeast, killing people and destroying settlements wherever they went. No leader could stand against them, and in a little while they had wasted all the lower settlements and advanced into the mountains. The warriors of the old town of Nĭkwäsi', on the head of Little Tennessee, gathered their wives and children into the townhouse and kept scouts constantly on the lookout for the presence of danger. One morning just before daybreak the spies saw the enemy approaching and at once gave the alarm. The Nīkwāsī' men seized their arms and rushed out to meet the attack, but after a long, hard fight they found themselves overpowered and began to retreat, when suddenly a stranger stood among them and shouted to the chief to call off his men and he himself would drive back the enemy. From the dress and language of the stranger the Nīkwāsī' people thought him a chief who had come with reinforcements from the Overhill settlements in Tennessee. They fell back along the trail, and as they came near the townhouse they saw a great company of warriors coming out from the side of the mound as through an open doorway. Then they knew that their friends were the Nūñnē'hī, the Immortals, although no one had ever heard before that they lived under Nīkwāsī' mound.

The Nūñnē'hī poured out by hundreds, armed and painted for the fight, and the most curious thing about it all was that they became invisible as soon as they were fairly outside of the settlement, so that although the enemy saw the glancing arrow or the rushing tomahawk, and felt the stroke, he could not see who sent it. Before such invisible foes the invaders soon had to retreat, going first south along the ridge to where joins the main ridge which separates the French Broad from the Tuckasegee, and then turning with it to the northeast. As they retreated they tried to shield themselves behind rocks and trees, but the Nūñnē'hī arrows went around the rocks and killed them from the other side, and they could find no hiding place. All along the ridge they fell, until when they reached the head of Tuckasegee not more than half a dozen were left alive, and in despair they sat down and cried out for mercy.

Ever since then the Cherokee have called the place Dayûlsûñ'yï, "Where they cried." Then the Nūñnē'hī chief told them they had deserved their punishment for attacking a peaceful tribe, and he spared their lives and told them to go home and take the news to their people. This was the Indian custom, always to spare a few to carry back the news of defeat. They went home toward the north and the Nūñnē'hī went back to the mound.

And they are still there, because, in the last war, when a strong party of Federal troops came to surprise a handful of Confederates posted there they saw so many soldiers guarding the town that they were afraid and went away without making an attack.

There is another story, that once while all the warriors of a certain town were off on a hunt, or at a dance in another settlement, one old man was chopping wood on the side of the ridge when suddenly a party of the enemy came upon him—Shawano, Seneca, or some other tribe. Throwing his hatchet at the nearest one, he turned and ran for the house to get his gun and make the best defense that he might. On coming out at once with the gun he was surprised to find a large body of strange warriors driving back the enemy. It was no time for questions, and taking his place with the others, they fought hard until the enemy was pressed back up the creek and finally broke and retreated across the mountain.

When it was over and there was time to breathe again, the old man turned to thank his new friends, but found that he was alone—they had disappeared as though the mountain had swallowed them. Then he knew that they were the Nūññē'hī, who had come to help their friends, the Cherokee.

HOW THE DEER OBTAINED HIS HORNS

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Mooney, James. "Myths of the Cherokees" Journal of American Folklore 1 (1888): 106–108.

Date: 1887

Original Source: Cherokee

National Origin: Native American

---

In this myth from the Cherokee, rabbit plays his familiar role of trickster. The myth of "Kanati and Selu" (page 33) focused on sacred features of the Cherokee world. In these narratives, however, the origins of the animals' attributes and the phenomena of the physical universe are at times overshadowed by the amusement value attending the escapades of characters such as rabbit. Therefore, the tales invite comparison to the African American tales of Brer Rabbit and the Cajun Comrade Lapin. These narrative similarities comprise an interesting continuity across the South.

---

In the old days the animals were fond of amusement, and were constantly getting up grand meetings and contests of various kinds, with prizes for the winner. On one occasion a prize was offered to the animal with the finest coat, and although the otter deserved to win it, the rabbit stole his coat, and nearly got the prize for himself. After a while the animals got together again, and made a large pair of horns, to be given to the best runner. The race was to be through a thicket, and the one who made the best time, with the horns on his head, was to get them. Everybody knew from the first that either the deer or the rabbit would be the winner, but bets were high on the rabbit, who was a great runner and a general favorite. But the rabbit had no tail, and always went by jumps, and his friends were afraid that the horns would make him fall over in the bushes unless he had something to balance them, so they fixed up a tail for him with a stick and some bird's down.

“Now,” says the rabbit, “let me look over the ground where I am to run.”

So he went into the thicket, and was gone so long that at last one of the animals went to see what had become of him, and there he found the rabbit hard at work gnawing down bushes and cutting off the hanging limbs of the trees, and making a road for himself clear through to the other side of the swamp. The messenger did not let the rabbit see him, but came back quietly and told his story to the others. Pretty soon the rabbit came out again, ready to put on the horns and begin the race, but several of the animals said that he had been gone so long that it looked as if he must have been cutting a road through the bushes. The rabbit denied it up and down, but they all went into the thicket, and there was the open road, sure enough. Then the chief got very angry, and said to the rabbit, “Since you are so fond of the business, you may spend the rest of your life gnawing twigs and bushes,” and so the rabbit does to this day. The other animals would not allow the rabbit to run at all now, so they put the horns on the deer, who plunged into the worst part of the thicket, and made his way out to the other side, then turned round and came back again on a different track, in such fine style that every one said he had won the horns. But the rabbit felt sore about it, and resolved to get even with him.

One day, soon after the contest for the horns, the rabbit stretched a large grape-vine across the trail, and gnawed it nearly in two in the middle. Then he went back a piece, took a good run, and jumped up at the vine. He kept on running and jumping up at the vine, until the deer came along and asked him what he was doing.

“Don’t you see?” says the rabbit. “I’m so strong that I can bite through that grape-vine at one jump.”

The deer could hardly believe this, and wanted to see it done. So the rabbit ran back, made a tremendous spring, and bit through the vine where he had gnawed it before. The deer, when he saw that, said, “Well; I can do it if you can.” So the rabbit stretched a larger grape-vine across the trail, but without gnawing it in the middle. Then the deer ran back as he had seen the rabbit do, made a powerful spring, and struck the grape-vine right in the center; but it only flew back, and threw him over on his head. He tried again and again, until he was all bruised and bleeding.

“Let me see your teeth,” at last said the rabbit. So the deer showed him his teeth, which were long and sharp, like a wolf’s teeth.

“No wonder you can’t do it,” says the rabbit; “your teeth are too blunt to bite anything. Let me sharpen them for you, like mine. My teeth are so sharp that I can cut through a stick just like a knife.” And he showed him a black-locust twig, of which rabbits gnaw the young shoots, which he had shaved off as well as a knife could do it, just in rabbit fashion.

The deer thought that was just the thing. So the rabbit got a hard stone, with rough edges, and filed and filed away at the deer’s teeth, until they were filed down almost to the gums.

“Now try it,” says the rabbit. So the deer tried again, but this time he couldn’t bite at all.

“Now you’ve paid for your horns,” said the rabbit, as he laughed and started home through the bushes. Ever since then the deer’s teeth are so blunt that he cannot chew anything but grass and leaves.

THE RAVEN MOCKER

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Mooney, James. Myths of the Cherokee. Nineteenth Annual Report of the Bureau of American Ethnology, 1897–1898, Part I. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1900, 401–403.

Date: 1898

Original Source: Cherokee

National Origin: Native American

---

In traditional Cherokee theories of disease causation and cure, death is caused by a personal attack. This attack may come from a nonhuman, supernatural source or from a human agent such as a witch. The witch, in general, carries out his or her mischief under cover of darkness. Therefore, the Cherokee term translates as “night-goer.” In his analysis of Cherokee sacred formulas, James Mooney discusses ravens as agents who never fail to take disease away from the afflicted individual and then hide these afflictions in mountain crevices at the cardinal points on the Cherokee compass.

---

Of all the Cherokee wizards or witches the most dreaded is the Raven Mocker, the one that robs the dying man of life. They are of either sex and there is no sure way to know one, though they usually look withered and old, because they have added so many lives to their own.

At night, when some one is sick or dying in the settlement, the Raven Mocker goes to the place to take the life. He flies through the air in fiery shape, with arms outstretched like wings, and sparks trailing behind, and a rushing sound like the noise of a strong wind. Every little while as he flies he makes a cry like the cry of a raven when it “dives” in the air—not like the common raven cry—and those who hear are afraid, because they know that some man’s life will soon go out. When the Raven Mocker comes to the house he finds others of his kind waiting there, and unless there is a doctor on guard who knows how to drive them away they go inside, all invisible, and frighten and torment the sick man until they kill him. Sometimes to do this they even lift him from the bed and throw him on the floor, but his friends who are with him think he is only struggling for breath.

After the witches kill him they take out his heart and eat it, and so add to their own lives as many days or years as they have taken from his. No one in the room can see them, and there is no sear where they take out the heart, but yet there is no heart left in the body. Only one who has the right medicine can recognize a Raven Mocker, and if such a man stays in the room with the sick person these witches are afraid to come in, and retreat as soon as they see him, because when one of them is recognized in his right shape he must die within seven days. There was once a man who had this medicine and used to hunt for Raven Mockers, and killed several. When the friends of a dying person know that there is no more hope they always try to have one of these medicine men stay in the house and watch the body until it is buried, because after burial the witches do not steal the heart.

The other witches are jealous of the Raven Mockers and afraid to come into the same house with one. Once a man who had the witch medicine was watching by a sick man and saw these other witches outside trying to get in. All at once they heard a Raven Mocker cry overhead and the others scattered "like a flock of pigeons when the hawk swoops." When at last a Raven Mocker dies these other witches sometimes take revenge by digging up the body and abusing it.

The following is told on the reservation as an actual happening:

A young man had been out on a hunting trip and was on his way home when night came on while he was still a long distance from the settlement. He knew of a house not far off the trail where an old man and his wife lived, so he turned in that direction to look for a place to sleep until morning. When he got to the house there was nobody in it. He looked into the sweatlodge and found no one there either. He thought maybe they had gone after water, and so stretched himself out in the farther corner to sleep. Very soon he heard a raven cry outside, and in a little while afterwards the old man came into the sweat lodge and sat down by the fire without noticing the young man, who kept still in the dark corner. Soon there was another raven cry outside, and the old man said to himself, "Now my wife is coming," and sure enough in a little while the old woman came in and sat down by her husband. Then the young man knew they were Raven Mockers and he was frightened and kept very quiet.

Said the old man to his wife, "Well, what luck did you have?"

"None," said the old woman, "there were too many doctors watching. What luck did you have?"

"I got what I went for," said the old man, "there is no reason to fail, but you never have luck. Take this and cook it and lees have something to eat." She fixed the fire and then the young man smelled meat roasting and thought it smelled sweeter than any meat he had ever tasted. He peeped out from one eye, and it looked like a man's heart roasting on a stick.

Suddenly the old woman said to her husband, "Who is over in the corner?"

“Nobody,” said the old man. “Yes, there is,” said the old woman, “I hear him snoring,” and she stirred the fire until it blazed and lighted up the whole place, and there was the young man lying in the corner. He kept quiet and pretended to be asleep. The old man made a noise at the fire to wake him, but still he pretended to sleep. Then the old man came over and shook him, and he sat up and rubbed his eyes as if he had been asleep all the time.

Now it was near daylight and the old woman was out in the other house getting breakfast ready, but the hunter could hear her crying to herself. “Why is your wife crying?” he asked the old man. “Oh, she has lost some of her friends lately and feels lonesome,” said her husband; but the young man knew that she was crying because he had heard them talking.

When they came out to breakfast the old man put a bowl of corn mush before him and said, “This is all we have—we have had no meat for a long time.” After breakfast the young man started on again, but when he had gone a little way the old man ran after him with a fine piece of beadwork and gave it to him, saying, “Take this, and don’t tell anybody what you heard last night, because my wife and I are always quarreling that way.” The young man took the piece, but when he came to the first creek he threw it into the water and then went on to the settlement. There he told the whole story, and a party of warriors started back with him to kill the Raven Mockers. When they reached the place it was seven days after the first night. They found the old man and his wife lying dead in the house, so they set fire to it and burned it and the witches together.

CHEYENNE

---

YOUNG MEN WHO KILLED THE HORNED SERPENT AND RELEASED THE BUFFALO

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Kroeber, A. L. "Cheyenne Tales." Journal of American Folklore 13 (1900): 179–181.

Date: 1899

Original Source: Cheyenne

National Origin: Native American

---

The original lifestyle of hunting and gathering cultures on the Plains used dogs for traction. As a result, small tepees were used that could be transported by dogs who could not travel far in a day, and bands had to remain close to timber and water. There was buffalo hunting on the Plains before the acquisition of the horse, but in the pre-horse culture, this was a seasonal activity only. This is the stage of Cheyenne culture described in the following myth. The communal hunt required careful preparation and close supervision to ensure that as much meat as possible would be taken. The cautionary tale about controlling dogs and proper actions and words in the following narrative alludes to these precautions.

---

Far away there was a large camp-circle. Food was very scarce, and some persons had starved. One day one of the old men went about inquiring whether the people wanted to travel to a large lake, where ducks and game abounded. They moved camp, packing their goods on dogs.

Two young men were sent ahead, but they returned with the news that they had found no game whatever. The children were all crying for food, and the misery was extreme. The people selected two strong young men able to travel four days without food, and told them that they must find something for the whole tribe, and bring back good news.

The young men set out and traveled steadily for two days, until they were worn out and slept from the middle of the night until the morning star rose. Then they went on northward again.

Finally they came near a large river, and beyond it they saw a blue mountain. The river was slow, smooth, wide, and sandy on both sides, but beyond it rose bluffs, and close behind these the mountain. The two scouts put their clothes on their heads, and entered the river. In the center, one of them got stuck fast. He shouted that some powerful thing under water was taking him; and he asked his friend to tell his parents not to weep too much for him. The other man crossed in safety. Then his friend called to him to come back and touch him as a farewell. So the other went back into the river, and touched him.

Then he went out again, and cried all day, wandering about. A person came to the top of the bank above the river, and asked him why he cried, and whether he could do anything for him. The young man replied that a powerful animal was holding fast his friend in the river, and pointed to him.

The person who had come was powerful; he wore a wolfskin, painted red, on his back; it was tied around his neck and waist, so that he looked like a wolf; and he carried a large knife. He dived into the river, and the water moved and waved, and finally an immense snake with black horns came up, and he cut its throat. The man who had been held fast was already cold and stiff in his legs, but the two others dragged him off, and floated him ashore, and laid him in the sun.

The rescuer told the other young man, "Go to the mountain, to its stone door, and tell your grandmother that I have killed the animal that I have been after so long."

The young man ran to the foot of the mountain, stood before a flat stone door, and called as he had been told, telling the woman to bring a rope with her. The old woman was glad that the animal had at last been killed.

The young man ran back, and was told by the man to help him butcher the snake; then they would carry his friend to his house. They dragged the snake on shore by its horns, and cut it in two, and then into many smaller pieces. They made many trips to the mountain, carrying the meat.

Inside, the mountain was like the interior of a tepee, with tent-poles, beds, and so on. Then the young man carried his friend to the mountain, taking him on his back, and holding his hands. The woman made a sweat-house, and he was put into it. The woman told him to try to move. The second time they poured water on the hot rocks he moved a little, the third time more, and after the fourth time he was perfectly well.

Then they went into the mountain, and the man told his daughter to cook food—corn and buffalo meat. This was the first time the young men had seen the daughter, who was very handsome. They ate all the food given them, and were well satisfied. Then the woman asked them why they had come. They told her that they were looking for game for their starving people.

The woman said, "It is well, you will have something for your tribe." Then she asked them what kin they would be to the girl; whether they would be her brothers. While they conferred, she said that they could marry her. The other young man proposed to the one that had been fast that he should marry her; and the latter agreed. They were then all very grateful to each other, and the young man married the girl.

The woman told her daughter to take the two young men to the herd of buffalo, and the girl showed them large herds of buffalo, and on the other side wide fields of corn. Then the woman told them to cross the river in the same place as before, and not to look backwards, and to rest four times on their way home. So they traveled for four days.

Then an old man cried through the village that they were coming. All their relatives and many others came forward; but when they saw that there were three persons, they held somewhat aloof. They entered a tent, and the new husband told an old man to cry to the people to come to shake hands with his wife and embrace her. This was done, and then the young man said that he brought good news, and that that same night his wife's herd would come from the mountain.

At night long strings of buffalo came, and the people heard them on all sides. Early in the morning they saw the buffalo, as far as they could look. It was announced that the dogs were not to disturb the game. Then the hunt commenced. The buffalo ran when pursued, but always came back. As many were killed as could be used, and there was abundance of meat. The chiefs gathered, and resolved that they were thankful to the girl for her kindness, and every family was to bring her a present, the best that they had; and they asked her to take the presents to her parents. So all gave to her, and she started back to her parents with her husband and his friend.

When they arrived at the mountain, the man stood there, calling to his wife to come out, for their son-in-law had returned. She embraced the two young men from joy and gratitude. When they returned, the tribe was still hunting successfully, and they were again given presents to bring to the girl's parents.

When they brought presents a second time, the man was still more grateful, and asked his daughter to take a few ears of corn to the tribe. But she, thinking that they had enough with the buffalo, was silent. When her parents asked her why she did not answer, she told them the reason. So they returned, after her parents had warned her not to feel sorry for any buffalo killed in her sight. Soon after, the children drove a young calf toward the village, and the boys shot at it, and it died in front of her tent.

As she came out, she said to herself that she pitied the calf. But as she said it, the herd ran back toward the mountain, and nothing could be seen but dust. A crier went about, saying that presents must again be sent to the old man in the mountain. After prayer and with blessings, the two young men and the girl started once more. After four days they arrived.

At once the old man told his daughter that she ought to have been careful. But he would not let them return to the tribe. The parents of the young men and their relatives felt lonely at the long absence, and went out alone to cry. But the young men never returned.

TWO-FACES

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Kroeber, A. L. "Cheyenne Tales." Journal of American Folklore 13 (1900): 184.

Date: 1899

Original Source: Cheyenne

National Origin: Native American

---

The character known by various names such as "Two Faces" or "Double Face" appears among Native American Plains cultures other than the Algonquian Cheyenne (see, for example, the Wichita myth, "The Two Boys Who Slew the Monsters and Became Stars," page 148). The protagonist in this tale uses the cleverness and imitative skills reminiscent of a trickster to overcome the monster.

---

Nearly every night a child disappeared from a camp. A young man wondered who stole the babies. One dark night he said to himself, "I will watch tonight. I will watch every tent where the people are sleeping. If any one takes a child tonight, I may hear it cry out." So he watched the whole village, and looked outside.

He found that the thief was Two-Faces, who had one face in front and one at the back of his head, so that he could look on both sides of him. The young man found him fast asleep. Near him were many dead babies that he had stolen. Most of them had their ears cut off, and Two-Faces had a long string of ears on a line, for he lived on human ears.

The young man ran to the river and looked for shells. He gathered a great number of shells, which looked almost like human ears, and strung them, and bloodied them. Then he cut a piece of meat, and shaped it like an ear. When Two-Faces awoke, he saw a person sitting near him eating an ear. It was this young man eating the meat. Two-Faces asked him where he learned to eat ears.

The man said to him, "I live on ears. I always steal children and cut off their ears. The only thing that I am afraid of is that if I eat salt, it will kill me."

Then Two-Faces said, "I should at once die if any one beat a gourd and fat was thrown in the fire."

When night came, they both went to the camp. The young man then told Two-Faces to wait for him; he would go ahead. Then he went to his friends and told them to prepare. He was bringing Two-Faces, who had stolen all the children.

He directed that a gourd be beaten and fat meat thrown at the fire. So at last they succeeded in killing Two-Faces. Then he was burned.

HOW THE WHITES BECAME RICH

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Kroeber, A. L. "Cheyenne Tales." Journal of American Folklore 13 (1900): 177–179.

Date: 1899

Original Source: Cheyenne

National Origin: Native American

---

The Cheyenne were a nomadic Northern Plains culture who based their way of life on the horse for mobility (after Europeans introduced the modern horse to the Americas) and the buffalo for subsistence. Originally from the northeast, this Algonquian nation was pushed west where they settled in the area of the Black Hills in the modern Dakotas and Wyoming. Anthropologist A. L. Kroeber notes concerning this narrative that it "seems probable that we have not a case of adaptation and corruption of a European original, but a native story which for some reason has attracted European additions, perhaps because [the plot is] exceptionally European in spirit" (177).

---

There was a great medicine-man, who was powerful and did injury, but who had a good daughter. He lived near a geyser, in an earth-lodge. Several young men lived with him, and went out hunting for him. He had great quantities of dried buffalo meat hanging all around his lodge. When meat was scarce in a village near by, he sent his young men to summon the people to him, and then he gave a feast to the various companies.

Then this great man told the companies to dress, and dance before him. When the dance was almost over, he announced that he would pick out a young man to be his son-in-law.

So he selected a young man, but after the marriage he sent the village away again. He was malicious and did not treat his son-in-law rightly. Every night he had a fire, and slept close by his son-in-law and daughter. When they moved, he raised his head, and said, "Don't stir! Sleep!" When they talked, or even whispered, he made them be quiet, and ordered them to sleep. Even when they were outside, and spoke against him, he was so powerful that he knew it. The first morning he sent his son-in-law out to cut arrows. He told him that if he brought no smooth, straight sticks, he need not come back.

The young man wandered through the woods, but he found only rough sticks, and he was discouraged, and tired, and cried. A person called to him, and asked him why he wept.

The young man related his trouble, and the person told him to cut bulrushes of the right length. So he got as many bulrushes as he could carry, and they turned to smooth sticks. Then he went on up a mountain, and cried again.

The birds heard him, and asked him why he cried. He said that he could not get the eagle-feathers that his father-in-law wanted for feathering the arrows. So the eagle shook himself, and feathers flew out, and he got as many as he could use. Then he returned, carrying the sticks and feathers.

His father-in-law had four men who could make bows and arrows, and they began to make the arrows for him. Then he sent his son-in-law to get plums for the arrow-makers. It was nearly winter, and there was no fruit of any sort left, but he told him to get fresh plums, and bring none that were rotten or dried. He knew this was impossible.

The young man took a bag, and went out, crying. Again a person asked him why he wept. The young man said it was because he was to get plums for the arrow-makers of his father-in-law.

The person told him to go to a plum-bush, and that contains foreign elements, these are not the same in different tribes the tree would shake itself, and only fresh plums would fall from it. All this happened.

When the great medicine-man saw his son-in-law returning well loaded, he was pleased and went to meet him. So they made the arrows, and ate the plums. Next morning the great man wanted to play at throwing arrows at a hoop with his son-in-law. They played near the geyser, and the medicine-man pushed his son-in-law into it. Only his bones came out again.

Three times the great man had selected a son-in-law, and all this had happened. His daughter did not like his acts; but even when she went far off to tell her husband of his danger, the great man could hear by the wind or the earth what she said.

The fourth time he got a very fine young man for son-in-law. He sent him out to drive a buffalo of good age immediately in front of his house, so that he could shoot him with his new arrows. The son-in-law went far off, crying. Seven buffalo were about him, and one asked him what he wanted.

The young man told him, but they said they were power-less against this great man, and told him to go farther south. He went on, and met four buffalo, who asked him what he wished. But they also were powerless, and sent him farther south. He went on and came to two buffalo. With them the same happened. As he again went on southward, he was so discouraged that he walked with his head down, and when he met a single buffalo, did not stop even when the bull asked him what he wished. Finally he turned around, and told his story. He was hopeless, for the great man could not be cut or burnt or wounded in any way. "He is like this rock," he said, and pointed to a large black stone.

Then the buffalo said, "I will try on this whether I can do anything to him." He went off east, and charged against the stone, but did not injure it. He charged from the south, from the west, from the north—all vainly. The fifth time he went toward the northeast, and this time he broke a piece out of the rock.

Then he told the young man to drive him toward his father-in-law's house. They arrived there, both seeming completely tired out; the buffalo pretended to be trying to escape, while the young man headed him off. At last, after a long chase, he drove him near his father-in-law's door. The medicine-man came out with his new arrows, and shot at the bull. When the arrows neared the buffalo, they turned to reeds again, and did not injure him; but to the medicine-man they appeared to enter the bull, and disappear in him. The bull staggered and seemed nearly dead, and the man approached him. The bull staggered farther and farther away from the house, leading the medicine-man with him, so that he might not escape. Then he turned, charged, and tossed him. As the man fell, he tossed him again and again, so that he never touched the ground. Thus he tossed him until he was completely bruised and unable to move.

Then they put him in his lodge, covered him with brush and wood, and lit it. The flames burnt higher and higher, but they only heard the medicine-man inside the fire cursing and threatening them with death when he should come out. Then suddenly there were poppings, and explosions, and beads, diamonds, and precious stones flew out of the fire.

They were afraid to touch these, for fear the man might then come to life again, and put them back into the fire. But the whites to whom some of them flew kept them, and thus became richer.

CREE

---

LITTLE ONE LEFT ALIVE (CHE-CHE-PUY-EW-TIS)

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Bell, Robert. "The History of the Che-che-puy-ew-tis. A Legend of the Northern Crees." Journal of American Folklore 10 (1897): 2–8.

Date: ca. 1897

Original Source: Northern Cree

National Origin: Native American (Canada)

---

At the time of the collection of the following myth, author Robert Bell notes that the "Northern Crees have extended themselves from the north-west territories of the Dominion eastward around the head of James Bay, up the east main coast of Hudson Bay, and far into the Labrador peninsula, also southward towards the watershed of the St. Lawrence, a few of them having been met with on the Bell River, just north of the Ottawa" (2). Variants of the narrative have been found across the breadth of the Canadian Cree homeland. In the historical period, trapping and fur trading (especially beaver pelts) was a particularly important means of livelihood for the Cree. This tale develops from that central focus. The plot of the sons of a mother murdered by a monster and the creative power of the "thrown away" twin is widely distributed in Native North American myth (see, for example, the Cheyenne "Two Faces," page 53, and the Wichita "The Two Boys Who Slew the Monsters and Became Stars," page 148).

---

Once upon a time there lived an Indian, his wife, and their only son. The period had nearly arrived for the woman to be delivered of her second child. The husband had a presentiment that some-thing was going to happen to his wife, for he repeatedly warned her when he went off hunting to take care of herself, and that if any sign of danger arose she was to hide their son under the brush flooring of the wigwam.

One day, while the man was away from the wigwam hunting, a Toosh, or devil, came, and finding only the woman in the tent, cruelly killed and disemboweled her, throwing aside the womb containing the unborn child. The Indian returned from his hunt and found the mutilated corpse of his wife, but he was in time to catch the Toosh, which he put to an ignominious death. His son he found alive, as his wife had taken the precaution to hide him under the brush of the wigwam floor, as she had been told. For a number of days the man remained in his tent, mourning the death of his wife.

It happened that just after the womb had been thrown aside, an A-pook-a-shish (mouse) chanced to hunt in that direction, and saw what she thought to be food, but on nibbling at it she was surprised to find it quivering, and on further examination she saw what proved to be a living child. Being of a kind disposition, she took it home and nursed it tenderly, and called it Che-che-puy-ew-tis (the little one that moves or quivers). The Indian and his son now moved their wigwam (which is an universal custom among these people when a death has occurred).

When the son had almost arrived at manhood he became a keen hunter, but was very unfortunate in losing his arrows. So frequently did this happen that at last he told his father of it.

“Come now,” said the old man, “shoot an arrow a short distance from where we stand, and we cannot fail to see what will become of it.” The boy did as he was told, and was surprised to see an A-pook-a-shish run away with it. “This is how my arrows are lost,” he said. “I will follow and see where she takes them.” He did so, and came to the wigwam of the A-pook-a-shish. On entering he saw all the arrows he had lost, but they were in possession of a young boy, who was amusing himself with them. The A-pook-a-shish now told the young man that this child was his brother, and related exactly the manner in which she had saved him, but cautioned him not to tell his father when he returned, as the old man might not be pleased. The lad did as the A-pook-a-shish told him, and after that he often went and visited his brother. Occasionally, when they thought the father was absent, they returned home together.

The father at last noticed that there were footprints of two sizes about the tent, and questioned his son regarding them. But the boy, still wishing to keep secret the identity of his brother, gave a misleading answer. The A-pook-a-shish having heard about it, said it would be much better for them to go to the wigwam together, for sooner or later their father would be certain to find them out. So Che-che-puy-ew-tis took his little brother home to their father’s wigwam.

When the Indian returned in the evening with his hunt, he noticed the boy in the tent, and asked his son who the little stranger was, and where he had found him. The lad told him it was his young brother, and related how the

A-pook-a-shish had discovered him after the murder of his mother, and gave him full particulars, which satisfied the man that this was really his child. He pre-tended to be very glad, and told his sons to go at once to the A-pooka-shish's wigwam with the meat of a whole beaver, and thank her for having rescued his son. But all the time he was meditating on a scheme to get rid of both the boys, as he intended taking a second wife. Still, for some time after this they all lived together in harmony with one another. Whilst the father was off hunting, the sons always used to remain about the wigwam, but they noticed that he always went to hunt in one direction, and wondered why he did this. So they made up their minds to follow his path when an opportunity should occur, and find out the reason for his strange behavior.

The next day the old man did not go hunting as usual, so the boys took advantage of this chance to investigate, and they followed up his tracks until they stopped at the margin of a deep lake, and further pursuit seemed impossible. But Che-che-puy-ew-tis was equal to the occasion. He said to his brother, "Pull up some strong spruce-roots fasten them around my waist, then take hold of the other end and I will go under the water. When you feel the roots shake, be sure and pull me out again." Che-che-puy-ew-tis then went into the water and found, as he expected, a large wigwam in the bottom of the lake. At the door were two Pishews (lynxes). He took hold of both of them, shook the roots, and his brother pulled him to the surface again. They killed the Pishews, and returning presented them to their father; but the old man, instead of being pleased, wept bitterly, and told his sons that hereafter it would be better for them to live separate; so going out of the tent, he left them together.

Che-che-puy-ew-tis, knowing their father was angry, said to his brother, "Our father will certainly come again in the morning, so let us make a number of arrows and be prepared. They did so, and, as the elder brother said, their father appeared in the morning, in company with a number of Pishews, who began to attack the boys; but the arrows they had made the night before played havoc among the Pishews, so that not one of them escaped. The following morning the attack was repeated with a fresh lot of Pishews, but Che-che-puy-ew-tis this time, after the animals were all slaughtered, shot an arrow at his father and slew him also.

The two boys now lived together and were very happy, hunting in company and killing all kinds of game.

Years had passed when one night Che-che-puy-ew-tis was awakened by his brother talking to some person, as he thought, and wondered who it could be. In the morning, when his brother went out, Che-che-puy-ew-tis looked into his robe, but found only some rotten wood. He threw it out of the wigwam, saying, "Why do you soil my brother's robe?" The next night he again heard his brother in conversation with some unknown person, and in the morning, on looking into his robe, found this time an Atik (frog), which he threw outside with the same exclamation.

Then Che-che-puy-ew-tis said to himself, "I will find wives for my brother," and he did find them, bringing home two young squaws, whom he presented to him. Thus they lived for some time, the younger brother having two wives and the elder not even one. At length one of the wives became discontented and said to the other, "I will remove to the left side of the wigwam, where our brother-in-law sits. He has no mate, and besides I find it inconvenient for both of us to be staying with one man." The other wife consented, and the next time the young men returned they found only the oldest of the wives sitting in her usual place on the right side of the wigwam, the youngest having gone over to the left side, where Che-che-puy-ew-tis generally sat.

When the men laid down their day's hunt at the door, as is customary, the youngest of the women pulled Che-che-puy-ew-tis's share to the side she had taken possession of, which clearly showed that she wanted this hunter for herself. But Che-che-puy-ew-tis did not agree with the arrangement which had been made by the women, and he also knew that his brother would be displeased with it. Besides, he wanted a wife of his own choosing. He therefore left the tent secretly.

After Che-che-puy-ew-tis had walked a considerable distance, he met with an Atik (deer). They conversed together for some time, and then he told her to find a suitable spot on which to erect a wigwam whilst he went hunting for some food for their supper. He returned in the evening and stayed with Atik one night, but would not remain another, as he thought Atik's legs were too long. So he departed in the morning.

He next met a Muskwa (black bear), but only remained with her one night as he had done with the Atik, her claws being too long and sharp to suit him.

Then he fell in with Kak (porcupine), but again one night was sufficient for him to remain with her. She could not look him straight in the face, her neck being too short and her sharp quills were also very disagreeable. So he left her, as he had done the others, and went on his journey, still determined to find a suitable mate.

The next creature Che-che-puy-ew-tis fell in with was a Wes-ku-chan ("whiskey-jack," the Canada jay). They made a wigwam for the night, as usual, and Che-che-puy-ew-tis provided a beaver for their supper, leaving it, Indian fashion, at the door. But it proved too heavy for poor Wes-ku-chan to manage, and she broke both her legs in trying to haul the carcass into the tent. Che-che-puy-ew-tis was equal to the occasion, and, taking the string off his bow, he bound the legs up nicely and the little bones soon grew together again, but to this day the marks of the bowstring can be seen on the legs of all Wes-ku-chan's descendants. Che-che-puy-ew-tis did, not remain more than one night with her, she being altogether too inquisitive. So he proceeded on his way again.

All at once an Amisk (beaver) met him, and without waiting to be asked she said to him, "If you want a mate, I will go and live with you." She appeared more to his taste than the others, so he answered, "Yes, but you must not be lazy. You will always require to work hard; and one thing which I shall insist upon is, that when-ever we come upon a creek you must lay brush or sticks for me to walk upon. If you fail once in doing this, the creek will turn into a river and we will be lost to each other." So the Amisk agreed to the terms and they lived happily together. One day, unfortunately, Amisk (who was supposed to know a creek when she came to one) made a mistake. She was not certain that what she saw was a creek or not, and did not lay sticks or brush for her husband as usual.

Che-che-puy-ew-tis, when he returned to his mate in the evening, was horrified to find that the water at which he had left her had now turned into a large river. He only now found out that Amisk had made a mistake, and he bewailed the loss of his mate for a long time.

Walking one day along the bank of this large river, he saw to his surprise his wife swimming and diving about in the water, evidently enjoying herself. Che-che-puy-ew-tis called out, "Come ashore; you must not leave me." But Amisk said, "I cannot live ashore any longer; I find this water more to my liking; you had better come to me instead; see how easy it is to swim and dive. Throw me one of your mittens and I will show you that the water is not even wet." This she said in order to entice Che-che-puy-ew-tis to go to her. He threw one of his mittens to her as she had requested, and Amisk, diving down, brought it to the surface quite dry, having secretly anointed it with her oil. She threw it to Che-che-puy-ew-tis, saying, "Have I not told you that the water will not even wet you, just as it does not wet your mitten?"

Che-che-puy-ew-tis was now convinced, so he jumped into the water and was astonished to find that he was quite at home therein, and he stayed with his mate and lived as the beavers live.

Towards the autumn they started to build a house, but Che-che-puy-ew-tis was not at all satisfied with the way Amisk set about it, which was after the manner of the old-time beavers. He knew that, if they did not make it better than that, the Indian hunters would surely be able to kill them, as they had killed so many beavers already, if they should find their house. So he showed Amisk how to fasten large sticks, knit together the smaller ones, and mix them with stones, and how to plaster it with mud which would freeze solid, till at length they had made quite a secure abode. They lived happily together there for a time, but after a while something happened which broke the harmony, and one day Che-che-puy-ew-tis said to Amisk, "As I left my brother's wigwam without his knowledge, and as I know he has a great regard for me, I am certain, it being now winter, that he will look everywhere till he finds me, and if he discovers us here he will be sure to kill you. Come, let us make holes along the bank, so that, should the house be broken into, you will be able to escape."

Several months had passed, and the elder brother (Mejigwis) was very much annoyed at Che-che-puy-ew-tis for having left him without giving any warning, and was displeased with his youngest wife, who had been the cause of his departure. Whilst hunting this winter it had seemed to him that the character of the Westa (beaver houses) had changed, that the Amisks had constructed them differently from those of former years. In consequence of this he now found it difficult enough to keep his family in beaver meat. At last it dawned upon him that there must be some one wiser than the Amisks themselves guiding and directing them, and who could this person be but his brother Che-che-puy-ew-tis. He therefore redoubled his efforts to find him, and, acting on the idea he had formed, he directed his attention to the beaver-houses. One day, while out hunting, a larger Westa than he had been accustomed to see attracted his attention, and cautiously approaching he broke into it and was rewarded by finding his long-lost brother; but the Amisk escaped to the holes they had made in the bank.

Che-che-puy-ew-tis was brought back to his brother's wigwam, and the best of everything was given to him, but one thing he stipulated was, that when any of the party brought home a Pay-uko Amisk (a solitary beaver), he was to be sure and mention it, as he was afraid that some day his brother might kill his mate, and he did not wish to eat her, as he knew that something would happen to himself if he did so.

His brother obeyed his wish as long as there were plenty of Amisks to kill, but frequently he was able to bring home only barely sufficient meat to feed the party, and one day he came back to the wigwam with only one beaver, and it was a Pay-uko Amisk. But he did not let Che-che-puy-ew-tis know about it, as they did not like to see him take no part in the meal. So they cooked the Amisk, and first offered Che-che-puy-ew-tis some of the liquid it had been boiled in; but he refused it, saying he feared that, as his brother had killed only one, it might be a Pay-uko Amisk. "Oh, no," said his brother; "there were quite a number of Amisks along with this one, only all the rest escaped." So Che-che-puy-ew-tis, believing his brother, drank of the liquor and ate of the flesh; but immediately after he had done so, he was transformed into a real Amisk, and jumping into the creek, on the bank of which the wigwam stood, he dived under the water and was lost forever to his brother. But he still lives as a Kitche-kisaimisk (a great old beaver), and it is his wisdom to this day that prevents the Indians from entirely exterminating the Amisk tribe, of which he is the great chief and counselor.

CREEK

---

RABBIT GETS A TURKEY FOR WILDCAT

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Swanton, John R. Myths and Tales of the Southeastern Indians. Smithsonian Institution, Bureau of American Ethnology, Bulletin 88. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1929, 47–48.

Date: 1929

Original Source: Creek

National Origin: Native American

---

The Creek Nation was a confederation of tribes in the “deep” southern states of Georgia and Alabama, and the contiguous areas. Prior to their removal to “Indian Territory” (Oklahoma), the Creeks developed close ties with African Americans, including offering refuge to runaway slaves. This undoubtedly influenced the animal tales that were collected from their descendants in later centuries. The following narrative is one such tale. In it, rabbit as trickster reveals his willingness to sacrifice his neighbors to save himself. Typically, he couples his guile with the character flaws of his victims to attain his ends.

---

A Rabbit was overtaken by a Wildcat, who threatened to kill and eat him. The Rabbit said, “Do not kill me; I will bring you a turkey.” The Wildcat consented to let Rabbit try, so he ran into the woods to find the turkey, first telling the Wildcat to lie down and pretend he was dead.

Rabbit soon found some Turkeys and told them the Wildcat was dead and proposed that they all go and dance and sing around his body. The Turkeys agreed and went with Rabbit and when they saw the Wildcat’s body stretched on the ground and his mouth and eyes looking white as if he were flyblown (for Rabbit had rubbed rotten wood on the edges of his eyes and mouth) they were satisfied that he was really dead.

Rabbit took his place at the head of the Wildcat and began to beat his drum and to sing while the Turkeys danced around him.

After the song and dance had continued a while they heard Rabbit sing, “Jump up and catch the red leg, Jump up and catch the red leg.”

“Why, he is dead and cannot jump,” they said, but since they objected, he promised not to say that any more.

So Rabbit sang and drummed away and the Turkeys again danced around their enemy’s body; but soon Rabbit sang in a low tone:

“Jump up and catch the biggest, Jump up and catch the biggest.”

The Turkeys stopped their dance, but too late, for the Wildcat jumped up and caught the biggest gobbler. Rabbit ran away to the woods and the Turkeys pursued him, threatening to kill him for his trickery. They chased him round and round the trees till at last one of the Turkeys bit at his long tail and bit it off, and ever since that time all rabbits have had short tails.

RABBIT STEALS FIRE

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Swanton, John R. Myths and Tales of the Southeastern Indians. Smithsonian Institution, Bureau of American Ethnology, Bulletin 88. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1929, 47–48.

Date: 1929

Original Source: Creek

National Origin: Native American

---

In this myth, fire symbolizes technology in general, and one of the common exploits of the culture hero is the theft of fire. In the overwhelming majority of cases, the bringer of fire in other narratives serves as a trickster figure. Although there is an innate irony in the coupling of the wily exploiter and the clever culture bearer, the combination is appropriate. Innovation must deviate from the norm, by definition, and who deviates better than the trickster? In the following myth, rabbit turns his guile to the service of humanity rather than to his own selfish ends.

---

All the people came together and said, “How shall we obtain fire?” It was agreed that Rabbit should try to obtain fire for the people.
He went across the great water to the east. He was received gladly, and a great dance was arranged. Then Rabbit entered the dancing circle, gaily dressed, and wearing a peculiar cap on his head into which he had stuck four sticks of rosin.

As the people danced they approached nearer and nearer the sacred fire in the center of the circle. The Rabbit also danced nearer and nearer the fire. The dancers began to bow to the sacred fire, lower and lower. Rabbit also bowed to the fire, lower and lower. Suddenly, as he bowed very low, the sticks of rosin caught fire and his head was a blaze of flame.

The people were amazed at the impious stranger who had dared to touch the sacred fire. They ran at him in anger, and away ran Rabbit, the people pursuing him. He ran to the great water and plunged in, while the people stopped on the shore.

Rabbit swam across the great water, with the flames blazing from his cap. He returned to his people, who thus obtained fire from the east.

RABBIT FOOLS ALLIGATOR

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Swanton, John R. Myths and Tales of the Southeastern Indians. Smithsonian Institution, Bureau of American Ethnology, Bulletin 88. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1929, 52–53.

Date: 1929

Original Source: Creek

National Origin: Native American

---

Rabbit in the following Creek tale exemplifies trickster in his malicious persona. The narrative is of particular interest for the variety of cultural influences it displays. The devil is an obvious European introduction to the tale, while rabbit is an indigenous trickster in African (as hare), African American, and Native American traditions. Rabbit's strategy of asking an apparently innocent question designed to victimize Alligator by means of his own vanity, however, could be classified as "signifying," the African American rhetorical strategy of directing by indirection.

---

The Alligator was sunning himself on a log when the Rabbit said to him, "Mr. Alligator, did you ever see the devil?"

"No, Mr. Rabbit, but I am not afraid to see him," replied the Alligator.

"Well, I saw the devil, and he said you were afraid to look at him," said the Rabbit. "I'm not afraid of him, and you tell him so," bravely responded the Alligator.

“Are you willing to crawl up the hill tomorrow and let me show you the devil?” asked the Rabbit. “Yes, I am willing,” said the Alligator. The Rabbit spoke up and said, “Now Mr. Alligator, when you see smoke rising don’t be afraid, the devil will be just starting out.”

“You need not be so particular about me. I am not afraid,” said he. “Now when you see birds flying and deer running past you don’t get scared.”

“I shall not get scared.”

“When you hear fire crackling close to you and the grass burning all around you, don’t get scared. The devil will come along and you can get a good look at him,” and with this advice the Rabbit left.

The next day he returned and told Alligator to crawl out and lie in the high grass and wait until the devil came. So out crawled the Alligator and took his position in the grass as directed by the Rabbit.

When he saw the Alligator so far from the water the Rabbit laughed to himself. He ran across the prairie till he reached a burning stump, got a chunk of fire, and returned to a spot near his confiding friend, where he kindled the grass and soon had the pleasure of seeing a blaze all around the Alligator. Then, running to a sandy place where there was no grass, he sat down to see the fun. He had not long to wait, for when the smoke rose in clouds and the birds flew by, and the animals ran for life over the prairie, the Alligator cried out, “Oh, Mr. Rabbit, what’s that?”

The Rabbit answered, “Oh, you lie still; that’s nothing but the devil starting out.”

Soon the fire began to crackle and roar, and the flames swept over the prairie, and the Alligator called, “Oh, Mr. Rabbit, what’s that?”

“Oh, that’s the devil’s breath. Don’t be scared. You will see him directly.” The Rabbit rolled over in the sand and kicked his heels in the air. The fire came nearer and nearer and began to burn the grass all around the Alligator, and under him, till he rolled and twisted in pain. “Don’t be scared, Mr. Alligator. Just lie still a little longer and the devil will be right there and you can get a good look at him,” cried out the Rabbit, as he saw the movements of the Alligator. But the latter could stand it no longer and started down the hill to the water through the burning grass, snapping his teeth and rolling over in pain, while the Rabbit laughed and jumped in delight, saying, “Wait, Mr. Alligator, don’t be in such a hurry. You are not afraid of the devil.” But the Alligator tumbled into the water to cool his roasted skin, and wondered how the Rabbit could stand such awful scenes.

CROW

---

FAMINE

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Hoffman, W. J. "An Absaroka Myth." Journal of the Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 10 (1881): 239–240.

Date: 1880

Original Source: Crow (Absaroka)

National Origin: Native American

---

The Absaroka (popularly known as the Crow) shared the same nomadic lifestyle as the Cheyenne (pages 50–56) and the Lakota (pages 112–120) discussed elsewhere in this anthology. The Fool Dog of this myth refers to a member of a Plains fraternity often called the Contraries, or among the Crow "Crazy-Dogs-Wishing-to-Die." The Contraries did things opposite to the norm, including such acts as riding a horse backward into battle or rolling in the snow and then complaining of the heat. They were pledged to what might be labeled self-destructive madness during war. The bravery that was expected of the young men in general was carried to extremes by the Fool Dogs. Thus, in spite of the suicidal appearance of many of their actions, they served the needs of the group. This theme is echoed in the following narrative.

---

A long time ago, before we had either guns or horses, and lived in a country where the snow never fell, there dwelt among us a beautiful maiden whom the sun saw and fell in love with. The maiden was the pride of the Absaroka, and every warrior tried to excel the others in making her presents of the finest robes. She was surrounded with every comfort, and lived in the best lodge in the village. The sun came here to visit her every night, and in time a child was born, which, as it grew older would amuse itself by sliding down the rays of sunlight that entered the lodge. After a while, Fool Dog also saw this woman and fell in love with her, but finding his love was not returned, he ravished her. The next time the sun visited her, she related all that had happened, whereupon the sun became very angry and threatened to destroy the Absaroka.

There came a great famine; the snow fell, and the buffalo did not return to the hunting grounds. The weather continued so cold during the following summer that the corn did not grow and the Absaroka were rapidly dying off from starvation and disease. Then the chief men met in council, where it was decided that it were better for them to seek a new home. It happened that while the Absaroka were moving, that Fool Dog was obliged to fall behind on the trail, as he was weak, sick, and starving; then White Wolf, the servant of the sun, appeared to him and said that the Absaroka might yet be saved if his directions were followed: Fool Dog must hasten on to overtake the party at their next camp, where an offering must be made to the sun; he must gather a large pile of dry wood and grass for kindling; also some corn and the fat of the buffalo, of which he must make ten balls, to be thrown upon the pile, when the fire would instantly appear.

When White Wolf had finished talking he disappeared, and Fool Dog started on the trail, though he had great difficulty in reaching the party who had already encamped at some distance for the night. He began to search in the various lodges for the corn and buffalo fat, but meeting only with disappointment, he strolled away from camp to meditate. Here he observed a solitary lodge, occupied by an old woman who, upon seeing the distress of Fool Dog, inquired the cause. Fool Dog told her of his meeting with White Wolf, and the instructions he had received, but said he was unable to complete the offering to the sun, necessary for the preservation of the tribe. The old woman replied that she had a little corn left that had been laid by for planting in the country to which they were going, but was willing to part with some of it for the purpose required; also, that her son had a necklace to which was attached a small buckskin sack containing buffalo fat, which he always carried about with him as "medicine"; this, said the old woman, she would also give with the corn. The old woman then left, but soon returned again with the promised articles, of which Fool Dog at once made ten balls, and hastening back to camp, he threw them upon the pile of wood, which was immediately ignited.

Then White Wolf came again and told Fool Dog that he must take a "buffalo chip" (dried bit of bison dung), pulverize it and sprinkle it upon the snow, and that upon the following morning he would find ten buffalo there, of which the Absaroka must not permit any to escape. Fool Dog followed these instructions, and all the warriors who were strong enough turned out the next morning, surrounded the buffalo which they found, and killed them.

As there was scarcely enough meat to satisfy the starving people, they began to fear that they should yet perish, when White Wolf came a third time, and told Fool Dog that he must take another "buffalo chip," pulverize it, and sprinkle it upon the snow as he had done the other, when he would find one hundred buffalo at that place upon the following morning, but the Absaroka must be careful to kill every one, and not allow a single animal to escape. Fool Dog again did as he was told, and next morning the buffalo were found as promised, when the slaughter began. It happened that one young bull escaped, who immediately ran to the sun and complained. Then the sun cursed the buffalo, and told him he would no longer protect the herds. He next called White Wolf and cursed him, saying he was no longer a servant of the sun, but would be obliged to subsist upon such offal as the Absaroka chose to leave him. The sun no longer tried to destroy the Absaroka, but remained neutral, and since that time he has had no children with an Absaroka woman.

ESKIMO

---

THE BEWITCHED WIVES

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Burrows, Elizabeth. "Eskimo Tales." Journal of American Folklore 39 (1926): 79–80.

Date: 1926

Original Source: Eskimo

National Origin: Native American

---

In this and the following narratives, the name "Eskimo" is used for the native people of the northern regions of North America. These groups are more accurately classified by other labels, for example, Inuit or Yupik. The more widely known though less precise term was chosen to preserve a user-friendly category for the collection. The cure for supernatural assault among the Eskimo is by recourse to a shaman, an individual who through personal power (as distinct from divine intervention) is able to discover the source of evil influence and remove it. In many cases, the shaman then sends the malevolent force from the victim to the original aggressor. This is the case in the following narrative when the ferns used to remove the girl's bewitchment are then used as the instrument of attacking the evil woman-spirit.

---

A little girl, who lived alone with her grandmother, followed tracks along the river till at a water-hole she found a house where a man was making arrows. He gave her no greeting, but warned her to be careful lest the door close upon her. She got away safely to the ceremonial house near-by, but here the door in closing upon her bit off a piece of her dress. On her return home her grandmother suspected her adventure from the torn garment, but the girl claimed that the rent was made by a fall on the ice.

Early next morning she returned to the Arrow-maker's with a plate of fish-heads. The house was empty. She lifted up the grass-mat on the wall and discovered another door. She went through it into a passage where she commenced sliding, first on her feet till her moccasins were worn out, then on one side, then on the other, then on her breasts, and then on her back, in each position wearing out the dress on that side. She held on to her plate of fish-heads, and at last came to a high cliff overlooking the water. She heard some one singing.

It was the Arrow-maker she had seen the previous day; he was sealing in his kayak. When he had speared the seal, lifted it on his raft, cut it up, and put it into the kayak, he came in close to the cliff, and told the girl to jump into the boat. She was afraid, but he pointed out that the place where she was covered with the bones of people who had starved to death there, and warned her that unless she obeyed, she would meet the same fate. The girl jumped, and the man took her home, warning her not to look behind at anyone who called to her. She heard people crying out, and he told her it was his wives making a great racket.

Finally they came to his home where there were two houses. He told her to go to the smaller one, where were the head-man and the head-woman who welcomed her with gifts of clothing, and sent food to the ceremonial house for the man. Several times the girl heard someone calling, but each time she refused to look in the direction of the call.

In the course of a year, the girl married the Arrow-maker. One day as she carried his food to him at the ceremonial house, she at last looked behind her at the person whom she heard calling. At once she was in the power of this evil woman-spirit, and followed her to her house. There this evil spirit gave her snow-and-oil to eat, and immediately she began to cry out continuously like the other wives. Thereupon the evil woman threw her out of the house, where her husband found her and put her into the house with the other wives.

In the large village across the river an old woman lived with her grandson, and the girl had been accustomed to give them food. When the old woman knew that the girl had been bewitched, she sent her grandson to get her. She put her on a grass-mat, removed her clothes, and with a bunch of ferns whipped her from the feet to the face, until at last the girl sat up and asked why she had been awakened.

Then the old woman directed her to take the ferns and use them in the same way on the face of the evil woman-spirit. When she had done so, the bad woman began to call out continuously as she had made others do. In the same way the girl transformed also the evil woman's father and mother, and then took them all by the hair and threw them out of the house.

Meanwhile her husband searched for her, and when he found her cured in the house of the old woman, he took her home where they lived together and had children. He always took care of the old woman who had saved her life, but the rest of the villagers all died.

THE ORIGIN OF THE NARWHAL

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Kroeber, A. L. "Tales of the Smith Sound Eskimo." Journal of American Folklore 12 (1899): 169–170.

Date: ca. 1897

Original Source: Eskimo

National Origin: Native American

---

The Arctic can be a land of meager resources. The neglect and even abandonment of those who are not able to contribute to community survival was a matter of course in the traditional culture. The cannibalistic Adlet appear in this tale (see "Origin of the Adlet and the Whiteman," page 73) as one of the trials the siblings must endure in their quest for community. This tale is widely distributed not only among the Eskimo but also among Athabascans and the Bella Bella of the Northwest Coast.

---

There was a blind boy who lived with his mother and sister. They went to a place where there was no one and lived alone. One day, when they were in their tent, a bear came up to it.

Though the boy was blind he had a bow, and the woman aimed it at the bear for him. The arrow struck the bear and killed it. The mother, however, deceived her son and told him he had missed it. She cut it up and then cooked it. The young man now smelled the bear-meat, and asked his mother whether it was not bear he was smelling. She, however, told him he was mistaken. Then she and her daughter ate it, but she would give him nothing. His sister, however, put half her food in her dress secretly, to give him later.

When her mother asked her why she was eating so much (noticing that she seemed to eat an unusual quantity), the girl answered that she was hungry. Later, when her mother was away, she gave the meat to her brother. In this way he discovered that his mother had deceived him. Then he wished for another chance to kill something, when he might not be thus deceived by his mother.

One day, when he was out of doors, a large loon came down to him and told him to sit on its head. The loon then flew with him toward its nest, and finally brought him to it, on a large cliff. After they had reached this, it began to fly again, and took him to a pond [the ocean].

The loon then dived with him, in order to make him recover his eyesight. It would dive and ask him whether he was smothering; when he answered that he was, it took him above the surface to regain his breath. Thus they dived, until the blind boy could see again. His eyesight was now very strong; he could see as far as the loon, and could even see where his mother was, and what she was doing. Then he returned. When he came back, his mother was afraid, and tried to excuse herself, and treated him with much consideration.

One day he went narwhal-hunting, using his mother to hold the line. “Spear a small narwhal,” his mother said, for she feared a large one would drag her into the water by the line fastened around her. He speared a small one, and she pulled it ashore. Then they ate its blubber.

The next time two appeared together, a small white whale and a large narwhal. “Spear the small one again,” she told him. But he speared the large one, and when it began to pull, he let go the line, so that his mother was dragged along, and forced to run, and pulled into the water.

“My knife,” she cried, in order to cut the rope. She kept calling for her knife, but he did not throw it to her, and she was drawn away and drowned. She became a narwhal herself, her hair, which she wore twisted to a point, becoming the tusk.

After this, the man who had recovered his sight, and his sister, went away. Finally they came to a house. The brother was thirsty, and wanted water. He asked his sister for some, telling her to go to the house for it. She went up to it, but was at first afraid to go in.

“Come in, come in!” cried the people inside, who were murderous Adlet. When she entered, they seized her and ate her. She had stayed away a long time, and finally her brother went to look for her.

He entered the house, but could not find her. An old man there, after having eaten of her, tried to say he did not have her, and did not know where she was. The brother, however, kept stabbing the inmates of the house with a tusk he had, trying to make them confess, but vainly, and finally killed them.

Then her brother put her bones together and went away, carrying them on his back. Then the flesh grew on the bones again, and soon she spoke, “Let me get up!”

But he said to her, “Don’t get up!”

At last she got up, however. Then they saw a great many people, and soon reached them. By this time his sister had quite recovered; she ate, and went into a house. She married there, and soon had a child. Her brother also married.

ORIGIN OF THE ADLET AND THE WHITEMAN

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Rink, H., and Franz Boas. “Eskimo Tales and Songs.” Journal of American Folklore 2 (1889): 125.

Date: 1889

Original Source: Eskimo

National Origin: Native American

It is erroneous to think of the Eskimo habitat as barren land. As their north-south range is great, there is variation in topography and land form, climate, vegetation, and the availability of fish and game. The arctic is a desert in truest sense of the world. The cold reduces the amount of moisture in the air so that some areas receive as little as four inches of precipitation a year, so it is a difficult task to obtain fresh water. Summers are short and defined when temperatures above freezing. Streams begin to flow. Water travel becomes possible, but walking becomes virtually impossible over the swampy tundra because of melting surface areas. At the onset of winter and freezing temperatures, the people begin to settle down. Nuclear families are often organized into bands. Band leadership is personal or charismatic: family allegiance, personality qualities, or physical strength. An episode in the following myth of the origin of the Adlet and the Whiteman recalls the a central figure in Eskimo myth, the female sea spirit called various names—including, for example, Takanakapsaluk, Nuliajuk, and Sedna. She is a terrifying presence living in a house at the bottom of the sea. Often the shamans traveled on spirit journeys to confront her and her entourage of monsters in times of famine or danger to win her help for the people, such help as asking her to provide seals and other sea mammals, which according to myth grew from the severed parts of he own body.

---

Saviqong (that is, the knifeman), an old man, lived alone with his daughter. Her name was Niviarsiang (that is, the girl), but as she did not want to take a husband she was also called Uinigumissuitung (that is, she who did not want to take a husband).

She refused all her suitors, but at last a dog, spotted white and red, whose name was Ijiqang (that is the powerful eye), won her affection and she married him. They had ten children, five of whom were Adlet and five dogs.

The legs of the Adlet were like those of dogs, and hairy all over, the soles excepted, while the upper part of their bodies was human. When the children grew up they became very voracious, and as the dog Ijiqang did not go hunting at all, but let his father-in-law provide for the whole family, Saviqong found great difficulty in feeding them. Moreover, the children were very clamorous and noisy; so at last their grandfather, being tired of their manifold demands and the trouble they gave him, put the whole family into his boat and carried them to a small island. He told Ijiqang to come every day and fetch meat.

Niviarsiang hung a pair of boots on his neck and he swam across the narrow channel separating the island from the mainland. But Saviqong, instead of giving him meat, filled the boots with heavy stones which drowned Ijiqang when he attempted to return to the island.

Niviarsiang thought of revenging the death of her husband. She sent the young dogs to her father's hut and let them gnaw off his feet and hands. In return Saviqong, when his daughter happened to be in his boat, threw her overboard, and cut off her fingers when she clung to the gunwale. As they fell into the sea they were transformed into seals and whales. At last he allowed her to climb again into the boat.

As she feared that her father might think of killing or maiming her children, she ordered the Adlet to go inland, where they became the ancestors of a numerous people. She made a boat for the young dogs, setting up two sticks for masts in the sole of one of her boots, and sent the puppies across the ocean. She sang, "Angnaijaja. When you will have arrived on the other side, you will make many little things. Angnaija."

WHEN RAVEN WANTED TO MARRY SNOWBIRD AND FLY WITH THE GEESE

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Kroeber, A. L. "Tales of the Smith Sound Eskimo." Journal of American Folklore 12 (1899): 173–174.

Date: 1897–1898

Original Source: Eskimo

National Origin: Native American

---

Raven served as trickster and culture hero for both the Eskimo and for many other native cultures along the Northwest Coast. Despite his gift of fire, the tales of raven also depict him with the common flaws of trickster figures—in this case lying, to satisfy his selfish impulses and intruding where his company is not wanted.

---

A small snowbird was crying because she had lost her husband. While she was crying, the raven, who had no wife, came along. When the raven reached her he said, "Why are you crying?"

"I am crying for my husband, because he has been away so long a time," said the snowbird. "My husband went out to look for food for me, and has not come back."

The raven told her that her husband was dead; that he had been sitting on a rock, when this became loosened and fell through the ice, and that he had fallen with it. "I will marry you," he said. "You can sleep here under my armpit. Take me for a husband; I have a pretty bill; I have a pretty chin I have good enough nostrils and eyes; my wings are good and large, and so are my whiskers."

But the little snowbird said, “I don’t want you for my husband.” Then the raven went away, because the snowbird did not want to marry him.

After a while the raven, who was still without a wife, came to some geese who had become persons. The geese were just going away. The raven said, “I too, I who have no wife, I am going.” The geese, because they were about to leave, now became birds again. One of them said, “It is very far away that we are going. You (meaning the raven) had better not go with us. Don’t come with us.”

The raven said, “I am not afraid to go. When I am tired, I shall sleep by whirling up.” Then they started, the raven going with them. They flew a great distance (having now become birds), passing over a large expanse of water, where there was no land to be seen. Finally, when the geese wanted to sleep, they settled and swam on the water, and there they went to sleep. The raven also grew very tired, and wanted to sleep, but of course could not swim. So he whirled upwards towards the sky. But as soon as he went to sleep, he began to drop from up there.

When he fell into the water he woke up and said, “Get together, so that I can climb on your backs and go to sleep there.” The geese did as he told them, and he was soon asleep on their backs.

Then one of the geese said, “He is not light at all. Let us shake him off, because he is so heavy.” Then they shook him off their backs into the water.

“Get together,” cried the raven. But they did not do so, and thus the raven was drowned.

RECOVERING THE SUN

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Boas, Franz. “Notes on the Eskimo of Port Clarence, Alaska.” Journal of American Folklore 7 (1894): 205–206.

Date: ca. 1894

Original Source: Eskimo

National Origin: Native American

---

Many Eskimo live in an environment in which the land is mostly tundra that remains permanently frozen except for the few inches of surface that thaw during the brief summers and the nights of winter darken until there is twilight at noon in the northernmost areas. A myth such as the following gives voice to the anxiety that this lack of light can generate. In the course of the search for the sun, the party covers a territory filled with monsters and approaches the edge of a world that Eskimo tradition maintained was flat and balanced on wooden pillars. The party succeeds because of a motif that has appeared in other Eskimo narratives: a young woman defying a parent.

---

Once upon a time the people were assembled in a singing house. While they were dancing the sun disappeared, and nobody knew what had become of it. The people were unable to go hunting, and soon all their provisions were exhausted. Then they told the women to mend their clothing carefully, and to make as many boots as possible.

These they put into bags and set out in search of the sun. It was dark all the time. They followed the seacoast, and went so long that they wore out their boots. Then they took new ones from their traveling-bags.

After many days they came to a country which swarmed with seals, walrus, and deer. There they found a people whose language they did not understand. After some time, however, they learned to converse with them. They asked these people if they had seen the sun.

The latter replied that they would come to five places. At the fifth place there lived a woman who had both the sun and the moon in her house. Then they went on. It was very cold, and they ran as fast as they could in order to keep warm. When their provisions began to run short, they reached another country which swarmed with game.

They found a people whose language they did not understand, but after some time they were able to converse with each other. There they obtained the same information as before, and went on.

It was very cold, and they ran as fast as they could, in order to keep warm. When their provisions began to run short, they reached a third country which swarmed with game.

They met a people whose language they did not understand. After some time they were able to converse, and upon their inquiries they were told that at the second place which they would reach there lived a woman named Itudlu'g-piaq, who had both sun and moon, but that it was very doubtful if they would be able to obtain it.

Then they went on. It was very cold, and they ran as fast as they could, in order to keep warm. When their provisions began to run low, they reached a country which swarmed with game. There they found dwarfs, who tried to escape when they saw the strong men coming. They caught them, however, and learned that at the next place they would find the house of Itudlu'g-piaq, who had both sun and moon.

They went on. On their way they found ice and driftwood obstructing their way, but they kicked it aside. At that time the people were very strong and able to lift heavy stones. After they had gone a long time they saw a singing house. When they came near, they went very slowly, because they were afraid.

At last one of the men tied his jacket around his waist and tied his pants around his knees. Then he crept cautiously through the entrance and put his head through the door in the bottom of the floor. He saw a young woman, Itudlu'g-piaq, sitting in the middle of the rear of the house. Her father was sitting in the middle of the right-hand side of the house, her mother in the middle of the left-hand side. In each of the rear corners a ball was hanging from the roof. At the right-hand side was a large ball, and at the left-hand side a smaller one.

Then he whispered, "Itudlu'gpiag, we came to ask you for some light."

Then her mother said, "Give them the small ball."

The man, however, refused and asked for the large ball. Then Itudlu'gpiag took it down and gave it a kick. It fell right into the entrance hole. The people took it and ran outside. Then they tore the ball to pieces and the daylight came out of it. It was not warm at once, but it grew warmer day after day. If they had taken the small ball it would have been light, but it would have remained cold.

HAIDA

---

STORY OF THE FIN-BACK CREST

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Deans, James. "Legend of the Fin-Back Whale Crest of the Haidas, Queen Charlotte's Island, B.C." Journal of American Folklore 5 (1892): 44-46.

Date: ca. 1890

Original Source: Haida

National Origin: Native American (Canada)

---

Because of the predictability of sources of subsistence, Northwest Coast cultures such as the Haida were able to develop stable settlements and devote less time to the business of staying alive. As a result, the Northwest Coast societies were highly stratified with hereditary chiefs and lineages ranging from commoners to the nobility. In any consideration of the social structure on the Northwest Coast, the references to rank and status must at some point turn to the consideration of crests. These crests were the outward symbols of rank and ancestry. They operated like coats-of-arms and parallel the crests painted on shields in medieval Europe where a similar type of art was used to reflect rank and position among European nobility. According to James Deans, "As a people, the Haidas were divided into a number of crests, or clans, each having for its crest some animal, bird, or fish. There were formerly two principal crests, or as some people style them, phratries, each being divided into a number of smaller ones. Each of these crests had a legend" (43). The following narrative is the myth of the fin-back whale, often called the killer whale.

---

It has long been related among the Haidas that at Quilcah, where the oil-works stand, about three miles west from the village of Skidegat's Town, lived, long ago, a boy, who dwelt with his aged grandmother. He was the youngest of a family of eleven sons, both his parents being dead, and also his brothers, of whom I shall say more by and by. Excepting himself and the old woman, no other person lived in that place, all the other Indians in that quarter being on Mand Island. Our hero and his grandmother belonged to a different crest from the others. Close to the spot where they lived were three stone boats or canoes. What is meant by these I do not know, unless it be canoes made entirely by hot stones and stone hammers, as used to be the case in by-gone ages. This boy, it seems, was so weak and sickly that he could neither stand upright nor walk. His weakest parts were from the knees down.

One day he said, "Granny, put me into one of these three canoes," and this she did. After sitting in the canoe for a considerable length of time he became quite strong, and was able to walk like any other person.

After becoming strong, he used to swim about in the bay. One day, instead of a swim, he concluded to have a sail, and with this idea got his grandmother's aid to put one of them into the water. While this was being done, two of them broke, but they were successful with the third. After this, instead of swimming, he used to sail about on the bay, gradually venturing farther and farther from the shore.

One day, making a further venture than usual, he sailed up the Hunnah River, a mountain stream emptying its waters into Skidegat channel, four or five miles west of the place where he lived.

Tradition says that this river in olden times was three times larger than it now is. At present there is seldom water enough to float a canoe. It is also related that the waters of the sea came higher up on the land than is now the case. (Of the rise of the land evidence is everywhere to be found.)

After pulling up the river, he became tired, so in order to rest he pulled ashore and lay down. In those days at the place where he went ashore, in the bed of the river, were a number of large boulders, while on both sides of the stream were many trees.

While resting by the river, he heard a dreadful noise, up stream, coming toward him. Looking to see what it was, he was surprised to behold all the stones in the river bed coming down towards him. The movement of these frightened him so much that he jumped to his feet and ran into the timber.

He found he had made a mistake, because all the trees were cracking and groaning, and all seemed to him to say, "Go back, go back at once to the river, and run as fast as you can." This he lost no time in doing. When again at the river, led by his curiosity, he went to see what was pushing the stones and breaking the trees; on reaching them he found that a large body of ice was coming down, pushing everything before it. Seeing this, he took his canoe and fled towards home.

Some time after this adventure with the ice, Scanna gan Nuncus [the Fin-back Whale Boy] took his trusty bow and quiver filled with arrows and went out in order to shoot a few birds.

Walking along the shore, he saw at a distance what seemed to be a man, standing on shore at the edge of the bushes, looking at him. Wondering who the stranger could be, he walked over toward him and hailed him. Receiving no answer, he went up to him, and was surprised to find only a stump with a curving dome resembling a man's head. Turning to go away, a voice which seemed to come from the head said, "Don't go away; take me down, take me down." Hearing these words, he took the stump in his arms, pulling him down at the same time. I say him, because it was a man under enchantment. Taking him down broke the spell, and he instantly became himself again.

When thus restored, he told our hero that long ago he had been taking liberties with the Cowgans [wood spirits], who as a punishment had cast upon him a spell, under the influence of which he was to remain as a stump until a young man who lived with his grandmother would come and set him free, and he, our hero, was the person predicted. The Cowgans, or wood nymphs (literally, wood mice), were said to be a number of beautiful young women whose homes were in the woods and among the mountains. At the head of these was a queen who was remarkable for her beauty, and who also lived in a magnificent palace in some unknown locality.

In order to discover the palace, and to see the queen, a thing permitted to none except those who could show some act of kindness done, the young man used to go to the woods and mountains, from which quest many never returned, and of this number were the ten brothers of our hero. These nymphs, it also appears, used to seek the company of young men, and lead them to take liberties with them, and when tired of their services would turn them into stumps.

The stump man asked our hero if he would like to see the queen and her palace, to which he answered yes.

"Well, then, go your way until you find a lame mouse trying to run on a big log, be kind to it, and it will show you what to do, and where to go."

After leaving the stump man, our hero did not go far until he saw a poor lame mouse trying to run along a large log of wood; he watched it for a while, and saw that it would run a little way and then fall off. Seeing this, he went and picked it up, put it on the log and set it going again; this he did several times. At last it stopped trying, and told our hero, "You are a good man and a kind one. Instead of killing me, every time I fell off the log you picked me up and put me on again. Many a one would have chased me and tried to kill me, but you did neither. I am not lame; I only feigned lameness in order to try you. You are Scanna gan Nuncus, and you would like to see the queen of the Cowgans. Your ten brothers also wished to see her. They could not because they were bad men; they ran after me and tried to kill me. No bad man can try to kill me and see the queen and live. That was why they all disappeared so mysteriously. By trying to put me out of the way, they all met the same fate. Now, come follow me, and I will show you the queen and her palace.”

The mouse led and our hero followed, through long grass bushes and timber, until they reached a beautiful country, where everything was fair and young. After traveling across this region for some time, they came to the palace. Anything so beautiful Scanna gan Nuncus never saw, nor ever could picture in his imagination.

“Now,” said the mouse, “let us go inside, and I will introduce you to the queen of the Cowgans.” This it did, telling her that he was a good and kindly man who, unlike his brothers, did not run after it to kill it.

When they found the queen, she was sitting spinning with a wheel. She was so pretty and fair to look on that our hero nearly forgot himself. The queen made him welcome, left her spinning, and came and sat beside him, telling him that as he was a good man he should be always welcome to her palace, and whenever he decided to visit her he had only to come to the log, and he would find her servant, the mouse, who would show him the way. How long he stayed with her I have as yet been unable to learn. Thus much I can say, that his grandmother asked him where he had lived so long. He replied that while absent he had been where few or none had ever been before; he had visited the queen of the Cowgans.

Hopi

---

HOW THE TWINS VISITED THE SUN

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Fewkes, J. Walter. "The Destruction of the Tusayan Monsters." Journal of American Folklore 8 (1895): 136–137.

Date: ca. 1895

Original Source: Hopi (Arizona)

National Origin: Native American

---

The Hopi were a farming culture that relied on rainfall to grow their crops of corn, beans, and squash. Given the fact that they are at the mercy of forces of nature, great energy was devoted to religious ceremonies that literally caused natural acts such as rainfall to occur. Religious life was developed through the religious societies and clans that were headed by strong females. Spider-Woman, the mother of the Twins, was an especially powerful female figure. Hopi witches, who were believed to be possessed of "two hearts," were traced back to mythic times. Spider-Woman (or Grandmother Spider as she is sometimes called) brought both death and witchcraft into the lives of the people.

---

The Twins lived with Spider-Woman, their mother, on the west side of Mt. Taylor, and desired to see the home of their father. Spider-Woman gave them as a charm a kind of meal, and directed that when they met the guardians of the home of the Sun, to chew a little and spurt it upon them.

The Twins journeyed far to the sunrise where the Sun's home is entered through a canon in the sky. There Bear, Mountain Lion, Snake, and "Canyon Closing" keep watch. The sky is solid in this place, and the walls of the entrance are constantly opening and closing, and would crush any unauthorized person who attempted passing through.

As the Twins approached the ever fierce watchers, the trail lay along a narrow way; they found it led them to a place on one side of which was the face of a vertical cliff, and on the other a precipice which sunk sheer to the Below (Underworld). An old man sat there, with his back against the wall and his knees drawn up close to his chin.

When they attempted to pass, the old man suddenly thrust out his legs, trying to knock the passers over the cliff. But they leaped back and saved themselves, and in reply to a protest the old man said his legs were cramped and he simply extended them for relief. Whereupon the hero remembered the charm which he had for the southwest direction, and spurted it upon the old man and forced the malignant old fellow to remain quite still with legs drawn up, until the Twins had passed.

They then went on to the watchers, guardians of the entrance to the Sun's house, whom they subdued in the same manner. They also spurted the charm on the sides of the cliff, so that it ceased its oscillation and remained open until they had passed.

These dangers being past, they entered the Sun's house and were greeted by the Sun's wife, who laid them on a bed of mats. Soon Sun came home from his trip through the underworld, saying, "I smell strange children here; when men go away their wives receive the embraces of strangers. Where are the children whom you have?" So she brought the Twins to him, and he put them in a flint oven and made a hot fire. After a while, when he opened the door of the oven, the Twins capered out laughing and dancing about his knees, and he knew that they were his sons.

HOW THE TWINS KILLED THE GIANT ELK

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Fewkes, J. Walter. "The Destruction of the Tusayan Monsters." Journal of American Folklore 8 (1895): 135–136.

Date: ca. 1895

Original Source: Hopi (Arizona)

National Origin: Native American

---

Moving beyond the role of mischievous young tricksters that is given to them in Hopi mythology, the twins mature into culture heroes in this myth. They do so by cleansing the land of a monster and giving chipmunk its distinctive markings.

---

Great Elk was one day lying down in a valley near Mount Taylor (one of the San Francisco mountains), and the Twins went out against him. Mole met them and said, “Do not encounter him, for he is mighty, and may kill you; wait here, and I will help you.” Mole then excavated four chambers in the earth, one below the other, and made the Twins remain in the upper one.

He dug a long tunnel, and coming up under Elk, plucked a little soft hair from over his heart, at which Elk turned his head and looked down, but Mole said, “Be not angry, I only want a little soft down to make a bed for my children.” So Elk allowed him to continue the plucking. But Mole took away enough fur to leave the skin quite bare over the heart. He returned to the Twins and told them what he had done.

Then each Twin threw his lightning, and wounded Elk, who sprang to his feet, and charged them, but the Twins concealed themselves in the upper chamber, and when Elk tried to gore them. His horns were not long enough; again he charged, and thrust his horns downward, but the Twins had safely retreated to the second chamber; again he tried to reach them, but they were safe in the third room. They retreated to the fourth chamber, and when Elk made another attempt he fell dead.

Chipmunk hurried to them, and after thanking the Twins said he had come to show them how to cut up the monster’s body, which with his sharp teeth he soon accomplished. One of the Twins thanked Chipmunk, and stooping he dipped the tips of the first two fingers of his right hand in Elk’s blood, and, drawing them along the body of Chipmunk, made on it the marks which he still bears.

HOW TIYO PUNISHED MAN-EAGLE

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Fewkes, J. Walter. “The Destruction of the Tusayan Monsters.” Journal of American Folklore 8 (1895): 132–137.

Date: ca. 1895

Original Source: Hopi (Arizona)

National Origin: Native American

---

Tiyo, in the following Hopi myth, is not a culture hero as were the twins. Although he serves one of the functions associated with the culture hero by destroying the monster Man-Eagle, he does so because he has enlisted powerful allies. The familiar figure Spider-Woman shows her abilities as a shape-shifter (a trait associated with witches) as well as her knowledge of medicines such as “charm flour” (bewitched corn meal). In contrast to his role in European culture, mole has been shown to be an important character in Pueblo mythology. He is an underground hunter who demonstrates talents as a trickster as he works behind the scenes in Tiyo's physical contests against Man-Eagle.

---

The ravages of Man-Eagle extended over the whole earth, afflicting all people. He carried off their women and maids, and took them to his home in the sky, where he was accustomed to sleep with such as he wished, during four nights, and then devour them.

The Youth, while on his way to the San Francisco mountains, met at the foothills the Pinon Maids, dressed in mantles of pinon bark and grass. There likewise he found Spider-Woman and Mole. After they had greeted him and bade him be seated, they inquired where he was going. He replied that Man-Eagle had carried off his bride, and that he sought to bring her back.

"I will aid you," said Spider-Woman, and told the Pinon Maids to gather pinon gum, wash it, and make a garment in exact imitation of the flint arrow-head armor which Man-Eagle is said to wear. The Pinon Maids bathed themselves, gathered and washed the gum, and made the desired garment for Spider-Woman, who gave it with charm flour to the Youth. Then she changed herself into a spider, so small as to be invisible, and perched on the Youth's right ear, that she might whisper her advice.

Mole led the way to the top of the mountains, but the Pinon Maids remained behind. When they reached the summit, Eagle swooped down; they got on his back, and he soared aloft with them until he was tired; Hawk came close by, they were transferred to his back, and he carried them still higher in the sky. When he was weary, Gray Hawk took them and mounted the heavens with them, until he could go no farther, and Red Hawk received the burden; thus for an immense distance upward they flew, until the adventurers reached a passageway through which the Youth, Spider-Woman, and Mole passed, and saw the white house in which Man-Eagle lived.

Spider-Woman advised the Youth, before mounting the ladder which led into this house, to pluck a handful of sumac berries and give them to Lizard, who received them with thanks, chewed them, and gave him back the cud. The ladder of the house had for each rung a sharp stone like a knife, which would lacerate the hands and feet of any one who attempted to climb it. The Youth rubbed these sharp edges with the chewed berries and instantly they became dull, and he was able to climb the ladder without cutting himself.

Upon entering the house of Man-Eagle, one of the first objects which met his eye was the fabulous flint arrow-head garment hanging on a peg in a recess, and he at once exchanged it for his own, the imitation which the Pinon Maids had manufactured. Glancing into another recess, he saw Man-Eagle and his lost wife. He called out to her that he had come to rescue her from the monster, and she replied that she was glad, but that he could not do so as no one ever left the place alive. Youth replied, "Have no fear; you will soon be mine again."

So powerful was Spider-Woman's charm that it prevented Man-Eagle from hearing the conversation, but he soon awoke and put on the imitation flint garment without detecting the fraud. He then for the first time became aware of the Youth's presence, and demanded what he wished.

"I have come to take my wife home," responded the hero.

Man-Eagle said, "We must gamble to decide that, and you must abide the consequences, for if you lose I shall slay you," to which the Youth agreed. Man-Eagle brought out a huge pipe, larger than a man's head, and having filled it with tobacco gave it to the hero, saying, "you must smoke this entirely out, and if you become dizzy or nauseated, you lose." So the Youth lit the pipe and smoked but exhaled nothing. He kept the pipe aglow and swallowed all the smoke, and felt no ill effect, for he passed it through his body into an underground passageway that Mole had dug. Man-Eagle was amazed, and asked what had become of the smoke. The Youth going to the door showed him great clouds of dense smoke issuing from the four cardinal points, and the monster saw that he had lost.

But Man-Eagle tried a second time with the hero. He brought out two deer antlers, saying, "We will each choose one and he who fails to break the one he has chosen loses." The antler which he laid down on the northwest side was a real antler, but that on the southeast was an imitation made of brittle wood. Spider-Woman prompted the Youth to demand the first choice, but Man-Eagle refused him that right. After the Youth had insisted four times, Man-Eagle yielded, and the hero chose the brittle antler and tore its prongs asunder, but Man-Eagle could not break the real antler, and thus lost a second time.

Man-Eagle had two fine large pine trees growing near his house, and said to the hero, "You choose one of these trees and I will take the other, and whoever plucks one up by the roots shall win." Now Mole had burrowed under one of them, and had gnawed through all its roots, cutting them off, and had run through his tunnel and was sitting at its mouth, peering through the grass anxious to see Youth win. The hero, with the help of his grandmother, chose the tree that Mole had prepared, and plucked it up, and threw it over the cliff, but Man-Eagle struggled with the other tree and could not move it, so he was unhappy in his third defeat.

Then Man-Eagle spread a great supply of food on the floor and said to Youth that he must eat all at one sitting. Tiyo (the Youth) sat and ate all the meat, bread, and porridge, emptying one food basin after another, and showed no sign of being satisfied before all was consumed; for Mole had again assisted him, and dug a large hole below to receive it, and the Youth was a winner the fourth time.

Man-Eagle then made a great wood-pile and directed Tiyo to sit upon it, saying he would ignite it, and that if the Youth were unharmed he would submit himself to the same test. The Youth took his allotted place, and Man-Eagle set fire to the pile of wood at the four cardinal points, and it speedily was ablaze. The arrow-heads of which the flint armor was made were coated with ice, which melted so that water trickled down and prevented Youth from being burnt, and all the wood-pile was consumed, leaving Tiyo unharmed.

The monster was filled with wonder, and grieved very much when he saw Youth making another great pile of wood. Still, thinking that he wore his fire-proof suit, he mounted the wood-pile, which Youth lit at the four cardinal points. The fuel blazed up, and as soon as the fire caught the imitation garment of gum, it ignited with a flash and the monster was consumed. At the prompting of Spider-Woman Tiyo approached the ashes, took the charm in his mouth and spurted it over them, when suddenly a handsome man arose. Then Spider-Woman said to him, "Will you refrain from killing people, will you forsake your evil habits?"

Man-Eagle assented with a fervent promise, and the Youth rejoicing ran to his wife, embraced her and set free all the captive women wives of the Hopi and other peoples, of whom there were many. Eagle and Hawk carried them to the earth.

IROQUOIS

---

GRANDMOTHER O-NE-HA-TAH, MOTHER OO-KWA-E, AND THE LOST BOY

Tradition Bearer: Albert Cusick

Source: Beauchamp, W. M. "Onondaga Tales." Journal of American Folklore 6 (1893): 173–178.

Date: 1893

Original Source: Onondaga

National Origin: Native American

---

This tale is from the Onondaga whose ancestral home is in New York and who were one of the original nations of the Iroquois League. The narrative shares the qualities of a folktale by virtue of taking place in a universe that has already formed, unlike the world of myth. Conversely, the narrator's final comment seems to situate the events in the very recent past giving it at least some elements of legend. The obvious irony of the plot is that an animal, especially the porcupine that in the traditions of this culture area is rarely regarded as benevolent, should be kinder than the boy's peers. It is significant that the other animals in the tale are among the clan totems of the traditional Onandaga. Bear, in many Native American traditions, is regarded as the most anthropomorphic of the animals. Some mythologies, in fact, maintain that bears were once human. This makes Oo-kwa-e the logical guardian for the lost boy. Inevitably, however, the tale seems to argue that the established boundaries (in this case, the dividing line between human and nonhuman) cannot be violated.

---

A long time ago, among the Onondaga Indians, were several families who went off to camp near the wildwood streams, where fish, deer, bear, otter, beaver, and other like game could be caught for winter use.

These Onondagas, or People of the Hill, journeyed several days, and finally came to the hunting-grounds. The hunting-ground where they stopped was a very beautiful place, with its little hills and the river with high banks. Not far from their camp was a beautiful lake, with high rocky banks, and with little islands full of cedar trees. When they came there it was in the moon or month of Clzut-ho-wa-ah, or October.

Some of these Indians made their camps near the river, and some near the lake. As it was quite early in the season for hunting, some of the Indians amused themselves by making birch-bark canoes. With these they could go up and down the river and on the lakes, fishing and trapping, or making deadfalls for smaller game.

In the party were five little boys, who had their own bows and arrows, and would go hunting, imitating their fathers and uncles. Among them was one much smaller than the rest, who was greatly teased by the older boys. Sometimes they would run away from him and hide themselves in the woods, leaving him crying; then they would come back and show themselves, and have a great laugh over the little boy's distress. Sometimes they would run for the camp, and would tell him that a bear or a wolf was chasing them, leaving the little boy far behind, crying with all his might. Many a time he sought his father's camp alone, when the other boys would leave him and hide themselves in the woods.

One day these little Indians found a great hollow log lying on the ground. One of them said, "Maybe there is a Ta-hone-tah-na-ken [rabbit] or a Hi-sen [red squirrel] in this hollow log. Let us shoot into it, and see if there is any Ta-hone-tah-na-ken in it."

All agreed to this, and they began to take the little boy's arrows from him and shoot them into the hole; then the larger boys said to him, "Now go into the hollow log, and get your arrows."

The little boy said, "No; I am afraid something might catch me." Then he began to cry, and was not at all willing to go into the log.

The others coaxed him to do so, and one said he would get his uncle to make him a new bow and arrows if he would go into the hollow log, and get the arrows they had shot there. At last this tempted the little boy. He stopped crying, got down on his hands and knees, and crawled into the log. When he had gone in a little way, he found one of his arrows, and handed it out. This gave him courage to go in a little farther.

When he had advanced some distance in the log, one of the larger boys said, "Let's stop up the log, and trap that boy in it, so that he can't get out." This was soon agreed to, and the boys began to fetch old rotten wood and old limbs, stopping up the hollow, and trapping the little boy in it. When this mischief was done, the four boys ran to their camp, not saying a word about the little boy who was trapped in the log.

It was two days before the mother and father began to notice the absence of their boy, for they thought he must have stayed over night with one of the others, as very often he had done, but the second day a search was begun, and the other four boys were asked whereabouts they had left him.

They all said that they did not know, and that the last time they were out the little boy did not go with them. Then the entire camp turned out to join in the search, as now they knew that the boy must be lost. After they had hunted a long time he could not be found, and they ceased to look for him; they thought he must have been killed and eaten by a wolf or a bear.

When he was first shut up in the log the little boy tried to get out, but could not do it, as the chunks of rotten wood were too large for him to move. He could not kick or push them out.

Then he cried for help, but no one came. There he was for three days and three nights, crying loudly for help, and now and then falling asleep.

But on the fourth night, while he was in the hollow log, he thought he heard some one coming. He listened, and was sure he heard the crying of a very old woman and the noise of the tramping of human feet. The crying and the tramping came nearer and nearer to the log where he was. At last the crying came very close to him, and then he heard a noise, as though some one sat down on the log.

Now he heard the old woman cry in earnest, and now and then she would say, "Oh, how tired I am! How tired I am! and yet I may have come too late, for I do not hear my grandchild cry. He may be dead! He may be dead!" Then the old woman would cry in earnest again.

At last he heard a rap on the log and his own name called, "Ha-yah-noo! Ha-yah-noo! are you still alive?"

Ha-yah-noo, or Footprints under the Water (for this was the name of the little lost boy), answered the old woman, and said that he still lived.

The old woman said, "Oh, how glad I am to find my grandchild still alive!"

Then she asked Ha-yah-noo if he could not get out, but he said he could not, for he had already tried.

Then said the old woman, "I will try to get you out of this log." He heard her pull at the chunks of old wood, but at last she said she could not get him out, as she was too old and tired. She had heard him crying three days before, and had journeyed three days and nights to come and help her grandchild out of his trouble. Now this old woman was an O-ne-ha-tah, or Porcupine. She lived in an old hemlock tree near the spot where the boy was shut up in the log.

When Grandmother O-ne-ha-tah had said that she had to journey three days and nights, and now she could not help Ha-yah-noo out of the log, she was very sorry, and began to cry again. Finally she said that she had three children, who were very strong, and that she would get them to help her; so she went after them.

It was almost daylight when they came, and then Ha-yah-noo heard them pull out the chunks which stopped up the log. At last Grandmother

O-ne-ha-tah said to Ha-yah-noo, "Come out now. My children have got the chunks out of the log. You can come out."

When Ha-yah-noo came out, he saw four wild animals around him. There was Grandmother O-ne-ha-tah and her three children, as she called them. They were Oo-kwa-e, the Bear; Sken-no-doh, the Deer; and Tah-you-ne, the Wolf. "Now," said O-ne-ha-tah, "I want one of you to take care of this boy, and love him as your own child. You all know that I have got to be very, very old. If I were younger I would take care of him myself."

Tah-you-ne, the Wolf, was the first one to speak. She said she could take care of the boy, as she lived on the same meat on which he fed.

"No," said Grandmother O-ne-ha-tah, "you are too greedy. You would eat up the boy as soon as he is left with you alone." The Wolf was very angry. She showed her teeth, and snapped them at the boy, who was very much afraid, and wanted no such mother.

The next that spoke was Sken-no-doh, the Deer. She said that she and her husband would take care of the boy, as they lived on corn and other things which they knew the boy liked. Her husband would carry him on his back wherever they went.

But Grandmother O-ne-ha-tah said, "No, you can't take care of the boy, for you are always traveling, and never stay in one place. The boy cannot do the traveling that you do, for you run very fast and make very long journeys. The boy cannot stand it, and you have no home for him for the winter. Boys like this have homes." Then the Deer ran away, very happy, as though she were glad to be rid of the boy.

Then Oo-kwa-e, the Bear, said that she knew she could take care of the boy, as she lived in a large stone house and had plenty to eat. She lived on meats and fishes, and all kinds of nuts and berries, and even wild honey, all of which the boy would like. She had a good warm bed for him to sleep on through the winter, and she was a loving mother to her children. She would rather die than see them abused.

Then O-ne-ha-tah said, "You are just the right one to take care of this boy. Take him and carry him home." So the Bear, like a loving mother, took the boy and brought him to her home.

When they got there, Oo-kwa-e said to her two children, the Oo-tutch-ha, or Young Bears, "Don't play with him roughly, and he will be your kind little brother." Then she gave him some berries to eat, and they were all happy together.

The stone house was a cave in the rocks, but to the little boy it seemed to have rooms like any other house, and the little bears seemed to him like human children. They did not tease him, but lived in the most friendly way, and the old Oo-kwa-e was a very kind mother to the boy.

It was now quite late in the fall, and the days became short and dark. Then Mother Oo-kwa-e said, "It is late and dark now. We had better go to bed." The nights were cold, but the bed was warm, and they slept until the spring.

One evening it thundered; for the bears do not wake up until the thunder is heard. It made such a noise that they thought the walls were coming down. Then the old Oo-kwa-e said, "Why, it's getting light. We had better get up." So they lived happily together for a very long time. She went out in the woods, going to and fro for food, and the children amused themselves at home.

Every now and then, through the summer, the Bear people would come in and say, "In such a place are plenty of berries." These would be strawberries, raspberries, or others, according to the season. Later they told of chestnuts and other kinds of nuts, of which they were fond. Then they would say, "Let us go and gather them."

So the Mother Bear and the little Bears went, taking the little boy along with them; for they always expected a good time. The other bears knew nothing about the little boy. When they came near the spot, and he was seen, these would be frightened, and say, "There is a human being! Let us run! let us run!" So they would scamper off as fast as bears can, leaving their heaps of nuts or berries behind them. Then the old Oo-kwa-e would gather these up, she and her children, and take them home, which was a very easy way of getting plenty of food. Thus the boy became very useful to Mother Bear.

The boy lived with them thus for about three years, and the same things happened every year. In the third year Mother Bear said, "Some one is coming to kill us." Then all looked out, and saw a man coming through the woods, with his bow and arrows in his hand, and his dog running all around looking for game. Then Mother Bear said, "I must see what I can do." So she took a forked stick, and pointed the open fork towards the man. It seemed to come near him, and appeared to him like a line of thick brush that he did not wish to break through. So he turned aside, and went another way, and they were safe that time.

Another day she again said, "Someone is coming towards us again, and we shall be killed." She put forth the forked stick again; but the man did not mind it, and came straight towards her stone house. The stick itself split, and there was nothing in the way. Then she took a bag of feathers and threw these outside. They flew up and down, and around and around, and seemed like a flock of partridges. The dog ran after them, through the bushes and trees, supposing them to be birds, and so the second man went away.

The days went by, and the third time Mother Bear saw a man coming. This time she said, "Now we certainly are all going to die."

Then she said to the boy, "Your father is coming now, and he is too good a hunter to be fooled. There is his dog, with his four eyes, and he, too, is one of the best of hunters." Now when a dog has light spots over each eye, the Indians say that he has four eyes. So the man came nearer, and she tried the forked stick, but it split; and still the man and dog came on. Then she scattered the feathers, and they flew around as before; but the hunter and dog paid no attention to them, and still they both came on. At last the dog reached the door and barked, and the man drew his bow to shoot at anything that came out.

When the Mother Oo-kwa-e saw the man standing there, she said, "Now, children, we must all take our bundles and go." So each of the Bears took a small bundle and laid it on its back, but there was no bundle at all for the boy. When all were ready, Mother Oo-kwa-e said, "I will go first, whatever may happen." So she opened the door, and as she went out the man shot, and she was killed.

Then the oldest of the Oo-tutch-ha said, "I will go next"; and as he went he also was killed.

The last little Bear was afraid, and said to the boy, "You go first." But the little boy was afraid, too, and said, "No; you go first. I have no bundle." For all the Bears tried to get their bundles between them and the man. So the little Bear and the boy at last went out together; but though the Bear tried to keep behind, the man shot at him first, and he was killed. As the hunter was about to shoot again, the boy called out, "Don't shoot me! Don't shoot me! I am not a bear!"

His father dropped his arrow, for he knew his voice at once, and said, "Why did you not call out before? Then I would not have killed the Oo-kwa-e and Oo-tutch-ha. I am very sorry for what I have done, for the Bears have been good to you."

But the boy said, "You did not kill the Bears, though you thought so. You only shot the bundles. I saw them thrown down, and the spirits of the Bears run off from behind them." Still, the man was sorry he had shot at the Bears, for he wished to be kind to them, as they had been to his boy.

Then the father began to look at his boy more closely, to see how he had grown and how he had changed. Then he saw that long hairs were growing between his fingers, for, living so long with them, he had already begun to turn into a Bear. He was very glad when he took the boy back to his home, and his friends and relatives, and the whole town, rejoiced with him. All day they had a great feast, and all night they danced, and they were still dancing when I came away.

GA'NA'A'S ADVENTURES AMONG THE CHEROKEE

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Mooney, James. Myths of the Cherokee. Nineteenth Annual Report of the Bureau of American Ethnology, 1897–1898, Part I. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1900, 367–370.

Date: 1883

Original Source: Iroquois (Seneca)

National Origin: Native American

The linking of athletic endeavors, dance, warfare, and spirituality in this legend is found not only in the Northeast but throughout Native America cultures and in myriad other warrior cultures globally. Dance and games (in this case what came to be called “lacrosse”) are used for training warrior attributes and for displaying these attributes both within one’s own group and to the enemy. For example, peace terms are accepted by the Cherokee after the Seneca (like the Mohawk, also members of the Iroquois League) vigorously demonstrate their physical prowess through dance. Conversely, the Seoqgwageono (possibly an indigenous name for either the Catawba or Tuscarora) decide to wage war on the Cherokee after defeating their representative in a foot race. Furthermore, warfare and athletic competition both are seen as activities that must be supported by supernatural power. Strengthening and purification rituals, taboos, and amulets all figure into the preparation for both. Often success at one of these enterprises is evidence of the spiritual superiority of oneself or one’s spiritual support system. It is probably in the light of such supernatural strength that the Seoqgwageono’s assertion of being a “double man” should be interpreted.

---

Ga'na'a was a Seneca war chief. He called a council and said, “We must go to the Cherokee and see if we can’t agree to be friendly together and live in peace hereafter.” The people consented, and the chief said, “We must go to water first before we start.” So they went, a great party of warriors, far away into the deep forest by the river side. There were no women with them. For ten days they drank medicine every morning to make them vomit and washed and bathed in the river each day.

Then the chief said, “Now we must get the eagle feathers.” They went to the top of a high hill and dug a trench there the length of a man’s body, and put a man into it, with boughs over the top so that he could not be seen, and above that they put the whole body of a deer. Then the people went off out of sight, and said the words to invite the Great Eagle that lives in the clouds, to come down.

The man under the brushwood heard a noise, and a common eagle came and ate a little and flew away again. Soon it came back, ate a little more, and flew off in another direction. It told the other birds and they came, but the man seared them away, because he did not want common birds to eat the meat. After a while he heard a great noise coming through the air, and he knew it was the bird he wanted. The Great Eagle is very cautious, and looked around in every direction for some time before he began to eat the meat. As soon as he was eating the man put his hand up cautiously and caught hold of the bird’s tail and held on to it. The Great Eagle rose up and flew away, and the man had pulled out one feather. They had to trap a good many eagles in this way, and it was two years before they could get enough feathers to make a full tail, and were ready to start for the Cherokee country.

They were many days on the road, and when they got to the first Cherokee town they found there was a stockade around it so that no enemy could enter. They waited until the gate was open, and then two Seneca dancers went forward, carrying the eagle feathers and shouting the signal yell.

When the Cherokee heard the noise they came out and saw the two men singing and dancing, and the chief said, "These men must have come upon some errand." The Seneca messengers came up and said, "Call a council; we have come to talk on important business." All turned and went toward the townhouse, the rest of the Seneca following the two who were dancing. The townhouse was crowded, and the Seneca sang and danced until they were tired before they stopped. The Cherokee did not dance.

After the dance the Seneca chief said, "Now I will tell you why we have come so far through the forest to see you. We have thought among ourselves that it is time to stop fighting. Your people and ours are always on the lookout to kill each other, and we think it is time for this to stop. Here is a belt of wampum to show that I speak the truth. If your people are willing to be friendly, take it," and he held up the belt.

The Cherokee chief stepped forward and said, "I will hold it in my hand, and tomorrow we will tell you what we decide." He then turned and said to the people, "Go home and bring food." They went and brought so much food that it made a great pile across the house, and all of both tribes ate together, but could not finish it.

Next day they ate together again, and when all were done the Cherokee chief said to the Seneca, "We have decided to be friendly and to bury our weapons, these knives and hatchets, so that no man may take them up again."

The Seneca chief replied, "We are glad you have accepted our offer, and now we have all thrown our weapons in a pile together, and the white wampum hangs between us, and the belt shall be as long as a man and hang down to the ground."

Then the Cherokee chief said to his people, "Now is the time for any of you that wishes to adopt a relative from among the Seneca to do so."

So some Cherokee women went and picked out one man and said, "You shall be our uncle," and some more took another for their brother, and so on until only Ga'na'a, the chief, was left, but the Cherokee chief said, "No one must take Ga'na'a for a young man is here to claim him as his father."

Then the young man came up to Ga'na'a and said, "Father, I am glad to see you. Father, we will go home," and he led Ga'na'a to his own mother's house, the house where Ga'na'a had spent the first night. The young man was really his son, and when Ga'na'a came to the house he recognized the woman as his wife who had been carried off long ago by the Cherokee.

While they were there a messenger came from the Seoqgwageono tribe, that lived near the great salt water in the east, to challenge the Cherokee to a ball play. He was dressed in skins which were so long that they touched the ground. He said that his people were already on the way and would arrive in a certain number of days. They came on the appointed day and the next morning began to make the bets with the Cherokee. The Seneca were still there.

The strangers bet two very heavy and costly robes, besides other things. They began to play, and the Cherokee lost the game. Then the Seneca said, "We will try this time." Both sides bet heavily again, and the game began, but after a little running the Seneca carried the ball to their goal and made a point. Before long they made all the points and won the game. Then the bets were doubled, and the Seneca won again. When they won a third game also the Seoqgwageono said, "Let us try a race," and the Seneca agreed.

The course was level, and the open space was very wide. The Cherokee selected the Seneca runner, and it was agreed that they would run the first race without betting and then make their bets on the second race. They ran the first race, and when they reached the post the Seneca runner was just the measure of his body behind the other. His people asked him if he had done his best, but he said, "No; I have not," so they made their bets, and the second race—the real race—began. When they got to the middle the Seneca runner said to the other, "Do your best now, for I am going to do mine," and as he said it he pulled out and left the other far behind and won the race.

Then the Seoqgwageono said, "There is one more race yet—the long race," and they got ready for it, but the Cherokee chief said to his own men, "We have won everything from these people. I think it will be best to let them have one race, for if they lose all, they may make trouble." They selected a Cherokee to run, and he was beaten, and the Seoqgwageono went home.

In a few days they sent a messenger to challenge the Cherokee to meet them halfway for a battle. When the Cherokee heard this they said to the Seneca, "There are so few of you here that we don't want to have you killed. It is better for you to go home." So the Seneca went back to their own country.

Three years later they came again to visit the Cherokee, who told them that the Seoqgwageono had won the battle, and that the chief of the enemy had said afterward, "I should like to fight the Seneca, for I am a double man." Before long the enemy heard that the Seneca were there and sent them a challenge to come and fight.

The Seneca said, "We must try to satisfy them," so with Cherokee guides they set out for the country of the Seoqgwageono. They went on until they came to an opening in the woods within one day's journey of the first village. Then they stopped and got ready to send two messengers to notify the enemy, but the Cherokee said, "You must send them so as to arrive about sundown." They did this, and when the messengers arrived near the town they saw all the people out playing ball.

The two Seneca went around on the other side, and began throwing sumac darts as they approached, so that the others would think they were some of their own men at play. In this way they got near enough to kill a man who was standing alone. They scalped him, and then raising the scalp yell they rushed off through the woods, saying to each other as they ran, “Be strong—Be strong.”

Soon they saw the Seoqgwageono coming on horses, but managed to reach a dry creek and to bide under the bank, so that the enemy passed on without seeing them.

The next morning they came out and started on, but the enemy was still on the watch, and before long the two men saw the dust of the horses behind them. The others came up until they were almost upon them and began to shoot arrows at them, but by this time the two Seneca were near the opening where their own friends were hiding, drawn up on each side of the pass. As the pursuers dashed in the two lines of the Seneca closed in and every man of the Seoqgwageono was either killed or taken.

The Seneca went back to the Cherokee country and after about a month they returned to their own homes. Afterward the Cherokee told them, “We hear the Seoqgwageono think you dangerous people. They themselves are conjurers and can tell what other people are going to do, but they cannot tell what the Seneca are going to do. The Seneca medicine is stronger.”

THE UNSEEN HELPERS

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Mooney, James. Myths of the Cherokee. Nineteenth Annual Report of the Bureau of American Ethnology, 1897–1898, Part I. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1900, 360–362.

Date: 1883

Original Source: Iroquois (Seneca)

National Origin: Native American

---

The Seneca of this legend were one of the nations of the Iroquois League. Although no particular clan membership was specified for Ganogwioeoñ, the Wolf Clan was one of the eight traditional Seneca clans. If he was, in fact, one of the Wolf Clan, this might explain the behavior of his “unseen helpers.” A more likely bond, however, would be that the wolf was his guardian spirit animal. As such, the wolf taught and protected its protégée, and the man would be obliged to pay homage in various ways to the guardian. This may be the reason that, as the wolf says in this supernatural legend, he always gave the best part of his hunt to them.

---

Ganogwioeñ, a war chief of the Seneca, led a party against the Cherokee. When they came near the first town he left his men outside and went in alone. At the first house he found an old woman and her granddaughter. They did not see him, and he went into the sweatlodge and hid himself under some wood.

When darkness came on he heard the old woman say, "Maybe Ganogwioeñ is near; I'll close the door." After a while he heard them going to bed. When he thought they were asleep he went into the house. The fire had burned down low, but the girl was still awake and saw him. She was about to scream, when he said, "I am Ganogwioeñ. If you scream I'll kill you. If you keep quiet I'll not hurt you." They talked together, and he told her that in the morning she must bring the chief's daughter to him. She promised to do it, and told him where he should wait. Just before daylight he left the house.

In the morning the girl went to the chief's house and said to his daughter, "Let's go out together for wood." The chief's daughter got ready and went with her, and when they came to the place where Ganogwioeñ was hiding he sprang out and killed her, but did not hurt the other girl. He pulled off the scalp and gave such a loud scalp yell that all the warriors in the town heard it and came running out after him. He shook the scalp at them and then turned and ran. He killed the first one that came up, but when he tried to shoot the next one the bow broke and the Cherokee got him.

They tied him and carried him to the two women of the tribe who had the power to decide what should be done with him. Each of these women had two snakes tattooed on her lips, with their heads opposite each other, in such a way that when she opened her mouth the two snakes opened their mouths also. They decided to burn the soles of his feet until they were blistered, then to put grains of corn under the skin and to chase him with clubs until they had beaten him to death.

They stripped him and burnt his feet. Then they tied a bark rope around his waist, with an old man to hold the other end, and made him run between two lines of people, and with clubs in their hands. When they gave the word to start Ganogwioeñ pulled the rope away from the old man and broke through the line and ran until he had left them all out of sight. When night came he crawled into a hollow log. He was naked and unarmed, with his feet in a pitiful condition, and thought he could never get away.

He heard footsteps on the leaves outside and thought his enemies were upon him. The footsteps came up to the log and someone said to another, "This is our friend." Then the stranger said to Ganogwioeñ, "You think you are the same as dead, but it is not so. We will take care of you. Stick out your feet." He put out his feet from the log and felt something licking them.

After awhile the voice said, "I think we have licked his feet enough. Now we must crawl inside the log and lie on each side of him to keep him warm." They crawled in beside him. In the morning they crawled out and told him to stick out his feet again.

They licked them again and then said to him, "Now we have done all we can do this time. Go on until you come to the place where you made a bark shelter a long time ago, and under the bark you will find something to help you." Ganogwioeñ crawled out of the log, but they were gone. His feet were better now and he could walk comfortably. He went on until about noon, when he came to the bark shelter, and under it he found a knife, an awl, and a flint, that his men had hidden there two years before. He took them and started on again.

Toward evening he looked around until he found another hollow tree and crawled into it to sleep. At night he heard the footsteps and voices again. When he put out his feet again, as the strangers told him to do, they licked his feet as before and then crawled in and lay down on each side of him to keep him warm. Still he could not see them. In the morning after they went out they licked his feet again and said to him, "At noon you will find food." Then they went away.

Ganogwioeñ crawled out of the tree and went on. At noon he came to a burning log, and near it was a dead bear, which was still warm, as if it had been killed only a short time before. He skinned the bear and found it very fat. He cut up the meat and roasted as much as he could eat or carry. While it was roasting he scraped the skin and rubbed rotten wood dust on it to clean it until he was tired. When night came: he lay down to sleep. He heard the steps and the voices again and one said, "Well, our friend is lying down. He has plenty to eat, and it does not seem as if he is going to die. Let us lick his feet again." When they had finished they said to him, "You need not worry anymore now. You will get home all right." Before it was day they left him.

When morning came he put the bearskin around him like a shirt, with the hair outside, and started on again, taking as much of the meat as he could carry. That night his friends came to him again. They said, "Your feet are well, but you will be cold," so they lay again on each side of him. Before daylight they left, saying, "About noon you will find something to wear." He went on and about midday he came to two young bears just killed. He skinned them and dressed the skins, then roasted as much meat as he wanted and lay down to sleep. In the morning he made leggings of the skins, took some of the meat, and started on.

His friends came again the next night and told him that in the morning he would come upon something else to wear. As they said, about noon he found two fawns just killed. He turned the skins and made himself a pair of moccasins, then cut some of the meat, and traveled on until evening, when he made a fire and had supper.

That night again he heard the steps and voices, and one said, "My friend, very soon now you will reach home safely and find your friends all well. Now we will tell you why we have helped you. Whenever you went hunting you always gave the best part of the meat to us and kept only the smallest part for yourself. For that we are thankful and help you. In the morning you will see us and know who we are.”

In the morning when he woke up they were still there—two men as he thought—but after he had said the last words to them and started on, he turned again to look, and one was a white wolf and the other a black wolf. That day he reached home.

ISLETA

---

THE ANTELOPE BOY

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Lummis, Charles. Pueblo Indian Folk-Stories. New York: Century, 1910, 12–21.

Date: 1910

Original Source: Isleta Pueblo, New Mexico

National Origin: Native American

---

The Tiwa of Isleta, like the Acoma (see “Origin of Acoma,” page 3), developed an agricultural way of life based on raising corn, beans, and squash. The diet provided by these crops was supplemented by hunting, as was the case with Acoma. Eastern, or Rio Grande, Pueblos such as Isleta, unlike the Western Pueblo of Acoma, relied on irrigation for their crops and thus developed a strong village identity and loyalty. The village was divided into halves, called moieties, the Summer People and the Winter People. Each of the moieties had a Cacique (principal religious authority) who governed the village’s religious life for half of the year. The Caciques were elders who were chosen for wisdom, even temperament, and their ability to maintain village harmony. They stood in polar opposition to the witches who play so prominent a role in the following myth. The cigarettes smoked by Antelope Boy to create rain clouds are the equivalent to the pipe that is familiar to other Native American traditions. The power of Antelope Boy comes from both his animal spirit helpers and from his marginal status as a human who was raised by antelopes. This marginality is also an attribute of trickster.

---

Once upon a time there were two towns of the Tiwa, called White Village and Yellow Village. A man of White village and his wife were attacked by Apaches while out on the plains one day, and took refuge in a cave, where they were besieged. And there a boy was born to them. The father was killed in an attempt to return to his village for help; and starvation finally forced the mother to crawl forth by night seeking roots to eat. Chased by the Apaches, she escaped to her own village, and it was several days before she could return to the cave-only to find it empty.

The baby had begun to cry soon after her departure. Just then a Coyote was passing, and heard. Taking pity on the child, he picked it up and carried it across the plain until he came to a herd of antelopes. Among them was a Mother-Antelope that had lost her fawn; and going to her the Coyote said, "Here is a poor thing that is left by its people. Will you take care of it?"

The Mother Antelope, remembering her own baby, with tears said "Yes," and at once adopted the tiny stranger, while the Coyote thanked her and went home.

So the boy became as one of the antelopes, and grew up among them until he was about twelve years old. Then it happened that a hunter came out from White village for antelopes, and found this herd. Stalking them carefully, he shot one with an arrow. The rest started off, running like the wind; but ahead of them all, as long as they were in sight, he saw a boy!

The hunter was much surprised, and, shouldering his game, walked back to the village, deep in thought. Here he told the Cacique what he had seen. Next day the crier was sent out to call upon all the people to prepare for a great hunt, in four days, to capture the Indian boy who lived with the antelopes.

While preparations were going on in the village, the antelopes in some way heard of the intended hunt and its purpose. The Mother-Antelope was very sad when she heard it, and at first would say nothing. But at last she called her adopted son to her and said, "Son, you have heard that the people of White village are coming to hunt. But they will not kill us; all they wish is to take you. They will surround us, intending to let all the antelopes escape from the circle. You must follow me where I break through the line, and your real mother will be coming on the northeast side in a white manta (robe). I will pass close to her, and you must stagger and fall where she can catch you."

On the fourth day all the people went out upon the plains. They found and surrounded the herd of antelopes, which ran about in a circle when the hunters closed upon them. The circle grew smaller, and the antelopes began to break through; but the hunters paid no attention to them, keeping their eyes upon the boy. At last he and his antelope mother were the only ones left, and when she broke through the line on the northeast he followed her and fell at the feet of his own human mother, who sprang forward and clasped him in her arms.

Amid great rejoicing he was taken to White village, and there he told the principales (Council of advisors) how he had been left in the cave, how the Coyote had pitied him, and how the Mother-Antelope had reared him as her own son.

It was not long before all the country round about heard of the Antelope Boy and of his marvelous fleetness of foot. You must know that the antelopes never comb their hair, and while among them the boy's head had grown very bushy. So the people called him Pée-hleh-o-wah-wée-deh (big-headed little boy).

Among the other villages that heard of his prowess was Yellow Village, all of whose people "had the bad road." They had a wonderful runner named Pée-k'hoo (Deer-foot), and very soon they sent a challenge to White village for a championship race. Four days were to be given for preparation, to make bets, and the like. The race was to be around the world. Each village was to stake all its property and the lives of all its people on the result of the race. So powerful were the witches of Yellow Village that they felt safe in proposing so serious a stake; and the people of White village were ashamed to decline the challenge.

The day came, and the starting-point was surrounded by all the people of the two villages, dressed in their best. On each side were huge piles of ornaments and dresses, stores of grain, and all the other property of the people. The runner for the Yellow Village was a tall, sinewy athlete, strong in his early manhood; and when the Antelope Boy appeared for the other side, the witches set up a howl of derision, and began to strike their rivals and jeer at them, saying, "We might as well begin to kill you now! What can that little thing do?"

At the word "Hái-ko!" ("Go!") the two runners started toward the east like the wind. The Antelope Boy soon forged ahead; but Deer-foot, by his witchcraft, changed himself into a hawk and flew lightly over the lad, saying, "We do this way to each other!" The Antelope Boy kept running, but his heart was very heavy, for he knew that no feet could equal the swift flight of the hawk.

But just as he came halfway to the east, a Mole came up from its burrow and said: "My son, where are you going so fast with a sad face?"

The lad explained that the race was for the property and lives of all his people; and that the witch-runner had turned to a hawk and left him far behind.

"Then, my son," said the Mole, "I will be he that shall help you. Only sit down here a little while, and I will give you something to carry."

The boy sat down, and the Mole dived into the hole, but soon came back with four cigarettes. Holding them out, the Mole said, "Now, my son, when you have reached the east and turned north, smoke one; when you have reached the north and turn west, smoke another; when you turn south, another, and when you turn east again, another. Go!"

The boy ran on, and soon reached the east. Turning his face to the north he smoked the first cigarette. No sooner was it finished than he became a young antelope; and at the same instant a furious rain began. Refreshed by the cool drops, he started like an arrow from the bow. Halfway to the north he came to a large tree; and there sat the hawk, drenched and chilled, unable to fly, and crying piteously.

“Now, friend, we too do this to each other,” called the boy-antelope as he dashed past. But just as he reached the north, the hawk—which had become dry after the short rain—caught up and passed him, saying, “We too do this to each other!”

The boy-antelope turned westward, and smoked the second cigarette; and at once another terrific rain began. Halfway to the west he again passed the hawk shivering and crying in a tree, and unable to fly; but as he was about to turn to the south, the hawk passed him with the customary taunt. The smoking of the third cigarette brought another storm, and again the antelope passed the wet hawk halfway, and again the hawk dried its feathers in time to catch up and pass him as he was turning to the east for the home-stretch. Here again the boy-antelope stopped and smoked a cigarette—the fourth and last. Again a short, hard rain came, and again he passed the water-bound hawk halfway.

Knowing the witchcraft of their neighbors, the people of White village had made the condition that, in whatever shape the racers might run the rest of the course, they must resume human form upon arrival at a certain hill upon the fourth turn, which was in sight of the goal. The last wetting of the hawk’s feathers delayed it so that the antelope reached the hill just ahead; and there, resuming their natural shapes, the two runners came sweeping down the home-stretch, straining every nerve. But the Antelope Boy gained at each stride. When they saw him, the witch-people felt confident that he was their champion, and again began to push, and taunt, and jeer at the others. But when the little Antelope Boy sprang lightly across the line, far ahead of Deer-foot, their joy turned to mourning.

The people of White village burned all the witches upon the spot, in a great pile of corn; but somehow one escaped, and from him come all the witches that trouble us to this day.

The property of the witches was taken to White village; and as it was more than that village could hold, the surplus was sent to Isleta, where we enjoy it to this day; and later the people themselves moved here. And even now, when we dig in that little hill on the other side of the pool, we find charred corn-cobs, where our forefathers burned the witch-people of the Yellow Village.

THE HERO TWINS

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Lummis, Charles. Pueblo Indian Folk-Stories. New York: Century, 1910, 206–214.

Date: 1910

Original Source: Isleta Pueblo, New Mexico

National Origin: Native American

According to Charles Lummis who collected the following myth at Isleta Pueblo, the narrative was imported into the Tiwa village by Keres (Quères) speakers from the villages of Laguna and Acoma who were given refuge from crop failure brought on by a drought and stayed to become residents of Isleta. The Hero Twins are prominent figures in Pueblo myth as tricksters and culture heroes. Similar twin figures, in fact, are found throughout Native North America (see, for example, the Wichita “The Two Boys Who Slew the Monsters and Became Stars,” page 148).

---

Máw-Sahv and Oó-yah-wee, as the Hero Twins are named in Quères, had the Sun for a father. Their mother died when they were born, and lay lifeless upon the hot plain. But the two wonderful boys, as soon as they were a minute old, were big and strong, and began playing.

There chanced to be in a cliff to the southward a nest of white crows; and presently the young crows said, “Nana, what is that over there? Isn’t it two babies?”

“Yes,” replied the Mother-Crow, when she had taken a look. “Wait and I will bring them.” So she brought the boys safely, and then their dead mother; and, rubbing a magic herb on the body of the latter, soon brought her to life.

By this time Máw-Sahv and Oó-yah-wee were sizable boys, and the mother started homeward with them. “Now,” said she when they reached the edge of the valley and could look across to that wondrous rock whereon stands Acoma, “go to yonder town, my sons, for that is where live your grandfather and grandmother, my parents; and I will wait here. Go ye in at the west end of the town and stand at the south end of the council-grounds until some one speaks to you; and ask them to take you to the Cacique, for he is your grandfather. You will know his house, for the ladder to it has three uprights instead of two. When you go in and tell your story, he will ask you a question to see if you are really his grandchildren, and will give you four chances to answer what he has in a bag in the corner. No one has ever been able to guess what is in it, but there are birds.”

The Twins did as they were bidden, and presently came to Acoma and found the house of the old Cacique. When they entered and told their story, he said, “Now I will try you. What is in yonder bag?”

“A rattlesnake,” said the boys.

“No,” said the Cacique, “it is not a rattlesnake. Try again.”

“Birds,” said the boys.

“Yes, they are birds. Now I know that you are truly my grandchildren, for no one else could ever guess.” And he welcomed them gladly, and sent them back with new dresses and jewelry to bring their mother.

When she was about to arrive, the Twins ran ahead to the house and told her father, mother, and sister to leave the house until she should enter; but not knowing what was to come, they would not go out. When she had climbed the big ladder to the roof and started down through the trap-door by the room-ladder, her sister cried out with joy at seeing her, and she was so startled that she fell from the ladder and broke her neck, and never could be brought to life again.

Máw-Sahv and Oó-yah-wee grew up to astounding adventures and achievements. While still very young in years, they did very remarkable things; for they had a miraculously rapid growth, and at an age when other boys were toddling about home, these Hero Twins had already become very famous hunters and warriors. They were very fond of stories of adventure, like less precocious lads; and after the death of their mother they kept their grandmother busy telling them strange tales. She had a great many anecdotes of a certain ogre-giantess who lived in the dark gorges of the mountains to the South, and so much did Máw-Sahv and Oó-yah-wee hear of this wonderful personage—who was the terror of all that country—that their boyish ambition was fired.

One day when their grandmother was busy they stole away from home with their bows and arrows, and walked miles and miles, till they came to a great forest at the foot of the mountain. In the edge of it sat the old Giant-woman, dozing in the sun, with a huge basket beside her. She was so enormous and looked so fierce that the boys' hearts stood still, and they would have hidden, but just then she caught sight of them, and called, "Come, little boys, and get into this basket of mine, and I will take you to my house."

"Very well," said Máw-Sahv, bravely hiding his alarm. "If you will take us through this big forest, which we would like to see, we will go with you."

The Giant-woman promised, and the lads clambered into her basket, which she took upon her back and started off. As she passed through the woods, the boys grabbed lumps of pitch from the tall pines and smeared it all over her head and back so softly that she did not notice it. Once she sat down to rest, and the boys slyly put a lot of big stones in the basket, set fire to her pitched hair, and hurriedly climbed a tall pine.

Presently the Giant-woman got up and started on toward home; but in a minute or two her head and manta were all of a blaze. With a howl that shook the earth, she dropped the basket and rolled on the ground, grinding her great head into the sand until she at last got the fire extinguished. But she was badly scorched and very angry, and still angrier when she looked in the basket and found only a lot of stones. She retraced her steps until she found the boys hidden in the pine tree, and said to them, "Come down, children, and get into my basket, that I may take you to my house, for now we are almost there."

The boys, knowing that she could easily break down the tree if they refused, came down. They got into the basket, and soon she brought them to her home in the mountain. She set them down upon the ground and said, "Now, boys, go and bring me a lot of wood, that I may make a fire in the oven and bake you some sweet cakes.”

The boys gathered a big pile of wood, with which she built a roaring fire in the adobe oven outside the house. Then she took them and washed them very carefully, and taking them by the necks, thrust them into the glowing oven and sealed the door with a great, flat rock, and left them there to be roasted.

But the Trues were friends of the Hero Twins, and did not let the heat harm them at all. When the old Giant-woman had gone into the house, Máv-Sahv and Oó-yah-wee broke the smaller stone that closed the smoke-hole of the oven, and crawled out from their fiery prison unsigned. They ran around and caught snakes and toads and gathered up dirt and dropped them down into the oven through the smoke-hole; and then, watching when the Giant-woman's back was turned, they sneaked into the house and hid in a huge clay jar on the shelf.

Very early in the morning the Giant-woman's baby began to cry for some boy-meat. “Wait till it is well cooked,” said the mother; and hushed the child till the sun was well up. Then she went out and unsealed the oven, and brought in the sad mess the boys had put there. “They have cooked away to almost nothing,” she said; and she and the Giant-baby sat down to eat. “Isn't this nice?” said the baby; and Máv-Sahv could not help saying, “You nasty things, to like that!”

“Eh? Who is that?” cried the Giant-woman, looking around till she found the boys hidden in the jar. So she told them to come down, and gave them some sweet cakes, and then sent them out to bring her some more wood.

It was evening when they returned with a big load of wood, which Máv-Sahv had taken pains to get green. He had also picked up in the mountains a long, sharp splinter of quartz. The evening was cool, and they built a big fire in the fireplace. But immediately, as the boys had planned, the green wood began to smoke at a dreadful rate, and soon the room was so dense with it that they all began to cough and strangle. The Giant-woman got up and opened the window and put her head out for a breath of fresh air; and Máv-Sahv, pulling out the white-hot splinter of quartz from the fire, stabbed her in the back so that she died. Then they killed the Giant-baby, and at last felt that they were safe.

