DISCOVERING MALAYSIA AND SINGAPORE

Malaysia and Singapore have an astounding range of attractions for visitors, offering experiences and activities that appeal to all tastes. Malaysia's national parks, with their superb landscapes and unusual animals, are a magnet for nature-lovers, while its islands attract divers eager to explore the mysteries of the deep. The major cities of this region, particularly Singapore and Kuala Lumpur, offer the chance to see historical monuments, witness cultural shows, shop for local crafts, and sample the delights of Malay, Chinese, and Indian cuisine. These pages present the highlights of some of Southeast Asia's most intriguing destinations.

KUALA LUMPUR

- Colonial architecture
- Towering skyscrapers
- Superb shopping
- Vibrant nightlife

Although Kuala Lumpur is Southeast Asia's youngest capital and has developed beyond recognition during the past few decades, vestiges of its colonial past still exist. This is in evidence particularly around Merdeka Square (see pp60–61) where the Royal Selangor Club (see p62) and Sultan Abdul Samad Building (see p62) display British and Islamic influences on the city's early architecture. Several museums, such as the National Museum (see p66) and the Islamic Arts Museum (see pp68–9), offer insights into Malaysia's history and its complex ethnic composition. While an effort has been made to preserve the city's colonial past, Kuala Lumpur is essentially a modern city, and few visitors can resist the urge to admire the panoramic view from the dizzying heights of the Petronas Towers (see p72) or Menara KL (see p74).

Kuala Lumpur is a shopper's paradise and for serious shopping it is necessary to become steeped in the city's shopping mall culture. Most of the biggest malls are in the Golden Triangle (see p74), which is also the hub of the trendiest restaurants, bars, and clubs. Night owls can choose between watching live bands and listening to DJs play the latest trance and techno in state-of-the-art nightclubs.

It is well worth taking a stroll around Chinatown (see p64), Little India (see p70), and the Malay-dominated Kampung Baru (see p72) to explore their busy markets and to get a sense of the city's vibrant ethnic diversity.

Rolling hills of the Cameron Highlands, Northwest Peninsula

NORTHWEST PENINSULA

- Gorgeous beaches
- Cool hill stations
- Historic Georgetown

After Kuala Lumpur, the most visited region of Malaysia is the Northwest Peninsula, and it is not difficult to see why. With fabulous offshore islands, refreshing breezes at the hill stations, historic forts and churches, and ancient shophouses in the older towns, the region has abundant attractions. The region is also home to the archaeologically significant Lembah Bujang (see p110), the site of an old Hindu-Buddhist empire.

Situated just south of Malaysia's border with Thailand, Pulau Langkawi (see pp112–15) is Malaysia's foremost island retreat. The island's luxury resorts and hotels provide all kinds of activities for visitors, such as snorkeling excursions, watersports, and boat trips to other islands in the archipelago. It is also worth exploring the main island's beautiful mountains and waterfalls.

Popular beaches off Malaysia's west coast are Batu Ferringhi (see p108) on Penang and Coral Bay on Pulau Pangkor (see pp94–5).

After sizzling in the sun, the cool climate of the hill stations is irresistible, and places such as Cameron Highlands (see pp92–3) and Fraser's Hill (see p91) remain as popular with visitors today as they were with the British in the past, who established weekend retreats here to escape the heat of Kuala Lumpur. The most popular activities here are trekking, visiting tea plantations, playing golf, evenings by a roaring fire in a mock-Tudor hotel.

Although there are many cities of interest in the north-west, many people consider Georgetown (see pp100–5), the capital of Penang, to be not only the most fascinating town in Malaysia, but in all of Asia. Its reputation is largely due to its heritage, which includes colonial buildings such as Fort Cornwallis (see p100), ancient Chinese shophouses, temples, and museums. Excellent shopping and eateries combine to make it one of the most visited places in the country.

SOUTHERN PENINSULA

- Rich heritage of Malacca
- Traditional Minangkabau architecture
- Diving at Pulau Tioman

The Southern Peninsula has some of Malaysia's most historically and culturally significant towns as well as some of its most popular offshore beaches. Culture buffs should head directly for Malacca (see pp122–7) on the southwest coast to see evidence of Portuguese, Dutch, and British colonization. Of particular interest are the Stadthuys (see p122), the former Dutch town hall which now houses the Museum of History and Ethnography, the nearby Christ Church (see p123), and the Baba-Nonya Heritage Museum (see pp126–7), which offers a glimpse of a traditional Peranakan house. Peranakan culture resulted from the intermarriage of Chinese traders with local Malay women. Among the other immigrants to the Southern Peninsula were the Minangkabau people from Sumatra, who settled around the towns of Seremban (see p120) and Sri Menanti (see p120). These towns are well worth visiting for the unique signature motif of Minangkabau architecture (see p121) – the sweeping, saddle-shaped roofs that adorn their houses and palaces, the most spectacular example in the area is the Istana Lama (see p120).

Off the southeast coast, Pulau Tioman (see pp130–31) in the Seribu Archipelago (see p129) is often regarded as one of the world's most beautiful islands. A trip to the island is rewarded with visions of mountain peaks swathed in clouds, inviting sandy beaches, and some of the best diving and snorkeling in Malaysia.

EASTERN AND CENTRAL PENINSULA

- Trekking in Taman Negara
- Picturesque Perhentian Islands
- Riding the Jungle Railway

This region's appeal lies in its spectacular natural beauty. It is also the area that is most Malay in character, with Kelantan and Terengganu being the repositories of Malay culture and artistry.

Nature-lovers flock to Taman Negara (see pp138–9), Malaysia's oldest and biggest national park, to view its wildlife, climb mountains, and take trips on Sungai Tembeling. Less visited than other national parks, Endau-Rompin National Park (see p137), a huge tract of protected rainforest, offers the chance to escape the crowds. Visitors come here to see the hornbills, mouse deer, wild pigs, and tree frogs that inhabit the area.

Small offshore islands, such as the Perhentian Islands (see p142) and Pulau Redang (see p142), which are surrounded by colorful coral reefs and shoals of tropical fish, are increasing in popularity with divers and snorkelers. For the moment, however, they still evoke a sensation of getting away from it all. Also an experience is a boat trip on the 12 interlocking lakes that constitute Tasik Chini (see p136).

Kota Bharu (see pp146–7) and Kuala Terengganu (see p141) are centers of local handicrafts. They also boast some of Malaysia's best street markets and offer delicious Malay cuisine.

A wonderful way to explore this remote region is on the Jungle Railway (see p149), which runs between Gemas and Kota Bharu.

The train stops at tiny towns along the way and its passengers are mostly local villagers. A ride along the railroad's length provides a perfect introduction to the hospitality of the Malays.

SARAWAK

- Historic Kuching
- Encounters with orangutans
- Visiting a longhouse
- Superb national parks

Located in Malaysian Borneo, Sarawak is Malaysia's largest state and a prime destination for nature-lovers, as well as those with an interest in the history of the region or the traditions of its indigenous communities. Kuching (see pp154–7), the capital, is undoubtedly one of Asia's most intriguing cities, and its town center still has many well-preserved colonial buildings and monuments, including the Sarawak Museum (see p154), the Courthouse (see p155), and the Astana (see p157).

Kuching is also ideally situated to explore the rest of the state. Just a short day trip away are Semenggoh Nature Reserve (see p161) and Bako National Park (see pp162–3), with easy walking trails and an abundance of wildlife. A visit to the longhouses of the indigenous people of Sarawak is another highlight and day trips and overnight stays are easily organized in Kuching. A trip to a longhouse includes a journey by longboat along the mighty Batang Rajang (see p164), which is the only way to reach the settlements.

Some of Sarawak's most spectacular attractions are scattered in the northeast of the state and are best accessed from the town of Miri (see p168). Among these are the Niah Caves National Park (see p168) and Mulu National Park (see pp170–71). These are sites of some of the world's biggest caves, which are also of archaeological significance. Mulu National Park offers treks to the limestone Pinnacles and the summit of Gunung Mulu. The remote Kelabit Highlands (see p169) have some of the most unspoilt natural beauty in Sarawak.

While in the region, curious travelers might like to visit the tiny Sultanate of Brunei (pp172–3), with its glittering mosques, deserted beaches, and unspoilt interior.

SABAH

- Climbing Gunung Kinabalu
- Fantastic dive sites
- Rewarding wildlife watching

Nicknamed the Land below the Wind, Sabah lacks the historic monuments of Sarawak, but makes up for this with a rich mosaic of ethnic groups, an exciting choice of adventure activities, and a sophisticated capital in Kota Kinabalu (see p178). Sabah's principal attraction is Kinabalu National Park (see p184–7), which encompasses Malaysia's highest peak. While some visitors attempt to conquer Kinabalu, others are content to simply enjoy the refreshing breezes and abundance of rare plants on its slopes.

Kota Kinabalu is also the access point for the Tunku Abdul Rahman National Park (see p179), made up of five beautiful islands whose coral reefs are rich with marine life. Other popular activities include exciting white-water rafting, especially on the Padas River (see p181).

On the east coast are excellent opportunities for wildlife-watching. Visitors can observe green and hawksbill turtles laying their eggs at the Turtle Island National Park (see pp190–91), orangutans at Sepilok Orangutan Rehabilitation Center (see p190), and an amazing variety of fauna at the Kinabatangan Wildlife Sanctuary (see p191). Wildlife-watching and thrilling treks are also possible at Danum Valley (see p192). Off the state's east coast, Pulau Sipadan (see pp194–5) and Pulau Lankayan (see p191) are some of the best dive sites in the world.

SINGAPORE

- Visiting historic buildings
- Shopping on Orchard Road
- Sentosa Island
- Dining at Boat Quay

While Malaysia's main draw is its natural wonders, the attractions of Singapore are mostly man-made. The city's skyline gleams with tall skyscrapers giving one the impression of modernity and sophistication. Its history is reflected in the many buildings which fill the Colonial Core, among them the world-famous Raffles Hotel (see pp214–15). A more contemporary attraction is the nearby Esplanade – Theaters on the Bay (see p210). The Thian Hock Keng Temple (see pp222–3) in Chinatown, Sri Srinivasa Perumal Temple (see pp230–31) in Little India, and the Islamic Kampung Glam (see pp226–7) are also frequently visited. The shops, temples, and mosques in these areas are a major draw for visitors. For day trips, there are plenty of offshore islands, the most popular being the island theme park of Sentosa (see pp244–5).

A visit to Singapore would hardly be complete without a shopping spree, especially at Orchard Road (see pp232–5), or without indulging in its fabulous food scene, from hawker stalls to chic eateries.

Putting Peninsular Malaysia on the Map

Bordered by Thailand to the north and connected to Singapore in the south by a causeway and a bridge, Peninsular Malaysia occupies the extreme south of mainland Southeast Asia, lying between 2 and 7 degrees north of the Equator. Off the west coast is the Strait of Malacca, while the east coast looks out onto the South China Sea. The majority of Malaysia's 25 million inhabitants live on the peninsula, heavily concentrated on the west coast, which includes the capital Kuala Lumpur. A mountainous ridge runs down the center of the peninsula, separating the densely forested and sparsely populated east coast from the west.

Putting Malaysian Borneo on the Map

Generally referred to as East Malaysia, Malaysian Borneo comprises the states of Sarawak, the largest in Malaysia, and Sabah, which together occupy more than half of the country's 127,445 sq miles (330,000 sq km). The states are located in the northern part of Borneo, the world's third-largest island, which they share with tiny Brunei and Kalimantan, Indonesia. Borneo lies about 373 miles (600 km) east of Peninsular Malaysia, from which it is separated by the South China Sea. The region is rich in natural resources, particularly oil and gas, and much of it is covered by rain forest and is sparsely populated. Of a population of 5 million people, most live in the provincial capitals, Kuching in Sarawak and Kota Kinabalu in Sabah, while many indigenous communities occupy remote outposts in the interior of the states.

Landscape and Wildlife

Although separated by the South China Sea, Peninsular Malaysia and Malaysian Borneo form a part of the Sunda Shelf, a tectonic plate that once joined them in a single land mass. As a result, they share many geological features such as mountains, river networks, pristine offshore islands, and some of the world's oldest rain forests. These rain forests provide a habitat for a wealth of flora and fauna, including more than 15,000 types of flowering plants and nearly 200,000 species of animals. Among these are well-known endemic species, such as the orangutan, proboscis monkey, and rafflesia. Singapore retains pockets of primary rain forest in its northern region, while three-quarters of Brunei is still covered by native forest.

The tualang tree, one of the tallest plants in Malaysia

RAIN FORESTS

The rain forests of Malaysia are about 130 million years old and nurture a phenomenal range of plant life, from the 262-ft (80-m) tall tualang tree to an array of ferns, mosses, fungi, and orchids. They also provide a home for orangutans, proboscis monkeys, tapirs, binturongs or Malay civet cats, and honey bears, as well as hundreds of species of birds and butterflies.

Malaysian tapirs are distinguished by their black and white coloring and pig-like snout. These vegetarian mammals are most active at night.

The orangutan is the only great ape found outside Africa. These red-haired primates now face extinction and are rarely seen in the wild.

LIMESTONE OUTCROPS

Many of Malaysia's mountains are formed of limestone, often rising dramatically out of the surrounding plain and containing massive cave networks caused by erosion. The most spectacular limestone outcrops are found in Sarawak's Niah Caves (see p168) and in Gunung Mulu National Park (see pp170-71).

Bats, such as the wrinkle-lipped bat, are common residents of limestone caves. Each evening, millions of bats take flight, filling the sky with a fantastic display.

Cave swiftlets are unusual birds that use echolocation to navigate the pitch-dark interiors of the caves. White nest swiftlets are prized in Malaysia for their edible nests.

MALAYSIA'S ENDANGERED SPECIES

Malaysia's population has doubled since the 1970s, and the growing demand for living space is gradually destroying the habitat of several wildlife species. In greatest danger is the Sumatran rhinoceros, whose numbers are now thought to be fewer than 100. Several other species, including the clouded leopard, Asian elephant, and the country's national animal, the tiger, have also seen a dramatic decline. Among marine life, leatherback turtles and dugongs face a similar threat.

Clouded leopards, tawny or silver-colored cats, are hunted for their pelt, teeth, and bones, the latter being used in traditional Asian medicines.

The Sumatran rhinoceros is critically endangered. Its last remaining habitats include Sabah and Endau-Rompin National Park (see p137).

COASTAL PLAINS

The west coast of Peninsular Malaysia constitutes a long plain that provides an ideal environment for human habitation. These plains were the site of the earliest British settlements. Most of the country's important towns and cities, such as Kuala Lumpur, were established here.

Mangroves are trees and shrubs that form swampy forests in saline coastal waters and provide a vital habitat for a number of wildlife species such as the proboscis monkey.

Fiddler crabs are critical to the wetland environment as they help aerate the soil by their feeding action. Males have asymmetrical and often brightly-colored claws.

OFFSHORE ISLANDS

The seas around both Peninsular Malaysia and Malaysian Borneo are studded with stunning islands, many of them surrounded by coral reefs that sustain an incredible wealth of marine life. Divers are drawn to islands such as Tioman and Sipadan to observe the thriving underwater world.

Dugongs take their name from the Malay word duyung, which means mermaid. Persistent hunting has resulted in the near extinction of these large sea mammals.

Coral reefs, formed by tiny marine animals called polyps and other organisms, are beautiful living structures. They are essential to the preservation of marine life.

Marine Life

Sea slug

The waters around both Peninsular Malaysia and Malaysian Borneo contain a huge diversity of marine life that attracts divers and snorkelers from around the world to gaze at brilliantly colored parrotfish, lionfish, and clownfish flitting around the vibrant coral reefs. For much of the year, the superb clarity of the water makes it easy to spot even the tiniest fish. The Malaysian government has designated 38 of its coral islands as protected areas to preserve their unique and biologically sensitive ecosystems.

Sea anemones, named for a species of garden flower, are brightly colored, predatory animals that eat fish, mussels, and zooplankton.

CORAL LIFE

Over 350 species of coral have been identified in Malaysian waters, making the country's reefs some of the most diverse in the world. Sadly, they are under threat from sediment build-up caused by ongoing logging, blast and cyanide fishing, and anchoring.

Gorgonian fan corals reach up to 16.5 ft (5 m) in height in the warm waters of the tropics, filtering out the plankton and zooxanthellae on which they live.

Brain corals are usually found in colonies and bear an uncanny resemblance to the human brain.

The star coral has a stone-like calcium skeleton and star-shaped polyp.

Yellow soft corals, so called because of their lack of a hard external skeleton, have polyps with eight tentacles, and come in a stunning kaleidoscope of colors.

Sunflower corals have long polyps tipped with stinging tentacles to catch plankton.

Coleman shrimp, always found in pairs, live on the toxic fire urchin. They clear a resting area of poisonous spines and sit protected from predators.

Mandarin fish live camouflaged in broken coral bottoms eating small crustaceans called copepods. The male is larger than the female and has a spiked dorsal fin which it uses to threaten other males.

Sea ferns are a type of gorgonian coral with varied shapes and colors.

Clownfish live in a symbiotic relationship with sea anemones, which defend them from predatory fish.

The lionfish, a reef dweller of spectacular appearance, is a deadly killer, armed with venomous spines that it uses to stun small fish.

Sea horses are unusual in that it is the males that give birth. Many species are almost transparent and hard to spot. Their use in Chinese medicine has put them under threat of extinction.

Lettuce coral is named for its green color and spiraling plates that resemble a growing lettuce.

TURTLE CONSERVATION

Until recently, turtles were among the most conspicuous forms of marine life in Malaysia. Of the four species of turtle known to breed in these waters – the green, the hawksbill, the olive ridley, and the leatherback – only the green is now commonly seen and the leatherback is an endangered species. There is ample evidence that human intervention is destroying the habitat and damaging the life cycle of these turtles. Throughout their lives, adult turtles are prone to getting caught in fishing lines and nets, while the increasing development of beaches has adverse effects on the numbers of nesting females, eggs, and hatchlings.

Peoples of Malaysia and Singapore

The indigenous people of Malaysia settled in the region some 40,000 years ago. Owing to its key position on maritime trade routes from around 2,500 years ago, the region acquired a large immigrant population. Today, Malays form 51 percent of the country's 27 million inhabitants, with the Chinese making up about a quarter, and the Indians, about 7 percent. Indigenous groups comprise the remainder of the population. By contrast, the Chinese form a strong majority in Singapore, where there are fewer Malays and Indians.

THE MALAY

The largest ethnic group of Malaysia is, by definition, a Muslim group. Believed to have arrived on the peninsula from Sumatra, the Malays began converting to Islam in the 15th century, owing to the rise of the Malay sultanates. Today, they predominate on the east coast of Peninsular Malaysia, while in Singapore, they constitute about 14 percent of the population.

Malays celebrate Hari Raya Puasa, also known as Hari Raya Aidilfitri (see p52), the Muslim New Year. Here, men are dressed in traditional Malaysian finery at a formal reception.

Traditional Malay culture revolves around village compounds called kampung, where inhabitants farm, fish, and practice crafts. Today, many Malays have migrated to urban centers.

THE CHINESE

Originally from southern China, most Chinese immigrants arrived in Malaysia during the 19th century to work as laborers in the burgeoning tin-mining industry.

Since then, they have dominated all aspects of commerce and today, Malaysia has several Chinatowns, where Chinese businesses thrive. In Singapore, more than three-quarters of the population is Chinese.

The Peranakans, also known as Straits Chinese or Baba-Nonya, are a community born out of marriages between Chinese and Malays from the 16th century onwards.

Chinese traders can be seen selling artifacts in Kuala Lumpur. The Chinese have historically played a major role in the Malaysian economy.

SOUTH ASIANS

Indians have been trading with Malaysia for over 2,000 years. However, most Malaysians of Indian origin settled here, like the Chinese, during the 19th century. Although the immigrants came largely from southern India, there are also people of northern Indian descent, notably the Sikhs.

Asian women of Indian descent sell vibrantly colored handmade silk at market stalls in Kuala Lumpur. The ethnic enclave of Little India (see p70) is packed with such stalls.

A rubber tapper of south Indian origin collects latex from a rubber tree. Indians have also traditionally been employed on tea estates.

INDIGENOUS PEOPLES OF MALAYSIA

The indigenous peoples of Peninsular Malaysia, the Orang Asli, are among the minority of the peninsula's population, and generally live in its more inaccessible areas. In contrast, indigenous tribes make up half the population of Sarawak and 66 percent of Sabah. Many of these groups, including the Iban and Bidayuh of Sarawak, live in longhouses and hold animist beliefs. Some, like the Kelabit and Bajau, have converted to Christianity or Islam. The tribes of Sabah, such as the Kadazan Dusun, are traditionally agriculturalists, but most other groups were semi-nomadic hunter-gatherer communities. They are now being encouraged by the government to live in towns and villages.

The Penan, the only true nomadic indigenous group in Malaysia, are skilled hunter-gatherers. The Penan consist of about 10,000 individuals who live in the upper Rajang and Limbang areas of Sarawak.

The Bajau are predominantly Muslim and are the second largest ethnic group in Sabah. Noted horsemen, the Bajau dress in elaborate costumes at the annual Tamu Besar in Kota Belud (see p53).

The Kadazan Dusun are the largest ethnic group in Sabah, made up of a number of subgroups, constituting about 25 percent of Sabah's population. They traditionally wear black silk outfits on festive occasions such as the Dusun Harvest Dance.

The Rungus are an indigenous people of northern Sabah. They are skilled in beadwork, weaving, and gong-making. Rungus people live communally in longhouses around Kudat (see p183).

The Bidayuh, or Land Dayaks, build their longhouses on hillsides, rather than near water as the other groups in Sarawak do. The third largest of Sarawak's indigenous peoples, they predominantly inhabit the region around Kuching (see p159).

The Orang Ulu, or upriver people, is an unofficial generic name for about 27 small and ethnically diverse groups, such as the Kayan and Kenyah, living in the interior of Sarawak.

BUMIPUTRAS

The Malaysian authorities make an important distinction between migrant peoples and the bumiputra, or sons of the soil. The latter group includes all Malays and indigenous peoples of the country. This recognition was brought in as part of the New Economic Policy, following race riots in 1969, to boost the bumiputra's economic standing in society. Though it was much criticized by the Chinese and Indian migrants who then dominated commerce, the policy has ultimately led to more stability as it gave rise to a rich Malay group, whose financial interests lie in maintaining political and economic harmony.

The Iban, also known as Sea Dayaks, are the largest ethnic group of Sarawak. They have an enduring reputation as fierce warriors and good hunters. The men are often heavily tattooed.

Islam

While Malaysia is home to people of many different faiths, Islam is the official religion. So closely bound is Malay cultural identity with Islam that the Bahasa Malaysia phrase for adopting Islam, masok melayu, means “to become a Malay.” Arab and Indian-Muslim merchants, who doubled as missionaries, began converting the local population from the 11th century onwards. Most Malay Muslims are orthodox Sunnis of the Shafi’i school but there are also smaller numbers of Shia Muslims and Sufi mystics. Just over 60 percent of Malaysia’s population is Muslim; in Singapore, they form around 14 percent of the population.

Domes are a characteristic feature of all mosques. They are generally onion-shaped structures and are often crowned by a crescent moon, the universal symbol of Islam.

The courtyard of a mosque is designed to accommodate a large number of worshippers. This courtyard at Johor Babru’s Sultan Abu Bakar Mosque holds 2,000 people.

A minaret is a lofty tower usually located in one of the corners of a mosque. From here the muezzin, or caller to prayer, summons the faithful five times a day.

ISLAMIC ARCHITECTURE

Despite the flamboyant exteriors of some Islamic architecture, its real beauty lies in the inner spaces of the courtyard and rooms. This has often led to it being called the architecture of the veil. With its gleaming golden dome and striking minarets, Ubudiah Mosque (right) in Kuala Kangsar is among Malaysia’s finest mosques.

This crenellated arch at Masjid Kapitan Kling (see pp101) in Georgetown, Penang, is Moorish in style, borrowing from the architectural tradition of Islamic Spain and the North African Maghreb.

Colorful Islamic tilework is characterized by intricate geometric patterns and graceful floral motifs. Traditional Malay Muslim houses and mosques are adorned with these tiles.

ISLAMIC FAITH

Islam, which means “submission to the will of God” in Arabic, was first revealed to the Prophet Muhammad at Mecca in Arabia, in AD 622. The principle of Islam rests on an unshakeable faith in a single deity, Allah, and on his word delivered by Muhammad in the Koran. The five pillars of Islamic faith are shabadab, witnessing that there is only one God; salat, performing the five daily prayers; saum, fasting during the month of Ramadan; zakat, the giving of alms; and hajj, or performing the pilgrimage to Mecca at least once in a lifetime.

The Koran is the central religious text of Islam, believed to be the inspired and immutable Word of God. Divided into 114 units and written in the Arabic script, it is often memorized verbatim by the faithful.

Salat is the name given to the obligatory prayers that are performed five times a day. The faithful always pray in the direction of Mecca. Salat is believed to establish a direct link between the worshiper and the worshiped.

Wuzu is the first step of the ablutions performed before commencing the salat. This is an essential act of spiritual and physical cleansing, as no prayer is acceptable without the complete wuzu.

Zapin is a traditional Malay folk dance, with dancers usually performing in pairs accompanied by Islamic devotional chanting. Believed to have been introduced by 14th-century Muslim missionaries from the Middle East, it is commonly performed in Johor Babru (see p128).

ISLAMIC ART

Architecture and calligraphy are the two most distinctive and elegant art forms in Islam. Both have developed to levels of great sophistication because of the general prohibition of representational art forms. The hadith, or Traditions of the Prophet Muhammad, decree that “the house which contains pictures will not be entered by the angels.” Geometry also plays a major role in both architecture and calligraphy.

The Jawi script is a Malay variant of Arabic writing. It is one of the two official scripts in Brunei and is also used in Malaysia and Singapore, particularly in religious calligraphy.

Batik, the art of wax-resist dyeing on textiles, is commonly used to pattern garments such as sarongs with bright designs. The most popular of such designs are floral prints (see p30).

Hinduism and Buddhism

Hinduism and Buddhism are the major religions of Malaysia and Singapore's South Asian and Chinese communities respectively. Although Hinduism dates back to at least 1,500 years in both countries, the religion only took root when contract laborers from India were recruited to work in rubber and coffee plantations in Malaysia in the late 19th and 20th centuries. Buddhism became a permanent feature in Malaysia and Singapore after Chinese immigrants spread the religion to every part of the country in the 19th century.

HINDUISM

Hinduism in Malaysia and Singapore, complete with its many rituals and deities, is directly taken from Indian Hindu traditions, especially those of southern India from where most Indian migrants originated.

Statues of deities are enshrined at the central altar.

Fresh flower garlands are used to venerate the gods.

The gopuram, or entrance gateway to Hindu temples, is often multitiered and elegantly decorated with colorful sculptures from the vast pantheon of Hindu gods.

Devotees come to temples for individual or communal puja, or worship, ritual occasions, and to make offerings to honor the gods.

Offerings may include flowers, incense, and fruit such as coconuts, which are sprinkled with holy water during prayers.

Components of a prayer ritual include frankincense, myrrh, and other aromatic combustibles.

Hindu priests are Brahmins who belong to the highest of the four main castes. They tend to the temple and officiate at ceremonies.

SHAIVISM

Shaivism is a form of Hinduism which worships Lord Shiva as the main manifestation of the supreme being. His consort, Parvati, and their two sons, Murugan and Ganapati, are also worshiped by Shaivites. Shaivism grew prominent in Malaysia and Singapore as the Indian immigrants who settled there in the 19th century were mainly from southern India where the worship of Shiva is popular. The Sri Shivan temples in Singapore and Malaysia are especially revered by Shaivites.

BUDDHISM

In both Malaysia and Singapore the Chinese communities follow the Mahayana school of Buddhism practiced in China, Japan, Korea, and Vietnam. The Thais of Singapore and the Orang Syam, or indigenous Thais of Malaysia, follow Theravada Buddhism, practiced in Thailand, Lao PDR (formerly Laos), Cambodia, Myanmar, and Sri Lanka. Buddhism in both countries is a fusion of different beliefs. In Singapore it is combined with Confucianism, Taoism, and ancestor worship. Buddhism is also personalized and centers around Kuan Yin, the goddess of mercy. Belief in luck and filial piety are also central features of Buddhism.

Buddhist monks shave their heads, wear saffron robes, and generally go barefoot to indicate a life of austerity.

The Buddha's halo, or nimbus, commonly depicted in Buddhist art, signifies enlightenment and spiritual development.

An urna, or a small protuberance between the Buddha's eyes, represents the "third eye" of spiritual vision, a mark of a holy man.

The Buddha is often depicted with a serene expression and a faint smile.

The wheel turning pose represents the Wheel of Law, or dharmachakra, set in motion by the Buddha's first sermon at Sarnath, India.

Bare feet with both soles turned upward and resting on opposite thighs signifies meditation.

The Buddha's hair is generally arranged in the form of snail shell curls, and surmounted by a ushnisa, or topknot.

Elongated earlobes are thought to be the result of heavy earrings worn by the Buddha as a prince.

A simple monk's robe represents the Buddha's life of renunciation.

The cross-legged posture is the position in which Buddha is most commonly portrayed.

Devout Buddhists burn incense and make offerings at temples across Malaysia and Singapore to show respect to the Buddha, the sangha, or order of monks, and the dharma, or teachings of the Buddhist canon. Offerings often include fruit and flowers. Worshipers usually ask for good health and prosperity.

PRINCIPLES OF BUDDHISM

Despite the existence of two main schools and different sects that have evolved over the centuries, the central principles of Buddhism are common to most forms of the religion. These include the Four Noble Truths, the Eight Fold Path, karma, or the moral law of cause and effect, which is symbolized by the Wheel of Law, and nirvana, or enlightenment. The Mahayana, or Greater Vehicle, school stresses the role of the bodhisattva or religious adept who, having gained nirvana, voluntarily renounces it to enlighten others. The Theravada, or Lesser Vehicle, school emphasizes the role of the arhat, or worthy one, who has attained nirvana.

Secular Architecture

The traditional vernacular architecture of Malaysia and Singapore is mainly Malay and Straits Chinese, but a strong colonial influence is also apparent in buildings constructed during periods of British, Portuguese, and Dutch rule. In contrast, both countries boast stunning modern architecture, most prominently seen in their soaring skyscrapers. This is particularly true of Kuala Lumpur and Singapore.

The Singapore skyline is dominated by spectacular high-rise buildings

STRAITS CHINESE

Straits Chinese architecture centers on the ubiquitous shophouse, found throughout Malaysia and Singapore. Buildings of this style were introduced by immigrants from the Guangdong province of southern China.

Classic shophouses comprise a ground floor, whose street-facing portion is used to conduct business, and upper floors that serve as living quarters.

TRADITIONAL MALAY HOUSE

The traditional Malay house tends to be raised on stilts, with extensions added when necessary. The house is centered around the rumah ibu, or main living room.

Stilts that protect the house from floods

The interiors are ventilated by many open spaces such as verandas and windows. Traditionally, the houses have wooden walls and thatched roofs.

LONGHOUSES

Indigenous peoples of Sabah and Sarawak traditionally live in longhouse communities (see p167), with each family occupying a separate apartment under a single contiguous roof. The entire structure is raised on stilts.

Longhouses commonly have a covered veranda, or ruai, which runs the length of the building, backed by a series of living quarters, or bileks. There is also a tanju, or open veranda.

MINANGKABAU

The spectacular architecture of the Minangkabau people, concentrated in the state of Negeri Sembilan, is chiefly distinguished by upswept roofs rising to pointed peaks that represent the horns of a victorious buffalo, or minangkabau (see p121). Traditionally, the roofs were thatched with the fronds of the nipa palm, but today they are more usually shingled, or even made from galvanized iron.

Minangkabau houses, or rumah minangkabau, are recognizable by the distinctive style of their roofs.

COLONIAL BUILDINGS

Colonial buildings in both Malaysia and Singapore combine British Indian, Dutch East Indian, and Portuguese styles, often combined with indigenous Malay elements, Islamic motifs, and classical European flourishes. Elaborate decorations and wooden traceries lend individuality and style.

Mock-Tudor bungalows are not uncommon in the hill stations of Peninsular Malaysia. These were built by British plantation owners.

The Raffles Hotel in Singapore dates from 1887 and is named after Sir Stamford Raffles, the founder of Singapore (see pp214–15). It is the epitome of colonial elegance.

MODERN ARCHITECTURE

Both Malaysia and Singapore are distinguished by their steel and concrete skyscrapers, often with façades of light and heat-reflecting mirrored glass. While contemporary buildings in Malaysia incorporate elements of traditional Islamic architecture, Singaporean designs remain entirely modernistic.

The futuristic Esplanade – Theaters on the Bay, with twin domes (see p210), adds to Singapore's ultramodern cityscape, in contrast with the city's traditional Indian, Chinese, and colonial architecture.

Festivals of Malaysia and Singapore

Life in Malaysia and Singapore is punctuated with festivals, which are both frequent and spectacular. Although some festivals have a fixed date according to the international calendar, the Malay Muslim, Hindu, and Chinese traditions all set their festive days according to the lunar calendar (see p333), making these celebrations movable events. Fortunately, the Malaysia and Singapore tourist boards regularly publish calendars of national and local festivals.

Giant banners in abundance, marking the beginning of the Chinese New Year

The traditional dinner with the entire family is perhaps the most important aspect of the celebrations at the New Year, which is also considered the time for new beginnings.

CHINESE NEW YEAR

The most significant festival for the Chinese is the Lunar New Year. In Singapore and in some parts of Malaysia, such as Kuala Lumpur, Ipoh, Taiping, and Johor Bahru, this 15-day festival is marked by cingay, a joyous street parade with lion dancers, stilt-walkers, giant banners, music, and colorful floats. Almost all the festival rituals are focused on bringing good luck and prosperity.