Now the Giant-woman's house was a very large one, and ran far back into the very heart of the mountain. Having got rid of their enemies, the Hero Twins decided to explore the house; and, taking their bows and arrows, started boldly down into the deep, dark rooms. After traveling a long way in the dark, they came to a huge room in which corn and melons and pumpkins were growing abundantly. On and on they went, till at last they heard the growl of distant thunder. Following the sound, they came presently to a room in the solid rock, wherein the lightning was stored. Going in, they took the lightning and played with it awhile, throwing it from one to the other, and at last started home, carrying their strange toy with them.

When they reached Acoma and told their grandmother of their wonderful adventures, she held up her withered old hands in amazement. And she was nearly scared to death when they began to play with the lightning, throwing it around the house as though it had been a harmless ball, while the thunder rumbled till it shook the great rock of Acoma. They had the blue lightning which belongs in the West; and the yellow lightning of the North; and the red lightning of the East; and the white lightning of the South; and with all these they played merrily.

But it was not very long till Shée-wo-nah, the Storm-King, had occasion to use the lightning; and when he looked in the room where he was wont to keep it, and found it gone, his wrath knew no bounds. He started out to find who had stolen it; and passing by Acoma he heard the thunder as the Hero Twins were playing ball with the lightning. He pounded on the door and ordered them to give him his lightning, but the boys refused. Then he summoned the storm, and it began to rain and blow fearfully outside; while within the boys rattled their thunder in loud defiance, regardless of their grandmother's entreaties to give the Storm-King his lightning.

It kept raining violently, however, and the water came pouring down the chimney until the room was nearly full, and they were in great danger of drowning. But luckily for them, the Trues were still mindful of them; and just in the nick of time sent their servant, Tee-oh-pee, the Badger, who is the best of diggers, to dig a hole up through the floor; all the water ran out, and they were saved. And so the Hero Twins outwitted the Storm-King.

South of Acoma, in the pine-clad gorges and mesas, the world was full of Bears. There was one old She-Bear in particular, so huge and fierce that all men feared her; and not even the boldest hunter dared go to the south—for there she had her home with her two sons.

Máw-sahv and Oó-yah-wee were famous hunters, and always wished to go south; but their grandmother always forbade them. One day, however, they stole away from the house, and got into the cañon. At last they came to the She-Bear's house; and there was old Quéé-ah asleep in front of the door. Máw-sahv crept up very carefully and threw in her face a lot of ground chili, and ran. At that the She-Bear began to sneeze, ah-húтч! ah-húтч! She could not stop, and kept making ah-húтч until she sneezed herself to death.

Then the Twins took their thunder-knives and skinned her. They stuffed the great hide with grass, so that it looked like a Bear again, and tied a buckskin rope around its neck.

"Now," said Máw-sahv, "We will give our grandma a trick!"

So, taking hold of the rope, they ran toward Acoma, and the Bear came behind them as if leaping. Their grandmother was going for water; and from the top of the cliff she saw them running so in the valley, and the Bear jumping behind them. She ran to her house and painted one side of her face black with charcoal, and the other side red with the blood of an animal; and, taking a bag of ashes, ran down the cliff and out at the Bear, to make it leave the boys and come after her.

But when she saw the trick, she reproved the boys for their rashness—but in her heart she was very proud of them.

THE COYOTE AND THE WOODPECKER

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Lummis, Charles. Pueblo Indian Folk-Stories. New York: Century, 1910, 49–52.

Date: 1910

Original Source: Isleta Pueblo, New Mexico

National Origin: Native American

---

This story of the trickster trying to imitate another occurs in other variants in the Southwest (see, for example, the Jicarilla Apache “Tales of Fox: Fox and Kingfisher,” page 30). As in the tale types designated by folklorist Stith Thompson as animal tales, “The Coyote and the Woodpecker” offers a moral lesson. The philosophy of acceptance and non-competitiveness is consistent with general Pueblo worldview and morality.

---

Well, once upon a time a Coyote and his family lived near the edge of a wood. There was a big hollow tree there, and in it lived an old Woodpecker and his wife and children. One day as the Coyote-father was strolling along the edge of the forest he met the Woodpecker-father.

“Good evening,” said the Coyote; how do you do today, friend?”

“Very well, thank you; and how are you, friend?”

So they stopped and talked together awhile; and when they were about to go apart the Coyote said, “Friend Woodpecker, why do you not come as friends to see us? Come to our house to supper this evening, and bring your family.”

“Thank you, friend Coyote,” said the Woodpecker; “we will come with joy.”

So that evening, when the Coyote-mother had made supper ready, there came the Woodpecker-father and the Woodpecker-mother with their three children. When they had come in, all five of the Woodpeckers stretched themselves as they do after flying, and by that showed their pretty feathers—for the Woodpecker has yellow and red marks under its wings. While, they were eating supper, too, they sometimes spread their wings, and displayed their bright underside. They praised the supper highly, and said the Coyote-mother was a perfect housekeeper.

When it was time to go, they thanked the Coyotes very kindly and invited them to come to supper at their house the following evening. But when they were gone, the Coyote-father could hold himself no longer, and he said, "Did you see what airs those Woodpeckers put on? Always showing off their bright feathers? But I want them to know that the Coyotes are equal to them. I'll show them!"

Next day, the Coyote-father had all his family at work bringing wood, and built a great fire in front of his house. When it was time to go to the house of the Woodpeckers he called his wife and children to the fire, and lashed a burning stick under each of their arms, with the burning end pointing forward; and then he fixed himself in the same way.

"Now," said he, "we will show them! When we get there, you must lift up your arms now and then, to show them that we are as good as the Woodpeckers."

When they came to the house of the Woodpeckers and went in, all the Coyotes kept lifting their arms often, to show the bright coals underneath. But as they sat down to supper, one Coyote-girl gave a shriek and said:

"Oh, papa! My fire is burning me!"

"Be patient, my daughter," said the Coyote-father, severely, "and do not cry about little things."

"Ow!" cried the other Coyote-girl in a moment, "my fire has gone out!"

This was more than the Coyote-father could stand, and he reproved her angrily.

"But how is it, friend Coyote," said the Woodpecker, politely, "that your colors are so bright at first, but very soon become black?"

"Oh, that is the beauty of our colors," replied the Coyote, smothering his rage; "that they are not always the same—like other people's—but turn all shades."

But the Coyotes were very uncomfortable, and made an excuse to hurry home as soon as they could. When they got there, the Coyote-father whipped them all for exposing him to be laughed at.

But the Woodpecker-father gathered his children around him, and said, "Now, my children, you see what the Coyotes have done. Never in your life try to appear what you are not. Be just what you really are, and put on no false colors."

LAKOTA

---

THE STONE BOY

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Wissler, Clark. "Some Dakota Myths II." Journal of American Folklore 20 (1907): 199–202.

Date: ca. 1900

Original Source: Ogalala Lakota (Sioux)

National Origin: Native American

---

The Lakota (popularly labeled the Sioux by outsiders) like the Cheyenne (page 50) and Crow (page 67) were a nomadic northern Plains bison-hunting culture that depended on the horse for their migrations in pursuit of the herds. The sweat lodge that plays a central role in the following narrative is used for healing and ritual purification. These lodges are found throughout Native North America and, according to some sources, are likely to have been brought across the Bering Strait during migrations of the ancestors of the Native Americans into the New World. As described in the myth of the culture hero Stone Boy, heated stones (regarded as the "bones" of Mother Earth) are piled inside a covered structure and water is poured over them to produce steam. The emergence from the lodge can be symbolically interpreted as a rebirth, reflecting the literal birth of Stone Boy and rebirth of three brothers and four uncles in the course of the following narrative.

---

Four brothers lived together in the same tepee. One day a strange woman came and stood outside. They sent the youngest brother out to see what it was that stood outside. The youngest brother went out to see, and came back with the information that a woman was standing there. Then the eldest brother said to the youngest, "Call her your sister and invite her inside."

When she was invited she hesitated. She kept her face hidden in her robe. The brothers were cooking buffalo tongues for their meal. They gave some of these to the woman, but she turned her back while eating them so as not to show her face.

After a while the three older brothers went out to hunt. The youngest brother was curious to see the face of the woman. So he went to the top of a high hill and sat down. Then he left his robe on the hill and changed himself into a bird. He flew to the tepee and sat upon the poles at the top. He began to sing and to peck upon a pole, looking down at the woman.

Now she had her face exposed, and he saw that it was covered with hair. Spread out before her was a robe with a row of scalps half way around it. The woman heard the bird pecking on the poles above, and looking up said, "You bad bird, go away."

Then she began to count the scalps in the row, and, talking to herself, said, "I will take the scalps of these four brothers and fill out this row with them in the order of their ages, beginning with the oldest."

Now when the little bird heard this he returned to the hill, resumed his former shape, and waited for his three brothers. When he saw them coming he went out to meet them. He related what he had seen. Then they planned to take a pack strap and boil it so as to make it weak and soft. When this was done they gave it to the woman and sent her out for wood. Now when the woman had gone they took up the bundle she had brought with her and in which she kept the robe with the scalps and tossed it into the fire. Then the brothers went away.

The woman gathered together some wood, but every time she tried to tie it up with the pack strap the strap broke. At last she became very angry and said, "I will kill the brothers." So she returned to the tepee, but found the brothers gone and her bundle burned up. She was very angry.

She thrust her hands into the fire and pulled out the robe. Then she took up a large knife, tied an eagle feather on her hair, and started in pursuit of the brothers. As she was very swift, she soon over-took them, and, shaking the knife at them, said, "I will kill you."

All of the brothers shot arrows at her, but could not hit her. She came up, knocked down the oldest, then the second in order, and then the third. The youngest brother stood far off, with a bow and arrows in his hands.

The woman ran at him, but a crow that was flying around over his head said, "Young man shoot her in the head where the feather is."

The young man did as directed, and killed the woman. He beheaded her and buried the body. Then he made a fire, heated some stones, and made a sweat house. When this was done, he dragged his three dead brothers into the sweat house, where he began to sing a song and beat with a rattle. Then he poured water upon the heated stones, and as the steam began to rise one of the brothers began to sigh. Then all of them sighed. When the youngest brother poured more water upon the stones, the three brothers came to life again. They all returned to their tepee. One day another young woman came and stood outside of the tepee as before. The youngest brother looked out and said, "My sister, come in."

This woman did not hide her face. After a time she said, "Have you any brothers?" The youngest brother told her that he had.

The youngest brother cooked some buffalo tongues and gave one to the woman. She thanked him for this and they talked pleasantly together.

Now the brothers were out hunting for buffalo as before, and the youngest went out to the top of a high hill and left his robe, became a bird, and sat upon the poles on the top of the tepee. He pecked at the poles.

The woman looked up and said, "Get away from here. You will spoil my brother's poles." Looking down the bird saw a row of moccasins laid out in front of the woman. She put her hand upon one pair saying to herself, "These are for the oldest." Then she took up another pair, saying, "These are for the next of age." So she went on until all were provided for.

Then the bird flew back to the hill and became a boy again. When he met his brothers, he related to them what he had seen. They were all happy. They had as much buffalo meat as they could carry, and when they came into the tepee the woman said, "Oh my, you are good." At once she began to dry and cook meat.

One day the oldest brother went out to hunt, but did not return. The following day the next in order of age went out to search for him, but he never came back. Then the next went out, but he also failed to come back. Then the youngest went out to look for his brothers, and as he did not come back the woman began to cry. She went out to the top of a hill and found a nice smooth round pebble there. So she slept at that place one night and then swallowed the pebble. When she reached the tepee her abdomen had become very much distended. After a little while she gave birth to a child. It was a boy.

As this boy grew up he always wanted a bow and arrows. And when he got them he was always shooting at birds and small animals. At last he became a tall man. Some of his uncles' arrows were still in the tepee, and one day, as he took them down, his mother related the fate of his four uncles. When the young man heard this story he said to his mother, "I shall find them."

"No, you are too young," said his mother.

"No, I am old enough," said the young man.

So the young man started out to search for his uncles. After a time he came to a high hill, from the top of which he saw a little old tepee. He went up to it and looked in at the door. He saw a very old woman in-side.

When the old woman saw him she said, "Come in, my grandchild; come in and break my ribs."

As the young man entered, the old woman stooped over toward the ground, and the young man kicked her with his foot until all her ribs were broken. At last, as he kicked, one of the ribs turned inward and pierced the old woman's heart. This killed her. Looking around inside the tepee, the young man saw the skeletons of many people. These were killed when breaking the old woman's ribs, because the last rib when broken turned outward and pierced the heart of the kicker. But this young man, who was called the Stone Boy, could not be killed in that way.

Among the skeletons in the tepee were those of the four uncles of the Stone Boy. He looked over the bones, then went outside, made a sweat house, and heated some stones. Then he took the bones into the sweat house, sang some songs, and beat with a rattle as his uncle had done. When he poured water on the stones and the steam began to rise, the dead all came to life. The Stone Boy addressed his uncles and said to them, "You are my four uncles who went away and never came back. Now I shall take you home with me."

One day Stone Boy said to his mother, "I am going out in this direction" (pointing to the left).

"No," said she, "you must not go that way, for it is dangerous."

"Yes, but I am going that way," said he. This was in the winter. He came to a very high hill where four girls were sliding down on the snow.

"Come chase us," said they. Stone Boy sat down behind them on the piece of raw hide they were sliding with. At the bottom of the hill they ran against a bank and Stone Boy bumped the girls so hard that they were killed. Then he went home.

After a time he went out on another journey, and saw an old buffalo bull hooking at a rock. Stone Boy stood watching him for a while and then said, "What are you doing there?"

The buffalo replied, "A man named Stone Boy killed four girls. These girls were four white buffalo, and now all the buffalo are hunting for Stone Boy. So I am practicing my horns on this rock, because Stone Boy is very hard to kill. When winter comes, we shall go out to hunt for Stone Boy."

"I am the one you are looking for," said Stone Boy to the buffalo, as he shot an arrow into his heart.

Then Stone Boy went home, and told his four uncles that they should gather together a lot of brush, because the buffalo were coming, and they would cover the earth. With the brush they built four fences around their tepee. Then the buffalo came. Stone Boy and his uncles shot down many of them with their arrows, but the buffalo tore down one fence after the other until just one remained. But so many buffalo had been killed by this time that the leader of the herd called the others away, and Stone Boy and his uncles were left to live in peace.

COYOTE AND THE BUFFALO

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Wissler, Clark. "Some Dakota Myths I." Journal of American Folklore 20 (1907): 124–126.

Date: ca. 1900

Original Source: Ogalala Lakota (Sioux)

National Origin: Native American

---

The following myth illustrates a typical introduction of coyote tales, "Once Coyote was walking along." Coyote's behavior throughout the narrative is also typical of this trickster role. He is motivated by petty passions such as hunger, fear, and curiosity. He attempts to use objects and powers that he does not comprehend and, as a result, ends up in no better condition than he was at the beginning of the adventure.

---

Once Coyote was walking along. He had nothing to eat for a long time and was thin and weak. Finally he came to a deserted camp, but could find nothing save the remains of the fire. While he was looking around for food, he came upon a knife and an arrow. He carried them away with him, and when he came to the top of a high hill he saw many buffalo grazing in the valley below. He crept up close to the crest of the hill and looked over. Then he said to himself as he looked at the arrow and the knife, "Now those people kill buffalo with these things." So he took up the arrow and threw it toward the buffalo, saying, "Now, go and kill the buffalo. Go, hit that one."

The arrow fell down upon the ground and said, "You must take a piece of wood and a string before I can go and kill the buffalo."

Then Coyote went up to a tree, took the knife and cut off one of the branches, trimmed it and peeled off the bark. He twisted the bark into a cord and tied it to the stick. Then he went back, laid the bow on the ground, picked up the arrow, put it on the stick, and said, "Now, go."

The arrow said to him, "No, that is not the way. You must pull on the string."

Then Coyote put the arrow down, took hold of the string, and dragged the bow along the ground.

"No, no!" said the arrow, "that is not the way. You must hold me against the stick with one hand and hold the string with the other." Coyote did so.

"Now," said the arrow, "pull with all your might and then let loose."

The arrow flew towards the buffalo, struck one of them in the side, but did not bring it down. Coyote picked up the knife and ran after the wounded buffalo as fast as he could. He shouted so loud that the wounded buffalo soon fell over from fright. Coyote stopped at once to lick up the blood from his wounds. Then he took up the knife and got ready to butcher the buffalo. Just then he looked up and saw a bear sitting on the other side.

“Come on,” said Coyote, “I will give you some.” But the bear did not move.

Coyote invited him again. Then he came over and helped Coyote to butcher. Now, Coyote was afraid of the bear and so kept on the other side of the buffalo from him. After a while the blood in Coyote’s stomach began to roll. The bear heard the noise. He stopped and said, “What’s that?”

Then Coyote struck his stomach, and said in a loud voice, “Keep quiet, my brother.”

“What did your brother say?” said the bear.

“Well,” said Coyote, “my brother just said that he eats bear.”

The bear was puzzled by this, and started to go away.

“Where are you going?” said Coyote.

“Oh,” said the bear, “I am just going over the hill.”

As soon as the bear was out of sight, Coyote went up on the hill to look, and saw the bear running off as fast as he could. So he called out to the bear, “Come back, come back. I thought you were going to help me with my butchering.”

Then Coyote went back to the buffalo, and as there were many leaves upon the ground he covered the meat up with them. Then he went on with his butchering and a magpie flew by.

Coyote threw a piece of fat to the bird, saying, “Eat this, and then fly all around the world and tell the people to come here (all the birds and animals). There will be a great feast.”

The magpie went out and flew all around the country, inviting all the animals to come to the feast. They soon arrived, and gathered around in a circle. Then Coyote sat down to have a talk with them. As soon as he sat down the night hawk began to fly around over his head and make a noise.

“Oh, you get away, you jealous woman,” said Coyote. “I am going to talk now.” Then he tried to get up to begin his speech, but he could not rise. The night hawk had defecated around him, causing him to stick fast to his seat. Then all of the animals sprang up, ran to the carcass, and began to eat. Some of them soon found the meat hidden in the leaves, scratched it out, and ate it. Just as the meat was gone, Coyote got loose, but the animals ran away and left him. Then he sat down and cried.

After a time he started on his journey again and saw four buffalo. Now he had lost his knife and the arrow. The buffalo were in a hole among some tall grass. “Now, how can I get them,” said Coyote to himself. He went close up to them, and, when the buffalo looked at him, he said, “Brothers, turn me into a buffalo so that I can eat grass.”

“Well,” said a bull, “you stand over to one side and do not move.”

“Now,” said the buffalo, “get down and roll in the dust.”

When Coyote arose, the buffalo charged upon him, but Coyote was afraid and stepped to one side. The buffalo reproved him for this, and reminded him of the injunction to stand still. So they tried it again, but when the buffalo charged, Coyote stepped to one side as before. The buffalo reproved him, but said he would try again. The third time Coyote stepped aside as before. Now the buffalo was very angry, and he told Coyote he would try once more, and that, if he did not stand still, he would kill him.

This time Coyote stood still when the buffalo charged. The buffalo tossed him up into the air and as he came down he became a buffalo. At once Coyote began to eat grass. He was very hungry. The buffalo started to go, but Coyote lingered behind eating grass. Finally, he refused to follow altogether, and the herd left him.

Coyote saw a wolf, and called out to him, "Here, brother, let me turn you into a buffalo." Then Coyote instructed the wolf to stand to one side and not to move. Then he told the wolf to roll in the dust as before. When Coyote charged upon the wolf, the latter stepped to one side. This he did three times, but the fourth time he stood still. Coyote said, "Now, I will make you eat grass."

Then he tossed the wolf into the air, but he did not change. Coyote, himself, became a coyote again. Then the wolf began to fight him. Coyote was angry and said, "Now, you have spoiled all my fun, and I will punish you." So Coyote bit the wolf.

THE WOMAN WITH A BEAR LOVER

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Wissler, Clark. "Some Dakota Myths II." Journal of American Folklore 20 (1907): 195–196.

Date: ca. 1900

Original Source: Ogalala Lakota

National Origin: Native American

---

In the "Obstacle Flight" (AT 313 and 314), victims throw objects (in this case, a whetstone) behind them that are magically transformed into obstacles (here, a mountain). This narrative is cross-culturally distributed.

---

Once there was a man who lived alone with his three children and his young wife. One day, when the man returned from deer hunting, he found the children cooking bear's flesh. The next day, when he returned, he found them again cooking bear. Then he thought to him-self,

“I wonder how they kill these bears. The next time I shall watch.” So the next day he made ready as if to go deer hunting, but as soon as he got into the brush he concealed himself and waited.

In a little while he saw his young wife come out of the tepee with an axe on her back and walk toward the woods. As she went along, she struck the trees with her axe until she came to one that sounded hollow. When she struck on this a bear came out of the top, sprang to the ground, and after caressing the woman had sexual relations with her. Then the woman arose from the ground and killed him with the axe.

After the man saw what had happened, he went on with his hunting. When he returned he found his children cooking bear as before. He told the children not to eat any of the meat. His purpose was to make the woman eat all of it. Then he told his wife to eat.

At last she said, “I have enough now.” The man did not listen to her but took up the meat and forced it all down her throat until she died.

Then the man said, “Now children, you are to go back to your father [the bear].”

He gave them the skin of an oriole and a whetstone. Then he sent them out to look for their father. “Go home,” he said, “you do not belong here.”

So the children started on their way. While they were going they heard a little thing coming after them. They looked around and saw their mother’s head rolling along. “Where are you going?” said the head to the children.

The children were afraid and made no reply, but went on as fast as they could. They cried when the head was about to overtake them.

One of the children threw down the whetstone, and it turned into a very high mountain. This mountain separated the children from their mother’s head. When the head came to the foot of the mountain, a snake came along and the head said to it, “Grandfather, make a hole through this mountain for me. If you will make a hole through this mountain for me I will give you some scrapings from a buffalo-hide.”

So the snake bored a hole through the mountain. When the head had rolled through to the other side, it turned upon the snake and said, “No, I will not give you anything.”

Then the head took the snake and pulled it in two. Then the head went on in pursuit of the children, who were very tired. At last they went up into a tree to rest. The head came to the foot of the tree, looked up and saw the children at the top.

The head called to them, “My children, I have very hard times; come down and go home with me.” The children did not come down. The head waited a while at the foot of the tree, and then said angrily, “If you do not come down I will punish you. I will crush you, I will pound you up fine.”

Then the head began to shake the tree, and when the tree began to tremble a voice from above said to the children, “Take the bird’s nest you see near you and sit on it.” Just as the children got into the nest, the tree began to fall, but the wind carried the nest far off. At last the nest came to the ground, and the children got out and hurried on their way. Finally they came to a very large river.

They looked back and saw the head still following them. Out in the river they saw something black moving along.

When the head saw the children, it called out, “Now, I shall get you. You will drown.”

The black object in the water was a boat with a man in it. When the man saw the children on the shore and the head pursuing, he called out to them, “My children, come here. I will kill your mother.”

The children sprang into the water and swam to the boat. When they neared it, the man put out his oar and raised the children into the boat one after the other. The head rolled into the water and swam toward the boat also.

The head said to the man, “Take me, too.” So the man put out his oar, and the head rolled up on it, but instead of lifting the head into the boat, the man swung the oar with all his might, and the head fell far out into the stream. Then he rowed out to where the head was floating and beat it under with his oar.

NATCHEZ

---

THE TAR BABY

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Swanton, John R. Myths and Tales of the Southeastern Indians. Smithsonian Institution, Bureau of American Ethnology, Bulletin 88. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1929, 258–259.

Date: 1929

Original Source: Natchez

National Origin: Native American

---

By the earliest period of European contact, the Natchez had developed along the eastern bank of the Mississippi River a culture of such complexity that it was unrivaled north of Mexico. By the middle of the eighteenth century, however, the Natchez had been destroyed as a distinct cultural entity, although individuals survived passing along oral traditions such as the following tale. Influences from neighboring non-native cultures are readily apparent in tales such as “The Tar Baby.” The following narrative offers another version of a widely spread tale type (AT 175), known not only in the Americas but also in the Old World. There are many similarities among versions. For example, the “Briar Patch Punishment for Rabbit” (AT 1310A) is included in the Caribbean “Brother Rabbit an’ Brother Tar-Baby” (page 414). In the Natchez version of the tale, however, the trickster hero rabbit plays the role of shape-shifter. He does this by literally donning the skin of gray squirrel to gain initial access to the well. Taking on the shape of another being by donning its skin is commonly associated with witchcraft, but does not seem to do so in this case. Also, no apparent significance can be found for gray squirrel’s being the shape adopted by rabbit. Therefore, the similarity may indicate an exchange of motifs among neighboring groups that share a common environment and way of life in the same region. There is an irony in rabbit who is seen to be the master of disguise in most narratives being trapped by a similarly false image.

---

All of the wild animals appointed a time to dig for water and when the time came assembled and began digging. But presently Rabbit gave up digging, and the others went on digging without him. They found water. Then they stationed two people to watch it. But Rabbit became very thirsty. He killed a gray squirrel, stripped off its hide, got into it, and came to the watchers. It was Rabbit who did it, but in the form of the gray squirrel he said that he had become very thirsty for lack of water. "You may drink water because you are just a gray squirrel," they said to him, and he drank. He drank all he wanted and went away. Then he pulled off the hide.

But when he thought of going back to drink again the hide had become hard and he could not get it on, so when he became thirsty he dipped up the water at night. But when he set out water for his visitors they said to him, "Where did you find it?" and he answered, "I got it from the dew." Then, following the tracks by the water, they saw signs of Rabbit, made an image of a person out of pitch and set it up near the place where they had dug the well.

The next night Rabbit came and stood there. "Who are you?" he said. There was no reply and he continued, "If you do not speak I will strike you." Rabbit struck it with one hand and his hand stuck to it. "Let me go. If you do not let me go I will strike you with my other hand," he said, and he struck it with that hand. When he hit it that hand also stuck. "Let me go. Stop holding me. If you do not let me go I will kick you," he said, and he kicked it. When he kicked it his foot stuck. "If you do not let go I will kick you with my other foot," he said, and he kicked it with that foot. When he did so his other foot stuck. "Let me go," he said, "I have my head left, and if you do not let me go I will butt you." He pulled back and forth to get free and butted it with his head and his head stuck. Then he hung there all doubled up.

While he was hanging there day came. And when it was light the water watchers came and found Rabbit hanging there. They picked him up, made a prisoner of him, and carried him off. They assembled together to kill him. "Let us throw him into the fire," they said, but Rabbit laughed and replied, "Nothing can happen to me there. That is where I travel around."

"If that is the case we must kill him some other way," they said, and after they had debated a long time concluded, "Let us tie a rock around his neck and throw him into the water," but Rabbit laughed and called out, "I live all the time in water. Nothing can happen to me there."

"Well," they said, "he will be hard to kill. How can we kill him?" After all had conferred for a while, they said, "I wonder what would become of him if we threw him into a brier patch?" At that Rabbit cried out loudly. "Now you have killed me,” he said. “Now we have killed him,” they replied. “If we had known that at first we would have had him killed already,” so they carried him to a brier thicket, Rabbit weeping unceasingly as he was dragged along. Then they threw him into the brier thicket with all their strength, and he fell down, got up, and ran off at once, whooping.

NAVAJO

---

NOQOÏLPI, THE GAMBLER: A NAVAJO MYTH

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Matthews, Washington. "Noqoilpi, the Gambler: A Navajo Myth." Journal of American Folklore 2 (1889): 89–94.

Date: ca. 1889

Original Source: Navajo (New Mexico)

National Origin: Native American

---

According to folklorist Washington Matthews, "In the cañon of the Chaco, in northern New Mexico, there are many ruins of ancient pueblos which are still in a fair state of preservation, in some of them entire apartments being yet, it is said, intact. One of the largest of these is called by the Navajos Kintyèl or Kintyèli, which signifies 'Broad-house.' It figures frequently in their legends" (89). These are ruins of dwellings built by the Anasazi who occupied the area from about 1 C.E. to 1300 C.E. farming corn, beans, and squash. There are varied opinions concerning the reasons for the abandonment of the cliff dwellings and the fragmenting of the Anasazi culture; their descendants are probably the modern Zuni Pueblo. Some scholars contend that the Navajo migrated to the area as early as 1000 C.E., which would place them in the area before the Anasazi abandonment. At the time of their arrival, the Navajo, like the Apache, were hunters and gatherers. They were strongly influenced by the sedentary Pueblo farmers, which wrought changes in areas such as their means of obtaining subsistence and their religious life. The formulaic use of the number four is common not only in Navajo tradition, but among the majority of Native American groups. The story of "Noqoilpi, the Gambler" is a single episode in the Navajo myth of the creation and their migration to the Southwest.

---

Some time before, there had descended among the Pueblos, from the heavens, a divine gambler or gambling-god, named Noqoilpi, or He-who-wins-men (at play); his talisman was a great piece of turquoise. When he came, he challenged the people to all sorts of games and contests, and in all of these he was successful. He won from them, first their property, then their women and children, and finally some of the men themselves.

Then he told them he would give them part of their property back in payment if they would build a great house; so when the Navajos came, the Pueblos were busy building in order that they might release their enthralled relatives and their property. They were also busy making a race-track, and preparing for all kinds of games of chance and skill.

When all was ready, and four days notice had been given, twelve men came from the neighboring pueblo of Kinçolij (Blue-house) to compete with the great gambler. They bet their own persons, and after a brief contest they lost themselves to Noqoilpi. Again a notice of four days was given, and again twelve men of Kinçolij—relatives of the former twelve—came to play, and these also lost themselves. For the third time an announcement, four days in advance of a game, was given; this time some women were among the twelve contestants, and they too lost themselves. All were put to work on the building of Kintyèl as soon as they forfeited their liberty. At the end of another four days the children of these men and women came to try to win back their parents, but they succeeded only in adding themselves to the number of the gambler's slaves. On a fifth trial, after four days' warning, twelve leading men of Blue-house were lost, among them the chief of the pueblo. On a sixth duly announced gambling-day twelve more men, all important persons, staked their liberty and lost it. Up to this time the Navajos had kept count of the winnings of Noqoilpi, but afterwards people from other pueblos came in such numbers to play and lose that they could keep count no longer. In addition to their own persons the later victims brought in beads, shells, turquoise, and all sorts of valuables, and gambled them away. With the labor of all these slaves it was not long until the great Kintyèl was finished.

But all this time the Navajos had been merely spectators, and had taken no part in the games. One day the voice of the beneficent god Qastcèyalçi was heard faintly in the distance crying his usual call "hu'hu'hu'hu'." His voice was heard, as it is always heard, four times, each time nearer and nearer, and immediately after the last call, which was loud and clear, Qastcèyalçi appeared at the door of a hut where dwelt a young couple who had no children, and with them he communicated by means of signs.

He told them that the people of Kinçolij had lost at game with Noqoilpi two great shells, the greatest treasures of the pueblo; that the Sun had coveted these shells, and had begged them from the gambler; that the latter had refused the request of the Sun and the Sun was angry. In consequence of all this, as Qastcèyalçi related, in twelve days from his visit certain divine personages would meet in the mountains, in a place which he designated, to hold a great ceremony. He invited the young man to be present at the ceremony, and disappeared.

The Navajo kept count of the passing days; on the twelfth day he repaired to the appointed place, and there he found a great assemblage of the gods. There were Qastcèyalçi, Qastcèqogan and his son, Niltci, the Wind, Tcalyèl, the Darkness, Tcàapani, the Bat, Klictsò, the Great Snake, Tsilkkàli (a little bird), Nasísi, the Gopher, and many others. Beside these, there were present a number of pets or domesticated animals belonging to the gambler, who were dissatisfied with their lot, were anxious to be free, and would gladly obtain their share of the spoils in case their master was ruined. Niltci, the Wind, had spoken to them, and they had come to enter into the plot against Noqoilpi.

All night the gods danced and sang, and performed their mystic rites, for the purpose of giving to the son of Qastcèqogan powers as a gambler equal to those of Noqoilpi. When the morning came they washed the young neophyte all over, dried him with corn meal, dressed him in clothes exactly like those the gambler wore, and in every way made him look as much like the gambler as possible, and then they counseled as to what other means they should take to outwit Noqoilpi.

In the first place, they desired to find out how he felt about having refused to his father, the Sun, the two great shells.

"I will do this," said Niltci, the Wind, "for I can penetrate everywhere, and no one can see me"; but the others said, "No, you can go everywhere, but you cannot travel without making a noise and disturbing people. Let Tcalyèl, the Darkness, go on this errand, for he also goes wherever he wills, yet he makes no noise."

So Tcalyèl went to the gambler's house, entered his room, went all through his body while he slept, and searched well his mind, and he came back saying, "Noqoilpi is sorry for what he has done."

Niltci, however, did not believe this; so, although his services had been before refused, he repaired to the chamber where the gambler slept, and went all through his body and searched well his mind; but he too came back saying Noqoilpi was sorry that he had refused to give the great shells to his father.

One of the games they proposed to play is called çàka-çqadsàç, or the thirteen chips; it is played with thirteen thin flat pieces of wood, which are colored red on one side and left white or uncolored on the other side. Success depends on the number of chips, which, being thrown upward, fall with their white sides up.

"Leave the game to me," said the Bat; "I have made thirteen chips that are white on both sides. I will hide myself in the ceiling, and when our champion throws up his chips I will grasp them and throw down my chips instead."

Another game they were to play is called nanjoj; it is played with two long sticks or poles, of peculiar shape and construction (one marked with red and the other with black), and a single hoop. A long many-tailed string, called the "turkey-claw," is secured to the center of each pole.

“Leave nanjoj to me,” said the Great Snake; “I will hide myself in the hoop and make it fall where I please.”

Another game was one called tsínbetsil, or push-on-the-wood; in this the contestants push against a tree until it is torn from its roots and falls.

“I will see that this game is won,” said Nasísi, the Gopher; “I will gnaw the roots of the tree, so that he who shoves it may easily make it fall.”

In the game of tol, or ball, the object was to hit the ball so that it would fall beyond a certain line.

“I will win this game for you,” said the little bird, Tsilkáli, “for I will hide within the ball, and fly with it wherever I want to go. Do not hit the ball hard; give it only a light tap, and depend on me to carry it.”

The pets of the gambler begged the Wind to blow hard, so that they might have an excuse to give their master for not keeping due watch when he was in danger, and in the morning the Wind blew for them a strong gale. At dawn the whole party of conspirators left the mountain, and came down to the brow of the cañon to watch until sunrise.

Noqoilpi had two wives, who were the prettiest women in the whole land. Wherever she went, each carried in her hand a stick with something tied on the end of it, as a sign that she was the wife of the great gambler.

It was their custom for one of them to go every morning at sunrise to a neighboring spring to get water. So at sunrise the watchers on the brow of the cliff saw one of the wives coming out of the gambler’s house with a water jar on her head, whereupon the son of Qastcèqogan descended into the cañon, and followed her to the spring. She was not aware of his presence until she had filled her water-jar; then she supposed it to be her own husband, whom the youth was dressed and adorned to represent, and she allowed him to approach her. She soon discovered her error, however, but deeming it prudent to say nothing, she suffered him to follow her into the house. As he entered, he observed that many of the slaves had already assembled; perhaps they were aware that some trouble was in store for their master. The latter looked up with an angry face; he felt jealous when he saw the stranger entering immediately after his wife.

He said nothing of this, however, but asked at once the important question, “Have you come to gamble with me?” This he repeated four times, and each time the young Qastcèqogan said “No.” Thinking the stranger feared to play with him, Noqoilpi went on challenging him recklessly.

“I’ll bet myself against yourself”;

“I’ll bet my feet against your feet”;

“I’ll bet my legs against your legs”; and so on he offered to bet every and any part of his body against the same part of his adversary, ending by mentioning his hair.

In the mean time the party of divine ones, who had been watching from above, came down, and people from the neighboring pueblos came in, and among these were two boys, who were dressed in costumes similar to those worn by the wives of the gambler. The young Qastcèqogan pointed to these and said, "I will bet my wives my against your wives."

The great gambler accepted the wager, and the four persons, two women and two mock women, were placed sitting in a row near the wall. First they played the game of thirteen chips. The Bat assisted, as he had promised the son of Qastcèqogan, and the latter soon won the game, and with it the wives of Noqòilpi.

This was the only game played inside the house; then all went out of doors, and games of various kinds were played. First they tried nanjoj. The track already prepared lay east and west, but, prompted by the wind god, the stranger insisted on having a track made from north to south, and again, at the bidding of the Wind, he chose the red stick. The son of Qastcèqogan threw the wheel: at first it seemed about to fall on the gambler's pole, in the "turkey-claw" of which it was entangled; but to the great surprise of the gambler it extricated itself, rolled farther on, and fell on the pole of his opponent. The latter ran to pick up the ring, lest Noqòilpi in doing so might hurt the Snake inside; but the gambler was so angry that he threw his stick away and gave up the game, hoping to do better in the next contest, which was that of pushing down trees.

For this the great gambler pointed out two small trees, but his opponent insisted that larger trees must be found. After some search they agreed upon two of good size, which grew close together, and of these the wind-god told the youth which one he must select. The gambler strained with all his might at his tree, but could not move it, while his opponent, when his turn came, shoved the other tree prostrate with little effort, for its roots had all been severed by the Gopher.

Then followed a variety of games, on which Noqòilpi staked his wealth in shells and precious stones, his houses, and many of his slaves, and lost all.

The last game was that of the ball. On the line over which the ball was to be knocked all the people were assembled: on one side were those who still remained slaves; on the other side were the freedmen and those who had come to wager themselves, hoping to rescue their kinsmen. Noqòilpi bet on this game the last of his slaves and his own person. The gambler struck his ball a heavy blow, but it did not reach the line; the stranger gave his but a light tap, and the ball within it flew with it far beyond the line, where at the released captives jumped over the line and joined their people.

The victor ordered all the shell beads and precious stones and the great shells to be brought forth. He gave the beads and shells to Qastèyalçi, that they might be distributed among the gods; the two great shells were given to the Sun.

In the mean time Noqòilpi sat to one side saying bitter things, bemoaning his fate, and cursing and threatening his enemies, "I will kill you all with the lightning. I will send war and disease among you. May the cold freeze you! May the fire burn you! May the waters drown you!" he cried.

“He has cursed enough,” whispered Niltci to the son of Qastcèqogan. “Put an end to his angry words.”

So the young victor called Noqoilpi to him, and said, “You have bet yourself and have lost; you are now my slave and must do my bidding. You are not a god, for my power has prevailed against yours.”

The victor had a bow of magic power named the Bow of Darkness; he bent this upwards, and placing the string on the ground, he bade his illustrious slave stand on the string; then he shot Noqoilpi up into the sky as if he had been an arrow. Up and up he went, growing smaller and smaller to the sight till he faded to a mere speck, and finally disappeared altogether. As he flew upwards he was heard to mutter in the angry tones of abuse and imprecation, until he was too far away to be heard; but no one could distinguish anything he said as he ascended.

He flew up in the sky until he came to the home of Bekotcic-e, the god who carries the moon, and who is supposed by the Navajos to be identical with the god of the Americans. He is very old, and dwells in a long row of stone houses. When Noqoilpi arrived at the house of Bekotcic-e, he related to the latter all his misadventures in the lower world and said, “Now I am poor, and this is why I have come to see you.”

“You need be poor no longer,” said Bekotcic-e. “I will provide for you.”

So he made for the gambler pets or domestic animals of new kinds, different to those which he had in the Chaco valley; he made for him sheep, asses, horses, swine, goats, and fowls. He also gave him bayeta, and other cloths of bright colors, more beautiful than those woven by his slaves at Kintyèli. He made, too, a new people, the Mexicans, for the gambler to rule over, and then he sent him back to this world again, but he descended far to the south of his former abode, and reached the earth in old Mexico.

Noqoilpi’s people increased greatly in Mexico, and after a while they began to move toward the north, and build towns along the Rio Grande. Noqoilpi came with them until they arrived at a place north of Santa Fé. There they ceased building, and he returned to old Mexico, where he still lives, and where he is now the Nakàì C-igíni, or God of the Mexicans.

OJIBWA

---

THE FLOOD

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Radin, Paul, and A. B. Reagan. "Ojibwa Myths and Tales: The Manabozho Cycle." Journal of American Folklore 41 (1928 ): 71–76.

Date: 1911–1914

Original Source: Ojibwa

National Origin: Native American

---

Manabozho is the preeminent trickster in the Algonquin cultures of the North and Northeastern Woodlands. In this myth, however, his primary role is that of culture hero who cleanses the environment of monstrous sea-lions and snakes, making the world safe for human life. His supernatural power is demonstrated further by powers of prophesy, restoring life to the dead and shape-shifting.

---

Manabozho, as he is known to the Indians, is the Eastern God. When he was a boy he lived with his grandmother. His father and mother had been killed in war. When he became of age, he prepared to go to war.

The enemy (the sea lion) that had killed his parents lived on an island surrounded by water. Surrounding this island and extending to a distance of a mile and a half from shore was floating pitch-like ice, such that a canoe could not get ashore over it. He asked his grandmother for advice but she told him it was futile for him to fight with the sea-lion that lived on that island. However, Manabozho was determined. He made a large canoe and covered it with tallow so that it would float and go through the pitch that surrounded the island. The purpose of the pitch was to catch the canoe in it; after which the sea-lion would come out and devour the canoe and its occupants. When Manabozho had completed his canoe, he made a good bow and prepared plenty of arrows to fight with. After everything was ready, he started on the war path.

When he had launched his canoe, he told his grandmother to go ahead of him with another canoe in a zigzag course up the channel for a little way. (This custom of having the women precede a war party for a little way on its start was long afterwards followed by the Chippewas in starting on the war path against the Sioux.) So Manabozho started on his war expedition.

After considerable labor in paddling and pushing his canoe through and over the pitch-like ice, he landed safely on the island in the night. There on the shore he stayed till the break of day. At dawn, he gave a war-whoop and ran toward the chief's house, the sea-monster's home. Upon hearing the war-whoop, the chief jumped from his bed and got his bow and arrows.

The two powerful beings started to fight in accordance with the powers with which they were endowed by their superior givers. The fight was terrible. They fought two days continually without killing each other, and rested on their arms, with the contest undecided. But Manabozho had advisors at hand.

On the evening following the second day's battle, Batter, the bird called Bluejay, accosted Manabozho and said, "You can not kill the Sea-lion by shooting him in the body. His heart and vital parts are not in his body. I will tell you where his heart is if you will promise to give me some meat from his dead carcass."

With open mouth and wide eyes, Manabozho listened to Batter's statements and advice until he was through, then replied, "My brother, if you will tell me where the chief Sea-lion's heart is, I will give you the meat and make you chief of the Blue jays and all carnivorous birds."

"In truth," spoke up Batter, as he flew to a limb over Manabozho so as to be heard more easily without talking loud enough to be heard by anyone else, "this monster's heart is in his little toe. Aim for the little toe the next time you go into battle with him, and you will succeed in killing him."

The morning of the third day, Manabozho started again to fight after giving a war-whoop. The chief Sea-lion came out with his full equipment for another battle. The fight had begun. Manabozho aimed for the little toe of his adversary. The arrow struck the mark squarely and penetrated the vital organs. The chief Sea-lion keeled over and died. Seeing him fall, Manabozho ran towards him, pulled his knife out and cut the chief's scalp off.

He then set out for his canoe and sailed across to the place where he had left his grandmother, singing his song of victory as he went, as the Indians used to sing when returning from the battle field.

When the grandmother heard Manabozho coming, singing his song of victory, she started out to meet him in her canoe, and nearing the canoe of her grandson she took the scalp from him and set out ahead toward the shore.

Landing, she called the village neighbors, and all began to have the war dance around the scalp in the middle of the dance hall, as it was the custom of the Indians to dance the war dance in the past. Thus they danced till they had completed the ceremony. Then they smoked the pipe of peace.

After the close of the four-days dance over the scalp of the chief Sea-lion, Manabozho bid his grandmother good-bye, and started west over the earth. After four days of journeying, he met four wolves. One of the four was a chief.

Meeting him, they then accompanied him for four days. As he thus journeyed west with them, he noticed every evening when they camped for the night that they would pile sticks in a heap and the chief wolf would jump over the pile four times. Then the wood would catch fire without the aid of any fire-starter. So Manabozho learned this manner of starting fires from the chief. As they traveled about, young wolves came along behind and chased down the moose and deer and killed them as they were needed. Then they would dress and cook them and all would eat to their satisfaction. So all were happy.

After journeying four days with the wolf pack, Manabozho took one of the young wolves to accompany him, and leaving the rest of, the wolves, he continued on his way west. He called the young wolf his nephew. The first night after they had parted company with the rest of the wolves, Manabozho had a bad dream.

The next morning he told his nephew to be careful, as he was to chase a moose that morning, a moose which they had tracked the evening before, and he warned his nephew on account of his dream. This he told his nephew as he was about to start, for the hunt. He continued, "In chasing this moose you are tracking whenever you come to a little stream always cut a tree down and walk across on it. Don't jump over. Be careful, I had a bad dream about you in connection with this chase."

The nephew started out on the chase, and Manabozho, followed his tracks. Soon the nephew came to a little stream. He felled a tree across the stream as he had been instructed by his uncle Manabozho. Over this he crossed safely. After a while he came to another very small stream. This he thought he would jump over, as it seemed much too small to take time to cut a tree down on which to cross. In addition he could see the moose only just a little way farther on staggering with fatigue, and by crossing immediately, he could soon overtake it. He could even taste fresh meat, he imagined, so sure was he of the moose.

So he jumped. As he jumped, the stream swelled instantly into a raging torrent and swept him away; it became a large river through the power of the great snake god living a little way off from the outlet near a point that projected into the open lake. It was on an island just beyond this sand-point that the Snake God and other snakes and bears lived, animals that live in the water. Here to this island home the wolf was taken a prisoner, killed and skinned and his hide used to cover the door-way of the lodge where the snakes go in and out.

Manabozho, following along behind, tracked his nephew to this second stream, now a big river. He found that his nephew's tracks ended there. He knew at once that he had disobeyed his orders of the morning, to cut a tree and place it across every stream he came to. He had cut one tree down and had crossed the stream there safely; but now he had disobeyed orders. He had tried to jump the stream but had been caught by the current, and the stream getting larger and swifter as it passed on toward the lake, had taken him out with it to the residence of the Chief Snake God, who had then killed him and placed his hide as a door cover for the snake-passage.

Finding that his nephew's tracks ended at the stream crossing and that he had undoubtedly been swept out into the lake by the stream, Manabozho started down its winding course, hoping that he might find his nephew stranded and alive yet, or that he might be lucky enough to find his body, if dead. As he neared the stream's mouth he saw a bird looking down into the water. He sneaked slowly up to it. When it was within reach, he made a grab for its head, but unfortunately he just missed his hold and merely ruffled the feathers on the back of its head and neck. (The bird was a kingfisher; the top bunch of feathers on his head became a pompadour.) Having escaped the bird flew away a short distance and lit.

Then looking back and seeing Manabozho he said, "I would have told you where your nephew was had you not grabbed me by the head as you did."

But Manabozho was equal to the occasion, for he knew the vanity of living beings. So he said to the bird, "Come over and tell me and I will make you a pretty bird." Then the bird flew near to Manabozho and told him that his nephew had been killed by the Chief Snake who lived near the sand point yonder. He told him further that the snakes and bears and other water beasts came out to sun themselves about noon on the sand point each nice day and that the Chief Snake would be the last to come ashore to sun himself and take a nap. Manabozho thanked the bird for the information and made a nice bird of him, rubbed his breast with white clay and painted his back blue.

Having completed his conversation with the bird, Manabozho started for the sand point, after he had made a strong bow and had prepared bullrush tops for arrows. When he got near the sand beach he said to himself, "I will be a tree-stump." So he turned into a stump of a poplar tree.

After a while, as the sun ascended the heavens, the snakes came out to sun themselves on the sandy beach as they were wont to do, the white bears coming last. Then the Chief Snake came. The others had noticed nothing; but the Chief Snake at once noticed the tree-stump.

"What is that?" he exclaimed instantly. On scanning it further, he said, "I believe that is Manabozho standing there." Then he turned to another of the snakes and said, "You go and coil around that stump and squeeze it hard."

So the snake did as he was bidden. He went to the stump, coiled himself around it and squeezed it; but Manabozho never moved. After the snake had tried this for a considerable time, he gave it up and went back to where the Chief Snake was, saying, "That can't be Manabozho."

But the chief Snake was not satisfied. He turned to the white bear and commanded him also to examine the supposed stump, saying to him, "You go and climb on that stump to the top and slide down so as to scratch it as you come down."

The bear did as he was told and Manabozho nearly squealed, but he never moved. Going back to his master, the bear then said, "That can't be Manabozho."

So the chief Snake was satisfied. He came ashore and stretched himself on the sand to sun himself. Then after all the reptiles were fast asleep, Manabozho turned into a man again, took out his bow and arrows and went near the chief snake and shot him in the body; but the chief Snake never moved.

Then Manabozho remembered what the kingfisher had told him, that to injure the chief Snake he must shoot his shadow. This time Manabozho shot the chief Snake's shadow. Instantly he stretched out and gasped in awful pain.

Seeing this, Manabozho started to run back to get a few logs together to make a raft. The kingfisher had told him that if he wounded the chief Snake, he would flood the world as high as the topmost tree; that then the water would go down again; but that if he killed him, the dying reptile would destroy the whole world with a mighty flood. The water had already begun to rise. So Manabozho got on the little raft he had succeeded in making and floated about, as he watched the water rise until the trees all disappeared. Then the water went slowly down again.

After it was dry on the earth, Manabozho went back to tell the chief wolf what had happened. After narrating this to the wolf tribe, he went back to the lake where he had the encounter with the chief Snake. He knew by the fact that the world was not destroyed completely that the chief Snake had only been wounded, and he had it in his mind to kill him, whatever the consequence might be.

As he was walking along the shore of the lake, he heard something rattling. Looking ahead, he saw a large frog-like old lady jumping along. She had a rattle which she used in doctoring. She also had a pack of basswood bark on her back. "Hello, grandma," shouted Manabozho to her, "where are you going?"

"I am going to the chief Snake's house to doctor him," answered the frog-lady.

"Why, what is the matter with the chief Snake, grandma?"

"Why, a great god Manabozho, shot the chief Snake for revenge."

"Grandma, teach me your medicine song," broke in Manabozho, "I will pay you."

So, tempted with the promised pay, the old medicine-frog-lady told Manabozho all about her doctoring and medicine songs. Then Manabozho, after he had learned all she could impart to him, killed her, skinned her, then put the skin on himself, took the rattle and the pack of basswood bark and started for the village where the chief Snake lived. On the way, he stopped where the old frog-lady lived and there he made himself at home and waited.

That evening a messenger came saying, "Grandma, you are invited again to come and doctor the chief."

"All right," answered Manabozho. Then imitating the old frog-lady, he started to finish his killing of the chief Snake. As he journeyed toward the home of the King Snake he got a lot of trees together for a raft, in case he should need them. Getting everything ready, he continued on his journey to the chief Snake's house.

As he neared the door, he noticed his nephew's skin hanging as a curtain in the doorway. The sight of it made him feel so bad that he almost cried. They, thinking he was the old medicine-frog-lady, invited him into the house, and he entered.

They led him to the room where the chief Snake lay very sick. On entering the room, Manabozho took his rattles and started to sing the medicine songs he had learned from the aged frog-lady. As he sang he crawled nearer and nearer to the chief's side. As he did so, he saw that the arrow that he had shot that previous time was still imbedded in his flesh with the broken end sticking out. He waited.

At the opportune moment, he pushed the arrow completely in and instantly killed the chief, as he had intended. Immediately he fled from the house, singing to cover his tracks and to prevent suspicion. He knew the consequence of his act, and set out with all speed for his raft arriving there none too soon.

While Manabozho was still running, the water began to rise, and by the time he reached his raft it was knee-deep. He got on top of the raft just as it began to float away. The whole world was immediately submerged.

In this catastrophe the animals began to swim around the raft trying to get somewhere safe from the raging waters. Some succeeded in getting up on the raft—all that could; others hung on. For three days they were floating as if it were an ocean and they were in the middle of it; there was no land to be seen anywhere. The whole land surface had been swallowed up.

One thing Manabozho had forgotten before he got aboard his raft: he had forgotten to get a handful of dirt from the earth. So on the morning of the fourth day of the flood, he called a council, saying, "We must do something. We can not stay here on this raft for all time. We must get some dirt." So he chose four divers: Beaver, Otter, Loon, and Muskrat. These were to try to secure some earth from the bottom of the sea so as to be able to start land again.

Beaver first dove down; but died before he reached the bottom of the waters. The Otter dove likewise but died and floated lifeless on the water. Then the loon went down and down and returned again without anything. He had seen it but had lost his life just as he was nearing the green land and the trees. He floated dead near the raft and Manabozho brought him back to life by blowing his breath into his face. The Muskrat then started to dive downward. For two days nothing was seen of him. At last, however, he floated again on the waters' surface near the raft, dead and all doubled up. They pulled him aboard. Then Manabozho blew life into him again and examined him to see what he had found.

In the Muskrat's hands he found a little earth and sand, also in his feet and mouth, also a leaf and some seed. Having obtained the coveted gifts of earth, Manabozho dried them in his hands and caused them to increase till he had a hand full of them. The re-creation of the world was at hand.

Being all ready for the great work before him, Manabozho held his hand filled with dirt, sand, and seed up to his face, palm up. At once he began to blow his breath strongly over the lump and blow particles of it off around the raft. In this way he formed an island. At once the animals left the raft and began to roam around on the land surface, but Manabozho kept on blowing the particles from his hand out further and further, thus extending the land area. He kept on blowing till the "land extended beyond human sight." He then sent the raven to fly around the earth (land) to see how big it was.

He was gone for two days, then returned. Manabozho said, "That's too small." So he blew more and more sand. Then he sent the dove to see how large the earth was. But it was so large that the dove never came back. Manabozho was satisfied that the world was big enough. Then he started to plant things, including the great forest of the Northwest. Having completed his re-creation of the earth, he departed for his home.

Manabozho now lives down East, the great chief of all spirits of the Indians. He conquered and killed the great enemy of mankind, the Chief-Snake God. If Indians live good lives, according to the teachings of the Grand Medicine lodge, they will be guided to the happy hunting ground when they die, there to be forever happy, happy throughout all eternity with Manabozho, their elder brother.

BEAR MAIDEN

Tradition Bearer: Pa-skin

Source: Jenks, Albert Ernest. "The Bear Maiden: An Ojibwa Folk-Tale from Lac Courte Oreille Reservation, Wisconsin." Journal of American Folklore 15 (1902): 33–35.

Date: 1899

Original Source: Ojibwa

National Origin: Native American

---

According to the author, Albert Ernest Jenks, the narrator Pa-skin, was an elderly woman more than one hundred years old. Jenks goes on to suggest that the only European influence in this ordinary folktale enters with the horse, the bells, and the dishes at the end of the narrative. However, elements such as the pervasive patterns of threes, the success of the devalued younger of three siblings, and the winning of a spouse by performing extraordinary tasks for a chief (king) suggest more extensive European impact.

---

There was an old man and woman who had three daughters, two older ones, and a younger one who was a little bear. The father and mother got very old and could not work any longer, so the two older daughters started away to find work in order to support themselves. They did not want their little sister to go with them, so they left her at home.

After a time they looked around, and saw the little Bear running to overtake them. They took her back home, and tied her to the door-posts of the wigwam, and again started away to find work; and again they heard something behind them, and saw the little Bear running toward them with the posts on her back. The sisters untied her from them and tied her to a large pine tree.

Then they continued on their journey. They heard a noise behind them once more, and turned around to find their younger sister, the little Bear, running to them with the pine tree on her back. They did not want her to go with them, so they untied her from the pine tree and fastened her to a huge rock, and continued on in search of work.

Soon they came to a wide river which they could not get across. As they sat there on the shore wondering how they could cross the river, they heard a noise coming toward them. They looked up and saw their younger sister running to them with the huge rock on her back. They untied the rock, threw it into the middle of the river, laid a pine tree on it, and walked across. This time the little Bear went with them.

After a short journey they came to a wigwam where an old woman lived with her two daughters. This old woman asked them where they were going. They told her that their parents were old, and that they were seeking work in order to support themselves. She invited them in, gave them all supper, and after supper the two older sisters and the two daughters of the old woman went to sleep in the same bed.

The old woman and the little Bear sat up, and the little Bear told many stories to the old woman. At last they both appeared to fall asleep. The little Bear pinched the old woman, and finding her asleep, went to the bed and changed the places of the four sleeping girls. She put the daughters of the old woman on the outside and her own sisters in the middle. Then she lay down as though asleep. After a short time the old woman awoke and pinched the little Bear to see whether she slept. She sharpened her knife and went to the bed and cut off the heads of the two girls at the outer edges of the bed. The old woman lay down and soon was sleeping. The little Bear awoke her sisters, and they all three crept away.

In the morning when the old woman got up and found that she had killed her two daughters, she was very angry. She jumped up into the sky, and tore down the sun and hid it in her wigwam, so that the little Bear and her sisters would get lost in the dark. They passed on and on, and at last met a man carrying a light. He said he was searching for the sun. They passed on, and soon came to a large village where all of the men were going around with lights. Their chief was sick because the sun had vanished.

He asked the little Bear whether she could bring back the sun. She said, "Yes, give me two hands full of maple-sugar and your oldest son." With the maple-sugar she went to the wigwam of the old woman, and, climbing up to the top, threw the sugar into a kettle of wild rice which the old woman was cooking.

When the old woman tasted the rice she found it too sweet, so she went away to get some water to put in the kettle, and the little Bear jumped down, ran into the wigwam, grabbed up the hidden sun, and threw it into the sky. When the little Bear returned to the village, she gave the oldest son of the chief to her oldest sister for a husband.

The old woman was angry, very angry, to find that the sun was again up in the sky, so she jumped up and tore down the moon. The good old chief again became sick because the nights were all dark. He asked the little Bear whether she could bring back the moon.

She said, "Yes, if you give me two handfuls of salt and your next oldest son." She took the salt, climbed on top of the wigwam of the old woman, and threw it into her boiling kettle. Again the old woman had to go away for water. The little Bear then ran into the wigwam, and, catching up the moon, tossed it into the sky. The little Bear returned to the village and gave the chief's second son to her other sister.

Again the old chief got sick, and he asked the little Bear whether she could get him his lost horse which was all covered with bells. She answered, "Yes, give me two handfuls of maple-sugar and your youngest son." The little Bear went to the old woman's wigwam, and, doing as she had done before, she made the old woman go away for water.

She then slipped into the wigwam and began taking the bells from the horse which was there. She led the horse outside, but she had neglected to take off one bell. The old woman heard the bell, and ran and caught the little Bear. She put the bells all back onto the horse, and put the little Bear into a bag and tied the bag to a limb of a tree. When this was done she went far away to get a large club with which to break the little Bear's neck.

While she was gone the little Bear bit a hole in the bag and got down. This time she took all of the bells from the horse, and then she caught all of the dogs and pet animals of the old woman, and put them and her dishes into the bag, and tied it to the limb. Pretty soon the old woman returned with her large club, and she began to beat the bag furiously. The little Bear could see from her hiding-place, and could hear the animals and hear the dishes breaking as the old woman struck the bag.

When the little Bear took the horse to the chief, he gave her his youngest son. They lived close to the other two brothers and sisters. The little Bear's husband would not sleep with her, so she became very angry, and told him to throw her into the fire.

Her sisters heard the noise, and came in to see what the matter was. The young man told them what their sister had ordered him to do. When they went away he turned toward the fire, and a beautiful, very beautiful maiden sprang out from the flames. Then this beautiful maiden would not sleep with her husband.

Tlingit

---

EL: THE MYTH OF RAVEN

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Golder, F. A. "Tlingit Myths." Journal of American Folklore 20 (1907): 290–294.

Date: ca. 1907

Original Source: Tlingit

National Origin: Native American

---

The Tlingit are the northern neighbors of the Haida (see "Story of the Fin-Back Crest," page 79, for background on the Northwest Coast cultures) residing along the west coast where northwestern Canada meets southwestern Alaska. As the following myth reveals, raven (or El as he is called in this variant) is the divine creator, culture hero, and trickster for the Tlingit. Raven figures prominently and in many of the same roles for other Northwest Coast cultures, including the Eskimo (see, for example, "When Raven Wanted to Marry Snowbird and Fly with the Geese," page 75). While the tales of raven's exploits, in general, are shared among the people regardless of clan membership, other myths are regarded as the property of individual clans. Such is the case with the final episode of this narrative, which describes raven's encounter with Kanu, the clan ancestor of the wolf lineage. As might be expected, the wolf myth asserts that their clan ancestor is even older and more powerful than raven.

---

There was a time, say the followers of El [Raven], when there was no light, and all the people lived and moved in the darkness. At that time lived a certain man who had a wife and a sister. He loved his wife to such an extent that he would not allow her to do any kind of work; and she spent the day either sitting in the house, or sunning herself on the hillock outside. She had eight little red birds, four on each side of her, who were always near her, and who would instantly leave her if there was any familiarity between her and any man except her husband. Of such a jealous disposition was her husband, that, whenever he went away, he locked her in a chest. Every day he went to the forest, where he made boats and canoes, being very proficient in such work.

His sister, who was called Kitchuginsi (daughter of a sea-swallow), had several sons (it is not known by whom); but the jealous uncle, so soon as they reached manhood, destroyed them. Some say that he took them out to sea and drowned them; but others say that he sealed them up in a hollow log. The helpless mother could only weep for her children. One day when she was sitting on the beach, mourning over a son, who disappeared in the usual way, she saw a school of small whales passing by, and one of them coming in closer, stopped and started a conversation with her. When he had learned the cause of her grief, he told her to throw herself into the sea and from the bottom bring up a pebble, swallow it, and wash it down with a little sea-water. So soon as the whale departed, Kitchuginsi went down to the bottom of the sea, fetched up a small pebble, swallowed it, and drank some sea-water. The effect of this extraordinary dose was that she conceived, and in eight months gave birth to a son, whom she considered an ordinary mortal, but he was El. Kitchuginsi, before giving birth to El, hid herself away from her brother in a secret place.

When El began to grow up, his mother made him a bow and arrows and instructed him in the use of them. El liked this kind of exercise, and soon became such an excellent shot that not a bird could fly by him; and from the hummingbirds alone that he killed his mother made herself a parka; and to fully indulge his passion for the chase he made a hunting-barrabara. Sitting there one morning in the early dawn, he saw that directly in front of his door sat a large bird resembling a magpie, with a long tail and a long and thin bill, bright and strong as iron. El killed her instantly and carefully skinned her, as is usually done for stuffing, and put the skin on himself. He had no sooner done this when he felt the desire and ability to fly, and immediately flew up, and soared so high and with such a force that his bill pierced into the clouds, and he was held there so strongly that with difficulty he extricated him-self. After that he flew back to his barrabara, took off his skin and hid it. At another time and in the same manner he killed a duck, and, taking off her skin, put it on his mother, who instantly received the ability to swim.

When El reached full growth, his mother told him of all his uncle's doings. El, so soon as he heard about them, went to his uncle's, and at the time when he is usually at his work. Going into the barrabara, he opened the chest in which his uncle's wife was kept, and debauched her; the birds instantly deserted her. The uncle, returning from his work and seeing all that happened, became extremely angry; but El sat very quietly and did not even move from his place. Then the uncle, calling him outside, seated himself with him in a canoe, and went with him to a place where many sea-monsters gathered; there he threw him into the sea, and thought that he had again got rid of a rival. But El walked on the bottom of the sea till he came to the shore, and reappeared before his uncle.

The uncle, seeing that he could not destroy his nephew in the usual way, said, in his anger, "Let there be a flood." The sea began to overflow its banks and rose higher and higher. El put on his magpie skin and flew up into the clouds, and, as before, pierced them with his bill, and hung there suspended until the water, which had covered all the mountains, even reaching so high that his tail and wings were wet, subsided entirely. He then began to descend as lightly as a feather, and thinking, "Ah, if I could only drop on some good place," and he dropped there where the sun goes down. But he fell not on land, but into the sea, on the kelp; from there a sea-otter brought him safely away. Others say that he fell on the Queen Charlotte Islands, and, taking in his bill chips of the fir tree, flew away to other islands, and where he dropped the chips there trees grow; and where he did not there they are not.

On coming to land again after the flood, El went towards the east, and in one place finding some dead boys, brought them to life by tickling them in the nose with hair which he had pulled out from a certain woman; in another place he set the sea-gull and heron to quarrel, and in this manner obtained a smelt fish which he afterwards exchanged for a canoe and other things. But of all his adventures and doings, which are so numerous that it is impossible for one man to know them all, the most remarkable is the way he obtained the light.

At the time when the above-mentioned wonders were worked there was no light on the earth; it was in the possession of a rich and powerful chief, being kept in three small boxes, which he guarded jealously and did not permit any one even to touch them. El, learning this, wished above all things to obtain the light, and he obtained it.

That chief had an only daughter, a virgin, whom he loved dearly, indulged, and tended, even to the extent of carefully examining her food and drink before she used it. There was no other way to obtain the light from the chief except by becoming his grandson, and El concluded to be born of his daughter. To accomplish his end was not difficult for him; since he could assume the shape of any object that he desired, birds, fish, grass, etc., appearing as crow the oftenest, however. In this case he changed himself into a tiny piece of grass, and stuck to the side of the cup out of which the chief's daughter drank, and when she, after the usual examination, began drinking, it slid down her throat. Small though it was, she felt that she had swallowed something, and she tried hard but unsuccessfully to bring it up. The result, of all this was that she conceived; and, when the time came around for her to give birth, the chief ordered to be placed under her sea-otter skins and other valuable things. But the woman could not give birth, although her father and others assisted her in every known way. Finally a very old woman took her into the forest, where she made a bed of moss for her under a tree and laid her on it; and just as soon as she lay on it she gave birth to a son.

No one even suspected that the new-born child was El; the grandfather was delighted with his grandson, and loved him even more than his daughter. One day, after El commenced to understand a little, he set up a loud bawl and no one nor anything could quiet him. No matter what was given him, he threw it away and cried louder than before, and kept reaching out and pointing to the three little boxes which contained the heavenly lights. They could not be given to him without the permission of the chief, and he would not for a long time consent; at last he was obliged to give the boy one of the boxes. He immediately became quiet and happy, and began playing with it. A little later he took it out-of-doors, and, when unobserved, opened it and instantly stars appeared in the sky. Seeing this, the chief regretted the loss of his treasure, but he did not reprove the boy. In the same cunning manner El obtained the second box, in which the moon was kept, and opened it; he even cried for the last and most precious box, containing the sun. The chief would not indulge him any longer; El did not leave off crying and bawling, refused to eat and drink, and consequently became ill. To humor him, the tender grandfather gave him the last box too, and ordered that he be watched and prevented from opening it; but El, so soon as he came outside, changed himself into a crow, flew away with the box, and appeared on the earth.

In passing over one place, El heard human voices, but could see no one; for the sun was not yet. El asked them, "Who are you; and would you like to have light?"

"You are deceiving us," they said; "you are not El, who is the only one that can make light." To convince the unbelievers, El opened the box, and at once the sun in all his splendor appeared in the sky. At this sight the people scattered themselves in all directions, some to the forests and became beasts, others to the trees and became birds, still others to the waters and became fishes. There was no fire on the earth, but on an island in the mid-sea. Thither El, dressed in his magpie skin, flew, and snatching a live brand, he hastened back. But the distance was so great that by the time the mainland was reached the brand and half of his bill were nearly consumed. Near the shore he dropped the brand, and the sparks were blown on to the rocks and trees. This explains why fire is found in these substances.

Until El's time there was no fresh water on the mainland and islands, with one exception. On this island, situated not far from Cape Ommaney, was a small well of fresh water guarded by Kanuk, the hero and ancestor of the Wolf tribe of the Tlingit. El (the details will be told later in connection with Kanuk) went over there, and taking in his bill as much water as it would hold, and after suffering racking tortures, flew back to the mainland of America. While flying over the earth, the water dripped on the land; where small drops fell springs and creeks appeared, and the larger drops formed lakes and rivers.

At last El, providing the people with all the necessities, went to his home, Nasshakiel, which is inaccessible both to men and spirits, as is shown from the following. One daring spirit undertook to go there, and as a punishment had his left side turned to stone; for in flying forward he looked on the left side where El's palace was. The left side of the spirit's mask, which was at the time in possession of the shaman at Chilkat, also became stone.

Once upon a time Kanuk lived on a treeless island, Tikenum, "sea-fortress," not far from Cape Ommaney. On that island is a small, square, stone well of fresh water, covered with a stone. Inside the well, on the stone, is a narrow horizontal line of a different color than the rest. This mark dates from the time, and indicates the quantity of water El drank and stole out of the well. The well is known as Kanuk's Well, because formerly, when there was no fresh water elsewhere on the earth, Kanuk kept it in the well and guarded it jealously; he even built a barrabara [small dwelling used in the Northwest Coast culture area] over it and slept on the cover of the well. One time Kanuk, while out at sea in his canoe, met El there in his canoe and asked him, "Have you been living long in this world?"

"I was born," said El, "before the earth was in its present place; and have you been living here long?"

"Since the time when the liver came out from below," answered Kanuk.

"Yes," said El, "you are older than I."

While continuing their conversation, they went farther and farther from the shore, and Kanuk, thinking it a good time to demonstrate his strength and superiority, took off his hat and put it behind himself; instantly such a thick fog appeared that one, sitting in one end of a canoe, could not see the other end. During that time Kanuk paddled away from his companion. El, unable to see Kanuk, and not knowing which way to go, began to cry to him, "Achkani, Achkani," but Kanuk made no answer; he called many times with the same result; finally, El, weeping, implored Kanuk to come to him. Kanuk then coming up to him, said, "What are you crying about?" Saying this, he put on his hat and the fog raised.

"Nu Achkani (my father-in-law and brother-in-law), you are stronger than I," said El.

After this Kanuk invited El to go home with him to his island; there they refreshed themselves, and fresh water was one of the many things that El had. It tasted so sweet and good that he could not get enough to satisfy him, and he was too bashful to ask for more. When dinner was over, El commenced to tell about his origin and the history of the world. At first Kanuk listened attentively, then drowsily, and at last fell into a sound sleep in his usual place on the cover of the well. While he was sleeping El quietly placed some dung under and around Kanuk, and then going outside, called, "Achkani, wake up, look around you; you are, it seems, not well."

Kanuk woke up and felt around, and believing what El said, ran to the beach to wash himself. In the mean time El pushed the cover off the well, and drank all the water he could, and, changing to a crow, filled his bill with water and started to fly out by way of the chimney, but was mysteriously held back when almost at the top. Kanuk, re-turning from his wash, made a fire, and began smoking his guest until he turned black. This explains why the crow, who was formerly white, is now black. Finally Kanuk, pitying El, let him go, and he (El) flew away to his earth, and dripped the water on it, as was mentioned before.

THE DOOM OF THE KATT-A-QUINS

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Deans, James. "The Doom of the Katt-a-quins: From the Aboriginal Folk-lore of Southern Alaska." Journal of American Folklore 5 (1892): 233–235.

Date: 1862

Original Source: Tlingit

National Origin: Native American

---

The Tlingit, like the other cultures of the Northwest Coast, attained an extremely high level of cultural complexity because of the abundance and dependability of food resources and because of the presence of thick jungle-like forests that provided building materials. The Tlingit were able to develop stable settlements and devote less time to the business of staying alive. Raven, who acts as an agent of justice in the following myth, was the culture hero of many Northwest Coast Native Americans, including the Tlingit.

---

Katt-a-quin was a chief among the Tlingit. He lived very long ago, our fathers tell us, so long that no man can count the time by moons nor by snows, but by generations.

He was a bad man, the worst that ever lived among our people. Not only were he himself and his wife bad, but the whole family were like him. They were feared and shunned by every one, even by little children, who would run away screaming when any of the family came near.

Nothing seemed to give them so much pleasure as the suffering of other people. Dogs they delighted to torture, and tore their young ones to pieces. Most persons love and fondle a nice, fat little puppy, but not so the Katt-a-quin family; when they got a nice puppy it was soon destroyed by hunger and ill-usage.

When the people met their neighbors from above, at Shakes-heit, if Katt-a-quin came there, he generally spoiled the market, and if he could not get what he wanted by fair means, he would take it by force. The people, seeing this, would pack up and leave.

So tired had they grown of the family, that the rest of the tribe had decided to make them all leave the village, or, failing in that, endeavor to get clear of them by some other means. But before doing anything of that sort, they were delivered in a way terrible and unthought of. From old versions of the story, it appears that the people had become so disgusted with the family that when they wished to go hunting, or to gather wild fruit, they would strictly conceal their object and the direction of their journey from those whom they disliked.

One morning, while all were staying at Shakes-heit, they made up their minds to go to the large flat where these rocks stand, and lay in a stock of wild fruits for winter use. So in order that none of the Katt-a-quin might come, they all left early and quietly. When the others got up, which was far from early, as they were a lazy lot, and found that they were left alone, they were displeased at not being asked to go along with the others. After a time they all got into a canoe, and went up the river in order to find the rest, which after a while they did, by finding their canoes hauled up on shore.

After this they also landed, and began to pluck berries, but finding that the people who preceded them had got the best of the fruit, they gave up picking in disgust, and were seated on the shore when the others returned, having, as might be expected, plenty of fine fruit. Seeing that the rest had a fine supply, and they themselves nothing but sour, unripe stuff, they asked for a few, which the others gave them; at the same time saying that they should not be so lazy, as they might also have got their share of good ones. After a while, the old fellow demanded more of the best fruit; this the people flatly refused, saying that the late comers ought to go picking for themselves.

Just then a number of the first party, who had gone in another direction, returned with baskets full of nice, large, and ripe fruit. Seeing this, the whole family of the Katt-a-quins went and demanded the whole; this the others refused, saying they had no idea of toiling all day gathering fruit for such a worthless, lazy set as they were. A scuffle began, which ended in the family upsetting all the fruit, and trampling it under foot in the sand, thus destroying the proceeds of a long and hard day's work.

Seeing all this, the people made a rush, some for their bows and arrows, others arming themselves with whatever came to hand, all determined to wreak vengeance on those who had caused the destruction of their day's labor, and whom all disliked.

Seeing this turn of affairs, and the determination of the people, the offenders knew that their only safety lay in getting aboard their canoe, and going down the river before the others could follow them. This they did, leaving in their hurry one or two of their children behind them. But a new and terrible retribution awaited them. When they reached the middle, Yehl (Raven), who had been watching their conduct, turned them in an instant to these stones, and placed them where they now stand, to be an eternal warning to evil-doers. The largest one is Katt-a-quin. The next is his wife, and the small stones in the land and in the water, his children. What is seen is only their bodies; their souls, which can never die, went to Seewuck-cow, there to remain for ages, or until such time as they have made reparation for the evil done while in the body. After this they will ascend to Kee-wuck-cow, a better land. Such was the doom of the Katt-a-quins. As our fathers told the story to us, said the Tlingit, so I tell it to you.

WICHITA

---

THE TWO BOYS WHO SLEW THE MONSTERS AND BECAME STARS

Tradition Bearer: Ahahe

Source: Dorsey, George A. "The Two Boys Who Slew the Monsters and Became Stars."
Journal of American Folklore 17 (1904): 153–160.

Date: 1904

Original Source: Wichita

National Origin: Native American

---

The Wichita, proper, were one band of the Wichita Confederacy who at various historical periods occupied territory on the southern plains in modern Kansas, Oklahoma, and northern Texas. They lived in dome-shaped dwellings and built their villages along streams. They grew crops of corn, melons, and tobacco and engaged in a seasonal buffalo hunt. The village divided by a street and governed by two different chiefs is a common motif in Wichita myth. The following narrative is a Native American example of the Twin Hero category, and as is the case in many similar tales, the more extraordinary and marginal of the two brothers has gifts that allow the boys to accomplish their marvelous deeds of cleansing the world by killing the monsters that reside in each of the cardinal directions (that is, the entire universe was dangerous and in need of taming). The transformation into stars is common not only in Native American myth, but worldwide, as in the Greek Heracles cycle, for example.

---

There was once a village where there were two chiefs. The village was divided by a street, so that each chief had his part of the village. Each chief had a child. The child of the chief living in the west village was a boy; the child of the chief living in the east village was a girl. The boy and the girl remained single and were not acquainted with each other. In these times, children of prominent families were shown the same respect as was shown to their parents, and they were protected from danger. The chief's son had a sort of scaffold fixed up for his bed, which was so high that he had to use a ladder to get upon it. When he came down from the bed the ladder was taken away.

Once upon a time the young man set out to visit the young woman, to find out what sort of a looking woman she was. He started in the night. At the very same time, the girl set out to visit the young man, to see what sort of looking man he was. They both came into the street-like place, and when they saw one another the girl asked the young man where he was going. The young man replied that he was going to see the chief's daughter, and he asked her where she was going. She replied that she was going to see the chief's son. The young man said that he was the chief's son, and the girl said that she was the chief's daughter. They were undecided whether to go to the young man's home or to the girl's home. They finally decided to go to the young man's home.

The next morning, the young man's people wondered why he was not up as early as usual. It was the custom of all the family to rise early and sit up late, for the people of the village came around to the chief's place at all times. They generally woke the young man by tapping on the ladder, so they tapped on the ladder to have him come down. When they could not arouse the young man they sent the old mother up to wake him. When she got there she found her son sleeping with another person. She came down and told the others about it. She was sent back to ask them to come down from the bed and have breakfast. When they came down it was found that the son's companion was the other chief's daughter.

Meanwhile, the other chief wondered why his daughter did not rise as early as usual. It was her custom to rise early and do work inside the lodge. In the village where the girl was from, there lived the Coyote. Since the girl was not to be found, the chief called the men and sent them out to find her. The Coyote was there when the father sent the men in search of his daughter. The Coyote went all through his own side of the village, and then went to the side of the other chief, where he found the girl living with the chief's son. He went back immediately to the girl's father and told where he had found her. After she was found, the chief was angry and sent word that she was never to come back to her home; and the young man's father did not like the way his son had acted.

The time came when the young man decided to leave the village. He told his wife to get what she needed to take along for the journey. They started at midnight, and went towards the south. They went a long way and then stopped for rest and fell asleep. On the next day they continued their journey in search of a new home. They traveled for three days, then they found a good place where there was timber and water, and there they made their home. The man went out daily to hunt, so that they might have all the meat they wanted. The woman fixed up a home, building a grass-lodge, and there they resided for a long while.

One time, when the man was about to go out hunting, he cut a stick and put some meat on it and set it by the fire to cook. He told his wife that the meat was for some one who would come to visit the place; and that she must not look at him; that when she should hear him talking she should get up in bed and cover her head with a robe. The man left to go hunting that day, and the woman stayed and remembered what she had been told. After her husband had gone the woman heard some one talking, saying that he was coming to get something to eat. When she heard him she went to her bed and covered her head. The visitor came in, took down the meat that the woman's husband had placed by the fire, and ate it.

Before leaving, he spoke and said, "I have eaten the meat and will go back home." When the visitor had gone, the woman got up again, for she had her morning work to do. It was late in the evening when her husband returned from his hunting trip. Every time he went hunting he put the meat up before leaving, and when the visitor came the wife would get in her bed so as not to see who he was. Every time he came in and ate she would listen, and it would sound like two persons eating together.

One morning, after her husband had left, the woman made a hole in her robe and took a piece of straw that had a hole in it. When the visitor came she got in her bed and put the robe over her, with the hole over her eye, having the straw in her hand. As soon as the person came in he commenced to eat. After he had finished eating and was starting out, the woman quickly placed the straw in the hole in the robe, looked through it and saw the person. She saw that he had two faces, one face on the front and one on the back side of his head.

When she looked at him he turned back, telling the woman that she had disobeyed her husband's orders and that she would be killed. Thereupon the Double-Faced-Man (Witschatska) took hold of the woman and cut her open. She was pregnant, so that when the Double-Faced-Man cut her open, he took out a young child, which he wrapped with some pieces of a robe and put on the back of some timber in the grass-lodge, and covered the woman again with her robe. Then he took the afterbirth and threw it into the water.

When the husband returned, he found that his wife was dead. He was there alone and so he spoke out, saying, "Now you have done wrong, disobeying my orders. I told you never to run any risk, but you made up your mind to look and see what sort of a person that was who came here, and he has killed you." The man took his wife's body to the south, laid her on the ground, and covered her with buffalo robes.

When he came back he heard a baby crying, and he looked around inside of the lodge, then outside, but he could not find the child. He finally heard the baby crying again and the sound came from behind one of the lodge poles. He looked there and found the child. He cooked some rare meat and had the child suck the juice. In this way the man nourished his child. He stayed with it most of the time, and when hunting, he took the child on his back.

Whenever he killed any game he would not hunt any more until all of his meat was gone. This child was a boy, and it was not very long before he began to walk, though his father would still take him on his back when he went hunting. When the child was old enough the father made him a bow and arrows, and left him at home when he went hunting.

One day when the boy had been left he heard some one saying, "My brother, come out and let us have an arrow game." When he turned around he saw a boy about his own age standing at the entrance of the grass-lodge. The little boy ran out to see his little visitor, who told him that he was his brother. They fixed up a place and had a game of arrows, which is often played to this day. When Double-Faced-Man had killed the woman, he had taken a stick that she had used for a poker and he thrust it into the afterbirth and threw it in the water. This stick was still fastened in the visiting boy. The boy wondered what this stick was there for. They commenced to play. The visiting boy promised not to tell their father about winning the arrows, and the other boy promised not to tell that he had had company. When the visiting boy left he went towards the river and jumped into the water.

When the father came home he asked his boy what had become of his arrows. The boy replied that he had lost all his arrows shooting at birds. His father tried to get him to go where he had been shooting at birds, to see if he could not find the arrows, but the boy said that he could not find the arrows. Next day, the father made other arrows for the boy and then went out hunting again.

As soon as the father left, the visiting boy came, calling his brother to come and have another game. They played all day, until the visiting boy won all the arrows, then he left the place, going toward the river. When the man came back from his hunting trip he found the boy with no arrows, and he asked him what had become of them. The boy said that he had lost his arrows by shooting birds. His father asked him to go out and look around for the arrows, but the boy refused, and said that the arrows could not be found. Again the father made more arrows for his boy.

After a long time the boy told his father of his brother's visits. The father undertook to capture the visiting boy one day, and so he postponed his hunting trip until another time. About the time the boy was accustomed to make his appearance, the father hid himself and turned himself into a piece of stick that they used for a poker. The father instructed his son to invite his brother to come in and have something to eat before they should play. As soon as the visiting boy came and called his brother, his brother invited him to come in, but he refused, because he was afraid that the old man might be inside. He looked all around, and when he saw the poker he knew at once that it was the old man, and he went off. The father stayed still all that day, intending to capture the boy. On the next day he again postponed and instructed his boy as before about capturing the visiting boy. About the time for the boy to make his appearance the father hid himself behind the side of the entrance and turned into a piece of straw. When the visiting boy arrived, he called, and his brother invited him in again. He looked around in the grass-lodge, but not seeing anything this time, he entered and ate with his brother. The father had told his boy that when his brother came he should get him to look into his hair for lice; then the boy was to look into the visiting boy's hair, and while he was looking he was to tie his hair so that the father could get a good hold on it. Then he was to call his father. After eating, they both went out to begin their game. They played until the visiting boy won all his brother's arrows.

When they stopped, the boy asked his brother if they might not look into each other's hair for lice. The visiting boy agreed and looked into his brother's hair first, then allowed his brother to look into his hair. While the boy was looking into his hair the visiting boy would ask him what he was doing; and he would say that he was having a hard time to part his hair.

When he got a good hold of the visiting boy's hair he called his father. The visiting boy dragged him a good ways before their father reached them. When the old man got hold, the boy was so strong that he dragged both the father and brother toward the river, but the father begged him to stop. They finally released the visiting boy and he jumped in the water and came out again with his arms full of arrows. They started back toward their home. This boy was named Afterbirth-Boy.

After that, Afterbirth-Boy began to dwell with his father and brother. When their father would go out hunting the boys would go out and shoot birds. When the father was home he forbid his boys to go to four certain places: one on the north, where there lived a woman; on the east, where there was the Thunderbird that had a nest up in a high tree; on the south, where there lived the Double-Faced-Man.

The father made his boys a hoop and commanded them not to roll it toward the west. It was a long time before the boys felt inclined to lengthen their journeys; but after a time, during their father's absence, Afterbirth-Boy asked his brother to go with him to visit the place at the north, where they were forbidden to go. The brother agreed, and they at once started for the place. On their way, they shot a good many birds, which they carried along with them.

When they arrived they saw smoke. The woman who lived there was glad to see the little boys and asked them to her place. They gave her their birds, and went in. The old woman was pleased to get the birds, and said that she always liked to eat birds; then she asked the boys to go to the creek and bring her a pot full of water. She told the boys that she must put the birds in the water and boil them before she could eat them, so the boys went to the creek and brought the pot full of water.

When they returned with the pot of water the woman hung it over the fire, snatched the boys and threw them in, instead of the birds. The water began to boil and Afterbirth-Boy got on the side where the water was bubbling. He told his brother to make a quick leap, while he did the same. They at once made a quick jump and poured the boiling water upon the old woman and scalded her to death.

When they had done this they started back home. They reached home before their father. On their father's arrival they told him that they had visited the place he had warned them against, and what dangers they had met while visiting the woman, who was the Little-Spider-Woman.

The next day they started to visit the Thunderbird. When they came to the place they saw a high tree where was the nest of the Thunderbird. Afterbirth-Boy spoke to his brother, saying, "Well, brother, take my arrows and I will climb the tree and see what sort of looking young ones these Thunderbirds have." He began to climb the tree and all at once he heard thundering and saw a streak of lightning, which struck him and took off his left leg. Afterbirth-Boy told his brother to take care of his leg while he kept on climbing. When he began to climb higher the bird came again. The thundering began and the streak of lightning came down and took off his left arm. Still he kept on, for he was anxious to get to the nest. He was near the nest when his right leg was taken off, so that he had just one arm left when he reached the nest.

Now the Thunderbirds did not bother him any more. He picked up one of the young ones and asked whose child he was. The young one replied that he was the child of the Weather-Followed-by-hard-Winds, and that sometimes he appeared in thunder and lightning. When the boy heard this he threw the bird down, saying that he was not the right kind of a child, and he asked his brother to destroy him.

Afterbirth-Boy took another bird and asked him the same question. The young one replied that he was the child of Clear-Weather-with Sun-rising-slowly. He put the bird back in the nest, telling him that he was a pretty good child.

He took up another, asking whose child he was, and the bird said that he was the child of Cold-Weather-following-Wind-and-Snow. Afterbirth-Boy dropped him down and said that he was the child of a bad being, and he ordered his brother to put the bird to death.

He then picked up the last one and asked whose child he was. The young one answered that he was the child of Foggy-Day-followed-by-small-Showers. This child Afterbirth-Boy put back into the nest, telling him that he was the right kind of a child.

He then started to climb down with his one arm. When he reached the ground his brother put his right leg on him, and he jumped around to see if it was on all right. His brother then put his left arm on him, and he swung it around to see if it was all right. Then the brother put on the left leg, and he felt just as good as he did when he first began to climb the tree.

The two boys returned home before their father came back from the chase. When their father came back, Afterbirth-Boy began to tell what they had done while visiting the Thunderbirds and how his limbs were taken off, and the boys laughed to think how Afterbirth-Boy looked with one arm and both legs gone. The father began to think that his boy must have great powers, and he did not say much more to the boys about not going to dangerous places.

Some time after, the boys went out again and came to the place where their mother was put after her death. They saw a stone in the shape of a human being, and they both lay on the stone. When they started to get up they found that they were stuck to it, and they both made an effort and got up with the stone. They took it home for their father to use for sharpening his stone knife. When they reached home the old man told them to take the stone back where they had found it. He told them that that was their mother, for she had turned into stone after her death. They took the stone back where they had found it.

Some time after, Afterbirth-Boy and his brother started out to the forbidden place where Double-Faced-Man lived who had killed their mother. These creatures were living in a cave. When the boys arrived at the cave they both went in and the Double-Faced-Man's children came forward and scratched the boys. If there was any blood on their fingers they would put them in their mouths. Afterbirth-Boy took the string of his bow and slew the young ones. He caught the old Double-Faced-Man and tied his bow-string around his neck so that he could take him home to his father to have in the place of a dog. When they returned home the old man walked out, and seeing the old Double-Faced-Man, told his boys to take him off and kill him, and they obeyed.

Every day they played, the same as they had always done before, going out shooting birds and playing with their hoop. Afterbirth-Boy said to his brother, "Let us roll the hoop toward the west and see what will happen."

They rolled it toward the west, and it began going faster and faster. The boys kept running after it until they were going so fast that they could not stop. They kept going faster, until they ran into the water where the hoop rolled. When they went into the water they fell in the mouth of a water-monster called, "Kidiarkat," and he swallowed them.

It appeared to them as though they were in a tepee, for the ribs of the monster reminded them of tepee poles. They wondered how they could get out. Afterbirth-Boy took his bow-string with his right hand, drew it through his left hand to stretch it, then swung it round and round. When he first swung it, the monster moved. He swung the string the second time, and the monster began to move more. He swung it the third time, and the monster began to move still more. At this time Afterbirth-Boy told his brother that their father was getting uneasy about them and that they must get out of the place at once, for they had been away from home a long time. Again he swung his bow-string, and the monster jumped so high that he fell on the dry land. He opened his mouth and the boys quickly stepped out and started for home.

When the boys arrived at the lodge they found no one. Their father had gone off somewhere, but they could not find out where he had gone. Afterbirth-Boy looked all around for his trail, but could find no trace of him. At last he grew weary and decided to wait until night to look for their father.

When darkness came, Afterbirth-Boy again looked around to see where his father had gone. He finally found his trail and he followed it with his eye until he found the place where his father had stopped.

He called his brother and told him to bring his arrows and to shoot up right straight overhead. The boy brought his arrows and shot one up into the sky. Then he waited for a while and finally saw a drop of blood come down. It was the blood of their father.

When the boys did not return, he gave up all hope of ever seeing them again, and so he went up into the sky and became a star. They knew that this blood belonged to their father, and in this way they found out where he had gone. They at once shot up two arrows and then caught hold of them and went up in the sky with the arrows. Now the two brothers stand by their father in the sky.

NON-NATIVE CULTURES

Ethnic

AFRICAN AMERICAN

---

GRANDFATHER'S ESCAPE TO FREE HAVEN

Tradition Bearer: Mary Thomas

Source: Hubert, Levi C. Interview of Mary Thomas. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers' Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC. <http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/wpaintro/wpahome.html> (October 12, 2005).

Date: 1938

Original Source: New Jersey

National Origin: African American

---

In this segment of her family saga, Mary Thomas provides precise details dating back a century at the time of the telling. While various historical elements may be lost or altered during the process of oral transmission, narratives such as the following fill in crucial gaps in our historical knowledge.

---

As a child I remember hearing the old folks telling me of their terrible life which they led on the large farms of Maryland before the Emancipation.

My grandfather had been a chieftain's son [in Africa], and he remembered the time when he was a little fellow, playing with some other boys on the banks of the sea, and a band of men swooped down on them and carried them from their own people. My grandfather remembered the heavy gold bracelets and armlets of his rank and those slave-stealers took the gold ornaments from him.

My grandfather had a black mark about an inch wide running down his forehead to the tip of his nose. This mark was the sign of his tribe. He was tall and very much respected by the other slaves and the slave-holder down in Maryland. He married, raised a family and grew old. Even in his old age he was a valuable piece of property, but soon he became useless in the fields and his master agreed to give him his freedom.

But the old man, my grandfather, asked for the freedom of his youngest son, who was my father. This the master refused to do at first but at the earnest insistence of my grandfather, he agreed ... upon condition that the son, who was a great swimmer and diver, should dive into the Chesapeake Bay where a ship had sunk years before with a load of iron. If the son were successful in bringing to the surface this load of iron, then my grandfather and his son, my father, should go free.

My grandfather tied a rope around my father's waist and for over three months the two of them brought the pieces of iron to the shore for old master. They say that sometimes the son stayed under the water so long that my grandfather had to drag him up from the wreck and lay him on the ground and work over him like you'd work over a drowned person.

Day after day the two worked hard and finally there wasn't no more iron down there and they told the master so and he came down to the wreck and found out they was telling the truth ... but still he wouldn't let them go. The old man, yes, but not the son who was handy around the place, an' everything.

But my grandfather kept asking for his son and the old master said that if the two of them brought up the sound timbers of the old wreck, then he would keep his word and let them go. So my grandfather and his son, my father, between them brought up all the sound timber that was part of the wreck. It was cheaper to get this wood and iron from the wreck than to buy it, so the master wanted it.

The wreck had stayed down on the bottom of the Chesapeake Bay for over twenty years but nobody except my father had been able to dive that deep. So you see it was just like trading off some of the young slaves on the farm to be able to get the iron and wood.

When the two finished that chore, and it was a mighty big chore, too, they went up to the big house and asked for their freedom.

The master sent them back to their cabin and said that since the old man wasn't no good any more, and it just cost the master money to feed him, he could go whenever he pleased, but the son was going to stay on the farm and if he tried any foolishness, he would sell him south. Selling a slave south meant that the slave would be taken to one of the slave trader's jails and put on the block and be sold to some plantation way down south. And no worsen thing could happen. Many a family was separated like that, mothers from their children, fathers from their children, wives from their husbands, and the old folks say that a pretty girl fetched (brought) a higher price and didn't have to work in the fields. These young girls, with no one to protect them, were used by their masters and bore children for them. These white masters were the ones who didn't respect our women and all the mixing up today in the south is the result of this power the law gave over our women.

Well, when the old man and his son knew it was no use, that their master did not intend to let them go, they began to plot an escape. They knew of the Underground Railroad, they knew that if they could get to Baltimore, they would meet friends who would see them to Philadelphia and there the Friends (Quakers) would either let them settle there or send them to other people who would get them safely over the border into Canada.

Well, one night my grandfather and my father made up their minds and my grandfather could read and write so he wrote hisself out a pass. Any slave who went off the farm had to have a pass signed by the master or he would be picked up by a sheriff and put in jail and be whipped.

So my grandfather had this pass and got safely through to Baltimore. There they hid for several days and waited for an agent of the Underground Railroad.

One night they were dressed in some calico homespun like a woman and rode to Philadelphia on the back seat of a wagon loaded with fish. In Philadelphia, the town was being searched by slave-holders looking for runaway slaves, so the people where they were supposed to stay in Philadelphia hurried them across the river about ten miles.

My grandfather and my father stayed across the Delaware from Philadelphia, helping a farmer harvest his crops, and they built a cabin and soon other escaped slaves from among their former neighbors slipped into New Jersey where they were.

Finally there was almost a hundred escaped slaves in the one spot and because they were free at last and this place was a haven just like the Bible talked about, they decided to stay there and so they got together and called the place Free Haven.

My uncle says that he reached there by hiding in the woods all day and walking at night. So many people came from Maryland that they changed the name of the little village to Snow Hill, which was the name of the town nearest the farms from which all or most of the people had run away from. The post office people made them change the name again and now it is Lawnside, but I was born there sixty-four years ago and I still think of it as Free Haven.

HOW COME BRER BEAR SLEEP IN THE WINTER

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Backus, Emma M. "Animal Tales from North Carolina." Journal of American Folklore 11 (1898): 287–288.

Date: 1898

Original Source: North Carolina

National Origin: African American

---

The exploits of a trickster or culture hero are commonly celebrated in the animal fables and the origin tales that arise not only in African American repertoires, but also in the traditional narratives of many of the world's cultures. Despite the role played by rabbit, in most cases the master trickster, this narrative deviates from that model and instead celebrates cooperation and community action. In concert, the group bands together to manage the behavior of a larger and more powerful tyrant. As such, the tale offers alternative strategies to trickster's wily deviance or the outlaw hero's bold frontal attacks for dealing with a common threat. The threat is simply diminished, however, rather than eliminated because of individual frailties—"a meddlesomeness to move them rocks." Thus the narrative simultaneously praises cooperation and warns against potential pitfalls to community action. Neither message would have been lost on the African American audiences for whom the tale originally was performed.

---

When the animals was young, Brer Bar, he never sleep in the winter, no more'n the rest. The way it was in them days, old man Bar was flying roun' more same than the other creeters, and he was the meanest one in the lot, and 'cause he the biggest he get in he mind that he king of the country, and the way he put on the animals was scand'lous, that it was.

Well, the animals was all crossways wid the old man a long time, but they bound to step up when he tell 'em, cause you kin see in these times old Brer Bar ain't a powerful man, but he just on the onery side, was what he was in the old times. 'Pears like all the animals is getting mighty low down these here times, 'cept old Sis Coon, and sure you born she get more heady every year.

Well, they talk it over 'twixt themselves many and many a day, how they going to take down Mr. Bar. They know he mighty fond of sleepin' in the dark, and one day Brer Rabbit 'low that they stop the old man up when he sleep in a dark tree; he take a mighty long nap, and they get a little comfort.

So they all watch out, and when the old man sleep that night in a hollow tree they all turn in and tote rocks and brush, and stop up the hole.

And sure 'nough, when morning come, Brer Bar don't know it, and he just sleep on; when he wake up he see it all dark, and he say day ain't break yet, and he turn over and go sleep, and there the old man sleep just that a way till the leaves turn out the trees, and I 'spect the old man been sleeping there to this day; but the animals, they all hold the old man dead for sure, and they just feel a meddlesomness to move them rocks; and when they let the light in, old Brer Bar he just crack he eye and stretch hissself and come out, and when he see the spring done come he say, the old man did, that he done had a mighty comfortable winter, and from that time every year, when the cold come, old Brer Bar go to sleep.

HOW COME MR. BUZZARD TO HAVE A BALD HEAD

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Backus, Emma M. "Animal Tales from North Carolina." Journal of American Folklore 11 (1898): 288–289.

Date: 1898

Original Source: North Carolina

National Origin: African American

---

Ann Nancy, the protagonist of this tale, is a North American incarnation of the familiar West African and Caribbean trickster Anansi given an alternative name that is more comprehensible in nineteenth-century North Carolina. With this name change, comes a change in gender from male to female, which is in keeping with the name shift. Like her Caribbean and Continental African counterpart, however, Ann Nancy is an anthropomorphic spider with a penchant for pranks and an insatiable appetite. As with other trickster figures, Ann Nancy lives by her wits—usually at the expense of her neighbors, employing subterfuge to gain her selfish ends and to extricate herself from the trouble to which her schemes inevitably lead. Ann Nancy, as noted by the narrator, is particularly mean-spirited and unforgiving. Her “sour” mind and temper not only fulfills her desire for revenge, but alters forever buzzard’s appearance and appetite.

---

One day, in the old times, Ann Nancy started out to find a good place for to build her house; she walk on till she find a break in a nice damp rock, and she set down to rest, and take ‘servation of the points to throw her threads.

Presently, she hear a great floppin’ of wings, and the old Mr. Buzzard come flying down and light on the rock, with a big piece of meat in he mouth. Ann Nancy, she scroon in the rock and look out, and she hear Mr. Buzzard say, “Good safe, good safe, come down, come down,” and sure ‘nough, when he say it three times, a safe come down, and Mr. Buzzard, he open the door and put in he meat and say, “Good safe, good safe, go up, go up,” and it go up aright, and Mr. Buzzard fly away.

Then Ann Nancy, she set and study ‘bout it, ‘cause she done see the safe was full of all the good things she ever hear of, and it come across her mind to call it and see if it come down; so she say, like Mr. Buzzard, “Good safe, good safe, come down, come down,” and sure ‘nough, when she say it three times, down it come, and she open the door and step in, and she say, “Good safe, good safe, go up, go up,” and up she go, and she eat her fill, and have a fine time.

Directly she hear a voice say, “Good safe, good safe, come down, come down,” and the safe start down, and Ann Nancy, she so scared, she don’t know what to do, but she say soft and quickly, “Good safe, go up,” and it stop, and go up a little, but Mr. Buzzard say, “Good safe, come down, come down,” and down it start, and poor Ann Nancy whisper quick, “Go up, good safe, go up,” and it go back. And so they go for a long time, only Mr. Buzzard can’t hear Ann Nancy, ‘cause she whisper soft to the safe, and he cock he eye in ‘stonishment to see the old safe bob up and down, like it gone ‘stracted [distracted, crazy].

So they keep on, “Good safe, good safe, come down.”

“Good safe, good safe, go up,” till poor Ann Nancy’s brain get ‘fused [confused], and she make a slip and say, “Good safe, come down,” and down it come.

Mr. Buzzard, he open the do’, and there he find Ann Nancy, and he say, “Oh you poor mis’rable creeter,” and he just ‘bout to eat her up, when poor Ann Nancy, she begged so hard, and compliment his fine presence, and compare how he sail in the clouds while she ‘bliged [is obliged] to crawl in the dirt, till he that proudful and set up he feel mighty pardoning spirit, and he let her go.

But Ann Nancy ain’t got no gratitude in her mind; she feel she looked down on by all the creeters, and it sour her mind and temper. She ain’t gwine forget anybody what cross her path, no, that she don’t, and while she spin her house she just study constant how she gwine get the best of every creeter.

She knew Mr. Buzzard’s weak point am he stomach, and one day she make it out dat she make a dining, and ‘vite Mr. Buzzard and Miss Buzzard and the children. Ann Nancy, she know how to set out a-dining for sure, and when they all done got sot down to the table, and she mighty busy passing the hot coffee to Mr. Buzzard and the little Buzzards, she have a powerful big pot of scalding water ready, and she slop it all over poor old Mr. Buzzard’s head, and the poor old man go bald-headed from that day. And he don’t forget it on Ann Nancy, ‘cause you see she de onliest creeter on the top side the earth what Mr. Buzzard don’t eat.

PLAYING GODFATHER

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Fauset, Arthur Huff. “Negro Folk Tales from the South. (Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana).” Journal of American Folklore 40 (1927): 237–238.

Date: 1927

Original Source: Mississippi

National Origin: African American

---

This tale type, “Theft of Butter (Honey) by Playing Godfather” (AT 15), is distributed widely throughout the South and the Caribbean.

Typically, the trickster, rabbit, shifts the blame for the theft onto one of the dupes. The slow-witted possum appears as rabbit's victim elsewhere in "How Brer Fox Dream He Eat Brer Possum" (page 177).

---

Rabbit an' Fox make a proposition once to start farmin'. Dey bought lot of groceries for the year, butter, coffee, everything you could mention. So the butter was the most important. So they all went out in the field to work.

Rabbit studied a plan to leave Possum an' Fox in the field an' make believe that some one was callin' him away. So he let on some one callin' him, "Yoo-hoo-yoo-hoo-yoo-hoo!"

So Fox an' Possum said, "What's that?"

Rabbit said, "Aw, I can't work here for bein' bothered by these people. I'm goin' this time but I won't go no more." So Rabbit goes to the house an' sees the bucket o' butter. He ate some of the butter. Pretty soon he come back.

Pretty soon somebody callin', "Yoo-hoo-yoo-hoo-yoo-hoo!"

So they all said, "What's the matter, Brother Rabbit?"

Rabbit said, "Aw, they want me to christen another baby. These people are botherin' me too much. I'm not goin'."

So they all said, "You better go ahead. Hurry on." So he went an' got another stomach full o' butter. So when he come back they said, "Well, what did you name the baby?"

He said, "Just begun." So pretty soon they heard somebody callin', "Yoo-hoo-yoo-hoo-yoo-hoo."

So they all said, "What's the matter, Brother Rabbit?"

Rabbit said, "Aw, those people just won't let me alone. They want me to christen another child. I'm not goin' this time, tho, deed I'm not."

But they all said, "You better go ahead." So he went an' got some more butter. So he come back an' they asked him what name the baby had. He said, "Pretty Well On The Way." He comes back an' works a little while an' somebody yells, "Yoo-hoo-yoo-hoo-yoo-hoo."

They all said, "What's that?"

So Rabbit said, "Aw, it's them same people want me to come christen another baby. I'm not goin', I tell you."

They said, "You better go ahead." So he went off an' eat some more butter. When he come back they asked him what the baby's name was.

He said, "About Quarter Gone." So he went on workin' some more an' somebody yelled, "Yoo-hoo-yoo-hoo-yoo-hoo."

They said, "What's that?"

He said, "It's those same people again. I tell you I just won't go an' christen any more of their children."

But they said, "You better go on ahead." So he went off an' eat some more of the butter. When he returned they asked him what was the child's name.

He said, "Half Gone." So he went on back to work. This time somebody yelled, "Yoo-hoo-yoo-hoo-yoo-hoo."

So they all said, "What's that?"

He said, "Doggone the luck, you know that's rotten. A fellow can't work here for those people callin' on you to christen their children."

So they all said, "You better go on ahead." He went on an' eat some more of the butter.

When he come back he said, "Well I christened another child."

They said, "What you name him?"

He said, "Quarter Left." So he come on back, work awhile, an' pretty soon somebody cry, "Heh-h-h-h-h-h-h-h." Rabbit say, "Doggone the luck. I ain't goin' this time. By God they want to run a fellow to death."

So they all said, "You better go on ahead." So he went this time an' eat all the butter.

When he come back they said, "What happened this time?"

He said, "I had another child to christen."

They said, "What did you name him?"

He said, "All Gone." Well about the middle o' June they was gonna open the keg of butter. The crops were half grown. So when they got there the butter was all gone.

They all said, "Who stole the butter?" Rabbit didn't know; Fox didn't know; Possum didn't know.

So Rabbit say, "I tell you, Possum, he been layin' around dat house all time. I believe he must o' done it." So he said, "bet's build a big fire. Then all three of us will lay aroun' the fire, an' whoever et the butter the grease will come out o' his stomach." So they made a big fire an' everybody went to sleep but Rabbit. So he peeped. Everybody sound asleep. So Rabbit say, "All right, I got him now." So he took his tail an' greased it an' his belly right good. He oiled Fox up too. So pretty soon Fox woke up.

He spied Possum an' cried, "Dah, dah, I tot' you, Possum done it!" Possum woke up an' looked aroun'. He say, "Hey there, Fox, you had some too; look at your belly." Fox made for Rabbit but Rabbit got away. So Fox struck Possum a lick an' Possum went through the blaze of fire. That's why his tail is bare of hair today.

WHEN BRER RABBIT WAS PRESIDIN' ELDER

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Backus, Emma M. "Folk-Tales from Georgia." Journal of American Folklore 13 (1900): 20–21.

Date: 1900

Original Source: Georgia

National Origin: African American

---

In the African American folktale corpus, the stock character of preacher, like rabbit, appears as a figure that creates a façade to exploit gullible members of the community with the power of wit and words. This critique of preacher puts Brer Rabbit in the role of self-appointed presiding elder (in this case, a traveling preacher). At first offended to the point of “churching” (evicting from membership) Brer Rabbit, the congregation demonstrates similar greed by finally taking such a “good-paying member” back into the fold.

---

Now Brer Rabbit he never get to be no sure ‘nough presidin’ elder. Brer Rabbit he always been a meeting going man, but it all along [alongside] of his trifling ways that he never get no higher than a steward in the church. Brer Rabbit he never get to be a preacher, not to say a sure ‘nough presidin’ elder.

But one year Brer Rabbit he get powerful ambitious. He see all his neighbors building fine houses, and Brer Rabbit he say to his-self he going to have a fine house. So Brer Rabbit he study and he study how he going get the money for his house, and one day he say to Miss Rabbit, You bresh up my meeting clothes.

So Miss Rabbit she get out Brer Rabbit’s meeting clothes, and bresh em up, and take a few stitches, and make the buttons fast.

One Saturday Brer Rabbit he put on all his meeting clothes, and his church hat, and take his bible and hymn-book, and cut hisself a fine walking cane, and Brer Rabbit he start off.

Brer Rabbit he take the circuit, and he preach in every church, and Brer Rabbit he say how he be the presiding elder of the district, and how he taking up a collection to build anew parsonage; and being as Brer Rabbit am a powerful preacher when he aim to try hisself, and preach in the spirit, the people they give with a free hand.

Brer Rabbit he know what he doing, Brer Rabbit do, and he ride the circuit just before Christmas, and they tells how nigh ‘bout the lastest one enduring the whole circuit done rob his Christmas for Brer Rabbit’s parsonage.

Well, when they see Brer Rabbit’s fine house going up and hear how Brer Rabbit done used they alls money, well, there was a time, you may be sure, and they church Brer Rabbit; but Brer Rabbit he don’t trouble hisself, he just go on and build his fine house. But bless you, the last shingle ain’t laid before here they come begging Brer Rabbit to come back in the church, ‘cause Brer Rabbit be a good paying member. So Brer Rabbit he go back in the church and he live in his fine house and hold his head powerful high, and what the people done say they done say, but you may be sure they don’ say a word when Brer Rabbit listen.

HOW BRER RABBIT PRACTICE MEDICINE

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Backus, Emma M. "Tales of the Rabbit from Georgia Negroes." Journal of American Folklore 12 (1899): 108–109.

Date: 1899

Original Source: Georgia

National Origin: African American

---

The following tale of Brer Rabbit has at its heart messages concerning why rabbit and perhaps all conmen for that matter can make their way so successfully in society. Poor judgment leads Brer Wolf to take him on as a partner despite his "bad name for a partner." Then, gullibility and avarice set up wolf for the "fool's bargain" rabbit proposes. When Brer Rabbit's ploy is discovered and a jury is being selected to decide the disposition of the money from their venture, Sheriff 'Coon is given the job of finding bigger fools than the plaintiff and defendant to sit on the jury. When 'Coon is successful, the judge, plaintiff, jury, and spectators become so caught up in the courtroom drama that rabbit is able to win the day by keeping his wits about him and putting his ethics on hold. Compare this tale to "Playing Godfather" (page 164).

---

Ole Brer Rabbit had a bad name for a partner, but one time he get Mr. Wolf to work a crop on shares with him, and they have a 'greement writ out on paper, how in the harvest they goin' to divide half and half. Mr. Rabbit know Ole Mr. Wolf mighty good hand in the field, and sure to make a good crop. But when Ole Brer Rabbit set in to work, he get mighty tired, and the corn rows, they look so mighty long, and he 'gin to lag behind and work he brain.

Presen'ly he jump to the work, and make he hoe cut the air, and soon catch up with Mr. Wolf, and he open the subject of the education in medicine, and he tell how he am a reg'lar doctor, and got his 'plomy in a frame to home, but he say he don't know how all the patients goin' get on now he turn over the farming, and Ole Mr. Wolf ask how much money he get for he doctoring, and when he hear so much, he tell Mr. Rabbit to go when he have a call, and put by the money, and in the fall put in the crop money and then divide. So that night Mr. Rabbit, he instruct his children how they got for to run and call him frequent, and how they got to tell Mr. Wolf they wants the doctor.

And sure 'nough, Mr. Rabbit ain't more'n in the front row next day, when here come little Rab all out of breath and say, "Some-body send in great 'stress for the doctor." Mr. Rabbit make out like he can't go and leave Mr. Wolf to do all the work, but Mr. Wolf studying 'bout that big fee Brer Rabbit goin' turn in to the company, and he tell him, "Go 'long, he can get on with the work."

So Mr. Rabbit clips off in great haste, and he just go down on the edge of the woods, and what you 'spect he do? Well, sir, he just stretch hisself out in the shade of a swamp maple and take a nap, while Ole Mr. Wolf was working in the corn rows in the hot sun. When Mr. Rabbit sleep he nap out, he set up and rub he eyes, then he mosey off down by the spring for a drink, then he come running and puffing like he been running a mile, and tell Mr. Wolf what a mighty sick patient he got, and make out like he that wore out he can't more'n move the hoe.

Well, when they come back from dinner, Mr. Rabbit, he strike and make he hoe fly, but directly here come little Rab for the doctor, and Ole Mr. Rabbit, he take hisself off for 'nother nap, and matters goes on just dis here way all summer. Ole Mr. Wolf, he have to do all the work, but he comfort himself with the reflection, that he have half them big fees what Brer Rabbit turning in to the company money.

Well, when the fodder done pulled, and all the crop done sold, and they go for to count the money, Mr. Wolf ask Brer Rabbit where the doctor's fees what he goin' turn in. Brer Rabbit say they all such slow pay, he can't collect it. Then they fell out, and Mr. Wolf that mad, he say he goin' eat Brer Rabbit right there, and make an end of he tricks. But Mr. Rabbit beg that they take the trouble up to the court-house to Judge Bar.

So they mosey off to the court-house, and the old judge say it were a jury case, and he send Sheriff Coon out to fetch the jurymans, and he say, "Don' you fetch no mans here, 'cepter they be more fool than the parties in the case." But Sheriff Coon 'low he don' know where he goin' find any man what's more fool than Brer Wolf's in dis here case, but he take out down the county, and by and by he seed a man rolling a wheelbarrow what ain't got nothing in it round the house and round the house, and he ask him what he doing that for? And he say, he trying to wheel some sunshine in the house. Sheriff Coon say, "You is the man I wants to come with me and sot on the jury."

They go 'long, and directly they see a man pulling a long rope up a tall tree that stand 'longside a house; they ask him what he goin' do? He say he goin' to haul a bull up on top of the house to eat the moss off the roof, and Sheriff Coon say, "I'll be bound you is my man for the jury, and you must go long with we all to the court." So they take their way back to the court-house, then they have a great time taking evidence and argufying.

Ole Brer Wolf, he set up there, and 'sider every word of the evidence, but Ole Brer Rabbit he lean back and shut he eye, and work he brain on he own account. He settin' right close to the door; when the lawyer done get everybody worked up so they take no noticement, Brer Rabbit just slip softly out the back door, and he creep 'round the side of the cabin back to where Ole Judge Bar set wid de bag of money on the floor, and what you 'spect? When they all talking,

Ole Brer Rabbit just slide he hand in the crack, and softly slip out the bag of money, and take out home, and leave the case in the care of the court. That just like Ole man Rabbit.

BRER RABBIT'S COOL AIR SWING

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Backus, Emma M. "Tales of the Rabbit from Georgia Negroes." Journal of American Folklore 12 (1899): 22–24.

Date: 1900

Original Source: Georgia

National Origin: African American

---

In this narrative, Brer Rabbit plays the trickster to its fullest extent. He deceives the powerful Brer Wolf with an outright lie. To get Brer Squirrel to release him from the knots tied by Mr. Man, he uses the African American rhetorical device of indirect direction. In describing his situation to Brer Squirrel, Brer Rabbit is not bound and seeking a means of escape. He is enjoying a "cool air swing." The deception is so convincing that squirrel begs to take his place, unties the knots, and takes rabbit's place. The motif of trickster as shape-shifter is evident in Mr. Man's observation that "I done hear of many and many your fine tricks, but I never done hear you turn yourself into a squirrel before."

---

Mr. Man he have a fine garden. Brer Rabbit he visit Mr. Man's garden every day and destroy the everything in it, 'til Mr. Man plum wore out with old Brer Rabbit. Mr. Man he set a trap for old Brer Rabbit down 'longside the big road.

One day when Mr. Man going down to the crossroads, he look in his trap, and sure 'nough, there old Brer Rabbit. Mr. Man he say, "Oh, so old man, here you is. Now I'll have you for my dinner."

Mr. Man he take a cord from his pocket, and tie Brer Rabbit high on a limb of a sweet gum tree, and he leave Brer Rabbit swinging there 'til he come back from the crossroads, when he aim to fetch Brer Rabbit home and cook him for his dinner.

Brer Rabbit he swing this away in the wind and that away in the wind, and he swing this away in the wind and that away in the wind, and he think he time done come. Poor old Brer Rabbit don't know where he's at.

Presently here come Brer Wolf loping down the big road. When Brer Wolf see old Brer Rabbit swinging this away and that away in the wind, Brer Wolf he stop short and he say, "God a' mighty, man! what you doing up there? "Brer Rabbit he say, "This just my cool air swing. I just taking a swing this morning."

But Brer Rabbit he just know Brer Wolf going to make way with him. Brer Rabbit he just turn it over in his mind which way he going to get to. The wind it swing poor Brer Rabbit way out this-away and way out that away. While Brer Rabbit swinging, he work his brain, too.

Brer Wolf he say, "Brer Rabbit, I got you fast; now I going eat you up." Brer Rabbit he say, "Brer Wolf, open your mouth and shut your eyes, and I'll jump plum in your mouth." So Brer Wolf turn his head up and shut his eyes. Brer Rabbit he feel in his pocket and take out some pepper, and Brer Rabbit he throw it plum down Brer Wolf's throat. Brer Wolf he nigh 'bout 'stracted with the misery. He cough and he roll in the dirt, and he get up and he strike out for home, coughing to beat all. And Brer Rabbit he swing this away and that away in the wind.

Presently here come Brer Squirrel. When Brer Squirrel he see the wind swing Brer Rabbit way out this away and way out that away, Brer Squirrel he that 'stonished, he stop short. Brer Squirrel he say, "Fore the Lord, Brer Rabbit, what you done done to yourself this here time?"

Brer Rabbit he say, "This here is my cool air swing, Brer Squirrel. I taking a fine swing this morning." And the wind it swing Brer Rabbit way out this away and way back that away.

Brer Rabbit he fold his hands, and look mighty restful and happy, like he settin' back fanning hisself on his front porch.

Brer Squirrel he say, "Please sir, Brer Rabbit, let me try your swing one time."

Brer Rabbit he say, "Certainly, Brer Squirrel, you do me proud," and Brer Rabbit he make like he make haste to turn hisself loose. Presently Brer Rabbit he say, "Come up here, Brer Squirrel, and give me a hand with this knot," and Brer Squirrel he make haste to go up and turn Brer Rabbit loose, and Brer Rabbit he make Brer Squirrel fast to the cord. The wind it swing Brer Squirrel way out this away and way out that away, and Brer Squirrel he think it fine.

Brer Rabbit he say, "I go down to the spring to get a fresh drink. You can swing 'til I come back."

Brer Squirrel he say, "Take your time, Brer Rabbit, take your time." Brer Rabbit he take his time, and scratch out for home fast as he can go, and he ain't caring how long Brer Squirrel swing.

Brer Squirrel he swing this away and he swing that away, and he think it fine.

Presently here come Mr. Man. When Mr. Man he see Brer Squirrel, he plum 'stonished. He say, "Oh, so old man, I done hear of many and many your fine tricks, but I never done hear you turn yourself into a squirrel before. Powerful kind of you, Brer Rabbit, to give me fine squirrel dinner." Mr. Man he take Brer Squirrel home and cook him for dinner.

WHY THE PEOPLE TOTE BRER RABBIT FOOT IN THEIR POCKET

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Backus, Emma M. "Tales of the Rabbit from Georgia Negroes." Journal of American Folklore 12 (1899): 109–111.

Date: 1900

Original Source: Georgia

National Origin: African American

---

Rabbit as trickster figure in African American folklore at times acts in the community interest. In this tale, Brer Rabbit uses more than his wits to overcome Ole Mammy Witch Wise. He turns to his knowledge of the occult practices of the shape-shifting witches who slip off their skins to cause nocturnal mischief, thus revealing himself to be "wise" as well. In other tales, Brer Rabbit betrays skills at conjuration and hoodoo. This knowledge allows him to save the community from Mammy Wise Witch and marks his foot as a powerful protective amulet.

---

Why do people tote Brer Rabbit's foot in their pocket? Well, sir, that's cause Ole Brer Rabbit done killed the last witch what ever live. They tells how they done hang some of 'em, and burn some, till they get mighty scarce, but there was one ole witch what was risin' on five hundred years old, and 'cause she keep clear of all the folks what try to catch her, they done name her Ole Mammy Witch Wise.

Well, she do carry on to beat all them times, she 'witch all the folks, and she 'witch all the animals, and when they go to get their meal out some of the gardens, she just witch them animals, and they can't get in to save 'em, and they all nigh 'bout starved out, that they was, and they all hold a big consultation and talk over what they gwine do.

They was a mighty ornery lookin' set, just nigh 'bout skin an' bone, but when Ole Brer Rabbit come in, they observe how he mighty plump and in fine order, and they ask him, however he so mighty prosp'rous and they all in such powerful trouble. And then he allow, Brer Rabbit did, dat Ole Mammy Witch Wise can't 'witch him, and he go in the gardens more same as ever.

Why, Ole Mammy Wise don't 'low the animals get in the garden, she just want the pick of 'em herself, cause she don't have no garden that year; but when she set her mind on some Major Brayton's peas, she just put the pot on the fire, an' when the water bile smart, she just talk in the pot and say, "Bile peas, bile peas," and there they come, sure 'nough, for dinner; but you see if the animals done been troubling them peas, and there ain't no peas on the vine, then she call 'em in the pot.

So she just keep the creeters out till they nigh 'bout broke down, and they ask Brer Rabbit, can't he help 'em? Brer Rabbit scratch he head, but he don't say nothin', 'cause I tell you, when Ole Brer Rabbit tell what he gwine do, then you just well know that just what he ain' gwine do, 'case he's a man what don't tell what he mind set on.

So he don't make no promise, but he study constant how he gwine kill Ole Mammy Witch Wise. He know all 'bout how the old woman slip her skin every night, and all the folks done try all the plans to keep her out till the rooster crow in the morning, 'cause every witch, what's out the skin when the roosters crow, can't never get in the skin no mo'; but they never get the best of the Ole Witch Wise, and she rising five hundred years old. Brer Rabbit he go off hisself, and set in the sun on the sand bed and rum'nate.

And you may be sure, when you see the old man set all to hisself on the sand bed, he mind just working. Well, sir, that night, he go in the garden and take a good turn of peppers, and tote them up to Ole Mammy Witch Wise house, and just he 'spect, there he find her skin in the porch, just where she slip it off to go on her tricks, and what you 'spect he do? Well, sir, he just mash them peppers to a mush, and rub 'em all inside the Ole Witch Wise skin, and then he set hisself under the porch for to watch.

Just 'fore crowing time, sure 'nough, there come the ole woman, sailing along in a hurry, 'cause she know she ain't got long, but when she go for to put on her skin, it certainly do bite her, and she say, "Skinnie, skinnie, don't you know me, skinnie?" But it bite more same than before, and while she fooling with it, sure 'nough the rooster done crow, and the ole woman just fall over in a fit. And in the morning Brer Rabbit notify the animals, and they gravel a place and burn her. And the people, they find out how Brer Rabbit get the best of the Mammy Witch Wise, and then they tell the white folks, and that why nigh 'bout all the rich white folks totes a rabbit foot in their pocket, 'cause it keeps off all the bad luck, and it do that, sure's yo' born.

MR. DEER'S MY RIDING HORSE

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Johnston, Mrs. William Preston. "Two Negro Folktales." Journal of American Folklore 9 (1896): 195–196.

Date: 1896

Original Source: Louisiana

National Origin: African American

---

The following tale of rabbit's feigning illness to humiliate a gullible romantic rival enjoys wide distribution throughout the South. In some versions, fox or another animal rather than deer becomes rabbit's steed and, thus, the butt of his joke. In fact, the plot is labeled as "Rabbit Rides Fox A-Courting" in AT 72. The tale is not exclusive to African American communities. Extensive borrowing occurs between the various European-descended and Native American ethnic groups inhabiting the region. In all versions, however, rabbit exploits a personality trait, such as deer's kind heart, to defeat a romantic rival and, in the process, humiliates him.

---

Well, once upon a time, when Mr. Rabbit was young and frisky, he went a courting Miss Fox, who lived way far back in the thick woods. Mr. Fox an' his family was very skeery, an' they very seldom come outer the wood 'cept for a little walk in the clearin' near the big house, sometimes when the moon shine bright; so they did n' know many people 'sides Mr. Rabbit and Mr. Deer.

Mr. Deer he had his eyes set on Miss Fox, too. But he didn't suspicion Mr. Rabbit was a lookin' that way, but kept' on being jus' as friendly with Mr. Rabbit as he ever been.

One day Mr. Rabbit call on Miss Fox, and wile they was talkin', Miss Fox she tells him what a fine gentle-man she thinks Mr. Deer is. Mr. Rabbit jes threw back his head and he laugh and he laugh.

"What you laughing 'bout?" Miss Fox says; and Mr. Rabbit he jes laugh on an' won't tell her, an' Miss Fox she jes kept' on pestering Mr. Rabbit to tell her what he's laughing 'bout, an' at las' Mr. Rabbit stop laughing an' say, "Miss Fox, you bear me witness I didn't want to tell you, but you jes made me. Miss Fox, you call Mr. Deer a fine gentleman; Miss Fox, Mr. Deer is my riding horse!"

Miss Fox she nearly fell over in a fainting' fit, and she say she don't believe it, and she will not till Mr. Rabbit give her the proof.

An' Mr. Rabbit he says, "Will you believe it if you sees me riding pass you' door?" and Miss Fox says she will, and she won't have nothing' to do with Mr. Deer if the story is true. Now, Mr. Rabbit is been fixing up a plan for some time to git Mr. Deer outer his way; so he says good evening' to Miss Fox, and clips it off to Mr. Deer's house, and Mr. Rabbit he so friendly with Mr. Deer he don't suspect' nothing'. Presently Mr. Rabbit jes fall over double in his chair and groan and moan, and Mr. Deer he says, "What's the matter, Mr. Rabbit, is you sick?" But Mr. Rabbit he jes groan; then Mr. Rabbit fall off the cheer and roll on the floor, and Mr. Deer says, "What ails you, Mr. Rabbit, is you sick?" And Mr. Rabbit he jes groans out, "Oh, Mr. Deer, I'm dying; take me home, take me home."

An' Mr. Deer he's mighty kindhearted, and he says, "Get up on my back, and I'll tote you home"; but Mr. Rabbit says, "Oh, Mr. Deer, I'm so sick, I can't set on your back 'less you put a saddle on." So Mr. Deer put on a saddle.

Mr. Rabbit says, "can't steady myself 'less you put my feets in the stirrups." So he put his feets in the stirrups.

"Oh, Mr. Deer, I can't hold on 'less you put on a bridle." So he put on a bridle.

"Oh, Mr. Deer, I don't feel all right 'less I had a whip in my hand." So Mr. Deer puts the whip in his hand.

"Now I'm ready, Mr. Deer," says Mr. Rabbit, "but go mighty easy, for I'm likely to die any minute. Please take the shortcut through the wood, Mr. Deer, so I kin get home soon."

So Mr. Deer took the short cut, an' forgot that it took him pass Miss Fox's house. Jes as he 'membered it, an' was 'bout to turn back, Mr. Rabbit, who had slipped a pair of spurs on unbeknownst to him, stuck 'em into his sides, and at the same time laid the whip on so that po' Mr. Deer was crazy with the pain, and ran as fas' as his legs could carry him right by where Miss Fox was standin' on the gallery, and Mr. Rabbit a standin' up in his stirrups and hollerin', "Didn't I tell you Mr. Deer was my riding horse!"

But after a while Miss Fox she found out 'bout Mr. Rabbit's trick on Mr. Deer, and she wouldn't have nothing' more to do with him.

WHEN BRER RABBIT SAW BRER DOG'S MOUTH SO BRER DOG CAN WHISTLE

Tradition Bearer: Unknown

Source: Backus, Emma M., and Ethel Hatton Leitner. "Negro Tales from Georgia." Journal of American Folklore 25 (1912): 125–126.

Date: 1912

Original Source: Georgia

National Origin: African American

---

The behavior of Brer Rabbit in the following tale is more representative of his usual nature in the African American tradition than was his altruism in "Why the People Tote a Rabbit Foot in Their Pocket." Brer Rabbit, despite "know[ing] in his own mind Brer Dog ain' going to whistle" saws Brer Dog's mouth anyway. As in many of his escapades, trickster's motivations are simply to stir up trouble. Typical as well is the fact that both Brer Rabbit and the butt of his trick, Brer Dog, suffer injuries that mark them and set up their social relationship from that day forward.

---

In the ole times, when Brer Dog a-roaming through the woods, he come up with Brer Rabbit, Brer Dog do. Brer Rabbit he set on the sand just a-whistling, and a-picking of the banjo.

Now, in them times Brer Rabbit was a master-hand with the banjo. These here hard times 'pears like Brer Rabbit done forget how to whistle, and you don' hear him pick the banjo no more; but in the ole times Brer Rabbit he whistle and frolic, and frolic and whistle, from morning til night.

Well, Brer Dog he mighty envious of Brer Rabbit, 'cause Brer Dog he can't whistle, and he can't sing, Brer Dog can't. Brer Dog he think he give anything in reason if he could whistle like Brer Rabbit, so Brer Dog he beg Brer Rabbit to learn hisself to whistle.

Now, Brer Dog he called the most reliable man in the county; and he have some standing, Brer Dog do; and he have right smart of sense, Brer Dog have; but bless you, Sir, Brer Dog he can't conjure 'longside that Ole Brer Rabbit, that he can't.

Well, when Brer Dog beg Brer Rabbit will he learn hisself to whistle, Brer Rabbit he say, "Brer Dog, your mouth ain't shape for whistling." Brer Rabbit he say, "Name of goodness, Brer Dog, how come you studying 'bout whistling with that mouth? Now, Brer Dog, you just watch my mouth and try yourself"; and Brer Rabbit he just corner up his mouth and whistle to beat all.

Brer Dog he try his best to corner up his mouth like Brer Rabbit; but he can't do it, Brer Dog can't. But the more Brer Dog watch Brer Rabbit whistle, the more envious Brer Dog get to whistle hisself.

Now, Brer Dog he know how Brer Rabbit are a doctor; so Brer Dog he ask Brer Rabbit can he fix his mouth so he can whistle?

Brer Rabbit, he 'low as how he might fix Brer Dog's mouth so he can whistle just tolerable, but Brer Rabbit he 'low how he have to saw the corners of Brer Dog's mouth right smart; and he 'low, Brer Rabbit do, how "it be mighty worrisome for Brer Dog."

Now, Brer Dog, he that envious to whistle like Brer Rabbit, Brer Dog he 'clare he let Brer Rabbit saw his mouth.

Brer Rabbit he say as how he don' want deceive Brer Dog; and he say, Brer Rabbit do, as how he ain' gwine promise to make Brer Dog whistle more same as hisself, but he say he "make Brer Dog whistle tolerable."

So Brer Rabbit he get his saw, and he saw a slit in the corners Brer Dog's mouth. It nateraly just nigh 'bout kill Ole Brer Dog; but Brer Dog he are a thorough-going man, and what Brer Dog say he going to do, he going to do, he sure is.

So Brer Dog he just hold hisself together, and let Brer Rabbit saw his mouth.

Now, Brer Rabbit he know in his own mind Brer Dog ain' going to whistle sure 'nough, but Brer Rabbit he don' know just what Brer Dog going to say; so when Brer Rabbit get through a-sawing of Brer Dog's mouth, Brer Rabbit he say, "Now try if you can whistle!" Brer Dog he open his mouth, and he try to whistle; and he say, "Bow, wow, wow!" Brer Dog do say that for a fact.

Well, when Brer Rabbit hear Brer Dog whistle that there way, Brer Rabbit he that scared he just turn and fly for home; but Brer Dog he that mad, when he hears hisself whistle that there way, he say he going to finish Ole Brer Rabbit: so Brer Dog he put out after Brer Rabbit just a-hollering, “Bow wow, bow wow, bow wow!”

Now, in them times, Brer Rabbit he have a long bushy tail. Brer Rabbit he mighty proud of his tail in the ole times.

Well, Brer Rabbit he do his best, and he just burn the wind through the woods; but Brer Dog he just going on the jump, “Bow wow, bow wow!”

Presently Brer Dog he see Brer Rabbit, and he think he got him; and Brer Dog he open his mouth and jump for Brer Rabbit, and Brer Dog he just bite Brer Rabbit’s fine tail plum off.

That how come Brer Rabbit have such little no-count tail these here times; and Brer Dog he that mad with ole Brer Rabbit ‘cause he saw his mouth, when he run Brer Rabbit through the woods, he still holler, “Bow wow, bow wow!” and you take noticement how, when Brer Rabbit hear Brer Dog say that, Brer Rabbit he just pick up his foots and fly, ‘cause Brer Rabbit done remember how he done saw Brer Dog’s mouth.

HOW BRER FOX DREAM HE EAT BRER POSSUM

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Backus, Emma M., and Ethel Hatton Leitner. “Negro Tales from Georgia.” Journal of American Folklore 25 (1912): 132–133.

Date: 1912

Original Source: Georgia

National Origin: African American

---

This narrative pairs two traditional adversaries, Brer Fox (the clever) and Brer Rabbit (the tricky), in an uneasy alliance. While the tale does deal with the origins of Brer Possum’s hairless tail, the major focus is on the fragile nature of the social bonds between members of the community. Brer Rabbit, as usual, is ruled by his appetites, and Brer Fox is betrayed by a “fatal” flaw. Given the number of loopholes in the social contract, vigilance must be the order of the day. Trust may be betrayed by self-interest, and even the power of the law is no match for the guile of the trickster.

---

In the old times Brer ‘Possum he have a long, wide, bushy tail like Brer Fox. Well, one day Brer Rabbit and Brer Fox get a mighty honein’ to set er tooth in some fresh meat, and they both start off for to find some, and directly they find Brer ‘Possum up a black gum tree. Now, in them times Brer Rabbit he can climb well as any other of the creatures, 'case he has sharp claws like a cat; and he don't set down to nobody on climbing, Brer Rabbit don't. So when they find Brer 'Possum way up in the top of the gum tree, Brer Rabbit he jest climb up after Brer 'Possum, Brer Rabbit do; and jest before he reach him, Brer 'Possum he wind his tail on the limb, an' hang wid he head down, an' swing hisself out.

Brer Rabbit he standing on the limb; an' he reach out, and he grab Brer 'Possum's tail nigh the stump, Brer Rabbit do; and Brer 'Possum he swing hisself out, and try to reach another limb with he hand; and every time Brer 'Possum swing out, Brer Rabbit's hand slip a little on Brer 'Possum's tail; and next time Brer 'Possum swing and reach out, Brer Rabbit he hand slip a little more, til Brer Rabbit he done skin the whole of Brer 'Possum's tail; an' Brer 'Possum fall to the ground, where Brer Fox done wait for him, and Brer Fox done caught him and kill him; but since that day Brer 'Possum he never have no hair on his tail. Then Brer Rabbit he come down, Brer Rabbit did, and they study how's der bestest and soonest way to cook Brer 'Possum, 'cause dey both jes a-droolin' for some fresh meat.

Brer Fox he say "he take Brer 'Possum home and cook him," and he invite Brer Rabbit to come and dine with him. Brer Rabbit agrees to that, so Brer Fox he takes Brer 'Possum home and he fly round to beat all, Brer Fox do; and he gets some nice fat bacon and yams, and he just cooks dat 'Possum up fine and brown.

Then Brer Fox he get mighty tired, and he say, "I 'clare, I plum too tired out to eat. I don't know if I better eat that 'Possum now, and go to sleep and dream about him, or whether I better go to sleep and dream about him first, and then wake up and eat him"; and he lay down on the bed to study a minute, and first thing Brer Fox knowed he fast asleep.

Directly here come Brer Rabbit, he knock on the door, but he ain't get no answer; but he smell dat 'Possum, and the bacon and the yams, and the sage, and he most 'stracted [distracted] to set he tooth in it. He crack the door softly, and he find Brer Fox fast asleep on the bed, an' the nice dinner all smoking hot on the table.

Brer Rabbit he just draw up and set to, Brer Rabbit do. He eat one hind-leg; and it so fine, he say to hisself he bound to try a fore-leg, and then Brer Rabbit 'low [allows] he bound to try the other hind-leg.

Well, sir, dat old man Rabbit he set there and eat til the lastest mouthful of that 'Possum done gone. Then he just turn to wonderin', Brer Rabbit did, what Brer Fox gwine to say when he done wake up and find the bestest bits of that 'Possum gone.

Brer Rabbit he find hisself in a right delicate situation, and was disturbed, Brer Rabbit was; but he say to hisself he gwine fool Brer Fox; and Brer Rabbit he take all the bones, and he put them on the floor in a row round Brer Fox's head; and he take the marrow-grease, and he rub it softly on the whiskers round

Brer Fox's mouth; then he go out softly and close the door, and put he eye to the key-hole.

Directly Brer Fox he yawn and stretch hisself and wake up; and course his mind turn to that 'Possum, and he rise up; and shorely he most powerful astonished when he see the dish empty, and the bones all 'bout hisself on the floor.

Directly here come Brer Rabbit's knock. Brer Fox say, "Come in!" and Brer Rabbit say, "Brer Fox, I come for my share of that 'Possum." Brer Fox say, "Fore de Lord, Brer Rabbit, where that 'Possum gone?" and he fling he hand at the bones on the floor.

Brer Rabbit he snap he eye, like he most mighty got a way with [upset]; and he say, "Brer Fox, I heard the creatures tell heap a powerful hard tales on yourself, but I 'clare, I never think you treat a friend dis here way."

Then Brer Fox he swear and kiss the book [swear on the Bible] he ain't set a tooth in that 'Possum. Then Brer Rabbit he look most mighty puzzled; and at last he say, "Brer Fox, I tell you what you done done, you just eat the lastest mouthful of that 'Possum in your sleep." Brer Fox he rare and charge, and swear he ain't "even got the taste of 'Possum in he mouth."

Then Brer Rabbit he take Brer Fox to the glass, and make Brer Fox look at hisself; and he say, Brer Rabbit did, "Brer Fox, how come all that fresh marrow-grease on your whiskers?" and Brer Fox he look mighty set down on; and he say, "Well, all I 'low dat the most unsatisfying 'Possum I ever set a tooth in."

TROUBLE (RABBIT LOSES HIS TAIL)

Tradition Bearer: Ella Anderson

Source: Bacon, A. M., and E. C. Parsons. "Folk-Lore from Elizabeth City County, Virginia." Journal of American Folklore 35 (1922): 272.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Virginia

National Origin: African American

---

The plot of this tale apparently arises from Brer Turkey's taking offense at Brer Rabbit's pointing out turkey's red eyes. Turning the tables on the trickster, turkey lures rabbit into trouble by a play on words.

---

The turkey and the rabbit were once going through an old field, and the rabbit asked the turkey what made his eyes so red. Brer Turkey told him it was trouble. Then Brer Rabbit asked him what trouble was.

Brer Turkey said, "Come with me into the field, and I will show you trouble." Brer Turkey made believe he was after water, but he was only setting the field a-fire in different places.

By and by Brer Rabbit heard the fire begin to roar. “Brer Turkey! Brer Turkey!” he cried, “how are you going to get out of this field?”

Brer Turkey said he was going to fly out.

“Take me with you, Brer Turkey!” said the rabbit.

But Brer Turkey said he could hardly get himself out.

Brer Rabbit ran through the fire, and that is how he lost his tail. The fire caught it and burned it off.

And Brer Rabbit has never had a tail since.

WHEN BRER RABBIT HELP BRER TERRAPIN

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Backus, Emma M., and Ethel Hatton Leitner. “Negro Tales from Georgia.” Journal of American Folklore 25 (1912): 128–130.

Date: 1912

Original Source: Georgia

National Origin: African American

---

Brer Rabbit, in this tale, relies both on his wits and on his reputation as a conjurer, a practitioner of hoodoo (traditional African-descended magical techniques used to influence events and persons or cure disease). This talent appears from time to time in the traditional narratives, and Brer Rabbit may be portrayed as a genuine hoodoo doctor or may simply take on this persona to carry out his schemes. Relying on his powers to terrorize his neighbors, Brer Wolf attempts to enlist rabbit’s aid in his plan to destroy Brer Terrapin. Instead, Brer Rabbit uses his deceptive abilities to put the fear of conjuration into wolf. The power of the left eye to enact supernatural work is an authentic touch added by the narrator.

---

In the old days Brer Wolf he have a mighty grudge against Brer Terrapin, Brer Wolf do; and one day Brer Wolf come up with old Brer Terrapin in the woods; and he say, Brer Wolf do, how he just going to make a end of Old Brer Terrapin.

But Brer Terrapin he just draw in his foots and shut the door; and he draw in his arms and shut the door; and then if the old man don’t bodaciously draw in his head and shut the door right in Brer Wolf’s face.

That make ole Brer Wolf mighty angry, sure it naturally do; but he bound he ain’t going to be outdone that way, and he study ‘bout how he going smash Brer Terrapin’s house in; but there aim’ no rock there, and he feared to leave the ole man, 'cause he know directly he leave him the ole chap going open the doors of his house and tote hisself off.

Well, while Brer Wolf study 'bout it, here come Brer Rabbit; but he make like he don't see Brer Wolf, 'case they ain't the bestest of friends in them days, Brer Wolf and Brer Rabbit ain't, no, that they ain't.

But Brer Wolf he call out, he do, "O Brer Rabbit, Brer Rabbit, come here!"

So Brer Rabbit he draw up, and he see Old Brer Terrapin's house with the doors all shut; and he say, "Morning, Brer Terrapin!" but Brer Terrapin never crack his door; so Brer Wolf say, he do, "Brer Rabbit, you stay here and watch the ole man, while I go and fetch a rock to smash his house!" and Brer Wolf he take hisself off.

Directly Brer Wolf gone, ole Brer Terrapin he open his door and peek out. Now, Brer Rabbit and Brer Terrapin was the best friends in the ole time; and Brer Rabbit, he say, he do, "Now, Brer Terrapin, Brer Wolf done gone for to tote a rock to smash your house"; and Brer Terrapin say he going move on.

Then Brer Rabbit know if Brer Wolf come back and find he let Brer Terrapin make off with his house, Brer Wolf going fault hisself; and Brer Wolf are a strong man, and he are a bad man; and poor old Brer Rabbit he take his hindermost hand and he scratch his head, and clip off right smart. Brer Rabbit was a pert man them days.

Directly he come up with old Sis Cow, and he say, "Howdy, Sis Cow? Is you got a tick you could lend out to your friends?" and he take a tick and tote it back, and put it on the rock just where Brer Terrapin was.

Presently here come Brer Wolf back, totin' a big rock; and he see Brer Rabbit just tearing his hair and fanning his hands, and crying, "Oh, dear! oh, dear! I'se feared of my power, I'se feared of my power!" but Brer Wolf he say, "Where old man Terrapin gone with his house? I done told you to watch." But Brer Rabbit he only cry the more, and he say, "That what I done tell you, don't you see what my power done done? There all what left of poor ole Brer Terrapin right there." And Brer Rabbit he look that sorrowful-like, he near 'bout broke down, and he point to the cow-tick.

But Brer Wolf he done live on the plantation with Brer Rabbit many a day; and Brer Wolf he say, "Quit your fooling, ole man. You done turn Brer Terrapin loose, and I just going to use this here rock to smash your head." Then Brer Rabbit he make haste to make out to Brer Wolf how that little chap surely are all what's left of poor old Brer Terrapin.

And Brer Rabbit he make out how the power are in his left eye to make a big man perish away; and Brer Rabbit he 'low how he just happen to strike his left eye on his old friend Brer Terrapin, and directly he get smaller and smaller, 'til that all there be left of the poor old man. When Brer Rabbit say that, he turn and cut his left eye sharp at Brer Wolf, Brer Rabbit do.

Brer Wolf he just look once on the little tick, and he say, "Don' look at me, Brer Rabbit! Don' look at me!" and Brer Wolf he strike out, and he just burn the wind for the woods.

Then Brer Rabbit he clip it off down the road 'til he come up with old Brer Terrapin; and they strike a fire, and make a good pot of coffee, and talk it over.

THE WATCHER TRICKED

Tradition Bearer: Josephine Johnson

Source: Bacon, A. M., and E. C. Parsons. "Folk-Lore from Elizabeth City County, Virginia." Journal of American Folklore 35 (1922): 262–264.

Date: ca. 1900

Original Source: Virginia

National Origin: African American

---

After being deceived by rabbit's flattery, buzzard turns trickster by playing on fox's greed in this African American variant of "The Watcher Blinded" (AT 73).

---

Once there was a fox and a buzzard who were good friends. They used to go hunting together. One day they took their guns and went a-hunting. They came to a tree where there was a holler in the tree. Ol' fox decided there was somethin' up the holler, a rabbit or somethin'.

So he got some dry wood and made a fire in the holler, and smoked it. He smoked and smoked it, and nothin' came down. But he was sure there was somethin' up there. So he tol' the turkey-buzzard to stay and watch the holler, and see that nothin' came down, while he went back home to get an axe to cut the tree down. The buzzard promised that he'd do so. The fox went home to get an axe, and the buzzard set down by the tree to watch the holler.

While the fox had been talkin' to the buzzard, the rabbit had been thinkin' of some way to come down the holler. So after de fox left, Rabbit said to de buzzard, "Mr. Buzzard, they tell me you have silver eyes and a gold bill."

An' the buzzard said, "Well, so I have."

The rabbit said, "Look up yonder an' let me see them!"

An' the buzzard was very glad to show his gold bill and silver eyes. So he poked his head in the holler and looked up at the rabbit. The rabbit raked up a handful of trash and threw in his eyes. The buzzard went off to get some water to wash his eyes; and while he was gone, the rabbit came down.

The buzzard came back and sat down by de holler and waited for the fox. Fox came and cut down the tree, and didn' see the rabbit run or anything. So he ask, "Mr. Buzzard, where is dat rabbit?"

And de buzzard said, "He was up dere de las' time I see him."

So de fox decided to split de holler open. He split it, and still didn' see any rabbit; an' he ask again, "Mr. Buzzard, where is de rabbit?"

Buzzard said, "He was up dere de las' time I saw him." Den de fox got angry wid de buzzard, and ran at him with his axe to kill him. And de buzzard ran and ran so fast, dat he split his dress wide open, and he took de two sides of his dress and commence to fly, used dem for wings. So you see de buzzard's been flyin' ever since.

Buzzard was angry wid de fox, and wanted to get even with him: so one day he came flyin' over de fox, singin',

Way down yonder, whey I come from,
 Dey t'row away meat,
 Dey t'row away bread.
 Everyt'ing good dey t'row away.

And de fox say, "What's that, Mr. Buzzard? Sing dat again."
 And de buzzard sang it:

Way down yonder, whey I come from,
 Dey t'row away meat,
 Dey t'row away bread.
 Everyt'ing good dey t'row away.

Fox asked de buzzard, "Mr. Buzzard, could you take me down there?"

Buzzard say, "Yes, jump up on my back."

Fox got on de buzzard back. Buzzard went flyin' 'round. He went way up in de air. When he'd gotten high enough to kill the fox, he turned from one side to the other. Every time he turned, de fox would run to de other side, and de buzzard saw he couldn' turn him off in dat way. So he turned over upside down, and Fox fell to de ground and was killed.

'COON IN THE BOX

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Fauset, Arthur Huff. "Negro Folk Tales from the South. (Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana)." Journal of American Folklore 40 (1927): 265–266.

Date: 1925

Original Source: Mississippi

National Origin: African American

---

In this classic example of the John and Master cycle, Jack uses his repertoire of eavesdropping, wit, and even sham fortune-telling to advance and maintain his position with Master. When at last he believes his subterfuge has been found out, he significantly saves the day by his use of a racist and derogatory term for African American. Thus, from weakness and apparent denigration yet another advantage emerges. The tale is commonly found as an episode of “Dr. Know-All” (AT 1641). The specific motif upon which this tale is built is “What Is in the Dish: Poor Crab” (Motif N688); in the tale from which the motif was originally drawn, the sham fortune-teller’s surname is “Crab.”

---

White man had a slave; his name was Jack. This slave let on he know everything. Wasn’t a thing he didn’t let on he knew. Every night this man would talk to his wife. He’d say, “Y’know Jack, he’s a smart slave, smartest slave I ever knew.” One night he was talkin’ to his wife, and Jack he was eavesdroppin’. Man says, “Y’know, wife, the slaves are about done in de bottoms, I think I’ll send em down to de new lands.”

So nex’ day he goes to Jack an’ says, “Oh, Jack.”

Jack says, “Yassir, master.”

“What’s on fo’ t’day.”

Jack says, “Well de slaves done pretty good in de bottoms, t’morrer y’ goin’ send us to de new lands.”

So de master said to his wife, “Y’know, dat’s a smart slave. I asked him today what I was gonna do, an’ he tol’ me jus’ what I tol’ you las’ night. Said slaves done so good in de bottoms gonna send ‘em to de new lands.”

So nex’ mornin’ Master said to Jack, “Say, Jack, hitch up fifteen or sixteen wagons, I’m gonna send ‘em to de grocery.”

So Jack said, “Yassir, master, I know ‘xactly what you want.”

So de man said to his wife, “You know dat slave’s a fortune teller.” So dey goes to town, an’ in town de master meets another plantation owner. So dis man had a barrel an’ dere was a coon in dat barrel.

So Jack’s master said, “Say, I bet you I kin tell you ‘xactly what’s in dat barrel.”

De other man says, “Whut you bet?”

So de master says, “Le’s bet my plantation ‘gainst yours.”

So de other plantation owner says, “All right, my plantation ‘gainst yours. Now whut’s in de barrel?”

So de master says to Jack, “Come here, Jack.”

Jack says, “Whut you want, master?”

Master says, “Y’got t’ tell me whut’s in dis man’s barrel?”

Jack says, “I got t’ tell you whut’s in dis here barrel?”

De master says, “Yes, or you’re a dead man.”

So Jack commenced scratchin’ his head. He says. “Off it right now, cause he’s wool gatherin’.”

So he couldn’t guess whut was in de barrel. He says to his master, “Send to town an’ git me twelve deck o’ cards.” Dey got him de cards. He tore open a deck. He wanted to whisper. He tear open another deck. He wanted to whisper.

Den he says, “Aha, master, git me another twelve decks.” So he wanted to whisper. He tore open one deck after de other.

Den he say, “Well, oh, sen’ git me twelve mo’.” So he looked through eleven decks, den he fell back against a tree an said, “Well, oh master,” an’ he shook his head, “y’ caught de coon [derogatory term for African American] at las’.”

De master won de bet an’ he said to de other plantation owner, “I tol’ you he could do it, I tol’ you he could do it.”

Ol’ Jack he ups an’ says, “I could ha’ tell you when I fust cooked up here, but I only wanted to have some fun. I know dat was a raccoon in dat barrel.”

YOUR HORSE STAYS OUTSIDE

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Fauset, Arthur Huff. “Negro Folk Tales from the South. (Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana).” Journal of American Folklore 40 (1927): 274–275.

Date: 1925

Original Source: Mississippi

National Origin: African American

---

This protest tale comments on the social conditions begun under the plantation system and continuing into the post–War Between the States Jim Crow era by projecting racism into the afterlife. As the plot of the tale runs, even the staunch abolitionist Horace Greeley (1811–1872), who in his time had been founding editor of the New York Tribune, congressman, and U.S. presidential candidate, could not desegregate heaven. Choosing to disguise Brother Abraham Jasper as Greeley’s horse offers additional commentary on the status of African Americans as perceived by the narrator.

---

Ol’ Brother Abraham Jasper he died. Well, he went to heaven as they say. When he got there they wouldn’t admit him. Old Salt [Saint] Peter wouldn’t let him in.

Ol’ Abraham said, “Well, things ain’t here like I thought they was. I’m goin’ back.” So he met Ol’ Brother Horace Greeley goin’ to the same place he comin’ from.

Greeley said to him, “Well, hello Brother Jasper, where you been?”

Brother Jasper said, “I just been to heaven.”

“Well, what you comin’ back for?”

Brother Jasper said, “Well, ol’ Brother Salt Peter wouldn’t let me in.”

Brother Horace Greeley said, “Well now, that’s too bad. Now I’m gonna work a plan to git you in. Well now, you just let me get on your back an’ when I get there I’ll let on you’re my horse an’ we’ll both get inside the gates.”

So Brother Horace Greeley rode on Brother Jasper's back. When they got to the gates of [Heaven] Salt Peter said, "Whoa there, who's there?"
"Brother Horace Greeley."
Ol' Salt Peter said, "Is you ridin' or walkin'?"
Brother Horace Greeley said, "Ridin' on a horse."
Ol' Salt Peter said, "Hitch your horse outside an' come on in."

HOW COME PIGS CAN SEE THE WIND

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Backus, Emma M. "Animal Tales from North Carolina." Journal of American Folklore 11 (1898): 285–286.

Date: 1898

Original Source: North Carolina

National Origin: African American

---

This tale is reminiscent of the well-known "Three Little Pigs and the Big Bad Wolf," which was popular in the late nineteenth century. In fact, Joel Chandler Harris included a wolf and pig tale in his Nights with Uncle Remus published in 1883. Unlike either Chandler's version or the tales of the Big Bad Wolf familiar to American children, this becomes an origin narrative. Brer Wolf calls on Satan for help, and the encounter ends badly for Sis Pig. The collector provided no contextual information nor commentary along with the folktale, but several features of the tale invite further speculation. Among them are the following: Brer Wolf claims that he is "the master," leading to Sis Pig's surrendering four of her five offspring. This reflects the bondsperson's plight. The action casts light on the master's character as well. Brer Wolf enlists Satan's aid only to find himself frightened out of his wits by his pact. Similar pacts throughout African American tradition elicit similar consequences. Perhaps the best known is the legend of blues musician Robert Johnson (1911–1938) selling his soul to the devil at the crossroads.

---

Did you done hear how come that old Sis Pig can see the wind? Well, to be sure, ain't you never hear that? Well, don't you take noticement, many and many a time, how unrestful, and 'stracted like, the pigs is, when the wind blows, and how they squeal, and run this here way and that here way, like they's 'stracted? Well, sir, all dat gwine on is along of the fact that they can see the wind.

One time the old sow, she have five little pigs—four black and one white one.

Now old Brer Wolf, he have a mighty good mouth for pig meat, and he go every night and walk round and round Miss Pig's house, but Sis Pig, she have the door lock fast.

One night, he dress up just like he was a man, and he put a tall hat on he head, and shoes on he foots; he take a sack of corn, and he walk hard, and make a mighty fuss on the brick walk, right up to the door, and he knock loud on the door in a great haste, and Sis Pig, she say, "Who there?" and Brer Wolf say up, loud and powerful, Brer Wolf did, "Quit your fooling, old woman, I is the master, come for to put my mark on the new pigs; turn 'em loose here lively."

And old Sis Pig, she mighty skeered, but she feared not to turn 'em out; so she crack the door, and turn out the four black pigs, but the little white pig, he am her eyeballs, the little white pig was, and when he turn come, she just shut the door and hold it fast.

And Brer Wolf, he put down the corn, and just pick up the four little pigs and tote 'em off home; but when they done gone, he mouth hone for the little pig, but Sis Pig, she keep him mighty close. One night Brer Wolf was wandering up and down the woods, and he meet up with old Satan, and he ask Brer Wolf, old Satan did, can he help him, and Brer Wolf he just tell him what on he mind, and old Satan told him to lead on to Miss Pig's house, and he help him out.

So Brer Wolf he lead on, and directly there Sis Pig's house, and old Satan, he 'gin to puff and blow, and puff and blow, till Brer Wolf he that skeered, Brer Wolf is, that he hair fairly stand on end; and Miss Pig she done hear the mighty wind, and the house a-cracking, and they hear her inside down on her knees, just calling on God A'mighty for mercy; but old Satan, he puff and blow, and puff and blow, and the house crack and tremble, and he say, old Satan did, "You hear this here mighty wind, Sis Pig, but if you look this here way you can see it."

And Sis Pig, she that skeered, she crack the door and look out, and there she see old Satan's breath, like red smoke, blowing on the house, and from that day the pigs can see the wind, and it look red, the wind look red, sir. How we know that? I tell you how we know that, sir: if anybody miss a pig and take the milk, then they can see the wind, and they done tell it was red.

HOW BRER RABBIT BRING DUST OUT OF THE ROCK

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Backus, Emma M. "Tales of the Rabbit from Georgia Negroes." Journal of American Folklore 12 (1899): 113–114.

Date: 1899

Original Source: Georgia

National Origin: African American

Brer Rabbit's trick of seeming to strike dust from a rock despite the failure of other stronger competitors is reminiscent of the European and European American Jack Tales in which Jack uses similar slight of hand to appear to squeeze milk from a stone (AT 1060). By doing so, Jack intimidates giants and ogres. Unlike the folktale Jack, however, Brer Rabbit uses his deception to exploit yet another in a long line of reluctant fathers-in-law, shrugging off his ploy as just one of "his court-ing tricks." As Brer Rabbit once again in his guise of trickster subverts a competition designed to take him out of the running, the social mes-sage is again the triumph of brain over brawn and the flexibility of rules.

---

Mr. Fox, he have a mighty handsome daughter, and all the chaps was flying round her to beat all. Brer Coon, Brer Wolf, Brer Rabbit, and Brer Possum was a courting of her constant, and they all ask Brer Fox for he daughter.

Now the gal, she favor Brer Rabbit in her mind, but she don't let on who her favor is, but just snap her eyes on 'em all.

Now Ole Brer Rabbit, he ain't so mighty handsome, and he ain't no proud-ful man, that's sure, but somehow it 'pears like he do have a mighty taking way with the gals.

Well, when they all done ask Ole Man Fox for his daughter, he ask the gal, do she want Brer Wolf? And she toss her head and 'low Brer Wolf too bodaciously self-ish; she say, "Brer Wolf's wife never get a bite of chicken breast while she live."

Then the Ole man, he ask her how she like Brer Possum? and she just giggle and 'low "Brer Possum mighty ornery leetle Ole man, and he 'longs to a low family anyhow."

And Ole Man Fox, he 'low, "Dat's so for a fact," and he sound her affec-tions for Brer Coon, but she make out Brer Coon pass all endurance. Then the Ole man he tell her Brer Rabbit done ask for her too, and she make out like she mighty took 'back, and 'low she don't want none of that lot.

Then Ole Brer Fox, he say that the gal was too much for him; but he tell the chaps to bring up the big stone hammer, and they can all try their strength on the big step rock what they use for a horse block, and the one what can pound dust out of the rock shall have the gal.

Then Brer Rabbit, he feel mighty set down on, 'cause he know all the chaps can swing the stone hammer to beat hisself, and he go off sorrowful like and set on the sand bank. He set a while and look east, and then he turn and set a while and look west, but may be you don't know, sir, Brer Rabbit sense never come to hisself 'cepting when he look north. When it just come to hisself what he goin' to do, he jump up and clip it off home, and he hunt up the slippers and he fill them with ashes, and Lord bless your soul, the ole chap know just what them slippers do 'bout the dust out of the rock.

Well, the next morning they was all there soon. Ole Brer Rabbit, the last one, come limping up like he mighty lame, and being so, he the last one on the land, 'cause he have last chance.

Now Brer Wolf, he take the big hammer and he fetch it down hard, and Brer Wolf mighty strong man in them days, but he ain't fetch no dust. Then Brer Coon and Brer Possum, they try, but Ole Man Fox he say, he don't see no dust, and Miss Fox she behind the window curtain and giggle, and Ole Man Fox he curl the lip and he say, "Brer Rabbit, it you turn now." Brer Wolf he look on mighty scornful, and Brer Rabbit have just all he can do to fetch up the big hammer; it so hard he just have to stand on tiptoe in he slippers, and when the hammer come down, he heels come down "Sish," and the dust fly so they can't see the ole chap for the dust.

But Ole Brer Rabbit, he don't count that nothing but just one of his court-ing tricks.

JACK AND THE BEAN-POLE

Tradition Bearer: Mary Smith

Source: Parsons, Elsie Clews. "Tales from Maryland and Pennsylvania." Journal of American Folklore 30 (1917): 212–213.

Date: 1917

Original Source: Maryland

National Origin: African American

---

This ordinary folktale is an African American variant of the well-known European tale "Jack and the Beanstalk" (AT 328). The narrative shows localization and modernization by disguising Jack as a newsboy during one of his visits to the giant's castle, locating the castle on a hill-top rather than in the sky, and substituting a beanpole for a beanstalk. Jack, in this version, is shown to be reclaiming family property rather than stealing from the giant.

---

Jack an' his mother lived together, an' they had planted some beans. And it seemed that one bean had strayed off from the rest, an' it grew up right alongside of the house.

Their house was right below a hill, and Jack had always wondered what was on top of the hill. So one day Jack climbed a bean-pole to get up to the top of the hill. So, when he had got to the top, he saw a palace, an' he went to this place to see who lived there.

So, when he had got there, he found it was a giant's castle, but the giant wasn't at home. But his wife was. Jack was tired and hungry. So he asked the lady to take him in and give him something to eat. So she did so. But she told him not to let her husband catch him there. So, while Jack was eating, the giant came to the door.

She told Jack to hide, an' Jack hid in the chest behind the door. So the giant came in. He said,

Fe, fi, fo, fum,
I smell the blood of an Englishmun.

He said,

Be he alive or be he dead,
Fe, fi, fo, fum!

But his wife told him that he didn't, that it was only some mutton that she was cooking. So the giant sat down to eat his supper; and after he had finished eating, he called to his wife, and told her to bring him the wonder-box, which he was supposed to have taken from Jack's father before Jack's father died. So, while the giant was sitting there looking in the box, he fell asleep.

An' Jack slipped out of the chest behind the door, an' took the wonder-box home to his mother. So it wasn't very long till Jack made up his mind to make another trip back to the castle of the giant. So, when Jack went back this time, he tried to put on like another poor little boy that was half starved. So he begged entrance at the door of the castle from the wife.

And she didn't want to have him in, and she told him about the boy that had took the wonder-box from her husband. So he begged so hard that she left him in, an' she gave him some bread and milk to eat. And again, while Jack was eating, the giant came.

And as he came in the door, he said,

Fe, fi, fo, fum,
I smell the blood of an Englishmun.

He said,

Be he alive or be he dead,
Fe, fi, fo, fum!

And Jack jumped in the salt-cellar.

His wife said, "No, there hasn't been any one here today." She says, "I'm only roastin' some pork for your supper." So, after he ate his supper, the giant sent for his golden hen that lay the golden egg. So his wife went and brought it for him. And while the giant was playing with the egg that the hen had laid, he fell fast asleep.

An' Jack carried off the hen and the egg down the bean-stalk to where his mother lived. But Jack still thought that he wanted to visit the castle again.

So this time, when he went up the bean-stalk to the giant's castle, he was in the appearance of a newsboy selling papers. So, while the wife went to get the money to buy a paper, the giant appeared, and Jack hid in the closet. And the giant repeated again,

Fe, fi, fo, fum,
I smell the blood of an Englishmun.

He said,

Be he alive or be he dead,
Fe, fi, fo, fum!

So the wife said, "No, there hasn't been any one here today." And after the giant had ate his supper, he called for his harp, the only thing that he had left, an' this was a magic harp. So it commenced to play, an' it played so sweetly that the giant fell fast asleep and commenced to snore.

And as the harp stopped playing, Jack came out of the closet, took the harp, and started to the door. But the harp began to play, and it woke the giant up. An' the giant followed Jack out of the door, an' Jack run as fast as he could down the bean-stalk, an' the giant started to follow. But as the giant reached the top, Jack cut down the bean-stalk with an axe; an' as the giant stepped on, he fell down an' broke his neck.

An' Jack and his mother always lived happy afterward with the property of the father which the giant had stolen an' Jack had restored again.

TABLECLOTH, DONKEY, AND CLUB

Tradition Bearer: Helen Seeny

Source: Parsons, Elsie Clews. "Tales from Maryland and Pennsylvania." Journal of American Folklore 30 (1917): 210–212.

Date: 1917

Original Source: Maryland

National Origin: African American

---

This African American variant of "The Table, the Ass, and the Stick" (AT 563) contains the classic motifs of the Old World versions of this ordinary folktale. The final beating at the end is a touch of poetic justice.

---

Once upon a time there lived a woman an' a boy in a house together, Jack an' his mother. An' Jack's father was dead. So Jack's mother planted some barley. An' she told Jack to get the barley. Jack was lazy, an' he didn't want to gather it. So one day she whipped him with a broomstick, an' made him go to gather it.

An' Jack made up his mind then that he would go an' gather the barley. So when he went to gather the barley, the wind had blown it away. There was an oak tree standin' in the field where the barley had been, so Jack picked up a club an' commenced to beat on the tree.

So there came along a little old man while Jack was beatin' on the tree. An' he said to Jack, "Jack, my son, what are you doin'?"

An' he said, "I'm beatin' the wind for blowing my barley away." So the little man reached in his pocket, an' he took out something that looked to be a handkerchief to Jack. An' instead of being a handkerchief, it was a tablecloth.

An' so the old man said, "Spread, tablecloth, spread!" An' so it spread, and there was a lot of all different kinds of food on it. So the old man said to Jack, "Take this home, an' it will pay your mother for the barley."

But instead of going home, Jack went to a halfway house to play, an' he stayed there all night. An' he said to the people when he went to bed, "Do not tell this tablecloth to spread."

But as soon as he was in bed, they told the tablecloth to spread. So in place of Jack's tablecloth they put their own, an' kept Jack's.

So the next mornin' Jack got up overjoyed, an' took the tablecloth an' ran home. So he says to his mother, "Mommer, I have something to pay for all your good barley, even though the wind has blown it away." He says, "just tell this tablecloth to spread." An' they told the tablecloth to spread, an', instead of spreading, it lay still.

So his mother whipped him an' sent him out again. And he went down the field an' beat the same oak tree. And the little old man came along again, an' he said, "Jack, my son, what are you doing today?"

So he says, "Didn't the tablecloth repay your mother for the barley?"

An' Jack said, "No, when I told it to spread, it lay still on the table." So by this time there came a donkey up.

So the little old man he said, "Tell this donkey to shake." An' Jack told the donkey to shake. An' he shook a pack of gold out of one foot, and a pack of silver out of the other. But, instead of going home this night, he went back to the halfway house again; but he cautioned them to be sure not to tell the donkey to shake.

But it wasn't long before he had gone to bed but they went to the stable and told the donkey to shake. And when they found out that he shook a pack of gold out of one foot, an' a pack of silver out of the other, they put their donkey in place of his.

So the next mornin' he got up an' rode the donkey home to his mother; an' he said to her, "Now, this time, mother, I really have got something that will pay you for your barley." He says, "Let's tell this donkey to shake." But the donkey stood still.

So the old lady beat him an' sent him away again. So this time, while he was beatin' on the tree, the little old man came along again. So he says, "Jack, my son, what are you doin' this mornin'?"

Jack says, "I'm still beatin' the wind for blowing my barley away." So this time the little old man gave Jack a club. An' he told Jack whatever he wanted the club to beat, to tell it, "Beat, Club, beat!"

So Jack went to the halfway house again with the club. So he said to de people before he went to bed, "Be sure and don't tell this club to beat." So Jack went up-stairs, but he didn't go to bed this time; an' wasn't long till he heard the old man say, "Beat, Club, beat!" an' the club commenced to beat on the man. And the old man stood it as long as he could, an' the woman told it to beat her. So they couldn't stand it no longer, so they called for Jack.

When Jack came down, he asked them what was the matter. And the man said he had told the club to beat, an' it beat on him. So Jack says, "Give me my donkey an' tablecloth, and I'll stop the club from beatin'." So, to keep from gettin' beat any more, they give Jack his donkey and tablecloth.

So Jack took the donkey an' the tablecloth an' the club, all three, home to his mother. So Jack says, "Mother, I am quite sure this time I have more than enough to pay you for all the barley you have planted." So he says, "Tell this tablecloth to spread." So he says, "Tell this donkey to shake." An' then he says, "Tell this club to beat." An' it beat her.

And he says, "That's the way it felt when you beat me." So, after it beat her a while, he told it to stop. An' after the club had stopped beatin', they lived happy together always after, by the use of the tablecloth, club, an' donkey.

THE BRIDE OF THE EVIL ONE

Tradition Bearer: An African American gardener known as "Old William"

Source: Cooke, Elizabeth Johnston. "English Folk-Tales in America. The Bride of the Evil One." Journal of American Folklore 12 (1899): 126–130.

Date: 1899

Original Source: Louisiana

National Origin: African American

---

This tale of the demon lover who comes to claim the rich, beautiful, and heretofore inaccessible Maritta warns of the dangers of avarice. This narrative plot is distributed cross-culturally. Moreover, the plot crosses generic boundaries; “The Demon Lover” (also “James Harris” and “The House Carpenter”) presents the plot in the form of a British ballad. The motifs of the closing test of the devil’s questions and the Obstacle Flight enjoy a similar popularity. Localization of what is undoubtedly an old tale is seen in Satan’s breakfast of buckwheat cakes and his spending his days in his blacksmith shop overseeing “his hands” at work.

---

In former times there lived, on a great plantation far out in the country, the richest and most beautiful lady in the world. Her name was Maritta, and she was beloved by all who knew her, especially so by her parents, with whom she dwelt.

She was so rich that one could not count her wealth in many days; and her home was a palace, filled with rare things from all quarters of the globe. Rich hangings of damask and tapestry adorned the walls, and massive and wonderfully carved furniture filled the rooms. Instead of gilt, as is usual in splendid mansions, the mirrors and pictures were framed in gold, silver, and even precious stones. Then, the dining-table was a wonder to behold—glittering with costly glass and golden service. The lady Maritta always ate from a jeweled platter with a golden spoon; and her rooms were filled with wondrous vases, containing delicious spices and rare perfumes of many kinds.

Half the brave and daring fine gentlemen of her country had sought her hand in marriage; but her parents always declared that each was not rich enough. So loath were her parents to give her up, that they finally said she should never marry unless she could view her suitor ten thousand miles down the road.

Now, as roads in general are not straight for so great a distance, to say nothing of one’s eyesight, the poor lady was quite in despair, and had almost decided to remain a spinster.

At last the Evil One, seeing the covetousness of this old couple, procured for himself an equipage of great magnificence, and went a-wooing. His coach was made of beaten gold, so ablaze with precious stones that the sun seemed mean in comparison with it. Maritta beheld it thirty thousand miles off, and all the household were called out to view it; for such a wonder had never been seen in that part of the world. But so great was the Evil One’s power for conjuring that he was a very short time in arriving. He drove up to the door with so grand a dash and clatter and style that Maritta thought she had never beheld as princely a personage. When he had alighted most gracefully, uncovering [removing his hat] and bowing to the mother and father, he knelt at the feet of Maritta, kissed her hand, and turning to her astonished parents, asked the hand of their daughter in marriage. So pleased were they all with his appearance that the wedding was hastened that very day. After the marriage compact was completed Maritta bade adieu to her proud parents; and tripping lightly into his coach, they drove away with great effect.

Then they journeyed and journeyed, and every fine house or plantation which they approached, Maritta would exclaim, "Is that your home, my dear?"

"No, darling," he would reply with a knowing smile, "my house is another cut to [different from] that." Still they journeyed: and just as Maritta was beginning to feel very weary they approached a great hill, from which was issuing a cloud of black smoke, and she could perceive an enormous hole in the side of the hill, which appeared like the entrance to a tunnel. The horses were now prancing and chafing at the bits in a most terrifying manner; and Maritta thought she saw flames coming from out their nostrils. just as she was catching her breath to ask the meaning of it all, the coach and party plunged suddenly into the mouth of the yawning crater, and they sank down, down into that place which is called Torment. The poor trembling lady went into a swoon, and knew nothing more until she awoke in the House of Satan. But she did not yet know that it was the Evil One whom she had married, nor that, worse still, he was already a married man when she had made his acquaintance. Neither did she know that the frightful old crone was his other wife. Satan's manner had also undergone a decided change; and he, who had been so charming a lover, was now a blustering, insolent master. Lifting his voice until it shook the house, as when it thunders, he stormed around, beating the old hag, killing her uncanny black cat, and raising a tumult generally. Then, ordering the hag to cook him some buck-wheat cakes for breakfast, he stamped out of the house, towards his blacksmith shop, to see how his hands were doing their work. While the wretched young wife sat in her parlor, looking very mournful and lovely, wiping her eyes and feeling greatly mystified, the old hag was turning her cakes on the griddle and growing more and more jealous of this beautiful new wife who was to take her place. Finally she left the cakes and came and stood by Maritta. "My child," quoth she, "my dear daughter, have you married that man?"

"Yes, dame," replied the pretty Maritta.

"Well, my child," said she, "you have married nothing but the Devil." At this the wretched young wife uttered a scream and would have swooned again, except that the hag grasped her by the arm, and putting a rough horny hand over Maritta's mouth, said in a low and surly voice, near her ear, "Hist! Should he hear you, he will kill us both! Only do my bidding, and keep a quiet tongue, and I will show you how to make your escape."

At this Maritta sat up quite straight, and said in trembling tones, "Good dame, prithee tell me, and I will obey, and when I am free, I will send you five millions of dollars."

But the forlorn hag only shook her head, replying, "Money I ask not, for it is of no use to such as I; but listen well."

Then seating herself on the floor at the feet of Maritta, her black hair hanging in tangles about her sharp ugly face, like so many serpents, she continued in this wise, “He has two roosters who are his spies, and you must give them a bushel of corn to pacify them—but I shall steal the corn for you. He also has two oxen; one is as swift of foot as the wind can blow; the other can only travel half as fast. You will have to choose the last, as the swift one is too well guarded for us to reach him. The slower one is tethered just out-side the door. Come!” she cried to Maritta, who would have held back, “a faint heart will only dwell in Torment.”

At this thought the poor Maritta roused herself, and summoned all her strength. Her hair had now fallen loose and she was all in tears. But she mounted quickly, looking over her shoulder, to see if he was coming even then. “But dame,” cried she, “will he not overtake me, if his ox is so much more fleet of foot than mine?”

“Hold your slippery tongue,” replied the hag, and mark my words. Here is a reticule [a drawstring bag] to hang at your side; this is a brickbat which I put in the bottom, and on that I place a turkey egg and a goose egg. When you feel the hot steam coming near you, drop the brickbat—for he will soon return, and missing you, will start on your chase, mounted on the ox. As he approaches near, you will feel the heat of his breath like hot steam. When you drop the brickbat a wall will spring up from the earth to the sky; and the Devil cannot pass it until he tears down every brick, and throws it out of sight. When you feel the hot steam again, drop the turkey egg, and there will come a river; and when he reaches this river he cannot cross over until his ox drinks all the water. Do the same with the goose egg, and a river will again flow behind you, thus giving you more time in which to reach home. Now off with you, and Devil take you, if you don’t hold on tight and keep up your spirits. But, hark ye, if he catches you, I will poison you when you come back. At this terrible threat the lovely Maritta was so frightened that she forgot to thank the old hag or say good-bye. In the twinkling of an eye the weird-looking creature had raised her mighty arm, and gurgling out a frightful laugh, she lashed the ox with a huge whip.

Away he sped, verily as fleet as the wind, with the beautiful lady clinging on, her arms wound around his neck, and her soft face buried in his shaggy hair. On-ward they floated, above the earth, it seemed to Maritta, over hills and plains, through brake and swamp. Just as the lady began to rejoice at being set free, for it seemed a kind ox, and, after all, it was not so very hard to hold on, as she glided along, she heard a piercing shriek behind her; and suddenly a burning hot steam seemed to envelop her. Thinking of the brickbat, in an instant she snatched it from the reticule—almost breaking the eggs in her haste—and flung it behind her, nearly suffocated with the heat. Then she turned to look and lo! a great dark wall shut the awful sight from her gaze.

Onward, onward they sped, as she urged the ox by kind words, stroking his great neck with her delicate white hands. After they had traversed a great distance, Maritta began to think of home and the loved ones, when her reveries were broken by a gaunt black hand clutching at her hair over the back of the ox; and again she felt the intense heat. Too terrified to put her hand in the reticule, she gave it a shake, and the turkey egg fell to the ground. On the instant water was flowing all about her, cooling the air and quite reviving her. Then a harsh voice fell upon her ear, crying, "Drink, drink, I tell you; mighty hard on you, but you must drink!"

Soon the river was left far behind, and again Maritta aroused herself as she began to notice many familiar landmarks, which told that she was nearing home. After urging the ox on at a great rate for many more miles, she dropped the goose egg, in order to give herself ample time, although as yet she had not again felt the approach of her fiendish husband.

At length the welcome sight of her own broad fields greeted her anxious and weary eyes; and soon her dear home arose upon the horizon. With a few more strides the wonderful ox halted at her own very door, and she fell from his back more dead than alive. For some moments she was unable to rise and embrace her alarmed parents, who had seen her approach.

They had only had time to retire into the house, when Satan rode up to the steps. Throwing himself from the ox, he banged for admittance, in a vastly different manner from that of his first visit. But the father confronted him, and he had to content himself with talking to Maritta over her father's shoulders, while the poor lady was cowering in a corner of the room clinging to her mother. However, the touch of loving parental arms soon reassured her, and she demanded of Satan what he wished further. "I have," replied his Satanic majesty, "three questions to propound to you; and if not properly answered, I shall take you by force again to my realms." Then placing his feet wide apart, with head thrown back, one arm akimbo on his hip, and snapping the fingers of his other hand, he sang in an impudent, swaggering manner:

What is whiter than any snow?
 What is whiter than any snow?
 Who fell in the colley well?

The gentle Maritta lifted her soft eyes, and raising her sweet voice sang in a pure and tender strain:

Heaven is whiter than any snow,
 Heaven is whiter than any snow,
 Who fell in the colley well?

"Yes, ma'am," replied Satan, rather taken aback. "That's right." Then he continued:

What is deeper than any well?
 What is deeper than any well?
 Who fell in the colley well?

Maritta replied in the same strain:

Hell is deeper than any well,
Hell is deeper than any well,
Who fell in the colley well?

Again the Evil One took up his strain:

What is greener than any grass?
What is greener than any grass?
Who fell in the colley well?

Maritta lifted her voice a third time:

Poison is greener than any grass,
Who fell in the colley well?

Greatly confounded at her answers, the Evil One stamped his feet in such a manner that smoke and sparks flew upward, and an odor of sulfur filled the room. Then turning on his heels he cried to the mother that he had left a note under the doorsteps with the Devil's own riddle on it.

A thousand or more acres of green corn grew about the house; and the Devil, pulling it all up by the roots, carried it in his hands, tore the roof off the mansion, and raising a fearful storm, disappeared in it. When the storm had abated, the mountains around about were all leveled to the ground. After the panic caused by his wonderful conjuring had subsided, the mother bethought herself of the note, and when found it read as follows:

Nine little white blocks into a pen,
One little red block rolled over them.

None could guess it save Maritta, who said it meant the teeth and tongue.

TRAPPING A HAG

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: "Beliefs of Southern Negroes Concerning Hags." Journal of American Folklore 7 (1894): 66-67.

Date: 1894

Original Source: Virginia

National Origin: African American

“Hag-craft” refers to a belief in the “night hag,” an individual who can travel in body or spirit to torment a victim at night. The “hag experience” has been established to be a cross-cultural psycho-physiological phenomenon. Folklorist David Hufford describes it as being associated with four common symptoms: (1) awakening, (2) hearing or seeing something come into the room and approach the bed, (3) being pressed on the chest and strangled, and (4) the inability to move or cry out. The hag experience is represented in John Henry Fuseli’s painting “The Nightmare.” The legend below functions as a belief tale.

---

There is another way by which suspicions of hag-craft may be proved or disproved. A neighbor comes to see you whom you suspect. Would you be certain in regard to the matter, give your visitor a seat near the fire, and then, when she is not looking, steal quietly up behind her and stick a fork into the floor under her chair. By this means you have pinned her hag-spirit to the floor, and the old woman cannot or will not withdraw her bodily presence until the fork is withdrawn.

This story told by a young woman of my acquaintance illustrates this method of identifying a hag. She remembers how, when she was a little girl, her mother was greatly troubled by the nightly visitation of one of these tormentors. She finally fixed her suspicion upon a neighbor, and told her children that she believed old Aunt So-and-So was at the bottom of all her troubles. Accordingly the children, with the desire of verifying their mother’s suspicions, took council together and arrived at a conclusion.

The next time old aunty called, she found a nice comfortable chair awaiting her close by the fire, and an urgent invitation to sit down in it. As soon as she became absorbed in conversation, one of the children stole up behind her and stuck a steel fork into the floor under the chair. Aunty had only run in for a few minutes, but she spent the morning. The day moved on, and was near its end, but still aunty sat in the chair by the fire, never offering to stir. She was the hag, and her spirit was pinned down to the floor by that three-tined steel fork.

At last the mother, who had been making signs to the children that they must take that fork out, took them aside and told them that, if the fork was not removed at once, they should get a whipping that they would long remember. Under this threat the child who had stuck the fork into the floor came up again behind the chair and drew it out, and the old aunty rose and politely withdrew, leaving behind her a certainty where before there had been suspicion.

SOL LOCKHEART'S CALL

Tradition Bearer: Sol Lockheart

Source: Steiner, Roland. "Sol Lockheart's Call." Journal of American Folklore 48 (1900): 67–70.

Date: 1900

Original Source: Georgia

National Origin: African American

---

The following personal experience narrative is classified in Protestant religions as "testimony," which is reporting one's religious experience as a means of affirming one's faith or of converting others to belief. In this case, Sol Lockheart, a licensed (as distinct from a fully ordained) minister recounts his call to the Christian ministry, an occupation that he pursued part time while taking care of stock for collector Roland Steiner. His call, during the course of which he is struck blind and receives a vision from Christ, is reminiscent of many elements of the apostle Paul's call to preach while on the road to Damascus (Acts 9:1–9). Lockheart's notion of man's being influenced by both a good and bad conscience suggests the concept of hoodoo (see "When Brer Rabbit Help Brer Terrapin," page 180). However, Sol Lockheart rejects the belief in conjuring and hoodoo, although he is reported in Steiner's gloss of this narrative to be a traditional healer who uses magical-religious techniques for his cures.

---

When a man starts to pray, he has a conscience to tell him when and where; then he has at the same time a conscience to tell him not to go and pray. The first is a good spirit, the last is a bad spirit. Maybe you may be lying in bed at midnight, eating breakfast or dinner, or between meals. The good spirit may say, "Go in the swamp to pray," night or day. If you follow the good one, you will receive good; if the bad one, you will get nothing.

I have to work out and find the difference between the two spirits. I felt sometimes like obeying the good spirit and sometimes the bad, and I continued to live to obey it better, and was one morning, just at daylight, called out by it into a gully; and when I got there and sat down, I lost my sight, and I heard a voice at my head saying, "When a child learns to read it don't forget for seventy-five or eighty years; write and send your mistress word and give her thanks for teaching your lips to pray, and tell her to get right, if she ain't right"; and then there rose a dead head before me, with rotten teeth; the head seemed all torn up, a terrible sight; the sight made me sick and blind for three days.

A woman in the presence of me said, "Give me a pipe of tobacco"; another one said, "You don't use tobacco, just use at it"; [that is, "you don't use very much tobacco"] a voice said, "Go and set you out a tobacco plant, and let it grow to about one and a half feet, and there is a little worm on the plant." And he showed me the plant, a pretty green plant, and I never saw as pretty a tobacco plant, "the worm eats it and lives on it. Methodists live by the power of God, the Baptists live off of grace; go and tell all the Methodists they are wrong."

Three days after that I was in the field plowing, a sunshiny morning; there came a west wind as a fire and lifted me up, and showed me a ladder from the northwest, that passed right along by me, about two miles from me; the voice told me to go to it and be baptized. I saw the church, and in it twelve people, and in the pulpit a colored man preaching. I could see half his body; the twelve people were in front of him, and I saw myself sitting behind him in the pulpit, and by that spirit and that sign I was showed I was called to preach. The end of the ladder at the church was light and bright; the end away from the church ran up into the sky and was dark; if it had a been bright I would have seen into heaven.

I told my experience in April eleven years ago, and was baptized the third Sunday in May. As my experience I told the three deacons and our minister what I had seen and heard. When they carried me to the water I lost my sight again, got into the water about waist deep; my breath left me; a voice spoke at my right ear, "Brother Lockheart, I baptize you." I was sick all the time from the time I saw the head till I was baptized.

Tuesday night, after I was baptized, I fell from my chair dead, and when I fell back a cloud passed over me darker than any black night, and from that I got well; that night was the best night's rest I ever had.

Two days after that I was plowing in the field, turned my mule round and sat on my plow-stock; a voice spoke in midday, "What makes me Black?" The skin and hair shows it; if you look upon a hill and see two black men standing, you say there stands two Blacks; if you see two white men, you say there stands two white men; that is to show the difference between the two, skin and hair. I saw the master and servant walk out one day; the master got snake-bit, but by the help of God he got well, and he found the servant, the black man, knew the snake was there before it bit him, but would not tell him. The master would never like the servant no more for not telling him.

The servant wants the master to tell him the terror that is in death and hell, but he won't tell him on account of the snake. Now you can see clearly to pull the mote out of your brother's eye.

Two days after that I saw the heavens open and a white cloud come out about the size of a man's hand; it spread to the size of a tablecloth, closed to the size of a man's hand again, then again spread out to the size of a tablecloth and then closed out of sight, like a door closing in the heavens: then the next day, early in the morning, I saw the spirit of God, like a bird, like a rain-crow in shape, but the color of a dove: it had wide wings; as it passed by on the right side, it burnt inside of me like a flame of fire, and run me nearly crazy for about five minutes, and then I was all right again. About a week after that I was walking along from the field, when the horn blew for dinner. I walked right up to a coffin on two little benches; it was painted a dark red, and on each side were silver handles, and when I first saw it I was badly frightened and stopped and looked in it, till when I got quiet, it was empty, but lined, with a pillow at the head. When I got over my fear a voice spoke at the head of the coffin and said, "Your body shall lie in that and rest in the shade," and then, as soon as the voice ceased speaking, the coffin disappeared, and then I began preaching.

About a year after I was called, I went on a journey preaching. I walked all the way for about forty miles. I walked, for the commandment says you must not use your critter on the Sabbath day. When I was coming home, I felt great pain, as if some one was driving nails in me. It was nine o'clock Saturday morning. Sunday morning about the same time, I saw in the road before me the likeness of a man, clothed in a long white gown; he turned my mind round, just like a wheel turning round. The next day, at the same time, I saw the same spirit again, who said to me, "You have a purple gown made like mine." The spirit looked like a young white man, clean-faced; his hair was kinder straw-colored, and hung down to his shoulders. For three days he kept after me till I had one made, and on a Friday I felt something in my shoes. I couldn't keep them on, until Saturday evening, and then a voice spoke and said, "Take off those shoes and go to Cermonia church tomorrow barefoot and preach." I now preach like the Apostles, with my purple gown on and barefoot, at my own church, Mt. Pleasant, near Grovetown, Georgia.

One night I prayed to the Lord to let me visit Heaven, and then fell into a deep sleep, and then I began a journey up in the sky. I soon came to a fine building, and it was paled round with white palings. I walked up in front of the gate; the gate was shut. I looked through the gate, and saw a white man standing in the door of the house. The house was built round, of white stone, and the house was full of windows, as high as I could see. I could not see to the top of the house. All the windows were full of little children. I didn't see any grown folks there I expect, what I see and know in this world, they are powerful scarce up there in Heaven.

POSSESSED OF TWO SPIRITS

Tradition Bearer: Braziel Robinson

Source: Steiner, Roland. "Braziel Robinson Possessed of Two Spirits." Journal of American Folklore 13 (1900): 226–228.

Date: 1900

Original Source: Georgia

National Origin: African American

---

In terms of structure, "Possessed of Two Spirits" is best classified as a personal experience narrative. It is a first-person account of an individual experience. In terms of function, this account serves as a belief tale by virtue of exemplifying and reinforcing the narrator's belief in the powers of conjuration (supernatural manipulation) possessed by root doctors (spiritual practitioners from African American tradition). The overall system mastered by conjure men or root doctors has been labeled hoodoo, and these experts are often referred to as "two-headed doctors" in tribute to their cognizance of both the natural and supernatural world. The present narrative contains references to both culturally specific beliefs (the power of graveyard dirt, sometimes called "goofer dust," to affect the living) and more universal folk beliefs (the powers of second sight conferred by being "born with the caul," a delivery in which the birth sac is draped over the newborn's face). Typically, the more tightly structured of Robinson's narratives (such as his being conjured in May 1898) are framed by affirmations and descriptions of belief in the supernatural.

---

“I am not a preacher, but a member of the church, but I can make a few remarks in church, I have a seat in conference, I can see spirits, I have two spirits, one that prowls around, and one that stays in my body. The reason I have two spirits is because I was born with a double caul. People can see spirits if they are born with one caul, but nobody can have two spirits unless they are born with a double caul, very few people have two spirits. I was walking along and met a strange spirit, and then I heard a stick crack behind me and turned round and heard my prowling spirit tell the strange spirit it was me, not to bother me, and then the strange spirit went away and left me alone. My two spirits are good spirits, and have power over evil spirits, and unless my mind is evil, can keep me from harm. If my mind is evil my two spirits try to win me, if I won't listen to them, then they leave me and make room for evil spirits and then I'm lost forever, mine have never left me, and they won't if I can help it, as I shall try to keep in the path.”

Here he took the quid of tobacco out of his mouth, and rolling it in his hand for a few minutes, resumed:

“Spirits are around about all the time, dogs and horses can see them as well as people, they don't walk on the ground, I see them all the time, but I never speak to one unless he speaks to me first, I just walk along as if I saw nothing, you must never speak first to a spirit. When he speaks to me and I speak back I always cross myself, and if it is a good spirit, it tells me something to help me, if it is a bad spirit, it disappears, it can't stand the cross. Sometimes two or more spirits are together, but they are either all good, or all bad spirits, they don't mix like people on earth, good and bad together.

“Good spirits have more power than bad spirits, but they can't help the evil spirits from doing us harm. We were all born to have trouble, and only God can protect us. Sometimes the good spirits let the evil spirits try to make you fall, but I won't listen to the evil spirits.

"When a person sees a spirit, he can tell whether it is a good spirit or a bad spirit by the color, good spirits are always white, and bad spirits are always black. When a person sees a bad spirit, it sometimes looks like a black man with no head, and then changes into a black cat, dog, or hog, or cow, sometimes the cow has only one horn and it stands out between the eyes. I never saw them change into a black bird; a man told me he saw one in the shape of a black owl; but I have seen good spirits change into white doves, but never saw one in shape of a cat, have seen them in the shape of men and children, some with wings and some without, then I have seen them look like a mist or a small white cloud. When a person is sick and meets good spirits near enough to feel the air from their bodies, or wings, he generally gets well. Any one can feel a spirit passing by, though only a few can see it. I've seen a great many together at one time, but that was generally about dusk. I never saw them flying two or three along together. Good and bad spirits fly, but a bad spirit can't fly away up high in the air, he is obleeged [obliged] to stay close to the ground. If a person follows a bad spirit, it will lead him into all kinds of bad places, in ditches, briers. A bad spirit is obleeged to stay in the body where it was born, all the time. If one has two spirits, the one outside wanders about, it is not always with you. If it is near and sees any danger, it comes and tells the spirit inside of you, so it can keep you from harm. Sometimes it can't, for the danger is greater than any spirit can ward off, then one's got to look higher.

"I've heard spirits talk to themselves, they talk in a whisper like, some-times you can tell what they're saying, and sometimes you can't. I don't think the spirit in the body has to suffer for the sins of the body it is in, as it is always telling you to do right. I can't tell, some things are hidden from us.

"People born with a caul generally live to be old. The caul is always buried in a graveyard.

"Children born with a caul talk sooner than other children, and have lot more sense.

"I was conjured in May 1898, while hoeing cotton, I took off my shoes and hoed two rows, then I felt strange, my feet begun to swell, and then my legs, and then, I couldn't walk. I had to stop and go home. Just as I stepped in the house, I felt the terriblest pain in my jints [joints], I sat down and thought, and then looked in my shoes, I found some yaller [yellow] dirt, and knew it was graveyard dirt, then I knew I was conjured, I then hunted about to find if there was any conjure in the house and found a bag under my door-step. I opened the bag and found, some small roots about an inch long, some black hair, a piece of snake skin, and some graveyard dirt, dark-yaller, right off some coffin. I took the bag and dug a hole in the public road in front of my house, and buried it with the dirt out of my shoes, and throwed some red pepper all around the house. I didn't get any better, and went and saw a root-doctor, who told me he could take off the conjure, he gave me a cup of tea to drink and biled [boiled]up something and put it in a jug to wash my feet and legs with, but it ain't done me much good, he ain't got enough power, I am gwine [going] to see one in Augusta, who has great power, and can tell me who conjured me. They say root-doctors have power over spirits, who will tell them who does the conjuring; they generally [sic] uses yerbs [herbs] gathered on the changes of the moon, and must be got at night. People git conjur[e] from the root-doctors and one root-doctor often works against another, the one that has the most power does the work.

“People gits most conjured by giving them snake’s heads, lizards, and scorpions, dried and beat up into powder and putting it in the food or water they drink, and then they gits full of the varmints; I saw a root-doctor cut out of a man’s leg a lizard and a grasshopper, and then he got well. Some conjur ain’t to kill, but to make a person sick or make him have pain, and then conjur is put on the ground in the path where the person to be conjured goes, it is put down on a young moon, a growing moon, so the conjur will rise up and grow, so the person stepping over it will git conjured. Sometimes they roll it up in a ball and tie it to a string and hang it from a limb, so the person to be conjured, coming by, touches the ball, and the work’s done, and he gits conjured in the part that strikes the ball, the ball is small and tied by a thread so a person can’t see it. There are many ways to conjure, I knew a man that was conjured by putting graveyard dirt under his house in small piles and it almost killed him, and his wife. The dirt made holes in the ground, for it will always go back as deep as you got it, it goes down to where it naturally belongs.

“Only root-doctors can git the graveyard dirt, they know what kind to git and when, the hants [haunts, that is, ghosts] won’t let everybody git it, they must git it thro’ some kind of spell, for the graveyard dirt works trouble ‘til it gits back inter [into] the ground, and then wears’ off. It must git down to the same depth it was took from, that is as deep as the coffin lid was from the surface of the ground.”

JACK-O'-MY-LANTERN

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Newell, William Wells. “The Ignus Fatuus, Its Character and Legendary Origin.” Journal of American Folklore 17 (1904): 39–41.

Date: 1904

Original Source: Maryland

National Origin: African American

---

Ignus Fatuus (literally, “foolish fire”) has been identified as foxfire, swamp gas, will-o-the-wisp, the spirits of the dead, and in the legend below, “Jack-O’-My-Lantern.” William Wells Newell, citing W. Wirt Sikes, describes the hideous swamp “goblin” as being preternaturally strong and swift though no taller than five feet, covered with hair, and able to leap long distances. Other commentators differ on the apparitions’ exact attributes, but in all cases the Jack-O’-My-Lantern is associated with the devil and out to harm any mortal crossing its path. In this narrative, he even surpasses the devil himself in deceit and guile.

---

Once there was a man name Jack. He was a mighty wicked man, an’ treat he wife an’ children like a dog. He did n’ do nothing’ but drink from morning til night, an’ it wasn’t no use to say nothing’ at all to him ‘cause he was just as ambitious as a mad dog. Well sir, he drink an’ he drink til whiskey couldn’t make him drunk; but at last it burn him up inside; an’ then the Devil come for him. When Jack see the Devil, he was so scared he couldn’t do anymore than drop in the floor.

Then he beg the Devil to let him off just a little while, but the Devil say, “Naw Jack, I ain’t going’ wait no longer; my wife, Abbie Sheens, is expecting you.”

So the Devil start off pretty brisk’ an’ Jack was obliged to follow, till they come to a grog shop.

Mr. Devil,” said Jack, “don’ you’ wan’ a drink?”

“Well,” said the Devil, “I believe I does, but I ain’t got no small change; we don’t keep no change down there.”

“Tell you what you do, Mr. Devil,” said Jack. “I got one ten cent in my pocket; you change yourself into another ten cent, an’ we can get two drinks, an’ then you can change yourself back again.”

So the Devil change hissself into a ten cent, an’ Jack pick him up, but instead of going in the grog shop, Jack clap the ten cent in he pocket-book that he hadn’t took out of he pocket before, ‘cause he didn’t want the Devil to see that the clasp was in the shape of a cross. He shut it tight, an’ there he had the Devil, an’ it wasn’t no use for him to struggle, ‘cause he couldn’t get by that cross. Well sir, first he swear and threaten Jack with what he was going’ to do to him, an’ then he begun to beg, but Jack just turn round an’ start to go home.

Then the Devil say, “Jack, of you’ll lemme out o’ here, I’ll let you’ off for a whole year, I will, for truth. Lemme go Jack, ‘cause Abbie Sheens is too lazy to put the brush on the fire, an’ it’ll all go out of I ain’t there for’ long, to tend to it.”

Then Jack say to hissself, “I have a great mind to let him go, ‘cause in a whole year I kin repent and get religion an’ get shed of him that there way.”

Then he say, “Mr. Devil, I’ll let you out if you declare for gracious you won’t come after me for twelve month.”

Then the Devil promise before Jack undo the clasp, an' by the time Jack got he pocket-book open he was gone. Then Jack say to hisself, "Well, now I going' to repent an' get religion sure; but it ain't no use being' in no hurry; the last' six month will be plenty o' time. Where that ten cent? Here 'tis. I going get me a drink."

When the six month was gone, Jack allowed one month would be time enough to repent, and when the last month come, Jack say he going have one more spree, an' then he would have a week or ten days left an' that was plenty o' time, 'cause he done heard o' folks repenting on their death bed. Then he went on a spree for' sure, an' when the last' week come, Jack had the delirium tremblin's, an' the first thing he knowed there was the Devil at the door, an' Jack had to get out of he bed and go 'long with him. After a while there pas a tree full o' great big red apples.

"Don' you' wan' some apples, Mr. Devil?" said Jack.

"You can get some if you want them," said the Devil, an' he stop an' look up in the tree.

"How you expect a man with delirium tremblin's to climb a tree?" said Jack. "You catch hold the bough, an' I'll push you up in the crotch, an' then you' kin get all you' wants."

So Jack push him in the crotch, an' the Devil begin to feel the apples to get a ripe one. While he was doing' that, Jack whip he knife out of he pocket, an' cut a cross in the bark of the tree, just unther the Devil, an' the Devil holler, "Tzip! Something nurr but me then. What are you doing' down there, Jack? I going' cut you' heart out."

But he couldn't get down while that cross was there, an' Jack just sat down on the grass, an' watch him raging an' swearing an' cussing. Jack kept him there all night tell 'twas close to day, an' then the Devil change he tune, an' he say, "Jack, lemme get down here an' I'll give you another year."

"Give me nothing'!" said Jack, an' stretch hisself out on the grass.

After a while, 'bout sun up, the Devil say, "Jack, cut dis thing off here an' lemme get down, an' I'll give you ten year."

"Naw siree," said Jack, "I won' let you get down less you declare for' gracious that you won't never come after me no more."

When the Devil find Jack was hard as a rock, he agreed, an' declared for gracious that he wouldn't' never come for Jack again, an' Jack cut the cross off the tree, and the Devil left without a word.

After that Jack never thought no more about repenting, 'cause he wasn't afraid of the Devil, an' he didn't want to go where there wasn't no whiskey. Then he live until he body wore out, an' he was obliged to die.

First he went to the gate o' heaven, but the angel just shake he head. Then he went' to the gate o' Hell, but when word come that Jack was there, the Devil holler to the imps. "Shut the do' an' don' let that man come in here; he done treat me scandalous. Tell him to go 'long back where he come from."

Then Jack say, "How I going' find my way back in the dark? Give me a lantern." Then the Devil take a chunk out of the fire, an' say, "Here, take this, and don't you never come back here no mo'." Then Jack take the chunk o' fire an' start back, but when he come to a marsh, he done got lost, an' he ain't never find he way out since.

CAJUN

---

THE WINE, THE FARM, THE PRINCESS AND THE TARBABY

Tradition Bearer: Aneus Guerin

Source: Claudel, Calvin. "Louisiana Tales of Jean Sot and Boqui and Lapin." Southern Folklore Quarterly 8 (1944): 288–291.

Date: 1931

Original Source: Louisiana

National Origin: Cajun

---

Cajuns are the descendents of Europeans of French ancestry who were exiled from Acadia (now Nova Scotia, Canada) by the British, who began a systematic program of deportation in 1755. Although the exiles found homes as far away as the Caribbean, the largest and historically most identifiable Cajun population settled in what was then the Louisiana Territory, where they preserved tales from European tradition, adapted those of their neighbors, and developed their own that summed up their perceptions of themselves and others. The Cajun cycle of Lapin and Bouqui tales casts Lapin (French, "rabbit") in his common role of trickster and Bouqui (derived from Wolof "hyena" as noted on page xiv) as Lapin's foil and the butt of all his jokes. The Lapin and Bouqui cycle in general and "The Wine, the Farm, the Princess and the Tarbaby" in particular show the influence of African American tradition. Cross-cultural borrowing and adaptation to the southern environment are striking in these tales. In addition, this tale, composed of several narratives that are capable of standing alone, should be compared to other trickster narratives in this collection, especially "How Brer Rabbit Practice Medicine" (page 168) and "Brother Rabbit an' Brother Tar-Baby" (page 414).

---

One day Comrade Lapin was working with Comrade Bouqui on a farm. They were cropping together that year, and they had arranged to divide the crop equally at the end of the year. It was very hot that day, and Comrade Lapin wanted to fool Comrade Bouqui in some way or other.

“What do you say if we buy a jug of wine today?” suggested Lapin.

“Fine!” agreed Bouqui. “You will go get it yourself.”

Comrade Lapin went to fetch the wine. When he returned, he put it in a ditch where there was shade. He went to work again, but did not try to keep up with Bouqui. He took his time, cheating on his comrade. Bouqui was working fast to get finished, and Lapin was far behind. Suddenly Lapin exclaimed:

“Ooh!”

“What’s the matter?” requested Bouqui.

“There’s someone calling me,” explained Lapin.

“Go see who it is,” suggested Bouqui.

Lapin left, went toward the jug and took a drink. When he returned, Bouqui asked him why he had stayed so long.

“I was called for a christening,” explained Lapin.

“Is that so?” questioned Bouqui. “What did you name the baby?”

“I named him First-One,” continued Lapin.

They started working, and soon Comrade Lapin was called again. He went to take another big drink. When he returned, he told Bouqui it was another christening and he had called the baby Second-One.

Next he went to perform a third christening and named this baby Third-One. This time he finished drinking all the wine, turning the jug over before he returned to his work.

“Ah now!” exclaimed Bouqui when it was time to quit, “let’s go drink us some wine now.”

They went to the jug and saw it was turned over. There was not a drop of wine left in the jug.

“Too bad!” declared Lapin. “Our wine is all lost.”

Bouqui was sad, disappointed and tired. Comrade Lapin felt good as he returned to his cabin.

A little while after that Bouqui and Lapin went into the field to see their potatoes. There was a good crop. The potato plants were big and full of flowers. They stayed there a long time, talking and admiring their labor.

“It’s almost time to dig our potatoes,” said Lapin “How are we going to divide our crop? Do you want to take the roots, and I’ll take the plant?”

“Oh no!” replied Bouqui, “myself I want the pretty plant.”

“As you wish,” agreed Lapin.

When they took in the potato crop, Bouqui brought all the pretty plants into his storeroom. He had nothing at all. Lapin took the roots, and he had food for the whole year.

Later on it was time to harvest the crop of corn. Bouqui made up his mind that Lapin would not fool him on the corn. He said he wanted the roots this time, and Lapin told him to choose as he wanted again. Bouqui took the roots, taking them to his storeroom, and he had nothing. Lapin took the stalks, and he had a lot to eat for the whole year.

During the winter Bouqui went to ask Lapin for something to eat. Lapin refused him. Bouqui almost died from hunger that year, and he decided not to work on shares with Comrade Lapin anymore.

Comrade Bouqui was very dissatisfied, but he was to be still more unhappy yet before he would be done with Lapin.

They were courting the same girl, a princess. She was a pretty girl, and she liked Lapin better. Bouqui was jealous, and he wanted to know whether he or Lapin would marry the girl.

“I’ll tell you what we’ll do,” suggested Comrade Bouqui to Lapin one day. “We’ll have a race. We’ll leave here together tomorrow morning. He who gets at the girl’s place first will marry her.”

“Fine!” agreed Lapin. “We shall run a race.”

As they had planned, the following morning they started the race. Comrade Lapin beat him by a long distance. When Bouqui got there, he asked Lapin to give him another chance.

“What do you want to do this time, Comrade Bouqui?” asked Lapin.

“Let’s see,” thought Bouqui, scratching his head. “Oh yes! let’s boil a big pot of water, and he who jumps over it wins the girl. Do you want to try that?”

“As for me, I’ll do whatever you want,” replied Lapin.

They boiled some water until it was boiling over. They placed it in the yard by the house, and it was decided that Lapin should jump first. Lapin started running to make his jump; but when he got up to the big pot, fear seized him and he did not jump.

“It’s high, yes!” exclaimed Lapin.

He tried again. This time he jumped it.

“It’s your turn now, Bouqui,” said Lapin.

Bouqui started running. When he jumped, he fell into the middle of the pot. The water was so hot, he was cooked before he could count to four.

After that Bouqui’s family had a grudge against Lapin. They blamed Lapin for the death of their son, Bouqui; and they watched for the chance to pay him back in the same way.

Comrade Lapin would come to steal water from their well every night. Now old man Bouqui knew it was Lapin who was stealing his water. When Lapin came for water that night, he saw a little tar baby. He could not make out who it was. He walked all around it, looking closely. Finally he got up enough courage to talk to it.

“Get away from that well!” cried Lapin.

But it did not act as if it heard. Lapin advanced more closely, crying out:

“Go away! Go away, before I hit you a blow with my foot.” But it did not pay any attention at all. Comrade Lapin struck a blow with his foot, and his foot stayed stuck.

“Let my foot go!” cried Lapin. “Let me go, or I’ll strike you with my other foot.”

As he struck, the other foot stayed stuck, too. Lapin struck with his other two, and they stayed stuck, too. Then he struck with his head, his body, all staying stuck on the tar baby. Lapin was well caught.

The following morning old Bouqui found Lapin in his trap. “Now I have you!” exclaimed he. “I will go kill you, and I think I’ll burn you.”

“Burn me if you will!” cried Lapin, “but I beg of you not to throw me into the briars behind the fence there. That would be too mean a death.”

“I am going to give you the worst death I know,” added old man Bouqui, “and it’s into the briars you go.”

He went off with Lapin, to throw him into the briars. When he got by the fence, he threw him over. Lapin fell into the middle of the briar patch. Old Bouqui looked through a crack to see him die, but Lapin only laughed at him. Bouqui realized his mistake, but too late.

“You threw me exactly into my home here,” shouted back Lapin, running quickly toward his place.

“He’s a bad fellow, yes, that Lapin!” exclaimed old Bouqui to himself, turning homeward very regretful.

THE SACK OF PEAS AND THE MULE

Tradition Bearer: Aneus Guerin

Source: Claudel, Calvin. “Louisiana Tales of Jean Sot and Boqui and Lapin.” Southern Folklore Quarterly 8 (1944): 292–294.

Date: 1931

Original Source: Louisiana

National Origin: Cajun

---

In the following narrative, Lapin takes advantage of Bouqui’s appetite to acquire a free mule by indirect means. Obviously considering Bouqui easier prey than the farmer who owns the mule he covets, Lapin manipulates his victim into trading his beautiful wife for the mule and a sack of peas to start a vegetable farm. Much of the tale hangs on Bouqui’s poor powers of observation. He does not appreciate how beautiful his wife is until he has initiated the trade and alienated her. He is unable to recognize the dearly bought mule after its tail has been bobbed, and at last, he is deceived into seeing a drowning mule in a bundle of floating hair.

---

One day Bouqui went to visit Lapin. While at the dinner table Bouqui noticed what fine vegetables Lapin's wife served—squash, pumpkin and fine celery salad.

"What fine food you have, Lapin!" remarked Bouqui. "I wish I had such wonderful vegetables for my household."

"I raise them on my farm," replied Lapin. "Why don't you start a vegetable farm yourself and farm the way I do?"

"That's a good idea," ventured Bouqui. "But I have no mule or seed to start such a farm."

After they had all eaten a while, Lapin said to Bouqui:

"I know just the thing for you, Bouqui. A farmer nearby has a mule and a sack of peas. You can probably make a bargain with him to get them. You can use the peas to start a crop."

"But what can I offer him, Lapin?" questioned Bouqui. "I have no money. My wife is all I've got."

"I'll tell you what," proposed Lapin. "Trade your wife for his mule and the peas.... I'm sure he'll accept. I'll talk to him and fix it up for you.... Tomorrow I'll come to see you."

After Bouqui had returned home, he pondered over Lapin's proposition. Finally he said to his wife, who was indeed very pretty:

"My wife, I have been thinking about swapping you for a mule and a sack of peas. We can't live in this poverty. So I really need a mule more than I need you."

Next day Bouqui heard Lapin knock at the door.

"I have brought the mule and sack of peas," explained Lapin. All you have to do now is get your wife over to the farmer's place. He has agreed to the bargain."

At first Bouqui was reluctant, for he had noticed how his wife was pretty, and he really wanted to keep her. However, his wife came up just then with her clothes all bundled and packed ready to leave and said:

"No, Bouqui, I shall go.... You were stupid enough to want to trade me for a mule and a sack of peas. So I'm going to leave you now for the farmer.... Good-bye."

This settled the bargain. Bouqui's wife left, carrying her bundle. Bouqui kept the mule and the sack of peas, and Lapin went home.

Now it happened that Lapin really wanted the mule for himself. So he began to devise a trick to get the mule away from Bouqui. That night he went to Bouqui's barn, unlocked the door and started to lead the mule to his own place. While on his way home, he clipped off the end of the mule's tail and threw it into a pond nearby, where there was a very deep hole. Next day Bouqui came to Lapin's house and knocked at the door.

"Lapin," began Bouqui, "someone must have stolen my mule. Have you seen him?"

“Why no,” replied Lapin.

Just then Bouqui noticed his mule in Lapin’s barn, and he exclaimed, “That looks very much like my mule!”

“Of course not,” added Lapin. “That mule has a bobbed tail. Your mule has a long tail.”

That’s true enough,” answered Bouqui, shaking his head, however, in a puzzled fashion.

I’ll go help you to look for your mule, Bouqui,” offered Lapin, feigning sympathy. So the two started off together. Finally Lapin reached the pond and exclaimed, “There! Your mule slipped into the deep hole of the pond. I see his tail sticking out of the water.”

Lapin walked out over the water on a fallen tree to the place where the piece of tail was floating. He reached down and pulled and pulled on the tail, making out as if he was trying to pull up the mule on the other end of the tail. Finally he flew backwards out of the water, holding the tail in his hands.

You see, Bouqui,” explained Lapin. “Your mule fell in here and drowned. I pulled so hard, his tail came off.... It’s no use; he is lost under the water.”

“Yes, that’s too bad,” replied Bouqui, as he left with a look of despair.

ON HORSEBACK

Tradition Bearer: Aneus Guerin

Source: Claudel, Calvin. “Louisiana Tales of Jean Sot and Boqui and Lapin.” Southern Folklore Quarterly 8 (1944): 294–295.

Date: 1931

Original Source: Louisiana

National Origin: Cajun

---

Lapin chooses to humiliate Bouqui in front of some female friends. This tale is similar to “Mr. Deer’s My Riding Horse” (page 173). Unlike rabbit’s motive of eliminating a romantic competitor, Lapin demonstrates no motive beyond the trickster’s standard desire to stir up trouble.

---

One day Comrade Lapin and Comrade Bouqui planned to go see some girls together. Bouqui was to come to meet Lapin at his house at four o’clock Sunday afternoon, and they would go together. At four o’clock Bouqui arrived.

“Well now, let’s go,” he called to Lapin.

“I don’t think I can go,” replied Lapin. “I was coming down my steps yesterday, and I fell down. I really believe I broke my foot, because I can’t walk.”

“Can’t you walk just a little bit?” asked Bouqui very disappointedly.

“The only way I can go with you is if you carry me,” suggested Lapin.

“I’ll carry you until to the big-gate,” agreed Bouqui. “But I’ll put you down there, and you will have to walk the rest of the way, because the girls will laugh at me if they see that you ride me like a horse.”

Lapin put on a pair of spurs and mounted Bouqui. When they got to the big-gate, Lapin got down but could not make a single step, his foot hurt him so much.

“I can’t make it,” complained Lapin. “If you want me to go all the way, you will be obliged to carry me a little farther.”

“Oh well! get upon my back again,” agreed Bouqui.

Bouqui did not want to leave his friend there and would do any-thing to help him. When they passed the house, the girls were all upon the gallery. See Lapin seated upon Bouqui, they wanted to laugh, but they did not laugh, because they did not want to hurt Bouqui’s feelings.

Poor Bouqui placed himself next to the steps, and Lapin bounded upon the gallery, completely well. Lapin then turned toward the girls, saying, “Didn’t I always tell you Bouqui was my horse!”

The girls could no longer withhold themselves. They almost burst with laughter at Bouqui, right in front of him. He was so ashamed he was all miserable. So he excused himself right away and left.

JEAN SOT AND THE COWHIDE

Tradition Bearer: Jack Vidrine

Source: Claudel, Calvin. “Louisiana Tales of Jean Sot and Bouqui and Lapin.” Southern Folklore Quarterly 8 (1944): 297–298.

Date: 1944

Original Source: Louisiana

National Origin: Cajun

---

In the opening episode of this Cajun comic tale, Jean Sot (French, “John the Fool”) kills the family’s cow. In another episode, the misinterpretation of his mother’s instructions leading to this act would seem a willful attempt to misconstrue. In the case of Jean Sot, however, such behavior is consistent with the stock character. In a later episode in the tale, and due to a misinterpretation of Jean’s words by a group of robbers, he turns folly to fortune. The following tale (“Numskull Talks to Himself and Frightens Robbers Away,” 1653F) and motifs from it are found throughout the South.

---

Foolish John and his mother lived by the bayou in Louisiana and they spoke French. He was such a foolish lad he misunderstood everything he was told.

“Foolish John, go get the cow by the bayou and drive her into the lot,” said his mother.

In the French they spoke, “to drive” can also mean “to push.” So Foolish John went to fetch the wheelbarrow and rolled it out to where the cow was pasturing. He placed her into the wheelbarrow and rolled her home. When he reached home, he was panting and sweating like a horse.

“What in the world are you doing, Foolish John?” questioned his mother.

“Well, Mama, you told me to push the cow here, and that’s what I’m doing.”

“Fool! will you ever learn anything!” exclaimed the exasperated woman. “Now take that cow out of there and go milk her.”

As with many words that have double meanings, “to milk” also meant “to shoot.”

While his mother was busy inside, Foolish John went to get the gun and shot the cow. When he appeared inside without the milk, his mother became worried.

“Foolish John, where is the milk for supper?” she asked.

“Why, Mama, I thought you meant for me to shoot the cow with a gun.... That’s what I did,” replied the lad.

“Ah, foolish son!” she cried, “killing our only cow.... Now you must go skin her and sell the hide so we can buy food, because we don’t have milk.... Hurry now!”

Foolish John fetched the big butcher knife, strung the cow up to a tree by her hind legs and skinned her—head, feet and everything. He put the hide over his head and set out for town. As he walked under the hide, he looked like a strange beast.

It was getting dark and growing cold, for it was almost winter. He reached a tree that was losing its leaves. The tree groaned and shivered as the cold wind whistled through its limbs.

“That poor tree must be cold,” remarked Foolish John to himself. “I’ll cover it with this hide to keep it warm.”

He began climbing the tree with the cowhide still on his head. When he was up in the top ready to place the hide over the tree, a band of seven men suddenly came and sat down in a circle under the tree. They were robbers with a huge sack of money. The chief began to divide the money.

“This is for me.... That’s for you,” counted the chief as he placed each robber’s share before him.

Every time he said this, Foolish John would pluck a hair from his cowhide and cry, “And one hair for me-eee!”

“Listen, listen, the Old Devil!” would exclaim one of the robbers, and the chief would start to divide again. The dividing and counting continued far into the night, and each time the chief would say, “This is for me.... That’s for you,” Foolish John would add while plucking out hair, “And one hair for me-eee!”

Finally when they had all the money spread out, and Foolish John had picked his cowhide clean, he suddenly lost his grip on the limb he was holding and crashed to the ground right into the middle of the circle of thieves. When they beheld this strange apparition with horns, they all took to their heels and fled. Foolish John gathered up the money, placed the hide over the tree and went back home.

“Well, how much did you get for the hide?” inquired his mother.

“I collected a dollar for every hair on the hide,” answered Foolish John, laying down the heavy sack load of money.

“Foolish John!” exclaimed the mother with joy, “sometimes I think you are not so foolish!”

JEAN SOT FEEDS COWS NEEDLES

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Ray, Marie. “Jean Sotte Stories.” Journal of American Folklore 21 (1908): 364.

Date: 1908

Original Source: Louisiana

National Origin: Cajun

---

The following narrative (a variant of “Stupid Stories Depending on a Pun,” AT 1345) casts Jean Sot in the numskull role once again. In this case, his linguistic misinterpretation has no saving grace.

---

Jean Sot’s old mother was in despair over the stupidity of her boy, but thought she would try him again, hoping he would do better. So calling him, and giving him some money, she said, “My son, I want a paper of needles, and you must go down the road to the village and buy me one, but do not lose it on the way.”

Jean Sot promised to be careful and went off in high glee, for he liked to go on errands to the village. He knew just where to go; and, having counted out the money to the old dame who gave him the needles, he started down the lane which led to his home. He had not gone far when he met a number of cows, who, when they saw him, lifted their heads and cried, “A-moo, a-moo!” and turned into a barnyard. Jean Sotte, thinking they were calling him, followed; and when they continued to cry “A-moo!” he said, “Well, if it is the needles (a pun on French aiguille, “needle”) you want, here they are!” and he sprinkled them all over the straw they were eating.

Then he went home; and when the old woman asked where the needles were she had sent him for, he said, "Mother, I obeyed you: I did not lose them, but, when the cows cried so for them, I was obliged to give them to them on their hay."

JEAN SOT KILLS THE DUCK

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Ray, Marie. "Jean Sotte Stories." Journal of American Folklore 21 (1908): 364–365.

Date: 1908

Original Source: Louisiana

National Origin: Cajun

---

Jean Sot commonly reveals his stupidity when justifying the logic that motivates his unconventional actions. In this narrative, however, he attempts to conceal a minor crime by committing and then confessing to a worse one.

---

There was an old woman who had two sons—one so simple that he received the name of Jean Sotte, and the other so bright and intelligent that he was known as Jean Esprit.

One day the old woman said to Jean Sotte, "My son, I am old and stiff, but you are young and active and can go on my errands; so go into the store-room and bring me a bottle of wine you will find there."

Jean Sotte went to the storeroom, and, having found the bottle, he thought he would take out the cork and make sure it was wine; and when he had smelled it, he thought he would taste it to be sure it was all right; but the wine was so good and old, he soon felt very merry, and continued to drink until the bottle was quite empty.

Now, in a corner of the room an old duck had made her nest in some straw; and when Jean Sotte began capering around, she cried out, "Quack, quack!" and flapped her wings, which so frightened him that he caught her by the neck, and wrung her head off, and seated himself on her eggs.

The old woman, having waited some time for Jean Sotte's return, determined to see what was keeping him. What was her surprise, on hobbling to the store-room, to find her old duck dead and Jean Sotte sitting on her nest. "Silly boy!" she said, "why have you killed my duck, why are you sitting on the nest, and where is the bottle of wine you were to bring me?"

"Mother," said Jean Sotte, rolling his head and looking very sleepy, "I drank the wine; and when the old duck saw me, she cried out, and I knew she would tell you, so I killed her to keep her from telling; and, now she is dead, you will never know!”

TI JEAN CANNOT TELL A LIE

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Personal communication

Date: 2000

Original Source: Louisiana

National Origin: Cajun

---

Ti Jean (French, “Little John”) is a trickster figure found throughout French-descended traditions in the Americas. Unlike many such figures, this character has successfully survived into contemporary joke repertoires. Compare this character with Boudreaux in the following narrative, “Boudreaux and the Cottonmouth.”

---

Early one morning, Ti Jean was walking along the bank of Bayou behind his house. All of a sudden, he noticed that the family outhouse, located right on the bank, was sliding into the bayou. he decided to help it out and picked up a big tree limb and hit the outhouse til it.

Later, when Ti Jean got home his papa met him at the door and said, “Ti Jean, did you knock that outhouse into the bayou?”

“Papa,” the boy answered, “like George Washington, I cannot tell a lie. I did it.”

“Ti Jean, come with me to the woodshed. You are going to get the whipping of your life!”

Ti Jean looked up at his father and said, “Papa, when George Washington told his papa that he had chopped down the cherry tree, his papa didn’t give him a whipping.”

“Mais no (French, “But no”), Ti Jean, but George Washington’s papa wasn’t in that cherry tree when he cut it down, either.”

BOUDREAUX AND THE COTTONMOUTH

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Personal communication

Date: 1985

Original Source: Louisiana

National Origin: Cajun

The stock character of “Cajun” in jokes, as folklorist Barry Jean Ancelet has pointed out, can speak neither English nor French, is incapable of being educated, and is rural and stubborn. Boudreaux is far and away the supreme stock Cajun character who can be a wily trickster or an impregnable numskull. In contemporary intragroup narratives, however, Boudreaux’s foolishness is intended to attack the stereotype rather than the stereotyped.

---

Boudreaux tell this story ‘bout when he been fishin’ down at da bayou one night and he done run outta bait. He got ready bout to leave when he seen a big snake with a frog in his mouth, so he decide to steal dat frog from de snake.

Dat snake, he be a cotton mouth water moccasin, so he have to be real careful not to git bit. He sneak up behind dat snake and grab him round da neck. Dat snake squirm and twist tryin’ to git loose from Boudreaux. and he don’t let go of dat frog. No.

Now, Boudreaux need dat frog, so reach into his back pocket and pull out a little bottle of whiskey he keep in there. Den he pour a little bit o’ dat whiskey in da corner o’ dat snake’s mouth just to make him relax a little bit.

Da snake swallow down dat whiskey and turn loose of dat frog. Boudreaux take da frog outta da snake’s mouth and let da cottonmouth loose and he swim away slow and happy. Den, he put the frog on his hood and goes back to fishin’.

In a few minutes, Boudreaux hear a splashing down in the water by him and feel somethin’ bumpin’ against his leg. He look down, and what you t’ink he see?

It dat water moccasin an’ he lookin’ up at Boudreaux and got another frog in his mouth.

CAJUN COCKFIGHT

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Personal communication

Date: 2001

Original Source: Louisiana

National Origin: Cajun

---

The following joke connects two regional stereotypes: (1) the Aggies, students and graduates of Texas A&M University who are commonly cast in the numskull role in the South and southwestern regions; and (2) the Cajuns, who (as noted in the introduction to “Boudreaux and the Cottonmouth,” page 219) have been similarly stereotyped. In this contemporary trickster tale, however, the Aggies, the Cajun bettors, and (who one can assume) a Cajun detective turn the tables on detractors with the aid of the Mafia.

---

The Louisiana State Police received reports of illegal cock fights being held in the area around Lafayette, and duly dispatched the infamous Detective Desormeaux to investigate. Desormeaux reported to his sergeant the next morning.

“Dey is tree main groups in dis cock fightin’,” Desormeaux began.

“Good work Desormeaux! Who are they?” the sergeant asked.

Desormeaux replied confidently, “De Aggies, de Cajuns, and de Mafia.”

Puzzled, the sergeant asked, “How did you find that out in one night?”

“Well,” said Desormeaux, “I went down and done seed dat cock fight, I knowed de Aggies was involved when a duck was entered in de fight.”

The sergeant nodded. “Ok, I’ll buy that, but what about the others?”

Desormeaux intoned knowingly, “Well, I knowed de Cajuns was involved when somebody bet on de duck.”

“Ah,” sighed the sergeant. “And how did you deduce that the Mafia was involved?”

“De duck won.”

Regional

APPALACHIAN

---

PHOEBE WARD, WITCH

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Cross, Tom Peete. "Folk-Lore from the Southern States." Journal of American Folklore 22 (1909): 254–255.

Date: 1909

Original Source: North Carolina

National Origin: Anglo American

---

The fear of the night hag (the witch who comes in the night) is a terror that crosses cultures and regional boundaries. The following legend cycle alludes to many of the widely held beliefs about this supernatural figure, including the need for her to remove her skin, the ability to slip through tiny openings, and ways of repelling attacks.

---

The early years of Phoebe Ward, witch, are shrouded in mystery. It is known that she was a woman of bad morals. No one seemed to know anything of her past. She was an old, old woman when this account begins.

Phoebe Ward had no fixed home. She lived here and there, first at one place and then at another in Northampton County, North Carolina. She stayed in a hut or any shelter whatsoever that was granted her.

She made her living by begging from place to place. Most people were afraid to refuse her, lest she should apply her witchcraft to them. When she found a house at which people were particularly kind to her, there she stopped and abused their kindness. Hence the people resorted to a number of methods to keep her away. For instance, when they saw her coming, they would stick pins point-up into the chair-bottoms, and then offer her one of these chairs. It is said that she could always tell when the chair was thus fixed, and would never sit in it. Also, they would throw red pepper into the fire, and Phoebe would leave as soon as she smelled it burning.

Among her arts it is said that she could ride persons at night (the same as nightmares), that she could ride horses at night, and that when the mane was tangled in the morning it was because the witch had made stirrups of the plaits. She was said to be able to go through key-holes, and to be able to make a horse jump across a river as if it were a ditch. She was credited with possessing a sort of grease which she could apply, and then slip out of her skin and go out on her night rambles, and on her return get back again. It is said that once she was making a little bull jump across the river, and as she said, "Through thick, through thin; way over in the hagerleen," the animal rose and started. When he was about half way over, she said, "That was a damn'd good jump," and down the bull came into the river. (The witch is not to speak while she is crossing.)

To keep the witch away people nailed horse-shoes with the toe up over the stable-doors. To keep her from riding persons at night, they hung up sieves over the door. The witch would have to go through all the meshes before she could enter, and by the time she could get through, it would be day, and she would be caught.

Phoebe came near meeting a tragic death before her allotted time was out. One night several men of the neighborhood gathered around a brandy-barrel. As the liquor flowed, their spirits rose, and they were on the lookout for some fun.

They went over to where Phoebe was staying and found her asleep. Thinking she was dead, they shrouded her, and proceeded to hold the wake. They were soon back at their demijohns, and while they were standing in one corner of the room drinking, there came a cracked, weak voice from the other corner, where the supposed corpse was lying out, "Give me a little; it's mighty cold out here."

They all fled but one, Uncle Bennie, and he was too drunk to move. When things became quiet and Phoebe repeated her request, he said, "Hush, you damn'd b-h, I'm goin' to bury you in the mornin'."

The others were afraid to return that night, but did so the next morning, and found Bennie and Phoebe sitting before the fire, contented, warm, and drinking brandy.

After this Phoebe lived several years, making her livelihood by begging. Her last days were as mysterious as her early life had been.

THE WITCH AND THE BOILER

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Porter, J. Hampden. "Notes on the Folk-Lore of the Mountain Whites of the Alleghanies." Journal of American Folklore 7 (1894): 116–117.

Date: 1894

Original Source: Tennessee

National Origin: Anglo American

---

The legend of “The Witch and the Boiler” illustrates common practices attributed to witches and to those who attempt to combat their negative influences. One of the means of revenge pursued by the witch in this narrative is “dancing” on the chest of the victim of her supernatural assault. In the literature on supernatural assault, this is termed being ridden (attacked) by a “night hag” or simply “hagging.” These attacks are accompanied by paralysis and a feeling of an oppressive weight bearing down on the chest of the victim. The principles of “sympathetic magic” (the concept that phenomena can be made to influence each other at a distance by means of the proper magical rituals) are seen in the measures taken by the witch doctor, who used the organs of a sheep who was killed by supernatural assault to affect the agent of that attack. At the root of this diagnosis and cure is the principle of contagion: objects that have once been in contact continue to influence each other.

---

An animal killed by witchcraft should be burnt, partly because that is the best and most effectual way of destroying things that are infected, and also for the reason that in more than one way this may be made to affect the witch; she can be fascinated or punished. One of the parties implicated related the effects of fire in the case of a Tennessean sorceress who had done much harm.

An incredulous and stupid person, such as exists in every community, borrowed a boiler from her and refused to return it. Then she came every night and danced on him till he nearly fainted. There was no doubt about this, because she permitted herself to be seen. Each day, also, one of his sheep reared up, gave two or three jumps, and fell dead.

At length the “witch doctor” was called in, and he, being a pious man and a member of the church, advised his patient to try the effect of honesty and give back the boiler. This he did, but the witch laughed at him, and things went on as before. It was now evident that her machinations were prompted by malice, and not resorted to from a sense of justice, so the doctor directed him to eviscerate the next sheep that died, to do this alone, and in perfect silence. Moreover, on no account to lend or give away any article, however trifling its value, until the effect of his charm had been fully tried. Having taken out the lungs and heart, they were to be carried home, the kitchen cleared, and these organs laid upon a bed of live embers. While procuring them, the witch’s granddaughter, “a right smart shoot of a girl, training for a witch herself,” saw what he was doing as she passed through his field, and, anticipating the result, ran home, saying that her “Granny” would shortly be ill.

Such was indeed the case, for no sooner had the sheep’s vitals been placed upon the coals than her shrieks alarmed the neighborhood. A crowd gathered that seems to have had some inkling of what was going on, for a committee of women inspected the sufferer by force, and found her breast completely charred. The spell was broken before fatal consequences ensued, and from that time the persecutions and losses which had persisted so long came to an end.

THE MYSTERIOUS DEER

Tradition Bearer: A. S. Wiltse

Source: Wiltse, Henry M. "In the Southern Field of Folk-Lore." Journal of American Folklore 13 (1900): 211.

Date: 1900

Original Source: Tennessee

National Origin: Anglo American

---

The following legend operates as a belief tale intended to substantiate the existence of a white deer that displayed an uncanny ability to avoid death, the scream of a human being, and the ability to exact supernatural revenge on a hunter who had wounded it.

---

There is quite a prevalent belief among mountaineers in the existence of a mysterious deer, of which they stand in no inconsiderable awe. I have heard of a hunter in upper East Tennessee, who claims to have shot at this deer, or one of these deer, under a misapprehension. The bullet came back and lodged in his own leg, and he shows the scar in apparent confidence that the evidence is conclusive.

Dr. A. S. Wiltse, who has for many years practiced his profession in the Cumberland Mountains, and who takes a deep interest in the mountain people and their peculiarities, writes me this version of the deer myth, secured from a celebrated hunter named Jackson Howard. The language of the original relater is reproduced as nearly as practicable:

"El Moore is a good hunter, and a splendid good shot, too. But he gat into a streak o' mighty ornery luck one time jes' on account of one of them thar white deer. He tole me all about hit with 'is own lips, an' El is a mighty truthful man.

"He said he war out a' huntin' one mornin', an' he come onter a white deer, an' hit war not more 'n fifteen er twenty feet from him.

"He fired at hit, but never touch a hair. That deer jes' stood still until he'd a-wasted seven or eight shots on hit. Then hit run off, an' he tried his gun on a spot in a tree, an' the bullet went straight to their mark.

"He got his dander up then, an' laid for that white deer, an' he wasted a powerful lot more ammunition on hit, until fin'ly 'e plugged hit in the shoulder.

“But he was mighty sorry for that, right then an’ for a long time afterwards. He said hit made the sorrowfulest noise ‘at he ever heard in all of his life. An’ from that day twelvemonth hit war impossible for El ter kill any kind of deer whatsomever. He could kill other kinds of varmints all right enough, but kill a deer he couldn’t.”

LUCKY JACK

Tradition Bearer: R. M. Ward

Source: Chase, Richard, and Kathryn Chase. “Lucky Jack.” Southern Folklore Quarterly 3 (1939): 21–24.

Date: 1939

Original Source: North Carolina

National Origin: European American

---

The Appalachian region encompasses West Virginia, large areas of North and South Carolina, Kentucky, Tennessee and Virginia, and portions of Alabama, Georgia, and Mississippi. Although the area has been home to Native Americans and African Americans as well as those of European descent, the tale corpus that is often thought of as characteristically Appalachian comes from the British Isles. Specifically, the European ethnic makeup of the region is historically northern English and Scottish Irish. Jack is the quintessential folk hero, trickster, and everyman of the Appalachian folktale tradition. The plots of the following narratives follow the typical structure of European tales in which the protagonist begins in a miserable condition, but through effort and in many cases luck is elevated in status at the end. In the “Jack tales,” the formulaic ending closes with Jack rich.

---

[P]eople] said one time there was a man named Jack. He’uz a tol’able poor boy, but he kindly thought he’d hunt him up some girl for a wife. There was a farmer lived way back in the mountains had two awful pretty girls, and they said the boys was crazy about ‘em. This farmer though, he was wealthy and he didn’t want the boys to come around there, so he fixed up a way to get shed [rid] of ‘em. He put out an adver-tizement that any boy wanted one of his girls would have to catch a wild rabbit and put it in a ring and make it stay there thirty minutes. That was his proposition. They’d have to bring a wild rabbit and he’d make a ring ten foot across; then they’d put the rabbit in there and if it stayed thirty minutes they could have one of the girls. But if the rabbit failed to stay there, he’d kill them.

Well, not many went to try but some did and the old man cut their heads off. Directly it got so the boys quit goin' down there. That suited the old man because it kept the girls from bein' bothered. But then a boy'uld get so struck on one he'd venture, and get his head cut off. Finally it got so nobody 'uld go.

Well, Jack was studyin' out how he could get one of them girls. His mother told him he'd better not go, but Jack he said, "I'll jest have to try."

So his mother put him tip a little snack of dinner, and Jack caught him a rabbit, and then got fitted up and started out.

About twelve o'clock in the wilderness Jack met up with an old man. This old man looked like he was about a hundred years old, had a long grey beard and was walkin' with a walkin' cane, said,

"How we do, Jack."

"How d'e do, daddy."

Jack looked at him, said, "I don't believe I know ye."

"Well," says the old man, "I know you, and I know right where you've started. You goin' up there to get killed."

"I might now," says Jack.

"Are you familiar with what you got to do to get one of them girls?"

"Tol'able familiar," says Jack.

"Don't you think you jest as well start on back home?"

"O no," says Jack, "I never turn back. I'm goin' on down there."

"Well," says the old man, "I could help you if you got any faith in me." Says, "How's your faith, Jack?"

Jack said his faith was pretty good, said, "I'd sure be glad for you to help me."

"Well, if you come up the road a piece with me, I'll test you out and we'll see whe'er you got faith or no."

So they went on, and the old man said, "Now Jack, you take my cane here and go up yonder in the woods a ways till you come to a very flush spring. Then you take my cane and stir in that spring till the water turns to wine. And when it turns to wine, I'll come up there with something to help you."

So Jack took the cane and went on to where there'uz a very bold spring comin' out of the ground. Jack's faith was weak when he started, but he 'lowed he'd have to keep on tryin'. He stirred right on and on and it looked pretty soon like the water was turnin' jest a little bit red, so Jack's faith got stronger and stronger and the water got redder and redder.

Well, when the water turned right red the old man come back, says, "Well Jack, you shore got real faith." Says, "Now, Jack, you get out your lunch and we'll eat a little and jest try some of that and see whe'er it tastes like wine or not."

So they did, and that water 'uz jest as good as any wine. Then the old man says to Jack, says, "Now, Jack, I've made you a drill. You take it and set it in the middle of that ring and a rabbit'll stay in there till it dies, it don't differ how wild he is."

He gave Jack a drill shaved out of a stick. It was eight-square like a steel drill and about a foot long.

So Jack went on down to the farmer's house, and when he got there he hollered the old man out and said he'd come to try for one of the girls. The man said for Jack to come around in the yard, and then he marked out a ring, says to Jack, "Now you put your rabbit right down in this ring and if it stays there thirty minutes you can kill me and take whichever girl you want and take all the money I got, and if it don't stay in the ring thirty minutes I'll kill you."

So Jack went and stuck that drill down in the middle of the ring and turned his rabbit loose. Now that rabbit jest took out around that drill and went around and around and around.

The man watched it a while, saw it wouldn't leave, and directly he got up and went in the house. Says to the girls and his old woman, says, "Its my opinion that rabbit is stayin' in there on account of that drill Jack stuck down in the middle of the ring." Says, "One of you run out there and see can't you buy that drill off Jack."

So the oldest girl she went out and says to Jack, "What'll you take for that drill, Jack?"

Jack says "I don't know as I'd want to sell it right now."

"I'll give you a thousand dollars for it."

"No," says Jack, "I'll not sell it."

So she went back and told her daddy she couldn't make no trade. Then he sent his youngest girl out.

She says to Jack, says, "Jack, I'd like awful well to buy that drill."

"Well," says Jack, "You can have it after thirty minutes is up."

"No," she says, "I want it now. I'll give you two thousand dollars for it."

"No," says Jack, "You wait till thirty minutes is out, and then we'll trade."

So she saw she couldn't do no good and she went on back in the house. Then the old man said to his old lady, says, "You go." So she went out.

Says, "Jack, I'd shure like to trade you out of that drill. You can have one of the girls, and I'll give you three thousand dollars and everything on the place."

"No," says Jack, "Not till thirty minutes is out."

So the old lady went on back, says, "I can't do a thing with him. He won't even talk about selling."

Then the old man says, "Well, I guess that thirty minutes is about out. I reckon I'll have to go on out and let Jack kill me."

He started out, picked tip a big bowl off the table, took that to Jack, says, "Jack, it looks like your rabbit's goin' to stay in there, and you might as well kill me. But before you do, I wish you'd sing this bowl full for me."

"All right," says Jack, "I'll try." And he sang this song (recorded by John Powell at Marion, Virginia, August 1936).

“Is it full?”

“No,” says the old man, “Only one drop.”

“Oh the youngest daughter she came out. All for to buy my drill. I fooled around her, kissed her well. Fill, bowl, fill!”

“Is it full yet?”

“Jest two drops.”

“Oh the old lady she came out All for to buy my drill. I fooled around her, Ki—”

“Stop, Jack! It’s full and runnin’ over. Jes’ cut my head off.”

So Jack cut off the old man’s head and married the youngest girl, and as far as I know Jack’s plumb rich yet.

THE LION AND THE UNICORN

Tradition Bearer: Monroe Ward and Miles Ward

Source: Chase, Richard. “The Lion and the Unicorn.” Southern Folklore Quarterly 1 (1937): 16–19.

Date: 1937

Original Source: Beech Creek, North Carolina

National Origin: European American

---

As in many variants of the well-known European märchen (“The Brave Tailor,” AT 1640) on which “The Lion and the Unicorn” is modeled, this Jack tale is built around the unlikely hero’s inadvertent successes in defeating wild animals. His conquests are based not on hunting skill nor on cleverness, but rather on lucky accidents. Beyond luck, Jack’s primary attribute in the tale is audacity in asserting his prowess. The invariable conclusion of this tale, and the others of the cycle, is that Jack ends up rich.

---

Jack started out one time to try his fortune. Told his mother he couldn't do any good there at home. So he went traveling about over the country, and was going past a saw mill 'side the road, picked up a little thin piece of plank looked rather nice. He laid down under a tree to rest a while and got to shaving on that plank till finally he'd made him a paddle. He didn't know what he'd do with it, just carried it along. He struck out directly through a pasture field, come to where a bunch of flies had lit down on a cow-pile. So Jack cut loose with his paddle and come down on 'em, then he looked to see how many he'd killed. Well, he went on down the road and come to a blacksmith shop. Jack went in and got the blacksmith to make him some big letters for his belt, said:

Strong Man Jack
Killed Seven at a Whack.

So Jack put that around him and went on. Pretty soon here come the King riding on his horse, says, "Hello, Jack. What's all that writing you got around you?" So the King read it, says to Jack,

"You must be a pretty brave fellow."

"Not so awful. I can do some things."

"Well, if you're up to that sign on your belt, I got a job for you. How'd you like to take a chance on killing a wild boar? There's one over on the side of the mountain yonder been killing lots of sheep. I'll pay you a thousand dollars if you kill it. All my men are scared of it."

"Well," says Jack, "I'll try."

Jack got the King to pay him five hundred down, and then the King says, "Come on, Jack, I'll go with you and show you what mountain it uses on."

So Jack says, "If I can find it, King, I'll sure kill it."

Jack knew if the King's men were scared of it, it must be awful dangerous. The King took him over in the mountain a right smart piece, got to looking around kind of nervous, stopped his horse directly, says "Now, Jack, you'll have to go on up in the mountain and find it. I got important business back home."

Then he turned his horse around and just lit out. Jack said he'd wait a little while and then he'd slip out before that wild boar smelled him. He'd got five hundred dollars, and he didn't want to get mixed up with no wild hog. But when he started back to the road, he heard it breaking brush up the mountain, making an awful racket, then he saw it coming. So Jack took out across the field, him and the boar, whippety cut! whippety cut! and the wild hog just a-gaining. Well, Jack saw an old waste-house with no roof on it, standing down the field a ways, so he made for it, run in the door, and scrambled up the wall. The old hog was right on him and got a piece out of Jack's coat tail, Then he stood there with his forefeet up on the wall, looking for Jack. Well, Jack climb down the outside and run around and pushed the door to and propped it with some timbers. Then he went on back to the King's house.

“Well, Jack, did you have any luck?”

“No, I couldn’t find no wild hog. I hunted all over that mountain, didn’t see nothing.”

“Why, Jack, that wild boar just makes for anybody goes up there, time he smells ‘em.”

“Well, a little old boar shoat come bristling up to me, kept follering me around, I kicked it over several times, but the blame thing got playful and jerked a piece out of my coat tail. Made me a little mad then so I took it by the tail and ear, throwed it in an old waste house up there and barred him in. You can go up and look if you want to.”

When the King rode up there and saw it was that boar, he like to beat his horse to death getting back. Then he blowed his horn and fifty or sixty men come up. They took a lot of Winchester rifles and went up to that old waste-house; but they was so scared that they wouldn’t go close enough to get a shoot at it. Jack said he wasn’t scared so he went down with a rifle and poked it in there and shot two or three times. That old hog commenced tearing around inside and tore the house plumb down. He give one kick, knocked the chimney down and one of the rocks took him between the eyes and he keeled over dead. So the men skinned it out, and it made two wagon loads of meat. The King paid Jack the rest of the thousand dollars, said he had another job for him. Jack asked him what it was.

“They say there’s a unicorn using back here on another mountain, doing a lot of damage to people’s live stock. It’s a lot more dangerous than that boar, but a brave feller like you, Jack, ought not to have any trouble killing it. I’ll pay you another thousand dollars, too.”

Well, Jack couldn’t back out of it, but before he said he would try it he got the King to pay him five hundred down. When the King took Jack up there and left him, Jack watched him out of sight, then he says, “I’ll just get out of here now. I’m not going to fool around and get killed. I got my money, I’ll just go another way.”

But Jack hadn’t got out of the woods when he heard unicorn a-coming. So he started running around in among them trees as hard as he could go. He looked back and saw that horn making a lunge for the middle of his back so he grabbed hold of a little white oak and swung around behind it. The unicorn swerved at him, but he hit that oak and stove his horn plumb through it. And when Jack saw it come through, he took some nails out of his overall pocket, grabbed him up a rock, and wedged the horn in tight. Then he went on back to the King.

“What luck you have this time, Jack?”

“Why, King, I didn’t see no unicorn.”

“Now that’s a curious thing to me. Nobody else ever went in there but what that unicorn come right after ‘em.”

“Well, some kind of little old yearling bull, didn’t have but one horn, come down there bawling and pawing the ground. Follered me around so close it kind of aggravated me finally. So I took it by the tail and stove its horn through a tree. I reckon it's still fastened up where I left it. You can go up there and see if you want to."

So Jack took the King where it was, and when he saw it he whirled his horse and got back in a hurry. The men got their rifles but they were too scared to go close enough to get a shoot at it. So Jack went up to the unicorn, took a switch and hit it, says,

"See, men, there's not a bit of harm in him."

The men finally shot it and when it fell it tore that tree plumb up by the roots. Then they skinned it and brought back the hide. The King paid Jack the other five hundred and Jack was just about to leave when the King called him, says,

"Jack, they've just brought in word that a lion has come over the mountain and been using around a settlement over there killing every-thing it comes across, cattle and horses, and they say it's done killed several men tried to go after it. I told them about you, Jack, and they made me promise to send you."

"Well, King, that sounds like the dangerest thing of all." "I'll pay you nother thousand dollars for it, Jack."

"I don't know as I favor working any more right now, King. I said I'd be back home tonight and they'll be looking for me in. Besides I'm tired out with all that running around I done already."

"Come on now, Jack, I'll pay you two thousand."

"Well, I don't know. I'll have to study on it a while." "Here's a thousand dollars right now, son. I'd sure like to get shed of that lion."

"I'll do it then, I reckon."

So the King took Jack up behind him on his horse and they rode over to where they said the lion was. Then the King said he'd not venture any further, so Jack slipped off the horse, and the King says to him,

"When it smells you, Jack, you'll sure hear from it," and then he put out like a streak.

Well, Jack said he had three thousand dollars and he'd go a different direction and get back home. But before he'd started hardly, that old lion smelt him and commenced roaring up in the woods, roared so he jarred the mountain.

"Lordy me!" says Jack, "I'm a goner this time."

He didn't waste no time running, he made for the closest scaly bark sapling and skinned up it like a squirrel. The old lion jumped up on the tree a time or two and then prowled around looking up at Jack. Then the lion commenced gnawing on the tree and Jack was just about scared to death. He got it gnawed about half through, when he quit and laid down and went to sleep right against the foot of the tree. Well, Jack had heard that lions were hard to wake up, so he thought he'd better take a chance and try to slip down and get away before it woke up again. He got down about halfway all right, but he was looking so hard at the lion's eyes that he didn't see when he set his foot on a prickly snag. Well, that snag broke with him and he went scooting down and landed right straddle of the lion's back.