The display of fireworks in the night skies above the Petronas Towers is a spectacular highlight of the extravagant New Year's Eve celebrations in Kuala Lumpur.

The dragon is a mythical beast symbolizing justice, wealth, and good fortune.

The colors used are predominantly red and gold, representing prosperity and long life.

Seven poles support the body, although more may be needed if the dragon is long.

The leader of the team must be the most skilled and experienced of the dancers as the others follow him.

The lion dance is a traditional dance form that dates back more than a thousand years. A pair of dancers trained in martial arts form the fore and hind legs of the lion, mimicking its motions.

HARI RAYA PUASA

For Malay Muslims, the most important festival of the year is Hari Raya Puasa, also known as Aidilfitri in Malay, marking the end of the fasting month of Ramadan. Throughout the ninth month of the Muslim calendar, believers abstain from eating and drinking between sunrise and sunset. With the sighting of the new moon on the 30th day of the ninth month, Ramadan ends and the tenth month is ushered in with feasting on traditional fare such as ketupat, or rice cakes, and lemang, or glutinous rice.

The long, narrow body of the dragon is designed for sinuous movement.

Dragon dancers must be fit and need to practice regularly to put on a good show.

Muslim men start the day by congregating at mosques for morning prayers, dressed in their finest clothes. Graves are cleaned and quarrels forgiven before the festivities begin.

Muslim children light firecrackers on Hari Raya Puasa and are given duit raya, or gifts of money, in small green envelopes. For three days, family, friends, and neighbors visit each other.

THAIPUSAM

Celebrated by the southern Indian communities of Malaysia and Singapore, Thaipusam honors the Hindu god Murugan, youngest son of the gods Shiva and Parvati. It is held in the Tamil month of Thai (between January and February). The largest Thaipusam festival takes place at the Batu Caves, with over one million devotees and 10,000 tourists attending it. Worshipers shave their heads and undertake a pilgrimage along a set route, performing various acts of devotion along the way.

Kavadi carriers bold elaborately decorated metal frames called kavadi. Adorned with peacock feathers, these portable altars are attached to devotees with skewers pierced into the skin.

The Batu Caves (see p90), dedicated to Lord Murugan, are one of the prime pilgrimage sites for Malaysia's Hindus. A spectacular scene unfolds here during Thaipusam, when an estimated one million pilgrims climb the 272 steps to the temple at the summit.

Arts and Crafts of Malaysia

Malaysia has a wealth of indigenous artistic traditions, many dating back centuries, but its arts and crafts have also been enriched by the cultural influences of Chinese, Indians, and other peoples. While Peninsular Malaysia excels at metalwork, Malaysian Borneo produces the most spectacular woodcarvings. Besides pottery, ceramic, brass, and silverware, a wide range of regional artistry, such as kite-making in Kota Bharu, is available. The country has a flourishing art scene, influenced by Hindu, Buddhist, Islamic, and Chinese cultures, and more recently by Western art.

MALAYSIAN TEXTILES

Batik, which means writing in wax, is extremely popular in Malaysia, forming part of the Malay national dress. Among the best places to buy traditional batik is Kuching in Sarawak. The country's textile traditions also encompass fine silk and cotton cloth originally created for the royal courts. These include kain lemar, or silk brocade interwoven with ikat; kain sutera, or woven silk; kain songket, or rich brocade; and kain mastuli, or heavy silk.

Ikat cloth is made using a tie-and-dye technique on the threads before they are woven into elaborate patterns. Today, the best ikat, such as this decorative Iban blanket, comes from Sarawak.

Pua kumbu cloths are woven by the Iban for use in ceremonies and for decoration. Weaving is done primarily by women and the motif they use once showed their status. Today, motifs vary from plant and animal themes to more abstract patterns.

SONGKET SILK

The term songket is derived from the Malay menyongket, which means to embroider with silver or gold thread. The metallic thread inserted between the silk strands stands out on the background cloth, creating a shimmering effect.

Kain sutera is a type of songket used for sarongs traditionally worn on formal or ceremonial occasions.

Kain mastuli is a rich and heavy variety of songket silk thread that is used when making traditional garments and decorative fabrics.

Batik motifs are usually floral or geometric.

Melted wax is applied to the cloth to prevent dyes from penetrating.

WOODCARVING

Malaysian Borneo boasts the best and most varied forms of woodcarving in the country. Indigenous people of the region are known for their carving of spirit and totem figures, masks, and good luck charms.

Elaborate wooden masks are carved by the indigenous peoples of Malaysian Borneo to fend off evil and bad luck.

METALWORK

Traditional Malaysian silverware and jewelry has been influenced by the Peranakan. Metalware produced and sold in the markets of Penang, Malacca, and Kuching often shows considerable southern Indian influence. The products include gongs produced in Sumangkap (see p182), a range of brass items, and keris.

Keris, or daggers, are weapons unique to Malay culture. They are said to possess magical powers that protect their owners and bring death to enemies.

Brass is used for making household, decorative, and ceremonial objects. This brass screen in Kuala Lumpur's Sri Kamthaswamy Hindu Temple shows the intricate detailing that is typical of Malaysian craftsmanship.

Silverware of the finest quality is produced in Kelantan and Terengganu. Malaysian silverware is known for its intricate filigree work and designs.

THE HISTORY OF MALAYSIA AND SINGAPORE

The early history of the Malay peninsula is shrouded in mystery. But records of the subsequent centuries depict a great trading nation beleaguered by foreign invaders attracted by its abundant natural wealth and strategic position between the key maritime trade centers of India and China. Following their independence, Malaysia and Singapore have rapidly emerged as models of economic progress and modernization.

The discovery, in 1958, of a human skull at Niah Caves in Sarawak and stone tools from Perak point towards human occupation of the region as far back as 40,000 BC. Findings of pottery and stone objects from both the peninsula and Malaysian Borneo, dating between 2800 and 500 BC, prove the existence of a Neolithic culture in this region.

Although few iron and bronze objects have been found in Malaysia, evidence in the form of huge Bronze Age Dongson drums links Peninsular Malaysia to northern Vietnam at around 500–300 BC. The drums, together with beads and pottery from India and China also found on the peninsula and dating back to the same time, indicate that international trade networks were already well-established and foreign goods were being exchanged for the region's rich resources, including tin, gold, aromatic woods, and spices. So rich was this trade that the Indians seem to have referred to the peninsula as suvarnabhumi, or the land of gold, from as early on as 200 BC. The growth of trade relations with India brought the coastal peoples of the Strait of Malacca into contact with Buddhism and Hinduism, as well as with Indian notions of kingship. For example, the Malay word for ruler, rajah, was borrowed from Sanskrit. Significant archaeological finds, such as Sanskrit inscriptions and Hindu and Buddhist statues (especially in Kedah in northwest Malaysia), suggest that Indian influence was well-established in a number of settlements along the west coast of the peninsula by the 5th century AD.

Chinese trade was significant too, beginning from the 2nd century, via the Cambodian kingdom of Funan which extended its influence into the northern peninsula. The growing use of the sea to transport goods from western Asia to China gave further impetus to the emergence of port kingdoms in the Malaysian world.

SRIVIJAYA

The first of the port kingdoms to become a great pan-Malay confederation was the Hindu-Buddhist, maritime trade-based empire of Srivijaya. It emerged in the course of the 7th century and established its capital near Palembang in south-eastern Sumatra.

Srivijaya evolved into a wealthy and powerful Malay kingdom, dominating maritime passages around the Strait of Malacca and the Sunda Strait (between Java and Sumatra), as well as the overland portage routes across Peninsular Malaysia as far north as Nakhon Si Thammarat in present-day Thailand. From its strategic position, Srivijaya was able to attract and monopolize overseas commerce between India and China, acting as a great entrepôt for Southeast Asian shipping as well as a source for rare and valuable goods, from scented woods to gold.

The rulers of Srivijaya developed methods of government which became popular with succeeding kingdoms such as Malacca. Paramount among these concepts was complete loyalty to the ruler, who was associated with divine powers – disloyalty was severely punished. While a mixture of Hinduism, Buddhism, and indigenous spirit belief was practiced in Srivijaya, it gained prominence as a center of Buddhist learning.

Srivijaya prospered until the 11th century, after which it began to decline, weakened by wars both with Java and the south Indian Chola kingdom. The power of the Hindu-Buddhist rajahs was also being undermined by Islam. At the same time, the increasing presence of Chinese ships encouraged Srivijaya's vassals to break away from Palembang's grip. By the late-13th century, the Thai kingdoms of Sukhothai and Ayutthaya had acquired considerable influence over the peninsula, as had the Hindu Majapahit empire of Java over southeast Sumatra.

THE SPREAD OF ISLAM

Islam came to Southeast Asia as a religion of trade, not one of conquest. Introduced by Arab merchants and missionaries around the 11th century, the religion spread rapidly across Peninsular Malaysia with Indian-Muslim traders. The Terengganu Stone, discovered in the peninsula's northeastern province in 1899, bears an inscription in the Malay Arabic script, suggesting that Islamic law was established here as early as 1303. However, Islam received its greatest boost when it was made state religion of the Sultanate of Malacca in the 15th century. Spreading to the farthest corners of the Malaccan empire, Islam gradually came to be associated with the national identity of Malays.

THE RISE OF MALACCA

Around 1400, Parameswara, the prince of Palembang, attempted to throw off Javanese domination over his realm by fleeing to Tumasik in present-day Singapore, before finally establishing a new kingdom at Malacca. Ideally located on the Strait of Malacca and within easy reach of the spice islands of Indonesia, the new state attracted trade from across Asia.

In 1405, Zheng He, the great Chinese Ming admiral, launched his explorations of Southeast Asia and the Indian Ocean, and made Malacca the foremost outpost for his fleet. This helped secure a trade agreement with China as well as protection from its emperor against the constant threat of Siamese attacks. The city of Malacca became truly cosmopolitan: given the seasonal winds, ships from China, Japan, India, and Persia might spend at least a year in the port.

The spread of Islam in Malacca is believed to have taken place between 1425 and 1445, when Parameswara's successors made Islam the state religion and took the title of Sultan, thus giving rise to the Sultanate of Malacca. The adoption of Islam helped link Malacca to the vast Muslim trading world, and by the end of the 15th century it was the region's major entrepôt, dominating much of the Malay world. Though ties with the Imperial Court in China were fostered for added protection, the sultanate developed into an independent and centralized administration with the sultan as absolute ruler. He oversaw a fairly complex legal and administrative structure which ensured the stability of the kingdom. High-ranking officials of the state included the bendahara, or prime minister, the laksamanas, or admirals, who commanded the army and navy, the temenggung, or minister responsible for defense and justice, and the syahbandar, or harbor master. Government was formalized in the Undang-Undang Malacca, or codified laws of Malacca, which constantly evolved under successive sultans. The basis for Malaccan law was threefold – Hindu-Buddhist tradition, Islamic tradition, and adapt, or indigenous tradition. Concurrently, Malacca became a center for Islamic dissemination throughout present-day Malaysia, Indonesia, and Brunei. The state's influence was reflected in the emergence of the Malay language as the language of trade in the region.

PORTUGUESE CONQUEST

By the 15th century, the Portuguese were eager to challenge Venice's position as the sole suppliers of spices in Europe, as well as to break the monopoly of the Arab and Indian Muslim traders over the immensely valuable spice trade. In 1509, an initial Portuguese expedition under Admiral Lopez de Sequeira arrived in Malacca, but was driven off by the sultan's army. A much larger and better-equipped fleet, led by Admiral Alfonso de Albuquerque in 1511, succeeded in capturing Malacca after a 40-day siege, ushering in the era of European colonial powers in the region. Sultan Mahmud Shah escaped to the interior of the peninsula, where his elder son, Muzaffar Shah, eventually established the Sultanate of Perak in the north, and his younger son, Alauddin Riyat Shah, founded the Johor Sultanate in the south. This period also saw the rise of the Sumatran state of Aceh as a regional power.

Although Malacca remained a Portuguese colony for over a century, the period saw a three-way struggle between Aceh, the sultanates of Johor and Perak, and the Portuguese, for the control of Malacca, which lasted most of the 16th century.

THE DUTCH ERA

The new kingdom of Johor faced its own share of assaults, from both the Portuguese and Aceh, and it was not until the arrival of the Dutch, toward the end of the 16th century, that it succeeded in consolidating its position.

Looking to protect itself against its enemies, the sultan forged an alliance with the Dutch. In 1602, all the Dutch trading enterprises in Asia combined to form The United Netherlands Chartered East India Company (VOC), which recognized the need to seize control of Malacca to gain monopoly of the spice trade. In 1640, the Dutch, with the help of the Sultan of Johor, attacked Malacca and after a year-long siege succeeded in displacing the Portuguese. In return for its support, Johor was granted trading privileges and by the end of the 17th century it had grown into a powerful kingdom. At the height of its power it controlled southern Peninsular Malaysia and part of eastern Sumatra.

When the Dutch took over, much of Malacca lay in ruin owing to the 1640–41 siege. During their rule, the Dutch rebuilt the city and many of these structures survive to this day. Among the prominent buildings is the Stadthuys (see p122), the oldest Dutch building in Southeast Asia. Yet, over the next 180 years under the Dutch, Malacca's prosperity declined as the new colonial rulers concentrated on

BORNEO

Until the arrival of the British, the areas that now comprise Sarawak, Sabah, and the tiny, oil-rich state of Brunei had little to do with the Malay peninsula. Most of Borneo, as well as part of the neighboring Sulu Archipelago (present-day Philippines), was ruled by the powerful Brunei Sultanate. In 1704, during a period of internal unrest, Brunei appears to have ceded part of Sabah to the Sultan of Sulu in return for the latter's military assistance. The territory eventually passed to Malaysia via the British, but the Philippines tried to reclaim Sabah as their land after the formation of Malaysia in 1963.

ARRIVAL OF THE BRITISH

Things changed dramatically in Malaysia with the arrival of the British in the 18th century. The British East India Company (EIC) needed a halfway base for their maritime trade with India and China. In 1786, Sir Francis Light (see p103) signed a treaty and acquired Penang from the Sultan of Kedah on behalf of the company and established it as a commercial and naval base. He also declared it as a free trading port and Penang soon thrived. After Europe's Napoleonic Wars (1800–15), Britain emerged as the leading power in Asia. In 1819, Sir Stamford Raffles (see p38) repeated Light's work at Penang with considerable success in Singapore, which also became a booming trade port. In 1824, Britain and the Netherlands signed the Anglo-

Dutch Treaty dividing the Malay world, with the Malay peninsula passing to Britain and the bulk of the Indonesian Archipelago to the Dutch. Thus, Malacca passed to the British in exchange for Bengkulu on Sumatra, which went to Holland.

Initial British policy towards Malaysia was determinedly one of "trade, not territory," and also like the Dutch, but unlike the Portuguese, the British were not interested in spreading Christianity, but rather in free trade and profit. They limited their direct control to the Straits Settlements (see pp38–9), formed in 1826. The Malay Peninsula became part of Britain's sphere of influence, but remained largely self-governing and independent.

The Straits Settlements

Between 1826 and 1946, the British Crown held a group of geographically separate territories consisting of Penang, Malacca, Singapore, Province Wellesley, and surrounding islands, under the collective name of the Straits Settlements. Colonial influence in the area, however, began as early as 1786, when the Sultan of Kedah ceded Penang to the British East India Company in exchange for protection from Siam and Burma. As other areas came under colonial power, they were built up to promote trade. The consequent close association of the region is still visible today in the racial and cultural ties of its mixed ethnic communities and the legacies of its architectural style and landmarks.

The British in Penang employed Chinese and Indian migrants, and sometimes indigenous Malays, as laborers on road construction projects throughout the island.

COLONIZATION

The British did not arrive at the Straits Settlements in large numbers, instead establishing themselves as the ruling elite and employing migrants from India, China, and other parts of the British Empire to administer the new colonies and serve as soldiers, laborers, and tradesmen.

STAMFORD RAFFLES

Sir Stamford Raffles

One of the British Empire's most celebrated statesmen, Sir Thomas Stamford Raffles (1781–1826) began his career at the age of 14 as a clerk with the British East India Company in London. He worked his way up to Lieutenant-Governor of Java in 1811 and was knighted in 1817. In 1819, Raffles signed a treaty with a local sultan, laying the foundation for modern Singapore. Also a founder and first president of the Zoological Society of London, he is remembered in the name of the largest flower in the world, the rafflesia.

Chinese junks were used extensively for trade between the Settlements.

Sultan Abdul Hamid Halim Shah of Kedah and his entourage in 1900. Like all sultans who reigned after the British took control of Penang in 1786, he had no real power in the island's government.

TRADE

The Straits Settlements were acquired by the British to function as free trade ports, not to promote territorial ambitions. By establishing such ports, Britain sought to dominate trade routes between Europe and Asia.

Spice plantations were set up in Penang to grow mace, nutmeg, cinnamon, and pepper, which were rare and valuable commodities in 18th-century Europe.