Well, the old lion started in roaring and jumping and humping around but Jack just held on. And directly the lion got to running and he was so scared he didn't know that he was headed right for town. All the people come out shouting and hollering and the King's men started in to shooting at it till finally they tumbled it up. When they done that Jack picked himself up out of the dirt and come over where the King was, says,

"Look a-here, King, I'm mad."

"Why, how come, Jack?"

"These men have done killed your lion."

"My lion? What you mean, son?"

"Why, King, I'd a-not had him killed for three thousand dollars; I was just riding him down here to get him broke in for you a ridey horse."

So the King went over to where his men were and raised a rumpus with 'em, says,

"Why, I'd a-felt big riding that lion around. Now you men will have to pay Jack three thousand dollars for killing that lion."

So Jack went home with six thousand dollars in his pocket, and the last time I was down there he was still rich.

JACK AND THE FIRE DRAGAMAN

Tradition Bearer: Monroe Ward and Miles Ward

Source: Chase, Richard. "Jack and the Fire Dragaman." Southern Folklore Quarterly 5 (1941): 151–155.

Date: 1941

Original Source: North Carolina

National Origin: European American

---

Although the following narrative with its relatively complex plot, monstrous antagonist, and descent into a magical realm resembles the European märchen, its setting, characters, and occupations are localized to the rural southern highlands of the United States. Featuring the exploits of a clever hero Jack, who is often the youngest of three brothers, the tale is one of a widely distributed cycle derived from European models. Jack, unlike his brothers, offers hospitality to the ogre, and this may be the reason for his successes in the tale.

---

Well, hit's said that one time Jack and his two brothers, Will and Tom, wuz a-layin' around home: wuzn't none of 'em doin' no good, so their daddy decided he'd set 'em to work. He had him a track of land out in a wilderness of a place back up on the mountain. Told the boys they could go up there and work it. Said he'd give it to 'em. it wuz a right far ways from where anybody lived at, so they fixed 'en, up a wagon load of rations and stuff for housekeepin' and pulled out.

There wuzn't no house up there, so they cut poles and notched 'em up a shack. They had to go to work in a hurry to git out any crop and they set right in to clearin' 'em a newground. They decided one boy'd have to stay to the house till twelve and do the cookin'.

First day Tom and Jack left Will there. Will went to fixin' around and got dinner ready, went out and blowed the horn to call Tom and Jack, looked down the holler and seed a giant a-comin'. Had him a pipe about four foot long, and his long old blue beard drug the ground. When Will seed the old giant wuz headed right for the house, he run and got behind the door, pulled it back on him and scrouged back ag'inst the wall jest a-shakin' like a leaf. Old Bluebeard come on in the house, threwed the cloth back off the dishes, eat ever' bite on the table and sopped the plates. Went to the fire and lit his pipe; the smoke jest come a-bilin' out. Then he went on back down the holler.

Tom and Jack come on in directly, says, "Why in the world ain't ye got us no dinner, Will?"

"Law me!" says Will, "If you'd 'a seed what I seed, you'd a not thought about no dinner. Old Fire Dragaman come up here, eat ever' bite on the table, and sopped the plates."

Tom and Jack laughed right smart at Will. Will says, "You'uns needn't to laugh. Hit'll be your turn tomor', Tom."

So they fixed up what vittles they could and they all went back to work in the new ground.

Next day Tom got dinner, went out and blowed the horn. There come old Fire Dragaman.

"Law me!" says Tom, "Where'll I git?"

He run and scrambled under the bed. Old Fire Dragaman come on in, eat ever'thing on the table, sopped the plates, and licked out all the pots. Lit his old pipe and pulled out down the holler, the blot, smoke jest a-bilin' like smoke comin' out a chimley. Hit'uz a sight to look at. Will and Jack come in, says, "Where's dinner at?"

"Dinner, the nation! Old Fire Dragaman come back up here. Law me! Hit'uz the beatenist thing I ever seed!"

Will says, "Where wuz you at, Tom?"

"Well I'll just tell ye," says Tom, "I'uz down under the bed."

Jack laughed, and Will and Tom says, "You jest wait about laughin', Jack. Hit'll be your time tomorr'."

Next day Will and Tom went to the newground. They got to laughin' about where Jack'd hide at when old Fire Dragaman come, Jack fixed up ever'thing for dinner, went out about twelve and blowed the horn. Looked down the wilder-ness, seed old Fire Dragaman a-comin'.

Jack went on back in the house, started puttin' stuff on the table. Never paid no attention to old Bluebeard, jest went right on a-fixin' dinner. Old Fire Dragaman come on in. Jack 'uz scoopin' up a mess of beans out the pot, says, "Why hello, daddy."

"Howdy, son."

"Come on in, daddy. Git you a chair. Dinner's about ready; jest stay and eat with us."

"No I thank ye. I couldn't stay."

"Hit's on the table. Come on set down." "No. I jest stopped to light my pipe."

"Come on, daddy. Let's eat."

"No, much obliged. I got no time."

Old Fire Dragaman went to git him a coal of fire, got the biggest chunk in the fireplace, stuck it down in his old pipe and started on back. Jack took out and follered him with all the smoke a-bilin' out; watched where he went to, seed him go down a big straight hole in the ground.

Will and Tom come on to the house, seed Jack wuz gone. Will says, "I reckon that's the last of Jack. I bet ye a dollar old Fire Dragaman's done took him off and eat him. Dinner's still on the table."

So they set down and went to eatin'. Jack come on in directly. Will and Tom says, "Whare'n the world ye been, Jack? We allowed old Fire Dragaman had done eat ye up."

"I been watchin' where old Fire Dragaman went to."

"How come dinner still on the table?"

"I tried my best to git him to eat," says Jack; "He jest lit his old pipe and went on back. I follered him, seed him go in a big hole out yonder."

"You right sure ye ain't lyin', Jack?"

"Why no," says Jack. "You boys come with me and you kin see the place where he went in at. Let's us git a rope and basket so we kin go in that hole and see what's down there."

So they got 'em a big basket made out of splits, and gathered up a long rope they'd done made out of hickory bark, and Jack took 'em on down to old Fire Dragaman's den.

"Will, you the oldest," says Jack. "We'll let you go down first. If you see any danger, you shake the rope and we'll pull ye back up."

Will got in the basket, says, "You recollect now; whenever I shake that rope, you'uns pull me out in a hurry."

So they let him down. Directly the rope shook; they jerked the basket back out, says, "What'd ye see, Will?"

"Seed a big house."

Then they slapped Tom in the basket and let him down; rope shook; they hauled him up. "What'd ye see, Tom?"

“Seed a house and the barn.”

Then they got Jack in the basket, let him down. Jack got down on top of the house, let the basket slip down over the eaves, and right on down in the yard. Jack got out, went and knocked on the door. The prettiest girl Jack ever had seed come out. He started right in to courtin’ her, says, “I’m goin’ to git you out of here.”

She says, “I got another sister in the next room yonder, prettier’n me. You git her out, too.”

So Jack went on in the next room. That second girl wuz a heap prettier’n the first, and Jack went to talkin’ to her and wuz a-courtin’ right on. Said he’d git her out of that place.

She says, “I got another sister in the next room, prettier’n me. Don’t ye want to git her out, too?”

So he went on in. Time Jack seed that ‘un he knowed she ‘uz the prettiest girl ever lived, so he started in right off talkin’ courtin’ talk to her; plumb forgot about them other two. That girl said to Jack, says “Old Fire Dragaman’ll be back here any minute now. Time he finds you here he’ll start spittin’ balls of fire.”

So she went and opened up an old chest, took out a big sword and a box of ointment, says, “If one of them balls of fire hits ye, Jack, you rub on a little of this medicine right quick, and this here swords the only thing kin hurt old Fire Dragaman. You watch out nosy and kill him if ye kin.”

Well, old Bluebeard come in the door directly, seed Jack, and coin. commenced spittin’ balls of fire around in there, some of ‘em big as pumpkins. Jack he’uz jest a-dodgin’ around tryin’ to git at the old giant with that sword. Once in a while one of them fireballs would glance him but Jack rubbed on that ointment and it didn’t even make a blister. Fin’lly Jack clipped him with that sword, took his head clean off.

Then Jack made that girl promise she’d marry him. So she took a red ribbon and got Jack to plait it in her hair. Then she give Jack a wishin’ ring. He put it on his finger and they went on out and got them other two girls.

They wuz awful pleased. Told Jack they’uz such little bits of children when old Bluebeard ketched ‘em they barely could recollect when they first come down there.

Well, Jack put the first one in the basket and shook the rope. Will and Tom hauled her up, and when they seed her they commenced fightin’ right off to see which one would marry her. She told ‘em, says, “I got another sister down there.”

“Is she prettier’n you?” says Will. She says to him, says, “I ain’t sayin’.”

Will and Tom chunked the basket down in a hurry. Jack put the next girl in, shook the rope. Time Will and Tom seed her they both asked her to marry, and went to knockin’ and beatin’ one another over gittin’ her. She stopped ‘em, says, “We got one more sister down there.”

“Is she prettier’n you?” says Will.

She says to him, says, “You kin see for yourself.”

So they slammed the basket down, jerked that last girl out. “Law me!” says Will, “This here’s the one I’m a-goin’ to marry.”

“Oh no you ain’t!” Tom says; “you’ll marry me, won’t ye now?” “No,” says the girl, “I’ve done promised to marry Jack.”

“Blame Jack,” says Will, “he kin jest stay in there,” and he took the basket and rope, throwed ‘em down the hole.

“There ain’t nothin’ much to eat down there,” says the girl; “He’ll starve to death.”

“That’s jest what we want him to do,” says Will, and they took them girls on back up to the house.

Well, Jack eat ever’thing he could find down there, but in about three days he seed the rations wuz runnin’ awful low. Then he scrapped up ever’thing there wuz left and he wuz plumb out of vittles didn’t know what he would do.

In about a week Jack had commenced to git awful pore. Happened he looked at his hand, turned that ring to see how much he’d fell off, says, “I wish I wuz back home setting’ in my mother’s chimley corner smokin’ my old chunky pipe.” And next thing, there he wuz.

Jack’s mother asked him how come he wuzn’t up at the new ground. Jack told her that wuz jest where he wuz started.

When Jack got up there, Will and Tom wuz still a-fightin’ over that youngest girl. Jack come on in the house and seed she still had that red ribbon in her hair, and she come over to him, says, “Oh Jack!”

So Jack got the youngest and Tom got the next ‘un, and that throwed Will to take the oldest.

And the last time I’uz down there they’d done built ‘em three pole cabins and they wuz all doin’ pretty well.

JACK’S HUNTING TRIP

Tradition Bearer: R. M. Ward and M. A. Ward

Source: Chase, Richard. “Jack’s Hunting Trip.” Southern Folklore Quarterly 2 (1938): 145–148.

Date: 1938

Original Source: Beech Creek, North Carolina

National Origin: European American

---

The following tale is a variant of the widely distributed “The Lucky Shot” (AT 1890). The story often takes the form of a tall tale performed in the guise of a personal experience narrative.

---

Jack was shure a fool for luck. They say the luckiest time he ever had, though, was one time when he went hunting. His daddy had an old flint-lock rifle hanging up over the fire-board, so Jack took that down and inspected it a little, said he thought it would do all right. Then he found the powder horn and some bullets. He put on his old baggy overalls, poured the bullets in one pocket, picked up his old ragged hat and took out up the river.

He went a long ways, but he didn't see a thing all day long till he'd come back down the river and pretty near home again and the sun just about an hour high.

Well, he looked up ahead of him in the woods and he saw a deer standing under an oak tree, biggest buck deer he'd ever seen, and right over that deer was a whole flock of wild turkeys sitting on a limb. They were in a straight row pointing right Jack's way. Jack didn't know what to do. If he shot the deer all them turkeys would fly off and he figured if he shot down that row of fowls he'd likely kill three or four of 'em with one shot. He liked wild turkey meat the best in the world but lie hated not to bring that big deer home. So he took out his knife and cut the ramrod in two. Then lie put in a double charge of powder and one bullet, then he put that half-a-ramrod in and put the other bullet in on top of it. He drew down on the deer and when he lammed loose on him he jerked the gun up so the bottom bullet would hit the turkeys. Well, he got the deer and the other bullet hit the limb them turkeys was sitting on, split it open and when it clamped back, it clamped down on their toes and held 'em fast. Such a squawking and flopping you never heard.

Well, Jack saw he had them, so he went over to look at his deer, and he was a full grown buck and had horns on him reached about six feet from tip to tip. Jack started to walk around him when he saw something kicking in the bushes on the other side. He looked and found him a big, fat rabbit. That bullet had gone plumb through the deer and hit a rabbit was sitting in the weeds. Then Jack saw where the bullet had glanced from the rabbit and stopped in a holler tree. There was something sticky oozing out the hole, so Jack stuck his finger in it and tasted it. Well, sir, it was sourwood honey. That tree was packed full of wild honey right up to the top.

Then Jack he looked up at all them turkeys fluttering and clucking and he 'lowed he'd have to cut the limb off. So he cloomb up and started cutting it down with his pocket knife. But soon as he'd cut that limb through and tools hold on it, them turkeys commenced flying off all together, and when Jack grabbed on with both hands, they carried him right with 'em, clean over the tops of the trees. Jack was mighty near scared to death. Well, directly the turkeys got to flying a little lower down and Jack saw they were heading to fly right over an old stumpy tree was sticking up out of the woods. So Jack figured if they'd fly low enough he'd drop off on top of that stumpy tree.

They kept on straight and was flying pretty low, so Jack let go for that stumpy tree but when he drapped instead of lighting on top of the tree, it was holler, and Jack lit right in the mouth of the holler and drapped clean to the bottom. When he got up and quit staggering around, he heard something whimpering. Then he felt something like a big puppy come out from the side and rub up against his leg. Then two more come out sort of grunting around and tumbling over his feet. His eyes got used to how dark it was down there finally and he saw it was three young grizzly bears.

“Lord!” says Jack, “I’m into it now! The old bear’ll be coming down in here directly and she’ll eat me shure!”

He couldn’t figure no way in the world to get out. He tried to climb up the holler but he couldn’t catch no hold. He just kept slipping back and aggravating them young grizzlies till they got to yapping at him and biting his shins. So Jack quit trying to get out that way and tried to tame them bear cubs down a little. They ca’med down finally and then Jack picked up a sharp piece of dead root was lying down there and started trying to dig out one side when something cut the light out from above him all of a sudden like and Jack heard the old grizzly bear scrouging down the holler.

“Now what’ll I do?” says Jack. Well, he knew the old bear couldn’t turn around in the holler and he knew she had to come down backwards, so when she got close enough Jack seized hold on her tail and commenced gouging her with that sharp stick. The old bear just scrambled back up the holler and Jack swung on and kept on gouging her. When they got out at the top Jack shoved her off right quick and the old bear fell to the ground and broke her neck.

So Jack cloomb down the outside and started on home to get the axe and to fetch somebody to help him bring home all his game and all that honey, and to help catch them young bears. He went to the river, moved along till all to once he saw a bunch of wild ducks swimming on near the side of a bend where it was pretty deep. Jack just had to have them ducks, so he studied a while how he’d try to get ‘em without no gun nor nothing, then he crope up and slipped in the pool, and kept on easing in till he was clean under the water. Then he swum around under the ducks, pulled a long piece of stout cord out of his overall pocket, and right easy-like so’s not to scare ‘em, he tied all their feet together. He wasn’t aiming to let them ducks fly away with him like the turkeys done, so he dove on down to the bottom and tied the loose end to a big sycamore root. Then he popped out of the water right in amongst ‘em. They started in quacking and flopping to rise off the river but that rope would pull every one of ‘em slap back in the water. They kept on rising and jerking back till they got so tangled up in that rope they was all in one bundle. So Jack started wading out then and he’d been down under the water so long a lot of fish had got all tangled up inside his old baggy overalls. Jack kicked his legs till he’d shuck ‘em all out and when he’d strung ‘em up they weighed about thirty pounds. He slung the string of fish across his shoulder, picked up that passel of ducks and started for home once more. He kept looking for them turkeys but he reckoned they’d flown clean out of the county by that time, so he thought he'd might as well give up on ever finding them again.

When he got home he got the axe and he made his two brothers, Will and Tom, come to help him. They didn't believe Jack had done all that. They took the big wagon and two mules, and two big barrels for the honey. Will and Tom laughed at Jack all the way going, but Jack knew he'd be the one laughing on the way back. Well, when they got there and tried to load the deer on, it was so heavy that they had to cut some poles and roll the carcass up onto the wagon bed. Jack picked up the rabbit and stuck it under the wagon seat. Then they cut the bee tree, and when they'd filled both barrels with that fine sourwood honey the tree was still half full, so they had to leave it to fetch the next day. Then they took the poles and went after the bear. The bear weighed even more than the deer but they finally got it loaded. Then Jack cut a hole in the bear-holler and Will and Tom caught the young 'uns. They made some rope halters and let the young bears walk along behind the wagon.

When they got out in the road again and had gone along a piece, they heard some wild turkeys a-squawking and there was Jack's flock still fastened on that limb and it tangled up on a telephone wire where they'd tried to light down again. Jack hit 'em all in the head with a long pole to stunt 'em so they wouldn't fly off again, then he knocked the limb loose and flung 'em on the wagon.

So they cured up the bear and the deer and had enough meat to last all winter. Jack's mother cooked up a big dinner of all the ducks and turkeys and invited all the neighbors. Jack sent word to the king to come too, and before he left he got to liking them young bear cubs so well he paid Jack a thousand dollars apiece for 'em and took 'em home to pet up for his children. Jack didn't sell none of that honey, though. He got his mother a lot of quart jars and she canned it all. Jack was mighty partial to honey and for the next two years him and his folks had honey to eat with their biscuits every time they sat down to the table.

PENNSYLVANIA GERMAN

---

CURES OF A MARYLAND WITCH

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Wrenshall, Letitia Humphreys. "Incantations and Popular Healing in Maryland and Pennsylvania." Journal of American Folklore 15 (1902): 268–271.

Date: 1901

Original Source: Maryland

National Origin: German American

---

The "Pennsylvania Dutch" are descendants of German-speaking immigrants who came to Pennsylvania from various parts of southwest Germany, Alsace, and Switzerland. Although, as early as the seventeenth century, these immigrants began to settle heavily in Pennsylvania, "Pennsylvania German" culture found a home in other colonies as well, including Delaware, Maryland, and New York. Pow-wow doctors in this tradition are magical-religious healers using incantations, holy words, and holy actions to heal both animals and humans. Folklorist Letitia Humphreys Wrenshall's account of the personal experience narratives of a Maryland "witch" clearly identifies her resource person as operating within this folk tradition. Two of the more obscure diseases mentioned in the narrative are Botts, an ailment in horses caused by the larvae of the botfly, and Erysipelas, a skin infection generally caused by group A streptococci.

---

Last autumn I had the opportunity of making personal observations amongst the people living in the mountain valleys of western Maryland and Pennsylvania, and especially as to their ways of affording relief in many bodily ailments. It is most interesting to see the entire faith of the country patients in their sometimes called witch doctors, and the quiet acquiescence of some of the town folks in these practices. In Pennsylvania the practice is called "powwow"; in Maryland it is spoken of as "trying for it," and there is no doubt that the Maryland incantations are borrowed from the German; indeed, positive proof of this is found in South Mountain, the home of magic (of this species) in Maryland.

Among the women of the region patchwork is their sole indulgence. I was so fortunate as to obtain from a most accomplished weaver of quilt pieces and spells much information upon "trying for it" and some of her "words."

She was a gentle, quiet-spoken woman, living in her own thick-walled stone house, very comfortably surrounded, and supplied by all that was yielded from a well-cared-for place of several acres. She practiced her faith, and to her it was truly a faith.

I asked her if she made any effort to place her will in submission and supplication [to God] when she "tried for it." She looked at me in surprise, and said very seriously, "If I didn't do that, I couldn't cure. That's the way I do it." She then complained, almost to tears, that some people thought she did it in other ways, and said she was a witch, and nothing hurt her as bad as that.

She had perfect faith in her powers and her formulas, and told me instance after instance where she had "tried for it," and accomplished the cure. A few typical ones I will give you. Mostly her cases were for "livergrowded children" I asked her to tell me the meaning of this term. She explained, "when they are cross and peaky, and don't grow, just cry all the time."

"A wheal in the eye [inflamed eye]" was another, also all kinds of hemorrhage. "Botts in horses," I asked.

"Oh, yes, often cured them and burns and cuts of all kinds." She could always blow the fire out. The practice of treating burns by words, blowing, and movements of the hands, is very general in the mountains, and I have always been able to trace it to German origin.

Words often used are these, "Clear out, brand, but never in. Be thou cold or hot, thou must cease to burn. May God guard thy blood, thy flesh, thy marrow, and thy bones, and every artery, great and small. They all shall be guarded and protected in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost."

Erysipelas can be cured by taking a red hot brand from the fire, and passing it three times over the person's face, saying the words. This ordeal by fire was not fancied by some of the patients, so my witch told me; she sometimes put coals on a shovel, and waved it over the face, saying:

Three holy men went out walking,
They did bless the heat and the burning,
They blessed that it might not increase,

They blessed that it might quickly cease,
And guard against inflammation and mortification
In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.

My witch was especially proud of her ability to stop hemorrhages, and here comes in the absent treatment. She said it was not necessary for her to see the patients; they might be far away. Only the first name must be known and pronounced exactly, also the side of the body from which the blood came, the right or left side; this was essential. She always stopped it.

Not long before I talked with her, she had been called between midnight and morning to go to a young man some miles away, who was bleeding severely. He had had a number of teeth extracted, and when the messenger left was “pretty near dead”; nothing stopped the blood. She asked for the necessary information (his name, and which side of the mouth was bleeding), then told the messenger to go back; she would “try for it.” When he reached home, the bleeding had stopped, and when she inquired the time of relief, found it was just after she had said her words. Two formulas for stopping bleeding are:

On Christ’s grave grows three roses;
The first is kind,
The second is valued among rulers,
The third stops blood.
Stop, blood, thou must, and, wound, thou must heal,
In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.

Another charm: As soon as cut, say, “Blessed wound, blessed hour, blessed be the day on which Christ was born. In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.”

After my second or third visit to the gentle witch, who was pretty, rosy, and plump, she told me how she had learnt to “try for it.” When as a child she had been adopted by an aunt who had married a “German man,” and he had taught her how to use the words, how to speak them, how to move her hands (much value is attached to the movements of the hands), and, dying, bequeathed her his precious book. She showed me the book, which had been translated from the German in 1820. The preface stated that the translator had put it into English greatly against his wife’s wish, but he was old, he had no one to leave his book to, and he did not wish his wonderful knowledge to die with him, and accordingly translated it into English, which was generally spoken about him.

My witch would not part with her book. No, she must leave it to her daughter. She could not sell it; money could not buy it. If she had no daughter, she would give it to me, but could not sell it. I might study it all I wanted, but she could not part with it.

GHOST LEGENDS OF THE BLUE MOUNTAINS

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Newell, William Wells. "Ghost Legends of the Blue Mountains in Pennsylvania." Journal of American Folklore 11 (1898): 76–78.

Date: 1897

Original Source: Henning, D. C. "Tales of the Blue Mountains in Pennsylvania." Miners' Journal. Pottsdam, PA, March 26, 1897.

National Origin: German American

---

Folklorist William Wells Newell notes that "In 1755 the colonial authorities established as many as forty forts and blockhouses along the Blue Mountains, from the Susquehanna to the Delaware" (77). Newell contends that during the latter part of the nineteenth century these forts served as the catalyst for tales of "fairies" and other supernatural beings.

---

Return of Siegfried

---

The following legend, a folk version of Washington Irving's "Rip Van Winkle," attests to the vitality of a belief in mountain spirits within the German American community of the Blue Mountain region well into the nineteenth century.

---

A youth of the name of Siegfried, having paid a visit to his promised bride, rather singularly called Chriemhilt, crossed the mountains during a thunder-storm and disappeared. Sixty-five years, a month, and a fortnight later the bride, now grown to an old woman and still unmarried, received a visit from this lover, who appeared on horseback, still wearing the costume habitual in the time when he had been lost to knowledge.

This interview took place, according to the tale, in the presence of children. The old woman afterwards explained that she had been accosted by her lover, who was under the impression that he had remained only a few hours in the mountains with the spirits, whose splendid palaces and golden streets he described, and who were able to pass at will and in a moment from one end of the mountains to the other. The woman refused to accompany him, and one of the spirits of the mountain appeared, who claimed the suitor as his captive.

At the prayer of Chriemhilt, however, he consented that after her death the prisoner should be released, and reunion effected in heaven. Such is the folk-tale, obtained from the relation of one of the children present at the advent of the suitor, and who in after days narrated the incident.

Paul Heym, the Wizard of Lebanon

---

Although shape-shifting is usually associated with witchcraft, Paul Heym would be labeled a pow-wow doctor in the Pennsylvania German community. Pow-wowing (or braucherei) is a benign folk medical tradition that involves cures using, among other devices, charms such as the one included at the end of the following brief account.

---

A certain Paul Heym, living near Lebanon about 1755, was supposed to possess the ability of trans-forming himself into various shapes. When hard pressed by Indian pursuers, he escaped by changing himself into a stump, and under the form of a wildcat was able to visit an Indian council and overhear the plans formed; from an arrow the beast received a wound in a paw, which after-ward appeared on the arm of the wizard.

When he left his house, Heym was in the habit of protecting it by a charm, written on a piece of paper, and regarded as also a protection against lightning. The words are preserved:

In Namen Gottes geh' ich aus;
Der Vater wahr' mir dieses Haus;
Der Sohn mit seiner Lieb dabei
Dies Haus bewahr' in aller Treu;
Und Heil'ger Geist, lass nicht heran,
Ein Sach das dies Haus schaden kann.

WOLF OF THE GREENWOOD

Tradition Bearer: Mrs. William Buell

Source: Gardner, Emelyn E. "Folk-Lore from Schoharie County New York." Journal of American Folklore 27 (1914): 311–314.

Date: 1914

Original Source: New York

National Origin: German American

---

"The Wolf of the Greenwood" is an ordinary folktale that incorporates some of the traditional motifs associated with "The Girl as Helper in the Hero's Flight" (AT 313). Variants of this narrative are found throughout Europe and the United States.

---

Once upon a time there lived a woman who had three daughters who were old enough to marry, but no one came to marry them. The woman owned a witch chair, which had the power to charm any one who sat in it into loving one of the daughters. One day a fine young man came and sat in the chair, and the mother told him that he might have the choice of her daughters for his wife. After looking at them all to see which was the prettiest, he chose the youngest.

A short time after they were married, another young woman who had loved the young man invited him to her home high up on one of the Rocky Mountains. He went; and while he was there, the young woman, who was a witch, put a spell upon him which changed him into a wolf. Every day he was to roam the greenwood; but when night came, he could return to his own home in human form. So the poor young wife never saw her husband except at night, for every morning in the form of a wolf he ran away to the greenwood and spent the day.

After about a year a little baby girl was born to them; and after another year there came another babe to make them happy. This made the witch woman on the mountain so jealous, that she sent down her dog, which went to the baby lying in its cradle, and licked its little cheek so hard that it licked out one of the baby's eyes.

The mother took good care that the dog did not get at her children again, until the third baby came. Soon after that, one day the eldest disappeared; and all the mother knew was, that she saw the same dog which had licked out the second child's eye, disappearing up the road.

She did not know that the dog took the child to one of its father's brothers and left it there. As the brother had no children of his own, he was very glad to take the one which the dog left. In the same manner another was taken to another uncle, who was also childless.

The poor mother was almost distracted, for now the witch woman did not allow the husband to return to his home at all. The mother watched the third child as carefully as ever she could; but at last the dog managed to steal that, too, and carried her to still another childless uncle.

When the mother had lost both her babies and her husband, she felt that she must set out and see if she could not find them. She did not go far, before she came to the house of the brother-in-law who had taken the first child. The witch woman had put her under a spell, so that she did not know her own babe or her brother-in-law. Nor did they know her. When she told the man of her loss, he was so sorry for her that he gave her an accordion for company.

But she could not bear to go home and stay alone, so she went on until she came to the house of the second brother-in-law. Here the same things happened as had happened at the house of the first brother; and when she left him, he gave her a beautiful golden comb.

Still she could not bear to go home, but continued on her way until she came to the house of the third brother-in-law. To him she told her story, and also that her husband was kept upon a high icy mountain which she was not able to climb because it was so slippery. Wishing to help her, this brother-in-law, just as she was going away, told her to go to the nearest blacksmith, whom he ordered to shoe the woman with some sharp iron shoes, which would enable her to climb the mountain where the witch woman lived.

When the blacksmith had her shod, she started up the mountain, and, owing to the fine shoes he had made her, soon reached the home of the witch woman, and saw her own husband working about, felling trees and chopping wood to keep the witch woman comfortable, for it was very cold on the mountain. When the witch woman saw the wonderful shoes which had enabled the woman to climb so well, she asked her how much she would take for them. The woman replied that if she would let her pass the night with the wood-chopper, she would give her the shoes. The witch woman agreed to that; but when night came, before the wood-chopper went to bed, the witch gave him a draught which made him sleep soundly until the witch willed for him to awaken.

The wife, thinking that if she could get her husband by himself she could win him back, waited until she thought that the witch would not hear. Then she said, "O wolf of the greenwood! why won't you turn to me? Three poor little babes have I borne to thee."

But the witch had sealed his ears; so that, although the wife said three times, "O wolf of the greenwood! why won't you turn to me? Three poor little babes have I borne to thee," her husband did not hear her.

In the morning the witch saw her combing her hair with a beautiful comb, and asked her what she would take for it. The wife replied that she would exchange it for another night with the wood-chopper. The witch agreed to this. But again she gave the man a draught, so that he paid no heed when his wife said, "O wolf of the greenwood! why don't you turn to me? Three poor little babes have I borne to thee." In the morning, before he came out from the power of the draught, the witch came and took him away.

In the afternoon the witch heard the wife playing beautiful music on her accordion, and asked her how much she would take for it. The wife made the same reply as before; and the witch agreed, thinking that she would give the man the sleeping-draught the same as before.

Before night came on, however, the wife escaped the watchful eyes of the witch, and ran into the wood to her husband. She did not tell him who she was, but gave him a sponge, and told him when the witch gave him the draught that night to pretend to take it, but really to pour it into the sponge. The witch watched him so carefully that he had to pretend to get choked. Then, when the witch went for water to help him, he poured the draught into the sponge; and when she returned, he pretended that he had swallowed it.

That night the wife told her husband all that had happened to her; so in the morning, when the witch came into the room where they were, the husband fell upon her and killed her. Then he and his wife went down the mountain and got their children, after which they returned to the witch's house, and lived happily ever after.

GRANNY STEEL

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Hoffman, W. J. "Folklore of the Pennsylvania Germans III." Journal of American Folklore 2 (1889): 192–193.

Date: 1889

Original Source: Pennsylvania

National Origin: German American

---

The legend of "Granny Steel" describes of a benign haunting. Granny Steel's spirit is bound to the spot of death by an untimely death, but unlike many revenants, she does not seek restitution for a wrong committed by the living. The elimination of supernatural visitors by reversals, in this case counting backward, is a widely held traditional concept.

---

When Granny Steel was dead, there was a silver quarter [of a dollar] found in her wind-pipe, and it was said that she had undoubtedly been strangled by it. Anyhow, her ghost used to go about the house at all hours of the night. They used to hear it go up and down stairs, the doors opened and closed of their own accord, and in various ways it made itself very uncanny to those who dwelt in the house; for all that they knew there was no danger to be apprehended, inasmuch as old Granny had been a good old soul.

One of the members of a family who once lived there was a half-witted girl, who imagined that it would be well to go to a fortune-teller about this ghost. The fortune-teller told her to go home, to close all the doors in the house except one, and to sit in the dark to await the arrival of the ghost. The instant that it began to ascend the stairs she should count the number of steps. Then, when the ghost had finished its wanderings up-stairs, and was about to come down, she was to follow it, coming down backward, and to count aloud the number of steps taken by the ghost in ascending.

This the girl did, from first to last; and since that time the ghost of old Granny Steel has not been heard.

JAKE STRAUSS

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Hoffman, W. J. "Folklore of the Pennsylvania Germans III." Journal of American Folklore 2 (1889): 193–194.

Date: 1889

Original Source: Pennsylvania

National Origin: German American

---

In spite of Jake Strauss' apprehensions, there is no real evidence of witchcraft in the following narrative. The fright Jake Straus suffers is likely due to his superstitious nature fed by a guilty conscience. Although this is presented as a local legend, this anecdote featuring a local character most closely resembles "Clothing Caught in a Graveyard" (AT 1676B).

---

Jake Strauss had the name of being very superstitious, and he also believed in witches.

Late one night, as he was returning toward home from courting, and he had a considerable distance to go, he thought that by going across the fields he might reach home before the old folks had risen in the morning. One of the fields through which he had to pass was overgrown with brambles and vines, and he had not gone far when the vines made him fall down. Then he instantly thought that the witches had caused this, and that he could appease them by giving them a little tobacco; so he threw down a piece and began to run. He did not proceed far before falling again, and as he arose he again threw down a piece of tobacco to keep off the witches.

In the beginning Jake was well provided with plug tobacco, of the variety called horse-leg, but by the time he had crossed that field and paid the witches he had nothing left. Still he considered himself fortunate in not sustaining greater injury than the loss of his tobacco and a lacerated skin.

Jake used to have great times in telling of his misfortunes through the witches. Everything that he possessed, his cattle, chickens, and ducks, were bewitched, and at last he could no longer raise any ducks at all. Through the spells put upon them by witches, these became so lean that they could no longer pull the blades of grass, through sheer weakness. Then it occurred to him that perhaps the grass might be bewitched, because some of his ducks in attempting to pull up blades of grass pulled themselves out of their skins; then he had the trouble to place them near the fire until a new skin and feathers grew upon the bodies. This was too much for Jake, so he gave up raising ducks.

LAZY MARIA

Tradition Bearer: Mrs. William Buell

Source: Gardner, Emelyn E. "Folk-Lore from Schoharie County New York." Journal of American Folklore 27 (1914): 307–310.

Date: 1914

Original Source: New York

National Origin: German American

---

According to folklorist Emelyn Gardner, the tradition bearer comes from a family known for traditional arts such as divination and supernatural healing as well as storytelling. This ordinary folktale embodies the familiar quest images, formulaic elements, contrasts between siblings, and supernatural encounters that mark this genre. The most familiar version of this tale is the Grimms' "Mother Holle" (AT 480).

---

Once upon a time there lived a man with three daughters, who, as he thought, were old enough to look out for themselves. So he called them to him, and said, "It is time to go out in the world and seek your fortune. I'll start the oldest first. Go and see what luck you have in the world!"

So the oldest girl took her bundle of clothes tied up in a big kerchief, and away she went. After a while, just as she was beginning to feel hungry, she saw standing right near her a cow. The cow said, "Milk me, milk me, or my bag will bust! Milk me, milk me, or my bag will bust!"

No sooner had the cow said this, and the girl was wishing for something to milk the cow into, than she espied right near the cow an oven. From it came a voice, which said, "Take me out or I'll burn up! Take me out or I'll burn up!"

The girl looked inside the oven to see what was talking, and there was a fine loaf of bread. She took it out, dug the center out of it, and filled the hollow with milk from the cow, then had a meal of bread and milk. She said, "The old man sent me out, and I must be doing well."

After she had eaten all the bread and milk she wanted, she went on her way. Pretty soon she came to an apple tree full of apples. "Shake me, shake me, or my limbs will break! Shake me, shake me, or my limbs will break!" said the apple tree.

So the girl shook the tree until her lap was full of apples. When she had eaten all the apples she wanted, she put some in her kerchief and went on her way. Towards dusk she came to a fine-looking mansion, and she thought she would inquire if they (the occupants) wanted anybody to work for them. Seeing a man standing in front of the house, she called out, "Halloo!"

"Halloo!" answered the man, who liked the girl's looks.

"Do you want a girl to work for you?" asked the girl.

"I think we do need one," answered the man; "but my master isn't home tonight, so you had better stay all night. Which door would you like to enter? One is a gold door: if you go in through it, you will be covered from head to foot with gold. The other is a tar door: if you go in through it, you will be covered with tar.”

“Oh, I don’t mind!” replied the girl. “I had just as soon be covered with tar as with gold.”

“You are so humble, you deserve to go through the golden door.”

“I don’t care,” repeated the girl.

Thereupon the man led her through the golden door; and the gold clung to her nose, her fingers, her ears, to every part of her, until she was completely covered with gold. When she was well inside the house, the man said, “We have two places where we put those who come here. Will you sleep under the ladder with the cats and dogs, or will you sleep in the high bed with all your gold and glitter?”

“I’d just as soon crawl under the ladder with the cats and dogs as to sleep in the high bed.”

“Being as you are so humble, I’ll put you in the high bed with all your gold and glitter.”

When she reached the room where the high bed was, she saw that everything was of gold. The gold from everything she touched stuck to her, even the golden sheets; and in the morning, with the golden sheets clinging fast to her, she thought she was rich enough to go home. So home she went.

When the family saw her coming, her father said, “What! Is that lazy whelp coming back? I’ll get the horse-whip and whip her to death!”

The girl, however, as soon as she came near enough to make herself heard, cried out, “O father! I’m rich, rich!”

And sure enough, the father had never seen so much gold in his life as he now saw on his daughter. As soon as he touched her, the gold fell off from her to the ground. The father ordered the girl to tell where she had been. When he heard the story, he decided to send the second daughter to try her luck in the same way.

The second daughter had precisely the same experiences as her sister, and she too returned home “rich, rich!”

Then the father said, “Now for Lazy Maria! She’s never been good for anything yet. Let’s see what she can do!” To her he said, “Even if you are our baby, you must go.”

So Lazy Maria took her bundle on her shoulder and started. Soon she came to the cow, which said, “Milk me, milk me, or my bag will bust! Milk me, milk me, or my bag will bust!”

“Go along, you old bitch! I don’t care if it does,” replied the girl.

Then the voice from within the oven cried out, “Take me out or I’ll burn up! Take me out or I’ll burn up!”

“Burn up, then! I won’t touch you. I won’t work when I’m all tired out,” complained the girl, and went on her way. When she came to the apple tree, it cried, “Shake me, shake me, or my limbs will break! Shake me, shake me, or my limbs will break!”

“Let your limbs break, then! I sha’n’t shake you,” said the girl, and went on. When she came to the mansion, the man on guard told her of the two doors, and asked her through which she wanted to enter. “I want to go through the golden door,” said the girl.

“All right!” and the man pushed her through the tar door. The tar stuck to her hair, filled her eyes, and covered her from head to foot.”

“Oh, my father will kill me!” she cried.

“Where will you sleep, under the ladder with the cats, or in the high bed?” asked the man.

” In the high bed, tar and all,” at once decided the girl.

“All right! Creep under the ladder.” And the man pushed her among the cats and dogs. “You must be more humble,” said he, “if you would get on in the world.”

The next morning the poor girl, all covered with tar as she was, started for home. When the family saw her coming, they rushed out to see the gold; but when they discovered that she was covered with tar instead of gold, they cried, “Let’s whip her!”

“Oh, no!” said her father. “Let’s scrub the tar off!” but, scrub as they would, they couldn’t get it off, because, you see, it had been put on by a witch. They scraped and scraped until they scraped the hair off her head, and the skin off her fingers and toes. At last they scraped off one of her warts, and there lay the witch. At that all the tar fell off, and Lazy Maria was free once more. But while her two sisters were rich and could go and come as they liked, Lazy Maria always had to stay at home, poor.

THE SECRET ROOM

Tradition Bearer: Mrs. William Buell

Source: Gardner, Emelyn E. “Folk-Lore from Schoharie County New York.” Journal of American Folklore 27 (1914): 310–311.

Date: 1914

Original Source: New York

National Origin: German American

---

The following ordinary folktale is unusual if only for the fact that justice is not done at the end of the tale. Perhaps the female protagonist is not held culpable because she is bewitched. The motif of the animal spouse itself, however, is not uncommon.

---

Once upon a time there lived a mother with three daughters, whose duty it was to guard the cabbage-patch in front of the cottage in which they lived. One day they were all sitting in the sun, spinning, when they saw a Bull in the cabbage-patch. "Take your distaff and run, child, run!" said the mother to the eldest daughter. So the girl took her distaff and ran. The Bull ran and she ran, and she ran and the Bull ran, until they came to a great house standing on the edge of a wood.

There the Bull gave her a large bunch of keys, and told her that she could go anywhere in the house she liked except one room. He showed her the key to this room, and told her that she must not unlock the door to which it belonged. Then the Bull went away and left her. The girl took the keys and roamed from one beautiful room to another, until she had seen all except the forbidden room. This she wanted to see more than she had any of the others. At last her curiosity became so great that she opened the door and went inside. What was her horror to discover that the room was full of headless bodies hung on all sides. Quickly she locked the door and ran downstairs. But she had some blood on the key, on her hand, and on her shoes.

As she was trying the best she knew how to get the blood off, along came a big black Cat, which said to her, "Mew, mew, mew! Give me a dish of bread and milk, and I will tell you how to get the blood off your shoes."

"Go away, you old black thing! I am not going to bother with you."

So the Cat went away, and pretty soon the Bull came. "Let me see your keys!" said he. "How came the blood on this one?" Then he asked to see her hands and her shoes. When he saw blood on them too, he knew that she had disobeyed him; so, as he had done with all the others who had disobeyed him, he cut her head off and hung her body up with the others in the forbidden room.

The next day, when the mother and her two remaining daughters again sat spinning in the sun, they again saw the Bull in the cabbage-patch. The mother sent the second daughter just as she had sent the first, and exactly the same things happened to her.

The third day the mother and the youngest daughter sat spinning in the sun, when the mother looked up and saw the Bull a third time in the cabbage-patch. "Take your distaff and run, child, run!" cried the mother.

So the youngest daughter ran, and the Bull ran. The Bull ran and she ran until they came to the great house on the edge of the wood. There the Bull gave her a bunch of keys, and told her that she might open every door in the house except the one whose key he showed her. Then the Bull went away. The youngest daughter did just as her sisters had done, and went into all the rooms except the forbidden one. She kept wondering what could be in there, until her curiosity became so great that she unlocked the door and went in. She, too, was so horrified that she quickly shut the door and ran downstairs, but with the tell-tale blood on the key, on her hand, and on her shoes.

To her came the big black Cat, who said, "Mew, mew, mew! Give me a dish of bread and milk, and I will tell you how to get the blood off your shoes." Instead of telling the Cat to go away, as her sisters had done, she went and got some bread and milk for him. When the Cat had finished eating, he said, "If you will go into the attic, you will find there a sickle. Take it, rub it on the key, on your hand, and on your shoes, while you say, 'Blood, be gone! Blood, be gone!'"

The girl went to the attic, found the sickle, and did with it as the Cat had told her to do, saying, "Blood, be gone! blood, be gone!" Even as she spoke the last word, the blood-stains disappeared.

Then the girl went downstairs, where she found the Bull waiting for her. "Let me see your keys," he said, "and your hands and your shoes!"

When he saw that she had no blood-stains upon her, he suddenly changed from a bull into a beautiful prince. "I was bewitched," he said, "by a girl who loved me, but whom I wouldn't marry because I didn't love her. I killed many a girl when I was a bull; but now we will have the bodies taken care of, and then we will be married." So they buried the bodies, and then were married and lived happily ever after.

SOUTHWEST

---

RANGE LIFE IN TEXAS

Tradition Bearer: Jack Robert Grigsby

Source: Angermiller, Florence. Interview of Jack Robert Grigsby. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers' Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC. <http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/wpaintro/wpahome.html> (October 12, 2005).

Date: 1938

Original Source: Texas

National Origin: Anglo American

---

Most of the historical accounts that find their way into print chronicle significant turning points in political careers, national crises, and major encounters between political systems. The autobiography that follows includes a personal experience narrative about the notorious Billy the Kid, William H. Bonney (ca. 1859–1881), and passing references to lesser known, but no less deadly, gunmen Bill (William Preston) Longley (1851–1878) and George Gladden (a central figure in what came to be known as the Mason County [Texas] War). The Mason County War, also known as the Hoodoo War, took place in the decade after the Civil War. More important, however, the following are the vivid memories of a fairly average man caught up in the turmoil of Reconstruction and the changes brought by the turn of the twentieth century. This is a life that many lived in the Southwest region, but few have passed along to the twenty-first century.

---

I was born in Tyler, Texas, August 26, 1854, coming to this country in November, 1870. I was about sixteen years old when I came here. I was raised an orphan. I don't ever remember seeing my mother, and my father died when I was six or seven years old. After that I lived first one place and another till I came out here.

I started work on a ranch when I first got to this country, working for Will Pruitt. I just lived in the woods, for there were very few people here at that time. I worked for Mr. Pruitt about six years, just working for my board and clothes, and it wasn't many clothes either.

I went part of the way up the trail to Oklahoma, twice with stuff for Will Pruitt. But he would always turn me back at Red River. He knew that I had a half brother living on up in Oklahoma and I always thought he did this so I wouldn't find my brother and stay with him, for he wanted me to work for him. I would come all the way back from Red River alone. Sometimes I would meet up with herds on the way and sometimes I would ride all the way back without seeing anyone.

I have had all kinds of ups and downs in the cattle business. Once we took a bunch of cattle to the old Woodhull ranch out south of Spofford. Part of the herd belonged to Mr. Furness. He had come up here and bought them up, and we got twenty-five cents a head for all we delivered, and furnished ourselves. But we had to pay for all we lost. One night we had camped about where Cline is now and had put the herd in a corner of a pasture for the night. We were herding them too, but along in the night something scared them and they run through all three of those wire fences. As we would turn them from one string they would go into another. But we only lost two. One broke it's shoulder and one got away. It was a steer that belonged to old Man Vogel and three years later Millard Parkerson caught him and sold him for old Man Vogel. But the one that got its shoulder broke didn't cost us anything for it belonged to one of the boys in the bunch.

Our boss wanted to get there with the cattle looking good. So after we crossed Turkey Creek, we heard the train coming and he asked us to take the cattle a mile or so away from the track so the train wouldn't stampede 'em. Well, we all had cattle in the outfit and we made it up to hold them right to the track. So we took our slickers from behind our saddles and whipped the herd right up to the track. We had to do some riding for about two miles, for those cattle really did run. But we stayed with 'em. The boss sure got red but it didn't do him any good.

The next day we got to the ranch and was going down on a creek to camp, and one of the boys roped the pack horseman and he went to pitching and scattered skilletts, frying pans, coffee pots and all our grub everywhere. But we got everything back but our grub. So we went up to the house and told Mr. Furness what had happened. He told us to come on up to the house and stay. So we helped him brand out his cattle, and he give us enough grub to get back home.

Yes, we always used a pack horse to carry our grub for we worked in this rough country and there were no roads, so we had no use for a chuck wagon. Except one time when we made a trip up on the divide above Leakey. Well, there was no road and the wagon broke down. We had gotten ahead with the herd, so some of the boys went back to see what was wrong and to get some corn from the wagon to feed the horses. The man saw a light out across the country and came back and told us it was Indians. So we had to get out and round up the horses. We built a brush pen to put them in and guarded them all night. The next morning we had gotten breakfast and started to eat. But it was always the custom then, when the cowboys were eating, for someone to keep watch for Indians.

Well, one of the boys got up to look and saw a big bunch of men coming. He says, "Boys, here they come!" But it turned out to be soldiers and they had seen us and thought we were Indians. So the boss got up and hollered at them to wait and the officer in charge come on up to the camp. We had killed a beef the evening before, so we gave them part of that and they gave us about twenty-five pounds of coffee.

One time Joe Pan Pelt came to work with our outfit down here about Rio Frio. Well, we always turned all the horses loose at night except one or two we kept to ride after the others next morning. We never cared what we kept up to ride—just anything, no matter how they were. The boys always took it turn about going after the horses in the morning, so it came Joe's time to get the horses. It was a cold, frosty morning and he said he didn't want to get on the horse. But I told him yes, he must go. So he got on the horse and he began pitching and finally turned a somersault with him. He got up and said he couldn't ride the horse again. But I told him we had those horses there to ride and if he didn't ride him I couldn't keep him for I couldn't afford to keep a hand that could not ride the horses. So he got on him again and that time he rode him.

Joe Collins used to come out in this country and buy fat cattle and take them to New Orleans and ship them from there. I have seen him ride into cow camp with a morral (nose bag) full of gold and go off and leave it there maybe all night and no one ever bothered it. I guess if someone had taken it he would have just been killed and that would have been all there would have been to it. There wasn't any court. Uvalde was the nearest post-office.

Old Man Schwartz used to come to the cow camps with his hack peddling dry goods and lots of times he would stay all night. He always went prepared to camp, for them days you couldn't always make it to a house for the night. But he would always sell something to the cowboys, such as gloves and if they didn't have the money they got them just the same. And I don't believe those cowboys ever beat him out of a quarter. He was sure a fine old man. I thought a lot of him.

When I first commenced work for myself I had some awful mean horses. I traded for the meanest ones I could get, so the boys wouldn't ride 'em when I was gone. I had one I only rode every three days. Well, he was so mean I would have to tie him to a tree and beat him up before I could get a bridle on him, for he sure would fight.

I broke a horse down here once for Mart Pruitt. He finally traded him to Calvin Bowles. The horse was getting tender-footed so I met Calvin one day and told him his horse needed shoeing. He said yes, but he was too mean to shoe. But the old blacksmith in Leakey come out and said he could handle him. Well, they brought the horse down and the old blacksmith fooled around him a little while and finally dropped the rope. I said, "Don't do that; he'll run off." He told me to just let him alone he would handle him. So he went in and got his nails and hammer and horseshoes and put the shoes on him and the horse never moved. I don't know what he did to the horse for after that he was just as mean to kick anyone else as he ever was.

Yes, times are quite different now to what they used to be. I remember when Old Man Hanson come in here and taken up a preemption of a hundred and sixty acres. Hatten Elms come along and wanted to trade him out of it. Elms asked him what he would take for it and he said, "Two cows and calves," which meant about eight dollars for a cow and calf. Well, they traded for about a week, and then Elms backed out. So you can imagine about what land was worth then.

Once the Indians come into the country and was stealing horses. Well, we heard of them and the settlers got together and took their trail down here about Rio Frio. We followed them on across the Seco to the Sabinal Canyon and on to Frio Town, down by Old Man Westfall's ranch, which was a big cow ranch. And when we crossed the Frio near where Loma Vista is now, we had run out of food and were sure hungry. We hadn't had anything to eat for several days but a little coffee. There didn't seem to be any stock in that country then. But we finally met a Mexican sheep herder with a herd of sheep and asked him for one. He said we would have to go see the boss. We didn't have time to fool around hunting the boss. So Joe Van-Pelt jumped off his horse and shot at a big old mutton and killed two. We took them on down to a little creek and cooked them and the eighteen of us ate every bit of those two sheep.

The Indians killed nineteen people before they reached the Rio Grande. Well, we went on for a day or two without overtaking them and some of the men got discouraged and kept dropping out till there was only five of us left. We had appointed Henry Patterson as captain. So he decided it was best to go back to Uvalde and wire Lieutenant Bullis for help so he met us here with his Seminole Indian soldiers and we took up the trail again and followed it on to the Rio Grande. But they had already gone across. We could see men riding back and forth and we were satisfied it was these Indians, but we were not allowed to go after them.

They killed one man by the name of Byrd and about five of his men who was herding sheep for him. Mr. Byrd was in his buggy when the Indians overtaken him and after they killed him, they taken everything he had in the buggy and his buggy harness. They cut the leather harness up in little pieces and scattered it along the way. Of course it was of no value to them. But we found it as we followed the trail. They had also gone by the Mount Woodward ranch and killed two or three men there. We didn't see anyone as we passed the ranch. We wasn't bothered about seeing people—we was just following that Indian trail.

Another time we followed a bunch of Indians over on Dry Frio. They had killed a man by the name of Terry and captured his two children a little boy and a little girl. The girl's name was Mattie and the boy's name was Joe. But Joe had fought them so hard they knocked him in the head and left him for dead, right before his little sister's eyes. But he didn't die. Well, we rode all night that night till daylight. At daylight we took up the trail again and overtaken them just before noon. They didn't offer to fight for it was raining and their bow strings were wet. They couldn't shoot and that gave us the best of them.

One old Indian was off ahead of the others and they were crossing a creek when we begin to shoot at them. We followed them on into a shin-oak thicket. After awhile we come into a little opening and just as we got to this opening we saw the little girl. It looked like she had just been kicked off of the horse by the old Indian she was riding behind. She had an Indian blanket wrapped around her and when she saw us she started to run. But we told her to wait, we wouldn't hurt her, so she sat down on the blanket and waited.

We went on after the Indians, still shooting at them every chance we got. Finally we got so close to the old Indian that had dropped the little girl that we could see him kick his horse every jump trying to make him go faster. Anyway, he had a bed tick around him and we found that full of bullet holes and bloody. I don't know if we killed any or not but there was plenty of blood along the trail. He ran on till he got to a ridge and when he went over this ridge and into another thicket, we was close enough to see he carried a long lance in his hand. None of us wanted him bad enough to go in there after him, for you know they can throw those old lances through you.

We got the little girl and started back home. On the way back we found a lot of stuff the Indians had lost, such as goat hides and one buffalo robe. It was cold and everything was wet. So we picked them up and took them to camp and used them for bedding. Just before night someone said, "Do you suppose these things have lice?" But we slept on them just the same. Yes, we got plenty lice.

When we got back to Old Man Shores' where we were in cow camp, we took a big wash pot, got off down on the river and cleaned up. We boiled all our clothes and tied the buffalo robe in the river for about three days. Jim Avant took the little girl on to his home, but he had to stay in camp with the rest till he got rid of those lice. Mrs. Avant took the little girl and combed and washed the lice out of her hair, and washed the paint off of her face that the Indians had put on it. And she put clean clothes on her.

Every family in the whole country wanted the little girl, but she didn't want to stay with any of them. She wanted to stay with us men who had rescued her from the Indians. When they did take her back to her mother, she went with a herd of fat cattle that Pruitt was taking to San Antonio. When they got to San Antonio, she wouldn't get on the stage coach to go home unless one of the cowboys went along, so one of them got on the coach up with the driver and put the little girl back inside with the mail. There was a little window in the top where she could see the cowboy sitting up on top. Well, when they got down the road a piece, they picked up another passenger so the cowboy slipped off and this man took his place. The little girl didn't know the difference. But I never saw her after that.

I knew Billy the Kid. He stayed in camp with us down here about Hackberry once for about a week. He rode into camp one day and his horse was rode down. He told us his name was Word and he wanted to stay a few days. I told him all right. So he stayed on and helped us round up cattle till one day he got into a fight with a Negro we had working with the outfit. Billy cut the Negro across the side of the face and down the back with a long butcher knife. The Negro finally run. And when he stopped, I walked over to where he was and he said, "Mr. Jack, please don't let him hurt me any more!" About that time Billy came up and said, "Oh, shut your damn mouth. I have already done all to you that I want to." Billy stood there and wiped the blood off of the knife with his hands and looked at the cut on the man as unconcerned as if he hadn't done a thing. But he left after that. He was afraid the officers would hear of this and would get him for other things he was wanted for.

When he left camp he went on up to Bill Patterson's ranch and got a job going up the trail to Kansas that spring. They said he stayed with them part of the way back home, but stopped one day away out on the prairie and took his bed but turned his horse a-loose. So they left him right there without a horse. They said they guessed he didn't want to get any closer to Texas.

I knew several other desperados. Among them was Bill Longley, George Gladden, John Beard and Lew Sawyers. They all come through this one winter at different times. They didn't do any kind of work while they was here but they took in all the dances.

There was one man, a desperado, come in to this country one time. I can't remember his name right now. Anyway he stayed over on the West Prong a lot. I don't know what he had done, no telling what. Anyway, while he was staying up on the West Prong, he shot a Mexican one day just to try out his gun. The Mexican was about two-hundred and fifty yards away and as he stooped over to dig a hole this man shot him in the hip. I met the man about a mile down the road just after it had happened but he didn't say a word about what he had done. Well, the (Texas) Rangers come in and got after him and caught him away from home without a horse. But he got away from them and Old Man Lyman Smith helped him get out of the country by exchanging clothes with him so he would be disguised and wouldn't get caught. Those fellows were very peaceful and nice unless trouble come up.

I was married to Miss Jennie Horton in January 1888. We were married right up the river here about a half-mile in my wife's parent's home. We walked on down here after the wedding and have been here ever since. But I had to give a dance at Leakey in the court house that night to keep the boys from shivareeing us. We had a big supper and danced till about four o'clock, then it came up a big, snow storm and we had to go home to keep from freezing. It was one of the biggest snow storms I ever saw in this country. I guess me getting married caused it.

HISTORY OF A BUFFALO HUNTER

Tradition Bearer: Manuel Jesus Vasques

Source: Tejada, Simeon. Interview of Manuel Jesus Vasques. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers' Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC. <http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/wpaintro/wpahome.html> (October 12, 2005).

Date: 1939

Original Source: New Mexico

National Origin: Mexican American

---

The passing of the great bison (buffalo) herds on the Plains has been incorporated into every American school child's history text. The image of the white hide hunters and their Sharps rifles has transcended life into pop culture via media from the "dime novel" to the Hollywood feature film. The reality of this life has not survived into contemporary times. Manuel Jesus Vasques—hunting with a lance from horseback, making his patron a wealthy man while "never holding a single penny in his hand"—intimately knew the reality of life as a buffalo hunter and horse trader. His account is contained in the following personal experience narrative.

---

Don Manuel Jesus Vasques was born in the settlement of Chamisal, Taos County, New Mexico on the 31st day of January of the year 1856. He himself does not know how he came to live at the home of Don Juan Policarpio Romero of the village of Penasco but at the age of eight he was herdboy for a flock of goats belonging to Don Juan Policarpio Romero and continued as such until he married Rosario Fresquez of Penasco.

After he was married he practiced carpentry, making coffins for the dead, during the great smallpox plague of the year 1875. There were days in which four or five deaths occurred and Don Manuel could not make coffins enough to supply the demand and there was no other carpenter in Penasco. Some of the dead were placed on poles and dragged to the cemetery by burros.

While the epidemic raged Don Manuel continued making coffins and when it had subsided in Penasco, Don Juan Policarpio sent him to Ocate, Chacon and Santa Clara, now known as Wagon Mound, to make coffins at those places.

In the year 1877 Don Policarpio sent Don Manuel Jesus Vasques in company with other men to the plains on a buffalo hunt. He left Penasco with a Navajo Indian called Juan Jesus Romero, whom Don Policarpio Romero had raised. Alvino Ortega and Jesus Maria Ortega of the settlement of El Llano de San Juan (Plains of Saint John) as well as some thirty other men went with them on the buffalo hunt. They took with them fifteen ox drawn carts, the oxen's horns were tied securely to the yokes with straps of ox-hide. This group of men met in Penasco on the 15th of November, 1877 before setting out on the hunt.

They set the same day for Mora, there they were joined by more men and more carts, from there they went to Ocate and there also, they were joined by more men and more carts. From this place they traveled as far as the Colorado river which they crossed below what is now the town of Springer in Colfax County. At that time there was not a single house there, or at least they saw none, nor did they see any footprints and there was no trail of any kind.

They were traveling towards the state of Oklahoma and reached Chico, also in Colfax County, New Mexico. At this place they camped for a few days in order to rest their oxen. A meeting was called with the object of placing some one of them at the head of the expedition; votes were cast and Don Alvino Ortega of the Llano de San Juan received a majority of votes and was given the title of "Comandante," Commander.

From this time on nothing was done except at the express command of Don Alvino Ortega, he ordered the oxen to be yoked, he gave the order to make camp, to water the animals, he also ordered mounted men to ride ahead to scout for signs of Indians who might cause them trouble, and to reconnoiter ahead for water for since there was no road over the prairies it was quite possible and dangerous that at any moment they might suddenly come upon a deep canon or swollen stream which they would not be able to cross. These scouts would ride ahead of the caravan, returning to the cam each night.

They passed close to the site of the city of Clayton by way of a spring called El Ojo del Cibolo (Buffalo Spring) and continued across Texas to enter Oklahoma at a point called Punta de Agua (Waterhole). It took them a month to reach buffalo country. At a point called Pilares a buffalo bull was killed which furnished them meat for a few days.

From Pilares the expedition traveled for three or four days more until it reached a river called Rio de las Nutrias (Beaver River). They camped a short ways down the stream and began hunting buffaloes.

The hunt continued until they had killed enough buffaloes to fill fifty carts with the meat. Only the meat which could be cut into large strips was used, that is, the hind quarters, the hump. The buffalo fat was saved also.

The hunt was conducted on horseback and lances were the weapons used. The commander would order the men to form a line placing the hunters mounted on the swifter horses at each end so that when they advanced on a herd of buffalo the ends of the line would lead the rest in an encircling movement of the beasts.

When the men were formed in line and before they launched themselves on the buffalo the Commander would ask that they all pray together and ask the Almighty God for strength in the impending hunt. When the Commander was heard to say, "Ave Maria Purissima" (Hail Holy Mary) the line would move forward as one man the end men on their swifter horses outdistancing the rest so as to encircle the herd which was to be attacked.

Some of the men designated as skimmers followed the hunt driving burros before them. These men skinned the fat cows only for the dead animals were so plentiful that they would ignore the bulls and lean cows.

They would pack the buffalo meat into camp where they would cut it into convenient sized strips after which they would slice it very thin and hang it up to dry on poles. The "cecina" or jerked meat was prepared in the following manner; long strips were cut from the carcasses, for this, men expert at the job were selected. After the meat had cooled it was spread on hides and tramped on until it was drained of blood and then as we have already stated the cecinas were hung on poles to dry in the sun. After it had dried they would stack it up like cordwood, each pile containing enough meat to load three or four carts.

As soon as the Commander thought that sufficient meat had been prepared to fill all of the ox-carts he would give orders to cease killing buffaloes. He then would assign three or four carts to each pile of meat and he himself would divide the meat according to the different kinds, larger pieces, meat from the hump and the tallow; the smaller pieces were anybody's property in any quantity desired.

In loading the meat the same method was used as in loading fodder, some would load the meat on the cart while the owner of the cart would trample it down so as to get as much of a load on the cart as he possibly could and all that the oxen would be able to haul home.

After the carts were loaded a party of ten Plains Indians of the Kiowa tribe suddenly rode into camp. The Indians asked for something to eat and their request was complied with, after they had eaten some of the party thought it would be a good idea to kill the Indians arguing that they were only ten in number and could be safely dispatched whereas if they were allowed to leave they might apprise others of their tribe and return in larger numbers to kill the members of the hunting party and steal the meat. Don Manuel Jesus Vasques opposed this plan. The Indians were ordered out of camp. They retired a short distance but followed the homeward bound caravan for a long distance. The following morning on orders of the Commander the long trek home was begun in earnest.

At the crossing of the Nutrias river the ox-cart belonging to the only American in the party, became stuck in midstream. This American lived in Ocate.

After all the rest of the ox-carts had safely crossed the river, all of the party helped in extricating the American's cart from the river and onto dry land. The actual hunting of the buffaloes lasted one month, the trip to and from the hunting grounds required a month's travel each so that the whole trip lasted three months. It took three months of that winter for the entire trip.

This expedition was free of any dispute or fight of any kind, whatever Don Manuel ordered was executed and the whole expedition got along very agreeably.

When Don Manuel Jesus Vasquez returned to Penasco preparations were being made for another expedition to the country of the Comanches and Cayguas (Kiowas) towards Kansas. Don Manuel Jesus Vasques went on this trip also. The object of this trip was the buying of horses from the Apaches and Kiowas.

On this trip burros loaded with bread were taken along. The bread was a certain kind of bread called Comanche bread. This bread was made of wheat flour but without yeast so that the bread was as hard or harder than a rock; and was traded to the Indians for horses. The Indians were Kiowas and Comanches. A "trinca" of bread was given for each horse. A "trinca" was half a sack of bread or in other words a sack of bread for a pair of horses. At this time the Indians already were receiving some aid from the government and they would feed those who went to trade with them, they had plenty of coffee and sugar. Twenty men went on this trading expedition and they brought fifteen horses back to Penasco with them.

The most of the men who went on this expedition worked for wages, small wages however, no one of them ever made more than 50¢ a day. Yet Don Juan Policarpio Romero never paid Don Manuel Jesus Vasques a single cent for his labors, as shepherd for his flock of goats nor for the making of coffins, nor for his services as a buffalo hunter or horse trader with the Indians, but he did keep Don Manuel and his family. While his patron lived Don Manuel never held one single penny in his hand.

Don Manuel Jesus Vasques who is alive today at the age of 83 says that he never recollects having seen the inside of a school house, but that his patron taught him how to sign his name. Don Juan Policarpio left or designated Don Manuel as one of his heirs and the sons of Don Juan Policarpio Romero gave him four goats and asked him to sign a paper which attested that he had received his share of the inheritance, and he not knowing how to read signed. The Probate Judge at Taos called him before him and asked Don Manuel if he was content and satisfied and upon his answering that he was, he signed the paper or document.

THE ADAMS DIGGINGS

Tradition Bearer: E. V. Batchler

Source: Interview of E. V. Batchler. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers' Project, 1936-1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC. <http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/wpaintro/wpahome.html> (October 12, 2005).

Date: 1938

Original Source: New Mexico

National Origin: European American

---

The following is one of the many legends of lost treasures and goldmines that circulated throughout the Southwest. Many were lured by the tales, but virtually all came away disappointed.

---

Since I came to New Mexico, eighteen years ago, I have heard stories of the wealth of the famous, old, lost Adams Diggings Mine. I have heard at least a dozen different stories and each succeeding story made the mine richer both in actual gold value and romantic interest. As is often the way with lost mines of this type, it all depends on who you listen to, whether the mine gets richer or not. It always seemed strange to me that nearly every old-timer will swear that he knows more about a fabulously rich, lost mine than any other old prospector. He will try to discredit other prospectors who have searched for the mine and in an effort to tell something “bigger”, magnify its riches by many times what others have estimated it at. In reality, none of them know or have the slightest idea as to the value of the lost mine, because it has never been found.

The current story based on a story from the El Paso Herald is that a bunch of men, among them Edward Adams, who purportedly found the mine that was later named for him, organized an expedition to go to California. Their probably starting place was Magdalena. They traveled in a northwesterly direction, until somewhere between Magdalena and old Fort San Rafael, they camped on a little stream.

One of the men noticed gold in the stream and excitedly revealed his discovery to the rest. Adams, who knew a little more about mining than his companions, decided that the gold washed into the stream from a rich outcropping above the camp. Taking his partner, a man by the name of Davidson with him, he left camp and traveled up the canyon about a mile to try to discover the “mother lode”. A little while after they had disappeared around a bend in the creek, the expedition was attacked by Apaches, and as they caught the encampment totally unprepared, the Indians massacred every man in camp.

Adams and Davidson heard the firing, and guessed its cause, took to the cover of the bushes on the nearby hillside. After hiding for several hours, the two men cautiously made their way over the hill and saw that the Apaches had left, secure in the belief that they had killed all the men of the expedition, and had taken all the mules and horses with them.

After burying all the dead, Adams and Davidson knocked a few pieces of gold-bearing ore off an outcropping of quartz that they believed to be the “mother lode”. They then purported made their way to Fort San Rafael, where they said they asked for aid to go back and find the gold and were refused by the officer in charge.

They then made their way afoot and after perilous hardships and a great deal of suffering, came into the little town of Reserve, in what is now Catron County. It is said that they showed the ore to several of the natives, and then after borrowing some money on the strength of the richness of the ore, bought horses and went to Pima, Arizona, where Adams had friends whom he thought had enough money to properly outfit an expedition to return to the place where he had found the gold.

The expedition was organized, and traveled from Pima to Alma and thence to the immediate locality where Adams was supposed to have found the gold. But through some freak of nature of loss or direction, they could not find the gold, or even the place where the men had been massacred. Perhaps it was because Adams and Davidson both were notoriously poor in remembering directions. Many expeditions have been organized since then, but to this day, the Adams Diggings remains as much a mystery as when Adams first told of it.

Now I am going to tell a story that is almost completely at variance with the story printed by the El Paso Herald. It is a first-hand story from the lips of Bob Lewis, pioneer, old-time prospector, cowboy and for the better part of his manhood, a frontier peace officer and a personal friend of Edward Adams. Bob is a big man, well over six-feet and weighing in the vicinity of two-hundred pounds. He always have a jovial greeting and manner, and has the map of Ireland printed all over his face. Big, rough and burly, he has been the bane of many crooks and lawbreaker in his County. He lives in Magdalena. He has been over nearly every section of the southwestern corner of the State of New Mexico, and knows its rugged terrain as well or better than nearly any other man. He is renowned for his lack of fear, and truthfulness. That is why I believe his account of the Adams Diggings far more than any of the others I have heard. Here is the story in his own words:

“Sure I knowed old Adams. I knowed him before he left Magdalena, and after he came back. Never was a bigger old liar. He’d tell a lie when the truth would fit better. He was used to braggin’ and stretchin’ the truth. He was drinkin’ man too. I knowed him to stay drunk six months out of the year, and then go on and throw a big drunk the rest of the year.”

It was in the early part of August, 1864, when Adams and about seven other men organized a trappin’ expedition and started up in the northwestern part of the state to trap beaver. They started early and intended to get their camp set up before cold weather came. They camped on a little stream not far from old Fort San Fafael, which is now Fort Wingate and has been moved a few miles from the old site of Fort San Rafael.

Now I don't know this for certain, but I believe from events which I will try to explain later, that just about dark, a caravan from California stopped and threw camp with Adams party. They had stopped at Fort Wingate two days before and had told the commanding officer that they were transporting between sixty and eighty thousand dollars in placer gold from California to some of the Eastern states. I know that they were never seen after the time Adams party was wiped out by the Indians, so I believe that they camped with Adams party and met the same fate.

I know from Adams personal character, that he was not above ambushing such a caravan. I did not know Davidson, but as he was Adams sidekick, I believe he threw in with Adams and the two of 'em made plans to hijack the California outfit and steal their gold.

An encampment like that, in those days, usually got us an hour or two before daylight, in order to make an early start. It is said that Adams and Davidson made an excuse to go and gather some wood, as wood had been scarce the evening before and they had not been able to obtain a sufficient supply. I believe that Adams and Davidson absented themselves from camp, so they could go down country a few miles and find a suitable place for waylaying the California outfit.

While they were gone, and it must have been just as good daylight came, because that is the time when Indians usually attack, a big bunch of Apaches attacked the camp. So complete must have been the surprise, that the white men could not have had a very good chance to grab their guns and defend themselves. Every man in that camp was killed, scalped and their bodies mutilated, and all their provisions, horses and mules stolen by the Apaches.

When Adams and Davidson returned to camp, they must have congratulated themselves on the luck that had caused them to absent themselves from camp. Rummaging around among the supplies, Adams must have found the gold the California outfit had been carrying. As proof of this, I later saw a handful of this gold that Adams had save when he buried the rest and it was a quality entirely foreign to that part of New Mexico and identical with some I had seen from California Diggins. The pellets were about the size of a pinhead, up to as big as a pinto bean, and I knew that nobody ever found that kind of gold in the parts of New Mexico I have prospected over.

After burying the gold in what they considered a safe place, the two made their way afoot, supposedly, to Fort San Rafael, where they said they reported the massacre to the authorities in charge and petitioned aid from the commanding officer to go back and help them relocate a mine they had found and to view the remains of the Indian attack.

I do not believe this last part, because many years later, I happened to be in Evans, in March 1890, where Adams, who had been drinkin' pretty heavy, related a story of how he had gone to Fort San Rafael, on a certain day (he mentioned the exact date, which I can not now remember) in August, 1864, and petitioned the commanding officer for aid to return to give decent burial to the massacred party and offer him and Davidson, protection while they tried to relocate a rich gold mine.

There happened to be an old, retired Army officer in the saloon who had listened intently to Adams story. This man was Captain Sanborn, who was considered a heavy drinker. However, he did not appear to be drunk at this particular time, and he answered Adams:

“Sir, since the latter part of your speech concerns me, and it is most damaging to my character, I now take it upon myself to refute your statements and call you a contemptible, damned liar. I happened to be the commanding officer of Fort San Rafael at the time of which you are talking. I recall the day of which you speak very clearly and to my knowledge you never set foot in that Fort in your life. It could never be said truthfully that Cap Sanborn ever refused aid to anybody within a weeks ride of my post who needed it.”

“Who’s a damn liar?” bellowed Adams. “Yuh better eat them words Cap, or me an’ you are agoin’ to tangle right here an’ now. Bigod! I don’t like army officers anyway, so I might as well wipe up th’ floor with one of ‘em right now.” Saying which, he started for Sanborn.

Cap Sanborn ran behind the lunch counter and grabbed a big butcher knife and jumped over the counter. Adams ran out the front door and Sanborn chased him for a couple of blocks shouting that Adams was the dirtiest liar that ever lived. He could not catch Adams, and returned to the saloon, where he again told everybody in hearing distance that Adams had not ever been to Fort San Rafael.

From the above incident I drew the conclusion that Adams and Davidson never went to Fort San Rafael at all, but passed a considerable distance to the south in an effort to avoid it. They limped into the little town of Reserve, sore-footed and half-starved.

It was in Reserve that Adams showed a couple of pieces of ore in quartz form that was exceedingly rich, and stated that it was from the mine he had found before the Indians had massacred his party. He made no mention of the California expedition.

I later saw the same samples Adams had shown in Reserve and recalled that Adams had showed me one of the samples before he left Magdalena in 1864. He had told me then that he had given an Indian some whiskey for the samples and had promised him more if he would show him where he got the samples. If Adams story he told in Reserve about these samples had been true, there would indeed have been a substantial claim to his having found a rich mine. But to my knowledge, no ore of similar quality has ever been found, and the Indian who gave the samples to Adams must be long since dead and the place he found the samples will probably never be found.

Adams didn’t dare show any of the gold at that time he had stolen and buried. Therefore he and Davidson separated, Adams going to Pima, Arizona to obtain money and supplies from friends to outfit an expedition to later come back and salvage the gold. Davidson went on a supposed visit to see some relatives in Louisiana.

Adams was successful in his attempt to raise an expedition, and he sent for Davidson who returned from Louisiana and the expedition met him in Alma, a little town just south of Reserve. They could not find any gold, and Adams later made several solitary trips in search of it, but never had any luck.

Several expeditions have been organized and sent forth in an effort to find the Adams Diggings, but all have met with defeat. It was in 1818 that I decided to see if I couldn't find the bodies of the men who were massacred in Adams party. Adams had told me that they had camped about fifteen miles north of three peaks that rose up from the plain and were a considerable distance from any other mountains. I got to thinkin' and the only three peaks I knew of between Gallup and Magdalena, were the Tres Montosas, which are only about fifteen miles west of Magdalena. Figuring about fifteen or twenty miles north of there, I went to North Lake. A few miles north of North Lake, I found the bodies of five men, all buried in one hole. I could find no clue to any gold from anything in the vicinity, so I came back to town and reported the finding of the bodies. It is my belief that the bodies I found were the remains of part of Adams expedition, but of course I can't prove this. But there is one thing I do know. That is that an old fellow I know, found about twenty thousand dollars buried about five miles north of North Lake, and only a few miles from the place I discovered there bodies. This mans name is Jose Maria Jaramillo, and this what he told me. But when I asked him if the twenty thousand was in gold dust, he would not tell me.

That's the way a lot of there old, "rich-nice' stories get started," finished old Bob. "I've heard that the definition of a miner is a damn liar with a hole in the ground. And a prospector is a damn liar without anything but a dang good imagination. You can talk to most of 'em, and dang near ever' one of 'em tells you about some rich prospect they struck. But they're always broke and beggin' a grubstake. If their mines was half as rich as their imaginations, they could take a handpick, and a gold pan and make more money in a month than most bank presidents could by wearin' out a half a dozen fountains pens. It's true that sometimes a prospector does hit it rich, but when he does, he generally don't talk and brag on it, but gets busy and gets some capital interested and starts workin' it. That's my story of the Adams Diggings. It is one of the richest mines in the world in the mind of a danged old liar like I knowed Ed Adams to be, and in the minds of a bunch of old, dream-crazy prospectors who ain't got no more sense than to believe in it."

VICTORIO'S RAID

Tradition Bearer: Maurice Coates

Source: Totty, Francis. Interview of Maurice Coates. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers' Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC. <http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/wpaintro/wpahome.html> (October 12, 2005).

Date: 1938

Original Source: New Mexico

National Origin: European American

---

Victorio's War, which lasted from 1879–1880, was waged against the European Americans who moved into the Southwest after the Civil War. The war followed repeatedly broken promises to provide a reservation to his Warm Springs Apache in New Mexico Territory. Ultimately, Victorio led his band throughout the New Mexico and Arizona Territories waging guerilla warfare, terrorizing residents, and fleeing across the border into Mexico to evade the U.S. Army forces sent to subdue him. In Mexico, Victorio and the remainder of his band, by then numbering fewer than eighty, were penned in and killed in 1880. At its greatest strength, his band numbered fewer than two hundred. The following legend is important both for its account of one of the events in this campaign and for the clash of cultures the narrator's words reveal.

---

In 1878 Jim Keller, Maurice Coates, John Roberts, W. H. Beavers, Robert Stubblefield and Morris Smith and family left Prescott Arizona for the Frisco Valley, where they settled.

Late in May of 1879 we were out in the field plowing when a roving band of Apaches, five in number, fired upon us, we made a rush for the house and after getting our guns we crossed the Frisco river up into the Cedars, we were at the present site of Glenwood when we saw the Indians coming. Deming was going on down the valley to warn the settlers and Houston, Beaver, Keller and I hid, after staking out a horse as a decoy.

We fired on the Indians when they came in sight for they had made for the horse as they were all afoot. Deming came back as he was afraid that the Indians were heavily armed and he was taking too much of a risk to continue on down the valley. We fired too low and broke three of the warriors' legs, one of the warriors had been left on the hill to watch, and the others when we fired ran up the hill to escape.

We camped for the night and the next morning took the trail of the Indian that we had injured that went over the hill we saw an Indian up in the hill covered with a blanket Mr. Foster thinking that the warrior was dead lifted up the blanket and was surprised to find that the man had been asleep. Mr. Foster raised his gun to shoot. The Indian began to beg for his life, but Foster was so disgusted with the raids of the Indians that he pulled the trigger and blowed the Indian's head off.

Terrible was a son-in-law of Victorio and was killed by us during the fight, we soon heard that Victorio was on the warpath as he was going to revenge the death of his son-in-law.

During the month of April, 1880, there were many rumors that Victorio was out. Steve, a sub-chief of the Apaches, was up in the hills, was up in the White Rocks country camping for Indians on the warpath. Steve was on a hunting trip when Victorio arrived on the scene and tried to get him to throw in with him to attack the settlers in the territory. Victorio became angry with Steve because he wouldn't attack the whites, and attacked the sub-chief. Three of Victorio's warriors were killed and Steve left the region.

On April the 28th Victorio made his presence known by appearing at the location of the Conney Mine killing two men. The rest of the party hid out and brought the news into the camp that the Indians had attacked and killed two of their group. Jim Cooney and Jack Chick went to give the alarm while another group went Clairmont to give the alarm. George Doyle and John Lambert remained on the grounds. The tribe soon took over the mining camp and burned the cabins. Around noon one of the braves took a mirror and tied it around his neck. The squaws were soon fighting for a chance to get a glimpse of their dirty features in the mirror.

When Chick and Conney arrived with the news that Bright man and one other had been killed, we began at once to get out and round up the live stock. We spent the entire night on the range hunting the stock.

Conney and Chick went to the Meader ranch to carry the news, and Mr. Meader made the remark that, "Well we have the garden planted and I don't think the Indians are going to bother us." Mrs. Meader remarked that she believed the report and started at once to mold bullets. Conney desired to return to camp, and Mrs. Meader begged him to not leave, but he insisted that he was going and it was not long until the horses of Chick and Conney returned without riders.

When the horses were seen without their riders the alarm was sent out at once. Mr. Elliot rushed over to the Meader ranch and gave the alarm. The Meader family started at once for the Roberts Ranch. On the way over the Indians fired upon the family and as the wagon was between the house and the Indians there wasn't much that the people in the cabin could do to help the family. Agnes Meader Snyder had an arrow shot through her bonnet as near as the Indians came to hitting any of the members of the family. Mrs. Meader had the people to fill of the barrels and tubs with water before the water was cut off, and it was only a short time after the vessels were filled that the ditch was cut.

Five of we men decided to go behind the house and shoot at the Indians. They were out there only a short time when they were fired upon. We made a run for the house. I lost my belt of cartridges and pistol.

There was a horse picketed some forty feet from the house. An Indian tried to get the horse. When he raised up to cut the rope, he was surprised with a shot from Jim Keller's gun. Some time later when it was decided safe to go out to where the Indian was it was found that he had on the gun that had been lost earlier in the day. The body of the Indian was removed during the night from where it was laying.

Wilcox raised up to look over the barricade and was shot through the heart. The only member of the party to be killed after the fight started.

A rescue party was sent from Silver City to the aid of the besieged, but as the Indians left the morning after the fight and were not to be found.

ELFEGO BACA

Tradition Bearer: Elfego Baca

Source: Smith, Janet. Interview of Elfego Baca. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers' Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC. <http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/wpaintro/wpahome.html> (October 12, 2005).

Date: 1936

Original Source: New Mexico

National Origin: Mexican American

---

Elfego Baca (1865–1945) was a lawman, gunfighter, lawyer, and politician at various points in his life. The Frisco Affair that is mentioned in passing refers to an incident that took place in Frisco, New Mexico, when Baca was nineteen years old. Baca was deputized by the local deputy sheriff to arrest a gang of cowboys who had turned murderous. The ensuing events included a gunfight, an arrest, and the death of one of the men whose horse fell on top of him during the excitement. The arrested cowboy was fined for disorderly conduct, and later, Baca was compelled to hold off a reputed eighty cowboys from a refuge in a shack for thirty-six hours. He survived by lying flat on the dirt floor that had been dug to below ground level. From this legendary event, his reputation grew for the next sixty years. In 1958, Disney Studios made a film of his life.

---

“I never wanted to kill anybody,” Elfego Baca told me, “but if a man had it in his mind to kill me, I made it my business to get him first.”

Elfego Baca belongs to the six-shooter epoch of American history. Those were the days when hard-shooting Texas cowboys invaded the territory of New Mexico, driving their herds of longhorns over the sheep ranges of the New Mexicans, for whom they had little liking or respect. Differences were settled quickly, with few words and a gun. Those were the days of Billy the Kid, with whom Elfege, at the age of seventeen, made a tour of the gambling joints in Old Albuquerque. In the words of Kyle Crichton, who wrote Elfege Baca's biography, "the life of Elfege Baca makes Billy the Kid look like a piker." Harvey Ferguson calls him "a knight-errant from the romantic point of view if ever the six-shooter West produced one.

And yet Mr. Baca is not a man who lives in his past. "I wonder what I can tell you," he said when I asked him for pioneer stories. "I don't remember so much about those things now. Why don't you read the book Mr. Crichton wrote about me?"

He searched about his desk and brought out two newspaper clippings of letters he had written recently to the Albuquerque Journal on local politics. The newspaper had deleted two of the more outspoken paragraphs. Mr. Baca was annoyed.

I tried to draw Mr. Baca away from present day politics to stories of his unusual past, but he does not talk readily about himself, although he seemed anxious to help me. Elfege Baca is a kindly courteous gentleman who is concerned to see that his visitor has the coolest spot in the room.

He brought out books and articles that had been written about him, but he did not seem inclined to reminiscing and answered my questions briefly. "Crichton tells about that in his book" or "Yes, I knew Billy the Kid."

Finally I asked him at random if he knew anything about the famous old Manzano Gang which I had frequently seen mentioned in connection with Torrance County.

He replied that he broke up that gang when he was Sheriff of Socorro County.

"There were ten of them," he said, "and I got nine. The only reason I didn't get the other one was that he got over the border and was shot before I got to him. They used to go to a place near Belen and empty the freight cars of grain and one thing and another. Finally they killed a man at La Jolla. Contreros was his name. A very rich man with lots of money in his house, all gold. I got them for that. They were all convicted and sent to the Pen."

Mr. Baca settled back in his chair and made some remark about the late Senator Cutting whose photograph stood on his desk.

I persisted about the Manzano Gang. "I wish you'd tell me more about that gang. How you got them, and the whole story."

"Well," he said, "after that man Contreros was shot, they called me up at my office in Socorro and told me that he was dying. I promised to get the murderers in forty-eight hours. That was my rule. Never any longer than forty-eight hours."

Mr. Baca suspected certain men, but when a telephone call to Albuquerque established the fact that they had been in that city at the time of the killing, his next thought was of the Manzano Gang.

Accompanied by two men, he started out on horseback in the direction of La Jolla.

Just as the sun was rising; they came to the ranch of Lazaro Cordova. They rode into the stable and found Cordova's son-in-law, Prancasio Saiz already busy with his horse.

"Good morning," said Elfego, "what are you doing with your horse so early in the morning?"

Saiz replied that he was merely brushing him down a little.

Mr. Baca walked over and placed his hand on the saddle. It was wet inside. The saddle blanket was steaming. He looked more closely at the horse. At first sight it had appeared to be a pinto, white with brown spots. Mr. Baca thought he remembered that Saiz rode a white horse. "What happened to that horse?" he asked.

The man replied that the boys had had the horse out the day before and had painted the spots on him with a kind of berry that makes reddish-brown spots. "Just for a joke," he added.

"Where's your father-in-law?" asked Mr. Baca.

Saiz said that his father-in-law had gone the day before to a fiesta at La Jolla and had not returned.

"I understand you're a pretty good shot," said Sheriff Baca. "You'd better come along, and help me round up some men I'm after for the killing of Contreros in La Jolla." Saiz said that he had work to do on the ranch, but at the insistence of Mr. Baca, he saddled his horse and rode out with the three men.

"About as far as from here to the station," went on Mr. Baca, "was a graveyard where the gang was supposed to camp out. I rode over to it and found where they had lunched the day before. There were sardine cans and cracker boxes and one thing and another. Then I found where one of them had had a call to nature. I told one of my men to put it in a can. Saiz didn't know about this, and in a little while he went over behind some mesquite bushes and had a call to nature. After he came back I sent my man over, and by God it was the same stuff—the same beans and red chili seeds! So I put Saiz under arrest and sent him back to the jail at Socorro with one of my deputies, although he kept saying he couldn't see what I was arresting him for."

Mr. Baca and his other deputy proceeded in the direction of La Jolla. Before long they saw a man on horseback coming toward them.

"He was running that horse like everything. When we met I saw that he was a Texan. Doc Something or other was his name. I can't remember now. But he was a pretty tough man."

"You a Sheriff?" he said to Mr. Baca.

"No," replied Mr. Baca, "no, I'm not a Sheriff. Don't have nothing to do with the law, in fact."

"You're pretty heavily armed," remarked the man suspiciously.

"I generally arm myself this way when I go for a trip in the country," answered Baca, displaying his field glasses. "I think it's safer."

"Well, if you want fresh horses, you can get them at my ranch, a piece down the road," said the Texan.

Mr. Baca figured that this was an attempt to throw him off the trail, so as soon as the Texan was out of sight, he struck out east over the mountains for Manzano. Just as he was entering the village he saw two of the gang coming down the hill afoot leading their horses. He placed them under arrest and sent them back to Socorro with his other deputy.

It was about two o'clock in the morning when Mr. Baca passed the Cordova ranch again on his way back. He roused Lazaro Cordova, who had returned from La Jolla by that time, and told him to dress and come with him to Socorro.

"The old man didn't want to come," said Mr. Baca, "and kept asking what you want with me anyhow?" I told him that he was under arrest, and on the way to Socorro I told him that unless he and his son-in-law came across with a complete statement about the whole gang, I would hang both of them, for I had the goods on them and knew all right that they were both in on the killing of Contreros. I put him in the same cell with his son-in-law, and told him it was up to him to bring Saiz around. They came through with the statement. I kept on catching the rest of the gang, until I had them all. All but the one who got himself shot before I caught up with him."

"If you ever go to Socorro you ask Billy Newcomb, the Sheriff down there now to show you the records. You might see the place on the way down where they buried a cowboy I shot. It's a little way off the main road though.

"That was a long time before I was a real Sheriff. In those days I was a self-made deputy. I had a badge I made for myself, and if they didn't believe I was a deputy, they'd better believe it, because I made 'em believe it."

"I had gone to Escondida a little way from Socorro to visit my uncle. A couple of Texas cowboys had been shooting up the town of Socorro. They hadn't hurt anybody that time. Only frightened some girls. That's the way they did in those days—ride through a town shooting at dogs and cats and if somebody happened to get in the way—powie!—too bad for him. The Sheriff came to Escondida after them. By that time they were making a couple of Mexicans dance, shooting up the ground around their feet. The Sheriff said to me 'Baca, if you want to help, come along, but there's going to be shooting.'"

"We rode after them and I shot one of them about three hundred yards away. The other got away—too many cottonwood trees in the way.

"Somebody asked me what that cowboy's name was. I said I didn't know. He wasn't able to tell me by the time I caught up with him."

I asked what the Sheriff's name was, and when Mr. Baca said it was Pete Simpson, I said, "The one you were electioneering for the time of the Frisco affair when you held off about 80 cowboys for over thirty-six hours." This is the one of Mr. Baca's exploits that has been most frequently written about.

“Hell, I wasn’t electioneering for him,” he said. “I don’t know where they got that idea. I couldn’t have made a speech to save my life. And I didn’t wear a Prince Albert coat either. They didn’t have such things in this country in those days.”

“Is it true that you ate dinner afterward with French and some other men who had been shooting at you, and talked the affair over,” I asked.

“I ate dinner with some men afterward but I don’t remember who they were now. I don’t think that man French was there at all, although he must have been in the neighborhood, as he seemed to know all about it. But I don’t remember him. Jim Cook was one that was shooting at me though. He was a pretty tough man, but he came near getting it.”

He showed me a photograph which Jim Cook had sent him recently. The picture showed an old man who still looks as though he could not be easily trifled with. It was inscribed “To Elfego Baca in memory of that day at Frisco.”

“Did you see the letter that Englishman wrote to Crichton?” He wanted to hang me. “Why don’t you hang that little Mexican so-and-so?” he asked. I said, “Why don’t you be the one to do it?” and pulled my guns, and wooo, he wasn’t so eager. You know I surrendered only on condition that I keep my guns. They placed six guards over me, but they rode twenty-five steps ahead of me all the way to Socorro.

“Those were great old days. Everything is very quiet now, isn’t it?” said Mr. Baca looking up. “I think I’ll run for something this fall, but I don’t know what yet.”

THE GHOST PENITENTE

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Espinosa, Aurelio M. “New Mexican Spanish Folklore.” Journal of American Folklore 223 (1910): 397–398.

Date: 1910

Original Source: New Mexico

National Origin: Spanish American

---

Los Hermanos Penitente, the Brotherhood of Penitents, are a religious society operating outside the boundaries of official Roman Catholicism. They demonstrate their piety by acts of self-flagellation, cross-bearing, and on Good Friday, the crucifixion of a member.

---

A certain evening during holy week the Penitentes entered the church in Taos for the purpose of flogging themselves. After flogging themselves in the usual manner, they left the church. As they departed, however, they heard the floggings of a Penitente who seemed to have remained in the church.

The elder brother (hermano mayor) counted his Penitentes, and no one was missing. To the astonishment of the other Penitentes, the one in the church continued his flagellation, and they decided to return. No one dared to re-enter the church, however; and while they disputed in silence and made various conjectures as to what the presence of an unknown Penitente might mean, the floggings became harder and harder.

At last one of the Penitentes volunteered to enter alone; but, as he opened the door, he discovered that the one who was scourging himself mercilessly was high above in the choir, and it was necessary to obtain a lighted candle before venturing to ascend to the choir in the darkness. He procured a lighted candle and attempted to ascend. But, lo! he could not, for every time he reached the top of the stairs, the Penitente whom he plainly saw there, flogging himself, would approach and put out his candle.

After trying for several times, the brave Penitente gave up the attempt, and all decided to leave the unknown and mysterious stranger alone in the church. As they departed, they saw the mysterious Penitente leave the church and turn in an opposite direction. They again consulted one another, and decided to follow him. They did so; and, since the stranger walked slowly, scourging himself continuously and brutally, they were soon at a short distance from him.

The majority of the flagellants followed slowly behind; while the brave one, who had previously attempted to ascend to the choir, advanced to the side of the mysterious stranger and walked slowly by him. He did not cease scourging himself, though his body was visibly becoming very weak, and blood was flowing freely from his mutilated back. Thus the whole procession continued in the silence of the night, the stranger leading the Penitentes through abrupt paths and up a steep and high mountain.

At last, when all were nearly dead with fatigue, the mysterious Penitente suddenly disappeared, leaving his good companion and the other Penitentes in the greatest consternation. The Penitentes later explained that this was doubtless the soul of a dead Penitente who had not done his duty in life, a false Penitente, and God had sent him back to earth to scourge himself properly, before allowing him to enter heaven.

CURANDERAS AND BRUJAS

Tradition Bearer: Maria Antonia

Source: Bourke, John G. "Popular Medicines, Customs and Superstitions of the Rio Grande." Journal of American Folklore 7 (1894): 142–143.

Date: ca. 1894

Original Source: Texas

National Origin: Mexican American

---

John G. Bourke's comments on the following legends offer the cultural outsider's perspective on brujeria (Spanish, "witchcraft") and curandismo (Spanish, "curing") in the Southwest region. See "Witch Flights" (page 283) and "Witches Discovered" (page 284) for the insider's perspective on these traditions.

---

Maria Antonia was emphatic in her expression of belief that there were lots of "brujas" (witches) around, who took delight in doing harm to you personally, or in spreading sickness among your cattle, blighting your crops, or ruining your fruit trees. Everybody believed in witches; there might be some fool "Americanos" who would say they did not, but she was sure that they were only talking for talk's sake.

Once there was a man down here (Rio Grande City, Texas) who owed a washerwoman five dollars and refused to pay her. Now this washerwoman was a witch, and she filled this man full of worms, but Maria Antonia was called in just in time and gave him a strong emetic and a strong purge, and then dosed him with a decoction of Yerba de Cancer, Yerba Gonzalez, and Guayuli, and expelled thirteen worms ("gusanos") with green heads and white bodies.

Tradition Bearer: Sam Stewart

Source: Bourke, John G. "Popular Medicines, Customs and Superstitions of the Rio Grande." Journal of American Folklore 7 (1894): 144–146.

Date: ca. 1894

Original Source: Texas

National Origin: Mexican American

The last punishment inflicted for witchcraft within the limits of the United States was that imposed by Judge Sam Stewart of Rio Grande City (Fort Ringgold), Texas, in 1886.

As nearly as I can arrange the story from my notes and my recollection of the judge's account, it was about like this: A young man of good Mexican family was slowly wasting away under the attack of a disease, the exact nature of which quite baffled the local medical talent. All the medicines on sale in the "Botica del Aguila" (Eagle Drug Store) had been sampled to no purpose, and the sick man's condition had become deplorable. The physicians, who disagreed in everything else, concurred upon the one point that he had but a few days longer to live. At this juncture, a friend suggested to the mother that she call in one of the numerous old hags, who, under the name of "curanderas," combine in equal portions a knowledge of kitchen botany, the black art, humbuggery pure and simple, and a familiarity with just enough prayers and litanies to give a specious varnish to the more objectionable features of their profession.

The “curandera” responded promptly, and made her diagnosis almost with a glance of the eye.

“Your son,” she said to the grief-stricken mother, “has neither consumption nor paralysis. The doctors can’t tell what ails him, but I can see it all, and with the power of God can soon make him well again.”

“What is the matter with him, then, my dear little friend?”

“Black Thomas cats. When I came into the room, the floor was a foot deep with Thomas cats which had jumped out of your son’s throat, but they became frightened when they saw me and scampered back again. I’ll soon get rid of them all.”

Her intentions may have been good, but she got rid of nothing. Her “remedies” produced no effect, and the patient kept on sinking.

Just then a rival “curandera” came up to the mother and said, “That woman is deceiving you. She don’t know what she’s talking about. Why your son never has been troubled by Thomas cats, but I can tell you at once what ails him.”

“Tell me, then, in the name of God.”

“It is bull-frogs. I can see them jumping over each other and running into and out from his mouth.”

To make a long story short, the first “curandera” would not give up the case, but insisted on holding on to what, in the language of today, would be called a decidedly soft snap, and the town, as is usual in such cases, taking up a quarrel in which it didn’t have the slightest interest, became divided into the two bitterly hostile factions of the “bull-froggers” and the “Thomas-catters.” The street became blocked with a crowd of partisans and excitement ran high. Judge Stewart surrounded the whole gang and had them run down to court, where he dismissed all but the ten “curanderas” (for there were ten altogether), who were loudly proclaiming their influence with witches.

“Have you ever seen any witches?” he asked of the first.

“Oh yes, indeed, many times. Why only last Wednesday, the witches picked me up at midnight and took me out on the Corpus Christi road, and up above the clouds, where they played pelota (football) with me, and when they got tired of that, they dropped me into a mesquite thicket, and here you see my clothes all torn to rags to prove that I am telling the truth.”

The next one said she could get into any house, no matter whether the doors were open or shut.

The third could tell where to find hidden money, and so on through the list.

The judge wasted no time on the culprits, but fined them all ten dollars apiece, and sentenced them to a month each in the county jail, and when they begged for clemency and told him that they were poor humble women, he brusquely replied, “That’s nothing. You can all get out through the keyholes, and you all know where to find buried money to pay your fines. That is all there is about it.”

WITCH FLIGHTS

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: "Witchcraft in New Mexico." Journal of American Folklore 1 (1888): 167–168.

Date: 1888

Original Source: New Mexico

National Origin: Mexican American

---

This series of legends gives the general outlines of brujeria (often translated as "witchcraft"), a practice that embodies elements of both indigenous and Christian belief. The bruja (female) or brujo (male) is generally considered to constitute the opposite end of the spectrum of Hispanic magical-religious practice from the curandero (male healer) or curandera (female).

---

Every paisano in New Mexico can tell you the witches' strange habits, their marvelous powers, and their baleful deeds. They never injure the dumb animals, but woe to the human being who incurs their displeasure. Few, indeed, are bold enough to brave their wrath. If a witch asks for food, wood, clothing, or anything else, none dare say her nay. Nor dare any one eat what a witch proffers; for, if he does, some animal, alive and gnawing, will form in his stomach.

By day the witches wear their familiar human form; but at night, dressed in strange animal shapes, they fly abroad to hold witch meetings in the mountains, or to wreak their evil wills. In a dark night you may see them flying through the sky like so many balls of fire, and there are comparatively few Mexicans in the territory who have not seen this weird sight!

For these nocturnal sallies the witches wear their own bodies, but take the legs and eyes of a coyote or other animal, leaving their own at home. Juan Perea, a male witch, who died here in San Mateo some months ago, met with a strange misfortune in this wise: He had gone off with the eyes of a cat, and during his absence a dog knocked over the table and ate up Juan's own eyes; so the unfortunate witch had to wear cat's eyes all the rest of his life.

"Before they can fly, witches are obliged to cry out, 'Sin Dios, sin Santa Maria!' (Without God and without the Holy Virgin) whereupon they mount up into the air without difficulty. If you are on good terms with a witch you may persuade her to carry you on her back from here to New York in a second. She blindfolds you and enjoins strict silence. If you utter a word you find yourself alone in some vast wilderness, and if you cry, 'God, save me!' you fall from a fearful height to the ground, but are luckily never killed by the fall. There are several courageous people in the territory who have made journeys thus upon the backs of witches.

“Lorenzo Labadie, a man of prominence in New Mexico, once unknowingly hired a witch as nurse for his baby. He lived in Las Vegas. Some months afterward there was a ball at Puerta de Luna, a couple of hundred miles south, and friends of the family were astonished to see the nurse and baby there. ‘Where is Senor Labadie and his family?’ they asked. The nurse replied that they were at a house a few miles distant, but too tired to come to the ball. The friends went there next day and found the Labadies had not been there. Suspecting the nurse to be a witch, they wrote to Don Lorenzo, who only knew that the nurse and baby were in his house when he went to bed, and there also when he woke up. It being plain, therefore, to the most casual observer, that the woman was a witch, he promptly discharged her.”

WITCHES DISCOVERED

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Espinosa, Aurelio M. “New Mexican Spanish Folklore.” Journal of American Folklore 223 (1910): 397–398.

Date: 1910

Original Source: New Mexico

National Origin: Spanish American

---

In the Southwest region, witches were traditionally believed to take on the shapes of owls, foxes, and coyotes to work their evil deeds. As seen in other belief tales, the appearance of similar wounds on a human suspect after the wounding of a witch in animal form is a common method of discovering guilt.

---

In a certain village in northern New Mexico, which was considered a favorite rendezvous for witches, a certain house had been surrounded for various nights by owls and foxes (the fox is another animal whose form witches like to take). Fearing harm from witches, since the hooting of the owls and the howling of the foxes had become almost insufferable, men went out to meet them with bows and arrows. The owls and foxes disappeared in all directions, with the exception of one old fox, which had been wounded near the heart by an arrow. No one dared to approach the wounded fox, however; and the next morning it was discovered that an old lady, a witch, living near by, was in her death-bed, with an arrow-wound near the heart.

On another occasion a man was riding on a fast horse and saw a fox. He started in pursuit; and after a long chase, when the fox was very tired and was already dragging its tongue along the ground, a sudden transformation took place. At a sharp turn of the road the fox stopped, and the rider did the same.

To his amazement, he at once perceived a gray-haired woman sitting on a stone and panting in a terrible manner. Recognizing in her an old woman who was his neighbor, and whom he had suspected of being a witch, he went his way and troubled her no more.

The *bruja*s (generally women) are women who are wicked (pautadas con el diablo) and non-Christian. By confessing their sins to a priest, repenting, and abandoning their devilish ways, they may become good Christian women.

A certain witch desired to forsake her evil ways and save her soul, since those who die witches cannot expect salvation. She confessed to a priest, and gave him a large bundle in the shape of a ball, which consisted largely of old rags, and pins stuck into it, the source and cause of her evil powers.

The priest took the diabolical bundle and threw it into a fire, where, after bounding and rebounding for several minutes in an infernal manner, it was consumed, and the compact with the Devil ceased (ya no estaba pautada con el diablo).

METEOR HELL! CICERO DONE IT

Tradition Bearer: Harry Reece

Source: Bowman, Earl. Interview of Harry Reece. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers' Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC. <http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/wpaintro/wpahome.html> (October 12, 2005).

Date: 1939

Original Source: Arizona

National Origin: European American

---

As with the following narrative “Them Petrified Buzzards” (page 290), this tall tale is attributed to “Uncle” Steve Robertson and recounted by his nephew Harry Reece. Like “Them Petrified Buzzards,” “Meteor Hell! Cicero Done It” is atypical in its exaggerated focus on the rigors of the Arizona climate. The narrator further adopts a “persona” who lies with the greatest sincerity while cursing “some danged liars.” As is commonly the case with tall tales, this story abounds with pseudo-verifications as in the following: “if they don’t believe you, take ‘em out there an’ show them th’ Hole, its still there ain’t it? They can see for themselves th’ damned thing’s there—An’ that ought to be proof enough for anybody.”

---

“My Uncle Steve Robertson told me how the ‘Great Hole’ (which some people think was made by a meteor) happens to be out in the very middle of the vast, almost level Arizona desert. He told me about it one night when we were camped over in the Lost River country where we had gone with a pack outfit, aiming ultimately to get up into the Stanley Basin part of the Sawtooth Mountains and perhaps get ourselves a mountain sheep or, if our luck was good, maybe a mountain goat.

“My Uncle Steve was such a great pioneer in the very Far West that there were few things indeed whether of natural, human or animal phenomenon of those early settler days which he could not tell about and that too with the greatest of sincerity.

“So, Uncle Steve told me about the ‘Big Hole.’”

“We had been out through the ‘lavas’ where there are many strange sink-holes, lava-pots, and other weird and ghostly formations in the volcanic desolation of that mighty interesting corner of Idaho. (I think that it has been made into a National Park by the Government and is now called “The Craters of The Moon). Anyhow, it’s fascinating and one kind of feels like he is ... on the desolate Moon when he is wandering around in the silence that is always there.

“After supper, both of us entirely full of Little Lost River trout, we were lying by the camp fire listening to the coyotes and just sort of thinking ... maybe about what we’d seen that day, so I mentioned to Uncle Steve that once down in Arizona I had come onto a Great Hole, several hundred feet deep and nearly a mile across from lip to lip, right out there in the flat desert and as far as I could see there wasn’t the slightest excuse for it being there.

“But some people, I told my Uncle Steve, had the idea that a big meteor had fallen there one time and caved in the earth and that probably that was why the hole was there.

“My Uncle Steve then told me just how it happened...”

“Yeah, I-Gawd, since you mention it, I remember that damned hole out there in Arizony,” my Uncle Steve exclaimed. “In fact, by gosh, Bob White and me was right there and practically saw it made.... But, Meteor, hell, Cicero done it. ‘twant no dammed meteor a-tall!

“But maybe, to be plumb reliable an’ truthful an’ not ‘xaggerate an’ stretch things like some danged liars does, Bob an’ me wasn’t on the ‘xact spot where th’ hole is when she was made, an’ maybe we didn’t ‘xactly see th’ cussed thing made, but I-Gawd we was as clost as anybody ought to be an’ we sure as hell heard her when she was made. They ain’t no doubtin’ that!

“An’ like I said, twasn’t no cussed ‘meteor’ that made it. ‘Cicero’ which was Bob’s and my goat done it an’ he done a hell of a good job when he done it.

“That was one thing I admired about ‘Cicero’. He was one of th’ thoroughest damned goats I ever seen an’ when he done anything ... whether it was eatin’, or buttin’ or, I-Gawd, even smellin’ he done it right or he didn’t do it a-tall.... Fer instance, if Cicero started to eatin’ anything he et it all ‘fore he’d quit, if he started to buttin’ anything he’d keep buttin’ the danged thing till he busted it or butted it out of his way, that’s all there was to it; an’ when it come to smellin’, well, hell there jest ain’t no describin’ how p’rsistent he was about that!

“But Cicero was a Papago Injun goat (to be plumb honest an’ truthful, Bob an’ me stole him from some Papago Injuns an’ thats how we come to have him in the’ first place) an’ that’s that way the Papago Injun goats is. They ain’t nothin’ they won’t undertake an’ when they undertake it, I-Gawd they finish it up.

“Bob an’ me’d never possessed a goat back in Arkansas an’ natcherally when him an’ me an’ Mam (she was Bob’s wife) went out to Arizony an’ we heard about th’ buttin’ power of them Papago Injun goats, Bob an’ me thought that by rights we ought to git ourselves one jest to see if all we’d heard about ‘em was th’ truth, besides we figgered that probably we’d need one some time.... ‘Cause we’d heard how powerful they was in an emergency when it come to buttin’. Why, I-Gawd all th’ freighters haulin’ ore from Bisbee an’ so forth always had a Papago Injun goat in their outfit so’s when they’d git stuck in th’ sand with a load of ore an’ their six or eight mule-team couldn’t budge it they’d jest take their Papago Goat back a ways an’ turn him loose an’ tell him to butt th’ hind end of their wagon an’ I-Gawd he’d butt her a couple of butts an’ away they’d go! What them six or eight mules couldn’t do, that danged Papago Injun goat could accomplish with jest a few brief butts....

“So, when Bob an’ me got a chance we stole Cicero an’ took him home. “Mam (Bob’s wife) wasn’t so hellish enthusiastic about Cicero when she first saw him.

“My Gawd,” Mam says when she saw Bob an’ me leadin’ Cicero up to the’ ranch, “what have you danged fools gone an’ brang home now? Ain’t there enough disagreeable features on this cussed desert out here in Arizony without you goin’ an’ gittin’ a doggone Papago Injun goat for a body to be dodgin’ an’ also smellin’ all th’ time? Jest when I’m gittin’ used to smellin’ Arizony skunks an’ Arizony vinagaroons an’ Arizony carrion when a steer or cow dies an’ the buzzards let it ripen too long before cleanin’ it up, I-Gawd you go an’ bring home a danged Papago Injun goat for me to also smell—When I married you, Bob White, I promised to ‘love, honor an’ obey’ but darned if I promised to smell Papago Injun goats for you! So, you can take him right back where you got him or take him out behind th’ corral an’ shoot him, I don’t give a dang which, before he butts th’ britches off of you an’ Steve Robertson an’ smells me out of house an’ home!

“But Bob he always had a soothin’ way with wimmen so he jest said, ‘Why, Mam, Steve an’ me thought Cicero would be a kind of surprise to you an’ we stole him jest so you could have somethin’ else to smell a while besides them other things an’ he’d be a sort of change for you—But now you go an’ scold us for bringin’ him home! You’ve plumb hurt our feelin’s Mam ‘cause we brung him home jest for you an’ now you go an’ ... an’ ... resent him! I-Gawd, you see, Steve,” Bob says, “that’s the way it is—A Man goes an’ does his damndest to do somethin’ for a woman like stealin’ a goat for her to smell or something an’ then she gives him hell for it! That’s th’ way wimmen is, they never appreciate nothin’ an’ I-Gawd I don’t blame you for shyin’ off from ‘em like you do Steve an’ never gittin’ married or nothin’....”

“Bob winked at me when he said it an’ ‘course I knowed he was jest ‘soft-talkin’ Mam but I-Gawd it worked an’ Mam repented and said, ‘Alright, dadgum you, Bob White—you know cussed well no woman can resist that, danged honey-tongue-of Yourn—If it hadn’t been for it I’d still be down in Arkansas enjoyin’ paw-paws an’ persimmons in Mam an’ Pap’s peaceful home down on th’ old Sac River! So, you an’ Steve Robertson can keep your cussed Papago Injun goat but I’m promising you one thing and that is that if he ever butts me once I’ll bust him twice! I’ll smell Him ... but I’ll be danged if I’ll be butted by him, that’s all there is to it, Bob White!”

“So, Bob an’ me kept Cicero an’ if we hadn’t there probably wouldn’t be that damned Big Hole out in th’ middle of that Arizony desert you mentioned a while ago....

“To start with, that danged hole wasn’t a hole but was Injun Head Butts ... one of them cussed mountains that sticks itself right up all alone as if it doesn’t want any other mountain neighbors close to it ... Sort of like Big Butte, over there th’ other side of Lost River Sinks, where we was today.

“An’ Injun Butte was practically solid rock to begin with ... jest a great big bump of rock stickin’ up out of the’ desert.... Then, I-Gawd, Cicero turned that damned Butte into a hole in th’ ground!

“Yeah, it wasn’t no danged ‘Meteor,’ Cicero done it.

“I-Gawd, I ought to know. Bob White an’ Mam an’ me an’ Cicero was there when it happened.... After it happened, well, Bob an’ Mam an’ me was still there but where th’ hell Cicero was ... that’s a mystery nobody ain’t ever solved yet an’ I don’t reckon they ever will!

“It happened th’ year before th’ big dry spell, th’ one I told you about, maybe you remember it, when it got so dry an’ hot that even th’ damned buzzards wheelin’ around up in th’ sky an’ practically everything else includin’ th’ cattle an’ the trees out in th’ forest jest up an’ petrified from th’ heat and th’ dryness....

“Well, Bob an’ Mam an’ me decided to take a trip up to North Arizony an’ see if maybe there wasn’t better grazin’ for our cattle up there than there was down along th’ Santa Cruz river in south Arizony where we’d started our cow-outfit when we come out from Arkansas, so we traveled up there.

“Natcherally, Cicero went along. Bob an’ me had trained him to go along with us wherever we went with a wagon-outfit so if we got stuck in the sand he could butt us out like th’ ore freighters had their Papago Injun goats do when they got stuck.

“So, we got up there to where there was a little spring ... Arsenic Springs they called it ‘cause th’ water would physic anybody worse than hell but it was all there was an’ they had to drink it anyhow ... about two miles from old Injun Head Butte an’ we camped there.

“Everything would a’been all right only there was a couple of prospectors already camped there who was figgerin’ on doin’ some prospectin’ on Injun Head

Butte 'cause a old Hopi Injun Chief had told 'em there was a lost gold mine somewhere on th' Butte.

"Them damned prospectors had a whole burro load of dynamite with them an' had spread it out in th' shade of a Joshua tree to sort of cool off and ... Well, to make a long story short, while Bob an' Mam an' me was gittin' our camp set an' not payin' much attention to Cicero th' damn fool found that dynamite an' 'fore he quit he'd et every last cussed stick of it!

"Th' first thing Bob an' me knowed about what had happened was when one of th' prospectors ... Dirty Shirt Smith was his name ... caught Cicero jest swallerin' th' last damned stick of dynamite they had, an' he come runnin' over to our camp yellin' 'Hey, your cussed doggone goat has et up all our dynamite every damned drop of it! Now, how th' hell is Solemn Johnson (that was th' other prospector's name) an' me goin' to do any balstin' to find that damned lost gold mine that old Injun Chief told us was on Injun Head Butte? How th' hell are we goin' to—You gotta pay us for that dynamite your goat et!"

"I ain't worryin' about payin' for your damned dynamite," Bob up an' told him. "What I'm worryin' about is that cussed goat runnin' loose around here with all that high explosive in him. If he ever gits th' idea that 'cause our wagon's standin' still we're stuck an' need buttin' out, or if he starts in to practicin'g buttin' like Papago Injun goats does, well, Gawd help us all, that's all I can say!"

Mam she got excited too an' says, "White, for Gawd's sakes, you an' Steve Robertson figger out some scheme to keep that goat from stirrin' around much till he either sweats all that dynamite out of his system or digests it or something. If he goes off anywheres clost to us there wont be nothin' but fragments of us left! For Gawd's sake tie him up or something but do it an far away from camp as possible—Maybe you'd ought to give him a dose of castor oil, that might help!" Mam says.

"Yeah," Bob says, "an' who th' hell would straddle him an' hold him while I'm givin' it to him ... an' take a chance of him goin' off while they're straddle of him?"

"Mam realized th' danger of it an' didn't insist on us givin' Cicero castor oil.

"So Bob an' took Cicero an' tied him to a Joshua tree about a hundred yards from camp an' everything seemed safe an' sound for th' time being.

"Mam, she quieted down an' after supper we all went to bed ... lettin' the white Arizony moonlight stream over th' desert calm an' serene like.

"Fore I went to bed I looked out where Cicero was tied an' he was layin' there peaceful an' quiet as if eatin' sixty or seventy sticks of dynamite was jest a incident an' didn't have no significance a-tall....

"Bout three o'clock in th' mornin' I reckon it was I waked up all of a sudden with a sort of p'resentiment—I think that's what you call it when you think somethin' terrible's about to happen—pressin' down on me. Anyhow, I felt it in my marrow that Gawd only knowed what might take place any minute....

"Natcherally, when I was a little a waker I remember about Cicero eatin' that dynamite an' the first thing I done was to peer out through th' moonlight an' see if he was still tied to th' Joshua tree an' still keepin' still till th' dynamite was absorbed out of his system—

"I-Gawd, that's when I got a shock. Cicero was gone.

"He'd gnawed his rope in two an' escaped.

"Then I snuck over to where Bob was sleepin' an' shook him an' says, 'Bob, fer Gawd's sake wake up! Cicero's loose an' prowlin' around somewhere with all that dynamite in him an' Gawd only knows what's liable to happen!'"

Bob waked up and says, "My Gawd, Steve, don't wake Mam ... she's tired an' needs her rest (Bob was always like that, awful considerate of Mam) an' besides if she wakes up an' realizes Cicero's loose she'll raise hell an' I'm too dammed worried to have any woman raisin' hell with me at this time of night! But where th' hell do you reckon Cicero's gone to, Steve?"

"Danged if I know," I told Bob, "but th' chances is he's wanderin' around in th' moonlight huntin' something to practice buttin' on—Only, I-Gawd, I says, 'if he find it I hope to Gawd it's a good ways from camp!'"

"I-Gawd, so do I," Bob said. An' then it happened—

"Sounded jest exactly like th' world had come to a end.

"Th' long an' th' short of it was, th' next mornin' there wasn't no danged Injun Head Butte out there on th' Arizony desert. There was jest a hell of a big hole in th' ground where she had been.... Bob an' me knowed what had happened.

"Cicero had wandered around huntin' somethin' to practice butting on an' in that moonlight he'd saw Injun Head Butte.... She looked danged good an' solid so he thought he'd practice on her. An', natcherally, when he hit here with all that dynamite in him he jest went off. That's all there was to it.

"An' when he went off he jest ripped old Injun Head Butte out by th' roots ... an' there couldn't be nothin' left but jest a hole where she had been!

"So, that's the way it was—An' I don't give a dang what anybody says—even them cussed 'scientists' that thinks they know such a hell of a lot ... an' that that Big Hole out in Arizony was made by a meteor ... gits crazy ideas sometimes. They jost don't know th' inside story of them things like us Pioneers of th' Far West does, that's all.

"But th' next time anybody tells you that that hole was made by a 'meteor' jest tell them, 'Meteor hell, Cicero done it' ...

"An' I-Gawd, if they don't believe you, take 'em out there an' show them th' Hole, its still there ain't it? They can see for themselves th' damned thing's there—An' that ought to be proof enough for anybody...."

THEM PETRIFIED BUZZARDS

Tradition Bearer: Harry Reece

Source: Bowman, Earl. Interview of Harry Reece. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers' Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress.

American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC. <http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/wpaintro/wpahome.html> (October 12, 2005).

Date: 1938

Original Source: Arizona

National Origin: European American

---

This tale, attributed to Steve Robertson and recounted by his nephew Harry Reece, develops a typical tall tale theme in its exaggerated focus on the rigors of the Arizona climate. More than a playful attempt to enhance a regional reputation, a narrative of this sort, by implication, increases the stature of those who are able to survive the rigorous natural elements they describe—in the present case, a blistering summer whose heat petrifies buzzards in midair—and live to tell the tale. Therefore, it functions as tongue-in-cheek bragging. The repudiation of lies and liars that precedes and follows this tale is a typical way of framing such narratives. Moreover, Uncle Steve’s tale, in relying on the audience’s ignorance of the West, is typical of the tall tales included in explorers’ accounts of their exploits. See, for example, the literary contributions of Karl Friedrich Hieronymus Baron von Münchhausen, an eighteenth-century German aristocrat so noted for telling tall tales that his name became synonymous with the genre.

---

My Uncle Steve Robertson was a native of the State of Missouri or Arkansas; he was not certain which, because he said he was born so close to the line that sometimes he thought it was on one side and sometimes on the other.

He also said that one reason he didn’t remember which State it was, was because he started Out West when he was so young that it really didn’t matter whether he was born in Missouri or Arkansas; he was satisfied just to be born, and was willing to let it go at that.

Anyway, my Uncle Steve Robertson was a great pioneer in his day, before any government irrigation projects were built in the West, and he knew all about shooting bear and deer and fighting Indians, and settling in out-of-the-way places where people had to depend mostly on themselves and each other and there were not any electric lights or telephones or radios or WPAs or PWAs or AAAs or things like that to distract their attentions, and post offices were quite far apart indeed. So, people depended to a large extent upon themselves and not to any great extent to or on anything else.

My Uncle Steve’s idea of “Out West” was anywhere west of the east line of the Indian Territory (Uncle Steve never did get around to calling it “Oklahoma” because he said that did not seem natural!). He also thought that “Out West” was bounded on the south by the Big Bend country of the Rio Grande and on the north by the last peak of the Bitterroot Mountains in Idaho and which leaned over into Canada. So, Uncle Steve had quite a large idea of what “Out West” really was, and he also had quite a lot of experience with it...

Naturally, also, my Uncle Steve Robertson accumulated a vast knowledge of and quite a few strange experiences during the many years he was a great “pioneer” of the far “out west” and which, I am sorry to say, quite a lot of people in New York, and especially around the Washington Square district, do not yet realize ever existed—or for that matter may still exist to some extent.

Also, my Uncle Steve used to say that the one damned thing he could not endure was ... “a danged double talkin’ liar ... one of them ‘rubber-tongued’ persons who ... could stretch the truth till she would crack, and keep on stretchin’ it, and still expect people to believe it.”

My Uncle Steve always began his “tall tales,” (for I am afraid that they were “tall” tales, and some of them very tall indeed!) with the preliminary statement that he “just couldn’t stand any damn person that ‘zagerates!”

When we were on a fishing trip one time he told me about how the petrified forests of Arizona happened to be petrified—and also about “the petrified buzzards” ... It was a hot and dry season and I had mentioned it because the water in the creek where we were fishing was almost all dried up, and that was Uncle Steve’s excuse to tell me about a really hot and dry season he once experienced in Arizona.

“It was back in ... now danged if I remember jest which year it was back in,” Uncle Steve said, “but anyhow it was the year that old Geronimo was loaded on the train at Bowie, Arizona, when the government sent him to Florida to keep him from butchering people in Arizona. Well, that was the year that it was in, and it shore-as-hell was a hot and dry year in Arizona.

“Bob White an’ me had a little cow outfit in partnership down close to the Mexican line, and we was gettin’ along pretty well. We’d took up some land ... about two sections ... and dug some wells and built some ditches so we could irrigate a little ground around the place. We had windmills to pump water out of the wells into a pond and the ditches, and our nine or ten hundred head of cattle had pretty good feed on the range. And outside of havin’ to shoot a few Apaches now and then, before the government got rid of them, we was doin’ fairly well and was contented enough, I reckon.”

At first, “Mam” White, that was Bob’s wife, was a little lonesome because there wasn’t no frogs to croak down by th’ pond or along th’ ditches at night. She said she plumb missed frogs a-croakin’ an’ if there was jest some frogs she could hear croak of a’ evenin’ she’d be about as happy as she used to be back in Slippery Elm County, Arkansas, where she was born, and her pa and ma still lived. Well, Bob was always sentimental and he fixed it for Mam. He sent back to Arkansas and had a few settin’s of frog eggs sent out to her. So, Mam set ‘em an’ they hatched out jest fine, and before long, when the sun went down behind old Apache Peak of an' evenin', frogs was croakin' all over th' place and Mam was plumb happy.

Like I said, everything was goin' smooth an' pleasant and we was prosperous till it began to get hot and dry one summer ... hotter an' dryer, I-Gawd, than anybody'd ever knowed it to be in that part of Arizona before, an' the first thing me realized them damn pumps wasn't suckin' nothing out of them wells but hot air, and th' alfalfa was withered and Mam's marigolds she'd planted by the side of the house was all dead and dried up, too.

And in addition to that, them nine or ten hundred head of cattle Bob an' me had out there on th' range was staggerin' around, so cussed thirsty an' dried out, that when they'd walk their livers and hearts and lungs or whatever was loose inside of them would rattle against their hides like seeds shakin' around in a ripe gourd. Yeah, that's jest th' way they'd sound! And when one of them got tired walkin' around, hearin' hissself or herself as the case might be, rattlin' like a gourd that ain't got nothin' in it but some seeds, and finally laid down, well, danged if he or she or it didn't jest naturally petrify, plumb solid. That's when them poor buzzards got a awful shock.

They'd be wheelin' around, jest wheelin' around watchin' for a cow or a steer brute to topple over, and as soon as they'd see one topple, down they'd swoop thinkin' they'd make a meal on it, and when they'd try to take a bite out of that petrified carcass they'd bust their poor bills off, and there they was ... plumb helpless, so they'd topple over, too—and in a minute they'd be petrified themselves!

Well, the rest of them damn buzzards that hadn't come down and was still wheelin' 'round up there in the hell-blisterin' heat and dryness, would wonder what th' hell had happened to their brother buzzards, layin' down there all petrified beside them petrified cattle; they'd be scairt to come down, and jest keep on wheelin' and wheelin' and gettin' more and more bewildered till damned if they wouldn't petrify themselves up there in the sky without ever knowin' it—and that's the way it was.... Thousands and thousands, hell, millions of buzzards jest wheelin' and wheelin' around 'way up in that hot, sizzlin' Arizona atmosphere—and all so damned petrified they couldn't do nothin' but keep on wheelin' and wheelin' without ever makin' a sound or flappin' a doggone wing—Gawd, it was a gruesome sight!

Yeah, them damned buzzards—all petrified and everything jest wheelin' and wheelin' around up there in th' sky, was a terrible thing to look at, but, I-Gawd, bad off as they was they didn't suffer as much as them poor wild hydrophobia cats that got so dry that they couldn't even foam at th' mouth when they'd have hydrophobia fits ... That was one of the pitifullest sights I ever seen. A poor hydrophobia-cat tryin' to foam at th' mouth when he's havin' a fit, and not be able to do nothin' only spit out a little stream of dry, kind of chalky dust, instead of good rich foam like he'd naturally do! It sure as hell was pitiful to look at....

'But them hydrophobia-cats wasn't no worse off than all them poor ants jest crawlin' around on the sand under th' blazin' sun, without a drop to drink, jest sweltherin' and dryin' up till eventually they'd be in such agony they'd double over an' bite themselves on their own belly-band, an' commit suicide an' perish in misery ... Gawd, I'll bet ten billion ants ... damn nice big red Arizona ants committed suicide on our ranch alone! It's a awful thing to see a poor damn ant so thirsty an' hot an' dried out that it doubles over an' gnaws its own belly-band in two ... It sure is.

Still, I reckon th' worst sufferin' was done by them miserable danged frogs; all them frogs Mam had hatched out from them settin's of frog eggs Bob had had sent out from Arkansas ... They got so dry, they jest kind of shriveled up and all wrinkled sort-of-like, well, like a prune that has been layin' out in th' sun too long. That's jest th' way their hides looked—jest shriveled up an' wrinkled like a prune, or worse. But th' worst of it was when they didn't have no water to waller in any more, and sort of soak 'em up; I-Gawd, when the sun would go down behind old Apache Peak an' them poor frogs would open their mouths and try to croak, like Mam loved to hear 'em do of an evenin', all th' poor damn things could do was jest sort of whistle.... It was terrible, th' most agonizin' and heart-wrenchin' thing anybody can imagine. Yes, sir, I-Gawd, if you ever saw a poor shriveled frog tryin' to croak, and not be able to get anything out but jest a measly little damn whistle, it's th, saddest thing you ever saw!

It sure was distressin'.... Them poor frogs gaspin' out little dinky whistles instead of good solid croaks, was what settled it. When it got that dry, Mam, Bob's wife, couldn't stand it no longer. She'd listen to them frogs tryin' to croak—and jest break down with grief. She jest couldn't stand it. So, finally, after all then buzzards was petrified and most of them ants had committed suicide and them hydrophobia cats “most plumb forgot how to foam at the mouth, and at last them helpless cussed frogs was whistlin' 'stead of croakin,” Mam said to me an' Bob one day, “We're goin' to move out of this cussed place, Bob White and Steve Robertson. When it gets so danged dry that even a buzzard petrifies and even a frog can't croak, I-Gawd, it's time to go somewhere else.” That's what Mam said. And Bob an' me always did believe in lettin' the women folks have their way, so, I-Gawd, we moved. An' damned if I know whether it ever did rain an' bust th' dry spell, or not. Maybe it did an' maybe it didn't. But while we was present it was one hell of a dry spell and I imagine if anybody went down there to that part of Arizona they could still see some of them petrified trees layin' around on the ground ('cause—while I didn't mention it before—even most of th' damn trees got to be petrified, too, before things was done with) an' I also imagine that anybody would probably see some of them poor petrified buzzards still wheelin' an' wheelin' and wheelin' around and around, 'way up there in the air ... never makin' a sound an' never flappin' a wing.... Jest petrified as hell, an' unable to do anything about it!

My Uncle Steve Robertson was a very great pioneer in his day, and no doubt had many wonderful and thrilling experiences in the very far Out West, and—as I said before—he was one of those sturdy old ex-Rebel soldiers who could not endure a danged liar an' despised any ornery man that 'xagerates. Perhaps that is why I loved him; he was my favorite Uncle ... the one with whom I liked best to go fishing, or on camping-out trips.

SOUTH AMERICA

AUROHUAC (COLOMBIAN ARAWAK)

---

TACH THE PROPHET

Tradition Bearer: Unknown

Source: Nicholas, Francis C. "The Aborigines of the Province of Santa Marta, Colombia." American Anthropologist 3 (1901): 641–644.

Date: ca. 1901

Original Source: Aurohuaca

National Origin: Native American

---

The following narrative is set in the historical past as are legends. It focuses on a prophet around whom a cult has grown up; as such, it would qualify as a myth. The conclusion that should be drawn, therefore, is that traditional narrative often does not fit neatly into Western academic categories. Concerning the central figure of the narrative and the cult that developed around him, Francis C. Nicholas writes, "Among other strange beliefs they have a fixed faith in a prophet whom they call the Tach. They say that he came to them out of the sea and that he will return to make them a great people. In the latter part of December or early in January, according to the time of the new moon, they all assemble and dance in expectation of the coming of the Tach. Of their prophet they will say very little, but an Indian told the story to me, though it required urging from a Colombian who had heard it and wished that I should hear the story from the Indians themselves. His account, in brief, was as follows" (641–642).

---

Long ago, longer than the lives of the oldest mamas [leaders] and in the days of their fathers (fathers of the mamas), whose names had been forgotten, a stranger came up out of the sea. His skin was white, but he was not pleasant to look upon because his hair had grown wrong and covered his face, and not his head where it should have been; and the people thought to kill him, but the mamas to whom he first had come, and who were wise, gave hospitality and kept him alive. His dark garment was girt about the waist and flowed below his knees.

When the people saw that no harm came, they were no more afraid, and saw that he had clear, kind eyes. They helped him and he lived among them; but he wanted little, and when the time came that they could hear his voice—that is, when he could speak their language—he taught them all things that were good, and the fathers who lived so long ago that their names are forgotten told their sons, who told it again that the story might be remembered.

This man was the Tach, and his teachings are these: That to worship the sun is right, that it is holy and quickens all life; that gold represents the sun on the earth and it is holy, and those who gather it must hide it and let no stranger look on it, in order that there should be much gold when he returned; and when he came again he promised to make them a great people. And he prophesied, saying that others with hair grown wrong and covering their faces would come, but they would be different and none could trust them, and he who bargained with them would carry away not enough and would give too much. To these strangers no gold should be shown, nor should they see the temple and holy gold (perhaps the golden images of the sun and the bird), because on the day in which they saw them they would carry all away and the sun would be angry and never shine on the mountains again.

And the Tach said, “Live at peace and shed no man’s blood, but cultivate the soil, have gardens, and eat plenty.” And he charged them to live only with their own people and take no strangers, not Indians nor white men with hair on their faces, into the tribe, but remain a people apart, yet hospitable. And if strangers came, to receive them with hospitality, for he came as a stranger and would so return, but that no stranger must stay too long in the land, for that would not be good. Then he taught them all the lore of sins, sickness, and death, and the healing charms of stones on which the sin could rest, and he went away to the sea but will return out of it again.

This is probably their conception of the teachings of a missionary priest who chanced among them and who, seeing gold, thought of the necessities of the church and what a great people the church could make of the Indians if it only had the money; but when they heard of a second coming, the Indians naturally thought that the priest spoke only of himself.

AYMARA

---

THE CREATION

Tradition Bearer: Juan de Betanzos

Source: Bandelier, Adolph F. "Aboriginal Myths and Traditions Concerning the Island of Titicaca, Bolivia." American Anthropologist 6 (1904): 201–202.

Date: ca. 1551

Original Source: Aymara

National Origin: Native American

---

The Aymara are a native South American ethnic group, indigenous to Bolivia and, to a lesser extent, Peru. Although they have retained their ethnic identity into the twenty-first century, the Aymara were subjugated by the Inca Empire. The following myth records the Aymara version of the arrival of the Inca creator and culture hero Viracocha. Compare this narrative to the Inca myth "Viracocha" (page 315).

---

In ancient times, they say, the country and province of Peru was dark, having neither light nor day. In those times there were certain people in it, which people had a certain chief who commanded them, and to whom they were subjected. Of the name of that people and of the chief who commanded them they have no recollection.

And in those times, when all was night in this land, they say that from a lagoon in this country of Peru, in the province called Collasuyo, came a chief whom they called Con Tici Viracocha, who, they say, had with him a certain number of people, which number they do not recollect. And after he had come out of this lagoon he went to a place near it, where today stands a village called Tiaguanaco, in this aforesaid province of the Collao; and when he and his people were, there, they say that at once, and unexpectedly, he made the sun and the day, and ordered the sun to move in the course in which it now moves; and afterward, they say, he made the stars and the moon.

Of this Con Tici Viracocha they relate that he had appeared once before, and on that occasion he made the heavens and the earth, leaving them in darkness, and that when he made the people who lived in darkness as aforesaid, this people did some sort of wrong to this Viracocha, and as he was angered by it he turned to come out again, as the first time, and those first people and their chief he converted into stones, in punishment for the anger they had caused him.”

Then Viracocha made, at Tiahuanaco, men and women out of stones. His companions he told to scatter, and, pointing out to them the people he had created from the stones, said to them, “These shall be called so and so, and will come out of such a spring in such a province, and will settle in it and grow and multiply there and those will come out of such a cave and their name will be so and so, and they will settle in such a place; and as I have them here painted and carved out of stone, so they shall come forth from springs and rivers, caves and heights, in the provinces I have told you and named; and now you go in that direction (pointing to the rising sun) indicating to each one the line which he had to travel.

With himself he kept only two of his followers; the others started on their peregrination, in the direction assigned to them. Each one, as he came to the province designated, called out aloud. “So and so, come forth and settle in this deserted region, for so it is ordered by the Con Tici Viracocha who made the world.” Thereupon the people would come out of the places foretold by the Viracocha.

While these executed his commands in the direction of the east, the great Viracocha dispatched his two companions, one to the south and the other to the north, while he himself went to the northwest toward Cuzco [the center of the Inca Empire]. On his way he kept on peopling the country in the manner described, by creating men and women from rocks, springs, and rivers, and when he reached the site of Cuzco he caused to come forth a chief called by him Alcaviza, and also gave the place its name Cuzco. Con Tici Viracocha continued his journey as far as the coast of Ecuador, where his companions rejoined him. There they all began to walk together on the waters of the sea and disappeared.”

Alcaviza settled the site of Cuzco; and after that settlement had been made, a cavern opened at a nearby place called Pacaritambo, and out of this cave came four men with their women. One of the men was called Ayar Mango, afterward called Manco Capac. Two of the others had a rather strange fate—one being immured alive in a cave and the other becoming an idol. Manco Capac, however, settled at Cuzco with Alcaviza, and through his shrewdness became the first chief of the tribe and the founder of the Incas.

MANCO CAPAC

Tradition Bearer: Anello Oliva

Source: Bandelier, Adolph F. "Aboriginal Myths and Traditions Concerning the Island of Titicaca, Bolivia." American Anthropologist 6 (1904): 221–222.

Date: Unavailable

Original Source: Aymara

National Origin: Native American

The following legend elaborates on Manco Capac who was introduced in the myth "The Creation" (page 299). This narrative offers a rational, as distinct from a supernatural, explanation for events in the life of the founders of the Inca Empire. "The Deluge," alluded to in the beginning of "Manco Capac," is described in further detail in "The Children of the Sun" (page 302). Lake Titicaca, which serves as a major point of orientation in this and other Aymara narratives, is located in the Andes on the border between Bolivia and Peru.

After the Deluge, the first people came to South America from parts unknown, landing somewhere on the coast of Venezuela. From there they gradually scattered over the whole continent, one band reaching the coast of Ecuador near Santa Elena. Several generations passed, many made voyages along the coast and some were shipwrecked.

At last one branch took up its abode on an island called Guayau, near the shores of Ecuador. On that island Manco Capac was born, and after the death of his father Atau, he resolved to leave his native place for a more favored clime. So he set out, in such craft as he had, with two hundred of his people, dividing them into three bands. Two of these were never heard from again, but he and his followers landed near Ica, on the Peruvian coast, thence struggled up the mountains, reaching at last the shore of Lake Titicaca.

There Manco separated from the others, leaving them with orders to divide after a certain time and to go in search of him, while he took the direction of Cuzco. He told his people, before leaving, that when any of the natives should ask them their purpose and destination, to reply that they were in quest of the son of the Sun. After this he departed, reaching at last a cave near the Cuzco valley, where he rested.

When the time had elapsed, his companions started in several groups in search of him. One of these crossed over to the Island of Titicaca, where they were surprised to find a rock, and in this rock a cave lined with gold, silver, and precious stones. Thereupon they sunk the craft in which they had reached the island, and agreed among themselves, if anybody from the surrounding country should appear, to say that they had come out of the cave to look for the son of the Sun.

A few days after, on the day of the full moon, they saw some canoes approaching, and they forthwith retreated to the cavern. Those who came in the canoes, when they approached the cliff and perceived the strangers viewing the cave apparently with the greatest unconcern, were surprised. The strangers gave them to understand that they had just come out of the rock and were in quest of the son of the Sun. This filled the others with profound respect for the newcomers; they worshipped them and made offerings to the rock, sacrificing children, llamas, and ducks.

All together went back to the mainland, and shortly afterward learned that at Pacari Tampu, the son of the Sun, had come out of a cavern, called Capacocco, in great splendor, bedecked with gold, as brilliant in appearance as his father, and that with a sling he had hurled a stone with such force that the noise was heard for more than a league off, and the stone made in the rock a hole as large as a doorway.

At this news all the people of those regions went to see the miraculous being. Manco Capac received them as subjects. On this artifice he began to base his authority and the subsequent sway of the Inca tribe.

THE CHILDREN OF THE SUN

Tradition Bearer: Cristoval de Molina

Source: Bandelier, Adolph F. "Aboriginal Myths and Traditions Concerning the Island of Titicaca, Bolivia." American Anthropologist 6 (1904): 209–210.

Date: ca. 1570

Original Source: Aymara

National Origin: Native American

---

The following is a complete myth of origin. This narrative serves as a supernatural complement to the more mundane explanation for the emergence of Manco Capac from the underworld described in "Manco Capac" (page 301).

---

In the life of Manco Capac, who was the first Inca and from whom they began to be called Children of the Sun and to worship the Sun, they had a full account of the deluge. They say that all people and all created things perished in it, in as far as the water rose above all the highest mountains in the world. No living things survived except a man and a woman, who remained in a box, and when the waters subsided, the wind carried them to Huinaco, which will be over seventy leagues from Cuzco, a little more or less. The creator of all things commanded them to remain there as Mitimas, and there in Tiahuanaco the creator began to raise up the people and nations that are in that region, making one of each nation of clay and painting the dresses that each one was to wear, those that were to wear their hair, with hair, and those that were to be shorn, with their hair cut; and to each nation was given the language that was to be spoken, and the songs to be sung, and the seeds and food they were to sow.

When the creator had finished painting and making the said nations and figures of clay, he gave life and soul to each one, men as well as women, and ordered that they pass under the earth. Thence each nation came forth up in the places to which he ordered them to go. Thus they say that some came out of caves, others issued from hills, others from fountains, others from the trunks of trees. From this cause, and owing to having come forth and commenced to multiply, from those places, and to raving had the beginning of their lineage in them, they made huge and places of worship of them in memory of the origin of their lineage which proceeded from theta. Thus each nation uses the dress with which they invest their huacas, and they say that the first that was born from that place were there turned into stones; others say the first of their lineage were turned into falcons, condors, and other animals and birds. Hence the huaeas they use and worship are in different shapes....

They say that the Creator was in Tiahuanaco and that there was his chief abode, hence the superb edifices—worthy of admiration, in that place. On these edifices were painted many dresses of Indians, and there were many stones in the shape of men and women who had been changed into those for not obeying the commands of the Creator. They say that it was dark, and that there he made the sun, the moon, and stars, and that he ordered the sun, moon, and stars to go to the Island of Titicaca, which is near at hand, and thence to rise to heaven.

They also declare that when the sun in the form of a man was ascending into heaven, very brilliant, it called to the Incas and to Manco Capac as their chief, and said, "Thou and thy descendants are to be Lords and are to subjugate many nations. Look upon me as thy father and thou shalt be my children and thou shalt worship me as thy father." And with these words it gave to Manco Capac for his insignia and arms the suntur pauear [a feathered staff] and the champi [mace-like weapon] and the other insignia that are used by the Incas like scepters. And at that point the sun and moon and stars were commanded to ascend to heaven and to fix themselves in their place, and they did so.

At the same instant Manco Ccapac and his brothers and sisters, by command of the Creator, descended under the earth and came out again at the cave of Paccari-Tambo, though they say that other nations also came out of the same cave, at the point where the sun rose on the first day, after the Creator had divided the night from the day. Thus it was that they were called Children of the Sun, and that the Sun was worshipped and revered as a father.

TWO SONS OF THE CREATOR

Tradition Bearer: Cristoval de Molina

Source: Bandelier, Adolph F. "Aboriginal Myths and Traditions Concerning the Island of Titicaca, Bolivia." American Anthropologist 6 (1904): 210–211.

Date: ca. 1570

Original Source: Aymara

National Origin: Native American

---

"Two Sons of the Creator" introduces a pair of culture heroes who are entrusted with naming species and instructing humans in plant lore and healing arts. Compare the two Viracochas in this myth to the central character in the Inca myth "Viracocha" (page 315).

---

The Creator had two sons, the one called Vmaymana Viracocha and the other Tocapo Viracocha. Having completed the tribes and nations and assigned dresses and languages to them, the Creator sent the sun up to heaven, with the moon and stars each in its place. The Creator, who in the language of the Indians is called Pachayachi and Tecsiviracocha, which means the incomprehensible God, then went by the road of the mountains from Tiahuanaco, visiting and beholding all the nations and determining how they had begun to multiply and how to comply with his commands.

He found that some natives had rebelled and had not obeyed his commands; so he turned a large number of them into stones of the shape of men and women, with the same dress they had worn. These conversions into stone were made at the following places: Tiahuanaco, Pucara, and Yauxa; where they say he turned the huata called Huarivilca into stone, and in Pachacamac, and Cajamarca, and in other parts. (In truth there are great blocks of stone in those places, some of which are nearly the size of giants. They must have been made by human hands in very ancient times; and by reason of the loss of memory and the absence of writing, they invented this fable, saying that people had been turned into stones for their disobedience, by command of the Creator.) Also, in Pucara, which is forty leagues from the city of Cuzco, on the Collao road, fire came down from heaven and destroyed a great part of the people, while those who were taking to flight were turned into stones.

The Creator, who is said to be the father of Ymaymana Viracocha and Tocapo Viracocha, commanded that the elder Ymaymana Viracocha, in whose power all things were placed, should set out from the point and go by way of the mountains and forests through all the land, giving names to the large and small trees and to the flowers and fruits that they bear, and teaching the people which ones were good for food or for medicine and which should be avoided. He also gave names to all the herbs and explained which had healing virtues and which were poisonous. The other son, Tocado Viracocha, which means "I the maker," was ordered to go by way of the plains, visiting the people and giving names to the rivers and trees, and instructions respecting the fruits and flowers. Thus they went on until they reached the sea, whence they ascended to heaven, after having accomplished all they had to do in this world.

CAINGANG (KAINGANG)

---

THE DELUGE

Tradition Bearer: Arakxó

Source: Borba, Telemaco M. "Caingang Deluge Legend." Journal of American Folklore 18 (1905): 223–224.

Date: ca. 1905

Original Source: Caingang

National Origin: Native American

---

The Caingang people are a nomadic Native American group indigenous to southern Brazil. The following myth was collected in the province of São Paulo. Beyond serving as a South American example of the widely distributed motif of the destruction of the world, this myth accounts for the origin of various native species and cultures as well as their behavior and physical attributes, the origins of song and dance, and sources of supernatural knowledge.

---

In times past there was a great flood which submerged all the land inhabited by our ancestors. Only the top of Mt. Crinjijnbé emerged from the waters. The Caingangs, Cayurucrés and Camés swam towards the mountain carrying in their mouths burning wood. The Cayurucrés and the Camés became tired and were drowned; their souls went to live in the center of the mountain. The Caingangs and a few Curutons (Ares) reached with difficulty the top of Crinjijnbé, where they remained, some on the ground, and others (by reason of lack of space) clinging to the branches of trees. There they passed several days without food, for the waters did not subside.

They expected, indeed, to die, when they heard the song of the saracúra birds, who came carrying earth in baskets and threw it into the waters, which slowly subsided. They cried out to the saracúras to make haste, and the birds did so, repeating their song and asking the geese to help them. In a short time they reached the top with the earth, so that the Caingangs who were on the ground could get away. Those, however, who clung to the branches of the trees were transformed into macaques and the Curutons into bugios. The saracúras did their work on the side where the sun rises, and thus our waters all run to the west and flow into the great Paraná. When the waters dried up, the Caingangs established themselves close to Crinjijinbés.

The Cayurucrés and Camés, whose souls had gone to dwell in the center of the mountain, began to open roads in the interior. After much labor they succeeded in getting out by two paths. In the Cayurucré opening broke forth a beautiful valley, very level and without stones, wherefore to this day they have kept their small feet. It was different with the Camés, whose path opened through stony ground, bruising their feet and causing them to swell in walking, hence, to this day, they have kept their feet large. In the path which they opened there was no water, and, being thirsty, they had to beg it from the Cayurucrés, who allowed them to drink what they needed. When they got out from the mountain, they ordered the Curutons to bring the baskets and gourds which they had left below, but the latter, through laziness, remained there and never joined the Caingangs again, for which reason, we, when we meet them, lay hold of them as our escaped slaves.

The night after leaving the mountain they kindled fire, and with ashes and coals made tigers [jaguars], and said to them, "Go, eat people and hunt." And the tigers went about roaring.

As they had no more coal to paint with, they could only make with ashes the tapirs (oyoro), to which they said, "Go, eat and hunt." But these had not come out with perfect ears, and, for that reason, did not hear the order, and asked again what they were to do. The Cayurucré, busy making other animals, said to them in an ill mood, "Go, eat leaves and twigs of trees." This time they heard, and that is the reason why tapirs eat only leaves, twigs of trees, and fruits.

The Cayurucré was making another animal. The teeth, tongue, and some nails were lacking, when it began to grow daylight. Since nothing in the way of making could be done in the daytime, he put into the animal's mouth, in haste, a fine rod, and said, "Since you have no teeth, live by eating ants." That is why the tamandua, or ant-eater, is an unfinished and imperfect animal. The next night they continued and made many animals, among them the bees. At the time these animals were made, the Cayurucré made also others to combat them, for example, the "American lion," venomous snakes, wasps, etc.

After these labors, they set out to join the Caingangs, but found that the tigers were bad and ate many people. In passing a deep river, they made a bridge of a tree trunk, and, when all had crossed, the Cayurucré said to one of the Camés that, when the tigers were on the bridge, he was to push it off so that they would fall into the water and be killed. The Camé did so, but of the tigers some fell in the water and dived, and others leaped on the bank and clung there by their claws. The Came wanted to throw them back into the river, but, when the tigers roared and showed their teeth, he was seized with fright, and let them get away. This is why we have nowadays tigers on land and tigers in the water.

They reached a great plain, where they joined the Caingangs and considered how to marry the youths and maidens. First they married the Cayurucré to the Camés, (girls), and then, as there was a superfluity of men, they married these to the Caingangs (women). Hence the Cayuruces, Comes, and Caingangs are relatives and friends.

Then they wanted to have festivals, but knew neither how to sing nor how to dance. One day some Cayuruces, who were out hunting, saw, at the edge of a clearing in the wood, by the trunk of a great tree, a little clear spot. Against the trunk of the tree were some rods with leaves, and one of them had a gourd stuck on end. They departed and told the Cayurucré about it. He made up his mind to go there the next day and verify the matter. So he went to the clearing cautiously and hid near the trunk. After awhile the little rods began to move slowly from bottom to top and a feeble voice began to sing and the little gourd, with a cadenced movement, produced this sound: Xii, xii, xii... The Cayurucrés approached the trunk, when suddenly all song and movement of the rods ceased, but they continued on the same trunk. He withdrew, and returned the next day with several friends. They cautiously approached the same spot and saw and heard the same things as on the day before. After the first song a voice sang another song. They learned the song, approached the trunk, but saw only the rods. Then they brought them with them, made others like them, and prepared to have a great festival. On that day the Cayurucré opened his mouth and sang the songs which he had heard in the clearing, making with the rod with the gourd on it and with his body the movements he had seen. His companions imitated him, and this is why we learn to sing and dance without knowing who is the teacher.

After some time the Cayurucré met on the road an ant-eater and lifted his stick to kill him. The ant-eater began to dance and to sing the songs heard in the clearing. Then the Cayurucré knew that this was his dancing-teacher. The ant-eater asked for his stick, and after having danced with it, gave it back and said to him, "The child that your wife has within her womb is man, and let this be established between us, that when you or yours meet me and mine and give their sticks and would fain dance with them, it is a sign that your wives will give birth to male children. If they would leave without dancing, the children will be girls." The Cayurucré returned much pleased, and we, when we meet the ant-eater, always renew this experience, which almost always gives certain results. The ant-eater knows many other things we are ignorant of, and we think that they are the first people who through magic took on the form which they now have.

CHILE

---

THE GOOD SERPENT

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Moore, T. H. "The Good Serpent. A Chilian [sic] Fairy Tale in Spanish, el Culebroncito, Literally Big Snake." Journal of American Folklore 1 (1883): 221–226.

Date: ca. 1883

Original Source: Spanish American

National Origin: Chile

---

Chile extends along the Pacific coast of South America bordered by the Andes mountains on the north and Peru, Bolivia, and Argentina to the east. The following tale blends the European ordinary folktale genre with pre-Columbian elements. "The Snake Helper" (AT 533) is found elsewhere in Latin America, especially in the Caribbean. Although the tale more closely adheres to Spanish American than to Native American plot structures, it is likely that the figure of the "Good Snake" in the following narrative has been influenced by the benevolent deity and culture hero Viracocha, who is often associated with a serpent. The serpent in the indigenous cultures that served as one of the bases of contemporary Spanish-Chilean folklore was typically regarded as benevolent rather than malevolent.

---

Thou must know to tell, and understand in order to know that there was a gentleman who had three children; two sons, and a daughter whose name was Mariquita. This one was precisely the darling of her father and brothers. One day when she was in the garden she found a little snake; she took it up and put it in her bosom. There she nursed it, and when it was bigger she kept it inside a trunk. Every day she kept a plate of food, went to the trunk, opened it, and said to the snake, "Sister mine, Florita!"

The snake answered, "What wantest thou, sweetheart?" put out its head and ate the food. Her father noticed this. For whom should she hide away food? and set his servants to spy upon her. When they saw the serpent, that had grown ever so big, they were very frightened, and went running to the master to tell him that the food was for a very horrid animal. The gentleman went to see it, and indeed the sight of the serpent put one in a fright; he ordered a servant to go with it to a wooded height and to kill it. In vain the maiden begged him to leave it with her, since she had brought it up from a very little one, but her father was not willing, only he told the servant instead of killing it, to cast it alive into the wood. The maiden remained weeping very much for her snake, for she liked it as if it were a sister; so she passed many days very sorrowful.

One day her father had to send his two sons with a message to the king, who lived in a neighboring town. Being one day at the king's table, they were relating many things to him (for they were very well instructed in everything), and amongst others they said to him, "We have a very singular sister, for when she laughs she lets fall fine pearls; when she washes her hands, the water next day changes into a block of silver; and when she combs her hair, the hair that falls off becomes golden threads."

"Is this possible?" said the king.

"So possible is it," said the young men, "that we will lose our heads if it be not as we have said."

"Very well," said the king, "I am going to ask for your sister in marriage, and if what you have told me does not turn out true, I will order your heads to be cut off, as a punishment for having deceived me." Soon after he sent messengers to their father, asking him for Mariquita, to become the king's wife. Now, besides the gifts which her brothers had talked of, she was beautiful as the sun, and good.

Her father consented, highly pleased; and sent her to the king, accompanied by her nurse. The latter had a daughter named Estefania, and she and her daughter were very bad-hearted and envious. When they had traveled halfway, Mariquita fell asleep; so Estefania said to her mother, "Can you tell what I am thinking about?"

"What is it?" said she to her.

"That it would be a good thing if we were to put out Mariquita's eyes, and cast her off in this wooded height (now just then they were passing through a thickly wooded spot), and as the king does not know which is Mariquita, we will tell him that I am she, and I shall be married to him."

"Very well," said the old woman to her; so they did so, but seeing that the eyes were very beautiful, they put them in a glass to keep them.

The maiden passed a dreadful night in the wood, for that night it rained and thundered a great deal; she was half dead with pain and cold. The following day there came a little old man to the wood with his little donkey, to get a load of firewood to take to sell in the town, and with the money to buy a bag of bran for his family, for he could not do any better for them. Instead of getting firewood he found the maiden, and moved by pity he took her to his house on his little donkey. The little old man had three bad-hearted daughters, who treated him very badly.

When they saw him coming without firewood and a woman in its stead they began to cry out, "Bad old man, what wilt thou give us to eat today? It will be this woman mayhap? She is coming to bring another mouth to the house that we may come to an end once for all by dying of hunger! Of what use is this blind wench who cannot gain her living?"

The little old man said to them, "Have patience, daughters; this poor creature was in the wood, and I have brought her out of pity. I am going quickly for the load of firewood, and you shall soon have your dinners. I will leave my share and will give it to her." But his daughters scolded him more and more, for that blind wench he would die of want, and then who was going to work for them? At last he managed to pacify them a little, went for the firewood, sold it, and brought them their food.

Meanwhile the daughters ill-treated Mariquita in all sorts of ways, until at last one of them more merciful than the others got them to leave her in peace.

The maiden said to this one, "Little sister, bring me a little water to wash my hands." She brought it to her in a broken earthen pot.

But the others cried out, "What a fine lady! She does not like to go and wash herself in the river!"

But the kind one said, "There now, don't you see that the poor little thing is blind, and might fall into the water?"

She washed her hands, and said, "Keep this water, little sister, till tomorrow."

The old man's daughter said, "But tomorrow I will bring thee fresh water."

Mariquita said, "But I want the same." At last the girl put it away among some shrubs, spilling a little on the ground.

The next day Mariquita said, "Little sister, bring me the water that I asked thee yesterday to keep for me."

She went to bring it, and found in its stead a block of silver, and silver on the ground where the water was spilt; and in bringing it the potsherd came to pieces from the weight of the silver. "What is this," said she, "that I have found instead of the water?"

Mariquita said, "This is silver; tell daddy to go to the town and sell it, for it is worth a great deal, and let him buy for you clothes and food."

The little old man did as Mariquita said; they bought it of him for a great deal of money; he bought plenty of clothes and plenty of food, and went home well pleased, for he had never even dreamed of so much riches.

Mariquita laughed heartily at the surprise of these people; and while she laughed, gathered in her lap the pearls that fell from her mouth. Then she said to the little old man, "Take these, daddy, they are fine pearls; take them to the town and sell them, for they are worth a great deal. Buy more food and all that you need."

Meanwhile she asked the girls for a comb, to comb her hair. They brought her one; for since she had made them rich, they were so kind to her that they did not know what to make of her. She began to comb herself at the corner of the fireplace; and the girls to take care of her feet that she might warm them, put them so close to the fire that it almost burnt them.

She kept the hair that fell from her head, and the next day she had a handful of golden threads. "Take these, daddy," said she to the little old man, "and go to town and sell them, for they are threads of gold. Buy all you need; all that you get for them is for you." The little old man was well pleased, and brought much money to his daughters.

Meanwhile, Estefania had arrived at the king's palace. He received her with great kindness, and married her on the spot. On the morrow he made her wash her hands, and put away the water, but the next day it was nothing but water. He made her laugh, but not a single pearl fell from her mouth. He made her comb herself, and kept the fallen hair, but hair it was, and hair it remained. So he slapped his forehead, and said, "These young men have deceived me; I will order their heads to be cut off!"

He did so, and had their bodies embalmed to be sent to their father. Estefania went on living with the king, and the time was drawing nigh that she was about to have a baby, so that she was full of longings for everything she set eyes on.

One day that Mariquita was sitting in the sun, at the door of the little old man's hut, his daughters saw a big serpent that went towards Mariquita. "Ay!" they said, "come away from there! There is a big serpent, a very dreadful one, that is going to eat thee!"

She said to them, "He will not hurt me, only let him come!" The girls wanted to kill it, but Mariquita would not let them. The serpent came near to her, caressed her a great deal, and began to lick the sockets of her eyes, for it was the same which she had reared from a little snake. It said to Mariquita, "Thy foster sister Estefania will soon have a baby, and all that she sets eyes on she longs for. Send the little old man to the town, let him buy the most beautiful nosegay of flowers that he can find, and take it to sell at the king's palace."

The little old man did so, and when he passed by the palace, cried out, "Who buys nosegays?"

Estefania said to her mother, "I must have that nosegay!" Her mother asked the little old man what it was worth, and he told her that he sold it for eyes.

"Mother," said Estefania, "let us take out the eyes of the dog and give them to him."

The old man took them and went his way; but, before he got home with them the serpent said, "Eyes are coming, Mariquita, but they are not thine, thine will come later."

When the little old man arrived, the serpent said to him, "Throw them away, daddy, they are dog's eyes!"

The next day Mariquita told him to buy another nosegay finer still, and pass by the palace to sell it for eyes. Estefania came out, as on the day before, to buy it, and said to her mother, "Let us take out the cat's eyes, and give them to him."

They did so, and the little old man took them, but before he came home the serpent said, "Eyes are coming, Mariquita, but they are not thine, thine will come later"

So she said to the little old man, "Throw them away, daddy, they are cat's eyes."

The following day, they sent to buy a nosegay more beautiful than the others, with birds singing on the top of it, and the little old man went to the palace to sell it.

Estefania came out to buy it, and said to her mother, "Now we have no more eyes, what shall we do, for I must have the nosegay?"

Her mother said to her, "Dost thou not remember that we kept Mariquita's eyes in a glass; we will see if they are sweet yet."

Estefania said, "So long ago, they must be rotten." They went to look for them, and found them the same as when they had taken them out, so they gave them to him for the nosegay. Before the little old man got home, the serpent said, "Eyes are coming, Mariquita, and they are thine!"

So when he arrived she was well pleased, and said, "These, daddy, are really my eyes." She took them and gave them to the serpent. The serpent licked the sockets, put the eyes in again, and if beautiful they were before, much more beautiful were they afterwards.

The next day the serpent said, "Let us go to the palace. Take this bag of gold ounces, and as the king takes his afternoon nap with Estefania, and has his guards at the door, thou must throw a handful of ounces to the soldiers, and while they are busy in gathering them up, thou must cry at the door, 'Sister mine, Florita!' I will answer, 'What wilt thou, sweetheart?' Thou wilt say—

My servant Estefania
In the king's arms asleep;
Woe is me because of a faithless wretch.

Thou wilt fling another handful of ounces to the guards, and while they pick them up we will escape."

They did so one day, but the king, who had seen and heard all, gave orders to his guards to seize Mariquita and the serpent when they came again. But the guards, busied with picking up the ounces, took no notice of the king's orders. The third day, the king himself got behind the door to seize them, since he could not get his guards to do it, even though he threatened to cut their heads off. When they came the third time, and said the same things, and were running away, the king took hold of Mariquita by her clothes and stopped her.

“What is this, maiden,” said he, “what wert thou saying?”

Therewith the serpent spoke up for her and said, “It is that the wife that your royal majesty has is not Mariquita. She is here; order her to do the wonders which her brothers spoke of.” She then told all that the two wicked women had done with Mariquita on the way to the palace.

The king, very wroth, took her indoors, made her wash her hands, kept the water, and the next day it had changed into a block of silver. He made her comb her hair, and the hair that fell off became golden threads. She laughed and fine pearls fell from her mouth.

The king acknowledged his mistake, and felt very sorry for having killed so unjustly the brothers; he married Mariquita, and ordained great royal feasts, and ordered Estefania and her mother to be broken on the wheel, quartered, afterwards to be burnt and their ashes cast to the winds.

After some time had passed, Mariquita had twin princes. Once when they were lying in the cradle, and their parents fondling them, the serpent came, and said, “Which should you like best; to see, your sons dead, or your brothers alive?”

They answered, “Our sons dead, since they are angels from heaven, and our brothers alive.” The serpent cut the infants’ throats, and led the parents to the place where the bodies of the two brothers lay embalmed, and they found them alive and well. The parents then felt very sorrowful, and went back to weep over their children; when they found them alive, and playing in the cradle.

The serpent said to them, “I have now done all that I can do for you. I have no more business here, for I am an angel sent by God, and I am going back to heaven. Farewell

The tale is finished.

INCA

---

VIRACOCCHA

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Colum, Padraic. Orpheus: Myths of the World. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1930, 275–279.

Date: 1930

Original Source: Inca

National Origin: Native American

---

The Inca Empire centered in Cuzco extended through the territory comprising the modern countries of Peru, Ecuador, Bolivia, Argentina, Chile, and Colombia. As such, it was the largest of the pre-Colombian cultures. To the Incas (and other indigenous cultures), Viracocha was the creator of the sun, moon, stars, human beings (see the Aymara tales “The Creation,” page 299, and “Two Sons of the Creator,” page 304), and civilization itself. Two symbols commonly associated with him are mentioned in the following myth: a golden staff and the chakana (a three-tiered cross). The staff is mentioned directly, while the chakana is mentioned by implication by the blessing of the condor, the puma, and the serpent—the creatures who represent the top, middle, and lower tiers of the cross, respectively. Viracocha commonly traveled among humans disguised as a beggar, a central motif of this myth.

---

In other days we who are of the race of the Incas worshipped the Sun; we held that he was the greatest and most benignant of all beings, and we named ourselves the children of the Sun. We had traditions that told of the pitiable ways that we and the rest of the human race lived in before the Sun, having had compassion upon us, decided to lead us towards better ways of living.... Lo, now! Our Lord, the Sun, put his two children, a son and a daughter, in a boat upon Lake Titicaca. He told them they were to float upon the water until they came to where men lived. He put his golden staff into the hands of his son. He told him he was to lead men into a place where that staff, dropped upon the earth, sank deep down into it.

So the children of our Lord the Sun went upon the waters of Lake Titicaca. They came to where our fathers lived in those far days. Where we live now we see villages and cities; we see streams flowing down from the mountains, and being led this way and that way to water our crops and our trees; we see flocks of llamas feeding on good grass with their lambs—countless flocks. But in those days we lived where there were thickets and barren rocks; we had no llamas; we had no crops; we knew not how to make the waters flow this way and that way; we had no villages, no cities, no temples. We lived in clefts of the rocks and holes in the ground. The covering of our bodies was of bark or of leaves, or else we went naked in the day and without covering to put over us in the night. We ate roots that we pulled up out of the ground, or fought with the foxes for the dead things they were carrying away. No one bore rule amongst us, and we knew nothing of duty or kindness of one to another.

Out of their boat on Lake Titicaca came the children of our Lord to us. They brought us together; they had rule over us, and they showed us how to live as husband and wife and children, and how to know those who were leaders amongst us and how to obey those leaders. And having showed us these things they led us from the land they had found us in. And often did he who was the son of our Lord the Sun drop the golden staff upon the ground as we went on. Sometimes the staff sank a little way into the earth, sometimes it sank to half its length in the earth. We came to a place where the golden staff, dropped by him who was the son of our Lord the Sun, sank into the earth until only its top was to be seen. And there we stayed, or, rather, there our fathers stayed, for we are many generations from the men and women who came into this place with the two who were the children of the Sun.

They showed us how to sow crops in that rich ground, and how to lead water down from the hills to water the crops and the trees. They showed us how to tame the llamas, and how to herd them and tend them as tamed beasts. They showed us how to take the wool from them and weave the wool into garments for ourselves; also, they showed us how to dye our garments so that we went brightly clad in the light of the sun. They showed us how to work in gold and silver, and how to make vessels of clay, and how to put shapes and figures upon these vessels. They showed us how to build houses, and how to build villages, and cities, and temples. And they showed us, too, how to obey the rule of those who were left to rule over us, the Incas.

Then the two who were the son and daughter of the Sun left us. Before they went from us they told us that the Sun, their father, would adopt us as his children. And so we of the Inca race became the children of the Sun. They said to us, too, "Our father, the Sun, does good to the whole world; he gives light that men may see and follow their pursuits; he makes men warm when they had been cold; he ripens their crops; he increases their flocks of llamas; he brings dew upon the ground. The Sun, our father, goes round the earth each day that he may know of man's necessities and help him to provide for them. Be like the Sun, then, far-seeing, regular in all your occupations. And bring the worship of the Sun amongst the tribes who live in darkness and ignorance."

And so these two, his son and daughter who were sent to us by the Sun, were seen no more by us. But we knew ourselves now as the children of the Sun. We subdued the tribes in his name, and brought the knowledge of his beneficence amongst them. We built a great temple to him. And the daughters of the Incas in hundreds served him as Virgins of the Sun.

Yes, but there were those amongst us who came to have other thoughts about Heaven and the ways of Heaven. "Does not the Sun go as another being directs him to go?" one of the Incas said to his councilors. "Is he not like an arrow shot onward by a man? Is he not like a llama tethered by the will of a man rather than like one who has freedom? Does he not let a little cloud obscure his splendor? Is it not plain that he may never take rest from his tasks?"

So men amongst us have said, and they who have said them have mentioned a name. Viracocha that name is. And then they would say words from rites that were known to the people of this land before the Incas came into it. They would say, "O conquering Viracocha! Thou gavest life and valor to men, saying, 'let this be a man,' and to women saying, 'let this be a woman.' Thou madest them and gavest them being! Watch over them that they may live in health and peace! Thou who art in the high heavens, and among the clouds of the tempest, grant this with long life, and accept this sacrifice, O Creator!" So those who were priests in the land before our fathers came into it prayed.

And they said that it was Viracocha who created the Sun, and created the Moon also. They said that at the beginning the Sun was not brighter than the Moon, and that in his jealousy he flung ashes upon the face of the Moon and dimmed the Moon's primal brightness. And they said that Viracocha could make great terraces of rock and clay rear themselves up with crops upon them, and that he could bring the water-courses to freshen terraces and gardens merely by striking with a hollow cane that he carried.

Now although Viracocha was so great, he obscured himself, and came back to live amongst the Gods in the guise of a beggar. None knew him for Viracocha, the Creator of all things. And he saw the Goddess Cavillaca as she sat amongst llama lambs under a lucma tree, weaving the wool of the white llama. He saw her and he approached her. He left a ripe fruit beside her. She ate the fruit and she became with child by him.

And when her child was born her parents and her friends said to her, "You must find out who is the father of this child. Let all who live near come to this lucma tree, and let the child crawl amongst them. The man he crawls to and touches with his hand we will know is his father.”

So under the lucma tree Cavillaca sat, and her child was with her. All who lived near came to that place, and amongst them came Viracocha, still in his beggar’s dress. All came near to Cavillaca and her child. The child crawled where they stood. He came to Viracocha. He put his hand up and touched the man who was in the beggar’s garb.

Then was Cavillaca made ashamed before all the Gods. She snatched up her child and held him to her. She fled away from that place. She fled towards the ocean with her child. Viracocha put on his robes of splendor and hastened after her. And as he went he cried out, “O Goddess, turn; look back at me! See how splendid I am!” But the Goddess, without turning, fled with her child from before him.

Viracocha went seeking them. As he crossed the peaks he met a condor, and the condor flew with him, and consoled him. Viracocha blessed the condor, and gave him long life and the power to traverse the wilderness and go over the highest peaks; also he gave him the right to prey upon creatures. Afterwards he met a fox; but the fox derided him, telling him that his quest was vain. He cursed the fox, saying to him that he would have to hunt at night, and that men would slay him. He met a puma, and the puma went with him and consoled him. He blessed the puma, saying that he would receive honor from men. As he went down the other side of the mountain, he came upon parrots flying from the trees of their forest. And the parrots cried out words that were of ill-omen. He cursed the parrots, saying that they would never have honor from men. But he blessed the falcon that flew with him down to the sea.

And when he came to the sea he found that Cavillaca and her child had plunged themselves into the water and had been transformed into rocks. Then Viracocha in his grief remained beside the sea.

Now beside the sea there were two virgins who were Uрпиуасhас’s daughters. They were guarded by a serpent. Viracocha charmed the serpent with his wisdom, and the serpent permitted him to approach Uрпиуасhас’s daughters. One flew away and became a dove. But the other lived there with Viracocha. And this Virgin of the Sea showed Viracocha where her mother kept all the fishes of the world. They were in a pond and they could not go through the waters of the world. Viracocha broke down the walls of their pond, and let them go through the streams and the lakes and the sea. And thus he let men have fishes to eat.

He lived amongst men, and he taught them many arts. He it was, as the priests of those who were here before the Incas say, showed men how to bring streams of water to their crops, and taught them how to build terraces upon the mountains where crops would grow. He set up a great cross upon the mountain Caraway. And when the bird that cries out four times at dawn cried out, and the light came upon the cross he had set up, Viracocha went from amongst men.

He went down to the sea, and he walked across it towards the west. But he told those whom he had left behind that he would send messengers back who would protect them and give them renewed knowledge of all he had taught them. He left them, but men still remember the chants that those whom he left on the mountain, by the cross, cried out their longing:

“Oh, hear me! From the sky above, In which thou mayst be, From the sea beneath, In which thou mayst be, Creator of the world, Maker of all men; Lord of all Lords, My eyes fail me For longing to see thee; For the sole desire to know thee.”

THE SHEPHERD AND THE DAUGHTER OF THE SUN

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Markham, Sir Clements. The Incas of Peru. London: Smith Elder & Co., 1910, 408–415.

Date: 1910

Original Source: Inca

National Origin: Native American

---

The Incas, as established in their myth “Viracocha” (page 315) and in the Aymara “The Children of the Sun” (page 302), regarded themselves as the children of the Sun deity. As a consequence of divine descent, the supreme Inca—the ruler of the empire—was considered the Sun incarnate. To serve the needs of the deity in human form and to minister to the celestial manifestation of the Sun, special religious orders were enfranchised. Among these religious classes were the Virgins (or Daughters of the Sun). The Virgins of the Sun were chosen at puberty to serve the ceremonial needs of the Sun-centered religion of the Inca and his subjects. They, for example, wove sacrificial cloths, ground the maize used for the principal solar festival of Inti Raimi, and preserved in their convents a portion of the fire generated each year during Inti Raimi. Chuqui-llantu was a Virgins of the Sun. In this role, she had access to the Inca (the Sun), and his family and was expected to carry out sacred duties upon which the lives of all his subjects depended. The dire consequences following her disobedience should be understood in the light of these facts. The motif of transformation into stones is common to this region (see, for example, “Viracocha,” page 315, and “Two Sons of the Creator,” page 304).

---

In the snow-clad cordillera above the valley of Yucay, called Pitu-siray, a shepherd watched the flock of white llamas intended for the Inca to sacrifice to the Sun. He was a native of Laris, named Acoya-napa, a very well disposed and gentle youth. He strolled behind his flock, and presently began to play upon his flute very softly and sweetly, neither feeling anything of the amorous desires of youth, nor knowing anything of them.

He was carelessly playing his flute one day when two daughters of the Sun came to him. They could wander in all directions over the green meadows, and never failed to find one of their houses at night, where the guards and porters looked out that nothing came that could do them harm. Well, the two girls came to the place where the shepherd rested quite at his ease, and they asked him about his llamas.

The shepherd, who had not seen them until they spoke, was surprised, and fell on his knees, thinking that they were the embodiments of two out of the four crystalline fountains which were very famous in those parts. So he did not dare to answer them. They repeated their question about the flock, and told him not to be afraid, for they were children of the Sun, who was lord of all the land, and to give him confidence they took him by the arm. Then the shepherd stood up and kissed their hands.

After talking together for some time the shepherd said that it was time for him to collect his flock, and asked their permission. The elder princess, named Chuqui-llantu, had been struck by the grace and good disposition of the shepherd. She asked him his name and of what place he was a native. He replied that his home was at Laris and that his name was Acoya-napa. While he was speaking Chuqui-llantu cast her eyes upon a plate of silver which the shepherd wore over his forehead, and which shone and glittered very prettily. Looking closer she saw on it two figures, very subtly contrived, who were eating a heart. Chuqui-llantu asked the shepherd the name of that silver ornament, and he said it was called utusi. The princess returned it to the shepherd, and took leave of him, carrying well in her memory the name of the ornament and the figures, thinking with what delicacy they were drawn, almost seeming to her to be alive.

She talked about it with her sister until they came to their palace. On entering, the doorkeepers looked to see if they brought with them anything that would do harm, because it was often found that women had brought with them, hidden in their clothes, such things as fillets and necklaces. After having looked well, the porters let them pass, and they found the women of the Sun cooking and preparing food. Chuqui-llantu said that she was very tired with her walk, and that she did not want any supper. All the rest supped with her sister, who thought that Acoya-napa was not one who could cause inquietude. But Chuqui-llantu was unable to rest owing to the great love she felt for the shepherd Acoya-napa, and she regretted that she had not shown him what was in her breast. But at last she went to sleep.

In the palace there were many richly furnished apartments in which the women of the Sun dwelt. These virgins were brought from all the four provinces which were subject to the Inca, namely Chinchasuyu, Cuntisuyu, Antisuyu and Colla-suyu. Within, there were four fountains which flowed towards the four provinces, and in which the women bathed, each in the fountain of the province where she was born. They named the fountains in this way. That of Chinchu-suyu was called Chuculla-puquio, that of Cunti-suyu was known as Ocoruro-puquio, Siclla-puquio was the fountain of Anti-suyu, and Llulucha-puquio of Colla-suyu. The most beautiful child of the Sun, Chuqui-llantu, was wrapped in profound sleep.

She had a dream. She thought she saw a bird flying from one tree to another, and singing very softly and sweetly. After having sung for some time, the bird came down and regarded the princess, saying that she should feel no sorrow, for all would be well. The princess said that she mourned for something for which there could be no remedy. The singing bird replied that it would find a remedy, and asked the princess to tell her the cause of her sorrow. At last Chuqui-llantu told the bird of the great love she felt for the shepherd boy named Acoya-mpa, who guarded the white flock. Her death seemed inevitable. She could have no cure but to go to him whom she so dearly loved, and if she did her father the Sun would order her to be killed.

The answer of the singing bird, by name checollo, was that she should arise and sit between the four fountains. There she was to sing what she had most in her memory. If the fountains repeated her words, she might then safely do what she wanted. Saying this the bird flew away, and the princess awoke. She was terrified. But she dressed very quickly and put herself between the four fountains. She began to repeat what she remembered to have seen of the two figures on the silver plate, singing, "Micuc isutu cuyuc utusi cucim." Presently all the fountains began to sing the same verse.

Seeing that all the fountains were very favorable, the princess went to repose for a little while, for all night she had been conversing with the checollo in her dream.

When the shepherd boy went to his home he called to mind the great beauty of Chuqui-llantu. She had aroused his love, but he was saddened by the thought that it must be love without hope. He took up his flute and played such heart-breaking music that it made him shed many tears, and he lamented, saying, "Ay! ay! ay! for the unlucky and sorrowful shepherd, abandoned and without hope, now approaching the day of your death, for there can be no remedy and no hope." Saying this, he also went to sleep.

The shepherd's mother lived in Laris some distance from where he tended his llamas, and she knew, by her power of divination, the cause of the extreme grief into which her son was plunged, and that he must die unless she took order for providing a remedy. So she set out for the mountains, and arrived at the shepherd's hut at sunrise. She looked in and saw her son almost moribund, with his face covered with tears.

She went in and awoke him. When he saw who it was he began to tell her the cause of his grief, and she did what she could to console him. She told him not to be downhearted, because she would find a remedy within a few days. Saying this she departed and, going among the rocks, she gathered certain herbs which are believed to be cures for grief. Having collected a great quantity she began to cook them, and the cooking was not finished before the two princesses appeared at the entrance of the hut.

For Chuqui-llantu, when she was rested, had set out with her sister for a walk on the green slopes of the mountains, taking the direction of the hut. Her tender heart prevented her from going in any other direction. When they arrived they were tired, and sat down by the entrance. Seeing an old dame inside they saluted her, and asked her if she could give them anything to eat. The mother went down on her knees and said she had nothing but a dish of herbs. She brought it to them, and they began to eat with excellent appetites. Chuqui-llantu then walked round the hut without finding what she sought, for the shepherd's mother had made Acoya-napa lie down inside the hut, under a cloak. So the princess thought that he had gone after his flock.

Then she saw the cloak and told the mother that it was a very pretty cloak, asking where it came from. The old woman told her that it was a cloak which, in ancient times, belonged to a woman beloved by Pachacamac, a deity very celebrated in the valleys on the coast. She said it had come to her by inheritance; but the princess, with many endearments, begged for it until at last the mother consented. When Chuqui-llantu took it into her hands she liked it better than before and, after staying a short time longer in the hut, she took leave of the old woman, and walked along the meadows looking about in hopes of seeing him whom she longed for. (We do not treat further of the sister, as she now drops out of the story, but only of Chuqui-llantu.)

She was very sad and pensive when she could see no signs of her beloved shepherd on her way back to the palace. She was in great sorrow at not having seen him, and when, as was usual, the guards looked at what she brought, they saw nothing but the cloak. A splendid supper was provided, and when every one went to bed the princess took the cloak and placed it at her bedside. As soon as she was alone she began to weep, thinking of the shepherd. She fell asleep at last, but it was not long before the cloak was changed into the being it had been before. It began to call Chuqui-llantu by her own name. She was terribly frightened, got out of bed, and beheld the shepherd on his knees before her, shedding many tears. She was satisfied on seeing him, and inquired how he had got inside the palace. He replied that the cloak which she carried had arranged about that. Then Chuqui-llantu embraced him, and put her finely worked lipi mantles on him, and they slept together.

When they wanted to get up in the morning, the shepherd again became the cloak. As soon as the sun rose, the princess left the palace of her father with the cloak, and when she reached a ravine in the mountains, she found herself again with her beloved shepherd, who had been changed into himself. But one of the guards had followed them, and when he saw what had happened he gave the alarm with loud shouts. The lovers fled into the mountains which are near the town of Calca. Being tired after a long journey, they climbed to the top of a rock and went to sleep. They heard a great noise in their sleep, so they arose. The princess took one shoe in her hand and kept the other on her foot. Then looking towards the town of Calca both were turned into stone. To this day the two statues may be seen between Calca and Huayllapampa.

SURINAME MAROON

---

HOW MAN MADE WOMAN RESPECT HIM

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Penard, A. P., and T. E. Penard. "Surinam Folk-Tales." Journal of American Folklore 30 (1917): 244.

Date: ca. 1917

Original Source: Suriname Maroon

National Origin: African American

---

Suriname (formerly Dutch Guiana) is located on the northeast coast of South America, bordered by the Atlantic Ocean to the north, Brazil to the south, French Guiana to the east, and Guyana on the west. The Maroons of Suriname from whom the following narratives were collected were slaves of African descent who escaped from the coastal plantations developed by the Dutch and found refuge in the tropical rainforests of the interior. The Maroons established communities (in Suriname and throughout the Western hemisphere) in resistance to the European slave system and many successfully preserved and adapted African arts and cultural practices in "the bush." The following tale shows African influence both by the use of the typical African and African American trickster, the anthropomorphic spider Anansi, and by its deliberately explanatory quality. The words "Er tin tin," are formulaic in this folk tradition and mean, essentially, "Once upon a time."

---

Er tin tin, women had no respect for men. They were always scolding their husbands, and calling them all kinds of bad names, such as "Stupid," "Lazy," "Beast."

Anansi, too, was treated in this manner, and it humiliated him very much indeed. “I must put an end to this,” he muttered. “I’ll teach my wife better manners; I’ll make her respect me. Mi sa sori hem fa watea de go na kokronoto bere” [“I will show her how the water goes into the coconut’s belly,” Suriname creole, roughly, “I will teach her a lesson.”]

Anansi set to work and dug a deep well; and when it was deep enough, he called his wife, and asked her to bring him a ladder so that he could climb out. Scolding and jawing, as usual, she brought the ladder and set it in place. With spade in hand, Anansi climbed out of the pit; but, just as he reached the top of the ladder, he slyly dropped the spade into the pit, pretending that it was an accident.

“Ke!” [loosely, “My goodness!”] he exclaimed, turning to his wife, “I have just dropped the spade into the well, and I am so tired. Tangi tangi, (please) will you go down and get it for me?” His wife scolded him dreadfully, but she went down the ladder to fetch the spade. As she stooped to pick it up, Anansi quickly pulled up the ladder, and his wife was caught in the trap.

She began to rave and tear, called Anansi everything that was bad, and commanded him to lower the ladder; but Anansi paid no attention. He just smiled, and noted with satisfaction that the water was beginning to flow into the new well. And as the water rose, his wife scolded less and less, until it was on a level with her stomach. Then she asked her dear Anansi for the ladder, but Anansi paid no attention. When the water was up to her breast, she beseeched her good Boss (Basi) for the ladder; but Anansi paid no attention. When the water was up to her neck, she tearfully begged her beloved master to lower the ladder; then Anansi gave in. He lowered the ladder; and his wife, wet and shivering, meekly climbed out of the well.

But after that day she became very obedient and respectful; she never scolded her husband any more, and always addressed him as “mi masra” (“my master”). Other women followed her example and also became very obedient; and so to this day every woman respects her husband, and calls him “Basi,” or “mi masra.”

ANANSI EATS MUTTON

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Penard, A. P., and T. E. Penard. “Surinam Folk-Tales.” Journal of American Folklore 30 (1917): 245–246.

Date: ca. 1917

Original Source: Surinam Maroon

National Origin: African American

Anansi is so prominent in the folktales of some African American regions that the tales are referred to generically as “Anansi ‘tory” (Anansi story). Most, but by no means all, of the tales feature this anthropomorphic spider in the central role as trickster, liar, thief, and scoundrel. His guile and ability to change form to serve his own ends are showcased in the following narrative. This tale plot is known throughout the African Caribbean. See, for example, “Nancy Fools His Wife” (page 407).

---

Er tin tin, Anansi’s wife had a fine fat sheep that she herself had raised. Anansi often begged her to slaughter the sheep; but she steadily refused, and scolded him angrily for his greediness. “I will teach my wife not to be so stingy,” muttered Anansi one night as he went to bed.

Next morning he did not get up, but pretended to be very sick. He trembled and shook so, that his wife became alarmed, and asked him what ailed him and what she could do to relieve him.

“Ke!” replied Anansi weakly, “I don’t know what the matter is, but I feel awfully sick.” So he told his wife to consult with the loekoeman [traditional healer], whom she would find under the big kankantri [silk cotton tree, regarded as sacred] in the forest. His wife did not know the loekoeman, but she started out to find him. As she was going out, Anansi requested her to take the children with her. “They make such a terrible noise, that I shall go crazy,” he explained.

Well, as soon as his wife had departed, Anansi jumped out of bed and disguised himself as an old loekoeman. He pulled an old hat well over his eyes, and, hurrying over a short cut which he knew, reached the kankantri before his wife.

After a while his wife and children arrived, and greeted him politely with a kosi [curtsy], without seeing through the disguise. “Ke, mi papa,” spoke his wife, “masra Anansi is very sick. He has convulsions and terrible pains in his stomach, so he has sent me to you for some medicine to cure him.”

The loekoeman consulted with the spirits, shook his head thoughtfully, and said, “My good woman, your husband is a very good friend of mine; and so I will tell you a good medicine to cure him, and it will not cost you anything for the advice. My friend Anansi is very sick indeed; his spirit longs for mutton, and the poor man is slowly dying from this craving. You must serve him a nice fat sheep, nicely cooked, and he alone must eat it. You and the children must not even taste it, otherwise the takroe sani (‘evil thing’) that possesses him will surely kill him. Nothing else can save him.”

Anansi’s wife thanked the loekoeman and left. As soon as she was out of sight, Anansi hurried home over the short cut, removed his disguise, and jumped into bed, where he awaited the return of his wife and children.

In a short while they arrived, and told Anansi what the loekoeman had said. Anansi praised the loekoeman's wisdom. He said that the advice was good, and he felt that the medicine would cure him.

With unwilling hands his wife and children prepared the sheep for Anansi in a most appetizing manner. Anansi ate so much mutton that he nearly burst, while his wife and children looked on with longing eyes. When he had swallowed the last mouthful, he smacked his lips, thanked his wife, and advised his children to follow their good mother's example and never to be stingy or greedy.

JAUW'S DREAM

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Penard, A. P., and T. E. Penard. "Surinam Folk-Tales." Journal of American Folklore 30 (1917): 246–248.

Date: ca. 1917

Original Source: Surinam Maroon

National Origin: African American

---

The following narrative of a prophetic dream and the workings of one man's "good spirit" is unlike the two previous Anansi 'ories in all its particulars except for the formulaic opening. The notion of the spirit helper in the guise of an animal may be a mark of the influence of the neighboring Native American cultures on the Maroon repertoire.

---

Er tin tin, there were two friends, Jauw and Kwakoe, who thought very much of each other. Where any one saw Jauw, he would be sure to find Kwakoe; and where any one saw Kwakoe, he would be sure to find Jauw; they were inseparable. Even at night they went to bed together; and if one of them should fall asleep first, the other would lie quietly beside him until he, too, fell asleep.

Well, one night the two friends went to bed as usual, and it happened that Jauw fell asleep first. Kwakoe, who was lying with his face toward Jauw, was greatly surprised to see a mouse come out of Jauw's nose and noiselessly leave the hut. Kwakoe wanted to find out more about this wonderful animal, for he knew that it could not be an ordinary mouse; so he got up quickly and followed the little beast.

The mouse moved stealthily in the dark shadows, took the road, and entered the forest, through which it led the way to a giant kankantri whose trunk was completely hidden in a tangle of boesitetei [vines] that hung about it.

Cautiously the mouse looked around, and, swiftly climbing up one of the bush-ropes, disappeared between the clumps that grew thickly upon the branches of the big tree. But Kwakoe, from behind a near-by bush, had seen everything, and patiently he awaited the mouse's return.

Well, after a long time the mouse again made its appearance from among the mass of boesi-nanasi, came down the same bush-rope, and returned to the village by the same road. The strange little animal went straight to the hut of the two friends, entered cautiously, and ran quickly into Jauw's nose before Kwakoe, who had followed it, had a chance to grab it.

As soon as the mouse had vanished, Jauw awoke with a yawn, stretched himself lazily, and rubbed the sleep from his eyes, saying to his friend, "Kwakoe, man, I dreamed a wonderful dream, which I shall not soon forget. Ka [an exclamation of wonder or surprise] but a man's head can take him to strange places!" Kwakoe, curious to know if Jauw's dream could have any connection with what he had just seen, asked him to tell him about it; so Jauw proceeded to relate his dream.

"Well, then, friend Kwakoe, I dreamed that I quietly left the hut, followed the road a ways, and entered the forest. And I walked until I came to a big kankantri all covered with boesi-tetei and boesi-nanasi. I looked around to make sure that nobody was watching, and then I climbed up one of the bush-ropes. Hidden between the branches I discovered a great, big box, so big that I could easily enter it through the keyhole. And what do you think I found in the box, Kwakoe? It was full of gold money, just gold money, nothing else but gold money. Baja, ["friend" or "brother"] I was surprised. Happy to think that you and I would not have to work any more, I spent a long time counting the money. Then I crawled out of the box through the keyhole. I wanted to take the box back with me, but it was too heavy; so I decided to go home and get you to help me cut down the kankantri. I slid down the same bush-rope, and came home to tell you all about it. But you know how it is with dreams, Kwakoe. As soon as I entered the hut, I awoke. Ka, but a man's head can take him to strange places!"

Kwakoe, who had listened with great interest while Jauw related his dream, asked, "Do you think, friend Jauw, that you would recognize the kankantri if you should see it again?"

"Certainly I would," replied Jauw, "never before in my life have I seen such a big kankantri, or one so completely covered with boesi-tetei and boesi-nanasi. But why do you ask me that, Kwakoe?"

Thereupon Kwakoe told Jauw that it was his plan to search for the kankantri, and that Jauw would do better to get up and help grind the axes, so that they would have no difficulty in cutting down the tree which he thought they would have no trouble in finding. But Jauw, who knew nothing of the mouse in his own head, laughed at Kwakoe, saying that he had no desire to get up so early in the morning for the purpose of sharpening axes to cut down a kankantri he had never really seen, and that he could not see how an intelligent man like Kwakoe could put so much faith in dreams.

Then Kwakoe told Jauw that he did not believe in dreams, either, but that this was no ordinary dream; and he related to Jauw his experience with the wonderful mouse. Jauw was amazed at what Kwakoe told him, but he was sure that Kwakoe would not tell him a lie; so he consented to go out and help sharpen the axes.

At daybreak the two friends entered the forest, and soon they came to the giant kankantri into which the mouse had climbed during the night. As soon as Jauw saw the big tree all covered with boesi-tetei and boesi-nanasi, he exclaimed, “Kwakoe, this is the kankantri I saw in my dream. It can be no other.”

Kwakoe and Jauw now went to work with their axes. It was not an easy matter to cut down such an enormous tree; but the thought of finding the treasure in its branches spurred them on, and at last the forest giant tottered and crashed down with a noise like thunder.

And, sure enough, from its branches fell a large box. As it struck the ground, it broke open from the force of its own weight, and the bright gold pieces which Jauw had seen in his dream scattered and rolled over the ground. The two friends, in their joy, embraced each other, and declared that the mouse which had come out of Jauw’s nose must have been his good spirit. “Ka!” exclaimed Kwakoe, it was a good thing for you that I did not catch the mouse when I tried, or you would be a dead man now.”

Kwakoe and Jauw gathered up their treasure and carried it safely home. They celebrated by giving a great feast, to which everybody in the village was invited. At the feast they made it known how they came into possession of the golden treasure. They spent their money so freely, that the gold coins soon spread over the whole world and became known to every one; for I must tell you that before Kwakoe and Jauw found their treasure, gold coins were not known to anyone on earth.

SNAKE AND HUNTER

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Penard, A. P., and T. E. Penard. “Surinam Folk-Tales.” Journal of American Folklore 30 (1917): 248–250.

Date: ca. 1917

Original Source: Surinam Maroon

National Origin: African American

---

The following animal tale is a variant of “The Ungrateful Serpent Returned to Captivity” (AT 155A). In this tale, Anansi departs from his usual self-serving behavior to play the role of the sage judge. This narrative adds a final episode to the usual plot in which the snake learns his lesson and repays the hunter for his kindness.

---

*E*r tin tin, there was a big fire in the wood. All the trees were in flames, and nearly all the animals were burned to death. To escape the terrible heat, Snake lowered himself into a deep hole. The fire raged fiercely for a long time, but was at last extinguished by a heavy rain. When all the danger was past, Snake attempted to climb out of the hole, but, try as he would, he could not scale the steep sides. He begged every one who passed to help him; but nobody dared to give him assistance, for fear of his deadly bite.

Well, at last Hunter came along. He took pity on Snake and pulled him out. But as soon as Snake was free, he turned upon Hunter with the intention of biting him. "You must not bite me after my kind act," said Hunter, warding him off.

"And why shouldn't I bite you?" asked Snake.

"Because," explained Hunter, "you should not do harm to him who has shown you an act of kindness."

"But I am sure that everybody does," hissed Snake. "You know the saying, 'Buen no habi tangi.'" ["Good has no thanks."]

"Very well," proposed Hunter, "let us put the case before a competent judge!" Snake agreed, so together they started for the city.

On the way they met first Horse, next Ass, then Cow. To each of these Hunter and Snake told their story, and to each they put the question, "Ought any one to return Evil for Good?" Horse neighed, saying that he was usually whipped for his good services to man. Ass hee-hawed, saying that he was beaten with a stick for his good services to man. Cow bellowed that she expected to be slaughtered for her good services to man.

Snake then claimed that he had won the case, and lifted his head to strike Hunter; but Hunter said, "I don't agree yet; let us put the case before Anansi, who is very wise!" Snake agreed, and so they continued on their way.

Well, they came to the city where Anansi dwelled, and it so happened that they found him at home. They told Anansi how Snake had let himself down into a deep hole to escape the terrible fire that was raging in the wood; how he had begged everybody who passed for assistance; how Hunter had helped him out of the hole; and how Snake had then tried to bite Hunter. They also told Anansi how they had met Horse, Ass, and Cow, and how each of them had told them that "Tangi foe buen na kodja." ["Thanks for good is the cudgel."] And so they had come to Anansi, who was very wise, that he might settle the dispute fairly.

Anansi looked thoughtful, and, shaking his head, said, "My friends, I cannot say who is right until I have seen with my own eyes how everything happened. Let us go back to the exact spot."

Well, then all three walked back to the hole in the wood out of which Hunter had helped Snake, and Anansi asked them to act out everything just exactly as it had happened. So Snake slid down into the hole and began calling for assistance. Hunter pretended to be passing, and, turning to the hole, was about to help Snake out again, when Anansi stopped him, saying, "Wait, I will settle the dispute now. Hunter must not help Snake this time. Snake must try to get out without any assistance, so that he may learn to appreciate a kind act." Snake was obliged to remain in the hole, and he suffered much from hunger. At last, after many unsuccessful attempts, he managed to get out. But experience had been a good master, and Snake had learned his lesson well.

Well, it came to pass that some time later Hunter was caught poaching in the king's woods and was thrown into prison. Snake heard of it and made up his mind to help Hunter, so he hastened to the king's palace. Unobserved he approached the king. When he saw a good chance, he suddenly bit the king, and succeeded in making his escape before any one could catch him.

Then he made his way to the prison in which Hunter was confined, and found a way to enter it. He calmed Hunter's fears, and said, "A while ago you did me a favor, and now by experience I have learned to appreciate it. I come to aid you. Listen! I have just bitten the king, and he is very sick from the effects of the poison; in fact, he is on the point of dying. I bring you the only remedy for my deadly bite. It is known to me alone. Send word to the king that you can cure him, but that you will not do so unless he promises to give you his only daughter in marriage." So saying, Snake gave Hunter the remedy, consisting of three different kinds of leaves, and then he departed.

Hunter did as Snake advised him. He sent word saying that he could cure the king, and asked as reward his release from prison and the king's daughter in marriage. Fearing death, the king consented, and allowed Hunter to try the remedy. The king was quickly restored to health. Hunter married the princess, and the teller of this tale was present at the wedding.

WARRAU

---

THE ADVENTURES OF KOROROMANNA

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Roth, Walter E. An Inquiry into the Animism and Folk-Lore of the Guiana Indians. Thirtieth Annual Report of the Bureau of American Ethnology, 1908–1909. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1915, 126–129.

Date: ca. 1915

Original Source: Warrau

National Origin: Native American

---

The Warrau (also known as the Guarauno) are a nomadic Native American culture indigenous to northeastern South America, residing primarily in Venezuela, Guyana, and Suriname. Hunting, fishing, and gathering provide their primary subsistence. The Warrau believed that Kororomanna was a supernatural who created male human beings. Women were created by the spirit Kuliminia. Kororomanna was said to have two wives: Uri-Kaddo (“a worker in darkness”) and Emeshi (the name refers to a large burrowing ant). Regarding the names, Walter Roth contends that “together, they are typical of the creation of all things out of the earth in the dark” (126). The following narrative gives a description of a typical encounter with bush spirits (Hebus). In the course of the tale, Kororomanna is revealed to be something of a trickster as well as a creator.

---

Kororomanna went out hunting and shot a “baboon” (Mycetes), but as it was already late in the afternoon, in trying to make his way home he lost his way in the darkness. And there he had to make his banab [temporary shelter], and to lie down, with the baboon beside him. But where he lay was a

Hebu road; you can always distinguish a Spirit road from any other pathway in the forest because the Hebus occupying the trees that lie alongside it are always, especially at night, striking the branches and trunks, and so producing short sharp crackling noises.

It was not pleasant for poor Kororomanna, especially as the baboon's body was now beginning to swell with all the noxious humors inside; lest the Hebus should steal it from him, he was obliged to keep the carcass alongside and watch over it with a stick.

At last he fell asleep, but in the middle of the night the Hebus, what with the knocking on the trees, aroused him from his slumbers. Now that he was awake, he mimicked the Spirits, blow for blow, and as they struck the limb of a tree, Kororomanna would strike the belly of the baboon. But what with the air inside, each time he struck the animal, there came a resonant Boom! Boom! just like the beating of a drum.

The Hebu leader heard the curious sound, and became a bit frightened, "What can it be? When before I knocked a tree, it never made a noise like that." To make sure, however, he struck the tree hard again, and Boom! came once more from the carcass. Hebu was really frightened now, and began to search all around to find out where the extraordinary noise could possibly come from; at last he recognized the little manicole banab, and saw Kororomanna laughing. Indeed, the latter could not help laughing, considering that it was the first time he had heard such a funny sound come out of any animal.

Hebu then said to him, "Who are you? Show me your hand," to which Kororomanna replied, "I am Warrau, and here is my hand," but instead of putting out his own, he shoved forward one of the baboon's, and then held forward the animal's other hand, and finally both feet. Hebu was much puzzled and said he had never seen before a Warrau with so black a hand, and would not be satisfied until he saw the face. Kororomanna accordingly deceived him again and held out the monkey's, which caused Hebu to make the same remark about his face as he had done about his hands and feet.

The Spirit became more frightened than ever, but his curiosity exceeded his fear, because he next wanted to know where all that Boom! Boom! sound had come from. And when he learnt its source of origin (breaking wind), he regretted that he had not been made like ordinary mortals, he and all his family having no proper posteriors, but just a red spot. He thereupon begged Kororomanna to make for him a posterior which would allow of his producing a similar sound.

So with his bow Kororomanna split the Spirit's hind quarters, and completed the task by impaling him, but so rough was he in his methods, that the weapon transfixed the whole body even piercing the unfortunate Hebu's head. The Hebu cursed Kororomanna for having killed him, and threatened that the other Spirits would avenge his death; he then disappeared.

Our hero, becoming a bit anxious on his own account, and, recognizing by the gradually increasing hullabaloo in the trees that swarms of Hebus were approaching the scene of the outrage, now climbed the manicole tree sheltering his banab, leaving the baboon's corpse inside. The Spirits then entered the banab, and believing the dead animal to be Kororomanna, began hitting it with their sticks, and with each blow, there came Boom! Our friend up the tree, whence he could watch their every movement, and their surprise at the acoustic results of the flogging, could not refrain from cracking a smile, which soon gave way to a hearty laugh.

The Spirits, unfortunately for him, heard it, and looking at the dead baboon, said, "This cannot be the person who is laughing at us." They looked all around, but could see nothing, until one of them stood on his head, and peeped up into the tree. And there, sure enough, he saw Kororomanna laughing at them. All the others then put themselves in the same posture around the tree, and had a good look at him. The question they next had to decide was how to catch him. This they concluded could most easily be managed by hewing down the tree.

They accordingly started with their axes on the trunk, but since the implements were but water-turtle shells, it was not long before they broke. They then sent for their knives, but as these were merely the seed-pods of the buari tree, they also soon broke. The Hebus then sent for a rope, but what they called a rope was really a snake. At any rate, as the serpent made its way farther and farther up the tree, and finally came within reach, Kororomanna cut its head off; the animal fell to the ground again, and the Hebus cried "Our rope has burst."

Another consultation was held, and it was decided that one of their number should climb the tree, seize the man, and throw him down, and that those below might be ready to receive him when dislodged, the Hebu was to shout out, when throwing him down, the following signal: Tura-buna-sé mahara-ko na-kai. The biggest of the Spirits being chosen to carry the project into execution, he started on his climb, but head downward of course, so as to be able to see where he was going.

Kororomanna, however, was on the alert, and, waiting for him, killed him in the same peculiar manner as that in which he had dispatched the other Spirit just a little while before; more than this, having heard them fix upon the preconcerted signal, he hurled the dead Spirit's body down with the cry of Tura-buna-sé mahara-ko na-kai! The Hebus below were quite prepared, and as soon as the body fell to the ground, clubbed it to pieces. Kororomanna then slipped down and helped in the dissolution.

"Wait a bit," he said to the Spirits; "I am just going in the bush, but will soon return." It was not very long, however, before the Spirits saw that they had been tricked, and yelled with rage on finding that they had really destroyed one of themselves; they hunted high and low for their man, but with approaching daylight were reluctantly compelled to give up the chase.

In the meantime, Kororomanna had no sooner got out of their sight than he started running at topmost speed, and finally found shelter in a hollow tree.

Here he discovered a woman (she was not old either), so he told her that he would remain with her till “the day cleaned” (that is, till dawn broke).

But she said, “No! No! My man is Snake and he will be back before the dawn. If he were to find you here, he would certainly kill you.” But her visitor was not to be frightened, and he stayed where he was.

True enough, before dawn, Snake came wending his way home, and as he crawled into the tree, he was heard to exclaim, “Hallo! I can smell someone.”

Kororomanna was indeed frightened now, and was at his wits’ end to know what to do. Just then dawn broke, and they heard a hummingbird. “That is my uncle,” said our hero. They then heard the doroquarra [another species of bird] “That also is an uncle of mine,” he added. He purposely told Snake all this to make him believe that, if he killed and swallowed his visitor, all the other hummingbirds and doroquarras would come and avenge his death.

But Snake said, “I am not afraid of either of your uncles, but will gobble them up.” Just then, a chicken-hawk (Urubitinga) flew along, which made Snake ask whether that also was an uncle of his.

“To be sure” was the reply, “and when I am dead, he also will come and search for me.” It was now Snake’s turn to be frightened, because Chicken-hawk used always to get the better of him; so he let Kororomanna go in peace, who ran out of that hollow tree pretty quick.

It was full daylight now, but this made little odds, because he had still lost his way, and knew not how to find the road home. After wandering on and on, he at last came across a track, recognizable by the footprints in it: following this up, he came upon a hollow tree that had fallen across the path, and inside the trunk he saw a baby. This being a Hebu’s child, he slaughtered it, but he had no sooner done so than he heard approaching footsteps, which caused him promptly to climb a neighboring tree and await developments.

These were not long in coming, for the mother soon put in her appearance; as soon as she recognized her dead infant, she was much angered, and, looking around, carefully examined the fresh tracks, and said, “This is the man who has killed my child.” Her next move was to dig up a bit of the soil marked by one of the fresh footprints, wrap it up in a leaf tied with bush-rope, and hang it on a branch while she went for firewood.

Directly her back was turned, Kororomanna slid down from his hiding place, undid the bundle, and threw away the contents, substituting a footprint of the Spirit woman. Then, tying up the parcel as before, he hung it where it had been left, and hid himself once more. When the woman returned with the firewood, she made a big fire, and threw the bundle into the flames, saying as she did so, “Curse the person whose footprint I now burn. May the owner fall into this fire also!” She thought that if she burnt the “foot-mark” so would the person’s shadow be drawn to the fire. But no one came, and she felt that her own shadow was being impelled. “Oh! It seems that I am hurting myself; the fire is drawing me near,” she exclaimed. Twice was she thus dragged toward it against her will, and yet she succeeded in resisting. But on the third occasion she could not draw back; she fell in, and was burnt to ashes; she “roasted herself dead.”

Kororomanna was again free to travel, but which direction to follow was the puzzle; he had still lost his way home. All he could do was to walk more or less aimlessly on, passing creek after creek and back into the bush again, until he emerged on a beautiful, clean roadway. But no sooner had he put his foot on it, than it stuck there, just like a fish caught in a spring-trap. And this is exactly what the trap really was, save that it had been set by the Hebus.

He pulled and he tugged and he twisted, but try as he might, he could not get away. He fouled himself over completely, and then lay quite still, pretending to be dead. The flies gathered on him and these were followed by the worms, but he continued to lie quite still.

By and by two of the Spirits came along, and one of them said, “Hallo! I have luck today. My spring-trap has caught a fish at last,” but when he got closer, he added, “Oh! I have left it too long. It stinks.” However, they let loose their fish, as they thought it was, and carried it down to the riverside to wash and clean it.

After they had washed it, one of the Hebus said, “Let us slit its belly now, and remove the entrails,” but the other one remarked, “No, let us make a basket first, to put the flesh in.”

This was very fortunate for Kororomanna, who, seizing the opportunity while they went collecting strands to plait with, rolled down the river bank into the water and so made good his escape. But when he succeeded in landing on the other side, he was, in a sense, just as badly off as before, not knowing how to get home.

Kororomanna next came across a man’s skull lying on the ground, and what must he do but go and jerk his arrow into its eye-ball? Now this skull, Kwa-muhu, was a Hebu, who thereupon called out, “You must not do that. But now that you have injured me, you will have to carry me.”

So Kororomanna had to get a strip of bark and carry the skull wherever he went, and feed it too. If he shot bird or beast, he always had to give a bit to Kwa-muhu, with the result that the latter soon became gradually and inconveniently heavier, until one day he became so great a dead weight as to break the bark-strip support. The accident occurred not very far from a creek, and Kororomanna told Kwa-muhu to stay still while he went to look for a stronger strip of bark.

Of course this was only an excuse, because directly he had put the skull on the ground, he ran as fast as he could toward the creek, overtaking on the way a deer that was running in exactly the same direction, swam across, and rested himself on the opposite side. In the meantime Kwa-muhu, suspecting that he was about to be forsaken, ran after Kororomanna, and seeing but the deer in front of him, mistook it for his man and killed it just as it reached the water.

On examining the carcass, the Hebu exclaimed, when he got to its toes, “Well, that is indeed very strange. You have only two fingers”; and though he reckoned again and again, he could make no more—"but the man I am after had five fingers, and a long nose. You must be somebody else."

Now Kororomanna, who was squatting just over on the opposite bank, heard all this, and burst out laughing. This enraged Kwa-muhu, who left the deer, and made a move as if to leap across the creek, but, having no legs, he could not jump properly, and hence fell into the water and was drowned. All the ants then came out of his skull.

Poor Kororomanna was still as badly off as before; he was unable to find his way home. But he bravely kept on his way and at last came upon an old man bailing water out of a pond. The latter was really a Hebu, whose name was Huta-Kurakura ("Red-back"). Huta-Kurakura, being anxious to get the fish, was bailing away at the water side as hard as he could go, but having no calabash had to make use of his purse [scrotum], which was very large. And while thus bending down, he was so preoccupied that he did not hear the footfall of Kororomanna coming up behind.

The latter, not knowing what sort of a creature it was, stuck him twice in the back with an arrow, but Huta-Kurakura, thinking it to be a cow-fly (Tabanus), just slapped the spot where he felt it. When, however, he found himself stuck a third time, he turned round and, seeing who it was, became so enraged that he seized the wanderer and hurled him into a piece of wood with such force that only his eye projected from out the timber.

Anxious to be freed from his unenviable position Kororomanna offered everything he could think of—crystals, rattles, paiwarri [cassava-based liquor], women, etc., but the Spirit wanted none of them. As a last chance, he offered tobacco, and this the Hebu eagerly accepted, the result being that they fast became good friends. They then both emptied the pond and collected a heap of fish, much too large for Kororomanna to carry home. So the Spirit in some peculiar way bound them all up into quite a small bundle, small enough for Kororomanna to carry in his hand.

Kororomanna now soon managed to find the right path home, because each and every animal that he met gave him news of his mother. One after the other, he met a rat with a potato, an acouri with cassava root, a labba with a yam, a deer with a cassava leaf, a kushi-ant with a similar leaf on its head, and a bush-cow (tapir) eating a pineapple.

And as he asked each in turn whence it had come, the animal said, "I have been to your mother, and have begged potato, cassava, yam, and other things from her."

When at length he reached home, and his wife and mother asked what he had brought, he told them a lot of fish, and they laughed right heartily at what they thought was his little joke. So he bade them open the parcel, and as they opened it, sure enough out came fish after fish, small and large, fish of all kinds, so many in fact that the house speedily became filled, and the occupants had to shift outside.

KOMATARI, THE FIRST MEDICINE MAN

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Roth, Walter E. An Inquiry into the Animism and Folk-Lore of the Guiana Indians. Thirtieth Annual Report of the Bureau of American Ethnology, 1908–1909. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1915, 336–341.

Date: ca. 1915

Original Source: Warrau

National Origin: Native American

---

The following tale relates the origin of shamanism among the Warrau. Their shamans, as is the case in those other cultures in which this supernatural specialist exists, are both venerated and feared. Among the Warrau, in fact, even the bones of dead shamans are regarded as power-laden objects. Two important features of Warrau shamanism are emphasized in “Komatari, The First Medicine Man”: (1) the need for shamans to gain knowledge through their own communion with the spirits and (2) the central role played by tobacco. Tobacco juice is used as an intoxicant to induce the trances needed first to pass into trance and contact the Hebus (bush spirits) and later to bring on the state needed for some healing rituals. The myth of Komatari further rationalizes the fact that shamans’ efforts do not always succeed.

---

Komatari wanted some tobacco, but as there was none about, he searched for it. He had heard of its growing on an island out at sea, so he went down to the shore, where he came across a house with a man inside. Approaching him, Komatari said, “I am poor, and want tobacco. I hear you have it growing on an island. Could you get me some plants?”

While thus engaged in conversation, the hummingbird came along, and said, “Hullo! What are you two talking about?”

“Tobacco: we want tobacco,” they replied.

“Oh, is that all?” the little bird said; “why, I’ll go and fetch some for you. I shall be making a start before the morning, and you can expect me back just as the sun begins to turn that way” pointing in a direction which would indicate about an hour after midday.

The hummingbird kept his word, and returned as promised, but when the house-master saw what he had brought back, he said, “Why, that is no tobacco leaf: it is only the tobacco flower,” and, turning to Komatari, he said, “I will go myself.” The house-master started next morning for the same island, telling Komatari to expect him back as soon as the hummingbird, that is, shortly after midday. But as a matter of fact, he never returned until the following morning.

The cause of the delay was that so many people were watching the tobacco that he had to wait for nightfall before he could steal the leaves.

However, giving Komatari some of the seed, he told him to go down to the waterside, where he would find his corial [dugout canoe], and if he looked inside he would see two or three tobacco leaves, which he might take. Komatari did as directed, but instead of two or three leaves he found the whole corial full of them. He helped himself to as many as would fill a quake [basket] and went home.

Before taking his departure, however, the house-master said, "I have a name, but will not mention it: when you know all about Piai [that is, 'Medicine'] you will be able to find it out for yourself."

At last Komatari reached home, and naturally all his friends came to pay him a visit, to get some of the tobacco; but he was shrewd, kept the tobacco under the roof [that is, hanging up to dry in the ordinary manner] in charge of the marabuntas [wasps], left home very early of a morning, and only returned late, so as not to be at home when anybody called.

But at last a visitor came and made a very long stay purposely. They thus met, Komatari gave him three leaves, and sent him away. Next day, another man paid him a visit, but Komatari had already left, and only marabuntas were there—many marabuntas, all of different kinds. The visitor went home, and, taking some fish with him, returned to Komatari's place and asked the marabuntas to let him have some tobacco, at the same time showing them his fish and saying, "Look! this is the payment." And so, while the marabuntas all swarmed down upon the fish, the man climbed up, got what tobacco he wanted, and cleared out.

When Komatari got home, he also got up under the roof where the tobacco was stored, but found much of it missing, so he placed what was left elsewhere, and drove away all the marabuntas except one particular kind, a black variety, the oro [yiseri of the Arawaks], which he made his watchmen.

Starting now on his field, he cut it day after day, and after burning it [clearing the stubble by setting it on fire], at last planted his tobacco. When he saw that it was beginning to thrive, he built a piai-house, and going round his field, looked out for a calabash tree; he found one full of gourds.

He took one, but on turning round, he saw a Hebu, who, after asking whether it belonged to him and getting "Yes" for an answer, said, "All right. So long as the calabash is yours, you may have the whole tree. I have a name, but will not tell it you. I want to see whether you learn the piai business well. If you do, you will be able to find it out for yourself."

On reaching home with the calabash, Komatari started cleaning it out. When cleaned, another Hebu came along and asked him what he intended doing with it, but Komatari would not tell him. You see this particular Hebu was the one who comes to kill people and so was afraid of the power of the mar-aka [rattle], which is made from this very calabash.

After scooping out and cleaning the calabash, Komatari went into the bush and, traveling along, came upon a creek with swiftly flowing water: it was here that he cut the timber from out of which he next shaped the handle for the rattle and cut the sticks to make his special fire with.

Returning home once more, he fastened the handle in the gourd, but was not satisfied with the result: the rattle did not look as it should. So he hung it up on the beam of his pi'ai-house, and went once more into the bush, where he again met the killing Hebu, who repeated his question as to what Komatari intended doing with the rattle, but, as before, the latter would not tell him.

Passing along, and hearing a noise as of many people talking, Komatari proceeded in the direction whence the sound came, and found a number of Hebus fastening various parrot feathers into cotton-twine. How pretty this ornament would look tied on his calabash left hanging up at home, was Komatari's first thought when he saw what they were doing. On asking, the ornament was given him.

The Hebu who gave it to him said, "I have a name, but I will not tell it to you. You can find it out for yourself, if you should ever become a good pi'ai-man." Komatari next asked him for another kind of cotton-plait, with feathers different from those on the one mentioned, to wear as a hat, but the Hebu said he had none, though he would get it at the next house.

So Komatari went to the next house, saw the Hebu house-master, asked for the cotton-plait for the hat, and in the same manner as before, this Hebu also said to him, "I have a name, but I will not tell it to you. You must find it out for yourself when you are a medicine-man."

Komatari went home now, and arranged the feathered cotton on top of the calabash, when who should put in an appearance again but the killing Hebu. When he again asked Komatari what he intended doing with the calabash, the latter refused to tell him, as before.

But Komatari was not satisfied even now, because when he shook the gourd it did not rattle. As yet it had no stones in it. So Komatari went into the bush again, and followed creek after creek, and at last came to a big river. There he met another Hebu, who got the proper stones that were wanted.

When he had given them to Komatari, he said, like the others, "I have a name, but I will not tell it to you. You must find it out for yourself when you are a medicine-man." Komatari again made his way home and put the stones into the calabash. Just as he was finishing the work the killing Hebu again appeared, asking him as before, what he intended doing with the calabash. The answer was, "This is to kill you with, and to prevent you killing other people," and as Komatari shook the calabash, which was now a finished maraka rattle, the Hebu began to tremble and stagger and almost fell, but he managed to pick himself up and get away just in the nick of time.

He ran to his Aijamo [head-man, chief] and said, "There is a man who has an object with which he nearly killed me and I must get my payment [that is, my revenge]. I am going back to kill him."

“All right!” said the Aijamo, “I will go with you.” So they went together, and brought sickness to a friend and neighbor of Komatari’s; for they were afraid of attacking Komatari himself. However, his sick friend sent for him. Komatari went, and played the maraka on him, and took out his sickness. So the killing Hebu made another man ill, but Komatari took the disease out of him also. The Hebu next afflicted a third victim, and again Komatari was victorious. But when he attacked a fourth one, Komatari was out hunting.

When he returned, the poor fellow was in a bad enough condition: so strong did the sickness come, that Komatari could not cure him—he had “stood too long.” The killing Hebu then explained to Komatari that it would always be thus: some patients he (Komatari) could save, and other patients he could not.

Of course Komatari had been able to find out the names of all the Hebus that had lent him assistance in the manufacture of his maraka, and it is to these different Hebus whom the present-day medicine-men are said to “sing” and call on when they cure the sick. For instance the name of the Hebu that procured the tobacco seeds for Komatari was Wau-uno “the white crane.”

THE NIGHT OWL AND HIS BAT BROTHERS-IN-LAW

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Roth, Walter E. An Inquiry into the Animism and Folk-Lore of the Guiana Indians. Thirtieth Annual Report of the Bureau of American Ethnology, 1908–1909. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1915, 276.

Date: ca. 1915

Original Source: Warrau

National Origin: Native American

---

The following myth explains the origins of both natural and supernatural phenomena. In the natural category, the myth asserts that the vampire bat seeks revenge on humans and their domestic animals by sucking their blood, while in the realm of supernatural cause and effect, the myth establishes the cry of the night owl as a portent of death.

---

Boku-boku, the Night-owl, married the bats’ sister, and often took his brothers with him at night to rob peoples’ houses. One night they came across a house where the people were drying fish on a babracote: just to frighten them, they all sang out, boku! boku! boku!—this made the occupants run out into the bush, and so gave the bats their opportunity for stealing the fish.

The trio played the same trick at many a settlement, until one day the owl told them he had to travel about for a while, and that during his absence they must behave themselves, and stay indoors at night, as otherwise trouble would be sure to happen. But no sooner had Boku-boku turned his back, than the bats, unable to resist temptation, continued their evil courses.

They got to a place one night where the fish were being dried, but having no owl with them on this occasion, they could not shout boku! boku! boku! as loudly as they did before; hence, the people not being so frightened now, ran away only a little distance, just far enough to be able to watch everything and to see that it was only the bats who were stealing their food. But the bats, remaining undisturbed, thought they could now do what they liked with impunity, and hence returned again upon the following evening, when the people remained just as they were, some seated, some lying in their hammocks.

The bats still thought of course that nothing bad could happen them, and were laughing chi! chi! chi! for very joy. But the house master took out his bow and arrow, the latter tipped with a knob of wax, with which he shot one of them on the rump, stunning it.

The other bat, escaping into the forest, met Boku-boku, who had just returned from his travels, and to whom he narrated the circumstances of his brother's untimely death. Nothing daunted, the two returned to hunt that night, and on this occasion the noise of their voices, now that it included the owl's, created such a stir that the folk ran as before into the bush, while Boku-boku and his brother-in-law stole the fish. But lying on the babracote was the dead bat, which they took home with them, and there they soundly smacked him on the spot where he had been struck with the arrow: this brought him round, the fire not having withered him up beyond recovery, and he laughed chi! chi! chi! on awakening.

And although Boku-boku was prevented accompanying them the following evening, the two bats insisted on repeating their nocturnal excursion: as before, the folk were not frightened, and again one of the bats got shot in his posterior. Next night, the surviving bat returned with Boku-boku, and they found as before upon the babracote, the body of their relative: this they took away with them, but on this occasion, when they smacked the corpse, it never woke—it had been dried too much over the fire.

The surviving bat however continues to take his revenge upon people and sucks them and their fowls, as well as doing other damage, while the presence of Boku-boku, his brother-in-law, invariably means mischief: when heard at night, some one is surely about to sicken and die.

THE EXPLOITS OF KONEHO

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Roth, Walter E. An Inquiry into the Animism and Folk-Lore of the Guiana Indians.

Thirtieth Annual Report of the Bureau of American Ethnology, 1908–1909. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1915, 275–278.

Date: ca. 1915

Original Source: Warrau

National Origin: Native American

---

The following cycle of animal tales are modifications of African narratives; they were likely borrowed from Maroon sources (see Suriname Maroon, pages 324–331). Konehu (from Spanish, conejo, “rabbit”) is a widely spread trickster figure in the Western hemisphere, partly owing his origins to contact between African-descended and Native American cultures (see, for example, the Creek tales “Rabbit Gets a Turkey for Wildcat,” page 63, “Rabbit Steals Fire,” page 64, and “Rabbit Fools Alligator,” page 65). The fact that the Warrau label any rogue who uses guile and wit to get the better of his neighbors and overcome adversity “Konehu” attests to the vitality of these tales in the Warrau repertoire. The motif of concealing his murder of the jaguar cubs has precedents in the trickster tales of continental Africa (see, for example, “The Lion and the Jackal,” Volume 1, page 144).

---

There was once a celebrated Konehu, walking along the bush, when he met a female Tiger [jaguar]. The latter, who was hungry, wanted to go out hunting, but did not like to leave her three little cubs at home without anyone in charge of the place. So Konehu agreed to look after the youngsters while Tiger searched for game.

Things went on very well for some time, Tiger returning home each evening with meat which she shared with Konehu. But on a certain day, one of the cubs bit Konehu, so he killed it, threw the body away, and said nothing to the mother when she returned. In fact, Konehu as usual brought from out of the hollow log one cub after another for the mother to suckle, but on this occasion he brought out the same cub twice, and the mother was none the wiser.

Next day, another cub bit Konehu. So he killed it, threw the body away as before, and said nothing, but in the evening brought out the remaining cub three times to be fed, and its mother was none the wiser.

Next day, however, the surviving whelp bit Konehu. So he killed it, left its carcass close by the hollow log, and made tracks elsewhere. He knew that Tiger would follow him, so he traveled a long, long way before he rested. He next built a house on very high posts, posts too high for anyone to climb up, and then started making the roof which was just as high up again. Indeed, to get up all that way, he built a long ladder. And he started tying on the thatch.

In the meantime, Tiger, on her return home, found her one dead cub but no signs of the other two. There was also no Konehu. She therefore was vexed much, and determined to follow and kill him. She traveled night and day, and went on and on until she came to the house which Konehu was building, and there she saw him on top thatching the roof. "Hullo!" she growls, "What are you doing up there? I am come to eat you."

But Konehu does not worry himself. He only says, "You had better look out for yourself, because there is a big sea coming. I am building this house to save myself. You had better join me. Come up the ladder." Tiger thereupon clammers up the ladder and gets close to Konehu who is tying on the thatch with the itir-iti strand. As soon as she got too uncomfortably close to him, he suddenly exclaimed, "Oh! What a pity! I have just dropped a piece of the tying strand. Wait up here a minute, while I go down and fetch it."

This was a lie, for directly he reached the ground, he removed the ladder, leaving Tiger helpless on the roof. Again Konehu made tracks and walked about. He walked so far that he got tired. He then sat down and started making a quake, an openwork basket. Now, what did Tiger do? When she found the ladder gone, she scrambled up and under the roof, over and among the beams and rafters, but she could not get down. At last, hunger compelled her to say, "I must live, or I must die." So she made a big jump and reached the ground safely.

She was vexed much, and determined upon following and killing Konehu. She traveled night and day, and went on and on until she reached the spot where Konehu was seated, busily occupied in making his quake. "Hullo!" she growls, "What are you doing? I am come to eat you." Konehu however remained quite cool and quiet. He stuck to his story about the big sea coming, and swore that he was making the quake so that when completed he could get inside and haul himself up to the top most branch of a big mora tree that was close by.

Silly Tiger then believed what he told her, and said she would like to get into the basket also. Konehu therefore took her measure and increased the size of the basket. When finished, he told her to get inside, but no sooner had she comfortably fixed herself, than he drew the sides of the quake together, and sewed them up. Tiger was now prisoner. Fixing a long vine-rope to the basket, Konehu threw it over the topmost branch of the mora tree, pulled on its free end, left his victim dangling in mid-air, and made tracks.

Tiger was now in a bad way, for the more she roared the more did all the other animals get frightened and run away. At last, one of the most inquisitive, a little monkey, wanting to know what all the noise was about, climbed down the vine-rope and opened the basket. No sooner had he done so, than out jumped Tiger and both fell to the ground, where the monkey's only reward was to be eaten.

Yes, Tiger was vexed much and determined upon following and killing Konehu. She wandered on and on, and at last met him upon the banks of a river. Directly he saw her coming he commenced looking down into the water very hard, as if he was examining something very carefully. "Hullo!" growled Tiger. "What are you looking at? I am come to eat you."

“Nonsense, woman,” says Konehu. “Look, look down there. Don’t you see that beautiful yellow stone [gold]? If you could only fetch it you would be a rich woman. You would have a new husband, and get new cubs.”

Now what he was pointing at in the water was only the reflection of the sun overhead. Tiger, however, being both silly and greedy, dived in, and quickly came up to the surface to breathe.

“Oh!” he tells her, “you must go down deeper.” So she jumps in again, and stays under much longer. When she again appears on the surface, Konehu reiterates “You haven’t gone deep enough.” And so the game goes on, she being fooled every time about not having stayed below long enough.

She makes a last effort to dive under a very long time, when Konehu takes the opportunity of making good his escape. Tiger now sees that she has been tricked. She is vexed much and is more than ever determined to follow and kill Konehu, who by this time knows what to expect.

So he travels far, far until he comes to a high hill on the top of which he balances a big rock, and at the bottom of which he digs a deep pit. By and by, Tiger comes along, and seeing Konehu on top of the hill, looks up at him and says, “Hullo! What are you doing up there? I am come to eat you.” But Konehu puts his arms around the rock, and says it is a large piece of meat, which he will throw down to her if she lies quietly in the pit. And the silly, greedy Tiger believes him again, does just what he tells her, and waits for the meat to come. Soon, bumpy, bumpy, down the hill comes the big rock, faster and faster it speeds, until falling on Tiger, it kills and buries her.

Konehu was a lazy man, and would not labor for his living. He was hungry. One fine morning he sat at the foot of a high overhanging cliff, waiting for some one to come along. By and by he saw a company of men approaching. They had been out hunting, and were bringing along a quantity of game.

Konehu then picked up a long wooden pole, and placing it against the side of the cliff after the manner of a brace, began pressing it into position just as the huntsmen came up. In reply to their inquiry as to why he was pressing so hard upon the pole, Konehu said, “Can’t you see that the mountain is falling over, and that if I don’t brace it up, it will come down and destroy all of us? Look up and see it moving! Come, take my place, and let me have a little rest. I have been shoving at it all the morning.”

The huntsmen accordingly gazed up the wall of the precipice, and seeing the clouds moving over the top of it, indeed thought that the cliff was about to fall. So dropping their quarry on the ground, they all together started pressing on the timber, and continued pressing, and pressed harder, until by the time the sun was about to sink, they were so exhausted that they could press no longer. They satisfied their conscience by saying that whether the cliff overwhelmed them or not, it would not be their fault. They therefore let go the timber and turned around to pick up all their game and provisions. But these had all disappeared. And so had Konehu!

On another occasion Konehu was again hungry, but the people all about knew what a tricky man he was, and refused to give him anything to eat, unless he paid or worked for it. He had nothing to give, so he had to work.

He asked for food at a certain house, and the house-master told him to pound some rice. He pounded away until late in the afternoon. The master came to see how much rice had been cleaned, but was astonished to find so small an amount resulting from the large quantity that had been handed over in the morning.

The master gave Konehu the same quantity to pound next day, and in the afternoon there was again a marked shortage, so he became very angry and sent Konehu away. That very night, Konehu cooked rice for supper. Instead of a solid heavy-wood pounder, he had used a hollow-bamboo one, and the more he pounded the rice with it, the quicker it became filled.

One day Konehu met a man carrying two quakes of yams. The yams looked just splendid, and Konehu, not having any of his own, determined on possessing himself of them. "Those are fine yams," he said, "what are you going to do with them?"

On learning that they were being taken up the river for sale at the next settlement, Konehu said that he knew of another settlement where such beautiful yams would fetch a far higher price, and that if they were handed over to his care he, Konehu, would negotiate the business to the better advantage just for friendship's sake. Once they were in his possession, however, Konehu said good-bye to the stranger, and brought them home for his wife to cook. All that he had said about selling them at a big price was a lie.

Soon after the very same man whom he had cheated came up to the house and threatened to kill him. But Konehu managed to talk "sweet-mouth" and soothed his anger by telling him that if he waited a while, he would give him some nice pepper-pot.

Going into that portion of the lodge which was screened off for the women-folk, he told his wife to shriek and scream as if he were killing her. She did what she was bid. Konehu brought out some pepper-pot, which he placed before the stranger.

The man tasted and was enchanted with it. "That is a fine pepper-pot. What did you make it from?" he says.

"Just out of my wife's breast," replied Konehu. "Didn't you hear her yell when I cut it off?" The foolish man went back to his own home, and seizing his wife, gashed her breast to pieces, but the result was that she bled to death, and he recognized only too late that he had again been tricked.

The way in which Konehu managed to get the advantage of everybody soon spread abroad. Among others, it reached the ear of a head-man at one of the settlements. This man had a big field and several wives: he was indeed a rich man. He prided himself on being very clever and knowing everything: he knew all about the history of his tribe, and by looking at a certain star he could tell the proper time to visit the coast when the crabs were “on the march.” In fact, he knew he was shrewder than Konehu, and publicly said so.

Now, Konehu heard of this, and taking up a position on the path leading to this individual’s cassava field, waited for the owner to come along. As soon as he heard footsteps approaching, he loosed his bowels, and tearing a “cap” from off the shoot of a “trolley” palm, carefully placed it point upwards on the ground, over the dung, at the same time pressing his palms around the edge just as if there was some live animal underneath.

When a few feet distant, the owner saw Konehu in this extraordinary attitude, he asked him what he was doing. “I have just caught a bird here,” says Konehu, “and am afraid of it getting away. Do you happen to have a quack with you?”

Not suspecting any trickery, the man told him that if he liked to go round to his house, he could have the quack which he would find hanging up on one of the posts. So he puts down his bow, arrows, and pegall [basket], and Konehu shows him how to hold the trolley cap tightly down and prevent the wonderful bird escaping.

Konehu takes up the bow and arrows, marches off to the man’s dwelling, and makes himself quite at home with both the eatables and the women: indeed, he spends a gloriously happy time there. But as for the man watching over the wonderful bird, hour after hour passed and he finally felt so weary that he tipped up one edge of the trolley cap, and saw that he had indeed been outwitted by the very man he had boasted to despise.

The time at last arrived when mere mention of Konehu’s name made every-one spit. All had been fooled by him at some time or another, and now left him strictly to himself.

His wife went off with another man. Poor Konehu did not know how to clean the house, which became more and more dilapidated; he knew nothing about cooking, he had no cassava, and when he did manage to go out hunting with bow and arrow, he invariably met with poor success.

One day, however, he managed to shoot a fine big deer. He ate all of it except one leg, which he barbecued and slung up to one of the beams of his house. Next day, he again managed to secure some game, and so things went on, his luck, day after day, not only continuing but increasing.

More than this, every time he reached home in the afternoon, there he found the fire lighted, the pepper-pot already boiled, everything tidied up and cleaned, and yet not a soul was to be seen. He became curious. So instead of going hunting out back one morning, he hid himself behind a big tree whence he could observe everything taking place in the house without himself being seen. He waited and waited.

By and by he saw the deer leg change into a beautiful woman, and he then knew who it was that had been minding him so carefully. He rushed forward and held her fast. He wanted her to be his wife, but she resolutely declined, though she promised to remain and continue as his benefactress.

He therefore built another house, adjoining his, just for her especial use. After a time, she changed her mind about becoming his wife. She had only refused his offer before, because she was afraid he might tell his friends and relatives who she was—the offspring of a deer’s foot—the shame and disgrace of which she felt she could never face. The bargain was accordingly struck that so long as he held his tongue about her antecedents, she would remain with him as his spouse: if he betrayed her, she would punish him.

They were happy together for a long time, and everything prospered. Konehu’s luck in hunting and fishing, as well as his abundance of provisions, became now almost proverbial, but whenever questioned as to how he managed to secure such luck, and what binas [charms] he employed, he always remained silent. The neighbors’ envy and curiosity were not to be baffled by his silence. They said, “Let us ask Konehu to a paiwarri, and make him drunk. Then he will tell us!”

So they held a big feast, and they had many jars of drink, and Konehu, getting beastly intoxicated, told the whole story. When he woke next morning out of his debauchery, he turned his steps homeward: His astonishment was indeed great to find his old house, without any additions, just as dirty and untidy as in his grass-widower days—and, yes, there was the deer-leg still hanging on the cord.

In his anger he determined on eating the venison, but when he struck his knife in, all the blood gushed forth. This sobered him, and he left the house to become a wanderer. He may be here today, and gone tomorrow. Yes, indeed, there are so many Konehus [that is, rogues and vagabonds] wandering about the world now, that it is very difficult to recognize which one is our old friend.

MEXICO AND CENTRAL AMERICA

BRIBRI

---

HOW THE FIRST BRIBRI INDIANS WERE BORN

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: de Fábrega, H. Pittier. "Folklore of the Bribri and Brunka Indians in Costa Rica." Journal of American Folklore 16 (1903): 3–4.

Date: ca. 1903

Original Source: Bribri

National Origin: Native American

---

The Bribri's traditional homeland was on the Caribbean coast of Costa Rica located in Central America between Nicaragua to the north and Panama to the south. This myth of human origin establishes the territorial rights of the Bribri and the neighboring Brurán, and explains features of the natural environment. The Arari River is one of the largest waterways in the ancestral territory of the Bribri. The Djiri is a tributary of the Arari, and Torok-hu lies opposite its mouth.

---

In those far-away times, Sibû once thought what he could do to break up the seed of our kin, which he kept hidden without avail in a certain place. Then he made a bet with Jáburu, and they agreed that they would throw two cacao pods at each other, and that he should lose in whose hands the pod of cacao would break. And as Sibû did not want to lose again the seed of our kin, and let Jáburu have it, for that was the stake they were going to play for, he willed that he would choose for himself the green cacao, and give the ripe one to Jáburu. They were to throw four times.

Jáburu placed himself beyond the Arari, at the mouth of Djiri, while Sibû remained on the opposite side at Torok-hu. And Jáburu threw his pod twice, and the next time it broke in his hands, so that he lost the wager. This happened at dawn, and the angry Jáburu then proceeded to warm his chocolate, and to have the monkey, his bikd-kra or servant, serve it hot to him. But he, in trying to be quick, kicked the pot, and upset the hot chocolate. And this is how the warm spring near Torok-hu was formed. And there, where the hot water now remains, Jáburu had his large pot, and since dawn came upon him, he had to abandon it.

Just at this time our kin were born in human form. And as our forefathers were lying down on the stone banks which are still found there, they saw the peccaries going by. They went after them, and thus it was that they discovered the way over the cordillera. They got to the other side, and there they found out that the hogs had turned into men like themselves. And these are the Brurán people [neighbors of the Bribri].

THE TALE OF OUR DYING AWAY

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: de Fábrega, H. Pittier. "Folklore of the Bribri and Brunka Indians in Costa Rica." Journal of American Folklore 16 (1903): 4.

Date: ca. 1903

Original Source: Bribri

National Origin: Native American

---

In addition to explaining features of the physical environment, such as the white spots near the top of a local mountain and behavioral taboos such as the avoidance of certain areas, the following myth sets the tone for an indigenous worldview. The animal world, like some of the deities in the Bribri pantheon, conspires against human beings and threatens their continued existence.

---

Our forefathers told us that in far-away times, when we lived in other countries, the gods allowed us to be eaten by birds and animals. Once upon a time, when many of our people were playing on a plain, there came flying a mighty eagle, and he caught one of our kin and blood, and threw him into a large basket he was carrying. He carried him away to the top of the Kamuk, where he fell asleep, because he was very tired. At that time the eagle never thought of eating up our kinsman. On the morn, he flew again, carrying off his prey far away to the peak of Nëmósul, where he rested, without thinking yet of eating him.

Again he flew away, far away, and got to the ridge of Nëmóie, where he met with powerful jaguars. And he told them how he had brought the man.

One of the jaguars then proposed to him that they should eat the man together. The eagle consented, and they ate him. They ate him, and after that, the eagle flew up, high up to the top of Nēmóie. And this is the reason why we see white spots near the top of Nēmóie; they are the bones of our kinsman, and there it was that man was eaten for the first time by birds and animals, because the jaguar taught the eagle how to eat him.

Our forefathers also used to say that on the same ridge of Nēmóie there are stones shaped like jaguars. Whenever any one goes there, those stones become alive and true jaguars, because they are not stones at all, but bad spirits.

Such is the tale of our forefathers, and they also used to say, that once upon a time strange men became a prey to the jaguars, on that same ridge of Nēmóie. And this is why we are not permitted to live in these dangerous places.

HOW JÁBURU ATE THE SEED OF OUR KIN

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: de Fábrega, H. Pittier. "Folklore of the Bribri and Brunka Indians in Costa Rica." Journal of American Folklore 16 (1903): 2–3.

Date: ca. 1903

Original Source: Bribri

National Origin: Native American

---

The Bribri are a Native Central American culture who traditionally pursued an agricultural way of life on the coasts and in the mountains of Costa Rica. Their economic concerns with plant life are reflected in the incidents of the following myth. According to the research conducted by H. Pittier de Fábrega, the Bribri believed that "every man or animal was originally born from a seed like that of a plant. The seeds of the several races of man were kept in baskets which were entrusted by Sibû [their primary deity] to the keeping of the good deities. The evil ones, on the other hand, were constantly hunting for them" (2), as described in the following narrative.

---

Surá, the good God, had gone to see his cornfield. While he was away, Jáburu, the evil One, came and ate the seed of our kin which the almighty Sibû had given Surd to take care of. When Surd re-turned home, Jáburu murdered him, and buried his corpse in a hole behind the house; on the grave he planted a cacao tree and a calabash tree.

Then, Sibû the almighty God, resolved also to kill Jáburu. Moving away, he went to Jaburu's house, and talked to him, "O Thou, uncle of mine, let us have our chocolate!"

But Jáburu replied, “I have no chocolate.”

“Do not lie so openly! I have seen thy cacao fruits hanging from the tree, as I was coming.”

“It is good,” answered Jáburu, and, turning to his wives, he said to them “Go and gather cacao, and bring also a calabash,” and then Jáburu spoke again to his wives, “Let Surá’s first crop be roasted for us to drink!” They then roasted and prepared the cacao, and scooped out the calabash to drink the chocolate from.

Then Sibû, the almighty God, willed—and whatever he wills has to be, “May the first cup come to me!” and as it so came to pass, he said, “My uncle, I present this cup to thee, so that thou drinkest!”

Jáburu swallowed the chocolate at once, with such delight that his throat resounded, tshaaa!

And he said, “My uncle! I have drunk Surá’s first fruit!” But just at this moment he began to swell, and he swelled and swelled until he blew up.

Then Sibû, the almighty God, picked up again the seed of our kin, which was in Jáburu’s body, and willed, “Let Surá wake up again!” And as it so happened, he gave him back the basket with the seed of our kin to keep.

HOW SIBÛ KILLED SÓRKURA

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: de Fábrega, H. Pittier. “Folklore of the Bribri and Brunka Indians in Costa Rica.” Journal of American Folklore 16 (1903): 4–6.

Date: ca. 1903

Original Source: Bribri

National Origin: Native American

---

de Fábrega notes, “Every time the Indians find in the woods leaves sprinkled with blood, or bones and excrement, the origin of which they cannot explain, they see in them Sórkura’s relics, and turn away with awe; also leaves having the appearance of being spotted with blood, such as frequently occur in certain groups of plants (Araceae, Begonia, Columnea, etc.), are considered to be of the same origin, and are signs of ill-omen for the undertaking they are engaged upon” (6).

The following Bribri myth focuses on the origin of these ill omens, but it exhibits many of the characteristics that appear in Native American myth cross-culturally. The most powerful supernatural figure in the narrative is a shape-shifter whose motives often seem capricious and driven by whim rather than reason. The pattern of fours that figures into the plot is common, also. The significance of the skunk’s choice of the drum over the calabash lies in the fact that the calabash is a rattle used to control the cadence in ritual songs. Declining it in favor of the drum, an instrument of less importance, signifies the character's humility.

---

Sórkura was in the habit of drinking the water of a spring in which the skunk used to ease his body. Sibû, the almighty God, thought it would be well that Sórkura should kill the skunk. And so it happened: Sórkura went to watch the skunk, killed it, and hung its dead body to dry on the fire, since it was a prophet of ill-omen.

Now, while Sórkura was in the woods, Sibû went to his house. Sibû went to Sórkura door, and spoke to the spider, "Art thou there, art thou there?"

And the spider answered, "Here I am, here I am."

Sibû also asked the dried skunk, "Art thou there and dry?"

And the dried skunk answered, "Here I am and dry!"

Sibû had brought with him a cotton apron. He blew on the skunk, and it breathed again; it stood on its hind legs like a man, and was ordered to fasten the apron upon his body. Sibû had brought, also, the Singer's Calabash, and he said to the skunk, "O thou, my uncle; thou shalt get the Calabash!"

The skunk replied, "Oh no, I prefer to have the Drum of the Helper!"

Then they played for a long time, until the music pervaded the wilderness. And Sórkura, alone in the woods, said to himself, "What is that resounding tuit, tuu, in my house?"

And he thought, "What is it that so resounds? No one would dare to go to my house to bewitch." Then he thought again that he would go and watch. He went home, and hid himself behind a wall, to wait and see.

Sibû came again to play with the skunk. But then Sórkura was waiting for him with his spears. He threw one of these, and Sibû evaded it, so that it stuck fast in a wooden pillar; he threw another, but Sibû warded it off with a pot; the third one fell into the fire, and the fourth went through the door. And then Sibû ran away so swiftly that Sórkura only could grasp the whistle, which remained in his hand. Sórkura's people went after Sibû to kill him, but he could not be found.

Four days passed by, and Sibû was not seen anywhere. When he went back to Sórkura's house, this time under the disguise of an old Sórkura, buried in far-away times, and now covered full with wounds and sores, he said, "I am told that your boys stole Sibû's whistle."

Sórkura answered, "How is it? Dost thou happen to be Sibû?"

Then Sibû spoke again, "Thou willest make fun of me, because I am so old and sore! I Sibû, the Almighty! Could Sibû be like myself?"

But Sórkura insisted, "No, thou mightst be Sibû."

And Sibû went on, "Was Sibû, the Whistle-Bearer, like myself?"

Sórkura went and took the whistle, which was hanging from the brim of a basket. He showed it to Sibû, and Sibû grasped it; but Sórkura did not loose the string. Then Sibû spoke once more, and said, "The good gods manifest good virtues: what you have done is wrong! Let the string go."

But Sórkura said, "No."

Sibû then willed, "May he let me have the whistle! May he look back into the house!" And as this happened, Sibû ran away and ran on whistling all the while.

Meanwhile Sórkura thought he would go and set him an ambush on the path. He took four of his spears and his shield, hung his conch upon a string around his body, and said to his people, "I will go and kill Sibû; when you hear my conch resound, Sibû shall be dead. Then you are to warm up my cacao, as I will soon be back." He then went and waited for Sibû to pass by, and when Sibû came along, he threw one of his spears at him.

But Sibû had on the back of his head another ear, which warned him that some one was going to shoot at him. The spear fell noisily on his side. Sórkura made another throw, but without effect. And now Sibû took one of the spears in his hand, and threw it at Sórkura, who received it on his shield. Then Sibû willed, "I will kill Sórkura; may he look over his shield!" Then he took a new aim, and Sórkura was shot just in the middle of his face. And Sibû took the conch, and blew: Tuit, tuu, so that the woods resounded, and he cut Sórkura body into pieces with his knife, and made it into flesh, bones, blood, and bowels, which ever since have been things of ill-omen to us.

Sórkura's people waited long, and kept his chocolate warm for him; but he never came back. Sibû had killed Sórkura!

MAYA

---

THE MAYA CREATION

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Spence, Lewis. The Popol Vuh: The Mythic and Heroic Sagas of the Kichés of Central America. London: David Nutt, 1908. 217–219.

Date: pre-1500 C.E.

Original Source: Maya

National Origin: Native American

---

Over the course of approximately 3,000 years, the Maya developed a sophisticated, urban civilization that dominated an area extending from southern Mexico and the Yucatan Peninsula into the modern Central American nations of Belize, Guatemala, Honduras, and El Salvador. Contemporary Maya descendants of the classical civilization still reside throughout this area. The Popol Vuh, excerpts of which comprise the following narratives, is a collection of Guatemalan Mayan myths copied in the mid-sixteenth century from documents originally written during the post-Classical period (1000–1400 C.E.) using the Quiché writing system. The following creation myth details the wrath of the divine creator Hurakan at the neglect displayed by his first creations.

---

Over a universe wrapped in the gloom of a dense and primeval night passed the god Hurakan, the mighty wind. He called out “earth,” and the solid land appeared. The chief gods took counsel; they were Hurakan, Gucumatz, the serpent covered with green feathers, and Xpiyacoc and Xmucane, the mother and father gods. As the result of their deliberations animals were created. But as yet man was not.

To supply the deficiency the divine beings resolved to create manikins carved out of wood. But these soon incurred the displeasure of the gods, who, irritated by their lack of reverence, resolved to destroy them. Then by the will of Hurakan, the Heart of Heaven, the waters were swollen, and a great flood came upon the manikins of wood. They were drowned and a thick resin fell from heaven. The bird Xecotcovach tore out their eyes; the bird Camulatz cut off their heads; the bird Cotzbalam devoured their flesh; the bird Tecumbalam broke their bones and sinews and ground them into powder.

Because they had not thought on Hurakan, therefore, the face of the earth grew dark, and a pouring rain commenced, raining by day and by night. Then all sorts of beings, great and small, gathered together to abuse the men to their faces. The very household utensils and animals jeered at them, their mill-stones, their plates, their cups, their dogs, their hens.

Said the dogs and hens, "Very badly have you treated us, and you have bitten us. Now we bite you in turn."

Said the mill-stones (metates used for grinding corn), "Very much were we tormented by you, and daily, daily, night and day, it was squeak, screech, screech, for your sake. Now you shall feel our strength, and we will grind your flesh and make meal of your bodies."

And the dogs upbraided the manikins because they had not been fed, and tore the unhappy images with their teeth.

And the cups and dishes said, "Pain and misery you gave us, smoking our tops and sides, cooking us over the fire burning and hurting us as if we had no feeling. Now it is your turn, and you shall burn."

Then ran the manikins hither and thither in despair. They climbed to the roofs of the houses, but the houses crumbled under their feet; they tried to mount to the tops of the trees, but the trees hurled them from them; they sought refuge in the caverns, but the caverns closed before them. Thus was accomplished the ruin of this race, destined to be overthrown. And it is said that their posterity are the little monkeys who live in the woods.

VUKUB-CAKIX, THE GREAT MACAW

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Spence, Lewis. The Myths of Mexico and Peru. London: G. G. Harrap and Company, 1913. Internet Sacred Text Archive <http://www.sacred-texts.com/nam/mmp/mmp1.htm> (April 10, 2007).