Penang's first coin, bearing the British East India Company crest, was minted in 1787 in Calcutta.

Gas lighting was one of many innovations brought by the British to the Settlements.

A new port at Singapore was envisaged by Raffles as a free port astride the sea lanes between Europe and the Far East. Today, it is one of the busiest ports in the world.

CULTURE

The Straits Settlements developed as a fascinating melting pot of cultures. Immigrants from Asia lived side by side with Portuguese, Dutch, and British settlers, as well as indigenous Malays.

Early Chinese settlers, as well as Peranakan men, wore their hair in distinctive long pony-tails, or queues, well into the late-19th century. This was a sign of their allegiance to the Qing Empire.

Peranakan culture grew alongside the development of the Settlements. New customs were born out of the marriages between the Chinese and Malay, which blended the traditions of each culture. At Peranakan weddings, for example, couples traditionally wore Chinese dress.

Kling is an outdated name for early Tamil settlers originating from southern India. They formed the majority of South Asian migrants to the Straits Settlements.

THE RISE OF THE WHITE RAJAHS

Britain did not include Borneo in the Anglo-Dutch Treaty, preferring to concentrate their interests on the peninsula. By the late 18th century, Brunei was in decline and faced increasing unrest from the indigenous peoples as well as territorial claims from the Sulu Sultanate. In 1838, James Brooke, an explorer and former officer with the East India Company, set out to seek his fortune in the East Indies. En route he passed through Singapore and was asked by the British governor to deliver a message to

James Brooke, the first White Rajah of Sarawak

Rajah Muda Hashim, Governor of Kuching in Sarawak. Brooke arrived in Sarawak in 1839 to find the territory in a state of revolt, with the indigenous Dayaks rising up against the Sultan of Brunei. He was enlisted to help the sultan and together they crushed the rebellion within a year.

As a reward, in 1841, the sultan made Brooke the Rajah of Sarawak, the first of three White Rajahs (see p157). Brooke, backed by British naval power, used his position to consolidate his rule over the indigenous people, as well as ward off unruly Malay pirates who wreaked havoc on the coast. Brooke's rule was remarkably progressive, and he sought to establish law and order as well as welfare for the local people. He gradually won the trust of the indigenous communities, although he faced and put down a rebellion by Chinese migrants in 1857. When he died in 1868, James Brooke was succeeded as rajah by his nephew, Charles Brooke (1829–1917) who was responsible for expanding the territory of Sarawak at the expense of the shrinking Brunei Sultanate. During his reign, Sarawak also became a British protectorate in 1888, with the Brooke family retaining control of the internal administration.

EXPANSION OF BRITISH CONTROL

In the mid-19th century, Sabah remained under the loose control of Brunei (with Sulu chiefs exercising authority at a local level). Enfeebled by internal disputes, Brunei sought to lease the territory, first to Claude Lee Moses, the American consul in Brunei, in 1865, then to Baron von Overbeck, the Austrian consul in Hong Kong in 1875, and finally to Englishman Alfred Dent, who established the British North Borneo Company in 1881. In 1888, Sabah, along with Sarawak, came under British government protection. Like the White Rajahs, however, the company retained control of internal administration. A resistance movement started by Mat Salleh in 1895 against the company's rule was not defeated until 1905 (five years after Mat Salleh's death). Following that, Sabah remained a quiet colonial backwater.

At about the same time, the British began to refine their policies of non-intervention in the Malay peninsular states. The booming tin industry had attracted large numbers of Chinese immigrants to the states of Perak and Selangor. This led to ethnic clashes with the Malays, as well as to civil disorders caused by Chinese criminal gangs. Infighting also raged in various Malay sultanates. The British feared that another major European power, notably Germany, might exploit these weaknesses to gain a foothold on the Malaysian mainland. Hence, in 1874, through the Treaty of Pangkor, the first British Resident was appointed in Perak, whom the sultan agreed to consult on all issues except those involving Muslim religion and Malay custom. However, increased British control of judicial and financial affairs sparked unrest amongst the Perak Malays and led to the murder of the first Resident, J.W.W. Birch, in 1875.

Residents continued. In 1896, the states of Pahang, Selangor, and Negeri Sembilan joined Perak as part of the British-controlled Federated Malay States, which were administered from the Sultan Abdul Samad Building in Kuala Lumpur. In 1909, under the terms of the Anglo-Siamese Treaty, the former Thai tributaries of Kelantan, Terengganu, Kedah, and Perlis, joined by Johor in 1914, came under the system of British Residents, becoming known as the Unfederated Malay States. Thus, together with the Straits Settlements and Sabah, Sarawak, and Brunei, British consolidation of power over Malaya was complete by World War I.

COLONIAL LIFE

Having taken charge of the entire peninsula, the British turned their energies towards developing a productive economy. Peninsular Malaysia emerged in the 20th century as the world's leading producer of both rubber and tin. In Borneo, Sarawak was a securely established and relatively prosperous territory by the time Charles Vyner Brooke took over as the third White Rajah in 1917, while Sabah was profiting from the timber, rubber, and tobacco industries. Large-scale immigration from India and China was encouraged to supply the workforce for the colonial economy. The Malays were recognized as indigenous people, but were largely encouraged to stay in their villages. By the late 1930s, ordinary Malays were less well off than the urban Chinese, and in danger of becoming a minority in their own homeland. The stage had been set for decades of racial tensions. Politicization and elite sentiment for independence along ethnic lines also began to grow.

The advent of World War II ensured that colonial life would never be the same.

WORLD WAR II

Troops of the Japanese Imperial Army landed on the east coast of the peninsula in December 1941. Within two months, they had conquered it, and Singapore, and Borneo as well. For the next three years they would unleash a particularly ruthless regime. The sook ching (purification by elimination) massacres in the first months of Japanese rule involved the deaths of between 40,000 and 70,000 ethnic Chinese in Singapore alone. About 75,000 Malaysians, mostly Indian Tamils, were recruited to work on the Burma-Thailand "Death" Railway. With malnourishment, appalling working conditions, and the brutality of the Japanese overseers, death rates escalated to 40 percent.

Some Malaysians resisted, notably the guerrilla units of the Malayan Communist Party (MCP), armed by British saboteurs in the underground Force 136. At the same time, to bolster their rule, the Japanese encouraged radical Malayan nationalists to organize paramilitary and political organizations. Hopelessly overstretched throughout Asia and the Pacific, Japanese rule had induced economic chaos in the Malay peninsula and Borneo by 1944. But it was the dropping of atomic bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki in August 1945 that finally forced Japan to surrender.

THE EMERGENCY

In the reoccupation, the first British step was to establish the Malayan Union in 1946. This united all the peninsular states into a central administration under British rule and granted equal citizenship rights to all ethnic groups. Singapore, Sabah, and Sarawak were to be governed separately as crown colonies.

The union was strongly opposed by the Malay population and led to the formation of the first Malay political party, the United Malays National Organisation (UMNO). The Malayan Union was subsequently replaced by the Federation of Malaya, which excluded Singapore, and granted special rights to the Malays. However, the Chinese were dissatisfied with this development, and in June 1948, the Malayan Races Liberation Army (MRLA), the armed wing of the MCP, returned to the jungle to begin an insurgency against the British, under the leadership of Chin Peng. So began the hard-fought Emergency.

Chin Peng's war was ultimately doomed. Few Malays or Indians supported the MCP, while the resettlement of 400,000 rural Chinese cut off the guerrillas from food and intelligence supplies. The MCP leaders finally fled to Thailand in the late 1950s, and by 1960 the government of independent Malaya declared the Emergency over.

MERDEKA (INDEPENDENCE)

Parallel to their campaign against the MRLA, the British pursued talks with anti-communist Malay nationalists, promising independence. In 1955, elections were held to determine the government for the new country. This was won by the Alliance Party, formed by the UMNO, the Malayan Chinese Association, and the Malayan Indian Congress. On August 31, 1957, Malaya gained independence, with Tunku Abdul Rahman as its first prime minister. Sarawak, Sabah, and Singapore remained crown colonies, although Singapore became self-governing in 1959. In 1961, a new federation uniting the peninsular states, Singapore, Sarawak, Sabah, and Brunei, was proposed. Despite the opposition from Indonesia and the Philippines, the planned union went ahead, and Malaysia was proclaimed on September 16, 1963, but without Brunei, which opted out.

KONFRONTASI

Both Indonesia and the Philippines immediately severed diplomatic relations with the new state of Malaysia. Indonesian president Sukarno began a policy of Konfrontasi, or confrontation, involving infiltration and sabotage. Indonesian armed troops crossed into Sabah and Sarawak, and even landed in Peninsular Malaysia and Singapore. Over the next four years the Malaysian army, backed by British, New Zealand, and Australian forces, defeated Indonesian attempts to subvert the new federation. Malaysia was thus established as a secure, internationally recognized state. However, in 1965, Singapore reluctantly left the Malaysian Federation due to continuing political disagreements and became an independent country. Still, the two neighbors remained closely associated. In 1967, Malaysia and Singapore joined the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) and were two of its five original members.

ETHNIC AND ECONOMIC TENSIONS

In the late 1960s, Malaysia and Singapore were still relatively impoverished by the effects of war and also riven with ethnic tensions. The departure of Singapore from the Federation of Malaysia ensured a Malay Muslim majority within Malaysia, but Malay politicians and the ethnic Malay population were still concerned by the economic power wielded by the Chinese. In 1967, the National Language Act was passed to ensure the primacy of the Malay language. The move was resented by the Chinese. Ethnic tensions first came to a head in Singapore, where there was rioting between the Malays and Chinese in 1964. In the 1969 general elections, the Alliance Party polled less than 50 percent of the popular vote, but retained its majority in the parliament. A celebration march by the opposition parties led to an outbreak of race riots in Kuala Lumpur on May 13, 1969, when hundreds of ethnic Chinese were massacred.

The Malaysian government, under Tun Abdul Razak, who had taken over from Tunku Abdul Rahman in 1970, was badly shaken. It responded by introducing the New Economic Policy (NEP) in 1970, which was designed to favor the bumiputra (see pp20–21) and improve their economic standing in society. At the same time, the authorities made it clear that no further racial attacks on ethnic Chinese would be tolerated. The Alliance Party also broadened its coalition to include members of the opposition and formed the Barisan Nasional (National Front), which continues to be in power today.

MALAYSIA AND SINGAPORE TODAY

Over the next 20 years, using a cautious mixture of financial inducements and firm paternalism, both Malaysia and Singapore remained peaceful as their economies soared. Malaysia prospered due to world demand for its traditional products – rubber, palm oil, tea, and tin – and by the end of the 1970s, the development of light industries and the discovery of oil and natural gas reserves in the South China Sea provided an extra boost. A period of remarkable economic and social development in the 1980s and 1990s was overseen by Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad, who came to power in 1981.

At its independence in 1965, Singapore seemed to face a bleak economic future. However, under Lee Kuan Yew, Prime Minister from 1959 to 1990, it grew and prospered as a powerhouse of light industry and high technology. It also became one of the world's greatest sea ports.

In 2003, Abdullah Ahmad Badawi took over from Mahathir Mohamad as prime minister of Malaysia. In Singapore, Lee Kuan Yew's successor, Goh Chok Tong, was replaced by Yew's son, Lee Hsien Loong, in 2004. Both governments have now entered a less authoritarian era, although one where media and freedom of speech are still tightly monitored. The two countries remain close despite an ongoing dispute over the construction of a new causeway between Johor Bahru and Singapore, and their economies continue to surge ahead, as do living standards, higher education, health, and social services.

A PORTRAIT OF MALAYSIA

With its magnificent natural beauty and unique cultural heritage, Malaysia is a fascinating Southeast Asian destination. A relatively young country that celebrated 50 years of independence in 2007, it has progressed remarkably and has emerged as one of the most successful economies in Asia.

Situated at the crossroads of ancient maritime trade routes, Malaysia has long been a cultural melting pot. The bulk of the population lives on Peninsular Malaysia. While about half the country's 27 million people are of Malay origin, there are significant Chinese and Indian minorities, as well as many indigenous communities. The country's diversity is apparent in its social customs and festivals, and its many cuisines and languages.

SOCIETY AND POLITICS

Malaysia is a constitutional monarchy, based on the political system of its former colonial ruler, Britain. In practice, however, there is more power vested in the executive branch of government than the judiciary. The country is headed nominally by a supreme ruler, a rotating position that is held for a five-year term by sultans of nine hereditary Malay sultanates, while the government is led by an elected prime minister, currently Datuk Seri Abdullah Ahmad Badawi, who is assisted by a cabinet of ministers. The government's two-tier parliament consists of a lower house with 219 elected representatives and an upper house with 70 senators. Elections are held every five years. Since independence, the country has been ruled by a multiracial coalition named Barisan Nasional (National Front), of which the United Malays National Organization (UMNO) is the largest political party.

Performers at a cultural show in Penang

ECONOMY

From the early 1970s through the late 1990s, Malaysia transformed itself from an economy based on mining and agriculture to one dominated by manufacturing and exports, particularly of electronic components. Palm oil also continues to be one of the most important exports. Other prominent contributors to the economy are oil and gas production, timber, and tourism. The country has maintained steady economic growth over the past couple of decades, fueling rapid development in the major cities. Its main trading partners are the USA, China, and Japan, all of which are significant sources of foreign investment.

ENVIRONMENT

Malaysia, like many developing nations, faces its own set of environmental issues, including air and water pollution, deforestation, and the depletion of wildlife species. Although stretches of the country's ancient rain forests, and the wildlife they shelter, are protected in national parks, intense logging is changing the face of the country, transforming jungles into barren hillsides. Fortunately, several international bodies, such as WWF, the global conservation organization, are very active in Malaysia and their persistent campaigning has at least slowed down the rate of environmental degradation. Despite their efforts, the Sumatran rhinoceros and the leatherback turtle face extinction.

CULTURE AND ARTS

Malaysia's ethnic mosaic endows it with an infinitely varied and cosmopolitan culture, assimilating Malay, Chinese, and Indian customs, traditions, and beliefs, as well as those of its indigenous peoples. The ethnic diversity is also reflected in the variety of religions followed here. Although Islam is the state religion, Buddhism, Hinduism, and Christianity, among others, are practiced freely. Traditional Malay performing arts, including the fascinating wayang kulit, or shadow-puppet plays, continue to thrive and can be seen during festivals or at cultural shows. Local pastimes such as kite-flying and top-spinning are still practiced, particularly on the east coast of the peninsula. The country has a vibrant handicrafts tradition, ranging from exquisitely woven textiles to basketware and woodcarving. Malaysia is also gaining a healthy contemporary art scene, with work by the country's leading artists on display in galleries.

MALAYSIA THROUGH THE YEAR

With its unique blend of diverse ethnic groups and cultures, Malaysia hosts a range of festivals and events throughout the year. The country's religious festivals include the Islamic Hari Raya Puasa and Hindu Deepavali. Sporting events, such as Formula 1 racing, and traditional pastimes such as kite flying are also enjoyed. In addition to nationwide events, an array of state-specific festivals are celebrated. As many people visit family during major festivals, all forms of transport become congested. Many religious festivals are based on the lunar calendar, so dates can vary. Islamic festivals, for example, move forward by about ten days each year in relation to the Gregorian calendar. For exact dates, check with Malaysia Tourism.

OCTOBER TO DECEMBER

Due to heavy rain and rough seas on the east coast, boat travel to small islands is tough. Some national parks are also closed. The two important religious festivals during this season are the Mooncake Festival and Deepavali. Although there are only a few Christians in Malaysia, Christmas is still a much celebrated event.

Borneo Cultural Festival

(Oct), Sibiu. A week-long celebration of music and dance with participants that include local ethnic groups, and visiting performers from countries including China and Indonesia. The festival also attracts visitors from Thailand, Brunei, and nearby countries. Mooncake Festival (variable), nationwide. Also known as the Mid-Autumn Festival, this day is celebrated by the Chinese who exchange and consume mooncakes, made of lotus and sesame seeds,

Deepavali (Oct/Nov), nationwide. The festival of lights commemorates Lord Krishna's victory over Narakasura, the triumph of good over evil and light over dark. Hindu homes and temples around the country are decorated with oil lamps to welcome the goddess of prosperity. Hindus pray for happiness and stability.

Tamu Besar (Nov), Kota Belud. Held annually at one of Sabah's biggest markets and tourist attractions, Tamu Besar features cultural performances and handicraft demonstrations. The highlight, however, is to see Bajau horsemen, dressed in colorful traditional costumes. They ride their bedecked horses around town (see p182).

KL International Buskers Festival (Dec), Kuala Lumpur. For over a week, street performers from around the world, including musicians, dancers, comedians, jugglers, and acrobats, put on shows to demonstrate their talents.