Date: pre-1500 C.E.

Original Source: Maya

National Origin: Native American

In his vanity, the demon Vukub-Cakix considered himself the source of all light, the sun and the moon god. Their exploits in serving the will of the gods and cleansing the universe of destructive forces is typical of twin culture heroes of myth. So, too, is their use of guile rather than brawn in overcoming the superior forces of the demon and his titanic sons.

---

Ere the earth was quite recovered from the wrathful flood which had descended upon it, there lived a being orgulous and full of pride, called Vukub-Cakix (“Seven times-the-color-of-fire,” the Kiche name for the great macaw bird). His teeth were of emerald, and other parts of him shone with the brilliance of gold and silver. He boasted dreadfully, and his conduct so irritated the other gods that they resolved upon his destruction. His two sons, Zipacna and Cabrakan (Cockspur or Earth-heaper, and Earthquake), were earthquake-gods. These also were prideful and arrogant, and to cause their downfall the gods dispatched the heavenly twins Hun-Apu and Xbalanque to earth, with instructions to chastise the trio.

Vukub-Cakix prided himself upon his possession of the wonderful nanze tree, the tapal, bearing a fruit round, yellow, and aromatic, upon which he breakfasted every morning. One morning he mounted to its summit, whence he could best espy the choicest fruits, when he was surprised and infuriated to observe that two strangers had arrived there before him, and had almost denuded the tree of its produce. On seeing Vukub, Hun-Apu raised a blow-pipe to his mouth and blew a dart at the giant. It struck him on the mouth, and he fell from the top of the tree to the ground. Hun-Apu leapt down upon Vukub and grappled with him, but the giant in terrible anger seized the god by the arm and wrenched it from the body. He then returned to his house, where he was met by his wife, Chimalmat, who inquired for what reason he roared with pain. In reply he pointed to his mouth, and so full of anger was he against Hun-Apu that he took the arm he had wrenched from him and hung it over a blazing fire. He then threw himself down to bemoan his injuries, consoling himself, however, with the idea that he had avenged himself upon the disturbers of his peace.

Whilst Vukub-Cakix moaned and howled with the dreadful pain which he felt in his jaw and teeth (for the dart which had pierced him was probably poisoned) the arm of Hun-Apu hung over the fire, and was turned round and round and basted by Vukub’s spouse, Chimalmat. The sun-god rained bitter imprecations upon the interlopers who had penetrated to his paradise and had caused him such woe, and he gave vent to dire threats of what would happen if he succeeded in getting them into his power.

But Hun-Apu and Xbalanque were not minded that Vukub-Cakix should escape so easily, and the recovery of Hun-Apu's arm must be made at all hazards. So they went to consult two great and wise magicians, Xpiyacoc and Xmucane, in whom we see two of the original Kiche creative deities, who advised them to proceed with them in disguise to the dwelling of Vukub, if they wished to recover the lost arm. The old magicians resolved to disguise themselves as doctors, and dressed Hun-Apu and Xbalanque in other garments to represent their sons.

Shortly they arrived at the mansion of Vukub, and while still some way off they could hear his groans and cries. Presenting themselves at the door, they accosted him. They told him that they had heard some one crying out in pain, and that as famous doctors they considered it their duty to ask who was suffering.

Vukub appeared quite satisfied, but closely questioned the old wizards concerning the two young men who accompanied them.

"They are our sons," they replied.

"Good," said Vukub. "Do you think you will be able to cure me?"

"We have no doubt whatever upon that head," answered Xpiyacoc. "You have sustained very bad injuries to your mouth and eyes."

"The demons who shot me with an arrow from their, blow-pipe are the cause of my sufferings," said Vukub. "If you are able to cure me I shall reward you richly."

"Your Highness has many bad teeth, which must be removed," said the wily old magician. "Also the balls of your eyes appear to me to be diseased."

Vukub appeared highly alarmed, but the magicians speedily reassured him.

"It is necessary," said Xpiyacoc, "that we remove your teeth, but we will take care to replace them with grains of maize, which you will find much more agreeable in every way."

The unsuspecting giant agreed to the operation, and very quickly Xpiyacoc, with the help of Xmucane, removed his teeth of emerald, and replaced them by grains of white maize. A change quickly came over the Titan. His brilliancy speedily vanished, and when they removed the balls of his eyes he sank into insensibility and died.

All this time the wife of Vukub was turning Hun-Apu's arm over the fire, but Hun-Apu snatched the limb from above the brazier, and with the help of the magicians replaced it upon his shoulder. The discomfiture of Vukub was then complete. The party left his dwelling feeling that their mission had been accomplished.

But in reality it was only partially accomplished, because Vukub's two sons, Zipacna and Cabrakan, still remained to be dealt with. Zipacna was daily employed in heaping up mountains, while Cabrakan, his brother, shook them in earthquake. The vengeance of Hun-Apu and Xbalanque was first directed against Zipacna, and they conspired with a band of young men to bring about his death.

The young men, four hundred in number, pretended to be engaged in building a house. They cut down a large tree, which they made believe was to be the roof-tree of their dwelling, and waited in a part of the forest through which they knew Zipacna must pass. After a while they could hear the giant crashing through the trees. He came into sight, and when he saw them standing round the giant tree-trunk, which they could not lift, he seemed very much amused.

“What have you there, O little ones?” he said laughing.

“Only a tree, your Highness, which we have felled for the roof tree of a new house we are building.”

“Cannot you carry it?” asked the giant disdainfully.

“No, your Highness,” they made answer; “it is much too heavy to be lifted even by our united efforts.”

With a good-natured laugh the Titan stooped and lifted the great trunk upon his shoulder. Then, bidding them lead the way, he trudged through the forest, evidently not disconcerted in the least by his great burden. Now the young men, incited by Hun-Apu and Xbalanque, had dug a great ditch, which they pretended was to serve for the foundation of their new house. Into this they requested Zipacna to descend, and, scenting no mischief, the giant readily complied. On his reaching the bottom his treacherous acquaintances cast huge trunks of trees upon him, but on hearing them coming down he quickly took refuge in a small side tunnel which the youths had constructed to serve as a cellar beneath their house.

Imagining the giant to be killed, they began at once to express their delight by singing and dancing, and to lend color to his stratagem Zipacna dispatched several friendly ants to the surface with strands of hair, which the young men concluded had been taken from his dead body. Assured by the seeming proof of his death, the youths proceeded to build their house upon the tree-trunks which they imagined covered Zipacna’s body, and, producing a quantity of pulque [alcoholic beverage made from the fermented juice of the “century plant,” the agave], they began to make merry over the end of their enemy. For some hours their new dwelling rang with revelry.

All this time Zipacna, quietly hidden below, was listening to the hubbub and waiting his chance to revenge himself upon those who had entrapped him.

Suddenly arising in his giant might, he cast the house and all its inmates high in the air. The dwelling was utterly demolished, and the band of youths were hurled with such force into the sky that they remained there, and in the stars we call the Pleiades we can still discern them wearily waiting an opportunity to return to earth.

But Hun-Apu and Xbalanque, grieved that their comrades had so perished, resolved that Zipacna must not be permitted to escape so easily. He, carrying the mountains by night, sought his food by day on the shore of the river, where he wandered catching fish and crabs. The brothers made a large artificial crab, which they placed in a cavern at the bottom of a ravine. They then cunningly undermined a huge mountain, and awaited events. Very soon they saw Zipacna wandering along the side of the river, and asked him where he was going.

“Oh, I am only seeking my daily food,” replied the giant.

“And what may that consist of?” asked the brothers.

“Only of fish and crabs,” replied Zipacna.

“Oh, there is a crab down yonder,” said the crafty brothers, pointing to the bottom of the ravine. “We espied it as we came along. Truly, it is a great crab, and will furnish you with a capital breakfast.”

“Splendid!” cried Zipacna, with glistening eyes. “I must have it at once,” and with one bound he leapt down to where the cunningly contrived crab lay in the cavern.

No sooner had he reached it than Hun-Apu and Xbalanque cast the mountain upon him; but so desperate were his efforts to get free that the brothers feared he might rid himself of the immense weight of earth under which he was buried, and to make sure of his fate they turned him into stone.

Thus at the foot of Mount Meahuan, near Vera Paz, perished the proud Mountain-Maker.

Now only the third of this family of boasters remained, and he was the most proud of any.

“I am the Overtuner of Mountains!” said he.

But Hun-Apu and Xbalanque had made up their minds that not one of the race of Vukub should be left alive.

At the moment when they were plotting the overthrow of Cabrakan he was occupied in moving mountains. He seized the mountains by their bases and, exerting his mighty strength, cast them into the air; and of the smaller mountains he took no account at all. While he was so employed he met the brothers, who greeted him cordially.

“Good day, Cabrakan,” said they. “What may you be doing?”

“Bah! nothing at all,” replied the giant. “Cannot you see that I am throwing the mountains about, which is my usual occupation? And who may you be that ask such stupid questions? What are your names?”

“We have no names,” replied they. “We are only hunters, and here we have our blow-pipes, with which we shoot the birds that live in these mountains. So you see that we do not require names, as we meet no one.”

Cabrakan looked at the brothers disdainfully, and was about to depart when they said to him, “Stay; we should like to behold these mountain-throwing feats of yours.”

This aroused the pride of Cabrakan.

“Well, since you wish it,” said he, “I will show you how I can move a really great mountain. Now, choose the one you would like to see me destroy, and before you are aware of it I shall have reduced it to dust.”

Hun-Apu looked around him, and espying a great peak pointed toward it. “Do you think you could overthrow that mountain?” he asked.

“Without the least difficulty,” replied Cabrakan, with a great laugh. “Let us go toward it.”

“But first you must eat,” said Hun-Apu. “You have had no food since morning, and so great a feat can hardly be accomplished fasting.”

The giant smacked his lips. “You are right” he said, with a hungry look. Cabrakan was one of those people who are always hungry. “But what have you to give me?”

“We have nothing with us,” said Hun-Apu.

“Umph!” growled Cabrakan, “you are a pretty fellow. You ask me what I will have to eat, and then tell me you have nothing,” and in his anger he seized one of the smaller mountains and threw it into the sea, so that the waves splashed up to the sky.

“Come,” said Hun-Apu, “don’t get angry. We have our blow-pipes with us, and will shoot a bird for your dinner.”

On hearing this Cabrakan grew somewhat quieter. “Why did you not say so at first?” he growled. “But be quick, because I am hungry.”

Just at that moment a large bird passed overhead, and Hun-Apu and Xbalanque raised their blow-pipes to their mouths. The darts sped swiftly upward, and both of them struck the bird, which came tumbling down through the air, falling at the feet of Cabrakan.

“Wonderful, wonderful!” cried the giant. “You are clever fellows indeed, and, seizing the dead bird, he was going to eat it raw when Hun-Apu stopped him.”

“Wait a moment,” said he. “It will be much nicer when cooked,” and, rubbing two sticks together, he ordered Xbalanque to gather some dry wood, so that a fire was soon blazing. The bird was then suspended over the fire, and in a short time a savory odor mounted to the nostrils of the giant, who stood watching the cooking with hungry eyes and watering lips. Before placing the bird over the fire to cook, however, Hun-Apu had smeared its feathers with a thick coating of mud. The Indians in some parts of Central America still do this, so that when the mud dries with the heat of the fire the feathers will come off with it, leaving the flesh of the bird quite ready to eat. But Hun-Apu had done this with a purpose. The mud that he spread on the feathers was that of a poisoned earth, called tizate, the elements of which sank deeply into the flesh of the bird.

When the savory mess was cooked, he handed it to Cabrakan, who speedily devoured it. “Now” said Hun-Apu, “let us go toward that great mountain and see if you can lift it as you boast.”

But already Cabrakan began to feel strange pangs. “What is this?” said he, passing his hand across his brow. “I do not seem to see the mountain you mean.”

“Nonsense,” said Hun-Apu. “Yonder it is, see, to the east there.”

“My eyes seem dim this morning,” replied the giant.

“No, it is not that,” said Hun-Apu. “You have boasted that you could lift this mountain, and now you are afraid to try.”

“I tell you,” said Cabrakan, “that I have difficulty in seeing. Will you lead me to the mountain?”

“Certainly,” said Hun-Apu, giving him his hand, and with several strides they were at the foot of the eminence.

“Now,” said Hun-Apu, “see what you can do, boaster.”

Cabrakan gazed stupidly at the great mass in front of him. His knees shook together so that the sound was like the beating of a war-drum, and the sweat poured from his forehead and ran in a little stream down the side of the mountain.

“Come,” cried Hun-Apu derisively, “are you going to lift the mountain or not?”

“He cannot,” sneered Xbalanque. “I knew he could not.”

Cabrakan shook himself into a final effort to regain his senses, but all to no purpose. The poison rushed through his blood, and with a groan he fell dead before the brothers.

Thus perished the last of the earth-giants of Guatemala, whom Hun-Apu and Xbalanque had been sent to destroy.

THE CALABASH TREE

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Hartman, C. V. “The Story of the Calabash-Tree in the Popol Vuh.” Journal of American Folklore 20 (1907): 148–150.

Date: pre-1500 C.E.

Original Source: Maya

National Origin: Native American

---

“The Calabash Tree” is the prequel to “Vukub-Cakix, the Great Macaw” (page 358). Hun-hun-ahpu and Vucub-hun-ahpu are divine athletes who excelled at juego de pelota (Spanish, “ball game”) a ritualized pre-Columbian game. Lured to Xibalba by an invitation to a ball game, they were killed and dismembered by Hun-came and Vucub-came (Vukub-Cakix or Vucub-Caquix). The sons of Hun-hun-ahpu, the hero twins Hun-Apu and Xbalanqu, subsequently avenged their father after their miraculous birth from spittle. C. V. Hartman contends that the birth from spittle is a widely distributed motif in Native American myth.

---

The two brother wizards Hun-hun-ahpu and Vucub-hun-ahpu were condemned to death by the rulers of the nether world, Hun-came and Vucub-came, on their visiting them, inasmuch as they did not succeed in passing through the ordeals to which they were subjected....

“That is sufficient,” said Hun-came and Vucub-came, “now your days are accomplished! Ye shall die the death! Ye shall cease to exist! Ye shall be rent in pieces and your countenances shall be hid here in this place!”

They were, therefore, hewn in pieces and buried on the spot whereupon the ashes were wont to be cast. But ere that took place, the head of Hun-hun-ahpu was severed from his body and placed, by order of Hun-came and Vucub-came, between the two main branches of a dry tree by the wayside.

Thereupon the tree began to blossom and bear fruit, and the fruit thereof is what we now call “jicaras.” Hun-came and Vucub-came were mightily astonished at the wonder that had taken place. Round fruits were to be seen all along the branches, and shortly it was impossible to distinguish Hun-hun-aphu’s head from the other fruits on the tree. It took the shape of a calabash. All those who dwelt in the nether regions went out to behold the marvel. The tree was very highly esteemed and prized, for in a moment of time, on their depositing the head of Hun-hun-aphu in the fork of the tree, it had received life, and they said among themselves, “Do not pluck the fruit of the tree! Do not walk beneath this tree!” Such was the determination of all those who dwell in the nether regions. Now a young girl heard the story of the miracle that had happened. We are now about to narrate how it was that she went to the spot where the tree stood.

Herein is narrated an account of a young virgin, the daughter of a great lord of the name of Cuchumaquic.

A young girl, the daughter of a great lord, Cuchumaquic by name, and of a woman of the name of Xequic (blood), heard, her father speak about the marvelous tree. Astonished at what she had heard she exclaimed, “Why should I not go down to see the tree they are talking about; for, in truth, what they relate is very strange and delightful.”

She went there straightway alone and went up to the foot of the tree, which was just opposite the place where the ash-heap lay. On seeing it she exclaimed in astonishment, “What beautiful fruits, and how very fruitful the tree is! I surely shall not die, shall not perish, if I take one of these fruits.”

Then the skull fixed between the branches spoke and said, “What do you want? These round things are only bones of the dead, but perchance you desire them nevertheless.”

“Yes,” answered the girl, “I should like to have one of those fruits.”

“Stretch out your right hand,” said the skull.

“Gladly,” said the girl, stretching up her right hand towards the skull. The skull thereupon spat right in the middle of her hand. The girl immediately drew back her hand and looked into it, without, however, observing a single trace of the spittle of the skull.

“I have given you a sign,” said the skull, “in my spittle and slaver; this head of mine will never speak any more, for it is only bone; there is no flesh left here. The same shall be the fate of all mighty men whoever they may be.... They are only honored for the sake of their flesh, and when they die human beings are terrified at the skull, and its progeny is as spittle and slaver. But if they be children of a wise and clever man, the being of the wise man is not terminated but passes to the sons and daughters he has engendered. My being has now passed into you. Rise from the realms of the dead to the earth, in order that you may not die.”

So spoke the head of Hun-hun-ahpu. That was the word of wisdom and the message of Huracan, of Chipacaculha and Raxacaculha, and in accordance with their orders it was done. Then the young girl returned to her home, after hearing many words of counsel and messages.

In a short time she was conscious of being with child as a result of what was only spittle. The children who were born were Hun-hun-ahpu and Xbalanque. Six months afterwards the girl’s father became aware of her being with child, and she was severely reprimanded by him.

Then assembled in the council-chamber Hun-came, Vucub-came, and Cuchumaquic. The last named said, “My daughter is with child by reason of her dishonorable ways of life.” So spoke Cuchumaquic, when he stepped forward before his masters.

“That is sufficient,” they replied; “subject her to cross-examination, that she may confess and we may hear what she has to say in her defense.”

“Good, noble lords,” he replied, and thereupon at once asked his daughter, “Whose is the child thou hast in thy womb?”

She replied, “I am not with child, O my father! No man hath ever approached unto me.”

“Thou hast brought dishonor upon thyself,” was the father’s answer. “Come hither now and carry her away to be sacrificed, and then bring me her heart in a calabash.” This command was given to the owls, who were four in number.

They went straightway and brought a calabash, carried away the girl, taking with them a sharp knife to cut her asunder with.

The girl then said to those who had been sent, “Kill me not, for I have not done any wrong, for the fetus I have in my womb came there of itself; what happened was this: I went out to divert myself by beholding the marvel that had taken place with regard to Hun-hun-aphu’s head on the ash-heap; do not therefore put me to death!”

The messengers replied, “Well, then, what are we to take with us in the calabash instead of your heart? Did not our masters order that it was to be placed in this calabash? We would gladly set you at liberty.”

“Good,” said she. “This heart does not belong to them ... it shall not be burnt in their sight; put in the calabash the fruit of this tree,” said the girl, and the sap of the tree was red. The sap was tapped into the calabash, and at once it coagulated and formed a round ball. And the hardened sap was placed in the calabash instead of the heart, and in color it was red as blood ... and this tree is called “granapalo colorado” or the blood tree.

MEXICO

---

TALE OF THE RABBIT

Tradition Bearer: Unknown

Source: Boas, Franz. "Notes on Mexican Folklore." Journal of American Folklore 25 (1912): 204–210.

Date: ca. 1912

Original Source: Mexico

National Origin: Mexican

---

Mexico, south of the United States and north of Guatemala, was the birthplace of several of the most advanced cultures in the Western hemisphere (see, for example, the Maya tales, pages 357–366, and the Nahuatl tales, pages 393–401). With the Spanish conquest in the 1500s, European influence extended into the traditional folktale repertoire. The "Tale of the Rabbit," actually a tale cycle, attests to this European and Native American blending. Franz Boas notes that "The people of Pochutla [the village in which he collected the following tale cycle] today speak Spanish, and their folk-lore is based largely on Spanish sources" (204). An important position among the folktales is held by the "Rabbit and Coyote" tales, which are known from Mexico City eastward to the Gulf Coast, and southward to Central America. The following ordinary tale contains a number of traditional tale types. Among them are "Tarbaby and Rabbit" (AT 175), "The Wolf Dives into the Water for Reflected Cheese" (AT 34), "Holding up the Rock" (AT 1530), and "Hello, house!: Cave Call" (AT 66A).

---

There was a woman who had a chile-garden; and every day she went to watch it, because the Rabbit ate much of it. One day she went, and on the road met an arriera [a species of ant], and asked her if she did not know how to prevent the Rabbit from eating the chile. The arriera replied that she did not know, and that she should ask her sister the barendera [a species of ant], who came behind. She met the barendera, and asked her. Then she said that she should make four little monkeys of wax, and that she should nail them up in the opening in the wall where the Rabbit entered, two on each side, and that she should go the next day to see if the Rabbit had fallen into the trap.

She placed the four little monkeys of wax; and the Rabbit arrived, and said to them, "See here, monkey of wax? If you do not let me pass, I'll box your ears"; and he boxed his ears, and his little hand stuck fast.

He said again, "Look here, little monkey of wax! If you don't let me pass, I have another hand, and I'll box your ears again; and he boxed his ears, and the other little hand stuck fast.

He said again, "Look here, little monkey of wax! If you do not let go of my little hands, I'll kick you"; and he kicked him, and his little foot stuck fast.

He said again, "Look here, little monkey of wax! If you don't let go of my hands and of my foot, I'll kick you again. I have another little foot."

They were talking thus when the good little daughter arrived, and said to him, "Ah, it must be you who eats my chile. Now you'll pay it to me." She put him in a net which she was carrying, and took him to her house.

When she arrived, she hung him up in the middle of the house, and said, "What shall I do with you?" She thought she would throw boiling water over him; but the lady had no water, and went to fetch it and left the door locked.

The Rabbit was still hanging in the net; but since the house stood by the roadside, it so happened that a Coyote passed by, and the Rabbit, as soon as he saw the Coyote, began to talk, to speak, and said, "How can they want to marry me by force—me, who is so small, and I do not want to marry!"

Then the Coyote drew near, and asked him what he was saying; and Rabbit spoke to him, (asking him) if he (the Coyote) would not place himself in that net, for he himself was caught in the net because they wanted to marry him to a pretty girl, and he did not want to marry. Then the Coyote said to him that he accepted what the Rabbit proposed. The Coyote placed himself in the net, and the Rabbit escaped.

When the dear old woman found the Coyote, she said to him, "Ah, how did the Rabbit turn into a Coyote!" [She] put the pot of water over the fire, and, when it was boiling, she threw it over the Coyote. The Coyote was burnt, but only his backside was burnt. Then the Coyote left, rolling himself on the road, but the Rabbit was on a pitahaya ("dragon fruit" that grows on a variety of cactus) plantation.

When the Coyote passed by, the Rabbit said to him, "Good-day, Uncle Coyote!" and then the Coyote turned to see who spoke to him, and the Coyote said, "Why did you deceive me?"

And the Rabbit replied, "Because they did not find me, they punished you; but really I was about to marry a girl."

Then he said to him, "Better let us eat pitahayas," and threw one down from above. He said to him, "Shut your eyes and open your mouth!" He threw one down, and then another one. The two were clean; but the third one he did not clean, but threw it down with all the spines on it. The Coyote rolled about, and the Rabbit went away.

He saw the Coyote pass by, and said to him, "Coyote, burnt backsides!"

The Coyote said, "What do you say to me?" and the Rabbit replied, "I say to you, that you shall come and help me rock my little sister, who is crying, and my mother is not here." [Rabbit had put a wasps' nest in the cradle and covered it with a blanket. The buzzing of the insects was the sound that Rabbit identified as crying].

The Coyote did not reply to this. "You owe me much. You deceived me, saying that I was going to marry, and then you threw me a pitakaya with spines, and now I'll take revenge for what you have done to me."

He said to him, "But I do not know you, and have never seen you. Maybe those are others, perhaps my brothers."

And the Coyote said to him, "Then you have brothers?"

"Certainly," he said to him. "Man alive, who knows which one that may be!"

"And you, what are you doing here?"

"My mother has been away a long time to get tortillas to eat, and left me here rocking this little girl. Now I wish that you would stay here in my place, while I go to look for her, that she may come." The Coyote stayed there.

When the Rabbit left, he said to him, "If you see that my sister does not stop crying, box her ears and leave her."

The Coyote did so. He got tired of rocking the cradle, and the noise did not stop. He boxed her ears with vigor, and out came a swarm of wasps, who gave the Coyote a good dose [of stinging] and flew away.

The Coyote followed the road, and said to himself, "Where shall I find the Rabbit?" He walked along the road.

The Rabbit spoke to him, and said, "Coyote, burnt backsides?" and the Coyote asked him what he was saying.

The Rabbit said to him that he was asking him to help him pull out a cheese that was there. The Rabbit was in a pond, and the moon was shining and was seen in the water, and this was the cheese which the Rabbit said he was pulling out. The Rabbit left the Coyote there, saying that he was going to rest for a while, because he was very tired. The Coyote began to pull at the cheese; but since he could never do it, he got tired and went on his way.

After that he walked along the road, when the Rabbit spoke to him, and said, "Good-day, Uncle Coyote!"

The Coyote said to him, "Now you won't escape me, for you have deceived me much."

"No," said the Rabbit to him, "it is not I. Since the world has existed I have been placed here in this place, with this stone in my hand"; for the Rabbit, as soon as he had seen the Coyote, put a large stone into his hand, and said that he had been left right there supporting that stone, for, if he let go of it, the world would be lost.

The Coyote believed him; and the Rabbit said to him, "Sir, will you not help me a little while with this stone, for I am very tired?"

The Coyote took the stone. The Rabbit said to him, "Uncle Coyote, sir? Don't let go of the stone, else the world will be lost."

The Rabbit went away, saying to the Coyote that he would soon return; but the Rabbit did not come back. He went on; and the Coyote, who was tired, let the stone down gradually, and looked at the sky to see if it was coming down. But when he looked and saw that it was not so, he let the stone down until he put it down on the ground.

He left it and went, and said, "Whenever I find the Rabbit, I must kill him, because he has fooled me too much."

The Rabbit placed himself by the wayside, among the reeds. When the Coyote passed by, the Rabbit held a guitar, which, as soon as he saw the Coyote, he began to play, and said, "Good-day, Uncle Coyote!"

The Coyote said to him, "Come down, that we may talk together!"

"No, Uncle Coyote! Indeed, sir, you are much annoyed with me."

The Coyote said to him, "You have deceived me much, and therefore I am annoyed."

"No, Uncle Coyote," he said to him, "I am the best one of all, and, sir, don't be annoyed with me. I know well what has happened, but I did not do those things. My brother, he is a very bad one, it is he who has done all these things. But now he is about to marry, and I am waiting for them. They have been delayed a very long time. Who knows what they are doing! I should like to go and look for them if you would stay here and play the guitar; I'll give you a sign, sir, when the bridal couple are coming. I'll fire some rockets, so that you may know it, sir; and then you must play more strongly, so that they can dance when they come."

The Coyote did so. The Rabbit went. After a little while the Rabbit came and set fire to the reeds. The Coyote, believing that the bridal couple were coming, continued to play and began to dance. Before he knew it, he was in the midst of the flames. He could not escape; and the poor Coyote was burnt, and died.

The Rabbit came to look, and mourned the death of the Coyote, and said to himself, "Poor Uncle Coyote! Now he is dead, indeed, and where shall I go now?"

The Rabbit went to the bank of a river. He could not cross the river, and began to say, "Whoever takes me across may eat me."

He was saying thus, when the Alligator came, and said to him, "I'll take you across."

"Well!" said the Rabbit. He climbed up on the back of the Alligator.

When he came near the other bank, the Alligator said to him, "Now I am going to eat you."

“And don’t you feel any pity,” replied the Rabbit, “to eat such a little fatty as myself?” The Alligator said, “What shall we do?”

“Let us go nearer the bank,” replied the Rabbit, “that you may eat me easily, sir.” Already they were on the bank. The Rabbit said to the Alligator, “Does it not seem to you, sir, that there are some large leaves there? I’ll fetch them; and then I shall throw myself down, that you may not lose anything.”

The Alligator agreed. The Rabbit went, and never came back.

On the other side there were old stubbles; and the Rabbit found only a little piece of field, and thought, “I’ll sell much corn, and to whom shall I sell it? I’ll sell one bushel to Aunt Cockroach, another one to Aunt Hen, one to Uncle Dog, one to Uncle Lion, and one to Uncle Hunter.”

The time came when the corn was to be delivered. The Rabbit had a little ranch; and when he went out to take a walk, he used to lock the door of the ranch. Since, however, he had fooled the Alligator and owed him his life, the Alligator informed himself as to where he lived, and went to place himself near his bed, that the Alligator might eat the Rabbit when he arrived.

The Rabbit was on his guard; and when he arrived, he said, “Good-day, dear House!” The House never replied; but one day when he said, “Good-day, dear House!” the Alligator replied, “Good-day, Rabbit!”

“What? You never answer me, dear House!” He opened the door, looked inside, and, when he saw the back of the Alligator, he said, “What are those pegs that I see here? I am not a guitar-player, and I am not a violinist. I had better go to another ranch!”

There he was when the Cockroach arrived. “Good-day, Uncle Rabbit!”

“Good-day, Aunt Cockroach.”

“I come for my corn.”

“All right, only it is very early. Let us lunch first, and then we will go.”

They were waiting for their lunch when they saw the Hen. The Rabbit said to the Cockroach, “Listen, Aunt Cockroach! Will not the Hen want to eat you?”

“Certainly, where shall I hide?”

The Rabbit said to her, “Madam, hide under this piece of bark here.”

When the Hen arrived, “Good-day, Uncle Rabbit!”

“Good-day, Aunt Hen!”

“I came for my corn.”

“Certainly, let us first take lunch, and then we will go and shell it.” The Hen sat down; and the Rabbit said to her, “Madam, would you not like to eat a cockroach?”

“Certainly,” said the Hen, “where is it?”

The Rabbit showed her the cockroach, and the Rabbit said, “Thus I am getting rid of my troubles.”

The Rabbit and the Hen were talking when they discovered the Dog, who was coming.

The Rabbit said, "Where are you going to hide, madam? For the Dog is coming, and will want to eat you. Hide under this carrying-basket." The Hen hid, and the Dog arrived.

"Good-day, Uncle Rabbit!"

"Good-day, Uncle Dog?"

"I came for my corn."

"Certainly! Sit down for a moment." The Dog seated himself; and the Rabbit said, "Listen, sir! Would you not like to eat a hen?"

"Where is it?"

"It is under this basket." The Dog ate the hen, and continued to talk with the Rabbit.

They were still talking when they saw the Lion; and the Rabbit asked the Dog if he was not afraid that the Lion would eat him.

The Dog said, "I am frightened. Where shall I hide?" and the Dog hid behind the house.

The Lion arrived. "Good-day, Uncle Rabbit!"

"Good-day, Uncle Lion!"

"I came for my corn."

The Rabbit said to him, "Sir, enter for a moment, we will go right away." The Lion entered; and the Rabbit said to him, "I'll tell you something, sir. Would you not like to eat a dog?"

"Why not? Where is it?" The Rabbit showed him where the dog was, and the Lion ate it at once.

There they were still talking when they discovered the Hunter, who was coming; and the Rabbit said, "Will he not want to kill you, sir?"

"Certainly," said the Lion. "Where shall I hide?"

"Hide on the rafter of the house. There he will not see you, sir, even if he should come. He will not do you any harm."

The Hunter arrived. "Good-day, Uncle Rabbit!"

"Good-day, Uncle Hunter!"

"I came for my corn."

"Certainly, Certainly," he said to him. "Come in, sir, and take a lunch first of hot cakes and fresh cheese, and then we will go to shell the corn. This is the only remaining debt that I have. Meanwhile, sir, would you not like to kill a lion?"

The Hunter said "Where is it?" The Rabbit showed him where the lion was, which the Hunter killed. The Hunter killed the lion, and the Rabbit made his escape. When the Hunter came back to the house to look for the Rabbit, he did not find him. The Rabbit had gone away.

He went on, and met a Serpent, who was under a stone and could in no way get out; and she asked every one who passed to pull her out. The Rabbit took pity on her and went to get some levers. He lifted the stone, and the Serpent was able to get out. When she was free, she wanted to eat the Rabbit.

Then he said to her, "Why do you want to do this to me? Haven't I done you a favor in taking you out from under that stone?"

The Serpent said to him, "Certainly, but don't you know that a good deed is repaid by evil deeds?"

"Allow me three witnesses before I die."

When two horses came down, the Rabbit said, "Excuse me, gentle-men! Just one word! Is it true that a good deed is repaid by an evil deed?"

"That is very true," said the Horse, "for formerly I was a good horse for my master. When he was a boy, he loved me well, and fed me well. Now I am old, and he has let me go into the fields without caring how I fare. Thus it is well said that good deeds are repaid by bad ones."

The Serpent said to him, "Now, do you see? You have only two more chances."

When two Steers passed by, the Rabbit said, "Excuse me, gentlemen! Just one word! Is it true that a good deed is repaid by evil ones?"

The Steers said, "Even if it causes sorrow, for once my master considered me a valuable animal. I served him well in my time. I was very obedient. As I served him, he loved me well. Now I am old; I am useless; and he has said that he has let me go to the field to recuperate a little, so that he can kill me."

They went on, and met a Donkey. He was standing on one side of the road, and was very sad. "Friend," said the Rabbit, "is it true that a good deed is repaid by evil ones?"

"Even if it causes sorrow," answered the Donkey, "for I gave good service to my master when he was a boy; and today, when I am old, he does not want to look at me. I just come from receiving a sound beating, which they gave me because I went to see my master."

"There is no help," said the Serpent, "you must die."

They were talking when a Rooster passed by, and he said to him, "Friend, I must die because of a good deed."

"What good deed have you done?" said the Rooster.

"I pulled the Serpent from under a stone, where she had been a long time."

The Rooster said, "How was she?"

The Serpent placed herself just in the same way as she had been under the rock; and he said, "That is the way you were placed!"

The Serpent replied, "Yes."

Then he said, "If you were in this position, stay in it."

The Rabbit replied, "I owe you my life."

He followed on his way; and they were nearing a town, when the Hunter arrived at his house, and saw the Rabbit. "There is no help, I'll kill you."

He put a ball through him, and the Rabbit died. The Hunter took the Rabbit, who was half dead; and the Rabbit said, "Now I believe that a good deed is repaid by evil ones."

THE LONG-LEGS

Tradition Bearer: Unknown

Source: Boas, Franz. "Notes on Mexican Folklore." Journal of American Folklore 25 (1912): 219–220.

Date: ca. 1912

Original Source: Mexico

National Origin: Mexican

---

The following tale demonstrates the postcontact influence of Christianity as it recounts the hierarchy of powers in the universe. The narrative is a Mexican variant of "Stronger and Strongest" (AT 203.1).

---

There was a Long-Legs [a variety of mosquito], and it was very cold. He was sleeping in the foliage of a tree, and on the next day he could not sleep because his foot was broken.

Then said the Long-Legs, "Cold, cold, how strong you are, who have broken my foot!"

Then the Cold said, "But stronger is the Sun, because he heats me."

He went to where the Sun is, and said to him, "Sun, how strong you are, Sun that heats frost, frost that broke my foot!"

"But stronger is the cloud, because it covers me."

"Cloud, how strong you are, cloud that covers sun, sun that heats frost, frost that broke my foot?"

"But stronger is the wind, because it dissolves me."

"Wind, how strong you are, wind that dissolves cloud, cloud that covers sun, sun that heats frost, frost that broke my foot!"

"But stronger is the wall, because it resists me."

"Wall, how strong you are, wall that resists wind, wind that dissolves cloud, cloud that covers sun, sun that heats frost, frost that broke my foot!"

"But stronger is the mouse, because he perforates me."

"Mouse, how strong you are—mouse that perforates wall, wall that resists wind, wind that dissolves cloud, cloud that covers sun, sun that heats frost, frost that broke my foot!"

"But stronger is the cat, because he eats me."

"Cat, how strong you are, cat that eats mouse, mouse that perforates wall, wall that resists wind, wind that dissolves cloud, cloud that covers sun, sun that heats frost, frost that broke my foot!"

"But stronger is the stick, because it kills me."

“Stick, how strong you are, stick that kills cat, cat that eats mouse, mouse that perforates wall, wall that resists wind, wind that dissolves cloud, cloud that covers sun, sun that heats frost, frost that broke my foot!”

“But stronger is the fire, because it burns me.”

“Fire, how strong you are—fire that burns stick, stick that kills cat, cat that eats mouse, mouse that perforates wall, wall that resists wind, wind that dissolves cloud, cloud that covers sun, sun that heats frost, frost that broke my foot!”

“But stronger is the water, because it quenches me.”

“Water, how strong you are, water that quenches fire, fire that burns stick, stick that kills cat, cat that eats mouse, mouse that perforates wall, wall that resists wind, wind that dissolves cloud, cloud that covers sun, sun that heats frost, frost that broke my foot!”

“But stronger is the steer, because he drinks me.”

“Steer, how strong you are, steer that drinks water, water that quenches fire, fire that burns stick, stick that kills cat, cat that eats mouse, mouse that perforates wall, wall that resists wind, wind that dissolves cloud, cloud that covers sun, sun that heats frost, frost that broke my foot!”

“Hut stronger is the knife, because it kills me.”

“Knife, how strong you are, knife that kills steer, steer that drinks water, water that quenches fire, fire that burns stick, stick that kills cat, cat that eats mouse, mouse that perforates wall, wall that resists wind, wind that dissolves cloud, cloud that covers sun, sun that heats frost, frost that broke my foot!”

“But stronger is the black-smith, because he makes me.”

“Blacksmith, how strong you are—blacksmith who makes knife, knife that kills steer, steer that drinks water, water that quenches fire, fire that burns stick, stick that kills cat, cat that eats mouse, mouse that perforates wall, wall that resists wind, wind that dissolves cloud, cloud that covers sun, sun that heats frost, frost that broke my foot!”—

“But stronger is Death, because he kills me.”

He went to Death, and said, “Death, how strong you are—death that kills the blacksmith, blacksmith who makes knife, knife that kills steer, steer that drinks water, water that quenches fire, fire that burns stick, stick that kills cat, cat that eats mouse, mouse that perforates wall, wall that resists wind, wind that dissolves cloud, cloud that covers the sun, sun that clears the frost, frost that broke my foot!”

“But stronger is God, because he sends me.”

“God, how strong you are, God who sends Death, Death who kills blacksmith, blacksmith who makes knife, knife that kills steer, steer that drinks water, water that quenches fire, fire that burns stick, stick that kills cat, cat that eats mouse, mouse that perforates wall, wall that resists wind, wind that dissolves cloud, cloud that covers sun, sun that heats frost, frost that broke my foot!”

JOHN TIGER

Tradition Bearer: Samuel Villalobo

Source: Boas, Franz. "Notes on Mexican Folklore." Journal of American Folklore 25 (1912): 241–245.

Date: ca. 1912

Original Source: Mexico

National Origin: Mexican

---

"John Tiger" is a variant of the ordinary folktale classified as AT 301B. The tale is often entitled "John the Bear." In this case, however, rather than being the offspring of a human mother and a bear, the protagonist is the son of a jaguar (Spanish, tigre).

---

A man and his wife were living on their ranch at the outskirts of a village. They had several head of cattle which they milked every day. They used part of the milk for selling, and part for making cheese. The wife was pious, almost a fanatic, and went to mass every day just before her husband finished milking; then she took the milk of the first cows along for sale, and fulfilled her religious duties at the same time.

One Sunday it happened that she urged her husband to go to mass. After they had agreed upon this, he went to church, while she remained behind to milk the cows.

Unfortunately, that day one of them did not come to the corral, and, as it was getting late, the woman went out to look for her all around the corral; but instead of finding the cow of which she was in search, she met a tiger; and before she realized what was happening, the beast carried her to his cave, where he kept her locked up many years.

During this time the poor woman lived on raw meat, which the tiger obtained from the herd of her own husband. At the end of one year the woman gave birth to a boy, the son of the tiger, who grew up, strong and fierce, like his father, but who had human form. The years passed, and the boy developed extraordinary strength. Therefore he opened the stone door of the cavern, which his mother had not been able to move with all the efforts she had made. The mother, with the tenderness that belongs to all of them, taught him to speak, and told him her story as soon as she thought that her son understood her.

The boy asked her one day if she wished to leave her prison, and said that he could free her by killing his own father. The woman accepted the proposal of her son, although with great fear, and made up her mind to suffer the consequences in case he should not succeed. The beast had gone out to bring meat for his family. Then the boy, who was seven years old, searched for a weapon, and found near the cave a stout and heavy pole, with which he prepared himself to murder his father.

The boy kept in hiding outside of the enormous rock which served as his mother's prison, when the tiger's terrific and wild howl was heard, which terrified the poor woman inside the cave as never before. The wild beast came to the door, and, when he tried to open it, he received a tremendous blow on the head, which killed him almost immediately. A second blow ended the life of the animal, who lay there, extending his teeth and his claws for a little while, as though he wanted to imbed them in the flesh of his enemy.

The boy and his mother left the dark place in which they had passed such sad days of their existence, and traveled to the ranch of the woman's husband. As might be supposed, the woman had not even a rag with which to cover herself. While they were walking through the woods, she covered herself with leaves; but when they came near the hut, she sent her son to see the master, and to ask him for a garment for his mother, who was naked. That poor man was no other than her husband, who preserved as a sacred token of remembrance the dresses of his beloved wife, whom he believed to have been dead for many years.

The woman reached the home of her husband, to whom she did not disclose herself at once. She only asked for a room in which she and her son might sleep several days. But while these days were passing, he became convinced that she was his wife. He questioned her one day. "Do you remember Mr. H——. You say that you lived here a long time ago?"

"Certainly," replied she. "He was a very good and true man." Then he noticed in her face an expression of sadness which overshadowed her soul and tortured her.

He did not doubt any longer, and said to her, "You must be my wife Maria, whom I have not forgotten a single moment, and whom I love with all my soul."

Maria could not restrain her tears, and said, "Yes, I am your wife; rather, I have been your wife; for now, although I should like to call myself so, I am unworthy of loving you. I have lived with a tiger that took me from your side." And she told him all the bitterness and sadness she had endured in the dark abode of that wild beast.

The couple lived united, and loving each other more than in the first years after their marriage. They agreed to take the boy to be baptized; and they called him Juan, and his godfather was the priest of the village. They sent the boy to school; but as soon as his fellows saw him, they made fun of him, and called him Little-Hairy-Body or Juan Tigre. And Juan, who had in his veins the blood of the tiger, with one stroke of his fist left all those who made fun of him foolish for all their lives. His parents, in order to reform him, left him with his godfather, the priest. He thought he could reform Juan by frightening him by means of the skulls of the dead, which, according to the beliefs of the people, haunted the steeple of the church.

One day, when Juan went up to toll the bells, he saw two skulls, which jumped about as though moved by a mysterious power. Juan smiled, threw them down so that they rolled about, and, when he arrived at home after calling to mass, he said to the priest, "Godfather, your servant-girl is very careless; she left on the stairs of the steeple the two calabashes in which she makes atole [corn-meal gruel]." The priest was surprised at the courage of the boy, and replied, saying that he would tell the girl to take better care of her things.

Then he sent him to another town to take a letter to the priest there, with the condition that he should sleep alone in a hut which stood all by itself in the fields. Juan stayed there, as he had been told, continued his way on the following day, and on his way back he slept there again. He had hunger, but had no wood to heat the food that he was carrying.

Juan said to himself, "Why is there no wood or straw of any kind to make a fire, and heat my supper?" At the same moment he heard a noise which announced a falling body. They were bones of skeletons, which Juan used as fuel to heat his meal.

Undoubtedly the ghosts knew his courage, and said, "In the corner which looks southward, at a depth of half a yard, you will find a pot full of gold and silver coin, for, on account of this money, we have been haunting this spot for a long time."

Juan left there, and directed his steps to his godfather, to whom he gave the reply to his message, and explained to him the place that had been indicated to him, and where the money was. The priest took this wealth away in small quantities, so that nobody should know what he was doing.

Two years passed. The father of Juan had come to be rich, because he participated in the enormous wealth that his son had found. He, however, on account of his instincts, had to look for adventures, and make himself famous by his deeds throughout the world.

He left his home, armed only with a goodly iron pole, which he alone, on account of his extraordinary strength, could manage. He met a ghost, a man who carried enormous stones, and a very noted person called "Big-Finger" because he lifted whatever he liked with his first finger and without any effort.

These three wished to fight Juan Tigre; but it was impossible to vanquish him, and he made them his slaves. They traveled about several days, and came to a hut in the field which seemed to be inhabited. Notwithstanding appearances, nobody lived there.

The ghost stayed there, and was to prepare dinner for his fellows who went out to hunt. Poor ghost! He would better have gone with his friends! A wildman, ugly, exceedingly ugly, came to the hut, beat him, threw away his dinner, and ordered him to leave at once, or else he would kill him. The hunters came back, and the ghost explained to them what had happened. Then Juan Tigre, the chief, scolded him severely, and ordered that on the following day Big-Finger should stay at home. To him and to Stone-Carrier happened the same as to the ghost.

Then Juan Tigre said, "You all go and hunt, I shall await the wildman and see what he wants." Poor negro! Better he had not come! Juan beat him so hard, that the poor wildman had to flee precipitately, leaving a line of blood on the road, for he had torn off one of his ears. When Juan's companions arrived, he gave them a good dinner to eat, while they had not been able to provide a meal.

After dinner they followed the tracks of the wildman, and noted that in all probability he had gone down into a well. They brought halters; and Juan went down to the bottom of the well, telling his companions to pull him up as soon as he should shake the rope. After a few moments Juan shook the rope, and his companions began to pull up something heavy. They were surprised to see a beautiful maiden tied in the halter. They lowered the rope again, and pulled up another, younger girl. The same happened a third time.

Then each one of these bad people said, "This one shall be my wife!" and each one took his future wife by the arm.

They left Juan in the dark well. When the chief saw that the halter was not coming down again, he threatened the wildman of whom we have spoken, and who was in the bottom of the well, howling on account of the loss of his ear, with death, if he should not take him out of there. The wildman said, "Do not kill me! Let me live here! If you wish for anything, bite my ear which you have, and you will get your wish." Juan bit the ear, and, to his great surprise, he saw himself out of the well without knowing how it had happened.

By means of the ear he also learned the whereabouts of his companions, who thought Juan would die in the well, and took those beautiful maidens to the house of the King, who said that he was their father, and that they had been carried away by a wildman whose whereabouts could not be discovered.

The King compelled his daughters to marry the bad persons who had returned them to their father. They protested, saying that the person who had saved them was a stout, fierce, and ugly man, with whom each of them had left a ring. The father insisted on his idea; and the miserable companions of Juan would have triumphed, if he had not appeared on time at the castle of the King and shown the rings which his daughters had given him.

The King ordered the treacherous friends of Juan to be shot, and said to him, "You shall be the master of my daughters. They love you, because you have saved them from the claws of the monster; and as a prize for your virtues and strength you shall be my heir."

GOD

Tradition Bearer: Unknown

Source: Boas, Franz. "Notes on Mexican Folklore." Journal of American Folklore 25 (1912): 215–217.

Date: ca. 1912

Original Source: Mexico

National Origin: Mexico

---

This moralistic tale of three brothers and their choices of either money or grace derives from European sources. As seen in all cross-cultural borrowing, however, there is considerable adaptation to new settings. Franz Boas notes a particularly interesting one in this case: “[T]he end may be in part a description of the Mexican journey to the lower world, in which the soul has to pass between two mountains that strike each other, past a serpent guarding the trail, past the green lizard, eight deserts, eight hills, the wind of the knives, and a river which has to be crossed on the backs of the dogs of the dead” (251).

---

There was a man who had three sons. One day the oldest one said to his father, “Father give me your blessing, for I am going to seek my fortune”; and he went. He walked and walked along a road until he came to an old hut, and there was an old man who was God. The boy said, “Good-day, sir!”

“Good-day, son!” replied the old man. “Have you no work, sir?”

“Certainty,” replied the old man. “Come in! Be seated! Let us take lunch, and then you shall go and take a letter to Monjas.” After the boy had eaten, he said to him, “Sweep the house, and saddle this donkey and go and take this letter.”

The boy went, and came on the road to a red river, and he was much frightened. He threw the letter into the river and went back. The old man said at once, “Have you come back already, son?”

“Already, sir,” he said to him. “Did you deliver the letter?”

“Yes”; and the letter had come back again to the hands of God.

“All right!” he said. “Now what do you want?—money or grace?”

“Money,” he said to him. “Then take this napkin,” he said to him, “and you will have in it whatever you wish for.”

The boy went to his house well satisfied, and said, “Father, here I bring this napkin, and we must lunch with it presently.” Then the boy said, “Napkin, by the virtue given to thee by God, I ask thee to give me a lunch”; and at once a table was there, with much to eat.

After this the second brother said, “Father, give me your blessing, for I am going to seek my fortune”; and he went the way which his brother had taken.

He found the old hut and also the old man. He said, “Good-day, sir!”

“Good-day, my son!”

“Have you nothing to do, sir?”

“Yes,” replied the old man. “Come in! Be seated! We will lunch. Then sweep the house, put flowers on the altar; saddle the donkey, and go to take this letter to Monjas.”

The boy did so, and also met the red river, threw the letter into the river, and came back. The letter came again to the hands of God.

The boy arrived; and the old man said to him, "Have you come already, son?"

"Already, sir," he replied. "And now, what do you want? Money or grace?"

"Money," replied the boy. Then he presented him with an empty trunk, took a little pole, touched the top of the trunk with it, and said, "Pole, pole, by the virtue that God has given to thee, put this trunk in my house"; and immediately the trunk was transferred to the house of the boy. He bade good-bye to the old man; and when he arrived in his house, the trunk was there full of money.

Then the youngest brother said, "Father give me your blessing, for I, too, will seek my fortune." The father gave him his blessing, and the boy took the same road. He found the old hut and God who lived there. The boy said, "Good-day, sir!"

"Good-day, boy!" replied the old man. "Have you no work, sir?"

"Yes," replied the old man. "Come in! Be seated! We will lunch," and he gave him some very tough cakes to eat; and the boy said to himself, "Poor old man! How can he sustain himself on those tough cakes?" and God heard him, and said, "Arise, sweep the house; put flowers on the altar, saddle this donkey, and go to Monjas to take this letter there."

The boy went. First he came to the red river. He had no fear, passed it, and the water reached to the hoofs of the donkey. He went on. He walked and walked. He came to a white, white river. He passed it. Then he came to a green, green river. He passed it. Then he came to a grassy hill, and the cattle that roamed there, how lean they were! Then he came to a barren hill, and the cattle that roamed there were fat. He walked on and on, and came to rocks which were striking one another. Again he walked on and on, and came to a roast that was roasting.

He arrived at Monjas, inquired for the church, and delivered the letter into the hands of the Virgin. Then the Virgin said to the boy, "Take this little hat as a sign that you have delivered to me my letter. Tell God what you have seen on the road."

When the boy went back, there was nothing on the road. He reached the hut of the old man, and the old man said to him, "Have you come already, son?"

"Already," replied the boy. "Well," said the old man to him, "tell me about what you have seen on the road."

"Sir," said the boy to him, "first I saw a red, red river."

"That red river," said God, "is the blood that your mother shed for you."

"Then I saw a white, white river."

"That is the milk that you have sucked."

"Then I saw a green, green river."

“Those are your mother’s veins.”

“Then I saw a grassy hill with lean cattle.”

“Those are the cattle of the rich.”

“Then I saw a barren hill with fat cattle.”

“Those are the cattle of the poor.”

“Then I saw several rocks which struck one another.”

“Those are the godmothers when they are fighting.”

“When I came to Monjas there was a roast roasting.”

“That is the tongue of the gossip.”

“Well, son,” said God to him, “and now what do you want? Money or grace?”

“Grace,” replied the boy. “All right I” said the old man to him. “Take this crucifix, and on the base you will find a present every day.”

The boy left well satisfied. When he arrived at his house, he placed the crucifix on his altar; and every day early, when he awoke, he found two dollars on the base of the crucifix.

One day when the boy was eating, he saw at a distance an old man wrapped in his sheet, and full of ulcers, and disgusting to see. He came to the entrance, and said, “Good-day!”

“Good-day, sir?” replied the boy; while the other brothers began to cover the food, because the old man was very disgusting to see. Only the youngest boy gave the old man to eat.

Then the Lord said, “You have not felt disgust at seeing me; and now I’ll take you up, body and soul.” He took up the boy, and the brothers remained with their food full of grubs, and in the pot, instead of the food, a snake.

CINDER MARY

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Mason, J. Alden. “Four Mexican-Spanish Fairy-Tales from Azqueltan, Jalisco.” Journal of American Folklore 25 (1912): 192–194.

Date: ca. 1912

Original Source: Mexico

National Origin: Mexico

---

The following narrative of “Cinderella” (AT 510A) combines a medieval social structure (for example, an aristocratic hierarchy), Spanish European references (for example, “Black Moors”), and localization (for example, “five hundred pesos”) to produce a uniquely New World variant of the classic tale.

---

Once there was a poor orphan-girl who lived in an ash-hole belonging to the Black Moors. One day when one of them went there to throw out the ashes, he saw her, and asked her to come to their house. There they asked her name; but the poor girl did not know her own name, nor were they able to discover it. Finally they gave her the name of Maria Ceniza (Cinder-Mary).

Now, the Black Moors were witches; but they did not wish Cinder-Mary to learn the fact, so they gave her a black sheep's skin and a half-real [small Spanish coin] of soap, and sent her to the river, telling her not to waste the soap, but to wash the sheep-skin until it was as white as a pod of cotton.

Cinder-Mary knelt by the river and wept, because she could not wash the sheep-skin as the Moors had commanded her. Suddenly there appeared a lady, who asked her why she was weeping; and Cinder-Mary replied, that, if she could not wash the black sheep-skin as white as a pod of cotton, the Black Moors would kill her. Then the lady told her that she would bring her two white stones with which she would be able to wash the black sheep-skin. Presently she returned, and soon Cinder-Mary had washed the sheep-skin as white as a pod of cotton. Then the lady gave her a magic wand, and told her that when she needed anything, she need only speak to the wand. Then, placing a tiny star on Cinder-Mary's forehead, she disappeared.

Now, one of the Black Moors had a daughter; and when she saw the star on the forehead of Cinder-Mary, she was very jealous, and asked her mother to have a black lamb killed, that she also might go to the river to wash the skin. So, going to the river, she commenced to weep; and when the lady appeared to her and asked her why she was weeping, she replied that it was because she could not wash the black sheep-skin. Then she asked her if she would not put a star on her forehead likewise, but the lady replied that she would put nothing but "mango de burro" there. Then the girl returned to the house of the Black Moors.

Another day the Moors said to Cinder-Mary that they were going to mass, and they left her behind to prepare the breakfast. "If you have not a good breakfast ready when we return, we shall kill you," they said.

Then Cinder-Mary asked her magic wand to give her a dress such as had never before been seen in the world, and some shoes, in order that she might go to mass. Then she followed a little behind the Moors, and entered the church; and neither the Moors nor the rest of the people recognized her. When the priest saw her, he was much impressed with her beauty, and thought that she would make an excellent wife for the prince; so he gave orders that double guards be stationed at the doors of the parish, and that she be not allowed to leave.

This, however, did not deter Cinder-Mary, who fastened some wings to her back, so that they might not catch her. The guards tried to restrain her, but only succeeded in catching one of her shoes. Then she flew back to the house of the Moors and ordered her magic wand to prepare a breakfast with good food. Soon the Moors came home, and began to talk about the beautiful maiden whom they had seen with a star which illumined everything up to the grand altar; but it was Cinder-Mary.

Then the king ordered his men to search all the villages and ranchos for the maiden who had left the shoe behind. Soon they came to the house of the Black Moors, and found Cinder-Mary's other shoe.

They were about to carry the daughter of the Moor to the king, when a little dog commenced to howl, saying, "Mango de Burro goes, and Star of Gold remains." Then the king's retainers demanded to see the other maiden who was hidden in the house. Accordingly they left the girl who had the "mango de burro" on her forehead, and carried Cinder-Mary to the king, that she might marry the prince. There was a grand wedding, and Cinder-Mary was given a castle in which to live with the prince.

Soon afterwards the Black Moors came to the castle and asked that they be allowed to louse Cinder-Mary. They came to her while she was bathing, with her hair loose, and commenced to louse her. Suddenly they stuck a pin into her head, so that she became enchanted and flew away, for they were afraid that she would denounce them because they were witches. Then they left without as much as saying good-bye.

When her attendants came for Cinder-Mary, she was gone, and the only living being they could find was a dove in a cypress tree. Then they went to the head servant and asked him how much he would give them for the dove which they had found singing in the cypress tree, and which said in its song that it wanted to see the king in his palace. The dove, they said, was crying piteously. The servant went at once to the king and told him about the dove. Then the king asked him how much he wanted for bringing the dove to him; and the servant replied, that if he would give him five hundred pesos, he would bring it. The king agreed, and the servant went and brought him the bird. While stroking its back, the king found a pin stuck in its head, and pulled it out. Immediately the bird became Cinder-Mary. Then he asked her why the Black Moors had thus bewitched her; and she replied, that it was because they were witches, and were afraid that she would denounce them.

Then the king ordered that the Moors be brought before him, and he condemned them all to be burned to death with green wood.

THE STORY OF THE SUN AND THE MOON

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Mason, J. Alden. "Four Mexican-Spanish Fairy-Tales from Azqueltan, Jalisco." Journal of American Folklore 25 (1912): 196-198.

Date: ca. 1912

Original Source: Mexico

National Origin: Mexico

---

The following tale combines motifs such as G532—the hiding and deception of the sun and moon by their mothers when they smell human blood—and “The Obstacle Flight” (D672)—the protagonist throws small objects behind him that are magically transformed to aid in his flight. In this narrative, a clever soldier seeks a woman who appears to him in a dream. The tale, best labeled as an ordinary folktale, draws heavily on familiar European traditions to create its plot.

---

Once there was a soldier who saw a maiden in his house one night. He thought he might have been dreaming when he saw her, and decided to watch again the next night. When she appeared again, he lighted a candle, that he might see how beautiful she was; but no sooner had he done so, than he received a blow in the face which caused him to drop the candle and spill a drop of wax on the floor. Then the maiden disappeared. “I will go and search for her,” said the soldier, and he set out.

Soon he met on the road two brothers who were fighting about their inheritance. One of them said to the other, “Here comes a man who will know how to arrange it.”

When the soldier came up to them, he asked, “What are you doing, my good men?”

And they replied, “We are fighting over our inheritance.”

“My father,” said one of them, “had these magical boots, this magical cudgel, and this hat; and my brother wishes to inherit all of them. So I told him that you would arrange the matter for us.” The soldier agreed, and told the boys to run a race to a near-by hill and back. “Whoever arrives here first,” said he, “will be the owner of all that your father possessed.” The boys agreed, and started off; but when they re-turned, the soldier had disappeared with the magical objects. “Did I not tell you that he would settle the matter for us?” said one to the other.

Then the soldier went on, taking three leagues at a step, with the aid of his magic boots, until he came to the house of the Sun. Entering, he said to the old woman there, “Good evening, grandmother!”

“What are you doing here, my good son?” she asked. “When my son comes home, he will eat you!” Soon they heard the Sun approaching; and when he came in, he was very angry. “Mamma, mamma!” he cried. “Here is a human being! Give him to me! I will eat him!” But the old woman only replied, “No, my son! It is only a poor traveler, who is stopping here.” And then she gave the Sun a little box on the ear.

Then the soldier went on, taking three leagues at a step, until he came to the house of the Moon, and went within to greet the occupants. Seeing an old woman, he said to her, "Good evening, grandmother!"

"Why have you come here, my good son?" she asked. "My son will come home and eat you!" And soon arrived the Moon, very angry, and cried out, "Here is a human being! Give him to me! I will eat him!" But the old woman, the mother of the Moon, merely replied, "No, my son, you must not eat him. It is only a poor traveler, who is stopping here." Then she boxed his ears.

The soldier went on until he came to the house of the mother of the Wind. Here he found the Wind weeping because his mother had just died. So he said to the Wind, "What will you give me if I revive her?"

"Would that you could do so, my friend!" cried the Wind. "If you succeed, I will go with you to seek your lady." Then the soldier hit the old woman three times with his magic cudgel, and she rose up and began to talk. Then the soldier said, "Let us go to seek my lady. I will go ahead, and you follow behind." Then he set out at such a pace that the Wind was unable to keep up with him. "It is these boots which make me travel so fast," he said to the Wind.

"Lend me one of them," replied the Wind. "Then we may converse as we go."

Finally the Wind said, "Wait here a little while. I will go to see the maiden for whom we are searching." Presently he arrived, and found the mother of the maiden warming herself. He entered very briskly; and the old woman said, "Daughter, go to your sister and give her food." So the girl went to carry the food. Then the Wind said, "I told the soldier to follow a little ways behind."

Soon the soldier came in, and did not stop until he had looked through the entire house for his lady. After opening the seven doors, he at last found her, and she immediately commenced to give thanks to God. Then she and the soldier began to arrange a plan of escape from the place where she was confined. He told her to get a comb, a brush of pine needles, a thimbleful of ashes, and another of salt. Then he gave her a piece of the magic hat, a bit of the boot, and another piece of the cudgel. He embraced her, and they left the room where she had been imprisoned. Then they fled.

Soon the old woman found that they were gone, and commenced to pursue them, and soon drew near to them. "Throw down the piece of comb!" said the soldier; and immediately there grew up a thick brush behind them, and the fugitives fled on. Soon the old woman was near overtaking them again, and the girl threw behind them the brush; and immediately there grew up a wood of spiny pine trees, and the fugitives fled on. Again the old woman came nearer, and this time they threw down the thimble of ashes, and there appeared a fog of great density, and the fugitives fled on. But again the old woman approached them; and this time they threw down the thimble of salt, and there appeared behind them a great river. Then the old woman sat down on the bank and began to weep, crying, "Oh, ungrateful daughter! The grain of corn will return in the spring of water!” Then the girl turned to the soldier, and said, “You have released me from the prison where I was confined, but not from the curse which my mother has laid upon me.”

Soon the soldier said to the maiden, “I will leave you here a little while, and go to see my parents.”

“Very well,” she replied. “I will tie three knots in your belt. In one I will tie my clothes; the second is that you may not forget me; and the third is that you do not allow your parents, nor your brothers and sisters, nor any of your kinsfolk, to embrace you.” So the soldier went home and met his family; but at night, while he was sleeping, his grandmother came and embraced him, and immediately he forgot the maiden whom he had left at the spring of water.

Then the parents of the soldier decided to marry him with another woman, and the wedding was about to be celebrated. Then there came to the wedding the maiden whom the soldier had left at the spring of water, begging that she be allowed to give an entertainment at the wedding feast.

So, when all were assembled, she took two little doves, and said to them, “You remember, ungrateful little dove, that you released me from the prison where I was confined, but from the curse of my mother, no!”

“Kurukuku, I do not remember.”

“You remember, ungrateful little dove, that you left me at the spring of water.”

“Kurukuku, I believe that I am beginning to remember.”

“You remember, ungrateful little dove, that I tied my clothes in your belt.” Then the little dove remembered, and the soldier embraced the maiden and they went away. But the other woman they killed, and so ends the story of the Sun and the Moon.

HOW THE ELVES PUNISHED A QUARRELSOME MAN

Tradition Bearer: Luciano Munoz

Source: Blake, Mary. “The Elves of Old Mexico.” Journal of American Folklore 27 (1914): 237–238.

Date: ca. 1914

Original Source: Mexico

National Origin: Mexico

---

The duendes in this supernatural legend act as agents of social order. Although specifics regarding these mythical creatures vary from community to community, in both Spain and in the Spanish-descended cultures of the Western hemisphere duendes are compared to the fairies, goblins, or brownies of other folk traditions. The citing of specific locations and the naming of specific individuals who participated in alleged events are typical validating devices of legends.

---

In former times there was a ranch called “La Loma de Bufanda,” which I think still exists under that name. The owner had good land; and he had two large barns—one for wheat, and the other for hay. Near the barns was a house where the over-seer, José Maria Ruga, lived. The household consisted of José, his wife, two sons, and two daughters. One son was a cowherd, the other a shepherd.

Now, this family knew that duendes inhabited the barn which held hay. They had sometimes caught glimpses of them, and they described them as lightly clad children of diminutive stature. The shepherd was a gentle lad, who had made himself a rude musical instrument like a flute; and on Sundays and holy days he often sat among the haystacks in the barn, and played little tunes to the elves. He would hear childish giggles of delight, quickly suppressed, followed by stealthy footsteps toward him; but he rarely saw the little ones on these occasions. At the close of the concert, a half-eaten fruit or a bright-colored pebble, and sometimes a live frog or a harmless little snake, was dropped at his feet. The elves were like small boys in their tastes, and gave the shepherd the things most prized by them-selves.

Once there was a dance given at La Loma, and to this there came from a neighboring ranch a man who was of the most quarrelsome. He began by asking the shepherd’s betrothed to dance. When she refused, for of course no respectable girl cares to dance with other than her promised husband, he insisted, and tried to pull her from her seat.

Then the cowherd, who stood near, said, “Friend, this maiden is betrothed to my brother. Find thyself another partner.”

At that, the quarrelsome fellow, whose head had been heated by drink, answered, “I dance with whom I please,” and pushed the cowherd aside so violently that the overseer’s son fell against a stone bench and cut his cheek.

The girl screamed, and hid her face in her scarf; while all the young men with one accord hustled the brawler from the courtyard, where the dance was going on, to the hay-barn, into which they thrust him and locked the door, saying, “There canst thou pass the night, dancing with whichever lady-mouse pleases thee.”

With much laughter they returned to the dance, leaving the quarrelsome man to kick at the door and shout maledictions. At last the fellow grew tired of this occupation, and, lying down upon the hay, he fell asleep.

In a short time he awoke with a scream from a dream of being buried alive, to find himself completely covered with the hay. He shook himself free from it, and composed himself to sleep again; but no sooner had he closed his eyes than great bundles of hay fell on him. “There are other prisoners in the barn,” thought the quarrelsome man; and he called in a loud voice, “Who are you, and where are you?” There was no answer.

The man, as was his wont, began to shout insults, which were answered by a perfect shower of hay. He groped around the immense building among the stacks, but he found no one. At last he lay down again, and was again nearly smothered. He knew his tormentors then, and began to plead, “Dear duendes, pretty little duendes, let me sleep!” He could go no further, for a fistful of hay was suddenly thrust into his mouth. He was half-strangled, and each of his painful coughs brought a peal of laughter from the surrounding darkness.

When he had recovered a little, he exclaimed, “Unless you little brutes leave me alone, I shall set fire to the hay, even if I myself perish with you!” Now, this was a threat that the man was powerless to put into effect, as he had nothing with which to make a fire; but the elves were so frightened that they were perfectly quiet after that, and just before dawn the quarrelsome man fell asleep. The young men came early to release the prisoner, who was mightily shaken by the night he had passed. He related what had happened; and all, narrator as well as listeners, found the account so interesting, that they went off to drink coffee together, and to astonish the women with the tale.

THE PRIEST AND THE DEVIL

Tradition Bearer: Unknown

Source: Boas, Franz. “Notes on Mexican Folklore.” Journal of American Folklore 25 (1912): 223–225.

Date: ca. 1912

Original Source: Mexico

National Origin: Mexico

---

The priest’s domination of the devil in the form of a tiny, but fully formed, human (a manikin), beyond its assertion of the power of Christianity to prevail over evil, incorporates elements of Mexican and Mexican American folk belief concerning the devil. Two of the more important of these are the revelation of the devil’s disguised identity by his having the feet of a rooster and the supernatural flight seen in Mexican American tales such as “Witch Flights” (page 283).

---

There was a man pursued by the Devil, to whom, wherever he went, he appeared in the form of a manikin. Once upon a time the man went to mass, and there was the Devil. Whatever the padre did at mass, the Devil did too. He alighted on the shoulders of the boys, and made them sleep.

The man went and talked with the curate; and the padre said, "I'll take your confession, in order to see why you have these visions. Tomorrow go to early mass, in order to see if you'll again see that manikin."

The man went to mass, and there he [the manikin] was. Then he went to confession, and the Demon went there also. Then the padre said, "My son, take this string, and follow the Demon wherever he goes, catch him with this string, and bring him to me."

Again the man went to church with the string in his hand. The Demon left the church, and the man followed behind. He saw how he made some dogs fight; he saw how he made some drunkards fight; and the man followed the Demon. He entered a saloon, and put himself into a pot of tepacke [cane sugar-based liquor].

Then he went to notify the curate that the Demon had put himself in a pot of tepacke; and the curate said to him, "Go and ask the lady how much she wants to allow you to put your hand in and pull out that beast that is in the pot." The lady was frightened, and said, "You shall pay me nothing, only pull that beast out of there." Then the man put his hand and the string in, and caught him in a noose. It was not a manikin that came out, but a person with the feet of a rooster; and he took him to where the padre was; and the padre said to him, "Tie him up here, and give him hay to eat."

Then the padre went to where the beast had been tied up, and said to him, "Why are you interfering where it does not behoove you?" The Demon said to him, "Let me go! Promise to free me, and I'll tell you why."

"Yes," said the padre. "I promise to free you; But tell me, why do you come to my church?" Then the Demon replied, "Because you owe a vow to Rome; and if you wish to fulfill it, I'll take you there in four and twenty hours."

"Yes," said the padre to him. "But you know," said the Demon, "we shall not travel by land, but by sea."

"All right!" said the padre. "Early tomorrow we will go."

The next day, when daylight broke, a saddled mule was in front of the door of the curate's house. The padre mounted, and they went on the waters. In four and twenty hours they were in Rome.

The padre arrived at a house, and tied up his mule. The padre went to church, and brought from there many relics, pictures, and rosaries, which he put into a satchel. He did not find the mule tied up, but the people of the house were very much frightened because the mule had turned into a man; and the man said to the landlord, "Would you like to see how I put myself into this bottle of wine here?"

"Yes," said the people, "we should like to see how you do it." Then he put himself into the bottle.

The padre came, put the string inside the bottle, caught him in the noose, and pulled him out in the shape of a man. "Let us go!" he said, "I am ready."

He tied up the man by the nape of his neck, and he turned again into a saddled mule, and the curate mounted her. Then the mule could not walk, on account of the relics which the curate carried. The Mule said to him, "Throw away those things which you are carrying, for they burn me much. I promise you that you shall find them on your table."

Then the padre threw his relics into the middle of the sea, and in four and twenty hours he arrived at his house. The padre let him go, and said, "Go away, accursed one, and never come again to trouble me." The Demon did not come back.

HOW THE ELVES PUT A HOLY FATHER AND HIS SACRISTAN TO FLIGHT

Tradition Bearer: Luciano Munoz

Source: Blake, Mary. "The Elves of Old Mexico." Journal of American Folklore 27 (1914): 237–238.

Date: ca. 1914

Original Source: Mexico

National Origin: Mexico

---

The duendes are noted for mischief rather than malice as is shown in the following legend. Their threat to "cut off the priest's head" was merely a joke that exposed the pretensions and apparent lack of faith of their would-be exorcist.

---

In the ranch of San Jeronimo, jurisdiction of San Francisco del Rincon, many old houses were full of elves. In one house in particular the sprites were riotous from eight at night until dawn. The master of the house went to the priest of the nearest village and begged him to come and exorcise the spirits.

The priest willingly consented; and the next night he arrived on horseback, with his sacristan mounted behind him, bearing all the articles necessary for the holy task. "Now, father," said the man of the house, as he helped the good man dismount, "my son will unsaddle and feed the horse, while you and the sacristan will have a bite to eat before the service."

The three entered the house, and were soon seated upon a bench: while the man's wife placed before them three earthen dishes of pork cooked deliciously with green peppers, herbs, and olives; a pile of fresh tortillas; and three jugs of pulque (the national drink of Mexico, the juice of the maguey-plant). Each man rolled a tortilla to use as a spoon, and dipped it into his dish. Just as the little father had swallowed the first savory mouthful, a clamor of small voices began in the next room, He let his tortilla fall into his dish, and asked, "Who is in there?"

"The duendes, father," answered the woman. "It is the hour when they begin their pranks."

Just then there was a sound of metal being drawn back and forth over a stone. "What are they doing now?" inquired the sacristan.

A shrill voice from within replied, "We are sharpening a knife which we shall use to cut off the priest's head."

"Saddle the horse and follow us with it!" cried the priest to the man of the house, as he started running down the road, dragging the sacristan after him. They continued to run knee-deep in dust, until they fell upon the moonlit road exhausted. There the man with the horse helped them, and assisted them to mount. The priest advised the horse-owner to sprinkle the home with the holy water. The man returned to his home, and sprinkled the holy water over the floors and walls of his two rooms; but the elves were never so boisterous as that night. The duendes never left that house, it is said. They seemed to bring prosperity to a house. It is certain that their hosts never lacked good food and raiment.

NAHUA

---

QUETZALCOATL AND TEZCATLIPOCA

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Spence, Lewis. The Myths of Mexico and Peru. London: G. G. Harrap and Company, 1913. Internet Sacred Text Archive <http://www.sacred-texts.com/nam/mmp/mmp1.htm> (April 10, 2007).

Date: pre-sixteenth century

Original Source: Nahua

National Origin: Native American

---

The Nahua are a cluster of culturally and linguistically related groups indigenous to Mexico and Central America. The contemporary Nahua reside from Central Mexico to El Salvador and Nicaragua. Historically, the Aztec are the best known of the Nahua cultures, and during the pre-Columbian era, they developed an advanced civilization in the area of contemporary Mexico. The Aztec and related groups used the term Nahua, meaning “Those who live by Rule,” to distinguish themselves from the neighboring cultures that did not attain the Nahua level of cultural complexity. According to Nahua tradition, they originated in Aztlan and later migrated into the Mexican Plateau region. In Nahua myth, the Toltecs were the first to arrive in Mesoamerica, but scholars cannot incontrovertibly establish the fact of the existence of the Toltecs as an ethnic group outside of Aztec myth. The following myth illustrates the basic features of these sacred histories.

---

In the days of Quetzalcoatl there was abundance of everything necessary for subsistence. The maize was plentiful, the calabashes were as thick as one’s arm, and cotton grew in all colors without having to be dyed. A variety of birds of rich plumage filled the air with their songs, and gold, silver, and precious stones were abundant. In the reign of Quetzalcoatl there was peace and plenty for all men.

But this blissful state was too fortunate, too happy to endure. Envious of the calm enjoyment of the god and his people the Toltecs, three wicked “necromancers”—Huitzilopochtli, Titlachuan (or Tezcatlipoca), and Tlachahuepan—plotted their downfall. These laid evil enchantments upon the city of Tollan, and Tezcatlipoca in particular took the lead in these envious conspiracies. Disguised as an aged man with white hair, he presented himself at the palace of Quetzalcoatl, where he said to the pages in-waiting, “Pray present me to your master the king I desire to speak with him.”

The pages advised him to retire, as Quetzalcoatl was indisposed and could see no one. He requested them, however, to tell the god that he was waiting outside. They did so, and procured his admittance.

On entering the chamber of Quetzalcoatl the wily Tezcatlipoca simulated much sympathy with the suffering god-king. “How are you, my son?” he asked. “I have brought you a drug which you should drink, and which will put an end to the course of your malady.”

“You are welcome, old man,” replied Quetzalcoatl. “I have known for many days that you would come. I am exceedingly indisposed. The malady affects my entire system, and I can use neither my hands nor feet.”

Tezcatlipoca assured him that if he partook of the medicine which he had brought him he would immediately experience a great improvement in health. Quetzalcoatl drank the potion, and at once felt much revived. The cunning Tezcatlipoca pressed another and still another cup of the potion upon him, and as it was nothing but pulque, the wine of the country, he speedily became intoxicated, and was as wax in the hands of his adversary.

Tezcatlipoca, in pursuance of his policy inimical to the Toltec state, took the form of an Indian of the name of Toueyo (Toveyo), and bent his steps to the palace of Uemac, chief of the Toltecs in temporal matters. This worthy had a daughter so fair that she was desired in marriage by many of the Toltecs, but all to no purpose, as her father refused her hand to one and all. The princess, beholding the false Toueyo passing her father’s palace, fell deeply in love with him, and so tumultuous was her passion that she became seriously ill because of her longing for him.

Uemac, hearing of her indisposition, bent his steps to her apartments, and inquired of her women the cause of her illness. They told him that it was occasioned by the sudden passion which had seized her for the Indian who had recently come that way. Uemac at once gave orders for the arrest of Toueyo, and he was hauled before the temporal chief of Tollan.

“Whence come you?” inquired Uemac of his prisoner, who was very scantily attired.

“Lord, I am a stranger, and I have come to these parts to sell green paint,” replied Tezcatlipoca.

“Why are you dressed in this fashion? Why do you not wear a cloak?” asked the chief.

“My lord, I follow the custom of my country,” replied Tezcatlipoca.

“You have inspired a passion in the breast of my daughter,” said Uemac. “What should be done to you for thus disgracing me?”

“Slay me; I care not,” said the cunning Tezcatlipoca.

“Nay,” replied Uemac, “for if I slay you my daughter will perish. Go to her and say that she may wed you and be happy.”

Now the marriage of Toueyo, to the daughter of Uemac aroused much discontent among the Toltecs; and they murmured among themselves, and said, “Wherefore did Uemac give his daughter to this Toueyo?” Uemac, having got wind of these murmurings, resolved to distract the attention of the Toltecs by making war upon the neighboring state of Coatepec.

The Toltecs assembled armed for the fray, and having arrived at the country of the men of Coatepec, they placed Toueyo in ambush with his body-servants, hoping that he would be slain by their adversaries. But Toueyo and his men killed a large number of the enemy and put them to flight. His triumph was celebrated by Uemac with much pomp. The knightly plumes were placed upon his head, and his body was painted with red and yellow, an honor reserved for those who distinguished themselves in battle.

Tezcatlipoca’s next step was to announce a great feast in Tollan, to which all the people for miles around were invited. Great crowds assembled, and danced and sang in the city to the sound of the drum. Tezcatlipoca sang to them and forced them to accompany the rhythm of his song with their feet. Faster and faster the people danced, until the pace became so furious that they were driven to madness, lost their footing, and tumbled pell-mell down a deep ravine, where they were changed into rocks. Others in attempting to cross a stone bridge precipitated themselves into the water below, and were changed into stones.

On another occasion Tezcatlipoca presented himself as a valiant warrior named Tequiua, and invited all the inhabitants of Tollan and its environs to come to the flower-garden called Xochitla. When assembled there he attacked them with a hoe, and slew a great number, and others in panic crushed their comrades to death.

Tezcatlipoca and Tlachahuepan on another occasion repaired to the market-place of Tollan, the former displaying upon the palm of his hand a small infant whom he caused to dance and to cut the most amusing capers. This infant was in reality Huitzilopochtli, the Nahua god of war. At this sight the Toltecs crowded upon one another for the purpose of getting a better view, and their eagerness resulted in many being crushed to death. So enraged were the Toltecs at this that upon the advice of Tlachahuepan they slew both Tezcatlipoca and Huitzilopochtli. When this had been done the bodies of the slain gods gave forth such a pernicious effluvia that thousands the Toltecs died of the pestilence. The god Tlachuepan then advised them to cast out the bodies lest worse befall them, but on their attempting to do so they discovered their weight to be so great that they could not move them. Hundreds wound cords round the corpses, but the strands broke, and those who pulled upon them fell and died suddenly, tumbling one upon the other, and suffocating those upon whom they collapsed.

The Toltecs were so tormented by the enchantments of Tezcatlipoca that it was soon apparent to them that their fortunes were on the wane and that the end of their empire was at hand. Quetzalcoatl, chagrined at the turn things had taken, resolved to quit Tollan and go to the country of Tlapallan, whence he had come on his civilizing mission to Mexico. He burned all the houses which he had built, and buried his treasure of gold and precious stones in the deep valleys between the mountains. He changed the cacao trees into mesquites, and he ordered all the birds of rich plumage and song to quit the valley of Anahuac and to follow him to a distance of more than a hundred leagues.

On the road from Tollan he discovered a great tree at a point called Quauhtitlan. There he rested, and requested his pages to hand him a mirror. Regarding himself in the polished surface, he exclaimed, "I am old," and from that circumstance the spot was named Huehuequauhtitlan (Old Quauhtitlan). Proceeding on his way accompanied by musicians who played the flute, he walked until fatigue arrested his steps, and he seated himself upon a stone, on which he left the imprint of his hands. This place is called Temacpalco (The Impress of the Hands). At Coaapan he was met by the Nahua gods [the necromancers Huitzilopochtli, Tezcatlipoca, and Tlachuepan, who were inimical to him and to the Toltecs.

"Where do you go?" they asked him. "Why do you leave your capital?"

"I go to Tlapallan," replied Quetzalcoatl, "whence I came."

"For what reason?" persisted the enchanters.

"My father the Sun has called me thence," replied Quetzalcoatl.

"Go, then, happily," they said, "but leave us the secret of your art, the secret of founding in silver, of working in precious stones and woods, of painting, and of feather-working, and other matters."

But Quetzalcoatl refused, and cast all his treasures into the fountain of Cozcaapa (Water of Precious Stones). At Cochtan he was met by another enchanter, who asked him whither he was bound, and on learning his destination proffered him a draught of wine. On tasting the vintage Quetzalcoatl was overcome with sleep.

Continuing his journey in the morning, the god passed between a volcano and the Sierra Nevada (Mountain of Snow), where all the pages who accompanied him died of cold. He regretted this misfortune exceedingly, and wept, lamenting their fate with most bitter tears and mournful songs. On reaching the summit of Mount Poyauhtecatli he slid to the base. Arriving at the sea-shore, he embarked upon a raft of serpents, and was wafted away toward the land of Tlapallan.

THE ORIGIN OF THE CALABASH TREE AND THE TOBACCO PLANT

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Hartman, C. V. "The Mythology of the Aztecs of El Salvador." Journal of American Folklore 20 (1907): 144–146.

Date: ca. 1907

Original Source: Nahua

National Origin: Native American

The following myth of the origin of two sacred plants is drawn from the Aztec-Pipil Nahua culture indigenous to western El Salvador. Oral tradition claims the Pipil migrated to El Salvador from central Mexico. Although the surviving record of Pipil oral tradition is relatively scant, it is clear that their myths were profoundly influenced by the neighboring Maya cultures. For example, compare the sacred nature of the calabash in the following myth to the Quiché Maya myth "The Calabash Tree" (page 364).

The wizards come into the houses by night in the shapes of dogs, hogs, cats, or owls, and entice the women away with them. The women are acquainted with a number of tricks and dodges of which the men have no knowledge. The men are asleep, unaware of everything. Sesimite, or the Giant, was in the habit of coming to a house in the pueblo of Ahuachapan and carrying off the wife of one of the men to enjoy her.

The neighbor, the husband's friend, observed it and gave him warning. "Do you not know," said he, "that your wife is a witch, who steals away at night in a disguise to meet her lover? Take care of yourself!"

The husband kept watch over his wife, and observed her get up in the middle of the night and place a log of wood in his arms instead of herself. Then she swung herself up to the beams of the ceiling, falling straightway to the floor, where she lay headless, her head having vanished through the door.

The husband narrated to his neighbor what had happened. "What am I to do?" he said.

"Let us think out something to do!" said his neighbor. "Let the body lie where it is, but put a heap of hot ashes on the spot where the head belongs. That is the best method of curing women who give themselves up to witchcraft."

The man did as he was told. Later, during the night, the head re-turned, but could not succeed in attaching itself to the trunk. "Where are you, you cruel husband, who have done this thing?" the head exclaimed. The husband, however, who had gone up to the loft, made no reply, but sat crouched up in a corner perfectly still. Thereupon the head flew up to the loft. When it saw the husband, it settled on his shoulder and stuck fast there.

The man being aware of the fact with regard to witches, that you never get rid of them, if once they settle on your body in that manner, was grievously distressed at his woeful fate and went to the priest to inquire what he ought to do.

“Take matters quietly and wait!” said the priest. The head, however, remained on the man’s shoulder. The man wept at his misfortune, but that availed nothing. Not until after the lapse of a long time did the man succeed in enticing the head to leave his shoulder.

That occurred on one occasion, when the man was out in the woods, and at a time of the year when the zapotes [a soft sweet fruit] were just beginning to ripen. The man, as he was wandering about in the woods, caught sight of a gigantic zapote tree. “My daughter,” said the man to the head, “there are some zapotes already ripe in that tree. Would it not be nice to have some zapotes to eat? I know you are fond of that kind of fruit! Get off my shoulder while I climb up the tree, and do you sit here meanwhile on my back-cloth,” said the man. So saying he spread out his garment on the ground and the head settled itself down upon it.

The man then climbed the tree and got hold of a few quite green zapotes, which he hurled with all his force at the head. It jumped and cried out and called upon the man for mercy. “Have pity, for mercy’s sake, have pity upon me. Oh, cruel husband that you are! Do you want to kill me?”

“Oh, no,” said the man. “Why, I was choosing out the fruit that is ripest, those green zapotes fell off accidentally.” Straightway he began anew to hurl down upon the head the hard green fruit, and the head yelled and uttered lamentations. At that moment a roe happened to be passing quite near to the spot. The head then sprang up into the air and settled on the back of the roe, who in terror made off into the woods. The plaits came undone and the hair was tossed about by the wind. At the first precipice she came to, the roe threw herself over, and nothing remained of them but “dust” and skulls (pinole y calaveras).

The husband then returned to the priest and reported what had happened. The priest replied, “You must now follow in the footsteps of the roe and collect all the hairs which aid you in finding the place where the head lies. Then you must bury the head with all the hair at the same spot, and you must carefully tend the mound over the grave. For from that head something will arise.” The man obeyed the priest’s injunctions.

After burying the head he made a habit of going every fifteenth day to put the grave in order and to root up the weeds. He had been to the grave in this way many times, when one day he saw a sprout shooting up out of the mound. The young plant grew apace and soon became a tree, which one day brought forth a black flower, resembling the bowl of a pipe in shape. This flower gave place to a very large, round, green fruit. The tree was that which we now call “huachkal quahuit” (the calabash tree).

Once more the husband repaired to the priest and narrated what had taken place. "Be very careful of that fruit," said the priest. "Do not touch it until it is quite ripe." When the fruit had at length ripened and gone yellow, it fell to the ground. Then the priest lent the man a saw, with which he very cautiously began to divide the shell. To his amazement he observed something moving inside the fruit. His surprise turned into alarm when he plainly heard infant voices from within the calabash. The shell of the fruit had now been cut open.

Within there were four small children, three boys and a girl, who at once asked him, "Are you our father? Where then is our mother?" The mother being dead, the children were taken in hand by the husband's parents-in-law, Sesimite the Giant and Tanteputz, the man-eating woman.

The virgin up in the sky, to-wit, the Moon, dispatched a messenger, carrying a bamboo joint filled with milk from her own breast to the motherless little children found in the calabash. The messenger handed the joint to the alligator, who, however, drank up the milk himself. The rabbit, on hearing that, went to the alligator to ask him what he had done with the milk sent by the moon to the motherless children in the calabash.

"Here it is," said the alligator, opening its mouth and stretching out its tongue. With a rapid slash the rabbit cut off the alligator's tongue, leaving only a short stump in its mouth. Thereupon the alligator dived down into a deep pool. Ever since he lost his tongue the alligator in shame frequents the deepest pools of the rivers to hide himself.

The girl in the calabash was named Xochit Sihuat, "the flower-girl." In course of time she became one of the most beautiful women that have ever lived. Her black hair was very long, and she was ever en-compassed with that fresh scent that emanates from a woman on leaving the bath. "No man shall ever touch me," she said, "but after I am dead all the people in the world shall take delight in the glorious strength of which I am possessed."

She died quite young, a virgin as she had vowed, and on her grave there sprang up a plant called yet, which has a finer aroma and is possessed of diviner qualities than any other plant in the world [tobacco].

THE QUEEN WITH A HUNDRED LOVERS

Tradition Bearer: Adapted from Relación histórica de la nación tulteca by Alva Cortés Ixtlilxóchitl (ca. 1648).

Source: Spence, Lewis. The Myths of Mexico and Peru. London: G. G. Harrap and Company, 1913. Internet Sacred Text Archive. <http://www.sacred-texts.com/nam/mmp/mmp1.htm> (April 10, 2007).

Date: pre-sixteenth century

Original Source: Nahua

National Origin: Native American

The following historical narrative of the Mesoamerican Nahua ruler Nezahualpilli is contained in a historical account written between 1600–1608 and commissioned by the Spanish viceroy to New Spain. Despite the fact that the narrative was committed to print, oral tradition provided his primary resource. Therefore, the tale of “The Queen with a Hundred Lovers” is best classified as a folk history as distinct from historiography (a scientific history). As such, it reflects a worldview and attitudes toward the past more than an unbiased view of historical events.

---

When Axaiacatzin, King of Mexico, and other lords sent their daughters to King Nezahualpilli, for him to choose one to be his queen and lawful wife, whose son might succeed to the inheritance, she who had the highest claims among them, for nobility of birth and rank, was Chachiuhnenetzin, the young daughter of the Mexican king. She had been brought up by the monarch in a separate palace, with great pomp, and with numerous attendants, as became the daughter of so great a monarch. The number of servants attached to her household exceeded two thousand.

Young as she was, she was exceedingly artful and vicious; so that, finding herself alone, and seeing that her people feared her on account of her rank and importance, she began to give way to an unlimited indulgence of her power. Whenever she saw a young man who pleased her fancy she gave secret orders that he should be brought to her, and shortly afterwards he would be put to death. She would then order a statue or effigy of his person to be made, and, adorning it with rich clothing, gold, and jewelry, place it in the apartment in which she lived. The number of statues of those whom she thus sacrificed was so great as to almost fill the room.

When the king came to visit her, and inquired respecting these statues, she answered that they were her gods; and he, knowing how strict the Mexicans were in the worship of their false deities, believed her.

But, as no iniquity can be long committed with entire secrecy, she was finally found out in this manner:

Three of the young men, for some reason or other, she had left alive. Their names were Chichucoatl, Huitzilimitzin, and Maxtla, one of whom was lord of Tesoyucan and one of the grantees of the kingdom, and the other two nobles of high rank. It happened that one day the king recognized on the apparel of one of these a very precious jewel which he had given to the queen; and although he had no fear of treason on her part it gave him some uneasiness.

Proceeding to visit her that night, her attendants told him she was asleep, supposing that the king would then return, as he had done at other times. But the affair of the jewel made him insist on entering the chamber in which she slept; and, going to wake her, he found only a statue in the bed, adorned with her hair, and closely resembling her. Seeing this, and noticing that the attendants around were in much trepidation and alarm, the king called his guards, and, assembling all the people of the house, made a general search for the queen, who was shortly found at an entertainment with the three young lords, who were arrested with her.

The king referred the case to the judges of his court, in order that they might make an inquiry into the matter and examine the parties implicated. These discovered many individuals, servants of the queen, who had in some way or other been accessory to her crimes: workmen who had been engaged in making and adorning the statues, others who had aided in introducing the young men into the palace, and others, again, who had put them to death and concealed their bodies.

The case having been sufficiently investigated, the king dispatched ambassadors to the rulers of Mexico and Tlacopan, giving them information of the event, and signifying the day on which the punishment of the queen and her accomplices was to take place; and he likewise sent through the empire to summon all the lords to bring their wives and their daughters, however young they might be, to be witnesses of a punishment which he designed for a great example. He also made a truce with all the enemies of the empire, in order that they might come freely to see it.

The time having arrived, the number of people gathered together was so great that, large as was the city of Tezcuco, they could scarcely all find room in it. The execution took place publicly, in sight of the whole city. The queen was put to the garrote (a method of strangling by means of a rope twisted round a stick), as well as her three gallants; and, from their being persons of high birth, their bodies were burned, together with the effigies before mentioned. The other parties who had been accessory to the crimes, who numbered more than two thousand persons, were also put to the garrote, and burned in a pit made for the purpose in a ravine near a temple of the Idol of Adulterers.

All applauded so severe and exemplary a punishment, except the Mexican lords, the relatives of the queen, who were much incensed at so public an example, and, although for the time they concealed their resentment, meditated future revenge. It was not without reason, says the chronicler, that the king experienced this disgrace in his household, since he was thus punished for an unworthy subterfuge made use of by his father to obtain his mother as a wife!

CARIBBEAN

African Caribbean

ANTIGUA

---

NANCY AND THE HONEY TREE

Tradition Bearer: George W. Edwards

Source: Johnson, John H. "Folk-Lore from Antigua, British West Indies." Journal of American Folklore 34 (1921): 51–52.

Date: 1921

Original Source: Antigua

National Origin: African American

---

Antigua was established as a British colony in the seventeenth century. Located in the Eastern Caribbean Sea, it is the largest of the Leeward Islands. This tale of the trickster Anansi (Nancy in this version) is popular in the West Indies. As is common in both Continental African tales and African American plots, the narrative portrays Anansi as both trickster and dupe when he matches wits with monkey. Supernatural elements are included in the motifs of the speaking tree, the transformation of Nancy, and the power of the word "Wheelum," which causes the tree to wheel around and throw its victims. In a Jamaican variant collected by Beckwith (1924), the word is "Fling-a-mile." In both versions, therefore, Nancy's own words lead to his downfall. See "How Come Mr. Buzard to Have a Bald Head" (page 163) and "How Ananse Tales Got Their Name" (Volume 1, page 61) for southern U.S. and West African views of Anansi.

---

While Nancy was goin' on dis day, he see dis tree. Come up to dis tree, an' say, "Ah! dis a pretty little tree. Dis honey tree is a pretty little tree."

De tree say dat he mus' call 'em "Wheelum." Nancy laugh, an' say dat it was a honey tree. Dat he not need to call it "wheelum." Den Nancy get up in dat tree, an' start to suck de honey. He suck till he get all de honey what he want. Den he got stuck when he go to pull off from de tree. He twist, but he can't loose himself. Nancy start to beg. Say, "Please, Mr. Honey-Tree, don' catch me! Leave me go, please, Mr. Honey-Tree!"

Honey-Tree say, "My name not Honey-Tree. My name Wheelum," Nancy say, "Alright, Mr. Wheelum! Dat all right! Please let me go, Mr. Wheelum!"

When Nancy say "Wheelum," de tree start to spin. Dat tree wheel an' wheel. When it have him goin' round so, yap it loose him. Nancy was put at a distance by dis tree. He land, an' pick hisself well hurted by dis tree call "Wheelum."

Now Nancy come, an' all prepare to fool some a dese other animals wid dis tree. Soon he see Bro' Cow comin'. Bro' Cow he a stupid one, an' Nancy pick him quick. Say, "O Bro' Cow! Ah done find one very sweet tree."

Bro' Cow say, "Where dis tree? Show me it!"

An' Nancy carry him to where dis tree was. When he got him dere, he tell him dat he mus' suck, an' he will get all de honey dat he can eat. Bro' Cow did suck. When he finish, he not able to loose hisself. He cry, an' tell Bro' Nancy to help get him off. Nancy laughin' for fair now. Cow beg de tree to let he go. De tree say it name Wheelum. Den when Cow say "Wheelum," de tree t'row him also at a distance. An' he was hurted too.

Bro' Nancy have all dis sport. He fool some dese other animals wid dis same honey tree. By an' by he see Bro' Monkey. Now, Bro' Monkey was in dis tree, an' see all dat Nancy do. He come down, an' pass to where Nancy was. Nancy greet him. Say, "Well, Bro' Monkey, jus' de man I like to see. jus' de man. Bro', dere is a honey tree dat has so sweet t'ing; an' I going to carry you dere, bro'." De monkey was willin', an' Nancy took him.

Dey come to dis tree. Nancy tell Monkey dat he must suck. Monkey answer dat he will not suck till Nancy firs' suck. Nancy say, "What matter, bro'? Dat is sweet dere. You go. I have finish my suck. What matter you? Not want dat sweet t'ing dere! Come on, Bro' Monkey! suck from dis tree!" But Monkey refuse to suck till Nancy go firs' to suck. No matter what Nancy say, he still will not suck firs'. After dis, Nancy go to de tree, an' whisper, "Ah goin' suck firs', Bro' Honey-Tree, but don' hol' me! Hear, Bro' Honey-Tree, don' hol' me!"

De honey tree answer dat it will not hol' him. Den Nancy say, "Alright, Bro' Monkey! I going suck firs'. We going get full of dis honey."

Nancy went, an' he suck. But Monkey did not suck. De tree hol' him; an' no matter what he say, de tree not loose him. Monkey had in dis time gone to a distance. Here he put up a tall spike. Dese spike were jus' where de tree was t'rowin'. Monkey tell Nancy dat he going tell de tree wheelum.

Nancy say, "No!" Monkey he in all kind of glee an' jump 'round. Nancy he keep beggin' dat tree please let he go. Dis de tree would not do. Nancy say, "Please don' hol' me, Bro' Honey-Tree! Please let me go, Bro' Honey-Tree!"

Tree say, “My name not Honey-Tree. My name Wheelum.”

Den Bro’ Monkey shout, “Wheelum, wheelum, wheelum!” An’ de tree turn an’ commence to spin about. De tree wheel an’ wheel. Yap de tree let Nancy go, an’ he land upon dis spike. Nancy he turn to spider, an’ run in de cassy tree.

I went through Miss Havercomb alley,
An’ I see a lead was bending;
So da lead ben’,
So da story en’.

NANCY FOOLS HIS WIFE

Tradition Bearer: George W. Edwards

Source: Johnson, John H. “Folk-Lore from Antigua, British West Indies.” Journal of American Folklore 34 (1921): 49–50.

Date: 1921

Original Source: Antigua

National Origin: African American

---

Nancy (Anansi) turns tragedy to selfish triumphs by claiming to his wife that his arm was lost not as punishment for a crime, but rather in a work accident. His use of disguise to deceive his wife out of her only possessions suggests the trickster’s common ploy of “shape-shifting.”

---

Dis Nancy was real smart. He have wife too, an’ a son name Little Toukouma. On one day when Nancy was out stealin’, he get his arm caught, an’ it was cut off. Some man stuff he was stealin’ when de arm get caught, an’ it take off. Dis arm got take jus’ at de elbow. When Nancy come home, his wife say, “Ah, Nancy! How you get your arm cut off?”

Nancy say he been to a mill workin’, when it caught his arm an’ tear it off. He say dat it took all his arm. Dey was sorry fer Nancy, an’ he don’ do nothin’ now. He eat all dat he could get. An’ when da wife she gone, Nancy take all de food from de little Toukouma. Dis boy would be dere wid de food, an’ Nancy would come to him. Say, “Gi’ me dat food, or Ah show you me stump.” Den de boy go shoutin’, for he afraid to have Nancy show him de stump a his arm. While he cryin’, de wife come, an’ say Nancy refuse to admit dat he show de boy de stump.

Dis day come when Nancy want to get all de food what his wife got. Now, de woman had two pigs and a field of yams. Nancy try to t’ink how he could get dese. Each day she go to feed de pigs an’ work de yams. Nancy make up his mind dat he must get dem. On dis day Nancy he stay in de bed. Make out dat he sick. Say, "Wife, me so sick! O wife! Me too sick. Me too sick." De woman tell him dat he must go to de doctor. Nancy say, "Ah, wife me too sick. Me can't go, wife. Me too sick, wife." He roll an' toss about, an' de woman t'ink he about to die. Nancy tell her, "Wife, you go get de doctor! Wife, me too sick. You go!" She t'ink dat her husban' was really sick, an' she start fer de doctor. When she gone, Nancy up from de bed an' take another road, so dat he come out in front of where de woman is goin'.

When Nancy get dere [to meet her on the road], he have another kind a coat, so dat de woman not able to know he her own husban'. She come along. Nancy come out. Say to her, "Whar you goin', Mrs. Anancy?" She tell him dat her husban' so sick. Dat he look like he goin' to die. She goin' to get de doctor to come. He tell her dat she is doin' de right, an' dat she must be sure to get de doctor for him.

So she went. Nancy take by different road, and he come to de place where de doctor live. When de woman come, he take bearing like he de doctor. She come to dis place.

Say, "O doctor! Nancy is too sick. Me 'fraid he will die. Me here to bring you to him."

Den Nancy say to her. She not know who he was. All time t'ink dat dis was de doctor. "Well, Mrs. Anancy, dat is too bad. Dis is what you try to make you' husban' better. You has two pigs an' a field a yams. If you kill dem pigs an' cook 'em up wid jus' de hair off, also cook up de yam wid dem, dat will cure you' husban'."

Dese pigs an' de field a yam was all dat dis woman had. But she fool. De doctor say dat no matter what Nancy say, she mus give him dese t'ings, or he will die. She got home. Nancy was dere now in bed. Groanin' like he was goin' to die. Ask her what de doctor tell her. She say dat de doctor say she mus' kill a pig wid only de hair off, an' cook wid de yams.

Nancy say, "Don' do it, wife! Don' kill you' pig! Me not satisfy you kill de pig." He foolin' her now, an' she was sure to kill dem. So she have one pig kill, an' did as de doctor tol' her. When she bring de pig an' yams to Nancy, he eat it all.

On de next day she ask him how he feel. He say, "O wife! Me sure to die. Me too sick." Den she tol' him dat she was goin' to kill de other pig. Nancy say, "No!" But she sure dat only way to save Nancy, an' she did it.

She bring de food. Nancy eat every bit a dis, an' not give his wife an' Little Toukouma any. Dat's de way Nancy fool his wife.

Finish.

PLAYING MOURNER

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Johnson, John H. "Folk-Lore from Antigua, British West Indies." Journal of American Folklore 34 (1921): 61–62.

Date: 1921

Original Source: Antigua

National Origin: African American

---

The theft of food by a trickster is a common folktale motif. This tale of rat's betrayal of his friend cat closely resembles "Theft of Butter (Honey) by Playing Godfather" (AT 15). Variants of AT 15 are found elsewhere in this collection (see "Playing Godfather," page 164). The following narrative departs from AT 15, however, by virtue of the omission of the concluding motif of pinning the food theft on the victim (see "How Brer Fox Dream He Eat Brer Possum," page 177, for an example of this plot twist). "Playing Mourner" concludes instead with justice for the offender, which serves to explain the origin of the enmity between cats and rats.

---

Pussy and Rat was great friends. Dey was all de time in each other company.

On dis occasion Pussy learn dat his father is dead. Rat cry an' tell him dat he sorry. Pussy is sick at dis. Dese two prepare to go to de wake. Pussy not feelin' well. Rat pretend dat he is sick too. Dey both had a big barrel of rice. Before dey go to de wake, dey is goin' to cook dis rice. Dey cook it.

When de wake is over, dey will come for de rice. Both put a big cover over dis rice. De rice was finish. Also dey was to take somet'ing for dis wake. Dey had a tambourine, a triangle, an' a fiddle-bow. Dey prepare dese to take. At de wake dey will have dese. Pussy say, "Come, Bro' Rat! Me father dead. We goin' to de wake now."

"Dat is all right," Rat tell him. An' dey went. When dey gone some ways, Rat say, "Ah, Bro' Pussy! me forget de tambourine. Goin' back to get it." Pussy tell him he mus' hurry. He father dead, an' de wake done commence.

Rat went back. He hop in de kettle an' eat some of de rice. Now he come again. Dey went on. Pussy cryin' 'cause he father dead. Rat he cry too. Dey have de tambourine. Rat stop hear. Say, "Ah, Bro' Pussy! we done forget de triangle. Can't go widout de triangle."

"Bro' Rat, how go off widout de triangle? We need dem t'ings for to have at de wake."

Rat tol' him dat is "you' father," an' he will go back for de triangle. Bro' Pussy consent, an' Rat went back to their house. When he get back again, he jump in de kettle wid de rice. Eat full.

Now he come, an' dey go on. Pussy cryin' an' Rat bawlin'. Pussy say, "Step up dere, Bro' Rat! we is behin' for de wake now. My father mus' need for me to get to de wake."

Dey almos' dere. Rat stop. Say, "What happen to de fiddle-bow? You has de fiddle-bow?" Pussy has not it. He excite dat dey no have de fiddle-bow.

Rat tell him dat is all right, an' dat he goin' get it. "You' father dead, and me goin' bring back dat fiddle-bow. You is wait here. Jus' wait at dis point for me. I goin' back." An' Pussy let Rat go back.

Rat get back, an' he clean de pot. Not any rice in it. In dis time Pussy start to t'ink dat Rat fool him. An' he come back.

When he is dere, he not see nothin'. Look around, Bro' Rat not in sight. He move all round, can't find he friend. By an' by he hear sound, "Chip, chip, chip, chip, chip, chip, chip, chip!"

Dis sound is at de kettle. Soft, Pussy move to it. He creep up to it. Hear, "Chip, chip, chip, chip, chip!" Now he know where was Bro' Rat. De cover is on de pot. Bro' Pussy get to de cover. Jump on it. Cry, "Well, Bro' Rat, I's got you at it. So you is in dere. I goin' kill you, Bro' Rat." Rat beg him not to kill 'em. Say, "Please don' kill me, Bro' Pussy! Do anyt'ing to me, but please don' kill me!" Bro' Pussy insist dat he was goin' kill him. Rat beg dat he don't. Say he must not kill 'em. Den Pussy agree not to kill him, an' open de top.

Rat hop out. Pussy jump on him. Den John Cowrie (cat) lift him. He toss him. He let him go, den catch him. He beat him. He t'row him. He pounce on him. Beat him, but he did not kill him. He do dis till Rat was dead. But he did not kill him. He played him till he dead. Dat is why cat play wid de rat dat dey caught.

WHY RABBIT HAS A SHORT TAIL

Tradition Bearer: George W. Edwards

Source: Johnson, John H. "Folk-Lore from Antigua, British West Indies." Journal of American Folklore 34 (1921): 49–50.

Date: 1921

Original Source: Antigua

National Origin: African American

---

In this tale of the master trickster being tricked, rabbit seems a particularly easy dupe. The narrative resembles "The Tail-fisher" (AT 2). In the classic model, however, bear or wolf is tricked into using his tail to fish through a hole in the ice. The ice freezes around the tail, and when the tail-fisher is compelled to escape, the originally long tail is bobbed. Caribbean environmental factors require a modification of the preceding plot.

---

Dis was how dis come, Rabbit once have a tail long like dem other an'mals. Not short all de time.
On dis occasion Rabbit was goin' about, an' he was hot. Dis was summer, an' everyt'ing was hot. Rabbit he had run all over, was feelin' warm. By a' by he come to where Bro' Barracuda was. When Bro' Rabbit come near to de water, Bro' Barracuda speak to him. Say, "Why is it dat you so warm, Bro' Rabbit?"

Rabbit tell him dat is so warm 'round here, an' dat he been runnin' all 'bout. He not able to stay cool.

Den Bro' Barracuda fool Rabbit. An' Rabbit is a smart one. Bro' Barracuda say, "Bro' Rabbit, I will tell you which way you can get cool." Rabbit he glad for dat, an' ask de Barracuda to please do dis. Bro' Barracuda say dat Rabbit must come up to dis piece of wood what is over de water, an' let he tail hang down into de water. "In dis way, Bro' Rabbit, de cool from de water will go up from you' tail, an' you will not be warm."

Rabbit not against dis, an' he come. Now, when Rabbit come up to dis piece a wood, he drop his tail to de water. Den Bro' Barracuda sneak up to Rabbit tail, an' he bit it off.

Dat how Barracuda fool Rabbit, an' is why Rabbit has dat short tail.
Finish.

MR. HARD TIME

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Johnson, John H. "Folk-Lore from Antigua, British West Indies." Journal of American Folklore 34 (1921): 82–83.

Date: 1921

Original Source: Antigua

National Origin: African American

---

The foolish misunderstandings of a husband's orders to his wife lead first to disaster then to wealth in this variant of "Guarding the Door" (AT 1653A).

---

You see, it was like dis. A man was goin' out one day, an' he took his money an' give it to his wife, an' tell her to keep it for hard time. At the same time, you know, he had owed a man by the name of Mr. Hard-Time. His wife misunderstand him, an' pay it all to Mr. Hard-Time. When da husban' come home, she tol' him, "Mr. Hard-Time was here, an' I pay him all da money you gave."

You can picture dat man feelin', for it was all da money he had. Man got 'rouse', an' start to quarrel with his wife. Den he tol' her to close de door an' follow him. Instead of she closin' de door, she lift up de door an' put it on her shoulder.

An dey went travelin' through a wood. Whiles' dey was goin' on, you know, dey saw all kinds of food under a tree, an' dey sat down an' was ready to eat some of what was dere. In da mean time dey heard a set of robbers comin', an' both clamored up in da tree. Dis woman climb da tree with dis heavy door on her back, too. Well, da robbers come an' form a circle under da tree. Dey bring in all dere gold, an' had it under dis tree. Well, da robbers didn't see dem. Den da woman said de door was hurtin' her shoulders, an' she were goin' to t'row it; an' her husban' tell her not to do it, da robbers see it an' kill dem. An' she t'rowed it down. Da robbers got scared, an' said, "Da Lord has sent us vengeance in an earthquake." 'Cause dat door came crashin' down. So dey run an' make another camp.

Dere was a little boy with dem. Dey sent him back to see what had become of da gold. Da little boy came along whistlin'. Da man tol' him dat's not da way to whistle come, an' he'll show him how to whistle like a man. He tell him to long out [stick out] his tongue an' let him scrape it. Da man did scrape a little of da boy's tongue, an' he whistle a little clearer. Den he ask him, "Don't you see you whistle clearer?"

Da boy say, "Yes," an' ask him to scrape a little more. Da boy long out his tongue, an' da man cut off a piece of his tongue.

At that da boy run back to da robbers, goin', "Ma, ma, ma, ma, ma, ma!" talkin' like a man who is dumb. At dat da robbers got scared an' start to run too, an' dey run in da sea an' all over. Some turn shark, some turn whale, some turn ballyho (a fish), some turn turtle, dey turn all different kind a animal. Durin dis time da man an' woman took to carry home da gold. Dey brought back a wagon an' carry away da rest of da stuff.

An' I, da storyteller, got some of dat money, an' became rich myself.
And I went through Miss Havercomb alley,
An' I see a lead was bending;
So de lead ben',
So de story en'.

UNDER THE GREEN OLD OAK TREE

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Johnson, John H. "Folk-Lore from Antigua, British West Indies." Journal of American Folklore 34 (1921): 62–63.

Date: 1921

Original Source: Antigua

National Origin: African American

---

"Under the Green Old Oak Tree" is a variant of "The Singing Bone" tale type (AT 780). The version adheres to the classic plot: the bone of a murder victim is crafted into a musical instrument that makes an accusation that leads to the perpetrator of the crime.

---

Dis a nice little story. Der woman had two chil'ren. One was a boy. an' der oder was a girl. De fader a dese chil'ren die. Moder decide to marry again. She marry to anoder man.

Each day dese chil'ren did go to de mountain to get flowers. Dey went on dis day. Girl had a better bucket den what de broder got. Dey cumin' wid de flowers. On his way home, de boy stop wid de gal. He t'inkin' some evil plan. Want dis bucket which was his sister. She would not consent to gi' him dis bucket. He t'ink it best to kill der sister. He kill de sister. He kill dis girl near to a big oak tree. An' he hide her dere. After he kill her, he go home. Can't give no account a he sister. Dey all went to search for de girl, but none can find her.

Der broder stay home. Month gone.

Shepherd-boy dat is comin' down de mountain meet [finds] a big bone like a flute. He pick dis bone under dat same tree. He took up de bone an' play. Comin' home wid de flock, he play on de bone. It play a sweet tune:

My broder has killed me in de woods, an' den he buryth me.
 My broder has killed me in de woods, an' den he buryth me
 Under de green of oak tree, an' den he buryth me.

Dat's all it could play. It play sweet, you know. Comin' home, all dat hear dis tune beg de boy for a play on it. He give dem a play.

Now he way down de mountain. Mos' to where de moder is livin'. He meet de moder. She ask him for a play. He give her a play. As quick as she play, t'ing say—

My dear moder, my dear moder, it my dead bone you play.
 My dear moder, my dear moder, it my dead bone you play.

She drop an' faint, but never die. All de people was lookin' for de girl. Dis broder meet de boy. He ask him for a play. Take de bone an' start. T'ing say—

My broder, it is you dat has killed me.
 My broder, it is you dat has killed me.

An' dere he faints an' dies.
 Dat is de end a da green of oak tree.

BAHAMAS

---

BROTHER RABBIT AN' BROTHER TAR-BABY

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Edwards, Charles L. "Some Tales from Bahama Folk-Lore." Journal of American Folklore 4 (1891): 50–51.

Date: 1891

Original Source: Bahamas

National Origin: African American

---

The Bahamas (Commonwealth of the Bahamas) is an archipelago located in the Atlantic Ocean between the U.S. state of Florida and Cuba. Although Christopher Columbus' first landfall in the Western hemisphere was on San Salvador in the Bahamas, in the mid-seventeenth century English settlers established a British presence that led to the Bahamas becoming a crown colony. In the wake of the U.S. struggle for independence, the Bahamas provided a refuge for loyalists who immigrated along with their slaves in the late 1700s. The African-descended population of the islands was bolstered further in the nineteenth century by runaway slaves who escaped to the Bahamas following the emancipation of slaves in the British West Indies in 1834. The African influence is apparent in the following tales.

"Brother Rabbit an' Brother Tar-Baby" enjoys not only a general popularity because of a widely read version, "The Wonderful Tar-Baby Story," by Joel Chandler Harris, and the twentieth-century Walt Disney print and film versions, but also a wide oral distribution with versions found in South and East Asia, Africa, and Europe as well as the Western hemisphere (see the Native American Natchez tale "The Tar Baby," page 121). The tale of "The Tar Baby and the Rabbit" (AT 175) is usually concluded with the “Briar-patch Punishment for Rabbit” (AT 1310); “fine grass” is substituted for briars below. The formulaic “Once it was a time a very good time/De monkey chewed tobacco an’ ‘e spit white lime” serves as an opening marker equivalent to the familiar “Once upon a time” of the märchen. As is common in African American tradition, rabbit is a trickster figure living by his wits, outsmarting stronger beings, and overcoming superior numbers to achieve his ends. Given the position in which the African bondsperson was placed in the New World context, rabbit’s antics may serve not only as comic catharsis but also as models for emulation under social oppression. In this version, rabbit plays out both the strengths (cleverness and audacity) and the weaknesses (selfishness and impulsiveness) in his effort to obtain the necessities of life at the expense of other’s labor. Nevertheless, rabbit plays a common role of tricksters in transforming the world, avenging himself on the other animals by forcing them from their initial anthropomorphic lifestyle, and condemning them to run wild in the bush.

---

Once it was a time, a very good time,
De monkey chewed tobacco an’ ‘e spit white lime.

So dis day Brother Rabbit, Brother Bouki (hyena), Brother Tiger, Brother Lizard, Brother Elephant, Brother Goat, Brother Sheep, Brother Rat, Brother Cricket; all o’ de creatures, all kind, so now dey say, “Brother Rabbit, you goin’ help dig well?”

Brother Rabbit say, “No!”

Dey say, “When you wan’ water, how you goin’ manage?”

‘E say, “Get it an’ drink it.”

Dey say, “Brother Rabbit, you goin’ help cut field?”

Brother Rabbit say, “No!”

Dey say, “When you’re hungry, ho you goin’ manage?”

“Get it an’ eat it.” So all of ‘em gone to work. Dey went; dey dig well first. Nex’ dey cut field.

Now dis day Brother Rabbit come. Dey leave Brother Lizard home to mind de well. So now Brother Rabbit say, “Brother Lizard, you want to see ho can make de mostest noise in de trash?”

Brother Lizard say, “Yes!”

Brother Rabbit say, “You go in dat big heap o’ trash dere an’ I go in dat over dere” (Brother Rabbit did want to get his water now).

Brother Lizard gone in de trash; ‘e kick up. While ‘e was makin’ noise in de trash, Brother Rabbit dip ‘e bucket full o’ water. He’s gone!

So no when Brother Elephant come, an’ all de other animals come out of de field, Brother Elephant say, “Brother Lizard, did you’ let Brother Rabbit come here today an’ take dat water?”

Brother Lizard say, "I couldn't help it!" 'E say, "E tell me to go in de trash to see who could make the mostest noise."

Now de next' day dey leave Brother Bouki home to mind de well.

Now Brother Rabbit came. 'E say, "Brother Bouki, you wan' to see who can run de fastes'?"

Brother Bouki say, "Yes."

'E say, "You go dat side, an' le' me go dis side." Good! Brother Bouki break off; 'e gone a runnin'. Soon as Brother Bouki git out o' sight Brother Rabbit dip 'e bucket; 'e gone.

So no when Brother Elephant and the rest of them come dey say, "Brother Bouki, you let Brother Rabbit come 'ere again today and take our water?"

'E say, "'E tell me to have a race to see who could run de fastes', an' soon's I git a little ways 'e take de water an' gone."

So Brother Elephant say, "I know how to ketch him!"

All of them went to de pine yard. Dey make one big tar baby. Dey stick 'im up to de well.

Brother Rabbit come. 'E say, "Hun! dey leave my dear home to min' de well today." Brother Rabbit say, "Come, my dear, le' me kiss you!" Soon as 'e kiss 'er his lip stick fas'. Brother Rabbit say, "Mind you better le' go," 'e say, "You see dis biggy, biggy hand here," 'e say, "If I slap you wid dat I kill you." No when Brother Rabbit fire, so, 'e han' stick. Brother Rabbit say, "Min' you better le' go me," 'E say, "You see dis biggy, biggy han' here; f I slap you wid dat I kill you." Soon as Brother Rabbit slap wid de other han', so, 'e stick. Brother Rabbit say, "You see dis biggy, biggy foot here: my pa" say, "'f I kick anybody wid my biggy, biggy foot I kill 'em." Soon as 'e fire his foot, so, it stick. Brother Rabbit say, "Min' you better le' go me." Good! soon as 'e fire his foot, so, it stick. Now Brother Rabbit jus' was hangin'; hangin' on de Tar-baby.

Brother Bouki come runnin' out firs'. 'E say, "Ha! we got 'im today! We got 'im today!" 'E gone back to de field; 'e tell Brother Elephant; 'e say, "Ha! Brother Elephant; we got 'im today!"

Then all of 'em gone out now dey ketch Brother Rabbit. Now dey did want to kill Brother Rabbit; dey didn't know where to t'row 'im. Brother Rabbit say, "'f you t'row me in de sea" (you know 'f dey had t'row Brother Rabbit in de sea, dey'd a kill 'im)—

Brother Rabbit say, "'f you t'ro me in de sea you won't hurt me a bit." Brother Rabbit say, "'f you t'row me in de fine grass, you kill me an' all my family."

Dey take Brother Rabbit. Dey t'row 'im in de fine grass. Brother Rabbit jump up; 'e put off a runnin'. So now Brother Rabbit say, "Hey! ketch me 'f you could." All of 'em went away now.

Now one day dey [the other animals] was all sittin' down eatin'. Dey had one big house; de house was full o' all kinds o' animals. Brother Rabbit gone; 'e git up on top de house; 'e make one big hole in de roof o' de house. Brother Rabbit sing out, "Now, John Fire, go out!" Brother Rabbit let go a barrel o' mud; let it run right down inside de house. when 'e let go de barrel o' mud, so, every one of 'em take to de bush, right wild; gone right over in de bush. Brother Rabbit make all on 'em went wild, till dis day you see all de animals wild.

E bo ban, my story 's en':
If you don't believe my story 's true,
Ask my captain an' my crew.

BROTHER ELEPHANT AND BROTHER WHALE

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Edwards, Charles L. Bahama Songs and Stories. Memoirs of the American Folklore Society, No. 3. New York: American Folklore Society, 1895, 65.

Date: 1895

Original Source: The Bahamas

National Origin: African American

---

“Brother Elephant and Brother Whale” is distributed not only in the West Indies but throughout the American South and in African South America. A variant of “Deceptive Tug-of-War” (AT 291), Brother Rabbit (B’Rabby) indulges in his pastime of stirring up trouble by issuing false challenges that pit unwitting competitors against each other. Along the way, there is another object lesson concerning the power of brain over brawn.

---

Once it was a time, a very good time,
De monkey chewed tobacco an’ ‘e spit white lime.

Now dis day Brother Rabbit was walkin’ ‘long de shore. ‘E see Brother Whale. ‘E say, “Brother Whale!”

Brother Whale say, “Hey!”

Brother Rabbit,” Brother Whale, I bet I could pull you on de shore!”

Brother Whale, “You can’t!”

Brother Rabbit say, “I bet you tree t’ousan’ dollar!”

Whale say, “All right!” ‘E gone.

‘E meet Brother Elephant. ‘E say, “Brother Elephant,” ‘e say, “I bet I could pull you in de sea!”

Brother Elephant say, “Me!” ‘E Dey ain’t ary man in de worl’ can pull me in de sea!” Brother Rabbit “I’ll try it tomorrow at twelve o’clock.”

‘E gone an’ get a heap o’ rope. ‘E say, “Now today we’ll try”

‘E tie one end of the rope aroun’ Brother Whale’s neck, and den ‘e tie one end aroun’ Brother Elephant’s neck. ‘E say, “When you hear me say, set taut,’ you mus’ set taut.”

'E say, "Pull away!"

When Brother Whale pull, 'e pull Brother Elephant in de surf o' de sea.
'E say, "You think dis little Brother Rabbit doin' all o' dat!"

When Brother Elephant pull, 'e pull Brother Whale in de surf o' de sea.
Brother Whale catch underneath one shelf o' de rock, and Brother Elephant catch to one big tree. Den de two of 'em pull so heavy de rope broke.

Brother Whale went in de ocean and Brother Elephant went way over in pine-yard. Das why you see Brother Whale in de ocean today and das why you see Brother Elephant over in de pine bushes today.

E bo ban, my story 's en',
If you doan' believe my story 's true,
Ask my captain an' my crew.

BROTHER RABBIT, BROTHER BOOKY, AND BROTHER COW

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Edwards, Charles L. "Some Tales from Bahama Folk-Lore." Journal of American Folklore 4 (1891): 50–51.

Date: 1891

Original Source: Bahamas

National Origin: African American

---

In the usual pairing of rabbit and Booky (spelled variously as Bouqui, Bouki, Bookie), Booky plays the foil to rabbit and is the butt of all his jokes (see, for example, "Brother Rabbit an' Brother Tar-Baby," page 414). In this tale, however, Bouki imitates rabbit, tries his hand at being a con man, triumphs over his dupes, and wins rabbit's praise.

---

Once it was a time, a very good time,
De monkey chewed tobacco an' 'e spit white lime.

Now dis day it was Brother Rabbit an' Brother Bouki. The wind was blowin'; dey did n' have nuthin' to eat; dey could n' ketch no fish. Dey was travelin' along to see if dey could n' find something to eat. An' now when Brother Rabbit look 'e see one big cow; 'e gone to de cow.

Den 'e take his hand an' spank on de cow bottom. 'E say, "Open, Kabendye, open!" When de cow bottom open Brother Rabbit jump in with his knife an' his pan. 'E cut his pan full o' meat. Brother Rabbit say, "Open, Kabendye, open!" and de cow bottom open an' Brother Rabbit jump out.