Christmas (Dec 25), nationwide. Largely unmarked in predominantly Muslim regions, such as the peninsula's eastern coast and parts of Sabah, Christmas is a major commercial event in

Malaysia at a Glance

Malaysia consists of two geographical regions, Peninsular Malaysia and Malaysian Borneo, which are divided by the South China Sea. A range of mountains runs down the center of the peninsula, dividing the developed plains of the west from the more rural east coast. Malaysian Borneo, comprising the states of Sarawak and Sabah, is a land of rain forests and great rivers. Sandwiched between these two states is the oil-rich independent Sultanate of Brunei.

The Perhentian Islands (see p142) off the coast of Terengganu have pristine beaches and offer excellent swimming and diving in the clear waters of the South China Sea.

Cameron Highlands (see pp92–3) is the country's largest and most popular hill station, with a consistently pleasant climate, rolling hills, lush tea plantations, and a distinctively colonial character.

Taman Negara (see pp138–9), Malaysia's largest national park, contains the peninsula's highest peak and an incredible variety of birds and wildlife.

The Sultan Abdul Samad Building (see p62) is one of busy Kuala Lumpur's most magnificent colonial structures. The city's other attractions include interesting museums, pleasant gardens, and lively local markets.

Seremban (see p120), the state capital of Negeri Sembilan, is the center of Minangkabau culture in Malaysia. Striking buildings with roofs shaped like buffalo horns, such as the State Museum, can be seen throughout town.

Brunei's Sultan Omar Ali Saifuddin Mosque, an icon for the tiny Sultanate of Brunei (see pp172–3), stands on an island in an artificial lagoon in the heart of the capital city of Bandar Seri Begawan.

Pulau Sipadan (see pp194–5), off the east coast of Sabah, is surrounded by a stunning coral reef and is rated among the world's top diving destinations.

Turtle Island National Park (see p190) is a prime spot for viewing the green and hawksbill turtles that come ashore to nest.

Mulu National Park (see pp170–71) has picturesque walking trails in a forested landscape rich in wildlife.

SARAWAK
(see pp150–73)

SABAH
(see pp174–95)

Kuching (see pp154–7), the historic capital of Sarawak, is set on the banks of the Sungai Sarawak.

Lambir Hills National Park (see p169) protects the forested areas around Lambir Hills. Visited most often for its scenic waterfalls, the park reflects the natural heritage of Sarawak, a state that owes its considerable global significance to its many spectacular and species-rich forests.

KUALA LUMPUR

The capital of Malaysia, Kuala Lumpur, is the nation's biggest city with a population of 1.5 million people. A relatively young city, it has evolved from a humble town in the 1850s to the financial and commercial capital and principal gateway of the country. A vision of modernity with its skyscrapers and the best restaurants and nightlife in the country, Kuala Lumpur also possesses a rich cultural heritage that is revealed in its colonial architecture, temples, and mosques.

Kuala Lumpur sits in the Klang Valley, and its name, which means muddy confluence in Malay, is derived from its location at the point where the Klang and Gombak rivers meet. Established here in 1857, the city began as a ramshackle trading post for the burgeoning tin industry, and was constantly plagued by floods, fires, and civil wars. Chinese miners and traders formed a large part of its early population, governed by a Kapitan China, or headman. The most famous of them was Yap Ah Loy (see p65) who was responsible for the city's early growth.

A building boom began when the British took control in the 1880s, and in 1896, Kuala Lumpur was made the capital of the newly formed Federated Malay States. A multiracial population began to settle here, congregating in ethnic enclaves that remain even today. In 1999, Putrajaya became the new administrative capital, but Kuala Lumpur remains the country's financial and commercial center.

Some of the country's rich history can be seen in the 19th-century architecture of the old colonial district and in neighboring Chinatown, with its incense-filled temples and chatter-filled kedai kopi, or coffee shops. Little India, Kampung Baru, and Chow Kit are the best places to find Indian, Malay, and Chinese cuisines. A closer look reveals that the city blends the old with the new. Flanked by glitzy shops and trendy bars, the Golden Triangle is the hub of the city's nightlife, while the Petronas Towers dominate the business district of KLCC. The Lake Gardens are a perfect escape from the urban clutter.

Exploring Kuala Lumpur

Kuala Lumpur's old colonial core is centered on Merdeka Square, which is ringed with elegant colonial buildings. To the southwest are the tranquil Lake Gardens. Across the river, to the east, Chinatown, Little India, Chow Kit, and Kampung Baru boast some of the best street markets. To the west is the Putra World Trade Center (PWTC), one of the city's convention and exhibition centers. Farther northeast is the modern Kuala Lumpur City Center (KLCC) dominated by the Petronas Towers. The Golden Triangle is the business and entertainment hub of the capital. Close by is the soaring Menara KL at the foot of which is the Bukit Nanas Forest Reserve, a patch of rain forest in the center of the city.

GETTING AROUND

Exploring the city on foot is not advisable as heat, heavy traffic, air pollution, and a lack of sidewalks make walking around difficult. The best option is to use Kuala Lumpur's efficient public transport system. Stesen Sentral (KL Central Station) is the hub of the city's rail network, which consists of KTM, the national railway system; Light Rail Transport (LRT); the monorail; and KLIA trains to and from the international airport. KTM Komuter trains are useful for out-of-town destinations such as Shah Alam, Klang, and Seremban to the south. KLIA Ekspres runs direct to KLIA airport, while KLIA Transit stops at Putrajaya. LRT and the monorail cover the city with numerous stops, as do Rapid KL buses, which offer an unlimited day travel ticket. Puduraya is the city's main bus station, and also the hub for long-distance buses.

Street-by-Street: Merdeka Square

Located in the heart of Kuala Lumpur's colonial district, Dataran Merdeka, or Independence Square, is a vast rectangular grassy field that once hosted cricket matches and parades. Surrounded by the mock-Tudor Royal Selangor Club, the National History Museum, St. Mary's Cathedral, and the Sultan Abdul Samad Building, the square offers a rare glimpse into the city's past. The venue for many national events, it was here that the Union Flag was finally lowered on August 31, 1957, when independent Malaysia was born. Today, the Malaysian flag flies at the southern end of the square.

A magnificent Moorish edifice presiding over the eastern flank of Merdeka Square, the Sultan Abdul Samad Building was built in 1897 to serve as the headquarters of colonial administration and named in honor of the ruler of Selangor at the time. Designed by A.C. Norman, a British architect who also designed the nearby St. Mary's Cathedral, the building is made of red brick and white stone and draws upon Mughal, Egyptian, and traditional Islamic styles. Its architectural features include elegantly arched windows, cupolas, an imposing porch, and a soaring 133-ft (41-m) clock tower, flanked by two smaller towers crowned with gleaming copper domes. The building is the focus for mid-night celebrations on the eve of National Day (see p52) and New Year's Eve. Today, it houses the commercial division of Malaysia's High Court and although it is not open to the public, its striking façade makes it one of the capital's most photographed landmarks.

Standing at the confluence of the Klang and Gombak rivers, the site where Kuala Lumpur was founded, the beautiful Masjid Jamek is the city's oldest mosque. Masjid Jamek, which means Friday Mosque, was built in 1909 by architect A.B. Hubbock, who was responsible for many of the country's colonial cityscapes. The red brick and marble building, with three large onion-shaped domes, two minarets, and arched colonnades, was inspired by Mughal architecture. Surrounded by palm groves, and with unrivaled views downstream, the mosque forms a tranquil haven in the middle of the city. The main prayer hall is open only to Muslims. Visitors to the mosque must be dressed appropriately with arms and legs covered, and women must cover their heads. Gowns are supplied free of charge and shoes must be removed before entering.

Established in 1884, the Royal Selangor Club was at the center of colonial social life in Kuala Lumpur. Expatriates and officials gathered here to relax, play billiards, and watch cricket on the padang, now a part of Merdeka Square (see pp60–61). The club also hosted traveling plays and musicals. In 1970, the original building was destroyed by a fire, which was soon followed by a flood. The present black and white mock-Tudor building, an authentic reproduction of the old club, was built in 1980. Still referred to as The Spotted Dog, the club remains the preserve of the city's elite. The origin of its nickname attracted several theories, including one that traces it to a pet Dalmatian that belonged to a former member.

Completed in 1891, this grand Moorish-style building at the southern end of Merdeka Square was built to house Kuala Lumpur's first bank. During World War II, the structure was requisitioned as a telecommunications base by the then occupying Japanese army. In 1991, it was converted into the Muzium Sejarah Nasional, or National History Museum, which gives an overview of the country's history by compiling and chronicling key events and artifacts from the Stone Age until independence.

Museum displays include a collection of Paleolithic tools, Neolithic pottery, replicas of megaliths that have been found around the country, and exquisite bronze Buddhas. Upstairs, the timeline continues into the medieval and colonial eras, focusing on the Portuguese and Dutch forays into Malacca, with displays of ceramics, coins, and weapons. Artifacts from the Japanese occupation during World War II, including army uniforms and a Samurai sword, are displayed on the top floor, along with photographs, documents, and video footage from the independence movement. Also on display is the flag of the first Federation of

Also known as the Cultural Bazaar, the building has arts and crafts shops that sell an array of products including wood carvings, batik, pottery, paintings, and traditional kites. Prices tend to be high and haggling is necessary to get reasonable deals. There are a number of other outlets that sell an eclectic assortment of goods ranging from guitars to ladies' wigs.

The oldest Taoist temple in Kuala Lumpur, it was founded in 1864 by Yap Ah Loy, the third Kapitan China (see p65), who also funded its construction. Inside the temple, a statue of Loy is installed left of the main altar, while images of the patron deities Si Sze Ya and Sin Sze Ya occupy the right. The interior is filled with elaborate carvings and the smell of burning incense. The temple entrance is guarded by statues of fierce lions, a common feature in Chinese and Taoist temples, accompanied by statues of storks. 📅 Chinese New Year (Jan/Feb).

Kuala Lumpur's relatively small but vibrant Chinatown is roughly bordered by Jalan Hang Kasturi to the west and Jalan Sultan to the east, with Masjid Jamek and the Chan See Shu Yuen Temple marking its northern and southern limits respectively. The area is a maze of narrow streets and alleyways, dotted with small Chinese temples and lined with old shophouses, medicine stores, and traditional family-run kedai kopi, or coffee shops, where locals gather to socialize. At the heart of Chinatown is Jalan Petaling, with its bustling market and crowded cafés. Numerous modern shops and chain stores add a contemporary touch to this ethnic enclave. Chinatown is also home to much of the city's budget accommodation. The area, however, is not exclusively Chinese. Located on Jalan Tun HS Lee, a major thoroughfare, is the city's principal Hindu temple, Sri Maha Mariamman Temple.

Jalan Petaling Market 8

Jalan Petaling. Map 4 F3. ① Pasar Seni. 🚗 R110. 🕒 10am–11pm.

The scene of the capital's most famous and lively street market, Jalan Petaling is a partly roofed string of stalls specializing in fake designer goods. Watches, clothes, wallets, handbags, and a profusion of pirated CDs and DVDs are all sold openly. There are few fixed prices, and with initial offers often set unreasonably high, buyers are expected to haggle.

Interspersed with the stalls are a few shops that sell an assortment of other goods such as a variety of dried meats and traditional medicines. At the northern end is a vegetable and fruit market and plenty of cheap cafés.

Jalan Petaling is just a normal shop-lined street in Chinatown until around 4 or 5pm everyday, when the area is closed off to traffic and transformed into a pasar malam, or night market. Many of the daytime stalls pack up and are replaced by food stalls that sell a tempting array of Indian, Malay, and Chinese delicacies. Local souvenirs are also available. Both the day and night markets attract large crowds and visitors must be careful of their belongings.

📅 Thaipusam (Jan/Feb).

Established in 1873 as the private shrine of a Tamil family from southern India, Sri Maha Mariamman Temple was rebuilt on its present site in 1885. Today, it is Kuala Lumpur's main Hindu temple. The building is said to be laid out in the form of a reclining human body, with the head pointing to the west, and the feet to the east. The feet are represented by a five-tiered gopuram, or entrance gate, which is decorated with intricately carved statues of various Hindu deities. During an extensive renovation of the temple in the 1960s, gold and precious stones as well as Spanish and Italian tiles were added to the gopuram.

Inside the temple are several altars displaying images of Hindu gods. The temple also houses the ornate silver chariot used in a procession during the fascinating annual Thaipusam festival (see p29). The chariot is brought out from the temple's vault during the celebration, when up to a million devotees converge here and make their way up to the Hindu shrine at Batu Caves (see p90). Visitors must remove their shoes before entering the temple.

Built between 1897 and 1906, Chan See Shu Yuen Temple is said to be one of the finest examples of southern Chinese architecture in Malaysia. It features an elaborate pottery-tiled roof and undulating gables as well as superbly sculpted green- and blue-glazed ceramic friezes depicting mythological scenes on the façade. Decorating the edges of the temple are blue ceramic vases. On either side of the main entrance are shrines to the female and male guardians of the doorway, with incense burning continually before them.

The temple is essentially a clan association, representing families bearing the related names of Chan, Chen, or Tan, and is dedicated to the family ancestors. Enshrined at the central altar of the temple are images of the clan founders, Chan Siow Ling, Chan Xin Xi, and Chan Zai Tian, while above the altar, to the right and left, are a series of black and white photographs of deceased clan members. Framing the central shrine are gilded wooden panels painted with scenes of warriors battling lions and mythical creatures.

Among the best examples of colonial architecture in Malaysia, the ornate Kuala Lumpur Railway Station is a majestic, gleaming white building with Moorish arches, balustrades, minarets, and cupolas. Completed in 1911, it was designed by the British architect A.B. Hubbock, who is also known for the striking Masjid Jamek (see p62). Beneath the Islamic exterior, the building was constructed according to specifications for railroad stations in England and included an iron roof capable of withstanding up to 3 ft (1 m) of snow. The concrete structure was built to replace an attap, or thatch-roofed shed, which had served as the railroad terminal since 1886 when the first railroad line was constructed.

For 90 years it was the city's main intercity rail terminal, until it was replaced in 2001 by the state-of-the-art KL Sentral Station, a few streets to the south. Now only KTM Komuter trains pass through this historic station. Still, it remains one of the city's most notable landmarks. Some of the best views of the building are from Jalan Kinabalu.

The colonial-era Heritage Station Hotel (see p275), one of the grandest in its time, continues to occupy a section of the station.

KAPITAN CHINA

The office of Kapitan China, or headman of the Chinese community of Kuala Lumpur, was instituted in 1858 by Rajah Abdullah, Chief of Selangor state, as a way of imposing order on the fractious Chinese immigrants and their secret societies. In 1869, Yap Ah Loy, a fierce and ambitious immigrant from southern China, became the third Kapitan China. He soon found himself at the center of a bloody civil war between different Chinese groups and local Malays, but a major victory led by him in Kuala Lumpur in 1873, along with the arrival of the first British Resident in 1874 (see p41), put an end to the fighting. He remained headman until his death in 1885. Also credited with establishing the city as a major economic powerhouse, Yap Ah Loy is considered the founding father of modern Kuala Lumpur.

Lying on the western edge of the city center is the Lake Gardens, known in Malay as Taman Tasik Perdana. It is a beautiful expanse of greenery laid out in the late 19th century as a tranquil residential area for the governing British elite. Within the gardens are a number of other attractions, the highlight of which is the Bird Park. Said to be the world's largest walk-in free-flight aviary, the park houses around 3,000 tropical birds including flamingos, hornbills, and parrots. There is also a Butterfly Park which is home formerly known as The House on the Hill, was constructed as a home for Sir Frank Swettenham, the first British Resident-General of the Federation of Malay States (see p41), a function it continued to serve for subsequent British governors. The second building, Seri Negara, earlier known as the King's House, was the official home of the Governor of the Straits Settlements. After independence and until 1987, Carcosa was the official residence of the British High Commissioner while Seri Negara functioned as a state guesthouse for visiting foreign dignitaries. Perched on a hill southwest of the city center, the Thean Hou Temple is a striking 3-tier Chinese temple. Built in the 1980s, this is one of the biggest Chinese temples in Malaysia. It is dedicated to Thean Hou, or heavenly mother, the patron deity of sailors and fishermen. An image of the goddess, also known as Ma Zu, is enshrined in the main hall, flanked by statues of Sui Wei, goddess of the waterfront, and Kuan Yin, goddess of mercy. Statues of the Laughing Buddha and other Buddhist and Taoist images are also kept here.

The temple has a series of traditional Chinese-style roofs decorated with golden dragons, phoenix, and a canopy of red paper lanterns. Built on four levels, it has food outlets and shops on the ground level, while the main shrine is on the third floor. The temple also serves as a community center, and a hall on the second level forms the venue for social gatherings such as weddings. Outside the building stand twelve statues, which represent the twelve animals of the Chinese zodiac.

Masjid India 18

Jalan Masjid India. Map 4 F1.

📍 Masjid Jamek. 🗺️ R109. ♿

Originally built as a modest wooden structure in 1863, Masjid India has been rebuilt and upgraded a number of times over the years. The present building was completed in 1966, and designed in southern Indian style, with onion-domed cupolas and elegant arched windows. The three-story mosque, is the main place of worship for Kuala Lumpur's Indian Muslims. It has the capacity to accommodate up to 3,500 devotees, with separate floors for men and women.