Good! Now Brother Rabbit was goin' home; his pan full o' meat. Brother Bouki see Brother Rabbit; say, "Brother Rabbit, where you get all dat meat?" Brother Bouki say, "'f you don' tell me where you get all dat meat I goin' tell!"

Brother Rabbit say, "Go right down dere where you see one big cow."

Brother Bouki say, "Hall right!"

Brother Rabbit say, "When you get dere you must take your ban'- an' spank hard on de cow bottom an' say, 'Open, Kabendye, open!'" Brother Rabbit say, "Soon as dey open you must jump in." Den 'e say, "O' You see one big t'ing inside dere; you must n' cut dat!" Brother Rabbit say, "Mind, 'f you cut dat de cow goin' to fall down dead."

Brother Bouki gone. When 'e got dere 'e take his hand; 'e spank on de cow bottom an' 'e say, "Open, Kabendye, open." Den 'e jump in. Brother Bouki cut, 'e cut, 'e cut his hand full! Brother Bouki wan' satisfied; 'e went an' 'e cut de cow heart; de cow fall down; Bran, 'e dead! Den Brother Bouki say, "Open, Kabendye, open!" After 'e foun' de cow bottom could n' open, 'e went inside de cow mouth. Nex' mornin', when de people come to feed 'im, dey found de cow dead.

Now dey begin to clean de cow; skin 'im. After dey done clean 'im dey cut 'im open; dey take out all his guts. Brother Bouki was inside de maw; swell up. De woman say, "Cut dat big t'ing open. See what in dere! "After dat dey went to cut it open; den Brother Bouki jump 'way yonder. Dey did n' see 'im.

Brother Bouki say, "See what you t'row on me. Ma jus' sent me down here to buy fresh beef, den you go t'row all dis nasty stuff on me!"

De people say, "Hush, don' cry, we give you half o' de cow!"

Brother Bouki say, "I don' want no half!" 'E say, "I goin' to carry you to jail!"

Den de man say, "No, Brother Bouki, we give you half o' de cow! "De man goin' t'row another stinking' pan o' water an' blood out. Brother Bouki jump 'way yonder [in order to be splashed by the water and blood]. De man t'row it on Brother Bouki.

Den Brother Bouki say, "Now I ain' goin' to stop; I goin' carry you right to de jail!"

De man say, "Hush, Brother Bouki, don' cry, I goin' give you half o' de cow!" Anyhow, dey give Brother Bouki half o' de cow. Brother Bouki take it on his shoulder; 'e gone.

When 'e look 'e see Brother Rabbit.

Brother Rabbit say, "Hey, where you get all o' dat meat?"

Brother Bouki say, "I went down dere; I cut dat big, big t'ing in de cow, an' de cow fall down dead." Den 'e say, "When de people come in de mornin' to kill de cow," 'e say, "I was inside de cow; when dey cut dat big t'ing I jump 'way yonder"; I say, "See what you t'row 'pon me!" 'e say, "Den dey give me half o' de cow."

Brother Rabbit say, "Dat 's de way to do!"

E bo ban, my story 's en':
If you don't believe my story 's true,
Ask my captain an' my crew.

THE GIRL AND THE FISH

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Edwards, Charles L. "Some Tales from Bahama Folk-Lore: Fairy Stories." Journal of American Folklore 4 (1891): 247.

Date: 1891

Original Source: Bahamas

National Origin: African American

---

Collector Charles Edwards notes that catching the tiny fish that gather in old conch shells is a common pastime for children in the Bahamas. Martha Warren Beckwith (1924) in her discussion of this tale type, which she labels "The Fish Lover," notes that it is common in Jamaica and distributed widely in the West Indies. The message of the tale is that violations of the natural order cannot be tolerated. As Beckwith's label attests, this ordinary folktale is classified "The Fish Lover" (AT 431C).

---

This day this girl went down to de sea for salt water. She catch one little fish out de conch shell. She name him Choncho-wally. She put him in de well. Ev'ry morning she use to put some of her breakfas' in de bucket an' carry to de fish; an' some of her dinner, an' some of her supper. She feed him 'till 'e get a big fish.

This mornin', when she went' to carry de breakfas' for him, she sing:

Conch-o, Conch-o-wall-y,
Don't you wan' to mar-ry me,
my daddy short-tail.

'E comes up an' she feed him. Den she let him go down. When she wen' home, de boy say, "Pa, sister' got somet'in' inside de well."

Den de nex' day she come; bring vittles again for him. De man say to de boy, "You go behin' de. tree an' listen to what she goin' sing." De gal sing:

Conch-o, Conch-o-wall-y,
Don't you want to marry me,
My daddy short-tail?

Huh! De boy catch it [hears her song]; 'e gone; tell 'e pa. De boy say, "Pa, sister say, 'Conch-o, Conch-o-wally,' etc. De man go; 'e took he grange, [fish spear] 'e sing, "Conch-o, Conch-o-wally," etc. De fish come up; 'e strike him. 'E carry him home an' they had some for dinner. De gal say, "I bet you this nice fish!"

Den de gal took some in de bucket to carry to de fish. Den when de gal went' to de well to call de fish, she sing,

Conch-o, Conch-o-wally,
Don't you want to marry me,
My daddy short-tail?

She sing again,

Conch-o, Conch-o-wally,
Don't you want to marry me,
My daddy short-tail?

She ain' hear no fish, an' she ain' see none. She sing again,

Conch-o, Conch-o-wally,
Don't you want to marry me,
My daddy short-tail?

She begin to cry now,

Conch-o, Conch-o-wally,
Don't you want to marry me,
My daddy short-tail?

Den she went' home to de house, behin' de house, an' she cry 'erself to death.

E bo ban, my story 's en':
If you don't believe my story 's true,
Ask my captain an' my crew.

THE BIG WORM

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Edwards, Charles L. Bahama Songs and Stories. Memoirs of the American Folklore Society, No. 3. New York: American Folklore Society, 1895, 72–73.

Date: 1895

Original Source: The Bahamas

National Origin: African American

---

“The Big Worm” is a member of the class of stories known in the Bahamas as “old story.” These stories are, at their cores, of African rather than European origin.

---

Once it was a time, a very good time,
De monkey chewed tobacco an’ ‘e spit white lime.

So once there was a man; he had two sons; dey did n’ have no fire. All dey had to eat was raw potatoes. Now de man send’ dis boy to look for fire. De boy walk; he walk; he walk till ‘e saw smoke rising. When ‘e gone ‘e get to dat fire.

When ‘e get there, he saw a worm was full o’ fire. De boy say, “Dimme some fan!” (Give me some fire).

De worm say, “‘T ain’, ‘t ain’ none; jus’ enough for me.” De worm say, “Come in little closer.” Good! Soon as de boy wen’ a little closer, when ‘e went to reach de fire de worm swallow him down.

Den de boy wen’ down, right down, down inside de worm till ‘e stop. De boy met whole lot o’ people what de worm did swallow.

So now de man tell de other son, “I wonder where my son gone?”

De other son say, “Pa, I goin’ look for him.” ‘E walk, ‘e walk, ‘e walk till ‘e come to this big worm, what had de fire in his mouth. So now de boy went to de worm. De boy say, “Dimme some fan!”

De worm say, “Keelie o’ fire” (Come and get fire).

De boy say, “Do i en e [untranslated, perhaps a retention from an African language], dimme some fan?”

De worm say, “Come a little closer.” De worm say, “Time for Joe come” (Time to go home). De worm say, “Keelie o’ fire.”

When de boy wen’ to get de fire so, de worm swallow him down. De boy wen; ‘e wen’ down; ‘e wen’ down, till ‘e met ‘e brother.

Now de boy father say, “My two sons gone an’ I might as well gone too.” De man take ‘e lan’ (lance); it fairly glisten, it so sharp. When ‘e get there where de worm was wid de fire in he mouth, de man say, “Dimme some fan!”

De worm say, “You too do fur me!” (You’re too much for me). De worm say, “Keelie o’ fire.”

When de man wen’ to get de fire, so, de worm wen’ to swallow him. De man take he’ lan’; as ‘e was goin’ down ‘e cut de worm; ‘e cut de worm till ‘e cut de worm right open an’ all de people come, an’ dat was a big city right there.

E bo ban, my story ‘s en’,
If you doan’ believe my story ‘s true,
Ask my captain an’ my crew.

JAMAICA

---

THE ORIGIN OF WOMAN

Tradition Bearer: Harry Murray

Source: Bates, William C. "Creole Folk-Lore from Jamaica II: Nancy Stories." Journal of American Folklore 9 (1896): 124–125.

Date: 1896

Origin: Jamaica

National Origin: African American

---

Jamaica is an island located in the West Indies, east of the Central American coast, south of Cuba, and west of Haiti. From the mid-seventeenth century through independence in 1962, it was under British rule. The following "origin" tale, embedded within an argument between a husband and wife, serves no explanatory function as does the myth genre that it parodies. Rather, this story serves as an example of a comic narrative turning on alleged gender differences based on a flawed act of creation.

---

A discussion arose between black Lizzie and her husband upon the origin of man. Harry laid it down for an axiom that he was made from the dust of the earth, because the minister said so.

"I make out o' dust fe' sartin."

To him, according to the story, Lizzie replies, "Me no make out o' none dirt." Then Harry, "Ef you don' make out o' dirt, wha' you make out o'? You make out o' dirt, yes!"

"I don't make out o' notin' o' de skin."

"Den wha' you make out o'? You mus' make out o' some golden thing or another, den?"

"I don' make out o' no golden thing, an' I don' make out o' none dirt. I make out o' bone."

"Make out o' wha'?"

"Bone!"

"Bone?"

"Yes, bone to be sho'."

"Wha' kin' o' bone?"

"Rib's bone! You na hea' minista' say so?"

"Well, I don' know what to say 'bout dat; I don' like to say dat wha' minista' say not de truth; but I mean fe' say, when minista' read 'bout dat rib's bone, him must mean white woman, because dem white, so de bone white. Ef you make de same, you' 'skin would a been white."

"Cho," said Lizzie, "ef you had opened your ears instead of sleeping, you would a hea' de minsta' say de 'skin notin', but de blood, da de thing, because in de book say, dat white-o, brown-o, black-o, all make de same blood; you eba' see white blood an' black blood?"

"Look you," said Harry, "It you know how me Uncle Jame use to say woman came in dis worl'?"

"Cho, no bother me."

"Never min', I going tell you. Dem make two men; de first one he made very well, but when dem make de other one, it's kinda' spoil. Den as dem look upon it, so it began to jump about, and shake him head, and do all kind o' stupid thing, like a how woman goes on. Den one o' dem hold him, say, "Wha' kind o' thing you?" Den de oder say, "Cho, him no use, him can' talk. Every day him was like a dummy, till one day dem hol' him so, examine him tongue, den dem see de tongue tie; dem take a razor, cut it. As dem cut it so, bam! de thing mouth begin to fly, dem couldn't stop it. Dem say, "Well, dem sorry dey ever cut de tongue." From dat time, it make you hear dem say, "'Ef you wan' woman to be good, give him 'tump o' tongue (stump of tongue, a tongue-tie)."

ANNANCY AND THE YAM HILLS

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Smith, Pamela Coleman. "Two Negro Stories from Jamaica." Journal of American Folklore 9 (1896): 278.

Date: 1896

Original Source: Jamaica

National Origin: African American

---

"Annancy and the Yam Hills" shows the popular trickster figure in a typical attempt to satisfy his own needs at his neighbor's expense. In a gloss on a variant of this tale, Martha Warren Beckwith claims that the story turns on a belief that it is “unlucky to reveal to others a marvel one has seen oneself, or to repeat certain taboo words” (1924, 254). In any case, Annancy, rather than being constrained by the witch queen’s tyranny, finds a way to subvert it, at least temporarily. The concluding maxim concerning the penalty for greed is a common way of ending Annancy tales in some Caribbean traditions.

---

One time Annancy lived in a country where the Queen’s name was Five, an’ she was a witch; an’ she says whoever say “five” was to fall down dead.

It was very hungry times, and so Annancy go build himself a little house by de side of de river. An’ him make five yam hills. An’ when anybody come to get water at de river he call them an’ say, “I beg you tell me how many yam hills I have here. I can’t count whoever well.” So den dey would come in and say, “One, two, three, four, five!” an’ fall down dead. Then Annancy take dem an’ corn dem in his barrel [preserved them in brine] an’ eat dem, an’ so he live in hungry times—in plenty.

So time go on, an’ one day Guinea fowl come dat way, an’ Annancy say, “Beg you, Missus, tell me how many yam hills have I here.” So Guinea fowl go an’ sit on hill an’ say, “One, two, three, four, an’ de one I am sittin’ on!”

“Cho!” say Annancy; “you don’t count it right!” An’ Guinea fowl move to another yam hill an’ say, “Yes, one, two, three, four, an’ de one I am sittin’ on.”

“He! you don’t count right at all!”

“How you count, den?”

“Why dis way,” say Annancy, “One, two, three, four, FIVE!” an’ he fell down dead, an’ Guinea fowl eat him up!

Dis story show dat “Greedy choke puppy.”

CUNNIE-MORE-THAN-FATHER

Tradition Bearer: George Parkes

Source: Beckwith, Martha Warren. Jamaica Anansi Stories. Memoirs of the American Folklore Society, No. 17. New York: American Folklore Society, 1924, 27–31.

Date: 1924

Original Source: Jamaica

National Origin: African American

---

In the wake of being outwitted at every turn by the cleverness of Cunnie-mo’n-father (that is, “More Cunning Than Father”), Anansi is driven to murderous fury by losing his title of supreme trickster to his child. Folklorist Martha Warren Beckwith points out that this tale has parallels throughout the Caribbean, Latin America, and Africa. The particular narratives in this cycle of folktales differ in their details, but all focus on the superior wit of the son and the jealousy of the father, Anansi.

---

Anansi has seven children. He ask them how they would like to name. Six of them like different name, but one boy say he would like to [be] name “Cunnie-mo’n-father.” So for every tack [trick] Anansi put up, Cunnie-mo’n-father break it down.

One time he work a groun’ very far away into the bush, an’ in going to that bush he pass a very broad flat rock. So one day a man give him a yam-plant; that yam name “yam foofoo” [a yellow yam]. The same day plant the yam, it been bear a very big one same day. So nobody in the yard know the name of that yam save him, Anansi, alone.

So when he go home, he cook the yam an’ call the wife an’ chil’ren aroun’ to eat, an’ say, “Who know name, nyam; who no know name, don’ nyam!” So as no one know the name, they didn’t get none of it; Anansi alone eat off that yam that night. The nex’ day go back to the groun’ and the yam bear a larger one. He bring it home an’ bile it again, call the wife an’ chil’ren an’ say, “Who know name, nyam; who no know name, don’ nyam!” The nex’ day he went back an’ the yam bear a larger one than the previous day. He cut it an’ carry it home, cook it, call up the wife an’ chil’ren; he alone eat it.

Cunnie-mo’n-father say, “Look here! I mus’ fin’ out the name of that yam!” He got some okra an’ went to the place where the broad rock is an’ mash up the okra an’ have the place quite slippery, an’ hide himself away in the bush near by. Anansi now coming with a larger yam this time. As he reach to the rock, he make a slide, fa’ down, an’ the yam smash.

He said, “Lawd! All me yam foofoo mash up!”

Cunnie-mo’n-father now catch the name, an’ he ran home now an’ tell mother an’ other chil’ren, “Remember! yam foofoo!” Anansi then take up the pieces, put them together and carry home. He cook it an’ ca’ all of them roun’ to eat.

He say, “Who know name, nyam; who no know name, no nyam.” They began to guess all sort of name; after that, whole of them say, “Yam foofoo! yam foofoo!” Anansi get vex, say, “Huh! eat! nobody fin’ it out but Cunnie-mo’n-father!”

Anansi then get to hate Cunnie-mo’n-father, want to make an end of him, but he didn’t know what way was to do it. So one night Brar [Brother] Tiger came to pay a visit to Anansi at his house. While both of them sittin’ an’ talkin’, at that time Cunnie-mo’n-father was lying down underneath the table fawning [feigning] sleep.

Anansi said to Tiger, "Look heah! ev'ry tack dat I put up, Cunnie-mo'-n-father break it down. I wan' to mak an end of him, but I don' know what way to do it." That time, Cunnie-mo'-n-father listen.

Tiger said, "I wi' kill him fo' you."

Anansi say, "How you will manage it?"

So Tiger said to Anansi, "You mus' put up a tack, an' I wi' ketch him."

Anansi said, "Look heah! Tomorrow night jus' at dinner-time you come here hide yo'self in the pepper tree; behin' that fattest limb, you hide yo'self there, an' I will sen' him to pick some pepper an' as he put his han' on the pepper tree, you mus' hol' him."

So the nex' night at dinner-time Tiger went to hide himself there. Anansi call Cunnie-mo'-n-father, say, "Go get pepper from the pepper tree."

Cunnie-mo'-n-father start for de pepper tree. On his way going he call in the kitchen an' take a fire-stick, an' as he went to the pepper tree, he shove the fire-stick right in Tiger face.

Tiger cry out, "W'y-ee!" an' gallop away.

Cunnie-mo'-n-father return to Anansi an' say he hear something in the pepper tree cry, so he don' pick any. Anansi eat his dinner that night without pepper.

A few minutes after, Tiger come back in the house an' tol' Anansi what have taken place. Anansi say, "Well, the boy have tack! but we mus' ketch him." At that time the boy go under the table lay down an' study for them again.

Tiger say, "How mus' we ketch him?"

Anansi said, "You come here tomorrow twelve o'clock an' I'll sen' him up on a cocoanut tree an' while he in the tree, you wait underneath; when he come down you ketch him." The nex' morning, Cunnie-mo'-n-father get two bags, fill it with red ants go up same cocoanut tree an' hide it, preparing for Tiger. At twelve o'clock Tiger come to Anansi yard. Anansi call for Cunnie-mo'-n-father an' said, "Go an' get me some cocoanuts off'n that tree." He went, an' Tiger lay wait under the tree for him. He shout to Tiger he mus' look up an' show him the bes' cocoanut he want, an' while Tiger do that, he open one of the bag an' throw it down in Tiger face. Ant begun to bite him an' he has to run away. Cunnie-mo'-n-father slip right down off the cocoanut tree, so he didn't get any cocoanut.

In the evening, Tiger went back to Anansi to tell him how Cunnie-mo'-n-father do him again. While the two of them was talking an' setting up another tack, Cunnie-mo'-n-father was underneath table listening to them again.

Anansi said, "The boy smart! but I goin' to put you up a tack fo' ketch him! Look heah! Tomorrow at twelve o'clock, you fin' yo'self at me groun' an' you will see a fat root of yam near to a tree. You mus' hide yo'self in the bush an' I will sen' him there to come cut yam, an' as he come there, hol' him."

Tiger then went an' fix himself in the yam bush. At twelve o'clock Anansi call Cunnie-mo'-n-father an' sen' him to groun, to cut yam an' tell him that very spot whe' he is to dig them.

Cunnie-mo'n-father went to the groun' an' shout out "Yam-o-e-e! yam-o-ee! yam-o-ee!" t'ree times. Nobody answer. Cunnie-mo'n-father say, "I t'ink father tell me say that when I come to groun' call fo' yam, yam wi' speak, an' de yam don' speak!" Call again, "Yam-o-ee!"

So Tiger answer him, "O-ee-e!"

So Cunnie-mo'n-father say, "From me bwoy born, the firs' I hear that yam can talk!" So run home back lef' Tiger.

So Tiger leave the groun' an' come home an' tell Anansi what happen.

Anansi said, "Well, 'cunnie mo' than me' fe trew, but we goin' to ketch him!"

At that time Cunnie-mo'n-father underneath the table fe listen, an' unfortunately he fell fas' asleep. So Anansi an' Tiger ketch him an' make a coffin an' put him in. Anansi tell Tiger he mus' take him t'row him far away in the sea where he kyan't come back again. Tiger lif' up the coffin, put it on his head an' start on the journey.

On reaching to a bush he help down the coffin an', as the sun was so hot, went underneath a tree an' fall asleep. Now there was a little hole in the coffin, an' looking thru that hole, Cunnie-mo'n-father saw an ol' man comin' along drivin' a flock of sheep. He began to cry, sayin' they want him to go to heaven an' he don' ready to go yet.

The ol' man said, "Bwoy, you too foolish! Heaven's a good place an' you don' ready to go there yet? You open the coffin put me in!"

The ol' man open the coffin, Cunnie-mo'n-father come out, put in the ol' man an' nail up the coffin back with him in it. He then drove the sheep a little way up inside the bush. Tiger now wake out of his sleep, lif' up the coffin an' away he went to the sea with it, an' go as far he could an' t'row the coffin down in the sea drown the ol' man, fe' a heaven he want to go! He then go back to Anansi yard an' tell him that he has finish with the fellow—no more of him, fe' he has drown' him in the deepest part of the sea.

Later in the evening, while Anansi an' Tiger was sitting down an' talking about the badness of Cunnie-mo'n-father, Anansi look an' see a flock of sheep was coming up to his house an' some one driving it. The driver was Cunnie-mo'n-father.

Anansi says to Tiger, "But now look at the bwoy what you drown' today, look at him driving a flock of sheep coming up!"

Tiger said, "No! 'cause I t'row him in the farthest part of the sea!" They waited until he drove them up to the yard. Tiger said to him, "Boy, don't it was you I t'row into the sea today?" Cunnie-mo'n-father said, "Yes, the place whe' you t'row me I get these sheep, an' if you did t'row me a little further, I would get double more than this!"

Anansi, hearing that, said that he would like to get some himself an' Cunnie-mo'n-father mus' carry him an' t'row him at the part where he can get the sheep. Cunnie-mo'n-father then get a coffin make an' put Anansi in it carry him to the sea-side, hire a boat, an' carry him far far away in the sea an' drown him.

An' that was, the las' of poor Anansi in that story.

ANANSI AND THE LADY IN THE WELL

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Trowbridge, Ada Wilson. "Negro Customs and Folk-Stories of Jamaica." Journal of American Folklore 9 (1896): 283–284.

Date: 1896

Original Source: Jamaica

National Origin: African American

---

Anansi, often simply called "Nancy" in Jamaican tradition, plays out the ambiguities of tricksters cross-culturally. While identified with a large, black spider found throughout the islands, in the "Nancy tales," he may take on the human form along with his human attributes. Often turning his guile to selfish and even sadistic ends, in the tale of "Anansi and the Lady in the Well," he acts as a compassionate intermediary between an abused wife and her neglected child. Although his motivations remain unknowable, he intervenes to help the victims of an abusive and exploitive male figure.

---

Once it was a time when there was a good queen. An' she have husban' an' one pretty baby. An' she have one little pet dog, who go trot, trot, all 'bout de house after her.

Now de husban' he t'ink nothin' at all of him wife, an' he say to himse'f. "I put dat queen down de ole well, and den I get another mo' beau'ful queen." Den he do dis same t'ing what he t'ink in him ole black heart.

Now de queen she fall way down to de bottom of de well an' she can't scramble out no way, an' jus' sit all de day and cry fu' her baby. By an' by Nancy he come scrape, scrape, crup, crup, down de side de well an' say, "Howdy! W'at fo' you' cry, me lady?"

De queen say, "Howdy, Nancy! Me cry fo' me baby."

"Jus' jump on me back," say Nancy, "an' I fetch you' out dat well."

He take de queen on him back and go scrape, scrape, crup, crup, up de side de well. Den he say, "Now run! wash de baby, an' me fetch you down de well again befo' your husban' catch you."

Den she run to de door an' sing:

O-pen de do', my lit-tle dog-gie!

An' de little dog sing:

Yes, fo' cer-'a'n, my fair lah-dy!

Den she sing ‘gain:

Fetch the baby, my lit-tle dog-gie!

An’ de little dog sing:

Yes, fo’ certain, my fair la-dy!

An’ so till all de t’ings fetched an’ de baby all wash, dress, an’ sleep so sweet. Den she run back to Nancy an’ he take her on him back an’ go scrape, scrape, crup, crup, back down de well ‘gain. [In telling this story the narrator will often sing for each article of the baby’s toilette, and sing the reply of the dog, in the simple measures given above.]

An’ ev’ry day Nancy come dis way and say, “Howdy, me lady!” and take de queen on him back an’ fetch her out de well, an’ she wash an’ dress dat baby till him grow big boy.

COCK’S BREAKFAST

Tradition Bearer: Richard Morgan

Source: Beckwith, Martha Warren. Jamaica Anansi Stories. Memoirs of the American Folklore Society, No. 17. New York: American Folklore Society, 1924, 61.

Date: 1924

Original Source: Jamaica

National Origin: African American

---

The tale of the “Cock’s Breakfast” casts cockroach in the role of trickster. Martha Warren Beckwith, in fact, suggests a comparison between cockroach and the more famous African and African American trickster Anansi (1924, 260). Cockroach is featured in similar tales in Caribbean tradition. The present narrative is built on “Enmity of Fowl and Cockroach” (Motif A2494.5.18).

---

One day Cockroach said to Cock, “Brother Cock, get little breakfas’, so I will come an’ have breakfas’ wid you.” Cock said yes. Cockroach come, Cockroach eat.

When he done ‘e said, “Brother Cock, when you know time my breakfas’ ready, come.”

Cock said, “How mus’ I know?”

Cockroach said, “I will gi’ you a sign. When you hear I make noise, don’ come; but when you hear I stay still in de yard you mus’ come.”

When Cock go, he didn't fin' Cockroach. Cock return back to his yard. Secon' day, Cockroach come an' say, "Oh, Brother Cock! after I lef' you here, I got pain all over my skin so I go an' lie down, I couldn't look a t'ing; but t'-day you can come."

Cock do de same, go to de yard, didn't fin' him, return back. When he got half way, he hear in Cockroach house,

Ring a ting ting,
Me know fool for fool!

Cock take time, tip on him toe. An' go long to one gourd, he hear cockroach in a de gourd. An' Cock take him beak, lick him at de gourd. Cockroach run out. Cock pick him up an' swaller him.

So from dat day, not a cockroach walk a fowl yard any more.

TIGER SOFTENS HIS VOICE

Tradition Bearer: George Parkes

Source: Beckwith, Martha Warren. Jamaica Anansi Stories. Memoirs of the American Folklore Society, No. 17. New York: American Folklore Society, 1924, 116–118.

Date: 1924

Original Source: Jamaica

National Origin: African American

---

As is the case with various tales from the African Caribbean, an animal desires a human woman for his wife. These tales usually share a similar motif of the magic power of song to charm and transform.

---

Once upon a time a woman had one daughter, an' that daughter was the prettiest girl in an' around that country. Every man want the girl to marry, but the mother refuse them as they come.

Tiger, too, wanted the girl, an' demands the girl, an' the mother says no. Tiger said if he don't get the girl he will kill her. So they remove from that part of the country and go to another part, into a thick wild wood where no one live. And she made a house with a hundred doors and a hundred windows and a large staircase; and the house is an upstairs, an' there both of them live.

Tiger hear of it, always loafing aroun' the house to see if he can catch the girl, but the girl never come out. During the day, the mother went to her work, leaving the girl at home. When going out, the mother fasten all the doors an' windows; coming home in the evening, at a certain spot where she can see the house an' notice that all the windows an' doors are close as she leave it, then now she have a song to sing, go like this—

Tom Jones, Tom Jones, Tom Jones!
(that's the name of the girl)

Girl now—

Deh lo, madame!

Woman said to her now—

Fare you well, fare you well, fare you well,
Fare you well, me dear; fare you well, me love!
A[in't] no Tiger, deh la, ho, deh la, ho?
Me jus' come, ho!

Then the door open, so—

Cheeky checky knock umbar,
Cheeky checky knock umbar,
Cheeky checky knock umbar.

The door don't open without that song now, and when it open, the mamma go into the house.

At that time, Tiger in the bush listening to the song. So one day while she was away, hear time for her to come home, Tiger approach the spot where she always sing. He now in a very coarse voice sings the song—

Tom Jones, Tom Jones, Tom Jones!

Girl now—

Deh lo, madame!

The girl look from the window, said, "Tiger, a who no know sa' a you!" [I know who you are.] So now Tiger go 'way an' hide till mamma come. When she come, he listen good. Next day, Tiger go to a blacksmith an' ask de blacksmith what he t'ink can give him, Tiger, a clear v'ice [voice].

De blacksmi't say he must hot a long iron an' when it hot, mus' take it push down his t'roat. An' de blacksmi't give him a bit of meat to eat after he burn the throat an' that will give him a clear v'ice. So Tiger go away eat de meat first an' den burn de t'roat after.

Nex' day he went to the spot where the woman always sing from. An' that make his v'ice more coarser. He sing now—

Tom Jones, Tom Jones, Tom Jones!

Girl now—

Deh lo, madame!

The girl look thru the window an' say, "Cho! a who no know sa' a you!" So Tiger got vex' now, an' he went home, burn the throat first and afterward eat the meat, and that give him a clearer v'ice than the woman. The nex' day, when most time for the woman to come home from her work, Tiger went to the spot where he can see the house. He begin to sing—

Tom Jones, Tom Jones, Tom Jones!

Girl now—

Deh lo, madame!

The girl answer (tho't it was her mother now)—

Deh la, madame!

Then Tiger say—

Fare you well, fare you well, fare you well,
 Fare you well, me dear; fare you well, me love!
 A no Tiger deh lo o-o-o
 Me jus' come, h-o-o-o!

The door commence to open now—

Cheeky cheeky cheeky knock umbar,
 Cheeky cheeky cheeky knock umbar,
 Cheeky cheeky cheeky knock umbar!

And as the door open, Tiger step up an' caught the girl an' swallow her.

And when the mother coming home, reach to the spot and saw the doors and windows open, she throw down what she carry and run to the house. And she saw Tiger lay down. And the mother then went away an' get some strong men come an' tie Tiger, kill him, an' open de belly an' take out de daughter. At that time, little life left in her an' they get back the life in her. The woman then leave the house an' go off away far into another country, and that is why you always fin' lot of old houses unoccupied that no one live in.

THE WITCH AT BOSEN CORNER

Tradition Bearer: Martha Roe

Source: Beckwith, Martha Warren. Jamaica Anansi Stories. Memoirs of the American Folklore Society, No. 17. New York: American Folklore Society, 1924, 94–96.

Date: 1924

Original Source: Jamaica

National Origin: African American

---

The following tale is a Caribbean variant of “The Kind and the Unkind Girls” (AT 480). This widely distributed narrative is represented in the tale corpus of Jacob and Wilhelm Grimm as “Frau Holle.”

---

A woman have two daughter; one was her own chil' an' one was her daughter-in-law. So she didn't use her daughter-in-law good. So de place whe' dem go fe water a bad place, Ol' Witch country. De place name Bosen Corner.

One day she sen' de daughter-in-law fe water. So when she go long, she see so-so [only] head in de road; she put her hand on belly mek kind howdy. Go on again, see two foot go one in anudder so (crossed) in de road. An' say, “Howdy, papa.”

So-so foot say, “Gal, whe you gwine?” She said, “Mamma sen' me a Bosen Corner fe water.”

He say, “Go on, gal; good befo' an' bad behin'.” She go on till she ketch to a little hut, see one ol' lady sit down deh. She say, “Howdy, nana,” De ol' lady say, “Whe' you gwine?” Say, “Ma sen' me a Bosen Corner fe water, ma'am.” De ol' lady say, “Come in here; late night goin' tek you.” De Ol' Witch go pick up one piece of bone out dungle-heap an' choppy up putty in pot, an' four grain of rice. Boil de pot full of meat an' rice an' get de gal dinner. De gal eat, an, eat done call her say, “Me gal, come here 'cratch me back.” When she run her han' 'cratch her back so, back pick all de gal han' so it bleed. Ol' Witch ask her, “What de matter you' han'?” Say, “Not'ing, ma'am.” Even when it cut up all bleed, never say not'ing. When she go sit down, ol' lady go out of door come in one ol' cat. De ol' cat come in de gal lap, an' she hug it up an' coax de cat an' was so kin' to de cat. An' de gal sleep an' get up to go away in de mo'ning, De ol' lady tell her say mus' go roun' de house see some fowl-egg. She tell de gal say, de egg whe' she hear say, “Tek me! tek me!” dem are big egg; she musn't tek dem; small egg say, “No tek me!” she mus’ tek four. First crossroad ketch, she mus’ mash one. Firs’ crossroad she mash one de egg, an’ see into a big pretty common. Second crossroad she mash udder one; de common pack up wid cow an’ goat an’ sheep an’ ev’ryt’ing dat a gentleman possess in property. De t’ird crossroad she mash anudder one; she saw a pretty young gentleman come out into a buggy. De fourt’ crossroad she mash de las’ egg an’ fin’ de gentleman is a prince an’ he marry her.

De daughter-in-law come, her an’ her husban’, drive into de yard see murder-in-law. She expect’ de Ol’ Witch kill de gal didn’t know she was living. So she sen’ fe her own daughter, sen’ a Bosen Corner fe water, say de udder one go get fe her riches, so she mus’ get riches too. De gal tek a gourd an’ going now fe water too. Go long an’ see so-so head an’ say, “Ay-e-e! from me bo’n I nebber see so-so head yet!” So-so head say, “Go long, gall better day befo’.” An’ go long an’ meet upon so-so foot, an’ say, “Eh! me mamma sen’ me fe water I buck up agains’ all kind of bugaboo, meet all kin’ of insect!” An’ say, “Go long, gall better day befo’.” An’ go de ol’ lady house now. De ol’ lady go tek de ol’ bone go putty on de fire again, an’ say, “Nana, you gwine tell me so-so bone bile t’-day fe me dinner?” An’ when she see de four grain of rice she say, “Nebber see fo’ grain of rice go in a pot yet!” Till it boil de pot full de same wid rice an’ meat. De ol’ lady share fe her dinner give her, an’ she go tu’n a puss an’ come back in. When de puss beg fe little rice, de gal pick her up fling her out de door. Ol’ lady call her fe come, ‘cratch him back too, an’ put him han’ to ‘cratch him back, draw it back say, “Nebber see such a t’ing to ‘cratch de back an’ cut han’!” Nex’ mo’ning, de ol’ lady tell her mus’ look in back of de house tek egg. De big egg say, “Tek me! tek me!” mus’n’t tek dem; de little egg say, “No tek me! no tek me!” mus’ tek four. She don’ tek de small one, tek four of de big egg. De firs’ crossroad she break one an’ see a whole heap of snake. At de secon’ crossroad she break anudder an’ see a whole lot of insect. At de las’ crossroad she massoo one, an’ see a big Ol’ Witch man tear her up kill her ‘tiff dead in de road.

JACK AND THE DEVIL ERRANT

Tradition Bearer: Elizabeth Hilton

Source: Beckwith, Martha Warren. Jamaica Anansi Stories. Memoirs of the American Folklore Society, No. 17. New York: American Folklore Society, 1924, 61.

Date: 1924

Original Source: Jamaica

National Origin: African American

---

The following ordinary folktale is a classic example of “The Girl as Helper in the Hero’s Flight” (AT 313). As such, the plot incorporates the six characteristic episodes of AT 313: “Hero Comes into Ogre’s [Devil’s] Power,” “The Ogre’s Tasks,” “The Flight,” “The Forgotten Fiancée,” “Waking from Magical Forgetfulness,” and “The Old Bride Chosen.” The tale is an African American variant of a common European type.

---

Jack was a great gambler—no one could ever beat him a game; and he went and gambled with the Devil Errant. Jack won the first, second and third games; the Devil Errant won the fourth and the fifth games,

The Devil Errant said to Jack, “I require nothing of you but to find me in three months.” No man knew where the Devil Errant lived, and if Jack doesn’t find him in three months, the Devil Errant will take his head. And the Devil Errant knew where Jack lived.

Jack was fretting and didn’t know what to do. He asked every one of his friends and they said they didn’t know the Devil Errant and didn’t know where he lived. He went to the keeper of the world and asked him where the Devil Errant lived.

He said, “How could you play cards with a man like that! However, I am keeper of all the beasts. In the morning I will ring the bell and all will come and I will ask them if they know the Devil Errant.”

In the morning he rang the bell and all the beasts came. Everyone said he didn’t know the Devil Errant. So he said, “I don’t know what to do, Jack; but I have a brother who lives three hundred miles from here, and I will roll a barrel and you must go after the barrel; where the barrel stops, that will be where my brother lives.”

In the morning, he rolled the barrel and Jack followed the barrel, and it stopped in the brother’s yard and Jack stopped too. And he asked the brother if he knew the Devil Errant and he said no, didn’t know a man like that. And he said, “Well, I am the keeper of all the fish in the sea. In the morning I will ring the bell and all the fish can come und I will ask them if they know the Devil Errant.” In the morning, he rang the bell and all the fish came and they said they didn’t know a man like the Devil Errant.

Jack was fretting, for it only needed three days and the three month would be gone, The brother said, “Well, I don’t know what to do, but I have another brother who lives two hundred miles from here. Tomorrow I will roll the barrel and where that barrel stops that will be the place.

In the morning, he rolled the barrel and Jack followed after the barrel, and when he got to the other brother the brother said, “Well, I don’t know such a man by the name of the Devil Errant, but I am the keeper of all the birds in the year, and in the morning I will ring the bell and they will come and I will ask them if they know the Devil Errant.”

In the morning, he rang the bell and all the birds came except one named the Quack, and everyone said he didn’t know the Devil Errant. Little after, the Quack came up. The keeper asked him why he didn't come all this time and he said, "I was just at the Devil Errant's yard picking up a few grains of corn."

The keeper said to Jack, "This is the only one who can take you to the Devil Errant's yard."

Jack had to kill a cow now and cut it up in pieces and put it on the bird's back along with himself, and every time the bird said "Quack," give him a piece of meat. The Quack was a greedy bird; said "Quack" and gave him a piece, "Quack" and gave him a piece, "Quack" and gave him a piece, "Quack" and gave him a piece, till he gave him the whole cow, didn't have any more to give him. The bird said "Quack" and he gave him his hat, "Quack" and he gave him his boots, "Quack" and didn't have anything more to give him, and the bird dropped him at the river-side.

As Jack was there crying he saw an old man come. The man said, "Jack, what you doing here?" Jack said, "I was gambling with the Devil Errant and he won me the fourth and fifth times and he said I was to find him in three months, and the three months are up today."

The man said, "Well, I advise you to stay here for a few minutes and you will see the Devil Errant's two daughters come to bathe. You must not trouble those two, but when you see the third one come, when she goes to bathe take her clothes and hide them, and when she comes out to look for the clothing say to her, 'Your father played me a trick and I will play you one too!'"

Jack did so. When the girl looked for her clothes, Jack said, "Your father played me a trick and I will play you one too."

And the girl fell in love with Jack and told him all her father's secrets and said, "Now, Jack, when you go to my father's gate, if he tells you to come in you mustn't go in at the gate; for there will be a sword ready to cut off your head. Let him come and open the gate for you."

So when Jack went to the Devil Errant's yard, the Devil Errant said, "You are very clever indeed, Jack! Open the gate and come in."

Jack said, "No, you come and open it." The Devil came and opened the gate.

The Devil said, "As you are so clever to find me in three months. I will give you another task to do."

He dropped his gold ring into an empty well and said, "Go and pick it up."

When Jack went, the well was full of water. Poor Jack was hungry and crying. He saw the girl coming with his breakfast and a bag with a machete in it.

And she said, "Why are you crying, Jack?"

He said, "Because your father has given me a task I can't do."

She said, "What is it?" He said, "He dropped his ring into the well when it was empty, and when I went to pick it up, it was full of water."

She said, "Well, what you must do is to take this machete now and cut me up in pieces and I will be a ladder, and when you are coming back, you must take up every piece and put it into this bag and I will become the same woman."

Jack said he couldn't do it at all, but she forced him to and so he did it, He chopped her up and put her down and she became a ladder, and every time in coming up he took up a piece until he had taken up the whole, only one little piece he forgot, till at last she became the same woman, only she had lost one of her finger-joints; but she said, "Never mind for that, Jack!"

Jack took the ring to the Devil Errant and he said, "Since you are so clever, I will give you another task; take this house, now, and shingle it with dove feather." Jack was crying and he saw the girl coming with a barrel of corn.

She said, "Now, Jack, dash this corn about the house and every bird will come to feed; and pick the feathers and shingle it with dove feathers." And so Jack did.

And the Devil said, "You are so clever I will give you another task to do, and when you have done that I will set you free." And he gave him a bit and said, "Go and catch my horse in the pasture." When Jack went to the pasture he saw it was a mountain of sea. Jack was crying and he saw the girl coming with a gun and a stone.

She said, "Don't cry, Jack! take the bridle and stone, fire the gun and dash into the sea. The horse will come and put his head into the bit, as my grandfather was buried here."

When Jack carried the horse to the Devil Errant, the Devil Errant said, "You are very clever indeed. I will give you one of my daughters to marry." He had the three girls dress alike and gave a grand dance and said when they were dancing he must pick out the one that he loved the best. The girl told him that she would wear a different branch and told him what branch she would wear, so he picked out the youngest daughter. The Devil Errant said he couldn't give him that one at all because she was too young, but Jack said she was the only one he loved, and the Devil Errant couldn't break his promise and had to give her to him, and they got the parson to come and marry them.

That night the wife said, "Well, Jack, father is going to kill you tonight." When they went to bed, the wife made two wooden babies that would cry and put them in the bed; and they went into the pasture and got the best riding horses her father had and started for home. The devil got a pot of boiling water and threw it trough the chimney into the room on the bed. When he heard the babies cry, he went to cut their throats and he found the two wooden babies. So he went after them.

The horse's name was "Supple Jack." The girl said to Jack, "Look, look behind you and see what you see!"

Jack said, "Your father is at the horse's tail!" She said, "Take this grain of corn and throw it and it will turn a wood of trees that he can't pass." The Devil went back for his axe, and felled the wood.

She said, "Look, look behind you, Jack, and see what you see!"

He said, "Your father is at the horse's tail!"

She said, "Take this sweat and droop it behind you and it will mount to a great river he can't cross." The devil went back for his ladle and ladled the water till he drowned; he couldn't go any further!

The girl said to Jack, "As you have been away so long, don't take me with you; leave me at the lodgings and come back tomorrow for me. But you must not kiss anyone; if you kiss anyone, you will forget me and never remember me any more."

So Jack went home. His mother and sisters and everybody came to kiss him, but he refused to kiss them. He lay on the sofa sleeping and a pet dog came and kissed him, and Jack never remembered his wife any more for four years.

Then they made a great entertainment. Jack was just about to marry the next day to another woman, and he and his bride went to the entertainment. The first wife sat down at the window sad. They asked her to go with them to the entertainment. She said no, she was not going, but they forced her to go with them. As everybody was enjoying himself, they asked her to entertain them. She knocked her left side; a rooster came out. She knocked her right side; a hen came out. She knocked her stomach; a grain of corn came out. The rooster took it away from the hen.

The hen said, "Get away, you ungrateful rooster! You came into my father's yard, he gave you a task to do and you couldn't do it. He dropped his gold ring into the well and you couldn't take it out, had to mince me in pieces, and now I have lost one of my little finger joints!" She knocked again and another grain of coin came out. The rooster took it away from the hen.

The hen said, "Stop, you ungrateful rooster! You came to my father's yard, he gave you a task to shingle a house with dove feathers and you couldn't do it; I had to do it for you"

Jack said, "I remember something!"

She knocked on her stomach again and another grain of corn came out. The rooster ate it up. She said, "Get away, you ungrateful rooster you! You came to my father's yard. He gave you his bridle to go and catch his horse and you couldn't catch it and I had to show you how to do it!"

Jack said, "I just remember my fault!" Jack fell down at her feet and begged her to forgive him. He said to the company that a man had lost a key and was about to buy a new one when he found the old one just as good, and everybody told him there was now no occasion to buy the new one.

Jack said, "Well, this is my wife that I forgot for four years, and I have found her!" He put her in his buggy and drove home and left the other one in the same place. And they both lived happy forever.

DE STORY OF DE MAN AND SIX POACHED EGGS

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Smith, Pamela Coleman. "Two Negro Stories from Jamaica." Journal of American Folklore 9 (1896): 278.

Date: 1896

Original Source: Jamaica

National Origin: African American

---

The following tale is derived from an English source, “The Witty Exploits of Mr. George Buchanan the King’s Fool.” Buchanan, although he survives in folk narrative as a “fool” in the Elizabethan tradition, was tutor to James VI of Scotland and later an advisor and known as a social reformer. The presence of the tale in the African Caribbean corpus illustrates the influence of English traditions in this culture area.

---

Once a man go travelin’ an’ he get hungry, so he stop at a tavern an’ order something to eat, so dey bring him six poached eggs. He eat dem, but he did not have any money, so he say he would come back an’ pay. In six years—or maybe it was more—be comeback an’ pay sixpence for de eggs. But den de tavern keeper say dat if he had not eaten de six poached eggs dey might have been chickens, and den de chickens would have grown up and hatch more chickens, an’ dey more—an’ more—an’ more—an’ tell de man he must pay six pounds instead of sixpence. An’ de man say he would not.

So dey go to de judge. An’ while dey was conversin’ a boy come in with a bundle under his arm. An’ de judge say, “What you got in de bundle?” and de boy say, “Parch’peas,” say, “What you goin’ do with dem?”

“Plant dem, sir!”

“Hi” say de judge, “You can’t plant parch’peas, dey won’t grow!”

“Well, sir, an’ poached eggs won’t hatch!”

So dey dismiss de man and he never pay a penny!

Dis story show dat you mus’ never count you’ eggs before dey hatch!

Native Caribbean

ARAWAK

---

HARIWALI AND THE WONDERFUL TREE

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Roth, Walter E. An Inquiry into the Animism and Folk-Lore of the Guiana Indians. Thirtieth Annual Report of the Bureau of American Ethnology, 1908–1909. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1915, 120–122.

Date: ca. 1908

Original Source: Arawak

National Origin: Native American

---

The Arawaks were the first indigenous groups encountered by the Spanish in the Caribbean. They occupied the modern West Indian islands of the Bahamas, Cuba, Hispaniola (Haiti and the Dominican Republic), Jamaica, and Puerto Rico. The Taino were the dominant Arawak culture in the area at the time of first European contact. The “piai” is the holy man and healer of Arawak tradition. Many are regarded as having such an aura of the sacred as to be venerated after death. This myth in which Hariwali creates new species in his quest for revenge against an unfaithful wife and treacherous brother, and travels to the land of the spirits to retrieve his brother to alleviate their mother’s grief, illustrates the power the piais were believed to possess.

---

Hariwali was a clever, painstaking piyai, who spent most of his time in clearing the field for his two wives. These two women, their children, and his brother lived with him at his house. While felling the timber, the wives undertook, turn and turn about, to bring their husband some cassiri [cassava juice beer] daily.

It happened now that while carrying the usual refreshment one of the wives was met by the brother-in-law, who was bringing in some itiriti [a plant whose stems are used for plaiting household articles] strands to weave baskets with.

“Hullo!” he said, “where are you going?” to which he received reply, “I am taking cassiri to my husband; the field—But I like you. Do you like me?”

“No, I don’t,” he answered, “and even if I did, my brother, being a medicine-man, would find it out very soon.”

She tried him again, and tempted him sorely, and then she threw her arms round him. He was but mortal. She assured him that her husband would never find out what had happened, and both went their respective ways. Before she reached the field, however, she broke the calabash [in which the cassiri was contained]; then with a pointed stick she cut her knee, causing it to bleed. When Hariwali saw her coming slowly along with a limp carrying the broken calabash, he asked her what had happened. All she could do was to point to the scratch and blood on her lame knee, and tell him that she had had an accident, having fallen on a stump. He was a shrewd piyai, however, and knew exactly what had happened, and though he said nothing then, he determined not only upon getting rid of her, but of his other wife also; he just then, however, directed her to return home.

Next morning he bade both the women accompany him, as he intended fishing in the pond, and he merely wanted them to do the cooking and make the fire. When fire had been made, he brought them a turtle, which they put on the hot ashes without killing it, so it promptly crawled out; they pushed it on again, but with the same result. It was the omen betokening their death. The semi-chichi [sorcerer] had bewitched them and they thought they had already killed the turtle.

What they imagined was that the fire was not hot enough, and so the faithless spouse went to look for more dry wood. Now, as she was breaking up the timber she found it very hard work, and exclaimed Tata—Ketaiaba (literally, hard to break), but no sooner were the words out of her mouth, than she flew away as a hawk, the “bul-tata,” which can often be heard crying bul-tata-tata-tata.... Of course it was her husband who had done this. The other wife said she felt hot and would bathe her skin; no sooner had she ducked into the pond, than her husband turned her into a porpoise—she was the very first porpoise that ever swam in these waters.

Hariwali thus punished his wives, and now pondered over what he should do with his brother. While returning home, he met the very man with bow and arrows starting out to hunt, but neither spoke. That same afternoon the brother, who had never missed a bird before, made a bad shot every time now, the arrow invariably flying absurdly wide of its mark. This was really all Hariwali’s doing. At last the brother did manage to hit a bird, but only just hard enough to knock a few feathers off, nothing more.

“Don’t do that again,” said the bird, “and now look behind you.” And when he did so, there was a large sheet of water, and he realized that he was upon an island. But how to escape? Round and round he wandered, until he finally found a path; no ordinary path, but a Yawahu's ["spirit" in the generic sense] path leading to the Spirit's house.

Arrived at the house, the Yawahu caught him, and took all his bones out except those of his fingers; this was done only out of kindness, so that he could not escape, the Yawahu putting him into a hammock and paying him every care and attention. The bones themselves were tied up in a bundle under the roof (as bundles are kept by many other Indian tribes). The Yawahu was quite a family man, with plenty of youngsters who were always practicing with their bows and arrows; when their arrows got blunted they had only to go up to the captive's hammock and sharpen them on his bony finger tips.

All this time, Hariwali's mother would cry regularly every night over her absent son, whose whereabouts and condition she was absolutely ignorant of. So at last the pi'ai's heart became softened, and he determined on going to fetch his brother home again. It was all due to his "medicine" that his brother fell into the clutches of the Spirits. He told the old woman to pack up everything, because when he returned with his brother they and all their family would have to leave the place forever.

The night previous to their departure, he "played the shak-shak" (that is, called up his Spirit friends with the rattle), and next morning hosts of parrots were passing overhead. His children called his attention to them; so he went out and asked the birds to throw down a seed of a certain tree the bark of which he used medicinally. This they did, and though the youngsters saw the seed falling, directly it touched ground the father put his foot on it, and look as much as they could, the children could not find it. As he did not want them to know what he was doing, he told them that nothing had fallen, that they must be mistaken, and that they must run away now. Young folk are not allowed to see what the old medicine-men practice.

When left alone, Hariwali planted the identical seed just where it had fallen, and that same evening repeated the performance with the rattle; by next morning a stately tree had grown from that one seed. He told his mother to tie all the things which she had packed up, on the branches of this tree and to await his and his brother's return.

It was not long before he reached the Yawahu's place, where, the family being away, he had no difficulty in releasing the captive, untying the bones from the roof, and making good his escape. Unfortunately the Spirit returned earlier than was expected, and seeing the empty hammock and no parcel of bones, was not long in concluding what had happened. He recognized the fresh tracks, and put his dogs on the scent.

Poor Hariwali and his brother! They heard the barking of the dogs and the whistling of the Spirit, and barely had time to crawl into an armadillo hole. They just managed to get out of sight when Yawahu came up, threatening that if they did not come out, he would drive a stick into them; the fugitives laid low, and said nothing. Yawahu then shoved a stick in, but Hariwali touched it with his hand, and changed it into a bush-master snake. (This is why, even to the present day, a bush-master snake is always found in an armadillo hole.) At any rate, Yawahu on seeing the serpent thought he must have been mistaken in following the tracks and retraced his steps. Having put the bones back into his brother's skin, and waiting till the coast was clear, Hariwali led the way home.

And how glad their mother was to see them! She had everything packed away in and among the branches of the big tree, and she herself, her daughter, and the grandchildren were all prepared for a long journey. As night fell, they all, big and little, climbed up into the lower branches, finding shelter among the leaves while Hariwali made his way up to the very summit and began again the shak-shak performance.

This continued till quite into the middle of the night, when all of a sudden, the family below felt the tree shaking, and heard rumbling noises, followed by a quivering, and experienced a sensation of the trunk being rooted out of the sand, and starting to fly up into the air. Now, it was just about the moment when they were off on their proposed journey that the old woman's daughter, the pi'ai's sister, felt a bit chilly, and casting her eyes downward, remembered that she had left her apron behind in the house. All she could do was to shout out to her brother above, Dekeweyo-daiba (literally, "my apron back"), "I have forgotten my apron," and he told her to slip down quickly and fetch it. But by the time she had reached the old home, she was changed into a wicissi-duck (Anas autumnalis), which even yet can always be heard saying dekeweyo-daiba, but as it only whistles these two words, they do not sound so distinctly as if they were spoken slowly.

As to the rest of the family—well, we know that the wonderful tree flew away somewhere, but we have never heard anything more about the people who were on it.

THE TIGER CHANGED INTO A WOMAN

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Roth, Walter E. An Inquiry into the Animism and Folk-Lore of the Guiana Indians.

Thirtieth Annual Report of the Bureau of American Ethnology, 1908–1909. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1915, 202–203.

Date: ca. 1908

Original Source: Arawak

National Origin: Native American

---

Stories of tiger (tigre, jaguar) are common among both the Caribbean and South American Arawaks, Caribs, and related Native American cultures. Two beliefs are crucial to the narrative that follows. The first is the belief that animals are sentient beings possessed of spirits, as are human beings. The second is that metamorphosis from animal and human and human to animal occurs regularly.

---

There was a man justly noted for his skill in hunting bush-hog. Though his friends might be more than a match for him in hunting other game, with bush-hog he had hardly an equal, certainly no superior. He would always succeed in killing five or six, when the Tiger who invariably followed on the heels of the pack would catch only one or two.

The Tiger could not help noticing his success, and on the next occasion that our friend went into the bush changed himself into a woman, and spoke to him. She asked him how he managed to kill so many bush-hog, but all he could tell her was that he had been trained to it ever since the days of his early boyhood. She next expressed her desire to have him for a husband, but he, knowing her origin, was not too anxious to give a decided answer.

She overcame his scruples, however, by convincing him that if they lived together, they could kill ever so many more bush-hog than it was possible to do singly. And then he agreed. He lived with her for a long, long time, and she turned out to be an exceedingly good wife, for besides looking after the cooking and the barbecuing, she made an excellent huntress.

One day she asked him whether he had father or mother, and learning that his parents and other relatives were still alive, inquired whether he would not like to pay them a visit, because she felt sure that from not having seen him for so long the old people would think him dead.

And when he said, "All right! I would like to go home," she offered to show him the road and to accompany him, but only on the condition that he never told his folk from what nation she was sprung. Before they started, she said they must go hunting for a few days, so as to be able to take plenty of bush-hog with them. This they did, finally arriving at the house of his parents, who were indeed glad to welcome him after so many years.

The first question his old mother asked him was, "Where did you get that beautiful woman?" He told her that he had p. 204 found her when out hunting one day in the bush, at the same time taking care to omit all mention of the fact that she was really a Tiger. While at his old home, the couple went out hunting again and again, invariably returning with an extraordinarily large bag. This, unfortunately, proved to be their undoing.

All his friends and family became suspicious of his luck, and made up their minds to discover to what nation his beautiful wife belonged. He was often asked, but always refused to divulge the secret. His mother, however, became so worried and upset that he at last did make a clean breast of it to her, strictly warning her not to tell anyone else, as his wife might leave him altogether.

And now trouble soon came. One day the husband's people made plenty of cassiri, to get the old woman drunk, but when asked about her daughter-in-law she wouldn't tell: they gave her more drink and still she held her tongue: a last they gave her so much drink, that out came the secret and all the friends now knew that the beautiful creature whom they had so envied was after all only a Tiger.

The woman, however, who had heard her mother-in-law exposing her origin, felt so ashamed that she fled into the bush growling, and that was the last that was ever seen or heard of her. Her husband, of course, upbraided his mother roundly for betraying him but she said she really could not help herself; they had made her so drunk. And the poor husband would often go into the bush and call his wife, but there never, never came a reply.

THE BABRACOTE AND THE CAMUDI

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Roth, Walter E. An Inquiry into the Animism and Folk-Lore of the Guiana Indians. Thirtieth Annual Report of the Bureau of American Ethnology, 1908–1909. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1915, 261–262.

Date: ca. 1908

Original Source: Arawak

National Origin: Native American

---

The following legend underscores themes developed in “Haliwari and the Wonderful Tree” (page 443) and “The Tiger Changed into a Woman” (page 446). The sentient nature of the animal world is seen in the anaconda who is the mother-in-law's brother, and the tenuous nature of family relationships is dramatized by the husband's cruelty to his wife, mother-in-law, and younger brother. The issue of cannibalism is raised in the following narrative. The indigenous Caribbean peoples were accused of practicing ritual cannibalism. In fact, the Arawak name for the Caribs gave rise not only to the name of the geographic area, but also to the word “cannibal.” Note, however, that both in this narrative and in the Carib myth “How Pain, Misery, and Death Came into the World” (page 453), cannibalism is cast in an unfavorable light as an antisocial practice. The motif of the enduring physical signs of a tragic event (the images of the barbacote and the swollen anaconda) is common cross-culturally.

---

There was a man living with his wife and mother-in-law in the same house: the wife's father had been dead a long time. The man was always going out hunting, but, although he started early, and returned late, luck never seemed to attend his efforts.

This made the mother-in-law very angry, and one day she said to him, “You are a worthless son-in-law. Day after day, you go out hunting, and you bring back nothing. Day after day, you go out fishing, and bring back nothing.” The man made no reply to all this, but just laid himself quietly down in his hammock where he remained until next morning.

Next morning he called his wife and told her to pack the hammocks with sufficient cassava for two or three days, as he intended taking her out hunting with him. After they had traveled a long way, he killed her, cut her into pieces, and dried the flesh on a babracote [drying or cooking rack].

Next day he returned home with his victim’s liver, and handing it to his mother-in-law said, “Here’s the liver of a tapir for you. The wife is laden with the flesh and is slowly coming on behind.” The old woman, who was so hungry, spared no time in eating it, and when finished got into her hammock quite satisfied, anxiously looking down the pathway for her daughter. After watching for some hours in vain, she began to think that the alleged tapir’s liver must really have been her daughter’s. Turning to her son-in-law, she charged him with having killed her daughter, because it was then very late and still she had not returned.

He denied it and swore that she would soon be coming, but the woman would not believe him. She continued watching until late in the night, and then she knew that the liver she had eaten was indeed her own daughter’s. Of course she slept but little, and early next morning crept quietly out of the house, and made her way to her brother, the large camudi [anaconda], that lived at the head of the neighboring creek. She told him how her son-in-law had killed her child, and given her the liver to eat. She told him also that she would send the culprit along that very creek, and that as soon as he got within reach he was to catch and swallow him.

When she reached home again the old woman said nothing, but next day told her son-in-law that she was feeling very hungry, that he must go out hunting, and that if he went up to the head of the creek, he would find plenty of game to shoot. The son-in-law suspected something, so he went to a younger brother of his and told him to put in a day’s hunting at the head of that very same creek, while he took good care to take his bow and arrows in exactly the opposite direction.

That same evening, instead of returning to his own place, he came back to his younger brother’s house. No brother returned that night, nor the next day. Indeed, he never came back, because he had been killed and swallowed by the camudi, who had mistaken his man. The son-in-law, after waiting there a few days, then knew what had happened, and made his way to another settlement, far, far from the nagging old woman. On a clear night you can still see the babracote where he barbecued his wife, and close to its side you can just make out the camudi with its swollen belly, due to the younger brother being inside.

HOW WE BEAT THE CARIBS

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Roth, Walter E. An Inquiry into the Animism and Folk-Lore of the Guiana Indians. Thirtieth Annual Report of the Bureau of American Ethnology, 1908–1909. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1915, 382–384.

Date: ca. 1908

Original Source: Arawak

National Origin: Native American

---

The following legend purports to explain the enmity between the Arawaks and the Caribs. Outside evidence suggests that the conflict began not on the South American mainland as this narrative suggests, but on the Caribbean Islands that they struggled to control. Both established island and mainland territories and remained in conflict over them. The motif of the treacherous husband appears again as a motivation for the ancient conflict among the two groups. An element of historical truth may lie at the heart of this legend: Caribs were alleged to be notorious for raids on the Arawaks with the intent of stealing Arawak women.

---

An Arawak and a Carib were very friendly: this must needs be so, because each had taken the other's sister to wife. They regularly used to go hunting together. After living in harmony for a long time, they went out hunting, but on this occasion they did not go in company, and they both stayed away longer than usual, and their friends were beginning to wonder what had happened to them.

The Arawak, having finally returned, went to see after his brother-in-law, followed his tracks into the bush, and came on the babracote upon which he found the dried body of his sister whom her husband had evidently killed. He went home, but did not speak for some time.

He then told his wife, the Carib's sister, to come into the bush and hunt with him: when he got her away, he killed and babracoted her. The Carib next came along to see what had happened, and he soon saw. He also went home again, but did not speak for some time.

Finally, he expressed a wish to fight and kill the Arawak, but the Nafudi [village headman] said, "No. All the Caribs together must fight the Arawaks together." So both sides cut a big field and planted plenty of the particular canes required for making arrows, and when these canes were full grown, they cut them down and completed their weapons, and both sides erected a strong house, Waiba, to store them in. Up at Jack Low, on the left bank of the Pomeroun, is still to be recognized the site of the old settlement and fortress, the place itself even to this day being known as Waiba-diki. Furthermore, it was arranged by both parties that as they intended fighting their battle at sea, and not on land, they would allow themselves time to build a large number of canoes.

This being done, they filled their boats with arrows: twenty canoes were paddled by Arawaks, and forty by Caribs. They all went down the river, out to sea, at the Pomeroon mouth, each taking up such position as would permit of the intervening distance being just sufficient to allow of the arrows thrown from one side reaching the other.

The Arawaks, however, were shrewd. They made themselves cork-wood shields. The Caribs let fly their arrows first, but these stuck in the shields, then the Arawaks broke them off with their mossi, the now almost obsolete club. None of the Arawaks were slain, and it was now their turn to shoot.

This they did, with the result that they killed all their enemy, except two, whom they purposely spared in order that they might go home and tell their friends what had happened, and what to expect should they ever dare to fight the Arawaks again. The two who had been spared went away to the Cuyuni, to the Barima, and to the Waini, and remained three months gathering together all their people, who clamored that they would never rest until they had destroyed all the Arawaks.

The Arawaks were waiting for them at Waiba-diki, their stronghold, and stretched a vine-rope across the river; and as the hosts of Caribs approached up the stream, the steering paddles of their canoes became entangled in this rope, and broke away; and while the occupants were looking after them, their canoes all tossed one against the other in dire confusion, and the Arawaks shot showers of arrows into the wavering multitude.

Half the Caribs were destroyed; the other half effected a landing. But around their fortress, the Arawaks had already built a palisade, with just a few chinks in it to permit of arrows flying through; they were all well under cover, and though losing a few of their own people, massacred as before all their enemy, leaving but two to give the news to their friends.

These two went to the east, to Surinam, and started collecting the remnants of their own tribe from those parts. About three months passed. The Arawaks could wait no longer, so they traveled over to Surinam, and came upon the Carib forces, collected in a fortress with enclosing palisade, similar to what they themselves had constructed for their own preservation at Waiba-diki. The Caribs were in overwhelming numbers. So the Arawaks hid themselves, and sent in one of their number to reconnoiter. This man, who could talk Carib, painted himself like one of that nation, and boldly entered the enemy's camp, where he found them all drinking. He said he was a Carib, and that he had just come from the Pomeroon looking for his family; he accepted a little drink and then took his departure, but not before discovering that very early on the following morning, long before daybreak, a crab whistle (that is, made from a crab claw) would be blown as a signal for them to prepare for battle. The scout returned to his people, with all the information that he had gleaned.

That night, every one of the Arawaks made a crab whistle, and surrounding the Caribs while they were still drinking, blew their whistles, surprising the enemy, and slew them all, save one man and woman, who begged so earnestly for their lives that only their legs were speared. It is from this couple that all the present day Caribs are derived, and this is why there are comparatively so few of them. It was we Arawaks who broke their power.

CARIB

---

HOW PAIN, MISERY, AND DEATH CAME INTO THE WORLD

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Roth, Walter E. An Inquiry into the Animism and Folk-Lore of the Guiana Indians. Thirtieth Annual Report of the Bureau of American Ethnology, 1908–1909. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1915, 179–180.

Date: ca. 1908

Original Source: Carib

National Origin: Native American

---

The Caribs' traditional home lay in the southern region of the West Indies called the Lesser Antilles and along the northern coast of South America. Most commentators believe that, prior to European contact, the Caribs migrated to the islands from the mainland of South America. The Yurokons are spirits of the forest. As illustrated in the following myth, they are believed to be shape-shifters and to have an aversion to sweet potatoes. In this narrative, a Yurokon is the agent by which death and misery is brought into human life, but the responsibility for the "fall from grace" is laid at the feet of a Carib.

---

In the olden times, there was no contention, all were happy, and no one became sick or died. It was then that the Yurokons used to come and live among us as our friends and associates; they were short people like ourselves. One Yurokon in particular used to come and drink paiwarri [A blackish fermented drink made from cassava used on occasions of feasting and sport] with my people, whom he would visit for the purpose regularly once a month.

The last time he came, he appeared as a woman with a baby at the breast. The Caribs gave her of the pepper-pot [meat stew], into which she dipped the cassava, which she then sucked and ate. The pepper-pot was so hot, however, that it burned the inside of her mouth and “heart,” and this made her ask for water, but her hostess told her that she had none. Yurokon therefore asked for a calabash, and leaving her baby up at the house, she went down to the waterside, where she quenched her thirst.

On her return, she looked for her little child, but it was nowhere to be seen: she searched high and low, but all in vain, because during her absence some worthless woman among the company had thrown it into the boiling cassiri pot.

By and by Yurokon went to stir the cassiri with the usual paddle-spoon, and, while she stirred, the body of her baby rose to the surface. She wept, and then, turning on the people, upbraided them, “Why have you punished me in this way? I have never had a bad mind against any of you, but now I will make you pay me. In future your children shall all die, and this will make you weep as I am weeping. And when children are born to you, you shall suffer pain and trouble at their birth. Furthermore, with regard to you men,” continued Yurokon, as she addressed the male members of the company, “I will give you great trouble when you go out to catch fish.”

And so she did, because in those days we Caribs only had to go to the waterside, bail the water out with our calabashes, and picking up the fish that were left exposed at the bottom of the stream, just put the water back again to breed fish once more. Yurokon altered all this, and made us go to the trouble, annoyance, and inconvenience of poisoning the pools with various roots. What is more, Yurokon killed the worthless Indian who had thrown her boy into the cassiri, and then asked her children what had become of their mother.

“She has gone to the field,” they said.

“No, she has not; she is hunting after genitalia,” was the insulting rejoinder, a reply which she purposely gave in order to provoke them into a rage.

She asked them the same question a second time, and they told her she had gone to bake cassava.

“No, she has not,” replied Yurokon; “she has bored her way into my ear,” an answer supposed to be even more offensive. And she asked them the same question a third time, but on this occasion they told her that she had gone to dig sweet potatoes. As soon as they mentioned the word “potatoes,” Yurokon disappeared.

HOW THE MAN FOOLED THE TIGER

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Roth, Walter E. An Inquiry into the Animism and Folk-Lore of the Guiana Indians.

Thirtieth Annual Report of the Bureau of American Ethnology, 1908–1909. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1915, 218–219.

Date: ca. 1908

Original Source: Carib

National Origin: Native American

---

Resembling “Ogre Carries Sham Dead Man” (AT 1139), the drunken trickster is able to defeat a much fiercer and stronger adversary—tiger (jaguar). As is common in this folktale tradition, the animal is given human attributes.

---

An Indian went to a somewhat distant settlement to drink paiwarri, and on arriving there in the early afternoon, commenced imbibing. By midnight, the drinks being finished, he started on the return journey, although the house-master warned him not to leave then but to wait for day-break, because an immense Tiger [jaguar] was known to be prowling about.

Our friend would not be persuaded, however, to postpone his departure, but only said, “Oh, never mind. I am not afraid, and if I meet him I will kill him!” So saying, he hung his poto [stone-club] over his arm, and went out into the darkness. Being more or less drunk, he staggered along, and soon fell dead asleep on the road just about the very spot where the Tiger, of which he had been warned, used to cross.

Tiger found him lying there motionless in the early morning, felt and sniffed him all over to see whether he was dead or alive, and finally sat down on him. This sobered the Indian, and Tiger, seeing that he was alive, started pulling down the bushes so as to clear a pathway along which he could drag the body to his lair. Having thus cleared a few yards, the animal returned and slung the man over his back so that the head and arms hung over one flank and the legs over the other.

This gave the man his opportunity, for as the animal carried him along he caught hold of the bushes with his teeth and hands and so impeded Tiger’s progress. The Tiger thought that the pathway which he had cleared was still too narrow, and accordingly replaced the burden on the ground and pulled down more bushes. The Indian thus fooled his captor some three or four times and, having now collected his wits, watched for the tiger to sling him once more on his back.

No sooner had Tiger done so, than he struck the animal’s head just above the ear with his stone-tipped club, and thus killed him. Making sure that Tiger was quite dead, he returned to the place where he had been drinking the night before, and told the house-master what had happened. The latter would not believe that any drunken Indian could have killed so big a tiger, but when he went and saw with his own eyes, he had to admit that his late guest had spoken truly.

THE SUN, THE FROG, AND THE FIRESTICKS

Tradition Bearer: Unavailable

Source: Roth, Walter E. An Inquiry into the Animism and Folk-Lore of the Guiana Indians. Thirtieth Annual Report of the Bureau of American Ethnology, 1908–1909. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1915, 133–135.

Date: ca. 1908

Original Source: Carib

National Origin: Native American

---

Makunaima, was one of the twin children of the sun, and as such, he appears in the myths of many of the native cultures of the Caribbean and the northern coast of South America. The motif of twin boys delivered after the murder of their mother by a fearsome creature is seen elsewhere in Native American narrative (see, for example, the Wichita myth “The Two Boys Who Slew the Monsters and Became Stars,” page 148).

---

A long time ago; there was a woman who had become pregnant by the Sun, with twin children, Pia and Makunaima. One day the as-yet-unborn Pia said to his mother, “Let us go and see our father. We will show you the way, and as you travel along pick for us any pretty flowers that you may come across.”

She accordingly went westward to meet her husband, and plucking flowers here and there on the pathway, accidentally stumbled, fell down, and hurt herself; she blamed her two unborn children as the cause. They became vexed at this, and when she next asked them which road she was to follow, they refused to tell her, and thus it was that she took the wrong direction, and finally arrived, foot-sore and weary, at a curious house.

This belonged to Tiger’s mother, Kono(bo)-aru, the Rain-frog, and when the exhausted traveler discovered where she was, she told the old woman she was very sorry she had come, because she had often heard how cruel her son was. But the house-mistress took pity on her, and telling her not to be afraid, hid her in the big cassiri jar, and popped on the cover.

When Tiger got home that night, he sniffed up and down, and said, “Mother, I can smell somebody! Whom have you here?” And though she denied having anybody on the premises, Tiger was not satisfied, but had a good look round on his own account, and peeping into the cassiri jar, discovered the frightened creature.

On killing the poor woman, Tiger found the two as-yet-unborn children, and showed them to his mother, who said that he must now mind and cherish them. So he put them in a bundle of cotton to keep them warm, and noticed next morning that they had already begun to creep. The next day, they had grown much bigger, and with this daily increase in about a month's time they had reached man's size. Tiger's mother told them that they were now fit to use the bow and arrow, with which they must go and shoot the Powis (Crax) because it was this bird which had killed their own mother.

Pia and Makunaima therefore went next day and shot Powis, and these birds they continued shooting day after day. When they were about to let fly the arrow at the last bird, the Powis told them that it was none of his tribe who had killed their mother, but Tiger himself, giving them both full particulars as to how he had encompassed her death.

The two boys were very angry on hearing this, spared the bird, and coming home empty-handed, informed the old woman that the Powis had taken their arrows away from them. Of course this was not true, but only an excuse; they had themselves hidden their arrows in the bush, and wanted the chance of making new and stronger weapons. These completed, they built a staging up against a tree, and when Tiger passed below, they shot and killed him. And when they reached home, they slaughtered his mother also.

The two lads now proceeded on their way and arrived at last at a clump of cotton trees in the center of which was a house occupied by a very old woman, really a frog, and with her they took up their quarters. They went out hunting each day, and on their return invariably found some cassava that their hostess had baked.

"That's very strange," remarked Pia to his brother, "there is no field anywhere about, and yet look at the quantity of cassava which the old woman gives us. We must watch her."

So next morning, instead of going into the forest to hunt, they went only a little distance away, and hid themselves behind a tree whence they could see everything that took place at the house. They noticed that the old frog had a white spot on her shoulders: they saw her bend down and pick at this spot, and observed the cassava-starch fall. On their return home they refused to eat the usual cake, having now discovered its source.

Next morning they picked a quantity of cotton from the neighboring trees, and teased it out on the floor. When the old woman asked what they were doing, they told her that they were making something nice and soft for her to lie upon. Much pleased at this, she promptly sat upon it, but no sooner had she done so than the two lads set fire to it; thereupon her skin was scorched so dreadfully as to give it the wrinkled and rough appearance which it now bears.

Pia and Makunaima next continued their travels to meet their father, and soon arrived at the house of a Maipuri (tapir), where they spent three days. On the third evening Maipuri returned, looking very sleek and fat. Wanting to know what she had been feeding on, the boys followed her tracks, which they traced to a plum tree; this they shook and shook so violently as to make all the fruit, both ripe and unripe, fall to the ground, where it remained scattered.

When Maipuri next morning went to feed, she was disgusted to see all her food thus wasted, and in a very angry mood quickly returned home, beat both boys, and cleared out into the bush. The boys started in pursuit, tracked her for many a long day, and at last caught up with her. Pia now told Makunaima to wheel round in front and drive the creature back to him, and as she passed, let fly a harpoon-arrow into her; the rope, however, got in the way of Makunaima as he was passing in front, and cut his leg off. On a clear night you can still see them up among the clouds: there is Maipuri (Hyades), there Makunaima (Pleia-des), and below is his severed leg (Orion's Belt).

Glossary

---

- anecdote: Originally, a short, humorous tale. Now, the term commonly refers to single-episode narratives, regarded as true and commonly concentrating on an individual.
- animal tales: Narratives told as conscious fictions in which the characters, though they speak and behave like human beings, are animals. These animal characters are commonly stock types. For example, in many Native American traditions, coyote is regarded as an exploitive, impulsive manipulator. In African American tales, rabbit is type cast in the same role. The tales are most often moralistic (“don’t be greedy”) or etiological (why the frog has no tail) in intent.
- belief tales: Legends or personal experience narratives that are told with the purpose of validating a particular folk belief.
- cautionary tales: Narratives whose plots embody a message cautioning against the consequences of particular kinds of behavior.
- culture hero: Character in myth who finishes the work that brings technology (usually symbolized as fire), laws, religion, and other elements of culture to humans. Culture heroes may take over the business of creating order out of chaos where a Supreme Creator left off. The culture hero serves as a secondary creator or transformer of the universe. He/she transforms the universe by means of his gifts into a universe in which humans can live. In some myths, the culture hero cleanses the universe of things that threaten human existence: monsters, cannibals, or meteorological phenomena.
- cumulative tale: A tale that begins with an incident, action, or phrase and adds a succession of elements to create a lengthy chain of events.
- cycle: A group of tales that focuses on a central character, plot, or theme.
- fable: Fictional narrative ending with a didactic message that is often couched in the form of a “moral” or proverb.
- fairy tale: See ordinary folktale.
- family saga: Chronologically and often thematically linked collection of legends constituting the folk history of a particular family, usually over several generations. The term was coined by folklorist Mody C. Boatright.
- folk history: Accounts based on perceptions of historical events rather than on written documentation or similar media.

- formula/formulaic element: Conventional elements that recur in folk narrative. For example, clichés, structural patterns, stock characters, or situations.
- framing: The act of setting apart a traditional performance from other types of activity by words, occasions of performance or other distinguishing features.
- genre: Type, category.
- legend: Narrative told as truth, set in the historical past, and that does not depart from the present reality of the members of the group.
- local legend: Legends derived from and closely associated with specific places and events believed to have occurred in those locales.
- märchen: See ordinary folktale.
- motif: Small element of traditional narrative content, such as an event, object, concept, or pattern.
- myth: Narratives that explain the will (the intent) and the workings (the orderly principles) of a group's major supernatural figures. Myth is set in a world that predates the present reality.
- natural context: Setting, in all its elements, in which a performance would ordinarily take place.
- novelle: Romantic tale.
- numskull: Character who behaves in an absurdly ignorant fashion, also called "noodle."
- ordinary folktale: Highly formulaic and structured fictional narrative that is popularly referred to as "fairytale" and designated by folklorists as märchen or "wonder tale." Term coined by folklorist Stith Thompson.
- personal experience narrative: Narrative intended as truth performed in the first person by the individual to whom the described events happened.
- personal legend: Narrative intended as truth told about a specific (usually well-known) individual.
- resource person: The bearer of a particular tradition, such as the performer of a folktale.
- stock character: Recurrent narrative character who invariably plays a stereotyped role such as trickster or fool.
- tale type: Standard, recurrent folk narrative plot.
- tall tale: Fictional narrative often told as a firsthand experience, which gradually introduces hyperbole until the audience realizes by the conclusion that the tale is a lie.
- trickster: Character who defies the limits of propriety and often gender and species. Trickster lives on the margins of his world by his wits and is often regarded as possessing supernatural power. Often a mythic figure such as a coyote or hare will function as both culture hero and trickster.
- validating device: Any element occurring within a traditional narrative that is intended to convince listeners that the tale is true.
- variant: Version of a standard tale type.

Bibliography to Volume 4

---

- Aarne, Antti, and Stith Thompson. The Types of the Folktale: A Classification and Bibliography. 2nd revised edition. Folklore Fellows Communications, no. 184.
- Abrahams, Roger D., ed. African American Folktales: Stories from Black Traditions in the New World. New York: Pantheon, 1985.
- Abrahams, Roger D., ed. The Man-of-Words in the West Indies. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1983.
- Angermiller, Florence. Interview of Jack Robert Grigsby. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers' Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC. <http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/wpaintro/wpahome.html> (October 12, 2005).
- Backus, Emma M. "Animal Tales from North Carolina." Journal of American Folklore 11 (1898): 284–292.
- Backus, Emma M. "Folk-Tales from Georgia." Journal of American Folklore 13 (1900): 19–32.
- Backus, Emma M. "Tales of the Rabbit from Georgia Negroes." Journal of American Folklore 12 (1899): 108–115.
- Backus, Emma M., and Ethel Hatton Leitner. "Negro Tales from Georgia." Journal of American Folklore 25 (1912): 125–136.
- Bacon, A. M., and E. C. Parsons. "Folk-Lore from Elizabeth City County, Virginia." Journal of American Folklore 35 (1922): 250–327.
- Bandelier, Adolph F. "Aboriginal Myths and Traditions Concerning the Island of Titicaca, Bolivia." American Anthropologist 6 (1904): 197–239.
- Bates, William C. "Creole Folk-Lore from Jamaica II: Nancy Stories." Journal of American Folklore 9 (1896): 121–128.
- Baughman, Ernest W. Type- and Motif-Index of the Folk Tales of England and North America. The Hague: Mouton, 1966.
- Beauchamp, W. M. "Onondaga Tales." Journal of American Folklore 6 (1893): 173–189.
- Beckwith, Martha Warren. Jamaica Anansi Stories. Memoirs of the American Folklore Society, no. 17. New York: American Folklore Society, 1924.
- "Beliefs of Southern Negroes Concerning Hags." Journal of American Folklore 7 (1894): 66–67.

Bibliography to Volume 4

- Bell, Robert. "The History of the Che-che-puy-ew-tis. A Legend of the Northern Crees." Journal of American Folklore 10 (1897): 2–8.
- Blake, Mary. "The Elves of Old Mexico." Journal of American Folklore 27 (1914): 237–239.
- Boas, Franz. "Notes on Mexican Folklore." Journal of American Folklore 25 (1912): 204–260.
- Boas, Franz. "Notes on the Eskimo of Port Clarence, Alaska." Journal of American Folklore 7 (1894): 205–208.
- Borba, Telemaco M. "Caingang Deluge Legend." Journal of American Folklore 18 (1905): 223–225.
- Bourke, John G. "Notes on Apache Mythology." Journal of American Folklore 3 (1890): 209–212.
- Bourke, John G. "Popular Medicines, Customs and Superstitions of the Rio Grande." Journal of American Folklore 7 (1894): 119–146.
- Bowman, Earl. Interview of Harry Reece. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers' Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC. <http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/wpaintro/wpahome.html> (October 12, 2005).
- Burrows, Elizabeth. "Eskimo Tales." Journal of American Folklore 39 (1926): 79–80.
- Chase, Richard. "Jack and the Fire Dragaman." Southern Folklore Quarterly 5 (1941): 151–155.
- Chase, Richard. "Jack's Hunting Trip." Southern Folklore Quarterly 2 (1938): 145–148.
- Chase, Richard. "The Lion and the Unicorn." Southern Folklore Quarterly 1 (1937): 15–19.
- Chase, Richard, and Kathryn Chase. "Lucky Jack." Southern Folklore Quarterly 3 (1939): 21–24.
- Claudell, Calvin. "Louisiana Tales of Jean Sot and Boqui and Lapin." Southern Folklore Quarterly 8 (1944): 287–299.
- Colum, Padraic. Orpheus: Myths of the World. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1930.
- Cooke, Elizabeth Johnston. "English Folk-Tales in America. The Bride of the Evil One." Journal of American Folklore 12 (1899): 126–130.
- Cross, Tom Peete. "Folk-Lore from the Southern States." Journal of American Folklore 22 (1909): 251–255.
- Deans, James. "The Doom of the Katt-a-quins: From the Aboriginal Folk-lore of Southern Alaska." Journal of American Folklore 5 (1892): 232–235.
- Deans, James. "Legend of the Fin-Back Whale Crest of the Haidas, Queen Charlotte's Island, B.C." Journal of American Folklore 5 (1892): 44–46.
- de Fábrega, H. Pittier. "Folklore of the Bribri and Brunka Indians in Costa Rica." Journal of American Folklore 16 (1903): 1–9.
- Dixon, Roland B. Oceanic Mythology. Boston: Marshall Jones, 1916.
- Dorsey, George A. "Legend of the Teton Sioux Medicine Pipe." Journal of American Folklore 19 (1906): 326–329.
- Dorsey, George A. The Mythology of the Wichita. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1995.
- Dorsey, George A. "The Two Boys Who Slew the Monsters and Became Stars." Journal of American Folklore 17 (1904): 153–160.

- Edwards, Charles L. Bahama Songs and Stories. Memoirs of the American Folklore Society, no. 3. New York: American Folklore Society, 1985.
- Edwards, Charles L. "Some Tales from Bahama Folk-Lore." Journal of American Folklore 4 (1891): 47–54.
- Edwards, Charles L. "Some Tales from Bahama Folk-Lore: Fairy Stories." Journal of American Folklore 4 (1891): 247–252.
- Espinosa, Aurelio M. "New Mexican Spanish Folklore." Journal of American Folklore 223 (1910): 397–398.
- Fauset, Arthur Huff. "Negro Folk Tales from the South. (Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana)." Journal of American Folklore 40 (1927): 213–303.
- Fewkes, J. Walter. "The Destruction of the Tusayan Monsters." Journal of American Folklore 8 (1895): 132–137.
- Fornander, Abraham. Fornander Collection of Hawaiian Antiquities and Folklore. 3 Vols. Honolulu: Bernice Pauahi Bishop Museum, 1916/17–1919/20.
- Fortier, Alcee. "Louisianan Nursery-Tales." Journal of American Folklore 1 (1888): 140–145.
- Gardner, Emelyn E. "Folk-Lore from Schoharie County New York." Journal of American Folklore 27 (1914): 304–325.
- Golder, F. A. "Aleutian Stories." Journal of American Folklore 18 (1905): 215–220.
- Golder, F. A. "Tlingit Myths." Journal of American Folklore 20 (1907): 290–294.
- Hartman, C. V. "The Mythology of the Aztecs of El Salvador." Journal of American Folklore 20 (1907): 143–147.
- Hartman, C. V. "The Story of the Calabash-Tree in the Popol Vuh." Journal of American Folklore 20 (1907): 148–150.
- Henning, D. C. "Tales of the Blue Mountains in Pennsylvania." Miners' Journal. Pottsdam, PA, March 26, 1897.
- Hoffman, W. J. "An Absaroka Myth." The Journal of the Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 10 (1881): 239–240.
- Hoffman, W. J. "Folklore of the Pennsylvania Germans III." Journal of American Folklore 2 (1889): 191–202.
- Hubert, Levi C. Interview of Mary Thomas. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers' Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC. <http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/wpaintro/wpahome.html> (October 12, 2005).
- Interview of E. V. Batchler*. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers' Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC. <http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/wpaintro/wpahome.html> (October 12, 2005).
- Jenks, Albert Ernest. "The Bear Maiden: An Ojibwa Folk-Tale from Lac Courte Oreille Reservation, Wisconsin." Journal of American Folklore 15 (1902): 33–35.
- Johnson, John H. "Folk-Lore from Antigua, British West Indies." Journal of American Folklore 34 (1921): 40–88.
- Johnston, Mrs. William Preston. "Two Negro Folktales." Journal of American Folklore 9 (1896): 194–198.
- Kawaharada, Dennis. Ancient Oahu: Stories from Fornander & Thrum. Honolulu: Kalamakū Press, 2001.

Bibliography to Volume 4

- Kroeber, A. L. "Cheyenne Tales." Journal of American Folklore 13 (1900): 161–190.
- Kroeber, A. L. Handbook of the Indians of California. Bureau of American Ethnology, Bulletin 78. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1925
- Kroeber, A. L. "Tales of the Smith Sound Eskimo." Journal of American Folklore 12 (1899): 169–170.
- Lummis, Charles. Pueblo Indian Folk-Stories. New York: Century, 1910.
- Markham, Sir Clements. The Incas of Peru. London: Smith Elder & Co., 1910.
- Mason, J. Alden. "Four Mexican-Spanish Fairy-Tales from Azqueltan, Jalisco." Journal of American Folklore 25 (1912): 191–198.
- Matthews, Washington. Navajo Legends. Memoirs of the American Folklore Society, no. 5. New York: American Folklore Society, 1897.
- Matthews, Washington. "Noqoilpi, the Gambler: A Navajo Myth." Journal of American Folklore 2 (1889): 89–94.
- Mooney, James. James Mooney's History, Myths, and Sacred Formulas of the Cherokees. Asheville, NC: Historical Images, 1992.
- Mooney, James. Myths of the Cherokee. Nineteenth Annual Report of the Bureau of American Ethnology, 1897–1898, Part I. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1900.
- Mooney, James. "Myths of the Cherokees." Journal of American Folklore 1 (1888): 97–108.
- Mooney, James. The Sacred Formulas of the Cherokees. Seventh Annual Report of the Bureau of American Ethnology. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1891.
- Moore, T. H. "The Good Serpent. A Chilian Fairy Tale in Spanish, el Culebroncito, Literally Big Snake." Journal of American Folklore 1 (1883): 221–226.
- Newell, William Wells. "The Ghost Legends of the Blue Mountains in Pennsylvania." Journal of American Folklore 11 (1898): 76–78.
- Newell, William Wells. "The Ignus Fatuus, Its Character and Legendary Origin." Journal of American Folklore 17 (1904): 39–60.
- Nicholas, Francis C. "The Aborigines of the Province of Santa Marta, Colombia." American Anthropologist 3 (1901): 641–644.
- Parsons, Elsie Clews. Folk-Lore of the Sea Islands, South Carolina. Memoirs of the American Folklore Society, no. 16. New York: American Folklore Society, 1923.
- Parsons, Elsie Clews. "Tales from Maryland and Pennsylvania." Journal of American Folklore 30 (1917): 209–217.
- Parsons, Elsie Clews. Tewa Tales. Memoirs of the American Folklore Society, no. 19. New York: American Folklore Society, 1926.
- Penard, A. P., and T. E. Penard. "Surinam Folk-Tales." Journal of American Folklore 30 (1917): 239–250.
- Porter, J. Hampden. "Notes on the Folk-Lore of the Mountain Whites of the Alleghanies." Journal of American Folklore 7 (1894): 105–117.
- Radin, Paul, and A. B. Reagan. "Ojibwa Myths and Tales: The Manabozho Cycle." Journal of American Folklore 41 (1928 ): 71–76.
- Ray, Marie. "Jean Sotte Stories." Journal of American Folklore 21 (1908): 364–365.
- Rink, H., and Franz Boas. "Eskimo Tales and Songs." Journal of American Folklore 2 (1889): 125.

- Roth, Walter E. An Inquiry into the Animism and Folk-Lore of the Guiana Indians. Thirtieth Annual Report of the Bureau of American Ethnology, 1908–1909. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1915, 103–386.
- Russell, Frank. “Myths of the Jicarilla Apaches.” Journal of American Folklore 11 (1898): 253–271.
- Smith, Janet. Interview of Elfego Baca. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers’ Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC. <http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/wpaintro/wpahome.html> (October 12, 2005).
- Smith, Pamela Coleman. “Two Negro Stories from Jamaica.” Journal of American Folklore 9 (1896): 278.
- Spence, Lewis. The Myths of Mexico and Peru. London: G. G. Harrap and Company, 1913. Internet Sacred Text Archive <http://www.sacred-texts.com/nam/mmp/mmp1.htm> (April 10, 2007).
- Spence, Lewis. The Popol Vuh: The Mythic and Heroic Sagas of the Kichés of Central America. London: David Nutt, 1908.
- Steiner, Roland. “Braziel Robinson Possessed of Two Spirits.” Journal of American Folklore 13 (1900): 226–228.
- Steiner, Roland. “Sol Lockheart’s Call.” Journal of American Folklore 48 (1900): 67–70.
- Stirling, Matthew W. Origin Myth of Acoma and Other Records. Smithsonian Institution, Bureau of American Ethnology, Bulletin 135. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1942.
- Swanton, John R. Myths and Tales of the Southeastern Indians. Smithsonian Institution, Bureau of American Ethnology, Bulletin 88. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1929.
- Tejada, Simeon. Interview of Manuel Jesus Vasques. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers’ Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC. <http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/wpaintro/wpahome.html> (October 12, 2005).
- Thompson, Stith. The Motif Index of Folk Literature. Revised edition. 6 Vols. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1955–1958.
- Totty, Francis. Interview of Maurice Coates. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers’ Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC. <http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/wpaintro/wpahome.html> (October 12, 2005).
- Trowbridge, Ada Wilson. “Negro Customs and Folk-Stories of Jamaica.” Journal of American Folklore 9 (1896): 279–287.
- Wiltse, Henry M. “In the Southern Field of Folk-Lore.” Journal of American Folklore 13 (1900): 209–212.
- Wissler, Clark. “Some Dakota Myths I.” Journal of American Folklore 20 (1907): 121–131.
- Wissler, Clark. “Some Dakota Myths II.” Journal of American Folklore 20 (1907): 195–206.
- “Witchcraft in New Mexico.” Journal of American Folklore 1 (1888): 167–168.
- Wrenshall, Letitia Humphreys. “Incantations and Popular Healing in Maryland and Pennsylvania.” Journal of American Folklore 15 (1902): 268–274.

General Bibliography

---

- Aarne, Antti, and Stith Thompson. The Types of the Folktale: A Classification and Bibliography. 2nd revised edition. Folklore Fellows Communications, no. 184.
- Abercromby, John. "Samoan Tales I." Folklore 3 (1891): 455–467.
- Abercromby, John. "Samoan Tales II." Folklore 3 (1892): 158–165.
- Abrahams, Roger D., ed. African American Folktales: Stories from Black Traditions in the New World. New York: Pantheon, 1985.
- Abrahams, Roger D., ed. The Man-of-Words in the West Indies. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1983.
- Angermiller, Florence. Interview of Jack Robert Grigsby. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers' Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC. <http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/wpaintro/wpahome.html> (October 12, 2005).
- Backus, Emma M. "Animal Tales from North Carolina." Journal of American Folklore 11 (1898): 284–292.
- Backus, Emma M. "Folk-Tales from Georgia." Journal of American Folklore 13 (1900): 19–32.
- Backus, Emma M. "Tales of the Rabbit from Georgia Negroes." Journal of American Folklore 12 (1899): 108–115.
- Backus, Emma M., and Ethel Hatton Leitner. "Negro Tales from Georgia." Journal of American Folklore 25 (1912): 125–136.
- Bacon, A. M., and E. C. Parsons. "Folk-Lore from Elizabeth City County, Virginia." Journal of American Folklore 35 (1922): 250–327.
- Bandelier, Adolph F. "Aboriginal Myths and Traditions Concerning the Island of Titicaca, Bolivia." American Anthropologist 6 (1904): 197–239.
- Barker, W. H. "Nyankopone and Ananse in Gold Coast Folklore." Folklore 30 (1919): 158–164.
- Bates, William C. "Creole Folk-Lore from Jamaica II: Nancy Stories." Journal of American Folklore 9 (1896): 121–128.
- Baughman, Ernest W. Type- and Motif-Index of the Folk Tales of England and North America. The Hague: Mouton, 1966.
- Bayliss, Clara Kern. "Philippine Folktales." Journal of American Folklore 21 (1908): 46–53.

General Bibliography

- Beauchamp, W. M. "Onondaga Tales." Journal of American Folklore 6 (1893): 173–189.
- Beckwith, Martha Warren. Jamaica Anansi Stories. Memoirs of the American Folklore Society, no. 17. New York: American Folklore Society, 1924.
- "Beliefs of Southern Negroes Concerning Hags." Journal of American Folklore 7 (1894): 66–67.
- Bell, William C. "Umbundu Tales, Angola, Southwest Africa." Journal of American Folklore 35 (1922): 116–150.
- Benedict, Laura Watson. "Bagobo Myths." Journal of American Folklore 26 (1913): 13–63.
- Bergen, Fanny D. "Borrowing Trouble." Journal of American Folklore 11 (1898): 55–59.
- Blake, Mary. "The Elves of Old Mexico." Journal of American Folklore 27 (1914): 237–239.
- Bleek, W. H. I., and Lucy C. Lloyd. Specimens of Bushman Folklore. London: George Allen & Company, Ltd., 1911.
- Boas, Franz. "Notes on Mexican Folklore." Journal of American Folklore 25 (1912): 204–260.
- Bogoras, Waldemar. "Chukchee Mythology." The Jessup North Pacific Expedition, ed. Franz Boas. Memoir of the American Museum of Natural History New York. Vol. 8. New York: The American Museum of Natural History New York, 1910.
- Bogoras, Waldemar. "The Folklore of Northeastern Asia as Compared with that of Northwest America." American Anthropologist 4 (1902): 577–683.
- Bogoras, Waldemar. Koryak Texts, Publications of the American Ethnological Society V. Leyden: E. J. Brill, Ltd., 1917.
- Bolton, H. C. "Arab Legend of a Buried Monastery." Journal of American Folklore 2 (1889): 227.
- Borba, Telemaco M. "Caingang Deluge Legend." Journal of American Folklore 18 (1905): 223–225.
- Bourke, John G. "Notes on Apache Mythology." Journal of American Folklore 3 (1890): 209–212.
- Bourke, John G. "Popular Medicines, Customs and Superstitions of the Rio Grande." Journal of American Folklore 7 (1894): 119–146.
- Bowman, Earl. Interview of Harry Reece. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers' Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC. <http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/wpaintro/wpahome.html> (October 12, 2005).
- Brzozowska-Krajka, Anna. "Poland." The Greenwood Encyclopedia of World Folklore and Folklife, ed. William Clements. Vol. 3. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2006.
- Burton, Richard. Vikram and the Vampire, ed. Elizabeth Burton. London: Tylston and Edwards, 1893.
- Chase, Richard. "Jack and the Fire Dragaman." Southern Folklore Quarterly 5 (1941): 151–155.
- Chase, Richard. "The Lion and the Unicorn." Southern Folklore Quarterly 1 (1937): 15–19.
- Chase, Richard, and Kathryn Chase. "Lucky Jack." Southern Folklore Quarterly 3 (1939): 21–24.

- Claudel, Calvin. "Louisiana Tales of Jean Sot and Boqui and Lapin." Southern Folklore Quarterly 8 (1944): 287–299.
- Clements, William M., ed. The Greenwood Encyclopedia of World Folklore and Folklife. 4 Vols. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2006.
- Colum, Padraic. Orpheus: Myths of the World. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1930.
- Cooke, Elizabeth Johnston. "English Folk-Tales in America. The Bride of the Evil One." Journal of American Folklore 12 (1899): 126–130.
- Cosquin, Emmanuel. Contes populaires de Lorraine. 2 Vols. Paris: F. Vieweg, 1886.
- Cross, Tom Peete. "Folk-Lore from the Southern States." Journal of American Folklore 22 (1909): 251–255.
- Deans, James. "The Doom of the Katt-a-quins: From the Aboriginal Folk-lore of Southern Alaska." Journal of American Folklore 5 (1892): 232–235.
- de Fábrega, H. Pittier. "Folklore of the Bribri and Brunka Indians in Costa Rica." Journal of American Folklore 16 (1903): 1–9.
- Dixon, Roland. Oceanic Mythology. Boston: Marshall Jones Company, 1916.
- Dorsey, George A. "Legend of the Teton Sioux Medicine Pipe." Journal of American Folklore 19 (1906): 326–329.
- Dorsey, George A. The Mythology of the Wichita. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1995.
- Dorsey, George A. "The Two Boys Who Slew the Monsters and Became Stars." Journal of American Folklore 17 (1904): 153–160.
- Dunlop, W., and T. V. Holmes. "Australian Folklore Stories." Journal of the Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 28 (1899): 22–34.
- Edwards, Charles L. Bahama Songs and Stories. Memoirs of the American Folklore Society, no. 3. New York: American Folklore Society, 1985.
- Edwards, Charles L. "Some Tales from Bahama Folk-Lore." Journal of American Folklore 4 (1891): 47–54.
- Edwards, Charles L. "Some Tales from Bahama Folk-Lore: Fairy Stories." Journal of American Folklore 4 (1891): 247–252.
- El Shamy, Hasan M. Types of the Folktale in the Arab World: A Demographically Oriented Tale-Type Index. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2004.
- Evans, Ivor H. N. "Folk Stories of the Tempassuk and Tuaran Districts, British North Borneo." Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 43 (913): 422–479.
- Fauset, Arthur Huff. "Negro Folk Tales from the South. (Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana)." Journal of American Folklore 40 (1927): 213–303.
- Fewkes, J. Walter. "The Destruction of the Tusayan Monsters." Journal of American Folklore 8 (1895): 132–137.
- Fornander, Abraham. Formander Collection of Hawaiian Antiquities and Folklore. 3 Vols. Honolulu: Bernice Pauahi Bishop Museum, 1916/17–1919/20.
- Fortier, Alcee. "Louisianan Nursery-Tales." Journal of American Folklore 1 (1888): 140–145.
- Fox, C. E., and F. H. Drew. "Beliefs and Tales of San Cristoval (Solomon Islands)." Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 45 (1915): 131–185.

General Bibliography

- Gardner, Emelyn E. "Folk-Lore from Schoharie County, New York." Journal of American Folklore 27 (1914): 304–325.
- Gardner, Fletcher, and W. W. Newell. "Filipino (Tagalog) Versions of Cinderella." Journal of American Folklore 19 (1906): 265–280.
- Gardner, Fletcher, and W. W. Newell. "Tagalog Folk-Tales I." Journal of American Folklore 20 (1907): 104–116.
- Gaster, M. "Fairy Tales from Inedited Hebrew MSS. of the Ninth and Twelfth Centuries." Folklore 7 (1896): 217–252.
- Gaster, M. "Székeley Tales." Folklore 4 (1893): 328–344.
- Ginzberg, Louis. The Legends of the Jews. Vol. 1, Bible Times and Characters from the Creation to Jacob, trans. Herietta Szold. Philadelphia: The Jewish Publication Society of America, 1909.
- Golder, F. A. "Tlingit Myths." Journal of American Folklore 20 (1907): 290–294.
- Green, Feridah Kirby. "Folklore from Tangier." Folklore 19 (1908): 440–458.
- Green, Thomas A., ed. Folklore: An Encyclopedia of Beliefs, Customs, Tales, Music, and Art. 2 Vols. Santa Barbara: ABC-CLIO, 1997.
- Grey, Sir George. Polynesian Mythology and Ancient Traditional History of the New Zealanders. 2nd edition. Auckland: H. Brett, 1885.
- Grimble, Arthur. "Myths from the Gilbert Islands." Folklore 33 (1922): 91–112.
- Groome, Francis Hinds. Gypsy Folk Tales. London: Hurst & Blackett, 1899.
- Hanauer, James Edward. Folklore of the Holy Land: Moslem, Christian and Jewish. London: Duckworth and Company, 1907.
- Handbook of the Indians of California*. Bureau of American Ethnology, Bulletin 78. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1925.
- Hartman, C. V. "The Mythology of the Aztecs of El Salvador." Journal of American Folklore 20 (1907): 143–147.
- Hartman, C. V. "The Story of the Calabash-Tree in the Popol Vuh." Journal of American Folklore 20 (1907): 148–150.
- Hearn, Lafcadio. In Ghostly Japan. Boston: Little, Brown, and Co., 1899.
- Hearn, Lafcadio. Kwaidan: Stories and Studies of Strange Things. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin and Co., 1904.
- Henry, Tuira. "Tahitian Folklore." Journal of the Polynesian Society 10 (1901): 51–52.
- Herrick, Mrs. R. F. "The Black Dog of the Blue Ridge." Journal of American Folklore 20 (1907): 151–152.
- Hobley, C. W. "British East Africa: Anthropological Studies in Kavirondo and Nandi." Journal of the Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 33 (1903): 325–359.
- Hoffman, W. J. "Folklore of the Pennsylvania Germans III." Journal of American Folklore 2 (1889): 191–202.
- Honey [Honeij], James A. South African Folk-Tales. New York: Baker & Taylor, 1910.
- Howitt, A. W., and Otto Siebert. "Legends of the Dieri and Kindred Tribes of Central Australia." Journal of the Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 34 (1904): 100–129.
- Howitt, Mary E. B., and Otto Siebert. "Some Native Legends from Central Australia." Folklore 13 (1902): 403–417.

- Hutton, H. "Folktales of the Angami Nagas of Assam." Folklore 25 (1914): 476–498.
- Jacobs, Joseph. Indian Fairy Tales. London: David Nutt, 1912.
- Johnson, John H. "Folk-Lore from Antigua, British West Indies." Journal of American Folklore 34 (1921): 40–88.
- Johnston, Mrs. William Preston. "Two Negro Folktales." Journal of American Folklore 9 (1896): 194–198.
- Kawaharada, Dennis. Ancient Oahu: Stories from Fornander & Thrum. Honolulu: Kalamakū Press, 2001.
- Kirk, J. W. C., and E. S. Hartland. "Specimens of Somali Tales." Folklore 15 (1904): 316–326.
- Kroeber, A. L. "Cheyenne Tales." Journal of American Folklore 13 (1900): 161–190.
- Kroeber, A. L. "Tales of the Smith Sound Eskimo." Journal of American Folklore 12 (1899): 166–182.
- Krug, Adolph N. "Bulu Tales from Kamerun, West Africa." Journal of American Folklore 25 (1912): 106–124.
- Kúnož, Ignáz. Forty-four Turkish Fairy Tales. London: Gordon G. Harrap & Company, 1913.
- Lach-Szyrma, W. S. "Slavonic Folk-Lore." Folk-Lore Record 4 (1881): 52–70.
- Landa, Gertrude. Jewish Fairy Tales and Legends. New York: Bloch Publishing Co., Inc., 1919.
- Lang, Andrew. The Arabian Nights Entertainments. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1898.
- Lang, Andrew. The Crimson Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1903.
- Lang, Andrew. The Green Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1892.
- Lang, Andrew. The Olive Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1907.
- Lang, Andrew. The Pink Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1897.
- Lang, Andrew. The Violet Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1901.
- Lang, Andrew. The Yellow Fairy Book. London: Longmans, Green and Company, 1894.
- Lomax, John A. "Stories of an African Prince: Yoruba Tales." Journal of American Folklore 26 (1913): 1–12.
- Lummis, Charles. Pueblo Indian Folk-Stories. New York: Century, 1910.
- Mackenzie, Donald A. Indian Myth and Legend. London: The Gresham Publishing Company Limited, 1913.
- Mason, J. Alden. "Four Mexican-Spanish Fairy-Tales from Azqueltan, Jalisco." Journal of American Folklore 25 (1912): 191–198.
- Mathews, R. H. "The Wallaroo and the Willy-Wagtail: A Queensland Folk-Tale." Folklore 20 (1909): 214–216.
- Matthews, Washington. Navajo Legends. Memoirs of the American Folklore Society, no. 5. New York: American Folklore Society, 1897.
- Matthews, Washington. "Noqoilpi, the Gambler: A Navajo Myth." Journal of American Folklore 2 (1889): 89–94.
- Mawr, Mrs. E. B. Roumanian Fairy Tales and Legends. London: H. K. Lewis, 1881.
- Maxfield, Berton L., and W. H. Millington. "Visayan Folk-Tales I" Journal of American Folklore 19 (1902): 97–112.

General Bibliography

- Maxwell, W. E. "Raja Donan: A Malay Fairy Tale." Folk-Lore Journal 6 (1888): 134–139.
- Miura, Kiyoko. "Two Songs That Were Sung and Danced by Owl God." Yakura Epos of the Ainus: Study and Translation of Kamuy-Yukara. <http://www.harvestfields.ca/ebook/etexts1/01/38/00.htm> (July 2, 2007).
- Mooney, James. James Mooney's History, Myths, and Sacred Formulas of the Cherokees. Asheville, NC: Historical Images, 1992.
- Mooney, James. Myths of the Cherokee. Nineteenth Annual Report of the Bureau of American Ethnology, 1897–1898, Part I. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1900.
- Mooney, James. "Myths of the Cherokees." Journal of American Folklore 1 (1888): 97–108.
- Mooney, James. The Sacred Formulas of the Cherokees. Seventh Annual Report of the Bureau of American Ethnology. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1891.
- Moore, T. H. "The Good Serpent. A Chilian Fairy Tale in Spanish, el Culebroncito, Literally Big Snake." Journal of American Folklore 1 (1883): 221–226.
- Newell, William Wells. "The Ghost Legends of the Blue Mountains in Pennsylvania." Journal of American Folklore 11 (1898): 76–78.
- Newell, William Wells. "The Ignus Fatuus, Its Character and Legendary Origin." Journal of American Folklore 17 (1904): 39–60.
- Nikitine, B., and Major E. B. Soane. "The Tale of Suto and Tato: Kurdish Text with Translation and Notes." Bulletin of the School of Oriental Studies, University of London 3 (1923): 69–106.
- O'Connor, W. F. Folk Tales from Tibet. London: Hurst and Blackett, Ltd., 1906.
- O'Ferrall, W. "Native Stories from Santa Cruz and Reef Islands." Journal of the Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 34 (1904): 223–233.
- Orpen, J. M. "Folklore of the Bushmen." Folklore 30 (1919): 143–151.
- Parker, Henry. Village Folk Tales of Ceylon. London: Luzac and Company, 1910.
- Parker, K. Langloh. Australian Legendary Tales. London: David Nutt, 1897.
- Parkinson, John. "Yoruba Folk-Lore." Journal of the Royal African Society 8 (1909): 165–186.
- Parsons, Elsie Clews. Folk-Lore of the Sea Islands, South Carolina. Memoirs of the American Folklore Society, no. 16. New York: American Folklore Society, 1923.
- Parsons, Elsie Clews. "Tales from Maryland and Pennsylvania." Journal of American Folklore 30 (1917): 209–217.
- Parsons, Elsie Clews. Tewa Tales. Memoirs of the American Folklore Society, no. 19. New York: American Folklore Society, 1926.
- Parsons, Elsie Clews. "A West Indian Tale." Journal of American Folklore 32 (1919): 442–443.
- Penard, A. P., and T. E. Penard. "Surinam Folk-Tales." Journal of American Folklore 30 (1917): 239–250.
- Pilsudski, Bronislas [Bronislaw]. "Ainu Folklore." Journal of American Folklore 25 (1912): 72–86.
- Pleyte, C. M. "An Unpublished Batak Creation Legend." Journal of the Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 26 (1897): 103–109.

- Porter, J. Hampden. "Notes on the Folk-Lore of the Mountain Whites of the Alleghanies." Journal of American Folklore 7 (1894): 105–117.
- Porter, Ralph S. "The Story of Bantugan." Journal of American Folklore 15 (1902): 143–161.
- Rattray, R. Sutherland. Hausa Folk-Lore: Customs, Proverbs, Etc. London: Clarendon Press, 1913.
- Ray, Marie. "Jean Sotte Stories." Journal of American Folklore 21 (1908): 364–365.
- Roth, Terry, and Sam Schwartz. Interview of Mr. Wollman. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers' Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC. <http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/wpaintro/wpahome.html> (October 16, 2005).
- Roth, Walter E. An Inquiry into the Animism and Folk-Lore of the Guiana Indians. Thirtieth Annual Report of the Bureau of American Ethnology, 1908–1909. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1915, 103–386.
- Russell, Frank. "Myths of the Jicarilla Apaches." Journal of American Folklore 11 (1898): 253–271.
- Ryder, Arthur W., trans. [author unknown, Sanskrit title Vetalapañchavimsati]. Twenty-Two Goblins. London: J. M. Dent, 1917.
- Sarma, Bagwhan Das. "A Folktale from Kumaon State." Folklore 8 (1897): 181–184.
- Sayce, A. H. "Cairene Folklore." Folklore 11 (1900): 354–395.
- Schwab, George. "Bulu Folk-Tales." Journal of American Folklore 27 (1914): 266–288.
- Schwab, George. "Bulu Tales." Journal of American Folklore 32 (1919): 428–437.
- Scheltema, J. F. "Roostam the Game-cock." Journal of American Folklore 32 (1919): 306–323.
- Scheltema, J. F. "Sry Nagasary." Journal of American Folklore 32 (1919): 324–342.
- Seklimian, A. G. "The Wicked Stepmother, An Armenian Folktale." Journal of American Folklore 10 (1897): 135–142.
- Shanavonian, W., and Mary Mason Poynter. "A Folk-Tale from Asia Minor." Folklore 27 (1916): 311–313.
- Shelton, A. L. Tibetan Folktales. St. Louis, MO: United Christian Missionary Society, 1925.
- Sibree, James, Jr. "The Oratory, Songs, Legends, and Folk-Tales of Malagasy (Continued)." Folk-Lore Journal 1 (1883): 169–174.
- Sibree, James, Jr. "The Oratory, Songs, Legends, and Folk-Tales of Malagasy (Continued)." Folk-Lore Journal 1 (1883): 305–316.
- Sibree, James, Jr., and W. C. Pickersgill. "The Oratory, Songs, Legends, and Folk-Tales of the Malagasy." Folk-Lore Journal 1 (1883): 201–211.
- Smiley, Portia. "Folk-Lore from Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida." Journal of American Folklore 32 (1919): 357–383.
- Smith, Janet. Interview of Elfego Baca. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers' Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC. <http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/wpaintro/wpahome.html> (October 12, 2005).
- Smith, Pamela Coleman. "Two Negro Stories from Jamaica." Journal of American Folklore 9 (1896): 278.

General Bibliography

- Smith, Richard Gordon. Ancient Tales and Folklore of Japan. London: A. and C. Black, 1908.
- Spence, Lewis. The Myths of Mexico and Peru. London: G. G. Harrap and Company, 1913. Internet Sacred Text Archive <http://www.sacred-texts.com/nam/mmp/mmp1.htm> (April 10, 2007).
- Spence, Lewis. The Popol Vuh: The Mythic and Heroic Sagas of the Kichés of Central America. London: David Nutt, 1908.
- Steel, Flora Annie. Tales of the Punjab: Told by the People. New York: Macmillan and Company, 1894.
- Steiner, Roland. "Brazil Robinson Possessed of Two Spirits." Journal of American Folklore 13 (1900): 226–228.
- Steiner, Roland. "Sol Lockheart's Call." Journal of American Folklore 48 (1900): 67–70.
- Stirling, Matthew W. Origin Myth of Acoma and Other Records. Smithsonian Institution, Bureau of American Ethnology, Bulletin 135. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1942.
- Swanton, John R. Myths and Tales of the Southeastern Indians. Smithsonian Institution, Bureau of American Ethnology, Bulletin 88. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1929.
- Swynnerton, Charles. Indian Nights' Entertainment: Folk-Tales from the Upper Indus. London: Elliot Stock, 1892.
- Tejada, Simeon. Interview of Manuel Jesus Vasques. American Life Histories: Manuscripts from the Federal Writers' Project, 1936–1940. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress. American Memory. Library of Congress, Washington, DC. <http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/wpaintro/wpahome.html> (October 12, 2005).
- Theal, George McCall. Kaffir Folk-Lore: A Selection from the Traditional Tales Current Among the People Living on the Eastern Border of the Cape Colony. London: S. Sonnenschein, Le Bas & Lowrey, 1886.
- Thompson, Stith. The Motif Index of Folk Literature. Revised edition. 6 Vols. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1955–1958.
- "Three Folktales from Old Meldrum, Aberdeenshire." Folk-Lore Journal 2 (1884): 68–74.
- Trowbridge, Ada Wilson. "Negro Customs and Folk-Stories of Jamaica." Journal of American Folklore 9 (1896): 279–287.
- Weeks, John H. "The Leopard in the Maize-Farm: A Lower Congo Folk-Tale." Folklore 20 (1909): 209–211.
- Werner, A. "The Bantu Element in Swahili Folklore." Folklore 20 (1909): 448–450.
- Werner, A. Myths and Legends of the Bantu. London: George G. Harrap & Co., 1933.
- Werner, A. "Some Notes on East African Folklore (Continued)." Folklore 26 (1915): 61–62.
- Westervelt, W. D. Hawaiian Legends of Ghosts and Ghost-Gods. Boston: G. H. Ellis Press, 1916.
- Westervelt, W. D. Hawaiian Legends of Old Honolulu. Boston: G. H. Ellis Press, 1915.
- Westervelt, W. D. Hawaiian Legends of Volcanoes. Boston: G. H. Ellis Press, 1916.
- Wilson, Howard Barrett. "Notes of Syrian Folk-Lore Collected in Boston." Journal of American Folklore 16 (1903): 133–147.

- Wiltse, Henry M. "In the Southern Field of Folk-Lore." Journal of American Folklore 13 (1900): 209–212.
- Wissler, Clark. "Some Dakota Myths I." Journal of American Folklore 20 (1907): 121–131.
- Wissler, Clark. "Some Dakota Myths II." Journal of American Folklore 20 (1907): 195–206.
- "Witchcraft in New Mexico." Journal of American Folklore 1 (1888): 167–168.
- Wohlers, J. F. H. "New Zealand Heaven and Earth Myth." Journal of the Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland 6 (1877): 343–344.
- Wratislaw, A. H. Sixty Folk-Tales from Exclusively Slavonic Sources. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin and Co., 1890.
- Wrenshall, Letitia Humphreys. "Incantations and Popular Healing in Maryland and Pennsylvania." Journal of American Folklore 15 (1902): 268–274.

Cumulative Index

---

Boldface numbers refer to volume numbers.

1: Africa, The Middle East,
Australia, and Oceania
2: Asia
3: Europe
4: North and South America

- Abandonment, 1:36, 2:167
Abduction: maidens, 3:216; rescue
from supernatural, 2:24; rival ethnic group, 3:216; supernatural
bridegroom, 1:420
Aborigines, 1:297, 2:152
Absaroka (tribe), 4:67–69
Abu'n-Nuwâ's, 1:251
"Abu-Nowâs," 1:9–11
Acceptance, 3:67, 3:160, 4:110
Acoma Pueblo, 4:3–12, 4:102,
4:106
"The Adams Diggins," 4:267–72
Adlet, 4:72
"The Adventures of Kororo-
manna," 4:322
"Adventures of the Tuglay,"
2:388–95
"Advice of the Fox," 3:54
Africa: Central, 1:61–134; Eastern,
1:27–58; Northern, 1:1–25,
1:14, 3:385; Southern, 1:135–65;
Western, 1:61–134, 4:163
African American folktales,
4:159–208; Anansi tales, 4:326;
"The Bride of the Evil One,"
3:360; Cajun folktales, 4:209;
Creek tale, 4:65; rabbits, 4:415;
sources, 1:130–34; Southern tricksters, 4:45; trickster figure,
1:61
African Americans, 1:78, 4:63
African Caribbean, 4:403–40
African Diaspora, 1:57, 1:61,
1:126, 1:129
African folktales, 1:1–165; audience, 1:126; Bluebeard plot,
3:360; Malabasy influence, 1:33;
maroons, 4:324; old story as,
4:422; supernatural medicine,
1:87; Surinam maroons, 4:324
Afterlife, 2:83, 3:144, 4:185
Aggies, 4:220
Agha, 1:201
Agricultural lifestyle, 1:29, 1:98
Ainu, 2:3–27
"The Ai'wan Shamans," 2:50–58
Akan ethnic groups, 1:61, 1:96
"Aki Gahuk, the Father of the Crocodiles," 2:311–13
Akuapem, 1:61–64
Alabama (tribe), 4:13–18
Aladdin tales, 3:163
"Alcestis," 3:244–53
Aleut people, 4:19–24
Algonquin cultures, 4:124
"Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves,"
2:419
Allegory, 1:253
Alligator, 4:65
Ama-terasu, 2:59
Ambition, 2:123
America, 3:49
Amorality, 1:70
Amulets, 1:3, 1:49–52, 1:319,
4:95, 4:172
Anaconda, 4:448
Analogy, 2:301
"Ananse Buys the Town," 1:62–63
Anansi, 1:61, 1:96, 4:124, 4:163,
4:324, 4:326, 4:329–30, 4:424,
4:425–28, 4:429; Nancy, 4:405;
'tory, 4:324–29
"Anansi and the Lady in the Well," 4:429–30
"Anansi Eats Mutton,"
4:325–27
Anasazi, 4:124
Ancelet, Barry Jean, 4:220
Ancestors, 1:29, 2:59, 4:140
Ancestral ghosts, 1:333
Andalusia, 3:385
"Andras Baive," 3:321–24, 3:324
Anecdote, 3:285, 4:252
Angami, 2:261, 2:263, 2:264
Angels, 1:264
Angulimala, 2:156
"Animal Allows Himself to Be Tied to Another for Safety,"
2:121
Animal gratitude, 2:268, 2:429,
2:436, 3:364; lack of, 2:277;
repayment, 3:113; rescue from death, 2:176; snake, 4:329–30
Animal guardians, 4:98
Animal helpers: abusive family,
3:59; antelopes, 4:102; bulls,
3:185; quest role, 2:359; serpent,

Cumulative Index

- 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania
2: Asia
3: Europe
4: North and South America
- 4:309; Snow White, 3:261; unseen, 4:98–101
“The Animal Languages,” 2:295, 2:301, 3:109
Animals: clan totems, 4:89; dwarves, 3:81; folk tale characters, 1:64; grateful, 1:242; guise for spirit helpers, 4:327; hero transformation, 3:139; possessing spirits, 4:447; taming of wild, 3:313; tricksters, 2:328, 2:333; weak and larger, 2:121; witches as, 4:284; world vs. humans, 3:352
“Animals Grateful for Rescue from Peril of Death,” 2:176
Animal skin, 3:212
Animal spouse: husband, 3:86; justice, 4:255; lizard husband, 2:362; transformation, 2:320, 2:323; wife, 1:265, 4:431
Animal tales, 1:35, 4:329; African American and Caribbean sources, 1:130–34; Bantu, 1:31; cat and mouse, 2:128; Creek and African American, 4:63; danger descriptions, 1:149; fable function, 1:66, 2:126; fable trickster/culture hero, 4:161; fox nature in, 3:334; konehu cycle, 4:343; moral lesson, 4:110; moral precepts, 1:116; myth combination, 1:303, 1:306; Naga, 2:265–67; narrative functions, 3:313; origins explanation, 1:306; plot features, 1:57; question-and-answer pattern, 2:152; self-serving characters, 1:35. See also Trickster
Animism, 2:3; environmental elements, 2:14; shape-shifting, 2:17; Tibetan, 2:113
“Annancy and the Yam Hill,” 1:61, 4:424–25
Ann Nancy, 4:163–64
“The Antelope Boy,” 4:102–5
Anthropomorphic animals, 4:415; bears, 4:89; spider, 4:324
Anthropomorphic beings, 1:67, 1:353, 3:316
Antigua, 4:405–13
Anti-Semitism, 3:379
Anxieties, 3:360, 4:76
Apache, 4:25–32, 4:273
Ape, 2:365–66
Appalachian folktales, 4:225–43
Arabian Peninsula, 1:179
Arabic folk tradition, 1:220, 2:83
Arab influence, 1:12, 1:49
Arabs, 1:260
Arahat (people), 2:156
Arawak (people), 4:297–98, 4:443–52
Archetype tales, 3:67
Arctic, 4:72, 4:74
Arctic peoples. See Circumpolar cultures; Eskimo
Aristocracy, 1:98
Arizona (Native Americans), 4:285, 4:291
Arjuna, 2:142
Armenia, 1:169–79
Ascetics, 2:92
Ashanti, 1:61
Ashkenazim, 3:141–48, 3:147
Asia: East, 2:1–130; Malabasy influence, 1:33; South, 2:131–303; Southeast, 2:305–438
Assassination, 2:64
Assimilation, 1:201
Asuang, 2:429
Ataro, 1:333, 1:341
Athabascans, 4:72
Athletic competition, 4:95
Audience, 1:126, 1:176
Aurohuac, 4:297–98
Australia, 1:297–327
Autobiography, 4:258
Avenger, 1:240, 4:19
“Awa-Wanga Animal Fables,” 1:30
Axaiacatzin, 4:400
Aymara (people), 4:299–305
Aztec, 4:393
Babalawo, 1:129
“Baboon Disguises Himself and Becomes a Farmer,” 1:56–57
“The Babracote and the Camundi,” 4:448–49
Baca, Elfego, 4:275–79
Badger, 2:97
Baghdad, 1:10
Bagobo (people), 2:388
Bahamas, 4:414–22
Bajau, 2:307
“The Baker of Beauty,” 3:54–58
Ball games, 4:364
Bands of families, 4:74
Bantu, 1:29, 1:30–31, 1:49, 1:58, 1:64, 1:68
Banyan, 1:52
Bards, 2:74
Basque, 3:339–59
Batak (people), 2:338
Bats, 4:341
Battles, 2:74, 2:383, 3:54, 3:339
Baule (people), 1:61
Bear, 3:81, 4:40, 4:89; Brer, 4:161–62; fox and, 1:133–34; John the, 4:376; as maiden, 4:136–39; Mouse Deer and, 2:333; origin, 4:39–42; women lover, 4:118–20
“The Bear and the Fox,” 1:133–34
Beards, 3:81
“Bear Maiden,” 4:136–39
“The Beautiful and the Ugly Twin,” 3:373
“Beauty and the Beast,” 2:362
Beckwith, Martha Warren, 1:380, 4:420, 4:425, 4:426, 4:430
Bedouin, 1:179–80
Bee, 3:174
“The Beginning,” 2:307–8
Beliefs: animistic, 2:3; Bön, 2:113; indigenous, 2:307; shape-shifting, 2:17
Belief tale: hag legend, 4:199; spirit possession, 4:203; white deer, 4:228; witch identity, 4:284
Bell, Robert, 4:57
Bella Bella, 4:72
Benevolence, 1:216–17; ancestral ghosts, 1:333; fallen angles, 1:264; ironic, 4:89; naiveté,

- 3:285; protectors, 4:43; serpent, 4:309; skull, 1:92; validation, 1:92
- “Benevolence,” 1:216–17
- Benin, 1:124
- Berberisca, 3:385
- Berbers, 1:12
- Bering Strait, 2:40
- Betel nut, 1:343
- Betrothal, 1:313
- “The Bewitched Wives,” 4:70–71
- Bewitching: culpability, 4:255; female jinn, 1:24; medicine, 4:85; wives, 4:70–71
- Bharata, 2:142
- Biblical narrative, 1:42–43, 1:181, 1:196
- “Big Bad Wolf,” 4:186
- “Big Man-eater,” 4:16–18
- “The Big Worm,” 4:421–22
- “The Billy Goat and the King,” 2:295–97, 2:301, 3:109
- Billy the Kid, 4:258
- Birds, 1:297, 2:266–67; assistance of pet, 3:270; mythic, 2:359; ordinary folktale roles, 3:67; tengu, 2:92; trickster sparrow, 1:291; willy-wagtail, 1:303
- “The Birds and the Snakes,” 2:266–67
- “Bird’s Pea Gets Stuck in Socket of Mill-handle,” 2:291
- “The Bird That Made Milk,” 1:158, 1:161–65
- Birth, 3:21, 4:112, 4:364
- Black, 3:253
- “The Black Dragon and the Red Dragon,” 1:267–73
- Blame shifting, 1:72, 1:223, 4:165
- “Blessing from the Owl God,” 2:3–13
- Blind, 2:74, 3:113
- Blocking characters, 1:6
- Blood feuds, 3:304
- “Bluebeard,” 3:34, 3:360–64
- Boas, Franz, 4:367, 4:380
- Boccacio, Giovanni, 3:274–75
- Boer, 1:144
- “The Boiled Crab,” 2:266
- Bolivia, 4:299
- Bön, 2:113, 2:123
- Bones, 4:412–13
- Bonney, William H., 4:258
- Book of Jasher*, 1:181
- Booky, 4:418
- “The Borah of Byamee,” 1:313–19
- Borneo, 2:307–37
- Bornu (people), 1:98
- Born with caul, 4:203
- Borrowings: American ethnic group, 4:174; American south, 4:209; Cinderella variant, 4:382; from Maroons, 4:343; setting adaptation, 4:380
- Boston, 1:251, 1:253
- “Boudreaux and the Cottonmouth,” 4:219–20
- Bouqui, 4:209–15
- Bourke, John G., 4:281
- Boys, 3:21; culture hero, 4:112; initiation ceremony, 1:313, 1:322; leadership test, 3:96; orphan, 2:263; trickster, 2:263, 4:102. See also Brothers
- “The Boy Who Could Keep a Secret,” 3:96–103
- Brahma, 2:133
- “The Brahman, the Tiger, and the Six Judges,” 2:152–56, 2:277
- Brahmans, 2:152
- “The Brave Tailor,” 1:287, 4:232
- Brazil, 4:306
- Brer Bear, 4:161–62
- Brer Dog, 4:175–79
- Brer Rabbit, 4:45, 4:166–89
- “Brer Rabbit’s Cool Air Swing,” 4:170–71
- Brer Squirrel, 4:170–71
- Brer Turkey, 4:179–82
- Brer Wolf, 4:168–70, 4:170–71, 4:186
- “The Briar-Patch Punishment for Rabbit,” 1:152, 2:415, 4:121, 4:415
- Bribri, 4:351–56
- Bride: cannibal spirits, 1:92; courtship, 3:289; of demons, 4:193–98; of evil one, 1:85, 2:172, 3:360; hero winning, 3:295; husband abduction rescues, 2:24; nonhuman form, 3:212; price customs, 1:82; to spirit, 1:92; substitute, 1:260; test, 1:47–48, 3:289; underworld, 1:353, 1:372–80
- “The Bride from the Underworld,” 1:353, 1:372–80
- Bridegroom abduction by supernatural, 1:420
- “The Bride of the Evil One,” 1:85, 3:360, 4:193–98
- “The Bride Rescues Her Husband,” 2:24–27
- “The Bride Test,” 1:47
- Britain, 3:1–64
- Brother Abraham Jasper, 4:185
- “The Brother and the Sister,” 1:260–64
- “Brother Elephant and Brother Whale,” 4:417–18
- Brotherhood of Penitents, 4:279
- “Brother Rabbit, Brother Booky, and Brother Cow,” 4:418–20
- “Brother Rabbit an’ Brother Tar-Baby,” 1:152, 2:156, 4:121, 4:209, 4:414–17
- Brothers, 4:380; culture heroes, 1:324; tame and wild, 4:33–34; twin, 3:385, 4:148; younger, 2:245–47, 3:201–2, 3:216
- Buchanan, George, 4:440
- Buddha, 2:156
- Buddhism, 2:83, 2:92
- Buffalo, 4:50, 4:116–18, 4:264
- Bullroarer, 1:313
- Bulls, 3:185
- Bulu, 1:64–77
- Bunda, 1:303
- Bunyip, 1:310
- Burkovina, 3:171
- Burma, 2:261
- “The Burning of the Old House,” 3:309–12
- Bushmen. See San
- Bush spirits, 4:332, 4:338
- Buso, 2:388
- Buzzard, 4:163–64, 4:182
- Byamee, 1:313
- Caingang, 4:306–8
- “Cajun Cockfight,” 4:220–21
- Cajun folktales, 4:45, 4:209–21
- Calabar, 1:80

Cumulative Index

- |                                                    |
|----------------------------------------------------|
| 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania |
| 2: Asia                                            |
| 3: Europe                                          |
| 4: North and South America                         |
- Calabash tree, 4:364–66, 4:397
 “The Calabash Tree,” 4:364–66
 “The Cannibal and the Pig Who Ate Human Flesh,” 1:347–49
 Cannibalism, 1:347–49, 3:231, 3:317, 4:16–18; Adlet, 4:72; Caribbean peoples, 4:448; children, 1:158–61; evil spirits, 2:105; ghosts, 2:83; giants, 4:16; hunting of heads, 2:309; mother, 1:158; Native American tales, 4:16; preternatural stupidity, 1:55; supernatural power, 2:429
 “The Cannibal Mother and Her Children,” 1:158–61
 Cannibal spirits, 1:92
 “A Cannibal Story,” 1:324–27, 1:347
 Carib, 4:448, 4:450, 4:453–58
 Caribbean, 4:164, 4:403–58; animal tale sources, 1:130–34; Ann Nancy/Anansi, 4:163; Cajuns, 4:209
 Caribbean folktales: Anansi, 4:326; maxims, 4:425; serpent helper, 4:309
 “The Carpenter and the Amulet,” 1:49–52
 Caste system, 2:152
 “The Cat and the Mice,” 2:128–30
 “The Cat as Sham Holy Man,” 2:128
 Cats, 2:100, 2:128, 4:409
 “The Cat’s Elopement,” 2:100–102
 Cautionary tales: dog control, 4:50; drowning, 3:92; enemies, 3:379; good advice, 3:313; natural gifts, 1:393; social norms, 2:262; social transgressions, 3:28; upper classes, 3:182
 Central Africa, 1:61–134
 Central America, 4:349–401
 Central Europe, 3:65–138
 Ceylon. See Sri Lanka
 Chakana, 4:315
 Champions, 2:142
 Chaos, 2:28
 Chapbooks, 3:3–4, 3:21
 Characters: conventional, 2:427; predators/prey, 2:128; self-serving, 1:35; stock, 1:5, 2:128, 3:130, 3:185, 4:167, 4:215, 4:220; Two-Faces, 4:53; untrustworthy, 1:35. See also Culture hero; Trickster
 Charlemagne, 3:339
 “The Charmed Ring,” 2:176–81, 3:163
 Cherokee nation, 4:33–49, 4:94–98
 Cheyenne tribe, 4:50–56
 Chicken feet, 3:212
 Chih Nü, 2:30
 Children, 3:67, 3:141; abandoned, 2:167; of animals and humans, 4:376; bearing supernatural agreement, 3:373; cannibals, 1:55–56, 1:158–61; of deities, 1:55, 1:398, 3:231, 4:301, 4:319, 4:456; of deities and humans, 3:231; lost and animal guardian, 4:89; neglected, 4:429; orphan, 2:263; orphans, 2:262; trickster, 2:318–19, 2:319; twins, 3:373, 3:385, 4:34, 4:83, 4:84, 4:105–10, 4:148–55, 4:359, 4:364, 4:456
 “The Children and the Cannibal,” 1:55–56
 “The Children of the Sun,” 4:301, 4:319
 Chile, 4:309–14
 China, 1:223, 2:28–35
 Chinese philosophy, 2:28
 Chipmunk, 4:84
 Choctaw tribe, 4:13
 Choruses, 1:126
 Christian influence, 1:179, 3:253, 4:374, 4:389
 Christians, 1:223, 1:331, 2:399
 Chukchee, 2:36–58, 2:105
 Churinga, 1:319, 1:3038
 Cigarettes, 4:102
 “Cinderella,” 2:419, 3:58–59, 3:77, 3:270–74, 4:382
 “Cinder Mary,” 4:382–84
 Circumpolar cultures, 2:36, 2:40, 3:313
 Cities, 1:3, 1:10, 1:14, 1:16, 1:124, 3:390
 City dwellers, 1:3
 City-states, 1:98, 1:124
 Clan: ancestor, 4:140; animal helpers, 4:98; lineage, 4:3–4, 4:79, 4:140; membership, 1:42; totem animals, 4:89
 Cleansing environment: culture hero, 1:324, 3:231, 4:359; twin hero, 4:84, 4:148
 “A Clever Hunter and a Bird,” 1:116, 1:117–18
 Cleverness, 1:31, 2:319, 4:53, 4:232, 4:415
 “The Clever Orphan,” 2:263–64
 Climate: arctic, 4:74; exaggeration, 4:285, 4:291; tropical, 1:78
 Closings, 1:106, 1:291, 4:409
 “Clothing Caught in a Graveyard,” 4:252
 Clubhouses, 1:345
 Coastal dwellers: Chukchee, 2:36–58
 Coastal trade, 1:64
 Coats-of-arms, 4:79
 Cock fighting, 4:220–21
 Cockroach, 4:430
 “Cock’s Breakfast,” 4:430–31
 Colonialism, 2:367
 Comic fiction, 1:291
 Comic misunderstandings, 1:223
 Comic narrative, 3:143, 4:423
 Comic tales, 1:3, 1:6, 1:218
 Community: survival of, 1:238, 4:72; trickster role, 1:80, 4:162, 4:172
 Competition, 4:188
 Competitors, 1:64, 1:71, 1:345
 Complexion of spirits, 1:333
 Comrade Lapin, 4:45
 Conclusions, 4:425
 Congo, 1:78–79
 Conjunction, 4:172, 4:200, 4:203
 Conjuror, 1:431
 Contagion, 4:227
 “Contempt for His Torturers,” 3:147–48

- "Coon in the Box," 2:247, 4:183–85
 Cooperation, 4:162
 Corn, 4:33
 Cornwall, 3:3
 "The Corpse Killed Five Times," 1:223
 Corpses, 1:341
 Cosmology, 1:396, 3:299; humanity, 1:396; primal chaos, 1:353
 Cosquin, Emmanuel, 1:242
 Côte d'Ivoire, 1:61
 Courtship, 2:398–99, 3:289, 4:188
 Cow, 4:418
 Co-wives, 1:106
 Coyote, 2:128, 4:110–11, 4:116, 4:284
 "Coyote and the Buffalo," 4:116–18
 "The Coyote and the Woodpecker," 4:29, 4:110–11
 Crabs, 2:266, 2:334, 3:256
 Crazy-Dogs-Wishing-to-Die, 4:67
 "The Creation," 1:431–32, 4:299, 4:301, 4:315, 4:357–58
 Creation myth, 1:353, 1:396, 2:338, 4:423; Bagobo, 2:396; death, 2:307; dividing and ordering, 2:28; Haggada narrative, 1:185; Japanese, 2:62; Maya, 4:357–66; Navajo, 4:124–29
 "Creation of Heaven and Earth," 1:396–98, 1:398, 1:431
 "The Creation of the World," 1:184–95, 1:196
 Creators: anthropomorphic, 1:300; lata, 1:331; male and female, 4:50; raven, 4:140; Viracocha, 4:299, 4:304, 4:315; wrath, 4:357
 Creek Nation, 4:13, 4:57–62, 4:63–66
 Crests, 4:79
 Criminals, 1:24
 Crimination, 1:14
 Crocodile, 2:311–13, 2:335–36, 2:366–67
 "The Crocodile and the Dog," 1:33–34
 "Crocodile's Treason," 1:148–52
 Cross-cultural categories, 1:87
 Cross-cultural distribution: animal tales, 1:31; borrowing, 4:209; bride of demons, 4:194; "Brother Rabbit an' the Tar-baby," 4:414; ghost obligation fulfillment, 2:86; Hansel and Grettel variants, 3:67; magic swords, 3:96; motifs, 1:45; night hag, 4:225; obstacle flight, 4:118; omen origin, 4:354–55; setting adaptation, 4:380; shape-shifters, 3:212; sibling rivalry, 1:106; signs of tragic events, 4:448; titan in origin myth, 2:28; tricksters, 1:154, 2:430–31; trickster traits, 2:415; unnatural suitor, 1:85; vampire characteristics, 3:174; variant transformations, 2:298
 Cross-cultural elements: duendes, 4:387; hero, 2:383; supernatural, 3:357
 Cross-cultural influence, 4:382
 Cross-cultural phenomenon: hag experience, 4:199; shamanism, 2:36
 Crow tribe, 4:67–69
 Cruel stepmother, 1:119, 1:260, 2:167, 3:18
 "The Crumb in the Beard," 3:266–70
 "The Crystal Casket," 3:261–66
 "The Crystal Coffin," 3:72–77
 Cuchulain, 3:39
 Cultural complexity: food supply, 4:145; living by rule, 4:393; Nahua and Aztec, 4:393; Natchez, 4:145
 Culture: Armenia, 1:169; Australian aboriginal, 1:297; clashes, 4:273; Efik tales, 1:82; mixture, 1:49; perpetuation, 3:141; pig significance, 1:347; Southwest region Spanish, 4:281
 Culture hero: animal fables, 4:161–62; anthropomorphic, 1:300; characteristics, 1:398; cleansing environment, 1:324, 3:231, 4:84, 4:148, 4:359; divine ancestors, 1:29; fire theft, 4:27, 4:64; fox, 4:27; Hercules, 3:231; Manabozho, 4:124; mina birds, 1:297; monster-slayers, 1:120; pair, 4:304; raven, 2:40, 4:75; raven/El, 4:140; stone boy, 4:112; Theseus, 3:231; totemic clans, 1:301; trickster, 1:353, 3:3; twins, 1:347, 4:84, 4:359, 4:364; Viracocha, 4:299. See also Trickster
 Cumulative tale, 2:291
 "Cunnie-More-than-Father," 4:425–28
 "Cupid and Psyche," 1:242
 "Curanderas and Brujas," 4:280–82
 Curiosity, 3:280
 Curses, 2:295, 3:304
 Cycles: Anansi, 1:61–63, 4:426; animal tricksters, 2:328–29; Brer Rabbit, 4:45, 4:166–89; death-bed promises, 1:242; Jack tales, 4:229; John and Master, 4:183; Kampuaa myths, 1:380; Konehu, 4:343; Lapin and Bouqui, 4:209; mouse deer, 2:364; night hag legends, 4:225; Phoebe Ward witch, 4:225; rabbit-big man-eater, 4:18; rabbit tales, 4:367; Raja Rasalu legend, 2:268; tale names explanation, 1:61–62; Ulster myths, 3:39
 Cyclops, 3:350
 Dance: death sentence, 1:147; goddess of, 1:361; Shinto rites, 2:59; warrior culture, 4:95
 Dangers, 1:149, 1:369
 Darkness, 4:332
 "The Darkness and the Cleaving-Together," 1:353–57
 Date palm, 2:298
 Daughter, 2:191–95, 3:120
 Dead: appropriation of living, 2:86; communication with, 1:238; helpful, 2:268, 2:436; spirits, 1:67; unquiet, 3:339
 "Dead Man as Helper," 2:436
 Deans, James, 4:79
 Death: animal gratitude, 2:176; entry into world, 1:431; facing to win bride, 2:195; haunting and untimely, 4:251; of hero, 3:39; imposition of, 2:62; myths, 1:396; occupations and social

Cumulative Index

- |                                                    |
|----------------------------------------------------|
| 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania |
| 2: Asia                                            |
| 3: Europe                                          |
| 4: North and South America                         |
- class, 2:70; outwitting of, 2:133; overcoming, 1:341; personal attack causation, 4:47; portent, 4:341; revival from, 1:343; shaman powers, 2:36; trickster bringing of, 1:398; water of, 1:242
- “The Death and Burial of the Poor Hen-Sparrow,” 2:281–88, 2:291
- Deathbed promises, 1:242
- “Death of Baldr,” 3:296–98
- “Death of Cuchulain,” 3:39–48
- “The Death of the Little Hen,” 2:281
- Death sentences, 1:147
- Deceit, 2:203
- Deception: courting trick, 4:188; Jack-O’-My-Lanterns, 4:206; of women, 2:203–21
- “Deceptive Tug-of-War,” 4:417
- Decorum, 1:82
- Deer, 4:29, 4:45, 4:173–75, 4:228
- De Fábrega, H. Pittier, 4:354
- Deification: creation myth, 1:396; of wind, 4:25; Yoruba myth, 1:124
- Deities: akua, 1:369; Ama-terasu, 2:59; disguised, 4:315; genealogical linkage to humans, 1:417; good and evil, 4:353; rampaging, 1:347; romance with mortals, 2:30; sky, 2:62; snake, 2:123
- Deluge, 1:181, 4:306
- “The Deluge,” 4:301, 4:306–8
- “The Demon Lover,” 1:85, 4:194
- Demons, 2:156, 2:329, 4:193–98
- “The Demon with the Matted Hair,” 2:156–59
- Denmark, 3:285–91
- Dervishes, 1:216
- Descendants, 1:29
- “The Descendants of Fanga,” 1:353, 1:417–19
- Destruction: all-encompassing, 3:61; in deluge, 4:306; twin culture heroes, 4:359
- Deuteronomy, 1:181
- Devices: frame tales, 2:184–85 (See also Formulaic devices); “Mother Goose,” 3:360 (See also Linking devices; Rhetorical devices; Validating devices). See also Frame story
- Devil, 2:113–16, 4:65, 4:389, 4:436; Jack-O’-My-Lanterns, 4:206; marriage to, 3:280; selling soul to, 4:186
- “Diamond Cut Diamond,” 2:254–60, 2:255
- Dieri (people), 1:300, 1:322
- Dilemma of gift as curse, 2:295
- “Dinewan the Emy, and Goomblebuggon the Bustard,” 1:305–8
- Discord in creation, 1:431
- Disease causation, 4:47
- Disguise: failure, 1:57; fallen angels, 1:264; trickster, 1:72, 4:407–8. See also Shape-shifter; Shape-shifting
- Dishonesty, 2:430
- “The Disobedient Daughter Who Married a Skull,” 1:85–87, 1:92, 3:360
- Distribution: Indo-European tradition, 2:167; Rabbit’s [Hare’s] triumph, 1:152
- “To Divide Presents and Strokes,” 1:6
- Divination, 1:129, 2:113
- Divine ancestor, 1:29
- Divine conflicts, 1:361
- Divine essence, 1:124, 2:3
- Division of labor, 1:158, 1:161
- Dogs, 1:33–34, 1:398, 4:50, 4:67; Brer, 4:175–79; tanuki, 2:95
- Domestic strife, 1:5
- Donkey, 4:191–93
- “The Doom of the Katt-a-quins,” 4:145–47
- Double Faces, 4:34, 4:53
- Double man, 4:95
- Double spirits, 4:202
- “Dr. Know-All,” 2:247, 4:184
- “The Dragon Prince and the Stepmother,” 1:282–87
- Dragons, 2:80, 2:116, 3:160; helpfulness, 1:268
- “The Dragon-Slayer,” 3:185, 3:253, 3:351
- Dravidian (people), 2:298
- Dreams: power of, 3:216; prophetic, 4:327; seeking women in, 4:385
- Drowning, 3:92
- Ducks, 4:218
- Duelist mentality, 2:333
- Duendes, 4:387, 4:391
- Dusun, 2:307, 2:309, 2:319
- Dutch East Indies, 2:367–82
- Dutch Guiana. See Suriname
- Dwarfs, 2:32, 3:81
- “The Dybbuk of Bunker Street,” 3:143–47
- Dyerwine, 1:303
- Earth gods, 1:369
- East Asia, 2:1–130
- Eastern Africa, 1:27–58
- Eastern Europe, 3:139–228
- Eating fruit motif, 3:253
- Economy, 1:61, 1:80
- Edge of world, 4:76
- Education, 3:381, 3:390
- Edwards, Charles, 4:420
- Eel, 1:353
- Efik, 1:80–95, 3:360
- Egypt, 1:3–12, 1:42
- “Eight Brothers,” 2:245–47
- Eight (sacred number), 2:388
- “El: The Myth of the Raven,” 4:140–45
- Elders, 4:102
- “The Election of the King of the Animals,” 1:130
- “The Elephant and the Rooster,” 1:131
- “The Elephant and the Tortoise,” 1:80–82
- Elephants, 1:13, 1:80, 4:417
- “Elfego Baca,” 4:275–79
- Elijah, 1:240
- El Salvador, 4:397
- Elves, 4:387
- Emotions, 1:300
- Enemies of group, 3:379

- England, 3:3–38
 English influence, 4:229, 4:440
 “Enmity of Fowl and Cockroach,” 4:430
 Environment: animistic beliefs, 2:14; arctic, 4:72, 4:74; Australian Aborigines, 1:297; cleansing by culture hero, 1:324, 3:231, 4:84, 4:148, 4:359; culture heroes, 1:398; explanation, 1:393, 3:351, 3:352; plot modification, 4:410
 Epics, 2:142, 2:268
Er tin tin, 4:324
 Eskimo, 4:70–78
 Ethics, 2:277, 4:3–4
 Ethnic groups: Appalachian region, 4:229; Aztec sacred history, 4:393; Borneo, 2:307; conflict, 4:450; Congo, 1:78; Jewish communities, 3:141. See also names of specific groups
 Euripides, 3:245
 Europe, 3:1–398
 European influence: Brer Rabbit trick, 4:188; Central American folklore, 4:367; Cheyenne, 4:54; Creek tale, 4:65; Efik, 1:80; Natchez, 4:121; tale elements, 4:136–37; West African trade, 1:64
 Evil, 1:264, 4:389
 Evil eye, 3:174
 Evil one, 4:193–98
 Evil spirits, 2:105
 Exaggeration, 4:285, 4:291
 Exchanges of eyes, 1:80
 Excommunication rites, 3:28
 “An Exile’s Revenge,” 1:345–47
 Explanation, 2:80, 2:261, 4:423; animal nature, 1:80; animal tale mythic, 1:303; animal tales, 1:31, 1:35; emergence from underworld, 4:302; fable moralization, 1:112; historical enmity, 4:450; justice, 4:409; local features, 3:28; Muslim prohibitions, 1:12; origins, 1:306; prayer wand, 2:14; rational in legend, 4:301; relationships with other peoples, 2:309; sacred objects, 1:308; taboo adherence, 1:67; tattooing, 1:425
 “The Exploits of Koneho,” 4:342–48
 Explorer accounts, 4:291
 “Exposure in a Boat,” 2:383
 Expulsion, 1:260
 Eyamba, 1:87
 Eyes: animal, 1:80–82; closing, 2:128; evil, 3:174; exchanges of, 1:80
 “The Fable of the Leopard and Hyena,” 1:31
 Fables, 1:112; admonition, 1:121; animal tale, 1:66, 2:126, 2:265, 3:313, 4:161; animal tricksters, 1:76; Bulu, 1:64; envy, 2:102; moralizing, 1:33, 1:112; personified morals, 2:436; trickster/culture hero, 4:161
 Fábrega, H. Pittier de, 4:353
The Facetious Nights (Straparola), 3:275
 Facts, 2:67
 Fairies, 4:247
 Fair tales, 3:360, 3:364
 Fairy queen, 3:21
 “Faithful John,” 2:159
 Fallen angels, 1:264
 Fall from grace, 1:196, 4:453
 Falling fruit, 1:169, 1:176
 “The Fall of Man and the Punishment of the Serpent,” 1:196–200
 False bride, 1:87
 Falsehood, 2:435–38
 Family: animal helpers, 3:59; bands, 4:74; divine lineage, 2:59; escape of abusive, 3:59; ghosts as guardian, 1:333; human and divine, 1:417; property reclamation, 4:189; relationships, 4:448
 Family sagas, 4:159
 Family trees, 1:353
 “Famine,” 4:67–69
 “The Famine and the Spider,” 1:132–33
 Fang (people), 1:64
 “Fangono,” 1:419–25
 Fantastic animals, 1:36
 Fante, 1:61, 1:96–97
 Far away land, 2:13
 Farmers, 2:262; Angami, 2:261; good, 3:285–88; origin myth, 4:3; Pueblo practices, 4:102; rain-bringing, 4:83
 Fate of warrior, 3:304
 “The Father and Son Who Married Mother and Daughter,” 2:184, 2:191–95, 3:275
 Fathers: jealousy of sons, 4:426; marriage, 2:191–95; sibling rivalry, 1:106; unkind sister partiality, 3:18
 Fathers-in-law, 1:322
 Fattening houses, 1:82–83
 Faust legends, 3:160
 “Fear,” 1:257–60
 Fear of night hag, 4:225
 Fellahin, 1:3–4
 Female beauty, 1:82
 Female creator, 4:332
 Female figures, 2:40
 Female jinn, 1:24
 Female protagonists, 3:34, 4:255
 Females, 4:3–4, 4:83
 Female spirits, 2:40, 4:74
 “Ferdinand the True and Ferinand the False,” 3:364
 Feudal lords, 2:70
 Fez, 1:16
 “The Fifty-One Thieves,” 2:424–27
 Fionas, 1:335–41, 1:339
 Fin-back whale, 4:79
 Fire, 1:319; acquisition, 1:398; gift of, 1:29; making motif, 4:13; theft, 4:27, 4:64
 Fire Dragaman, 4:16, 4:236–40
 “The First People,” 2:62–63
 First person myths, 2:13, 2:16
 “The First Village,” 2:338–42
 Fish, 4:420
 “The Fisher and His Wife,” 2:102
 “The Fisherman and the Boyard’s Daughter,” 3:182–84
 “The Fisherman and the Jinn,” 1:220–23, 2:184, 3:275
 “The Fish Lover,” 4:420
 “The Fish Peri,” 1:176, 1:264–67, 1:268
 “The Flight,” 4:436

Cumulative Index

- |                                                    |
|----------------------------------------------------|
| 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania |
| 2: Asia                                            |
| 3: Europe                                          |
| 4: North and South America                         |
- Flight by heroes: girl helpers, 3:125, 3:152, 3:171, 4:248, 4:435–36
 “The Flood,” 4:124–36
 “The Fly and the Ant,” 1:134
 Folk beliefs: animal shape-shifters, 2:95; Basque, 3:357; devil in Mexican, 4:389; hag identification, 4:199; hoodoo, 4:203–5; Russian, 3:216; unquiet dead, 3:339
 Folk history, 4:400
 Folk medicine, 4:248
 Folktale: classification, 1:158; fair tales, 3:360; Indo-European central tale types, 2:167; myth distinction, 4:89; traditions, 1:47
 Folk traditions: pow-wow doctors, 4:244
 Folly, 3:36, 4:215
 Food, 1:319, 4:145; fruit, 1:169, 1:176, 3:253
 Fool Dog, 4:67
 Foolishness: fox as trickster, 4:29; husband-wife misunderstanding, 4:411; numskull tale, 2:288; stereotype, 4:220
 Fools: Buchanan, George, 4:440; Jean Sot, 4:215, 4:217, 4:218; trickster success, 4:168; wise, 2:221–33
 Foragers, 1:313
 Forbidden rooms, 3:280
 Forces, 2:28
 Foreign rulers, 1:3
 Forest demon, 2:329
 Forest spirits, 4:453
 “The Forgotten Fiancée,” 4:436
 Forgotten fiancée motif, 3:12
 Formulaic devices, 1:169; closing, 1:106, 1:291; composition, 1:106; endings, 1:176, 4:229; openings, 1:106, 1:274, 4:324, 4:327, 4:415; question-and-answer pattern, 2:152, 2:250
 Formulaic usage: four in Native American groups, 4:124; Polish märchens, 3:139; sacred, 4:40, 4:47
 Fornander, Abraham, 1:380
 “The Forsaken Fiancée: Service as Menial,” 3:77
 Fortune, 4:215
 Fortune telling, 4:183–84
 “The Forty Thieves,” 2:424
 Four (sacred number), 4:3, 4:124, 4:354–55
 Fox, 2:97, 2:126–28, 3:325, 3:334, 4:29–32, 4:182–83; fire-stealer, 4:27
 “Fox and Deer,” 4:29
 “Fox and Kingfisher,” 4:29, 4:30–31, 4:110
 “Fox and Mountain Lion,” 4:29, 4:31
 “Fox and Rabbit,” 4:31–32
 “The Fox and the Lapp,” 3:325
 Foxes, 2:95, 4:284
 Frame story: devices, 1:220–38, 2:203; linking in, 1:228; Sanskrit, 2:184; tall tales, 4:291
 France, 3:360–78, 4:209
 “Frau Hölle,” 3:90, 4:434
 Freedom, 1:147
 Frog god, 1:380–85
 “The Frog Prince,” 2:298–301, 2:298–303
 Frogs, 2:116, 2:121–22, 3:211, 4:456
 “From ‘Gisli the Outlaw,’” 3:303–12
 Fruit: eating piece, 3:253; falling, 1:169, 1:176
 Fugitive accountability, 2:359
 Fuseli, John Henry, 4:199

 Gamblers, 4:124–29
 Gambling for life, 2:268
 Game-cock, 2:367–82
 “Ga’na’a’s Adventures Among the Cherokee,” 4:94–98
 Gardner, Emelyn, 4:253
 Garuda, 2:359
 Gaster, M., 1:242
 Gazelle, 1:78
 Gender, 1:161

 Genealogy: Bantugan, 2:399; mythological, 1:417; mythology role, 1:353; rider claims, 1:372
 Generations, 2:123
 Genesis, 1:42–43, 1:181, 1:196
 “The Genius,” 3:104–9
 Genre: legends. See Animal tales; Fables; Fair tales; Myth; Ordinary folktales
 Geographic features, 3:28
 Geological features, 1:361, 1:393
 Gergasi, 2:329
 “Gerhajis and Arab,” 1:42–43
 German influence, 4:244–57
 Germany, 3:67–95
 Ghana, 1:96; Yoruba culture, 1:124
 “Ghost Legends of the Blue Mountains,” 4:247–48
 “Ghost of the Violet Well,” 2:70–74
 “The Ghost Penitente,” 4:279–80
 Ghosts: corpse seeking, 2:83; obligation fulfillment motif, 2:86; Penitente, 4:279
 Ghouls, 2:83
 “Giant of the Flood,” 1:181–84
 Giants, 3:298; biblical deluge extrapolation, 1:181; cannibal figure, 4:16; cyclops, 3:350; slaying, 3:3; zimwi, 1:55
 “A Giant’s Rock-Throwing,” 1:393–95
 Gift, 1:3, 1:5; animal languages, 3:109; curse of, 2:295; natural, 1:393
 “A Gift for the Sultan,” 1:4–6
 “Gifts for My Son Mohammed,” 1:3–4, 1:5, 3:194
 “The Gifts of the Little People,” 2:32
 Gilbert Islands, 1:353
 “Ginas and the Rajah,” 2:318–20
 Ginzberg, Louis, 1:185
 “The Girl and the Fish,” 4:420–21
 Girls, 1:43–44, 2:250–57, 4:248–51; bewitchment removal, 4:70; helper of hero’s flight, 3:125, 3:152, 3:171, 4:248, 4:435–36; kind/unkind, 1:121, 2:315, 3:18,

- 3:90, 4:434; two, 3:81; waxgirl, 1:78
 "The Girl Without Legs," 1:43–44
 Gladden, George, 4:258
 "The Glass Axe," 3:124–30, 3:125
 Gluttony, 1:80
 Goats, 2:295, 3:109
 Goblins, 2:186–91
 Goblins apparitions, 4:206
 Goblin tales, 2:184
 "God," 4:379–82
 Gods/goddesses: birth of first, 2:62; child of human and underworld, 1:398; creation myth, 1:396; creator, 1:431; Hawaiian nature, 1:369; Hiiaka, 1:361; Lata, 1:331; marriage worthiness, 2:320; mortal women and, 3:231; offspring, 1:380; Pele, 1:361; shape-shifting, 2:17. See also Creators; Deities
 Gold Coast, 1:61
 "The Golden Crab," 3:256–60
 "The Golden Hairpin," 2:86–91
 "The Golden Spinster," 3:120–24
 Golden staffs, 4:315
 Gold mines, 4:268
 Gold trade, 1:61
 "The Good Serpent," 4:309–14
 "The Grain of Corn," 2:291–95
 "Grandfather's Escape to Free Haven," 4:159–61
 "Granny Steel," 4:251
 Grass-cutting sword, 2:64
 Grateful animals. See Animal gratitude
 "The Grateful Animals," 2:195, 3:364
 "The Grateful Beasts," 3:113–19
 "The Grateful Dead," 3:139
 "The Grateful Tartaro and the Heren-suge," 3:350–56
 "The Great Fire Bird," 1:297–99
 Greece, 3:231–60
 Greed, 2:83, 2:264–65, 4:167
 Greek myth, 1:120, 3:231, 3:245
 Greeley, Horace, 4:185
 "The Green Lady," 3:18–21
 Griffin, 3:185
 Grimm, Jacob, 3:67
 Grimm, Wilhelm, 3:67
 Groom, Francis Hinds, 3:174
 Guaraauano. See Warrau
 Guardians, 1:14
 Guardian spirits, 4:98
 "Guarding the Door," 4:411
 Guatemala, 4:357
 Guile, 1:70, 4:206
 Gullibility, 4:168
 Gunfighters of American west, 4:258, 4:275
 "Gylaginning," 3:292
 Gypsies, 3:163, 3:185
 Habitat abandonment, 1:36
 Hag-craft, 4:199
 Hags. See Night hag
 Haida, 4:79–82
 Hair, 1:333
 "Haliwari and the Wonderful Tree," 4:443–46, 4:448
 Hammer, 3:298
 Hanauer, James, 1:241
 Hani al-Hakami, Abu-Nuwas al-Hasan ben, 1:10
 "Hansel and Grettel," 3:67–72, 4:16
 "Hans My Hedgehog," 3:86, 3:275
 Hare, 1:58, 1:68; Japanese folklore, 2:97. See also Rabbit
 "Harisarmen," 2:247–50
 Harris, Joel Chandler, 1:130, 1:152, 4:186, 4:414
 Hartman, C. V., 4:364
 "Háttatal," 3:292
 Haunting, 4:251
 Hausa, 1:98–115
 Hawaii, 1:331, 1:361–96
 Head hunting, 2:309
 Healers: curandero/a, 4:283; magical-religious cures, 4:200; pi'ai, 4:443; pow-wow doctors, 4:244; shaman, 4:338; witch doctors, 4:227
 Heart, 1:300
 Hebrew traditional tale, 1:181–200
 "The Hedgehog and the Rat," 1:35–36
 Hedgehogs, 3:86
 "Hello, house!": Cave Call," 4:367
 Helpers: Anansi, 4:429; animal, 2:359, 3:59, 3:185, 3:261, 4:98–101, 4:102, 4:309; dead men, 2:268, 2:436; girls, 3:125, 3:152, 3:171, 3:435–36, 4:248, 4:435–36; name, 3:120; nuns as, 3:253; ogres, 3:130; spirits in animal guise, 4:327; witches, 3:130
 "Help from Elijah," 1:240
 "The Helpful Horse," 1:45, 3:351
 Hen-sparrow, 2:281–88
 Hercules, 3:231
 Herders, 2:36–58
 Hermit crabs, 2:334
 "Hero Comes into Ogre's Power," 4:436
 Heroes: Bantugan, 2:398–99; cross-cultural motifs, 2:383; Cuchulain, 3:39; dragon-slayer tale type, 3:253; external transformation, 2:107; girl helpers, 3:125, 3:152, 3:171, 4:248, 4:435–36; identity and transformation, 3:139; promised to supernatural figures, 3:125; Raja Rasalu, 2:268; rescue of princess, 2:100; Roldan, 3:339; winning bride, 2:195. See also Culture hero
 "Hero is Driven from Home by His Stepmother," 1:45
 "The Hero Twins," 4:105–10
 Heym, Paul, 4:248
 Hierarchy of powers, 4:374
 Hiiaka, 1:361
 Hina, 1:380
 Hindu influence, 2:342–43
 Hinduism, 2:142
 Hindu theology, 2:133
 Historical accounts, 4:258; Elfego Baca, 4:275; folk history, 4:400; "Victorio's Raid," 4:272–75
 Historical events, 3:292, 4:400
 Historical figures, 1:10; Efik tales, 1:87; Ildris I, 1:16; Omar ibn el Khattâb, 1:213
 Historical narrative, 2:64
 Historical past, 2:16, 3:3
 History: oral transmission, 4:159; sacred, 4:393; shamans and band enmity, 2:51; warring factions, 2:142

Cumulative Index

1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania
2: Asia
3: Europe
4: North and South America

- "History of a Buffalo Hunter," 4:264–67
 "The History of Tom Thumb," 3:21–28
 Hobley, C. W., 1:31
 Hodgetts, Edith M. S., 3:194
 "Holding Down the Hat," 3:194
 "Holding up the Rock," 4:367
 Holy Land. See Palestine
 Holy man, 1:313, 2:203, 4:443
 Honor, 2:70
 Hoodoo, 4:172, 4:200, 4:203–5, 4:258
 Hopi, 4:83–88
 Horokaruru, 2:13
 "On Horseback," 4:214–15
 "The House Carpenter," 1:85, 4:194
 "How a Fox Fell Vicim to His Own Deceit," 2:126–28
 "How Ananse Tales Got Their Name," 1:61–62, 4:405
 "How a Small Kamak Was Transformed into a Harpoon Line," 2:105–7
 "How Brer Fox Dream He Eat Possum," 4:165, 4:409
 "How Brer Rabbit Brings Dust Out of the Rock," 4:187–89
 "How Brer Rabbit Practice Medicine," 4:168–70, 4:209
 "How Brothers and Sisters Came to Quarrel," 1:106–8
 "How Come Brer Bear Sleeps in the Winter," 4:161–62
 "How Come Mr. Buzzard to Have a Bald Head," 1:61, 4:163–64, 4:405
 "How Come Pigs Can See the Wind," 4:186–87
 "How Jáburu Ate the Seed of Our Kin," 3:353–54
 "How Man Made Woman Respect Him," 4:324–25
 "How Pain, Misery, and Death Came into the World," 4:448, 4:453–54
 "How Rabbi Joshua Went to Paradise Alive," 3:142–43
 "How Shango Hanged Himself and What Resulted," 1:124–26
 "How Sibû Killed Sórkura," 4:354–56
 "How Some Wild Animals Became Tame Ones," 3:313–16
 "How the Deer Obtained His Horns," 4:45–47
 "How the Devil Married Three Sisters," 3:280–82
 "How the Elves Punished a Quarrelsome Man," 4:387–89
 "How the Elves Put a Holy Father and His Sacristan to Flight," 4:391–92
 "How the First Bribri Indians Were Born," 4:351–52
 "How the Man Fooled the Tiger," 4:454–55
 "How the Raja's Son Won the Princess Labam," 2:195–202
 "How Theseus Slew the Devourers of Men," 1:120, 3:231–44, 3:253
 "How the Stalos Were Tricked," 3:316–21, 3:324
 "How the Twins Killed the Giant Elk," 4:84–85
 "How the Twins Visited the Sun," 4:83–84
 "How the Whites Became Rich," 4:54–56
 "How the Wicked Tankuki Was Punished," 2:94–96
 "How Thunder Came for the First Time," 1:126–28
 "How Tiyo Punished Man-Eagle," 4:85–88
 "How to Choose a Wife," 1:47–48
 "How Turtle Deceived Leopard into Eating His Own Mother," 1:74–75
 "How Turtle Inherited Leopard's Goods," 1:71–72
 "How Turtle's Greed Brought Him to a Sad End," 1:75–77
 "How We Beat the Caribs," 4:450–51
 Hufford, David, 4:199
 Human beings: animal disguise, 1:57; animal metamorphosis, 4:447; animal tricksters, 1:75; bears, 4:89; birth of first, 2:62; children by gods, 3:231; children of animals, 4:376; fire acquisition, 1:297; hunting of heads, 2:309; immortals and, 4:43; instruction by culture hero, 4:304; kinship to bears, 4:40; linkage to gods, 1:417; non-human boundary, 4:89; opposed by animal world, 3:352; origin, 2:40, 2:261, 3:351; pacts with superhuman, 3:357; spirits of deceased, 1:67; tricksters, 3:316
 Human flesh, 2:83, 2:105
 Humanity, 1:396, 4:353
 Human persistence, 1:108
 Human relationships, 4:25
 Humor, 1:218, 3:36
 Hunchbacks, 1:223
 Hungary, 3:96–138
 Hunger, 2:128
 Hunters, 4:57; animals granting success, 4:40; kindness repayment, 4:330; relationship with wolf, 4:33; white deer legend, 4:228
 Hunting, 2:262; animal competitors, 1:64; buffalo, 4:264; luck, 4:232; tall tale, 4:240
 Hunting and gathering: Ainu, 2:3; Australian Aborigines, 1:297; dog use, 4:50; life-way information, 1:313; Warrau, 4:50
 Husbands: animal, 2:362, 3:86; animal wife motif, 2:320; cruel, 4:448; foolish misunderstanding, 4:411; gender differences, 4:423; respect for, 4:324; saving life of, 2:133; supernatural abduction, 2:24; treacherous, 4:450
 Huts of witches, 3:212
 Hutton, H., 2:263
 Hyena, 1:108
 Ianu, 2:14
 Iberian Peninsula, 1:14
 Iceland, 3:292–312

- Identity: Basque, 3:339; devil, 4:389; heroes transformation, 3:139
- Idris ibn 'Abd Allah ibn Hassan II, 1:16
- Idrisid Dynasty, 1:16
- "Ifa," 1:129–30
- Ile Ife, 1:124
- Illanun, 2:307
- Ill omens, 4:354–55
- Immigrants: detached souls
functions, 3:144; Irish, 3:49;
tradition preservation, 1:251
- Impiety: afterlife punishment, 2:83;
all-encompassing destruction,
3:61; consequences of, 2:311
- Inca, 4:299, 4:301, 4:304, 4:315–23
- Incantations, 4:41–42
- Incarnations, 2:156
- India, 2:133–260; Nagaland,
2:261–67
- Indian Ocean, 1:56–57
- Indigenous categories, 1:87
- Indirect direction, 4:170, 4:212;
rhetorical device, 4:170
- Indo-European folktales, 1:43,
1:169, 2:167
- Indonesia, 2:338–82; Madagascar,
1:33
- Inference strategy, 2:301
- Infidelity, 2:110
- Initiation ceremony, 1:313, 1:322
- In-laws, 2:186–91
- Innocence, 3:285
- Innocent parties, 2:336, 2:430
- Integrity: gratitude repayment,
3:113; husband demonstration,
2:320; reward for, 2:191
- Intelligence, 1:253, 4:188, 4:417
- Intentional fictions, 1:33
- International distribution: hero
winning bride, 2:195; legend motifs, 2:268; sham wise man,
2:247
- "In the Beginning," 2:28–30,
3:293–96
- Inuit, 4:70
- Ireland, 3:39–53
- Iroquois bird, 1:126
- Iroquois League, 4:89–101
- Irving, Washington, 4:247
- Ishhak, 1:42
- Islam, 2:307; Bedouin culture,
1:179; Hausa people, 1:98; Indonesia, 2:342–43; Morocco, 1:12;
political structures, 1:45; power
structure, 1:5; scholarship,
3:390; Somalia, 1:42
- Islamic folktales, 1:42; Nasrudin,
1:7; Palestinian, 1:213–37
- Islamic influence: Borneo, 2:307;
Mindanao, 2:398–99; Philippines, 2:419; Spain, 3:385; Swa-
hili people, 1:49
- Islamic scholars, 1:216
- Islands, 2:156
- Isleta Pueblo, 4:102–11
- "The Isolated Island," 2:66–69
- Israel, 1:181–200
- Italy, 3:261–82
- "Ivanoushka the Simpleton,"
3:201–11
- Izanagi, 2:62
- Jack, 4:232
- Jackal, 1:58, 1:144, 1:149, 2:152,
2:267, 2:301
- "The Jackal as Schoolmaster,"
3:285
- "Jack and His Golden Snuff-box,"
3:163–70
- "Jack and the Bean-pole," 4:16,
4:189–91
- "Jack and the Beanstalk," 3:12,
4:189
- "Jack and the Devil Errant,"
4:435–39
- "Jack and the Fire Dragaman,"
4:16, 4:236–40
- "Jack My Hedge Hog," 3:85–89,
3:275
- "Jack-O'-My-Lantern," 4:205–8
- "Jack's Hunting Trip," 4:240–43
- Jack (slave), 4:183–84
- Jack tales, 4:188, 4:229
- "Jack the Giant-killer," 3:3–12
- Jade Emperor, 2:30
- Jaguar, 4:376, 4:446–47, 4:455
- "Jake Strauss," 4:251–52
- Jamaica, 4:405, 4:423–40
- "James Harris," 1:85, 4:194
- Japan, 2:3, 2:59–104
- "Jauw's Dream," 4:327–29
- Java, 2:342–43
- Jean Sot, 4:215, 4:218
- "Jean Sot and the Cowhide,"
4:215–17
- "Jean Sot Feeds Cows Needles,"
4:217–18
- "Jean Sot Kills the Duck," 4:218–19
- Jellyfish, 2:80–83
- Jenks, Albert Ernest, 4:136–37
- Jewish folktales: Ashkenazim,
3:141–48; Sephardim, 3:379–84
- Jewish quarter, 1:16
- Jews, 1:14, 1:45, 1:223, 1:238
- Jicarilla Apache, 4:25–32
- "Jikininki," 2:83–86
- Jinn, 1:24, 1:220, 1:268
- "The Jinns," 1:24–25
- John and Master cycle, 4:183
- Johnson, Robert, 4:186
- "John the Bear," 4:376
- John the Fool, 4:215
- "John Tiger," 4:376–79
- Jokes: pretentiousness, 4:391;
regional stereotypes, 4:220–21;
romantic rivals, 4:174; stock
character, 4:220; trickster,
3:148, 4:219
- Journeys to underworld, 2:62,
4:380, 4:443
- Juan Puson, 2:427
- "Juan Pusong," 2:430–35
- "Juan the Fool," 2:427–28
- Judaism, 1:179
- "The Judge Appropriates the Object of Dispute," 2:195, 3:325
- Judges, 2:152–56, 4:330
- "Judgments of Karakash," 1:218–20
- Justice: bone searching out, 4:412–
13; explanatory plots, 4:409;
murder victim, 2:181; outwitting
of, 2:133; poetic, 4:191; raven as agent of, 4:145; secret societies,
1:83; traditional peoples, 4:19;
trickster success, 4:168; when
bewitched, 4:255
- Kabbala, 1:238
- "Kadiwonkuru: A Legend of the Yaurokya," 1:319–21
- Kaingag. See Caingang
- Kalahari Desert, 1:137

Cumulative Index

- |                                                    |
|----------------------------------------------------|
| 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania |
| 2: Asia                                            |
| 3: Europe                                          |
| 4: North and South America                         |
- Kamak, 2:105
 “Kampuaa Legends: Legends of the Hog God,” 1:380–93
 “Kampuaa on Oahu and Kauai,” 1:385–89
 “Kanati and Selu: The Origin of Corn and Game,” 4:33–39, 4:45
 “Kantjil the Mouse Deer,” 2:364–67
 “Karamunagau,” 1:339–41
 “Kara Mustapha the Hero,” 1:287–91
 Karna, 2:142
 Kashgar, 1:223
 Kauravas, 2:142
 Kenharingan, 2:307
 Kenya, 1:49
 “The Kind and the Unkind Girls,” 1:121, 2:315, 3:18, 3:90, 4:434
 Kindness sibling motif, 2:313, 2:315
 Kind/unkind, 1:121, 3:18, 3:90, 4:434
 King, 2:184–85; animal speech, 3:109; billy goats, 3:109; curing of, 3:390; pig, 3:274–80; of snakes, 3:253; swab maiden, 3:185–89
 “The King and the Four Girls,” 2:250–57
 “The King and the Ju Ju Tree,” 1:92–95
 Kingfisher, 4:30
 “King of the Snakes,” 3:253
 “King Pig,” 3:274–80
 Kings, 2:152, 2:295
 “King Thunderbeard,” 3:266
 “The King Who Learned the Speech of Animals,” 2:301–3, 3:109
 Kinship: Bantugan, 2:399; bears to humans, 4:40; bond violation, 1:35–36; female lineage, 4:3–4; in-law roles, 1:322; legends, 2:67; maternal uncles, 1:345
 Kintyèli, 4:124
 Kiribati, 1:353–57
 “The Knights of the Fish,” 3:385–90
 “Kolbein’s Killing,” 3:307–9
 “Komatari, the First Medicine Man,” 4:338–41
 Kôn, 1:67
 Konehu cycle, 4:343
 Koryak, 2:105–12
 Kroeber, A. L., 4:54
 Kshatriyas, 2:152
 Kurdistan, 1:201
 Kurds, 1:201–13
 Kusanagi-no-Tsurgi (sword), 2:59
 Kuyimokuna, 1:300–301

 Labeled pointing attacks, 1:300
 “La Belle aux Cheveux d’Or,” 1:242
 “The Lad Who Knew Everything,” 3:109–13
 “Lady Featherflight,” 3:12–18
 Lake Titicaca, 4:301
 Lakota, 4:112–20
 Làloména, 1:36
 “Lame Habiyó,” 1:45
 Land of dead. See Underworld
 “Langaon,” 2:323–28
 Language of animals, 2:295, 2:301, 3:109
 Lapin, 4:209, 4:212, 4:214
 Lapin and Bouqui cycle, 4:209
 Lapland, 3:321–24
 “Lata and Sinota,” 1:331–32
 Law, 2:133, 4:19
 Lebanon, 1:213
 Legal system, 1:218
 “The Legend of Maui,” 1:398–416
 “The Legend of Savaddan Lake,” 3:61–63
 “Legend of the Breadfruit Tree,” 1:368–72
 Legends, 1:313, 4:301; animal world, 4:448; Arabic origin, 1:12; Arawak-Carib enmity, 4:450; Baca, Elfego, 4:275; boy initiation, 1:313, 1:322; classification, 2:16; colonial enmity, 2:367; common functions, 3:28; duende behavior, 4:391; environmental features, 1:393; Faust, 3:160; functions of, 2:66–67; ghost, 4:247–48; hag belief, 4:199; haunting, 4:251; human-supernatural intersection, 3:357; Jewish Middle Easterners, 1:238; Kurdish tradition, 1:201; local, 4:252; lost islands, 2:66; lost treasure and gold mines, 4:268; narrative of origin, 4:13; night hag cycle, 4:225; northwest native people crests, 4:79; origin narrative, 4:13; prophet in, 4:297; Raja Rasalu in, 2:268; regional rivalries, 2:367; resistance to foreign forces, 3:339; selling soul to devil, 4:186; spirits of deceased, 1:67; supernatural, 1:24, 1:310, 2:16, 2:70, 2:74, 2:86, 3:357, 4:387; survival, 3:147; sword, 2:64; tale classification, 1:87; tale time, 4:89; tragic lovers, 3:178; trickster, 1:241; unseen animal helpers, 4:98–101; Victorio raid, 4:273; witchcraft and curing, 4:281; witch practices, 4:227
 Le Jumel de Barneville, Marie-Catherine, 3:364
 Leopard, 1:70–77, 1:144
 “The Leopard in the Maize Farm,” 1:78–79
 Liars, 4:285, 4:291
 Lies, 4:291
 Life: gambling for, 2:268; saving of husband’s, 2:133; seed origins of, 4:353; water of, 1:242
 “Ligat Liou,” 2:313, 2:315–18
 Lineage: clan, 4:3–4, 4:79, 4:140; family divine, 2:59; female, 4:3–4; hereditary, 4:79; Luo myth, 1:29; Somalia, 1:42
 Lines of descent, 1:345
 Linguistic relationships, 1:30–31
 Linking devices, 1:228
 “The Lion and the Jackal,” 1:144–46, 3:285, 4:343
 “The Lion and the Unicorn,” 1:287, 4:232–36
 Lions, 4:232–36
 “Little-Bird-Man and Raven-Man,” 2:107–10
 “Little Brother and Little Sister,” 1:260

- “The Little Hunchback,” 1:223–28
 Little John, 4:219
 “Little One Left Alive (Che-Che-Puy-Ew-Tis),” 4:57–62
 “The Little Red Ox,” 3:58
 Living and dead, 2:86
 Lizard, 1:319, 1:353
 “The Lizard Husband,” 2:361–64
 Localization: Cinderella variant, 4:382; folktale variant, 4:189; foreign tales, 1:176; legend acceptance, 3:160; märchen plot, 4:236; supernatural legends, 2:86
 Local legends, 4:252
 Lockheart, Sol, 4:200
 Lodges, 4:112
 Loki, 3:298–99
 “The Long-Legs,” 4:374–75
 Longley, Bill, 4:258
 Los Hermanos Penitente, 4:279
 Loss of innocence, 1:196
 Lost children, 4:89
 Lost islands, 2:66
 Lost love, 1:282
 Lost siblings, 2:359
 Lost treasure, 4:268
 Louisiana, 4:209
 Love: quest for women, 1:420; separation and true, 2:100; suitor sensibility and, 3:373
 Lovers, 3:178, 4:118–20
 Luck, 4:229, 4:232, 4:425
 “Lucky Jack,” 4:229–32
 “The Lucky Shot,” 4:240
 Luguna Pueblo, 4:106
 Luhya, 1:29–32
 Lummis, Charles, 4:106
 Luxman, 2:159–67

 Macaw, 4:358–64
 Madagascar, 1:33–41
 “Made Over to the Devil,” 3:170–73
 “Mafua,” 1:428–30
 Magic, 2:383; contagious, 3:216; creator gods, 1:431; healer cures, 4:200; Kabbala, 1:238; Sami people, 3:321–24; saving from wild, 2:262; of song, 4:431; sympathetic, 4:227
 Magical devices: fiddles, 1:147; singing, 1:158; swords, 3:96; tricksters, 1:78
 Magical objects, 2:268; acquisition, 2:116; hero use, 2:195
 Magical powers: restoration, 1:43; resuscitation, 3:385; transformations, 1:310
 “The Magic Fiddle,” 2:181–84
 Magicians, 3:21
 “The Magic Object is Stolen from the Hero but He Forces Its Return,” 2:176
 Magic-religious practice, 4:283
 Magic remedies, 3:390
 “The Magic Ring,” 2:176, 3:104
 Magpie Man, 2:110–12
 Magyars, 3:96
The Mahabharata (scripture), 2:133, 2:142
 Maidens, 3:216, 4:76, 4:136–37
 Majapahit Empire, 2:342
 “Making a Rope of Sand,” 2:319, 3:28
 Makunaima, 4:456
 Malabasy culture, 1:33
 Malaysia, 2:383–86
 Male creator, 4:332
 Malevolent beings, 1:310, 1:319
 Malice, 3:81
 Malicious spirits, 1:24
 Malignant spirit, 1:333
 Manabozho, 4:124
 “Manco Capac,” 4:301–2, 4:302
 “A Man Deceives a Women,” 2:185, 2:203–21, 3:275
 Mandra-mankana, 1:301
 “Mandra-Mankana, Also Called Bakuta-Terkana-Tarana or Kantayulkana,” 1:301–3
 Man-eagle, 4:85–88
 Man-eater, 3:231, 4:16–18
 Manhood initiation, 1:313, 1:322
 “The Man in the Moon,” 2:13, 2:14–15
 “Manoli,” 3:178–81
 “The Man Persecuted Because of His Beautiful Wife,” 1:265
 Mantis, 1:154
 “The Mantis Assumes the Form of a Hartebeest,” 1:137, 1:154–57

 “The Man Who Flew Like a Bird and Swam Like a Fish,” 3:139
 “A Man with a Wife Who Could Change Herself into a Wild Animal,” 1:119–20
 “Many Wise Fools,” 2:185, 2:203, 2:221–33, 3:275
 Maori, 1:396
 Märchen, 4:236, 4:415
 Marginality, 4:4, 4:33–34, 4:102
 Maritime trade, 1:56–57
 Maroons, 4:324–31, 4:343
 Marriage: to animals, 1:57; Bluebeard plot, 3:360; conclusion merger, 2:419; devil, 3:280; Efik customs, 1:82–83; father/son to mother/daughter, 2:191–95; female deity, 2:30; magical restoration, 1:43; strife, 1:5; trickster, 4:75–76
 Mason County War, 4:258
 Masquerade figure, 1:83
 Massachusetts, 1:176
 Matthews, Washington, 4:124
 Maui, 1:398
 Maxims, 4:425
 Maya, 4:357–66, 4:397
 “The Maya Creation,” 4:357–58
 Medicine: knowledge, 4:85–86; pow-wowing, 4:248
 Mediterranean Europe, 3:229–82
 Melanesia, 1:329–49
 Men, 1:158, 2:92
 “The Merchant of Venice,” 1:52
 Merchants: tale telling, 1:52
 Merlin, 3:21
 Metamorphosis: animal/human/animal, 4:447
 “Meteor Hell! Cicero Done It,” 4:285–90
 Mexico, 4:349–401, 4:367–92
 Mice, 2:128–30
 Micronesia, 1:351–57
 Middle East, 1:49, 1:167–293, 1:223, 1:251
 Migration: Carib, 4:453; Navajo to Southwest, 4:124; ocean, 1:396; Pipil oral history, 4:397; Plains natives, 4:112
 Military epics, 2:74
 “The Miller at the Professor’s Examination,” 3:35–38

Cumulative Index

- |                                                    |
|----------------------------------------------------|
| 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania |
| 2: Asia                                            |
| 3: Europe                                          |
| 4: North and South America                         |
- Mina, 1:297
Mindanao, 2:398–99
Minotaur, 3:231
Miracle worker, 1:240
“A Miraculous Sword,” 2:59, 2:64–66
“Miti’ and Magpie Man,” 2:110–12
Mizrahim, 1:238
Modernization of folktales, 4:189
Moldavia, 3:178
Mole, 4:86
Money, 3:54
Monkey, 2:267, 2:428–30, 4:405
“The Monkey and the Jackal,” 2:267
“The Monkey and the Jellyfish,” 2:80–83
“The Monkey and the Tortoise,” 2:415–19
“The Monkey’s Fiddle,” 1:147–48
“Monkey Who Left His Heart at Home,” 2:80
Monks, 2:184–85
Monsters, 1:282; cleansing environment of, 1:324, 4:124; garuda, 2:359; griffin, 3:185; man-eagle, 4:85; slaying of, 4:34; stupid, 3:316–17, 3:351; trickster skills over, 4:53; twins cleansing from, 4:84, 4:148; wit over, 1:282
Monster-slayer: tricksters, 4:16–17; twins, 4:84, 4:148; youthful, 1:120
Moon, 2:97, 4:385
Mooney, James, 4:47
Moon gods, 4:359
Moralistic tales, 4:380
Morality: comic misunderstanding, 1:223; Pueblo view, 4:110
Moral lessons, 2:203
Morals: code synthesis, 2:343; fable personifications, 2:436; fables, 1:112; goals, 2:396; origin explanations, 1:306; precepts, 1:33, 1:116
“More Cunning than Father,” 4:425–28
Morocco, 1:12–25
“The Mosquito’s Village,” 2:313–14
Mother, 1:106, 1:158; boasting, 3:120; eating of fruit, 3:253; marriage, 2:191–95. See also Stepmother
“Mother Goose,” 3:360
“Mother Holle,” 3:89–92, 4:253
Mothers-in-law, 1:322
Motif, 2:359; animal gratitude, 2:176, 2:268, 2:277, 2:429, 2:436, 3:113, 3:364, 4:329–30; black ship sails, 3:253; cleansing of world, 1:324, 3:231, 4:84, 4:124, 4:148, 4:359; combinations, 4:385; concealing murder, 4:343; creation myth, 2:62; cross-cultural, 1:45; cruel stepmother, 1:119, 1:260, 2:167, 3:18; “Dead Man as Helper,” 2:436; defiance by young women, 4:76; devil’s questions test, 4:194; disguise and trickery, 1:57; disguised deities, 4:315; divided villages, 4:148; eating fruit, 3:253; “Enmity of Fowl and Cockroach,” 4:430; exchanges, 4:121–22; “Exposure in a Boat,” 2:383; expulsion by stepmother, 1:45; fire making, 4:13; folly turned to fortune, 4:215; forgotten fiancée, 3:12; ghost obligation fulfillment, 2:86; “The Girl as Helper in the Hero’s Flight,” 3:12, 3:125, 3:152, 3:171, 4:248, 4:435–36; human/animal spouse transformation, 2:320; Indo-European central, 2:167; legend international, 2:268; lost islands, 2:66; magic power of song, 4:431; magic sword, 3:96; obstacle flight, 2:62, 2:298, 4:118, 4:194, 4:385; ocean migration, 4:13; rescue from supernatural abduction, 2:24; tale classification, 1:87; theft of food, 4:409; tragic event signs, 4:448; transformation into stones, 4:319; treacherous husband, 4:450; trickster cousins, 3:49; trickster shape-shifting, 4:170; twin, 1:347, 4:456; two siblings, 2:313; underworld symbolism, 3:152; unnatural suitor, 1:85; weak animal deceives larger, 2:121; “What Is in the Dish: Poor Crab,” 4:184; witch, 3:216; younger brothers, 2:245
Motivations: Anansi, 4:429; stupidity, 4:218; tricksters, 2:329, 4:175, 4:214
Mountain lion, 4:31
“Mountain of the Bell,” 1:179–80
Mountain spirits, 4:247
Mount Yoshino, 2:70
Mouse, 2:128
Mouse deer, 2:328–37, 2:364–67
“The Mouse Deer and Crocodile,” 2:366–67
“The Mouse Deer and the Bear,” 2:333
“The Mouse Deer and the Crocodile,” 2:335–36
“The Mouse Deer and the Giant,” 2:328–32
“The Mouse Deer and the Hermit Crab,” 2:334–35
“The Mouse Deer and the Tiger,” 2:332–33, 2:364–65
“The Mouse Deer in a Hole,” 2:336–37
“The Mouse Deer, Tiger, and Ape,” 2:365–66
Mozambique: Swahili people, 1:49
“Mr. Deer’s My Riding Horse,” 4:173–75, 4:214
“Mr. Hard Time,” 4:411–12
Much Ado About Nothing (Shakespeare), 3:34
Mules, 4:212–14
Mullah, 1:42
Mullah Nasrudin, 1:6–9
Münchhausen, Karl Friedrich Hieronymus von, 4:291
Munsumundok, 2:307
Mura-mura, 1:300, 1:301, 1:319
“The Mura-Mura Darana,” 1:308–9
Murder: avengers and justice, 4:19; bone accusation, 4:412–13; curse for, 3:304; justice, 2:181; trickster concealment, 4:343

- Musician: unclean occupation, 2:181
 Muslim prohibitions, 1:12
 Muslims, 1:241
 Myanmar, 2:261
 "My Son Ali," 1:176–78
 "The Mysterious Deer," 4:228–29
 Mystical figures, 1:216
 Myth, 1:125, 1:158, 2:261, 4:297, 4:301; Ananse characteristics, 1:96; anthropomorphic culture hero, 1:300; birth from spittle, 4:364; cosmological, 1:396; creation, 2:307, 2:338, 4:124–29, 4:357; creators, 1:301; criteria, 3:3; deity-herdsman marriage, 2:30; deluge, 4:306; divided vil-lages, 4:148; divination systems, 1:129; earliest times, 2:388, 2:396; environmental features, 1:393; events time making, 1:324; evil spirits, 2:105; fire acquisition, 1:297, 4:64; folktale distinction, 4:89; Haggada and biblical, 1:196; hunting rituals, 4:40; impiety, 2:311; infidelity and spousal revenge, 2:110; jour-ney to underworld, 1:372; line-age, 1:417; lodge rites, 4:112; Luo, 1:29; Native American, 4:67; northwest native people, 4:79; omen origins, 4:354–55; origin, 1:29, 1:137, 1:353, 2:28, 2:40, 4:3, 4:13, 4:25, 4:73, 4:302, 4:341, 4:351; plant life, 4:353; power of holy men/ healers, 4:443; prayer wand, 2:14; rabbit-big man-eater, 4:18; ritual preparation for, 4:33; ruler genealogy, 1:372; sacred history, 4:393; sacred plants, 4:397; searching for sun, 4:76; self-brought-up-man, 2:13; shaman rituals, 4:338; spirit origin, 1:335, 1:339; subsistence staples, 1:161; sword, 2:59, 2:64; tale classification, 1:87, 4:423; tattoo origins, 1:425; trickster, 1:303, 2:107, 4:45–47; turtle messen-gers, 2:80; twin culture heroes, 4:106, 4:359, 4:456; volcanic activity, 1:361; world view, 3:352
 Mythical creatures, 3:185, 4:387
 Mythology, 1:380; cosmological, 1:396; dividing and ordering process, 2:309; genealogy, 1:353, 1:417; Greek, 1:120, 3:231, 3:245; Hindu, 2:133–44; Norse, 3:292, 3:298–99; Polynesian, 1:417; Yoruba, 1:124. See also Creation myth; Origin myths
 Na Areean, 1:353
 Naga, 2:261–67
 Nagas, 2:116
 Naiveté, 3:285
 "The Name of the Helper," 3:120
 Names of stock characters, 1:5
 Naming of species, 4:304
 Nancy, 4:405, 4:407, 4:429
 "Nancy and the Honey Tree," 1:61, 4:405–7
 "Nancy Fools His Wife," 1:61, 4:326, 4:407–8
 Narrative, 1:345, 2:80; allegorical class, 1:253; animal husband, 2:362; animal tale functions, 3:313; fairy tales as literary, 3:360; faithful servant, 2:159; frame tales, 2:184–85; god first person usage, 2:17; historical, 4:400; historical and shamanic, 2:51; infidelity and spousal revenge, 2:110; legends, 1:241; localization, 1:176; location, 2:13; origin, 4:25; origins, 4:13; personal experience, 3:141, 3:144, 3:339; plot amalga-mation, 1:242; question-and-answer pattern, 2:250; religious fiction, 1:223; sacred songs, 2:3; sacred sword, 2:64; spirits and shamans, 2:36; supernatural beings in, 1:268; traditional rites, 2:59; trickster role reversal, 2:97
 Narrator, 1:169, 4:285; first person, 2:13, 2:16
 Narwhal, 4:72
 Nasrudin, 1:6–7
 Natchez, 4:121–23
 Native Caribbeans, 4:441–51
 Native North America, 4:1–155
 Native North American influence, 4:327
 Native North Americans: hunting by Plains, 4:50; tame and wild brother narratives, 4:33–34; transvestites, 4:13; Two-Faces character, 4:53; Yoruba culture, 1:124
 Native North American traditions: bears in, 4:89; youthful monster-slayers, 1:120
 Natural forces, 1:124, 2:17
 Natural order adherence, 4:420
 Natural phenomenon, 1:369
 Nature spirits, 2:59
 Navajo, 4:124–29
 Negev, Israel, 1:179
 Netherlands, 2:367
 "Never Tell the Things of Taboo You Happen to See," 1:67–68
 Newell, William Wells, 4:206, 4:247
 New Zealand, 1:396–416
 Nezahualpilli, 4:400
 Nicholas, Francis C., 4:297
 Nigeria, 1:87
 Night hag, 4:199, 4:225
 "The Night Owl and His Bat Brothers-in-law," 4:341–42
Nights with Uncle Remus (Chandler), 4:186
 Nikitine, B., 1:201
 "The Nix of the Mill Pond," 3:92
 "The Nixy," 3:92–95
 Nkondi, 1:78
 Nobility: boyard, 3:182; clan divi-sion, 1:42; clans and crests, 4:79
 Nomadic peoples: Australian, 1:297; Bedoin, 1:179; Caingang, 4:306–8; Cheyenne, 4:54; Chuk-chee, 2:36; Crow, 4:67; Lakota, 4:112; San, 1:137; Warrau, 4:332
 Nonhuman-human boundary, 4:89
 Nonsense phrases, 1:291
 "Noqoilpi, the Gambler: A Navajo Myth," 4:124–29
 Nordic countries, 3:283–335
 Norse mythology, 3:292, 3:298–99
 North America, 4:1–294; ethnic borrowing, 4:174; non-native ethnic cultures, 4:157–221

Cumulative Index

- |                                                    |
|----------------------------------------------------|
| 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania |
| 2: Asia                                            |
| 3: Europe                                          |
| 4: North and South America                         |
- North Carolina, 4:163
 Northeastern Woodlands, 4:124
 Northern Africa, 1:1–25, 3:385; Sephardim, 1:14
 Northwest Coast native cultures, 4:79–82, 4:140
 Norway, 3:304, 3:321–24
 Novella, 1:43, 1:420
 Nubians, 1:5
 Nuhua, 4:393–401
 “Numskulls Unable to Count Their Own Number,” 2:288
 Numskull tale, 2:288–90; Aggies, 4:220; Boudreaux, 4:220; Jean Sot, 4:215, 4:217; Juan Puson, 2:427
 “Numskull Talks to Himself and Frightens Robbers Away,” 4:215
 Núnñē’hi, 4:43
 Nuns, 3:253

 Oath of secrecy, 2:320, 4:447
 Obligations and generational tension, 2:123
 Obstacle flight, 2:62, 2:298, 4:118, 4:194, 4:385
 Occult, 1:24, 4:172
 Occupations, 2:70, 2:181
 Oceania, 1:295–432, 1:331
 Ocean migration, 4:13
 ‘Off with the rat’s head,’ 1:106
 Og, 1:181
 “Ogre Carries Sham Dead Man,” 4:455
 Ogres, 3:317; cautionary tales, 2:262; folktale classification, 1:158; helper role, 3:130; hospitality to, 4:236; stupid, 3:350–51
 “The Ogre’s Tasks,” 4:436
 Ojibwa, 4:130–39
 “The Old Bride Chosen,” 4:436
 Old people, 2:388, 2:396
 Old stories, 4:422
 Old women, 4:199

 Omar ibn el Khattāb, 1:213
 Omens, 4:354–55
One Thousand and One Nights, 1:10, 1:220, 2:184, 2:419, 3:275
 “One Thousand Rubles,” 3:148
 Onondaga, 4:89
 Openings, 1:106, 1:274, 2:329, 2:338, 4:324, 4:327, 4:415
 Opportunism, 3:334
 Oral histories of families, 4:159
 Oral performance, 3:171
 Oral tradition: anxieties, 3:360; epic transmission, 2:74; formulaic composition, 1:106; Haggada creation narrative, 1:185; Hausa people, 1:98; lost islands, 2:66; Pipil migration, 4:397
 “The Order of the Hideous Masked Persons, and How They Met Their Fate,” 1:120–21
 Ordinary folktales, 4:253, 4:255, 4:367, 4:376, 4:385, 4:435–39; allegorical class, 1:253; blind learns secrets, 3:113; “The Cannibal Mother and Her Children,” 1:158; complexity and episodes, 2:383; contrasts and parallelism, 3:67; cross-cultural motif, 1:45; dwarf’s gift, 2:32; faithful servant, 2:159; “The Fish Lover,” 4:420; formulaic devices, 1:169; genre elements, 4:253; justice not done, 4:255; “The Kind and Unkind Girls,” 2:315; learning fear variant, 1:257; localization and modernization, 4:189; multiepisodic, 2:274; plot amalgamation, 1:242; plot inversion, 2:298; pre-Columbian/European blend, 4:309; prisoner freedom, 1:147; rescue from supernatural abduction, 2:24; social status elevation, 3:73; stolen magic objects and return, 2:176; threes in, 3:201; transformation in, 3:185; trickster perseverance, 1:251
 Origin: of human beings, 2:261; of predators, 2:311; of sacred objects, 1:308; of sacred plants, 4:397; of sea mammals, 4:74; of serpent figonas, 1:335, 1:339; of social practices, 1:303; of species characteristics, 1:303; of women, 4:423
 Origin myths: Birbri, 4:351; deluge, 4:306; foces, 2:28; Norse, 3:293–96; old people in, 2:388; raven as self-created one, 2:40; San, 1:137; Warrau, 4:341
 “Origin of Acoma,” 1:324, 4:3–12, 4:34, 4:102
 “Origin of Fire,” 4:27–28
 “Origin of Tattooing,” 1:428
 “Origin of the Adlet and the Whiteman,” 4:73–75
 “Origin of the Alabama Indians,” 4:13–16
 “Origin of the Apaches,” 4:25–27
 “The Origin of the Calabash Tree and the Tobacco Plant,” 4:397–98
 “Origin of the Ja-Luo,” 1:29–30
 “The Origin of the Narwhal,” 4:72–73
 “Origin of the Spider,” 1:108–11
 “The Origin of Woman,” 4:423–24
 “Origins,” 1:137–43
 Orphans, 2:262
 Otohime, 2:80
 Ottoman Empire, 1:238, 3:96
 Outcasts, 2:70
 Outlaw hero, 4:162
 “Outwitting the King,” 1:251–53, 1:253
 “The Owl,” 2:3, 2:13–14
 Owl god, 2:3
 Owls, 4:284, 4:341

 Pacts with devil, 4:186
 Padamelon, 1:303
 Pakistan, 2:268–90
 Palestine, 1:181; Islamic, 1:213–37; Jewish, 1:238–50
 Pandavas, 2:142
 P’an Ku, 2:28
 Papa, 1:369
 Papa-tu-a-nuku, 1:398
 Paradise, 2:338
 Parent defiance, 4:76
 Parodies, 1:218
 Parrot, 2:167
 “Paul Heym, the Wizard of Lebanon,” 4:248

- Peach Tree villages, 4:13
 Peasant trickster, 3:194
 Pele, 1:361
 "Pele and Kamapuaa," 1:309–93
 "Pele's Long Sleep," 1:361–68
 Pennsylvania German folktales, 4:244–57
 Performance: cumulative tale, 2:291; formulaic closing, 1:176; narration devices, 1:176; values of folk, 1:33
 Peris, 1:282
 Perrault, Charles, 3:360, 3:364
 Perseverance, 1:251, 3:77
 Persia, 1:220, 1:264, 3:379
 Persian origins, 1:5
 Personal experience narratives: battle legends, 3:339; buffalo hunting, 4:264; classification, 2:16; cultural traditions, 3:141; detached souls, 3:144; goblin apparitions, 4:206; religious, 4:200; root/two-headed doctors, 4:202–3; Southwest gun-fighters, 4:258; tall tales, 4:240; witch, 4:244
 Personality traits, 4:174
 Personal narratives, 4:159
 Personal protectors, 2:16
 Personification, 2:62, 2:436
 Peru, 4:299
 "Peter Ox," 3:285–88
 Philippines, 2:388–438
 "Phoebe Ward, Witch," 4:225–26
 Physical strength, 1:310
 Pia, 4:456
 Piai, 4:443
 Pigs, 1:347, 3:274–80, 4:186
 "The Pig with the Golden Bristles," 3:202
 Pipil, 4:397
 Plains native culture, 4:50, 4:112
 Plandok, 2:328–37, 2:364–67
 Plants, 1:319, 4:3, 4:397
 "Playing Godfather," 4:164–66, 4:409
 "Playing Mourner," 4:408–10
 "Playing the Godfather," 4:168
 Play-on-words, 2:263
 Plot: amalgamated, 1:242; animal tales, 1:57; benevolent naïveté, 3:285; biblical variant, 1:42, 1:181; bone leading to murderer, 4:412–13; boundary crossing, 4:194; "Cinderella" extension, 2:419; explanatory justice, 4:409; fable admonition, 1:121; frame tale resolution, 2:184–85; "Girl as Helper in the Hero's Flight," 4:435–36; granting wishes, 2:102; Indian frame tale conclusions, 2:233; ironic, 4:89; Jack tales, 4:229; looking for wife, 3:289; märchen, 4:236; numskull, 2:288; resemblance, 1:43; revenge justice, 4:19; shape-shifting spouses, 1:119; "The Singing Bone," 2:181; social justice for wife, 4:19; stolen magic ring, 2:176; true love and separation, 2:100; twist and revenge, 1:6; "Unjust Umpire Misappropriates Disputed Goods," 2:116; unnatural suitors, 1:85
 Poetry, 2:3
 Poland, 3:139–62
 Political systems, 1:45, 1:61; colonialism, 2:367
 Polygamy, 1:106
 Polynesia, 1:359–432
 Polynesian mythology, 1:417
 "Poor Little Maria," 2:419–24
Popol Vuh, 4:357
 Popular culture, 4:264; chapbooks, 3:3–4; tengu in, 2:92
 Porcupine, 4:89
 Porter, Ralph S., 2:399
 Portugal, 3:379
 Portuguese–West African trade, 1:116
 "Possessed of Two Spirits," 4:202–5
 Possum, 4:165
 "A Pound of Flesh," 1:52
 Power: dreams, 3:216; hierarchy of, 4:374; holy men/healers, 4:443; Islam structure, 1:5; magic song, 4:431; ogres, 4:436; shaman, 2:36, 2:51, 4:70; superficial appearance, 2:16; supernatural, 1:369, 2:36–58, 2:429, 4:40, 4:124; weak trickster, 2:121; witch social, 1:253; words variants, 4:405; word use, 4:405
 Powers: magical, 1:43, 1:310, 3:385; shaman, 4:70
 Pow-wow doctors, 4:244, 4:248
 Pow-wowing, 4:248
 Prayer wands, 2:14
 Preacher, 4:167
 Pre-Columbian culture: ball game, 4:364; Incas, 4:315
 Predators, 2:128, 2:311
 Presentation, 2:3
 Preservation of traditions, 1:251
 Pretension, 3:36, 4:391
 Preternatural beings, 1:55
 Prey, 2:128
 "The Priest and the Devil," 4:389–91
 Priests, 1:129, 1:341, 2:152, 4:389
 Primal chaos, 1:353
 Prince, 2:116–20, 2:184–85, 2:298; five weapons, 2:156; folly exposure, 2:221; monster guise, 1:282
 "Prince Fickle and Fair Helena," 3:77–80
 "The Prince's Elopement," 2:184–91, 3:275
 Princess, 4:209–12; criticism of suitors, 3:266; Labam, 2:195–202; rescue, 2:100; as reward, 3:390
 "The Princess on the Glass Mountain," 3:202
 "The Princess with Golden Hair," 1:241–50
 "Prince Unexpected," 3:152–60, 3:171
 Prisoner freedom, 1:147
 Prophetic dreams, 4:327
 Prophets, 4:297
 "The Prose Edda," 3:292–98
 Prosperity, 3:285
 Protagonists: female, 3:34, 4:255; maternal uncles, 1:345; wit over monsters, 1:282
 Protectors, 2:16, 4:43
 Protestant religions, 4:200
 Protest tales: racial discrimination, 4:185
 Proverb: diamond cut diamond, 2:255; kinship bonds, 1:36
 Pseudo-verification: tall tales, 4:285
 Psycho-physiological phenomenon: hag experience, 4:199

Cumulative Index

- 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania
2: Asia
3: Europe
4: North and South America
- Pueblo: Acoma, 4:3; influence, 4:25; Isleta, 4:102–11
“Punchkin,” 2:167–76
Punishment: in afterlife, 2:83;
agents of fall, 1:196; curiosity
and, 3:280; profane touch, 1:369
Punjab, 2:255, 2:268, 2:291–97
Puns, 4:179; orphan boy trickster,
2:263
Punt, 1:42
Purim, 3:379
“Puss in Boots,” 2:429
- “The Queen with a Hundred
Lovers,” 4:400
Quest: lost love, 1:282; lost siblings, 2:359; lover for beloved,
1:420; wife recovery, 2:320
“Quest for Lost Sister,” 1:274
Question-and-answer pattern,
2:152, 2:250
“Quetzalcoatl and Tezcatliopca,”
4:393–96
- Rabbi, 3:143, 3:381
“The Rabbi Extracts a Confession,”
1:240–41
“The Rabbi Kolonimos,” 1:238–39
Rabbit, 4:45, 4:63, 4:65, 4:367,
4:410, 4:414, 4:418; African American traditions, 4:415;
blame shifting, 4:165; Brer, 4:45,
4:166–89; Cajun folktales,
4:209; fox, 4:31; konehu, 4:343;
romantic rival humiliation,
4:173; tar baby, 4:121–23; trickster and Anansi, 1:61; trickster/culture hero, 4:16–17, 4:162. See
also Hare
“Rabbit and Big Man-Eater,”
4:17–18
“Rabbit and Coyote,” 4:367
“The Rabbit and the Python,”
1:116–17
“Rabbit Fools Alligator,” 4:65–66,
4:343
Rabbit foot amulet, 4:172
“Rabbit Gets a Turkey for Wildcat,” 4:63–64, 4:343
“Rabbit Kills Big Man-Eater,”
4:16–17
“Rabbit Rides Fox A-Courting,”
4:174
“Rabbit Steals Fire,” 4:64–65,
4:343
“Rabbit’s Triumph,” 1:152–54
“Race Won by Deception,” 2:334
Racial discrimination: protest tale,
4:185
Rain, 4:83
Rainbows, 1:333
Rain-bringing, 1:308, 4:102
Rainstorms, 1:333
“Raja Donan,” 2:383–86
“Raja Rasalu,” 2:268–76
“Rakian,” 2:320–23, 2:323
“Rama and Luxman,” 2:159–67
“Range Life in Texas,” 4:258–64
Rascals, 2:255
Rat, 4:409
“The Rat Princess and the Greedy
Man,” 2:264–65
“The Rattlesnake’s Vengeance,”
4:42–43
Raven, 2:40, 2:105, 4:75–76,
4:140–45, 4:145–47
Raven-Man, 2:107–10
“The Raven Mocker,” 4:47–49
“Raven’s Creation,” 2:39–43
“The Reason for Abstaining from Wine and Pork,” 1:12–14
Rebirth, 2:36, 4:112
Reconstruction period, 4:258
“Recovering the Sun,” 4:76–78
“The Red Calf,” 3:58–60
Reece, Harry, 4:291
Reef Islands, 1:331
Regional rivalries, 2:367
Religion: healer magic cures,
4:200; Hopi practices, 4:83;
Shinto, 2:59
Religious authorities, 1:24, 1:216,
3:28, 4:102
Religious beliefs, 4:297
Religious devotions, 3:143
Religious experiences, 4:200
Religious factions, 1:223
Religious instruction, 3:381
Religious societies, 4:279
Reptiles, 2:116
Rescue: by bridegroom, 1:420; from death, 2:176; from supernatural
abductions, 2:24
“Rescue by the Sister,” 3:280
Resistance legends, 3:339
Retribution, 1:43
“Return of a Cantonist,” 3:141–42
“Return of Siegfried,” 4:247–48
Revenge: creator role, 1:301; curse,
3:304; myth and spousal, 2:110;
plot twist, 1:6; social justice,
4:19; stepmother scheme, 3:261;
trickster, 2:415, 4:163; vampire
bats, 4:341; witches, 4:227
Rewards, 2:191, 2:315
Rhetorical devices, 2:281, 2:291,
4:170
Rhyme, 2:281, 2:291
“The Rich and the Poor Peasant,”
2:245
“Ricky of the Tuft,” 3:373–78
Rings, 2:176–81
“Rip Van Winkle” (Irving), 4:247
Rituals: calling game, 4:33; daily
affairs, 2:181; dance, 2:59; hunting success, 4:40; magic, 4:227;
preparation for hearing myth,
4:33; shaman healing, 4:338;
shamanic, 2:51; sun deity, 4:319;
warrior cultures, 4:95; warrior
preparation, 4:95
Ritual songs, 4:40, 4:42, 4:355
“The Robber Bridegroom,” 3:34–35
“Robbers Smuggled into House in Food Containers,” 2:424
Roberts, John, 3:163
Robertson, Steve, 4:285, 4:291
Robinson, Braziel, 4:203
“The Rogish Peasant,” 3:194–97
Roland, 3:339
“Roldan’s Bugle Horn,” 3:339–50
Roma, 3:130, 3:163–77
Roman Catholicism, 4:279
Romania, 3:178–93
“Roostam the Game-Cock,”
2:367–82

- Rooster feet, 4:389
 Root doctors, 4:203–5
 “Royal Rivals: The Pandavas and Kauravas,” 2:133, 2:141–53, 2:142
 Rulers, 1:372, 4:319
 “Rumpelstiltskin,” 3:120
 “Runaway Scrape,” 4:13
 Rural culture, 1:3
 Russia, 2:3, 3:141, 3:194–228

 “The Sack of Peas and the Mule,” 4:212–14
 Sacred formulas, 4:47
 Sacred history, 4:393
 Sacred objects: origins, 1:308; swords, 2:64; taboos, 1:369
 Sacred songs, 2:3, 2:16, 4:39
 Sacred texts, 1:185
 Sacrifice: community and self-, 1:238; of innocents, 2:336, 2:430
 Sailors, 1:345
 Saka, 2:268
 Sami (people), 3:313–35
 Samoa, 1:417–30
 Samurai class, 2:70
 “Samyekukuru and His Sister,” 2:17–19
 San (people), 1:137–57
 San Cristoval, 1:333, 1:335
 Santals, 2:181
 “The Saragossan Purim,” 3:379–80
 Satan, 4:186
 Savitri, 2:133–44
 “The Scabby Shaman,” 2:43–50
 Scheherazade, 1:220
 Scheltema, J. F., 2:367
 Science: magic remedies, 3:390
 Scotland, 3:54–60
 Scottish Irish, 4:229
 Scythians, 2:268
 Sea, 2:13
 Seafaring: dangers and rewards, 2:67
 Sea-lions, 4:124
 “Seal Island,” 2:15–17
 “The Search for the Lost Husband,” 3:256
 Seasons: arctic, 4:74; motifs interpretation, 3:152
 Sea spirits: Eskimo female, 4:74

 “The Secret Room,” 4:255–57
 Secrets: blind learning of, 3:113
 Secret societies: justice enforcement, 1:83
 Seeds, 4:353
 Self-brought up-man, 2:13
 Self-brought-up-Man, 2:16, 2:17
 Self-created one, 2:40
 Self-interest: trickster, 3:299
 Self-sacrifice: community, 1:238
 Self-serving characters: animal tales, 1:35
 Semang (people), 2:383
 Semidivine beings, 2:388
 Seneca tribe, 4:95–101
 Sephardim, 1:14, 1:16, 1:238, 3:379–84
 Serpents, 2:277
 Serpent, 1:196, 1:335, 1:339, 2:100; horned, 4:50; seven-headed, 3:253–56, 3:351
 Serpents, 4:309
 Servant: faithful, 2:159
 Servants, 1:5
 Settings: medieval, 1:45
 Settlements: Tlingit, 4:145
 “The Seven-headed Serpent,” 3:253–56
 “The Seven Wise Men of Buneyr,” 2:288–90
 Shahryar, 1:220
 Shakespeare, William, 1:52, 3:34
 Shaman, 4:338; curative powers, 4:70; divination, 2:113; power and rituals, 2:51; powers, 2:36, 2:43; sea spirit visitation, 4:74; shape-shifting, 3:321
 Shamanism, 2:113, 3:313, 4:338
 Shango, 1:124–29
 Shape-shifter: Anansi, 4:326; asuang, 2:429; Brer Rabbit, 4:170; daughter of underworld lord, 3:152; god-human offspring, 1:380; Japanese animal, 2:95; night hag, 4:225; nixies, 3:92; omens, 4:354–55; rabbit, 4:121; shaman divination, 2:113; Spider-Woman, 4:85–86; wife in animal guise, 1:265; wisemen-shaman, 3:321; Yurokons, 4:453

 Shape-shifting, 1:333; acts, 3:174; animal skin transformation, 3:212; animistic beliefs, 2:17; evil spirits, 2:105; pow-wow doctor, 4:248; spouses, 1:119; trickster, 4:407–8; trickster monster-slayer, 4:17; tricksters, 1:72, 1:154; witches, 4:284. See also Transformation
 “The Shepherd and the Daughter of the Sun,” 4:319–23
 Shinto, 2:59, 2:62
 Shiva, 2:191
 “A Short History, Purporting to Give the Origin of the Hausa Nation and the Story of Their Conversion to the Mohammedan Religion,” 1:98–105
 Siberia, 2:36–58, 2:105–12
 Siblings: abandonment and community, 4:72; beautiful/ugly twins, 3:373; kind/rude motif, 2:313, 2:315; quest for lost, 2:359; younger, 3:198, 4:137. See also Brothers; Sisters; Twins
 Signs of tragic events, 4:354, 4:448
 Sikes, W. Wirt, 4:206
 “The Silence Wager,” 1:5, 3:182
 “The Silver Plate and the Transparent Apple,” 3:198–201
 Simpletons, 3:198, 3:201
 Sinai Peninsula, 1:179
 Singing, 1:126, 1:158
 “The Singing Bone,” 1:106, 2:181, 3:185, 3:198, 4:412
 Sioux. See Lakota
 Sis Pig, 4:186
 “Sister of the Sun,” 3:324–34
 Sisters: marriage to devil, 3:280; unkind, 3:18, 3:90
 “Skáldskaparmál,” 3:292
 Skin: animal, 3:212; changing, 4:121, 4:225; having two, 1:87–92; metamorphosis, 4:447
 Skunk, 4:354–55
 Sky deity, 2:62
 Slavery, 4:186
 Slaves, 1:5, 1:61, 1:80; Bahamas, 4:414; maroons in Suriname, 4:324
 “The Slave’s Fortune,” 3:380–84

Cumulative Index

- 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania
2: Asia
3: Europe
4: North and South America
- “The Slaying of the Tanuki,” 2:97–100
“Sleeping Beauty,” 3:73
Smoking: rain-bringing, 4:102
Snake, 1:324, 2:116, 2:123, 2:266, 4:42, 4:124, 4:330, 4:448
“Snake and Hunter,” 4:329–31
“The Snake Helper,” 4:309
Snorri Strurluson, 3:292
Snowbird, 4:75–76
“Snow-White,” 3:261
“Snow-White and Rose-Red,” 3:81–85
Soane, E. B., 1:201
Social class: caste divisions, 2:152; cautionary tale, 3:182; status legend, 2:70; wit not distinguishing, 1:253
Social conditions: humor, 1:218; protest tale, 4:185
Social hierarchy, 2:67, 2:152
Social norms, 2:262
Social order, 1:16, 3:28, 4:387
Social organization, 1:179
Social power, 1:253
Social practices, 1:303
Social relations: clans, 1:42; cumulative tale, 2:291; Jews and Muslims, 1:241; trickster motivations, 4:175
Social status: animal language gift, 3:109; blind, 3:113; elevation, 3:73; marriage, 1:43
Social truths, 1:33
Society: customary law, 4:19; subsistence and stability, 4:79
“Sol Lockheart’s Call,” 4:200–202
Solomon Islands, 1:331–49
Somalia, 1:42–58, 1:421; Swahili people, 1:49
Somersaults, 3:174, 3:185
“The Song of Roland,” 3:339
“The Song of the Coffee Pot,” 1:253–56
Songs: magic, 4:431; ritual, 4:40, 4:42, 4:355; sacred, 2:3, 2:16, 4:39; transformation power, 4:431; trickster use, 1:73
“The Son of the Hunter,” 1:169
Sons: father jealousy of, 4:426; of human and animal, 4:376; marriage, 2:191–95; winning princess, 2:195–202
Sorcerers, 2:167
Sórkura, 4:354
Soul, 3:144, 4:186
South America, 4:295–348
South Asia influence: Indonesia, 2:359
Southeast Asia, 2:305–438
Southern Africa, 1:135–65
Southern plains, 4:148
Southern U.S., 4:164; Aggies and Cajuns, 4:220–21; cross-cultural borrowing, 4:209; fool motifs, 4:215; Southern tricksters, 4:45
Southwestern U.S.: Aggies, 4:220
Southwestern U.S. folktales, 4:258–94
Southwestern U.S. native peoples, 4:124
Spain, 3:385–98; conquest of Mexico, 4:367; duendes, 4:387; Jews, 3:381; Sephardim, 3:379
Spanish influence, 2:419
Sparrow, 1:291
Spider, 1:87, 1:96, 4:324, 4:429; anthropomorphic trickster, 4:163; tricksters, 1:108; West African trickster, 1:61
Spider-Woman, 2:40, 4:83, 4:85–86
“The Spirit of a Buried Man,” 3:149–52
“The Spirit of Defenders of Nikäi,” 4:43–45
Spirits: animals possessing, 4:447; bush, 4:332, 4:338; daily affairs, 2:181; of dead, 1:67; double, 4:202; evil, 2:105; forest, 4:453; guardian animal, 4:98; haunting, 4:251; helpers in animal guise, 4:327; mountain, 4:247; mythic origin, 1:335; nature, 2:59; shaman powers, 2:36; water, 3:92; wish granting, 2:102
Spiritual essence, 2:17
Spirituality in warfare, 4:95
Spouse: animal, 1:265, 2:362, 3:86, 4:255, 4:431; demonic, 3:280; extraordinary tasks, 4:137; infidelity and revenge myth, 2:110; shape-shifting, 1:119; transformation, 2:167, 2:320, 2:323. See also Husbands; Wife
Sri Lanka, 2:298–303
“Sry Nagasary,” 2:342–59
Stalo, 3:316, 3:321
Stars, 4:148–55, 4:456
Steiner, Roland, 4:200
Stepdaughter, 1:282
Stepmother: cruel, 1:119, 1:260, 2:167, 3:18; revenge schemes, 3:261; wicked, 1:176, 2:122, 2:268; witch parallelism, 3:67
“Stepmother Demands Bull’s Blood,” 1:45
Stereotypes: Aggies and Cajuns, 4:220–21; foolishness, 4:220; regional jokes, 4:220–21
Stock characters: Boudreaux, 4:220; gypsy, 3:130, 3:185; Jean Sot, 4:215; mutes, 4:220; names, 1:5; preacher, 4:167
Stone, 4:112, 4:319
“The Stone Boy,” 4:112–15
“The Stonecutter,” 2:102–4
“Stonger and Strongest,” 2:102
“The Storm Fiend,” 1:274–82
Storm god, 2:59
“A Story About a Giant, and the Cause of Thunder,” 1:111–15
“Story of a Tengu,” 2:92–94
“The Story of Bantugan,” 2:398–415
“De Story of de Man and Six Poached Eggs,” 4:439–40
“The Story of Hok Lee and the Dwarfs,” 2:32–35
“The Story of Ibonía,” 1:36
“The Story of Juan and the Monkey,” 2:428–30
“The Story of Lodge Boy, After-Birth Boy and Double-Face,” 4:34
“Story of Lumbart and Wari,” 2:395–98
“The Story of Mini-Nashi-Hoichi,” 2:74–80
“The Story of Mr. Fox,” 3:34–35

- “Story of Savitri,” 2:133–41
 Story of Tangi-nui, 1:398
 “The Story of the Buffalo and the Lion,” 1:32
 “The Story of the Children and the Zimwi,” 1:55
 “Story of the Fin-back Crest,” 4:79–82
 “The Story of the Flesh of the Thigh,” 1:52–54
 “The Story of the Kite and the Mole,” 1:32
 “The Story of the Pretty Goldilocks,” 3:364–72
 “The Story of the Prince’s Friend,” 2:116–20, 2:121, 2:123
 “The Story of the Rat and the Cat,” 1:31–32
 “The Story of the Sun and the Moon,” 4:384–87
 “The Story of the Swan Maiden and the King,” 3:185–89
 “The Story of the Two Devils,” 2:113–16, 2:123
 “The Story of the Vizir Who Was Punished,” 1:228–37
 Strangers, 2:315
 Straparola, Giovanni Francesco, 3:274–75
 Strategy, 2:301, 4:162
 “Stronger and Strongest,” 2:265, 4:374
 “Student of Paradise,” 1:4
 Stupidity: Jean Sot, 4:218; monster, 3:316–17, 3:351; preternatural, 1:55; puns, 4:217. See also Fools
 “Stupid Stories Depending on a Pun,” 4:217
 Subsistence: Ainu, 2:3; Australian Aborigines, 1:297; Borneo, 2:307; labor division, 1:158; myth, 1:161; myths, 1:161; predictability, 4:79; Sami people, 3:313; tales recalling, 1:56
 Sudras, 2:152
 Sufism, 1:7, 1:216
 Suicide, 2:70
 “The Suitor,” 3:289–91
 Suitors: admirable shape shifting, 1:265; avenging slight, 3:266; courtship attempts, 3:289; curiosity about, 3:280; love and sensibility, 3:373; unnatural, 1:85
 Sun, 2:107, 4:76–78, 4:83, 4:385, 4:456
 “The Sun, the Frog, and the Firesticks,” 4:456–58
 Sun deity, 4:319; Vukub-Cakix, 4:359
 Sun goddess, 2:59
 “The Sun Goddess and the Storm God,” 2:59–62
 “Sunrise,” 2:359–61
 Sunshowers, 1:333
 Superficial appearance, 2:16
 Supernatural: assistance, 3:270; bridegroom, 1:420; creation myths, 2:338; flight, 4:389; two-headed doctors, 4:203
 Supernatural assault, 1:300; night hag, 4:199, 4:227; shaman powers, 4:70
 Supernatural beings, 2:388; Bagobo myths, 2:388; snakes, 4:42; workings of, 1:268
 Supernatural belief, 1:341
 Supernatural figures, 3:125
 Supernatural head of society, 1:83
 Supernatural legend: duendes role, 4:387; female jinn, 1:24; human-supernatural intersection, 3:357; manhood initiation ceremony, 1:313; military epic, 2:74; Self-brought-up-Man, 2:16; social class status, 2:70; validating devices, 2:86
 Supernaturally-caused affliction, 1:92
 Supernatural medicine, 1:87
 Supernatural power: acquired by cannibalism, 2:429; incantations, 4:40; Manabozho, 4:124; taboo objects, 1:369
 Supernatural presence, 2:3
 Superstitions, 4:252
 “The Surety,” 1:213–16
 Surfboard, 1:372
 Suriname, 4:324
 Suriname Maroon, 4:324–31
 “Suto and Tato,” 1:201–13
 Swahili, 1:49–58
 “The Swallow and the Tortoise,” 1:116, 1:118–19
 Swords: drawing of, 3:96; sacred Japanese, 2:59, 2:64; theft-murder curse, 3:304
 Symbolism: cockfighting, 2:367; seasonal and solar motifs, 3:152
 Sympathetic magic, 4:227
 Syria, 1:251–55
 Székeley, 3:104
 Ta’aroa, 1:431
 “The Table, the Ass, and the Stick,” 2:427, 4:191
 “Tablecloth, Donkey, and Club,” 4:191–93
 Taboo, 1:67, 1:369
 Taboo words, 4:425
 “Tach the Prophet,” 4:297–98
 Tagalog, 2:424
 Tahiti, 1:431–32
 “The Tail-fisher,” 4:410
 Taino (people), 4:443
 Tale: cumulative, 2:281; generational tension, 2:123; linking of series, 1:228; myth classification, 1:87, 4:423; numskull, 2:288; performance, 1:42
 “Tale of a Lantern,” 1:16–22, 1:45
 “The Tale of an Ogress,” 2:262–63
 “A Tale of a Snake,” 2:266
 “The Tale of Our Dying Away,” 3:352–53
The Tale of the Heike (military epic), 2:74
 “Tale of the Rabbit,” 4:367–73
 “Tales of Fox,” 4:29–32
 Tale type: “The Cat as Sham Holy Man,” 2:128; death sentence revocation, 1:147; domestic strife, 1:5; “Dragon-Slayer,” 3:253; “The Fox Persuades the Cock to Crow with Closed Eyes,” 2:128; “The Grateful Dead,” 3:139; hero winning bride, 2:195; Indo-European central, 2:167; “The Judge Appropriates the Object of Dispute,” 3:325; multiepisodic Turkish, 1:274; rabbit cycle, 4:367; “The Search for the Lost Husband,” 3:256; “The Singing Bone,” 4:412; “Theft of Butter (Honey)

Cumulative Index

- |                                                    |
|----------------------------------------------------|
| 1: Africa, The Middle East, Australia, and Oceania |
| 2: Asia                                            |
| 3: Europe                                          |
| 4: North and South America                         |
- by Playing Godfather," 4:164; ungrateful animals, 2:277
- Tall tales, 4:240, 4:285, 4:291
- Tangaroa, 1:431
- Tanuki, 2:95–96, 2:97–100
- Tanzania, 1:49
- Taoism, 2:28
- "Taraematawa," 1:341–43
- Taranga, 1:398
- Tar baby, 1:78, 2:156, 4:121–23, 4:209–12, 4:367, 4:414
- "The Tar Baby," 4:121–23, 4:414
- "The Tarbaby and the Rabbit," 2:156, 4:367
- Tartaro, 3:350–51
- Tasks to win spouse, 2:195, 4:137
- "Tattoo," 1:425–30
- Technology: creation myth, 2:338; fire, 4:64; gift of Africa, 1:29
- Temptation, 1:36
- Tengu, 2:92–94
- Tensions, 2:123
- Territorial rights, 3:351
- Tests: bride, 1:47, 3:289; child trickster, 2:319; by devil, 4:194; drawing of sword, 3:96; sincerity, 3:148; wife, 1:66
- Tetragrammaton, 1:238
- Texas, 4:258
- Texas A&M University students, 4:220
- Texas Revolution of 1836, 4:13
- Theft: of fire, 4:27, 4:64; of food, 3:334, 4:409; of sword, 3:304
- "Theft of Butter (Honey) by Playing Godfather," 4:164, 4:409
- "The Theft of Fish," 3:334
- "Them Petrified Buzzards," 4:285, 4:290–94
- Theseus, 3:231
- Thomas, Mary, 4:159
- Thompson, Stith, 1:420, 4:110
- "Thor in Peril," 3:298–303
- "The Thrall's Curse," 3:304–7
- "Three Animals as Brothers-in-law," 1:274
- "The Three Golden Sons," 2:419
- "The Three Lemons," 3:130–38, 3:163, 3:185
- "Three Little Pigs and the Big Bad Wolf," 4:186
- "Three Men of Galway," 3:49–53
- "The Three Precepts," 3:54
- "The Three Rajahs," 2:308–11
- Three (sacred number), 3:201
- "The Three Stolen Princesses," 3:253
- Tibet, 2:113–30
- Tiger, 2:152–56, 2:332, 2:364–65
- "The Tiger and the Frog," 2:121–22
- "The Tiger Changed into a Woman," 4:446–48
- "Tiger Softens His Voice," 4:431–34
- Ti Jean, 4:219
- "Ti Jean Cannot Tell a Lie," 4:219
- Time: mythic events, 1:324; story classification, 4:89
- Tiruray tribe, 2:399
- Titans: myth of, 2:28
- Tiyo, 4:85–88
- Tlingit (people), 4:140–45, 4:140–47
- Tobacco, 4:338, 4:397
- Togo: Yoruba culture, 1:124
- Tolba, 1:24
- Toltecs, 4:393
- "Tom Thumb," 3:3, 3:21
- Tone: revealing content, 2:221
- Tools: culture hero, 1:398
- Tortoise, 1:68–77, 1:80, 1:82–85, 1:152, 2:415–19
- "The Tortoise and the Elephant," 1:68–70
- "The Tortoise and the Hare," 2:334
- "The Tortoise with a Beautiful Daughter," 1:82–85
- Totem animals, 4:89
- Totemic clans: culture heroes, 1:301
- Toyotomi Hidetsugu, 2:67
- Toyotomi Hideyoshi, 2:67
- Trade: Efik-European, 1:80; West African, 1:116
- Trade routes: morality on, 1:223
- Traders, 2:152
- Tradition: immigrant community preservation, 1:251
- Traditional arts, 4:253
- Traditional healers: roles and methods, 1:92
- Tradition bearers, 4:253
- Trances, 4:338
- Transformation, 1:310; act inversion, 3:174; animal spouse, 2:320, 2:323; anthropomorphic to wild, 4:415; external, 2:107; heroes into stars, 4:148–55; plot inversion, 2:298; somersaults, 3:185; song power of, 4:431; spouse, 2:167; into stones, 4:319; twins in stars, 4:456. See also Shape-shifting
- Transformation tales: hero identity, 3:139
- Transvestites: Native Americans, 4:13
- Transylvania, 3:104, 3:178
- Trapping, 4:57
- "Trapping a Hag," 4:198–99
- Traps: magical, 1:78
- Travel between worlds, 2:43
- "The Treacherous Jackal," 1:57–58
- Treasure: dwarves, 3:81; lost, 4:268
- Trees, 3:299
- Trials: siblings in arctic communities, 4:72
- "Tricking of Gylfi," 3:292
- Trickster: Abu'n-Nuwa's, 1:251; African animal tales, 1:68; Algonquin cultures, 4:124; amorality and guile, 1:70; Anansi, 1:61, 1:96, 4:163, 4:324, 4:326, 4:329–30, 4:425–30; animal fables, 1:76; animal myth, 1:303; animal tales, 1:57, 1:80, 2:328, 4:161–62; Ann Nancy, 4:163; Bantu tales, 1:68–77; being tricked, 4:410; Big Raven, 2:105; blame shifting, 1:72, 4:165; Boudreaux, 4:220; Brer Rabbit, 4:45, 4:166–89, 4:170; buzzard, 4:182; cat, 2:128; cockroach, 4:430; community interest, 4:172; community service, 1:80; cousins bested, 3:49;

- cowardly, 1:144; coyote, 4:116; cross-cultural characteristics, 2:430–31; culture hero function, 3:3; cunning amorality, 1:71; drunken success, 4:455; dual nature, 1:6; duelist mentality, 2:333; Egypt, 1:3; exploitation, 4:174; exposure, 2:107; extraordinary nature, 2:318–19; fire theft, 4:64; fox, 3:325, 4:27, 4:29; frog, 2:121–22; gazelle, 1:78; human, 3:316; imitation, 4:110; Jack, 4:229; jackal, 1:58, 1:144, 2:152; Japanese animal, 2:97; Jewish legends, 1:241; jokes, 3:148; Juan Puson, 2:427, 2:430–31; konehu, 4:343; Kororomanna, 4:332; Lapin, 4:209; Lata, 1:331; Loki, 3:298–99; loss by, 2:334; Maori, 1:3.98; marginality, 4:102; mole, 4:86; motivations, 4:175, 4:214; mouse deer cycle, 2:328–37, 2:364; opportunistic nature, 3:334; orphan boy, 2:263; peasant, 3:194; poets, 1:10; popular African, 1:152; precocious child, 2:318–19; puns against, 4:179; rabbi, 3:143; rabbit, 4:16–17, 4:45, 4:65, 4:121, 4:415; raven, 2:40, 4:75, 4:140; sacrifice of innocents, 2:336, 2:430; scatology, 2:415; Self-brought-up-Man, 2:17; serpent, 1:196; shape-shifting, 1:72, 1:154; skills over monsters, 4:53; sparrow, 1:291; spider, 1:353; strategy, 2:301, 4:162; tanuki, 2:95; theft of food, 4:409; Ti Jean, 4:219; traits, 1:68; twins, 4:84; ungrateful animals, 2:277; wallaroo, 1:303; West African, 1:108; younger brothers, 2:245. See also Culture hero
- “The Trickster and the Sultan,” 1:6–9
- “Trouble (Rabbit Loses His Tail),” 4:179–82
- “The True Sweetheart,” 3:77
- Truth, 2:435–38
- “Truth and Falsehood,” 2:435–38
- Tsamba tormas, 2:123
- “Tsarevna Frog,” 3:211–16
- Tuglay, 2:388–95
- Tuglibung, 2:388
- Turkey, 1:257–93
- Turkish narratives, 1:176
- Turks, 1:3
- Turtle, 1:72–77, 1:333, 2:80
- “Turtle Deceives Zoe, Giving Leopard the Blame for Stealing Zoe’s Daughter,” 1:72–74
- “Turtle Drinks at the Expense of the Other Beasts,” 1:70–71
- “Turtle Surpasses Man in Ingenuity,” 1:75
- “Twardowski the Magician,” 3:160–62
- “The Twelve-Headed Griffin,” 3:185
- Twenty-Two Goblins*, 2:184, 2:233, 3:275
- Twins: children of sun, 4:456; culture hero, 4:359, 4:364; heroes, 4:105–10; magical resuscitation, 3:385; Native American motif, 4:34, 4:148–55; sun visited by, 4:83; trickster cleansing, 4:84, 4:148
- “The Twins or Blood-Brothers,” 3:385
- “Two Boys and Their Grandmothers,” 1:121–23
- “The Two Boys Who Slew the Monsters and Became Stars,” 1:120, 1:324, 4:34, 4:53, 4:57, 4:106, 4:148–55, 4:456
- “Two-Faces,” 4:53–54, 4:57
- “Two Girls, the Bear and the Dwarf,” 3:81
- Two-headed doctors, 4:203
- “The Two Hunchbacks,” 1:64–66
- “Two Sons of the Creator,” 4:304–5, 4:319
- “The Two Sons of the Creator,” 4:315
- Tyrants, 4:162
- Uganda, 1:29
- Ukraine, 3:171
- Ulster myth cycle, 3:39
- Unclean occupations, 2:181
- Underground world, 4:3, 4:25, 4:86
- “Under the Green Old Oak Tree,” 2:181, 4:412–13
- Underworld, 1:398; bride, 1:353, 1:372–80; child with god of, 1:398; emergence from, 4:302; gods of, 1:369; journey to, 1:372, 2:62, 4:380; revival from, 1:343; symbolism, 3:152
- “The Ungrateful Serpent Returned to Captivity,” 2:152, 2:277, 4:329
- Unicorn, 4:232–36
- United Kingdom, 3:3, 3:54
- United States, 1:176
- Universe: creation, 1:396, 1:431, 2:28, 2:338; description, 2:43; ordering, 1:324, 2:309
- “Unjust Umpire Misappropriates Disputed Goods,” 2:116
- Unkind/kind. See Kind/unkind
- Unkind sibling motif, 2:315
- Unnatural suitors: motifs of, 1:85
- “The Unseen Helpers,” 4:98–101
- Untrustworthy characters, 1:35
- Upper classes, 3:182
- Urban cultures, 1:3
- Urban–rural dichotomy, 1:3
- Uzume, 2:59
- Vaiyas, 2:152
- Validating devices: facts, 2:67; foreign tales, 1:176; localization, 2:86, 3:160, 4:387; naming, 4:387; tall tales, 4:285
- Vampire: bats, 4:341; folly exposure, 2:221; frame tale, 2:203; frame tale by captured, 2:203
- “The Vampire,” 3:173–77, 3:185
- “The Vampire Puzzles Raja Vikram,” 2:203, 2:233–44, 3:275
- “The Vampire” Puzzles Raja Vikram,” 2:185
- Variants: “Animal Allows Himself to Be Tied to Another for Safety,” 2:121; “The Animal Languages,” 2:295, 2:301, 3:109; “The Beautiful and the Ugly Twin,” 3:373; biblical, 1:42; “Bird’s Pea Gets Stuck in Socket

Cumulative Index

1: Africa, The Middle East,
Australia, and Oceania
2: Asia
3: Europe
4: North and South America

of Mill-Handle," 2:291; "The Brave Tailor," 1:287, 4:232; "Cinderella," 2:419, 3:58, 3:270, 4:382; "Deceptive Tug-of-War," 4:417; deity-herdsman marriage, 2:30; domestic strife, 1:5; "The Dragon-Slayer," 3:351; "Ferdinand the True and Ferdinand the False," 3:364; formulaic devices, 1:169; "The Forty Thieves," 2:424; "The Gifts of the Little People," 2:32; "The Girl as Helper in the Hero's Flight," 3:125, 3:152, 3:171; "Guarding the Door," 4:411; "Hansel and Grettel," 3:67; "Hans my Hedgehog," 3:275; "The Helpful Horse," 3:351; Indian frame tale conclusions, 2:233; Italian tales, 3:261; "Jack and the Beanstalk," 4:189; "John the Bear," 4:376; "The Kind and the Unkind Girls," 3:18, 3:90, 4:434; "The King's New Clothes," 2:250; "King Thunderbeard," 3:266; "Little Brother and Little Sister," 1:260; "The Lucky Shot," 4:240; "The Magic Ring," 2:176, 3:104, 3:163; "Monkey Who Left His Heart at Home," 2:80; moral code synthesis, 2:343; "The Name of the Helper," 3:120; plot inversion, 2:298; power words, 4:405; predators/prey characters, 2:128; "Puss in Boots," 2:429; Rabbit's / Hare's triumph, 1:152; "Rescue by the Sister," 3:280; "The Rich and the Poor Peasant," 2:245; "Robbers Smuggled into House in Food Containers," 2:424; "The Search for the Lost Husband," 3:256; "The Singing Bone," 2:181, 4:412; "Sleeping

Beauty," 3:73; "Snow-White," 3:261; storylines, 1:4; "Stronger and Strongest," 2:265, 4:374-75; "Stupid Stories Depending on a Pun," 4:217; "The Table, the Ass, and the Stick," 4:191-93; tar baby, 4:121; "Theft of Butter (Honey) by Playing Godfather," 4:409; "The Theft of Fish," 3:334; "The Three Golden Sons," 2:419; "The Three Oranges," 3:130-38; "The Three Precepts," 3:54; "Tom Thumb," 3:21; "The Twins or Blood-Brothers," 3:385; "Two Girls, the Bear and the Dwarf," 3:81; "Ungrateful Serpent Returned to Captivity," 2:277; "The Ungrateful Serpent Returned to Captivity," 4:329; "The Watcher Blinded," 4:182; "The Youth Who Wanted to Learn What Fear Is," 1:257
Vasques, Manuel Jesus, 4:264
Veddah, 2:298
Verse, 2:268, 3:21
"Victorio's Raid," 4:272-75
Vikram and the Vampire, 2:185, 2:203, 2:233, 3:275
Villages: divided, 4:148; Isleta Pueblo, 4:102; justice enforcement, 1:83; Native American, 4:13
Viracocha, 4:299, 4:304, 4:309
"Viracocha," 4:315-19
Virgins of the sun, 4:319
Virtue-reward tale type plots, 3:77
Visayas, 2:430
Visions, 4:200
Viziers, 1:216
Volcanoes, 1:361
Vows, 2:399
"Vukub-Cakix, the Great Macaw," 4:358-64, 4:364

"Waipumaremare," 1:343-45
Wakea, 1:369
Wales, 3:61-63
"Walking from Magical Forgetfulness," 4:436
Wallachia, 3:178

Wallachia language, 3:174
Wallaroo, 1:303
"The Wallaroo and the Willy-Wagtail," 1:303-5, 1:306
Walt Disney, 1:152
"Walutahanga," 1:335-39
Warfare, 4:95
Warrau, 4:332-48
Warriors, 2:152, 3:304, 4:95
Wars, 4:258, 4:273
"Warungarce," 1:333-35
"The Watcher Blinded," 4:182
"The Watcher Tricked," 4:182-83
Water of life and death, 1:242
Waters (tabooed), 1:372
Water spirits, 3:92
Waxgirl, 1:78
"The Way in which Andrianoro Obtained a Wife from Heaven," 1:36-41
Weak animals, 2:121
Weapons: prince of five, 2:156; sword myth, 2:59, 2:64; tests, 3:96; theft-murder curse, 3:304
"The Weaver Maiden and the Herdsman," 2:30-32
"The Weight before the Door," 1:14-16, 1:45, 1:238
Werewolves, 3:174
Western Africa, 1:61-134; Ann Nancy/Anansi, 4:163
Western Europe, 3:337-98
Westervelt, W. D., 1:380
West Indies, 4:405
Whales, 4:79, 4:417
"What Happens to Wives When They Think More Highly of Anything Else Than Their Husbands," 1:6-67
"What Is in the Dish: Poor Crab," 4:184
"When Brer Rabbit Help Brer Terrapin," 4:200
"When Brer Rabbit Saw Brer Dog's Mouth So Brer Dog Can Whistle," 4:175-79
"When Brer Rabbit Was Presidin' Elder," 4:166-67
"When Raven Wanted to Marry Snowbird and Fly with the Geese," 4:75-76, 4:140

- “The White Slipper,” 3:390–98
 “Why Ananse Lives in the Ceiling,” 1:96–97
 “Why Men and Tigers Are Enemies,” 2:261–62
 “Why Rabbit Has a Short Tail,” 4:410–11
 “Why the People Tote Brer Rabbit Foot in Their Pocket,” 4:172–73, 4:175
 “Why the Worms Are Blind and Why the Elephant Has Small Eyes,” 1:80–82
 Wichita, 4:148–55
 “The Wicked Sparrow,” 1:291–93
 “The Wicked Stepmother,” 1:176, 2:122–26
 Wife, 1:106; animal guise, 1:265, 2:320, 2:323; animals seeking human, 4:431; cruelty to, 4:448; deception of, 4:407; dwellings, 1:106; foolish misunderstanding, 4:411; gender differences, 4:423; infidelity, 4:443; looking for, 3:289; metamorphosed tiger, 4:447; saving husband’s life, 2:133; social justice plot, 4:19; traded for mule, 4:212
 “The Wild Cat and the Rat,” 1:34–35
 Wildness, 4:415
 Willy-wagtail, 1:303
 Wilson, Howard Barrett, 1:253
 Windigo, 4:16
 “The Wine, the Farm, the Princess and the Tarbaby,” 4:209–12
 Winged men, 2:92
 Winter, 4:161–62
 Wisdom: choice over money, 3:54; decorum, 1:82; trickster, 1:82, 4:172
 Wise fools, 1:7, 2:221–33
 Wisemen, 2:247, 3:321
 Wishes, 2:102
 “The Witch and Her Servants,” 3:216–28
 “The Witch and the Boiler,” 4:226–28
 “The Witch and the New Born Infant,” 3:356–59
 “The Witch at Bosen Corner,” 2:315, 4:434–35
 Witchcraft, 4:283; skin taking, 4:121; Southwest region Spanish culture, 4:281
 Witch doctors, 4:227
 Witches: Berberisca, 3:385; bruja/brujo, 4:283; brujas, 4:281; elders opposition to, 4:102; helper role, 3:130; huts, 3:212; legends, 4:227; motif range, 3:216; night-goer, 4:47; night hag, 4:225; possessing two hearts, 4:83; shape-shifting, 3:174, 3:357, 4:85–86, 4:284; social power, 1:253; stepmother parallelism, 3:67; trickster action against, 4:172
 “Witches Discovered,” 4:281, 4:284–85
 “Witch Flights,” 4:281, 4:283–84, 4:389
 Wits, 1:72
 “The Witty Exploits of Mr. George Buchanan the King’s Fool,” 4:440
 Wolf, 4:33, 4:98, 4:209, 4:248–51
 Wolf clan, 4:140–45
 “The Wolf Dives into the Water for Reflected Cheese,” 4:367
 “Wolf of the Greenwood,” 4:248–51
 “The Woman Who Was Fond of Intestines,” 4:19–24
 “The Woman with a Bear Lover,” 4:118–20
 “The Woman with Two Skins,” 1:87–92
 Women: bear as lover, 4:118–20; children by gods, 3:231; child with underworld god, 1:398; clan lineage, 4:3–4; creator of human, 4:332; deception by man, 2:203–21; dream appearance, 4:385; gardening, 2:3; hunter-gatherer society value, 1:313; marriage to disguised animals, 1:57; origin, 4:423; parent defied by young, 4:76; stealing of, 4:450; subsistence labor, 1:158; suicide, 2:70; supernatural bridegroom abduction, 1:420; supernatural child bearing agreement, 3:373; treatment of husband, 4:324; warrior, 3:39. See also Bride; Wife
 Women-spirit, 4:70
 “The Wonderful Tar-Baby Story” (Harris), 1:152, 4:414
 Woodpecker, 4:110–11
 Words, 4:405, 4:425
 World, 2:156–59, 4:76
 “The Worship of the Thunderbolt: A Story of Shango,” 1:128–29
 Wrenchall, Leitia Humphreys, 4:244
 Writing systems, 4:33, 4:357

 Xhosa (people), 1:158–65

 Yama, 2:133
 Yamato-dake no Mikoto, 2:64
 Yoruba, 1:124–34
 Yoshino Yama, 2:70
 Younger brothers, 2:245, 3:216
 Younger siblings, 2:167, 3:198
 “The Young Man and the Snake,” 2:276–81
 “Young Men Who Killed the Horned Serpent and Released the Buffalo,” 4:50–53
 “Your Horse Stays Outside,” 4:185–86
 “The Youth in the Land of Cheaters,” 2:255
 “The Youth Who Received Supernatural Powers from the Ke’let,” 2:36–58, 2:105
 “The Youth Who Wanted to Learn What Fear Is,” 1:257
 Yu-Huan, 2:30
 Yukara, 2:3
 Yupik (people), 4:70
 “The Yuri-Ulu,” 1:321–24
 Yurokons (people), 4:453

 Zimwi, 1:55
 Zuni Pueblo, 4:124

About the Editor

THOMAS A. GREEN is Associate Professor of Anthropology at Texas A&M University. His many books include The Greenwood Library of American Folktales (Greenwood, 2006), and Martial Arts in the Modern World (Praeger, 2003).