Little India 19

Jalan Masjid India and environs.

Map 1 B5. 📍 Masjid Jamek, Bandaraya. 🗺️ R101 to Jalan Tuanku Abdul Rahman. 🗓️ Deepavali (Oct).

Although tiny in comparison with the Indian enclaves of Singapore or even Georgetown in Penang, Kuala Lumpur's Little India is equally lively and colorful, steeped in the history and culture of the capital's Indian community.

Jalan Masjid India is the main street of this ethnic quarter, which takes its name from Masjid India. Rows of shops and stalls line the street, and are crammed with Indian merchandise such as saris, silk cloth and other fabric, jewelry, flowers, and spices. There are also a number of hawker stalls that sell a variety of delicious and traditional Indian snacks such as pakoras and samosas.

At the end of Jalan Masjid India is Lorong Bunos, which marks the northern limit of Little India. It leads to Lorong Tuanku Abdul Rahman, a narrow lane that is the venue of another of the capital's popular pasar malams, or night markets. An assortment of Indian goods are sold here, including household items and brassware, and it is also one of the best places in the city to sample authentic Indian street food. During the day, artisans, including garland makers, can be seen at work all along the street.

Named for the first king of independent Malaysia, and commonly known as Jalan TAR, Jalan Tuanku Abdul Rahman is one of the busiest roads in Kuala Lumpur and is constantly choked with traffic. Stretching north from Merdeka Square to Little India, it is one of the city's most popular shopping destinations, particularly known for silk shops such as the Global Silk Store (see p318) as well as the small, bazaar-style carpet shops clustered around its southern end. The Japanese department store Sogo is also located on this road.

Despite a lot of modern development in recent years, Jalan TAR has retained much of its historic architecture, revealed in many of the striking 19th- and early 20th-century façades that still exist above the gaudy shop signs. Among the most interesting and significant of these structures is the Coliseum Cinema. Barring a few years during World War II, the cinema has been in business since 1921, making it Kuala Lumpur's oldest running movie hall. These days, it screens Hindi and southern Indian Tamil films. Visitors are free to explore the building. Next door to the cinema, and built around the same time, the Coliseum Café and Hotel was once the favorite haunt of colonial planters and tin miners. It also counts English author Somerset Maugham among its early patrons.

The Coliseum Café and Hotel still offers cheap meals, budget accommodation, and an authentic early 20th-century atmosphere that has changed little over the years.

Chow Kit Market 21

 Chow Kit  R109.  10am–2am daily.

Strung out along the narrow lanes and alleys just to the east of Jalan Tuanku Abdul Rahman, Chow Kit Market is one of the city's biggest and most popular street markets. It is divided into various sections and is especially known for its fresh produce, which includes everything from exotic fruits and vegetables to live seafood, dried anchovies, and meat. Stall owners shout out their wares to vie for attention while porters busily ferry trays and carts laden with goods between the stalls. Although the smells can be overpowering and the narrow wooden walkways wet and slippery, the market offers an interesting glimpse of everyday life in Kuala Lumpur. Chow Kit Market is also one of the best places to buy secondhand clothes. Numerous other stalls selling household goods, shoes, watches, and a wide variety of everyday items fill the market.

Most of Chow Kit Market, especially the fresh produce sections, closes before 6pm, which is when the night market takes over. A profusion of hawker stalls set up shop, offering a variety of Malay snacks, as well as inexpensive but substantial meals, cooked in the traditional way. Indian and Chinese food, authentically prepared, is also on offer. The market is always bustling, and often lasts into the early hours. As with other crowded areas, visitors should be vigilant of pickpockets, especially after dark.

The temporary shows of modern Asian art include photography, sculpture, and installation art.

Next door, the striking National Theater, designed in the shape of a wau bulan, or Malay kite, hosts several interesting cultural shows as well as national and international theater, and also features a traditional Malay theater costume gallery.

Located on the northern fringes of the city, these peaceful, manicured gardens are a great escape from the urban bustle and a popular recreational space. Laid out around a vast man-made lake, the lush gardens are a visual treat and also a perfect place to relax, go jogging, or even go boating. Established in 1899, the village of Kampung Baru is the oldest Malay residential area in Kuala Lumpur. Its traditional wooden houses, some on stilts, are still found throughout this small settlement which lies to the north of the Sungai Klang, roughly between Jalan Raja Muda Musa and Jalan Raja Muda Abdul Aziz, with Jalan Raja Abdullah and the incredibly busy Chow Kit area marking its western boundary. While the old-fashioned kampung-style houses and the 1920s Masjid Jamek on Jalan Raja Abdullah are worth a visit, the real highlight of Kampung Baru is the glimpse it offers of an older, more leisurely way of life that seems to be rapidly disappearing under the increasingly fast pace of modern Kuala Lumpur.

The area comes alive on Saturday nights for the locally popular Pasar Minggu, or Sunday Market. Stalls are set up along Jalan Raja Muda Musa and Jalan Raja Alang at about 6pm on Saturday evening, and stay open until 1am, or the early hours of Sunday morning. On sale are a wide variety of clothes, jewelry, handicrafts, and textiles, including reasonably priced batik and locally woven songket fabric. Plenty of food and fresh produce is available, as well as numerous hawker stalls tempting shoppers with delicious, traditional Malay street food. A few basic cafés offer visitors more substantial meal options.

Spread out over six floors inside the Petronas Towers, Suria KLCC is one of the city's busiest and glitziest shopping malls, with numerous chain stores, restaurants, coffee bars, and a cinema, as well as banks, ATMs, and a post office. A range of giant international department stores have branches here, including Isetan and Parkson, along with specialist retailers and fast-food outlets.

On the third floor is the Galeri Petronas, which hosts rotating exhibitions of traditional and contemporary art, both from Asia and farther afield. Petrosains, on the fourth floor, is an excellent interactive science discovery center. Young visitors can learn about petroleum science and technology through a range of engaging hands-on exhibits, and can also visit a mock oil rig, try a helicopter flight simulator, and learn about prehistory in the geotime diorama. Of interest to both young and adult visitors are the demonstrations and interactive sessions at the science stations.

The lush KLCC Gardens sprawling in front of the complex offer a welcome respite from city traffic. The gardens are laid out with benches and shelters, a jogging track for the more energetic, and a children's playground. Planted with over 1,900 native trees, many bearing explanation plaques, and centered on an artificial lake with dancing fountains, the gardens are a cool and pleasant place to wander around in the evenings. However, whistle-blowing security guards discourage visitors from lingering in the gardens beyond closing time.

This enormous state-of-the-art aquarium is home to over 5,000 creatures, both aquatic and terrestrial, including around 150 different species of fish from across the world.

Conceptualized around the route that water takes from the mountains to the sea, the aquarium recreates various ecosystems. The journey begins in the highlands and is followed by a flooded forest display where giant catfish can be seen lurking among tree roots. Other ecosystems include mangroves, coral reefs, and the spectacular open ocean. A highlight is the 295-ft (90-m) long moving walkway underwater tunnel, which offers views of a simulated natural habitat and a shipwreck colonized by reef inhabitants, as well as close-up sightings of stingrays, eels, and rare sand tiger sharks.

A theater screens films on Malaysia's marine life, and a touch pool lets children handle aquatic creatures. More adventurous visitors can even swim with sharks, but advance booking is essential.

The largest tourist center in Kuala Lumpur, the Malaysian Tourism Information Complex is housed in an impressive colonial mansion. Built on the site of an old rambutan orchard in 1935, it was formerly the home of Eu Tong Seng, a wealthy Chinese tin and rubber businessman. Not long after its construction, World War II broke out and the house was taken over by the British military and used as their war office. It was subsequently captured by the Japanese army, who converted it into their headquarters in Malaysia for the remainder of the war. After independence, the building housed several government agencies and also witnessed the coronation ceremonies of four successive Malaysian kings.

Today, the main building in the complex houses the Malaysia tourist information office, while several annexes contain a tourist police office, restaurant, and a concert hall where regular cultural shows are performed (see p321). Traditional games, such as top-spinning, are also hosted here over the weekends.

Spread over a large, roughly triangular area with its apex at Jalan Ampang in the north and its base formed by Jalan Imbi in the south, the Golden Triangle is Kuala Lumpur's main business, shopping, and nightlife district. Among the sea of glitzy high-rise buildings are most of the city's prominent shopping malls, along with countless bars, restaurants, cafés, and premier hotels, including the Mandarin Oriental (see p275), which is located opposite the Petronas Towers. At the heart of the Golden Triangle is Jalan Bukit Bintang with its trendy bars, eateries, and the biggest concentration of shopping Built as a communications tower between 1991 and 1996, Menara KL, or KL tower, is among the five tallest towers in the world. It stands at a height of 1,380 ft (421 m). Its lobby has several shops, restaurants, and a theater where a video of the tower's construction is screened. A lift whisks visitors up to the observation deck for a panoramic view of the city. At a dizzying height of 905 ft (276 m), it is more than 328 ft (100 m) higher than the skybridge at the Petronas Towers. Even farther up is a revolving restaurant, Seri Angkasa, which features afternoon teas and also traditional music and dance performances.

At the base of the tower is Malaysia's oldest nature reserve, the Bukit Nanas Forest Reserve, gazetted in 1906. This legal status saved the 27-acre (11-ha) slice of rain forest from destruction when the tower was built, and even resulted in a reworking of the architectural plans to avoid the cutting down of a 100-year old jelutong tree. Although small, the preserve supports a rich variety of wildlife, including monkeys and squirrels, as well as numerous

In 1995, it renovated a colonial bungalow on Jalan Stonor and turned it into a heritage center, with exhibition facilities for art and craft shows as well as a resource center with books, drawings, slides, and photographs for those keen to learn more about the organization's conservation work. The highlight is Rumah Penghulu Abu Seman, a traditional Malay wooden house dating from the 1920s. It was brought to this site in a state of serious disrepair from a village in Kedah. Since then, it has been expertly restored and now serves as a showpiece for modern conservation methods.

It is made up of four separate buildings that house shops and stalls, a museum, exhibition areas, and several workshops. The museum traces the history and development of age-old crafts and features dioramas of artisans creating their wares with displays of the various tools they would have used.

In the exhibition areas and workshops, craftspeople demonstrate ethnic art and craft skills, such as weaving, batik-printing, and silver and copperwork. Visitors are welcome to try their hand and can also receive lessons in a particular craft. The complex is one of the best places in Kuala Lumpur to buy these local handicrafts, with a number of shops and stalls selling pewter, silverwork, pottery, woodcarvings, hand-woven textiles, batik, and beadwork, alongside more unusual items such as rattan fishtraps, birdcages, and tribal blowpipes.

Designated the state capital of Selangor in 1978, Shah Alam is a well-planned modern city sprawled over a large area. It is essentially an industrial and administrative center, and is rarely visited by tourists. Still, the area's few sights of interest, most of which are within walking distance of each other, make it a pleasant day trip. Located in a park at the center of town is the city's main attraction, the Sultan Salahuddin Abdul Aziz Shah Mosque, more popularly known as the Blue Mosque owing to its large blue and silver aluminum dome. Its four 466-ft (142-m) high minarets are said to be the tallest in the world. The mosque can accommodate up to 24,000 worshippers and is reputed to be one of the largest mosques in Southeast Asia and the largest in Malaysia.

Nearby is the Museum Sultan Azlan Shah with extensive displays covering the history of Selangor from prehistoric times to the present day. It also contains galleries dedicated to the state's wildlife as well as its sporting achievements. To the west of the museum is the attractively landscaped Lake Gardens, home to the Galeri Shah Alam, a modern art gallery located in a traditional Malay wooden building which hosts temporary exhibitions of modern art over three separate galleries. On the opposite side of the lake is the Wet World Water Park, a water theme park with pools, slides, and rides (see p321).

The former royal capital of Selangor, the city of Klang, flourished during the 19th-century boom in the tin industry. However, in 1867, civil war erupted owing to the rivalry between the two local chieftains, Rajah Mahadi and Rajah Abdullah. The fighting was ended in 1874 when the British authorities intervened and installed the first Resident in the town. The discovery of new tin deposits in Kuala Lumpur in 1880 further diminished the importance of Klang. Today, the city is a commercial center, with most sights of interest located in the old town, south of the Sungai Klang.

Built in 1857, Gedung Raja Abdullah was the former residence of Rajah Abdullah. The building now houses the Tin Museum, which traces the history of the local mining industry through archived photographs and other artifacts. Nearby are the remains of Rajah Mahadi's fort. Also located in the old quarter is the attractive Masjid Di Raja Sultan Suleiman, the former state mosque, behind which is Istana Alam Shah, the royal palace of the Sultan of Selangor. Although closed to the public, visitors can view the pleasing façade of the palace which is a blend of Islamic and modern architecture. Port Klang, or North Port, lies 5 miles (8 km) to the west, close to South Port, Malaysia's main seaport, and is the access point for Pulau Ketam.

It is well known for its superb seafood restaurants, specializing in crab dishes, which make it a popular weekend dining venue for city residents. Putrajaya is built on cleared forest land and centered around a huge artificial lake. The city is designed to create a sense of vastness and with so much water around, great attention has been paid to building massive bridges. These include the Putra Bridge, inspired by the Khaju Bridge in Iran, and the 787-ft (240-m) long Seri Gemilang Bridge.

Government departments and ministries began the move here from Kuala Lumpur in 1999. These include the Prime Minister's office, known as Perdana Putra, built in a flamboyant Malay-Palladian style, Constructed of rose-tinted granite, the Putra Mosque is a landmark and the equally grand Palace of Justice, topped with a gigantic dome. The Putra Mosque with its 380-ft (116-m) high minaret looms over one edge of the lake and is one of the city's most impressive buildings, blending architectural styles from Iraq, Iran, and Morocco. Other sights worth exploring include the Botanic Garden with its collection of tropical flora, and the Putrajaya Wetlands, which were constructed to help cleanse river water. Paddleboats can be hired for trips on the wetlands and lake.

Lying on the outskirts of Putrajaya is its twin town, Cyberjaya. Conceived as a center for high-tech companies, it has been under construction for over ten years now.

NORTHWEST PENINSULA

The northwestern states of Malaysia are among the most geographically diverse and historically significant in the country. The landscape encompasses everything from coastal plains and lushly forested mountains to jutting limestone cliffs and pristine islands. A long legacy of immigrants and rulers, attracted by the region's strategic geographical position and its natural wealth, has bequeathed a fascinating mix of cultures.

Archaeological remains found at the coastal site of Lembah Bujang provide evidence of a Hindu-Buddhist kingdom that dates back to the 4th century AD. In the 7th and 8th centuries, the region was ruled by the Srivijaya empire and later by Siam (now Thailand), while the 15th century saw the rise of the Sultanate of Malacca. With the beginning of the 17th century, a power struggle ensued between colonial powers in the area until the British finally gained control.

By the mid-19th century, the growing importance of tin mining in the states of Perak and Selangor brought with it far-reaching economic, political, and social repercussions. It fueled Malaysia's tremendous economic rise in the 20th century and also attracted a huge influx of Chinese immigrants.

As a result of these varied early influences and economic developments, the Northwest Peninsula is more cosmopolitan and less culturally conservative than other parts of Malaysia. It is also one of the most developed and populous regions in the country, comprising not only ethnic Malays, Chinese, and Indians, but also indigenous groups such as the Orang Asli and the Orang Syam in the interior jungles and far north. The old royal capital of Kuala Kangsar and the vibrant, historic, and culturally diverse city of Georgetown in Penang are on the itinerary of most visitors to the Northwest Peninsula. More laid-back tourists head for the region's pristine beaches or the soothing environs of its tea plantations and cool hill stations.

Exploring the Northwest Peninsula

Few regions in the country offer the range of attractions found in the Northwest Peninsula. The interiors feature cool hill stations, such as the celebrated Cameron Highlands, limestone cliffs riddled with cave temples, including the Batu Caves, and Chinese dominated tin-rush towns such as Ipoh. The most popular destinations are along the coast, including Penang, which is an ideal base for exploring the region and a fascinating destination in itself, and the islands of Langkawi and Pangkor. The archaeologically important Lembah Bujang lies in Kedah which, together with Perlis, is carpeted with paddy fields.

GETTING AROUND

A good domestic flight network covers Ipoh, Pulau Pangkor, Langkawi, Georgetown, and Alor Star. The North-South Highway and Route 1, the region's two major roads, and the national railway (KTM) run almost parallel with each other, tracing the length of the west coast and linking the major towns. Driving is a good option; roads are safe and traffic is law-abiding. The Penang Bridge connects Butterworth with Penang, as do regular car and passenger ferries. Lumut is the ferry point for Pukau Pangkor, while ferries to Pulau Langkawi are available at Kuala Kedah and Kuala Perlis.

Batu Caves 1

8 miles (13 km) N of Kuala Lumpur on Middle Ring Road 2. 8am–8pm daily. Thaipusam Festival (Jan/Feb).

Set high in a range of rugged limestone cliffs, the Batu Caves are a vast cavern complex that has become one of the most popular attractions near the capital. Long known to the indigenous Orang Asli people, the caves only gained worldwide popularity when American naturalist William Hornaday came upon them in 1878. Deeply impressed by the extent and beauty of the largest cave, he compared it to a grand cathedral. In the 1890s, it was converted into a shrine dedicated to the Hindu deity Lord Murugan, and soon became the most important pilgrimage site for Malaysia's Hindus. During the annual Thaipusam festival, held in late January or early February, a spectacular scene unfolds here, when an estimated one million pilgrims visit the caves (see p.29).

Dominating the entrance to the caves is a 141-ft (43-m) tall golden statue of Lord Murugan. From here a steep flight of 272 steps leads up to the main cave. Also known as Temple or Cathedral Cave, it is 328 ft (100 m) high and is partially lit by shafts of light that stream through gaps in the roof. The cave walls are lined with numerous statues of Lord Murugan, along with those of other Hindu gods, including Shiva, Ganesh, and Durga. The dome of the cave is richly painted with scenes from the Hindu scriptures. In a chamber behind the central shrine is the statue of another deity, Lord Rama.

Orang Asli Museum 2

Jalan Pahang, Gombak, 18 miles (30 km) N of Kuala Lumpur. Tel (03) 6189-2113. 9am–5pm Sat–Thu.

Though visited by few people, the Orang Asli Museum provides a superb introduction to the customs, traditions, and material culture of Malaysia's almost 100,000 Orang Asli people, the earliest known indigenous inhabitants of the peninsula. Run by the Orang Asli Affairs Department, the museum presents the history of the 18 distinct groups within the Orang Asli community along with their geographical distribution, musical instruments, ornaments, medicines, models of their dwellings, and a collection of traditional hunting weapons, such as blowpipes and poison spoons. Among the most impressive of these is the display of traditional handicrafts, which includes wooden head carvings with fierce facial expressions. Details of daily life, including wedding rites and religious practices, are also described.

31 miles (50 km) NE of Kuala Lumpur. from Kuala Lumpur, then cable car (optional). www.genting.com.my. Cable Cars run every 20 min; after midnight every hour.

Unlike most conventional hill-station retreats, the 6,562-ft (2,000-m) high Genting Highlands, located in the Titiwangsa Mountain Range, is an extensive entertainment and gambling complex which features Malaysia's biggest theme park as well as its only casino. The glitzy 24-hour Casino de Genting, one of the largest in the world, contains endless rows of Chinese and Western games tables, a computerized racetrack, and slot machines, while the Genting Theme Park offers more than 40 rides including Grand Prix Go Kart, the Cork-screw roller coaster, and a 185-ft (56-m) Turbo Drop which reaches the ground in less than five seconds. The resort, considered to be the largest in the world, has over 6,000 rooms, a shopping arcade, a golf course, and several concert halls that host international performing artists. An indoor leisure zone provides an excellent alternative on rainy days.

An attraction in itself is the cable car ride, which is a popular alternative to the bus journey for the final 2.5-mile (4-km) trip to the top. Genting Skyway and Awana Skyway are the two cable car operators that regularly organize these scenic trips.

Kuala Selangor 4

42 miles (67 km) NW of Kuala Lumpur on Hwy 4, then S.

 39,200.

The small and quiet district capital of Selangor, located at the mouth of the Sungai Selangor, was once the royal capital of the Sultanate of Selangor. It was conquered by the Dutch in 1784, and soon became the scene of a number of intense battles. During their invasion, the Dutch destroyed the sultan's fort and rebuilt it, naming it Fort Atlingsburg after their governor general. Perched atop Bukit Melawati, a hill overlooking the town, the fort was fought over repeatedly, and all that remains today are sections of the wall and cannons. Directly below the fort lies the boundary of Taman Alam Kuala

Selangor Nature Park, a mangrove forest, home to over 150 species of birds. This is the only area in Malaysia to record sightings of the spoonbill sandpiper. It is also home to a variety of fish and crabs, found in the mangroves along the park's coastline. Several artificial ponds are surrounded by nature trails and observation hides.

A particular highlight of Kuala Selangor is the chance to see the dazzling kelip kelip, or fireflies, along the banks of the Sungai Selangor at Kampung Kuantan, 6 miles (10 km) east of the capital.

Fraser's Hill 5

62 miles (100 km) N of Kuala Lumpur.  to Kuala Kubu Bharu, then Fraser's Hill.  WWF Nature Education Center, Jalan Genting, (09) 362-2517.  nature walks.

A hill station sprawling across seven forested hills, the 4,921-ft (1,500-m) Fraser's Hill is named after British pioneer Louis James Fraser. A mule-train driver and tin-ore trader, he arrived here in the late 1890s, but then mysteriously disappeared around 1910. Shortly after, Fraser's Hill was developed as a refreshing retreat for the British expatriate community.

A picturesque journey leads to Fraser's Hill, passing through giant bamboo groves and tree ferns, and climbing steeply through the Gap, a mountain pass between Kubu Bharu and Raub.

Of all the hill stations set in the Titiwangsa mountains, Fraser's Hill retains the most distinct colonial ambience with Tudor-style buildings and neat rose gardens. It is a quiet, relaxed place, perfect for jungle strolls and afternoon teas. At the center of town is a market square and a clock tower. This small area is surrounded by dense woods, which contain several nature trails. One of the hill station's main attractions is its abundant flora and fauna. Over 265 species of birds have been recorded in the area. Every June, Fraser's Hill hosts the annual International Bird Race, in which teams of ornithologists compete to spot as many bird varieties as possible over a 24-hour period.

Golfing at the Fraser's Hill Golf Course is a popular sport, as is horseback riding. It is possible to fish on Allan's Waters, a tiny lake located in town. About 3 miles (5 km) northwest of the center, passing by a lookout tower, is Jeriau Waterfall, which flows into a small stream.

Cameron Highlands 6

The largest and most popular hill station in Malaysia, Cameron Highlands is located on the northwest corner of Pahang. It is named for the British surveyor William Cameron who charted the area in 1885. Dotted with lush tea plantations and farms, the region is renowned for its flowers and fresh produce. The temperature here rarely exceeds 22° C (72° F) and is accompanied by mists and light rainfall, which makes it a great getaway from the hot plains. It is also a popular destination for trekkers. Cameron Highlands retains a distinct colonial ambience, with its principal settlement located in Tanah Rata.

Gunung Jasar, at 5,564 ft (1,696 m), offers fine views across Cameron Highlands from its bald summit and is easily accessible by a carefully marked trail from Tanah Rata.

Gunung Perdah at 5,171 ft (1,576 m), rises above an Orang Asli village to the north of Tanah Rata and dominates the northwestern horizon.

JIM THOMPSON

In March 1967, James H.W. Thompson, a successful US-born Thai businessman, disappeared while on holiday in the Cameron Highlands. He simply walked out of the cottage where he was staying, and never came back. At the time, and for months afterwards, the media was filled with speculation about his fate. With his disappearance, he became a legendary figure, leaving behind him a resurrected and resilient Thai silk industry and a traditional teak home in Bangkok. Jim Thompson's home is now an exquisite museum of Southeast Asian art.

Nestled in the limestone cliffs of Kinta Valley, Ipoh is the state capital of Perak and Malaysia's third largest city. It was built on profits from the valley's rich tin mines, which were developed by immigrant Chinese workers in the late-19th century. This influx of people bequeathed to the city some of the finest Peranakan architecture seen in the country.

The Kinta River divides Ipoh into two neat halves. Occupying the left bank is the Old Town, the most atmospheric part of the city. It boasts elegant Chinese mansions and shophouses, as well as grand colonial buildings. Built in 1917, Ipoh Station is a blend of late Victorian and Moorish-Islamic styles. Directly opposite stands the Dewan Bandaran, or Town Hall, a dazzling white Neoclassical structure. Other prominent landmarks near the station include the mock-Tudor Royal Ipoh Club with its half-timbered walls and mullioned windows, and the historical landmark Birch Memorial Clock Tower erected in memory of James Birch, the first British Resident in Perak. A short distance from the Old Town center is Darul Ridzuan Museum. Set in a stately 1920s mansion, it recounts the history of Ipoh and the rise of the tin mining industry in Perak.

The New Town, on the right bank of the river, contains some splendid Chinese shophouses and most of the city's accommodations.

Kellie's Castle 8

19 miles (30 km) S of Ipoh. 8:30am-6pm daily.

A unique fusion of Scottish castle and Moorish architecture, Kellie's Castle is an unfinished colonial structure. It was built by Scotsman William Kellie-Smith, who made a fortune in the rubber business in the 19th century. The mansion was envisioned as a spectacular edifice, complete with an elevator, and work began in 1915. However, Smith died of pneumonia in 1926 while in Portugal, leaving his grand home incomplete. During World War II, the castle grounds were used as an execution site by the Japanese. Today, it is a well-preserved attraction set in a park with fig and banyan trees. Also on the grounds is a Hindu temple built by Smith for his largely Tamil labor force. The temple was built after many Tamil workers were killed in an epidemic of influenza during the mansion's construction. Grateful for this act, the workers added a small statue of Smith amid the Hindu deities on the temple roof.

Endowed with a laid-back feel and some of the best beaches on the west coast of the peninsula, Pulau Pangkor is a popular destination. The island is inhabited by a thriving fishing community. Most of the local villages, including Pangkor Town, the main settlement, lie on its east coast, while the resorts and stunning powder-white beaches are strung out on the west, around Teluk Nipah. The main beaches include Pasir Bogak, Coral Bay, and Pantai Puteri Dewi, which is privately owned and requires an entrance fee. The beach at Teluk Ketapang, or Turtle Bay, at the northern end of the island, is named for the increasingly rare sea turtles that come ashore here in the summer months to lay their eggs.

Offering a change of scene from the beaches is the historical site of Kota Belanda, a 17th-century Dutch fort 2 miles (3 km) south of Pangkor Town. The fort was built mainly to protect Dutch interests in the tin trade from Malay pirates. There are a few Hindu and Chinese temples

Once rich with tin ore, the magnificent jungle-topped limestone cliffs of Kinta Valley shelter a number of caves, which, over the years, have been converted into Buddhist temples and are now popular pilgrimage centers. The oldest and largest cave temple is Sam Poh Tong. Established by a Buddhist monk in the late-19th century, it features Chinese-style Mahayana Buddhist images. More impressive is Perak Tong, one of the largest Chinese temples in Malaysia, founded in 1926. Its interior walls are adorned with murals done by artists from across Southeast Asia. The main chamber contains over 40 Buddha statues and a huge bell believed to be more than a century old. A series of 400 steps leads up and through the cave to a balcony which offers splendid views across the

Although the name Taiping means everlasting peace in Chinese, the old state capital of Perak traces its origins to a turbulent past, marked by bitter feuds between rival Chinese secret societies.

The country's first tin mining center and the most important town in Perak in the mid-19th century, it began to be overshadowed by Ipoh and Kinta Valley in the 1890s. Now a low-key town, with a distinctly Chinese feel, Taiping is best known for its vast, tranquil Lake

It is also home to Perak Museum, the oldest museum in the country, built in 1883. Now officially called Bukit Larut, Maxwell Hill is the oldest and smallest hill station in Malaysia. It is also the wettest, receiving the highest rainfall in the country. Once a tea plantation, Maxwell Hill was founded in the 1870s. It was named after William Edward Maxwell, the Assistant Resident of Perak. The 3,340-ft (1,020-m) mist-shrouded hill station is still developing. Its greatest appeal lies in the bucolic charm of its surroundings and the stunning vistas that stretch across the plains to the Strait of Malacca.

Activities here revolve around trekking and bird- and butterfly-watching. The steep climb to the summit of Bukit Larut, with its spectacular views on the way up, is a popular day trip from Taiping. It twists through more than 70 hairpin bends, dense jungles, and a crumbling, old tea garden.

Kuala Kangsar in Perak has been the royal capital of the Sultans of Perak for the last 200 years. In the 1870s, it became the first foothold for the British in Malaysia, who initiated their control of the peninsula by installing Residents, or colonial officers, at the royal courts. During the same period, the town became the birthplace of Malaysia's rubber industry when Sir Hugh Low, then British Resident in Perak, planted the first seeds of rubber. By the 1890s, however, the town's prestige as an administrative and financial center was eclipsed by the tin-trading towns of Ipoh and Taiping.

Today a tranquil town, Kuala Kangsar remains steeped in Malay tradition and is home to one of the most attractive royal districts in the country, as well as some fine colonial architecture and lovely gardens. All the main sights are within walking distance of each other and can be explored in half a day.

The small town center can be divided into old and new sections. The older part, close to the banks of the Sungai Perak, is a good place to buy traditional Malay handicrafts, such as mengkuang woven cloth, bamboo products, and the celebrated labu, or gourd-shaped earthenware pots.

These are manufactured in the village of Sayong, which is located across the river and can be reached by boat. The new town is dominated by Chinese shophouses and modern buildings, including most of Kuala Kangsar's restaurants. Marking the center of town are two colonial-era structures, the distinctive clock tower and the District Office, whose grounds still contain one of the town's first rubber trees.

To the north of the town center is one of the most impressive colonial buildings in Kuala Kangsar, the Malay College. Opened in 1905 during the reign of Sultan Idris, it was the first Malay school to provide English education to the local elite who were hoping to join the colonial administrative service. Across the road from the Malay College stands Pavilion Square Tower. Built in 1930, this small wooden three-story structure, designed in colonial and Malay styles, enabled the royal family and British dignitaries to view polo matches and other sports events in privacy.

Masjid Ubudiah

Jalan Istana.

To the east of Kuala Kangsar, along the wide Sungai Perak, an ornamental gateway leads to Masjid Ubudiah, Perak's royal mosque and one of the finest examples of Islamic architecture in Malaysia. Gracing the slopes of the grassy Bukit Chandan, the striking mosque is built in Moorish style. Its magnificent golden onion-shaped dome is closely surrounded by four soaring white minarets, each crowned with its own small dome. Construction of the mosque began during the reign of Sultan Idris but was not completed until 1917, the first year of the reign of his successor, Sultan Abdul Jalil. The delays were partly due to World War I, and partly due to two royal elephants running amok and destroying the imported Italian marble floor. Next to the mosque is the Royal Mausoleum, where rulers of Perak have been interred since the 18th century.

The interior of the mosque is officially closed to non-Muslims. However, visitors are free to explore the grounds of the mosque and are permitted to photograph the building.

🏰 Istana Iskandariah

Jalan Istana.

Perched at the summit of Bukit Chandan, overlooking the Sungai Perak and Masjid Ubudiah, the modern Istana Iskandariah was built in 1933 and is the official residence of the present royal family. Set amid rolling lawns, the imposing white marble palace, with its series of towers topped by golden domes, reflects a fusion of Moorish and 1930s colonial Art Deco styles. A less impressive annex was added on the southern side in 1984. Although the palace is not open to visitors, a stroll along the two small roads that form its boundary provides excellent views of the building and its lawns, especially from the riverside.

It is a superb example of traditional Malay architecture. The structure is built entirely of wood without the use of an architectural plan, nails, or steel, and is decorated with geometric-patterned bamboo

The ground floor of the palace features extensive verandas that allow cool breezes to flow through the entire space. The erstwhile palace now houses the Perak Royal Museum, popularly known as Muzium Di Raja, which traces the history of Perak and its royal family through images and artifacts.

🏰 Istana Hulu

Jalan Istana. 🕒 9:30am–5pm daily. 📞

The beautiful Victorian-style Istana Hulu is another former palace that was built in 1903 for Sultan Idris, the 28th Sultan of Perak. When the palace ceased to function as a royal residence, it became the location of the prestigious girls' college Sekolah Raja Perempuan Mazwin, or Mazwin School for Ladies, for several decades. The palace has now been converted into the Galeri Sultan Azlan Shah, or Sultan Azlan Shah Museum, a Perak state museum. Exhibits showcase traditional handicrafts of the state including a fine collection of traditional keris, or Malay daggers, and examples of tekat embroidery. Most significant, however, is the museum's extensive collection of royal gifts, photographs, and other personal effects belonging to Azlan Shah, the present Sultan of Perak, who has also served as the ninth Yang di-Pertuan Agong, or King of Malaysia, from 1984 to 1994, a rotating position held by sultans of the various states.

Georgetown 14

Located on the northeastern coast of Penang, Georgetown is one of Malaysia's most visited cities. Founded in 1786 by Captain Francis Light as a base for the British East India Company in the Malay states, the town, which was named after the Prince of Wales, soon developed into the state's economic and cultural hub. An essentially Chinese city today, Georgetown has an authentic Straits Settlement atmosphere, enhanced by its well-preserved colonial architecture, traditional wooden shophouses, and the diverse cuisine developed by its Indian, Malay, Peranakan, Thai, and European communities.

Fort Cornwallis

Lebuh Light. from KOMTAR via Weld Quay. 9am–7pm daily.

The spot where Sir Francis Light (see p103) stepped ashore in 1786, Fort Cornwallis, in the colonial core of Georgetown, is a great place to start an exploration of the city on foot, by bicycle, or by trishaw. The original fort was a simple palm-tree stockade, but in 1805 this was replaced by a star-shaped brick and mortar structure complete with moat and crenellated walls to shelter cannon guarding the harbor. As the first headquarters of the British East India Company in Penang, Fort Cornwallis contained barracks for troops, a signal station, administrative offices, and a Christian chapel. Today, little remains of the fort apart from its outer fortifications. The inner area is a park liberally scattered with cannon. The oldest of these,

Victoria Memorial Clock Tower

Seri Rambai, is of Dutch origin and dates back to 1603.

In a small traffic circle to the southeast of the fort stands the Victoria Memorial Clock Tower, an elegant colonial edifice crowned by a Moorish-style dome. Built in 1897 with funds donated by a Georgetown toukay, or Chinese businessman, it commemorates the diamond jubilee of Queen Victoria's reign. The memorial stands 60-ft (18-m) high in honor of the 60 years of the monarch's reign. To the west of the fort are the parklands of the Padang Kota Lama, or the Old City Green. Among the fine colonial buildings to the south and west are the Supreme Court, the Dewan Undangan Negeri, or State Legislative Building, and the grand Dewan Bandaran, or City Hall. To the north, facing the northern channel of the Strait of Malacca, runs the Esplanade, named Jalan Tun Syed Sheh Barakbah.

Weld Quay Clan Piers

Pengkalan Weld. from KOMTAR.

South of Little India, along Weld Quay and projecting into the southern channel of the Strait of Malacca, stand long rows of jetties on which are built low houses, religious shrines, and shops. These are the clan jetties of Georgetown, dating back to the late-19th century. There are seven such jetties, all but one home to a different Chinese clan, originally from the Tong An district of China's Fujian province.

The oldest and largest is the Chew Jetty, founded in the 1870s, followed by the Lee, Tan, Yeoh, and Koay jetties. The most recent, the Mixed Clan and Peng Aun jetties, date from the 1960s. Six are home to Sino-Malaysian Buddhist clans, while the last, Koay Jetty, is Muslim, being home to around 30 Chinese Hui Muslim families. All the jetties, except Koay, terminate in small temples. The most important one, on Chew Jetty, is dedicated to the Jade Emperor.

It is more commonly known as Masjid Melayu, or the Malay Mosque, to distinguish it from the nearby Masjid Kapitan Kling, which was built by Indian-Muslim migrants.

The mosque, a 5-minute walk from Lebuh Chulia, has an Egyptian-style minaret and an Achenese-style roof. The hole halfway up its minaret was the result of a cannonball fired in a clan riot in Penang.

Syed Mohammed Alatas was a wealthy and influential 19th-century Achinese businessman and leader of Penang's Malay community. In the 1860s he built a magnificent rumah besar, or great house, on Armenian Street where he lived with his family until his death in the early 20th century. Set in a walled compound, the two-story Syed Alatas Mansion is an eclectic mix of Malay, Indian, and European architectural and cultural influences. It features a terra-cotta hipped roof that slopes down to the eaves and a carriage porch with a gable roof. The building is elaborately decorated with molded cornices and elegant stuccowork. Although considered one of the finest examples of upper-class Malay Muslim residences in Penang, it fell into a state of disrepair when it was abandoned in the 1930s and remained virtually forgotten for most of the 20th century.

In 1993, the mansion was taken over and restored by the Penang State Government and eventually reopened as the Penang Islamic Museum. It houses various collections of Islamic and Malay artifacts, and also functions as an information center. The exhibits are displayed thematically, and include Arabic calligraphy, ceramics, carpets and upholstery, and items used in religious rituals. One of the most unusual artifacts on display is a ceremonial Malay circumcision chair. Facets of Malay wedding rituals are also chronicled. The Personalities Room has exhibits on iconic Malay figures of the past. The entrance displays a beduk, or a long wooden drum, used to sound the call to prayer five times a day.

M Masjid Kapitan Kling

Jalan Masjid Kapitan Kling. Tel (04) 261-6663. Islamic Information Center. daily. prayer times.

Masjid Kapitan Kling, the oldest and best-known historic mosque in Penang, was founded around 1800 by Caudeer Mohudeen. He was a prominent member of the island's Indian Muslim community and bore the title Kapitan Kling, or Captain of the Klings. Kling was a term employed at that time to describe Tamil Muslims, also called Chulia, who formed the bulk of Penang's Indian Muslims. Mohudeen, officially named headman of the Chulias in 1801, died in 1834. His tomb is located at the nearby Kampung Kolam.

The Masjid has been restored and altered on several occasions, most notably in 1910 when it was given its present appearance with the addition of Indian-style copper domes, turrets, and a minaret. A madrasa, or religious school, was added in 1916. In 1935, the height of the central prayer hall was doubled, allowing more natural light and air into the interior. The most recent renovation took place in 2003, when Arabic calligraphy was added to the interior of the main dome and to the walls, which were originally decorated with intricate floral motifs.

M Sri Mariamman Temple

Jalan Masjid Kapitan Kling. 6am–9pm daily. Thaipusam (Jan/Feb), Navaratri (Oct/Nov).

On the opposite side of the street from Masjid Kapitan Kling is the Sri Mariamman Temple, a typical southern Indian temple with an elaborately carved and painted gopuram, or tiered entrance gateway of a Hindu temple. Dedicated to the deity Mariamman, or Great Powerful Mother, this is Penang's oldest Hindu temple.

Established by pious local Tamils as a simple shrine, it became a fully-fledged temple in 1833. Artisans were brought from Madras to create images of the goddess Mariamman in all her aspects. Subsequently, a 23-ft (7-m) high gopuram was added, with sculptures of about 38 Hindu deities. A statue of Lord Murugan, adorned with gold and diamonds, was also installed.

Several times a year, Sri Mariamman is taken out of the temple in a wooden chariot, and carried in procession through the streets of Little India. The most important occasion is Navaratri, a nine-night celebration in October or November when devotees worship female deities, such as Durga, Saraswati, Lakshmi, and Mariamman. Penang's annual Thaipusam (see p29) procession also begins here.

Little India

Lebuh Pasar. www.tourismpenang.gov.my

Penang's colorful and vibrant Little India, throbbing with antiquity and tradition, dates back to the early 19th century, when Indian migrants to Penang began to settle in and around Lebuh Pasar, then called Kadai Teru, or shop street. Since most of the early migrants were Tamils, the area was commonly known as Little Madras, but over the years other communities also moved in. Soon the enclave acquired a distinctive south Asian feel and gained its current sobriquet.

The narrow streets of Little India are lined with shops selling all kinds of south Asian produce, from saris and gold jewelry to flower garlands and images of Hindu deities. The wide range of shops and services includes astrologers, millers, grocers, fruit-sellers, herb dealers, and moneychangers. The aroma of spice, incense, and curry suffuses the air, while the bells of trishaw drivers and the constant bustle of the crowds make the ambience quintessentially Indian.

Although Bahasa Malaysia and English are the main spoken languages of Penang, here, the rolling, fast-paced southern Indian tongues of Malayalam and Tamil predominate. With attractions that include mosques, Hindu temples, and Chinese clan enclaves, as well as a host of restaurants, Little India is now a great draw for food-lovers, heritage enthusiasts, and visitors who simply want to soak up the atmosphere.

Kuan Yin Temple

Jalan Masjid Kapitan Kling. Dedicated to Kuan Yin, or the goddess of mercy, this temple was originally constructed as a shared Hokkien and Cantonese temple and community center. Its foundation stone was laid in 1800, making it one of the oldest Chinese temples in the province of Penang.

Kuan Yin is perhaps the most worshiped of Chinese deities, and also much revered by Buddhists and Taoists. Associated with peace, good fortune, and fertility, she is portrayed with 18 arms. Feast days are held to honor Kuan Yin's birthday, initiation, and attainment of nirvana. Even today, the temple bustles with worshipers carrying ritual offerings of flowers, oil, and food, especially on temple days. These fall on the first and 15th day of every lunar month, and on the 19th day of the second, sixth, and ninth lunar months. Puppet shows and Chinese opera performances are held on these days to honor the goddess.

The oldest Anglican church in Southeast Asia, St. George's Church was constructed in 1818 to serve the growing Christian community of Penang. Designed by military engineer and painter Captain Robert Smith, it was built by the British East India Company using convict labor. In 1886, to mark the centenary of the founding of Penang and to honor Sir Francis Light, a small Greek-style domed pavilion was built on the church grounds. The tall octagonal steeple of the Neoclassical church once dominated the town, although today the graceful structure is overshadowed by towering commercial buildings. Farther west on Lebuh Farquhar is the Protestant Cemetery, where Sir Francis Light is buried in a gazebo-like tomb shaded by frangipani trees.

SIR FRANCIS LIGHT

Born in Suffolk, England, in 1740, Francis Light joined the British East India Company in 1765. Directed to find a suitable island base for their commercial activities in Southeast Asia, he chose Pulau Penang, which he then acquired from the Sultan of Kedah in 1786. Having successfully established a colony, he served as its superintendent until his death in 1794 of malaria. He was buried at the Protestant Cemetery at Lebuh Farquhar. As closely linked to Penang's growth as Sir Stamford Raffles is to Singapore's, Sir Francis Light is still honored as a founding father. His statue now stands at Georgetown's Fort Cornwallis.

Located next to St. George's Church in the former Penang Free School, this small museum houses an excellent collection of maps, records, and displays charting the growth of Penang since the arrival of Sir Francis Light. The first floor showcases the various ethnic groups that constitute the population of Penang, with exhibits of clothing, photographs, household items, and artifacts associated with the island's Peranakan, Malay, Chinese, and Indian communities. The second floor is devoted to Penang's history with special emphasis on the colonial era, the Japanese occupation, the Chinese and Indian settlements, and the gaining of independence. Located in the heart of Chinatown, this is a Peranakan-influenced mansion that was built in 1897 by a local woman of Thai origin. Partially destroyed by fire in 1984, it was rebuilt using as much of the surviving structure as possible, and was reopened in 1999 as a shopping center specializing in antiques and artifacts. It also has a small tea shop.

Since then it has undergone several changes, and today the first floor of the three-story building functions as an antique and curio center offering a fascinating selection of 19th-century furniture, pictures, porcelain, brassware, calligraphy, paintings, and carpets. The second floor functions as a budget guest-house, while the third floor has been converted into a folk museum, focusing on the history and culture of Penang, with special emphasis on the Peranakan, or Straits Chinese community. Indian and Malay items are also on display.

The temple was initially established as a clan house for overseas Chinese from Hainan Island in 1866, although the current building dates from 1895. During its centenary celebrations in 1995, the temple was carefully restored and a new frontage was added with ornate carvings and distinctive swirling dragon pillars.

This spectacular mansion was built by Cheong Fatt Tze, a young Hakka Chinese entrepreneur who eventually became one of Southeast Asia's richest businessmen. Although Cheong Fatt Tze built several grand houses, this 1904 mansion is considered the most magnificent. Fatt Tze lived here with three of his favorite wives, raising eight sons. The house fell into disrepair after his death in 1916, but it has since been beautifully restored, winning the prestigious UNESCO Asia Pacific Heritage Award for authentic restoration in 2000. Said to be the largest traditional courtyard house in the region, the building conforms to the principles of geomancy, and blends Chinese and Western architectural concepts. Painted a deep blue, the mansion features Qing dynasty latticework and filigree ornamentation with louvered and stained-glass windows in the Western style, cast-iron balusters, and Stoke-on-Trent floor tiling. Today, the mansion functions as an opulent and unique homestay heritage hotel (see p277).

The grande dame of Penang's hotels, the Eastern & Oriental (see p277) is not just one of the most luxurious, but also one of the great historic hotels of Southeast Asia. Popularly called the E & O, it was established in 1884 by the Armenian Sarkies brothers, who went on to found Singapore's Raffles

Hotel and Rangoon's famous Strand. A landmark in colonial architecture, it boasts a 830-ft (253-m) seafront lawn – the longest in the world – and its suites overlook manicured lawns and lush gardens with a panoramic view across the Strait of Malacca.

Long a center of Penang's social life, the hotel has hosted eminent guests such as Noel Coward, Rudyard Kipling, Herman Hesse, and Douglas Fairbanks. Somerset Maugham, another visitor, referred to the E & O in several of his writings. Today, it is a great place to eat a light tiffin lunch followed by afternoon tea, or to sip a cocktail at sunset under the rain trees on the hotel's private veranda.

FIVE FOOT WAYS

Originally used by builders from Guangdong in China, this style of Chinese shophouse has long been associated with the former Straits Settlements of Singapore, Penang, and Malacca. The widespread presence of Five Foot Ways in Singapore and urban Malaysia is attributed to Sir Stamford Raffles, who decreed that all shophouses should have verandas that form continuous and open passages.

Shop signs over a Five Foot Way

Characterized by load-bearing gable walls and massive roof beams that span the building, these shophouses extend over the narrow sidewalks forming a sort of covered walkway and providing shelter from the sun and the monsoon rains. The sidewalk can be further shaded by lowering split bamboo blinds.

The 200-year old Burmese enclave at Pulau Tikus is home to a spectacular Theravada Buddhist monastery, founded in 1803 and known originally as the Nandy Molah Burmese Temple. Now called the Dharmikarama Temple in honor of the dhamma, or corpus of Buddhist teachings, this is Penang's oldest Buddhist place of worship.

The temple gateway, well guarded by a pair of stucco elephants, leads to a compound shaded by a peepul tree and dotted with mythical figures and religious icons, among them myriad Buddhas, flying beings, and chimeras. The ornate red-tiled roof of the temple, embellished with gleaming gold filigree work, is Burmese in inspiration and visible from afar. The complex includes monks' quarters, a wishing pool where visitors toss coins that are later used towards temple maintenance, and a peaceful prayer hall housing a large Burmese-style image of the Buddha. Within the hall are rows of finely carved arbat, or spiritual practitioner who had attained nirvana, created by Burmese artisans. The temple also has a shrine to the Arahant Upagutta, an arbat widely revered in Burma for his powers. A mural depicts the renunciation of Siddhartha Gautama, the Historical Buddha.

Popularly known as the Temple of the Reclining Buddha, this is the largest Buddhist temple in Penang. The name means temple of auspicious victory. The building dates from 1845, when the Thai community asked the government for land on which to build a monastery. The land was granted by the then Governor of Penang, W. L. Butterworth. The temple houses a Reclining Buddha statue, constructed in 1958 to mark the 2,500th anniversary of the birth of Gautama Buddha. Called Phra Chaiya Mongkol, the statue measures an impressive 108 ft (33 m) in length and is said to be the third-longest Reclining Buddha in the world. Besides the main shrine hall, the temple includes a Thai-style gilded stupa, or chedi, and fierce temple guardians called yaksas. The whole complex is distinctively central Thai in style, down to the gold-painted pagodas. The temple is attended to by Thai monks and serves the small local Thai community, as well as both Theravada and Mahayana Buddhist devotees from across the island. Legend has it that the temple's first abbot, a monk named Phorphan Kuat, or honorable father Kuat, was fond of local laksa or spicy noodle soup, and even today devotees bring bowls of laksa to offer at his shrine.

Established by the colonial administration in 1884 on the site of a disused quarry, the beautifully landscaped Penang Botanic Gardens are undoubtedly the finest botanical gardens in Peninsular Malaysia. Spread across 72 acres (29 ha) of land dominated by an attractive waterfall, rain forest-covered hills, and a small river, the gardens provide protected habitat for rare species of plant and also serve as a green lung for Georgetown and its people.

The gardens owe their beauty to the untiring work of Charles Curtis, who was the first to nurture and transform the former granite quarry into a lush tropical garden and nursery. In 1946, after World War II ended, the Penang Botanic Gardens were separated from their parent establishment in Singapore and began functioning as an independent entity.

Besides their educational and preservational role, the gardens are a popular spot for locals to exercise, jog, or walk in the refreshingly unpolluted air. There are two paved trails, the shorter Lower Circle and the longer Upper Circle. Surrounding these are less accessible forested areas. Botanical attractions include the Aroid Walkway, featuring plants of the philodendron family, the ornamental plant house, the fern house, the cactus house, and the lily pool. Among the species of rare trees seen here are the cannonball tree, the candle tree, the baobab, ebony, and the argus pheasant tree. The gardens also house a nursery of commercial plants, such as pepper, cloves, and nutmeg.

The largest and most celebrated Buddhist temple in Malaysia, Kek Lok Si, or the temple of supreme bliss, is spread across a hilltop overlooking the district of Ayer Itam. Long sacred to the island's Chinese residents, the hills of Ayer Itam are believed by locals to be geomantically fortuitous and a suitable retreat for Taoist devotees seeking immortality. This beautiful temple was initially envisioned by the head monk of the Kuan Yin Temple (see p103) on Jalan Masjid Kapitan Kling and supported by the Chinese consul in Penang. Later, the idea was backed by the Qing Emperor Guangxu, who gave its foundation an imperial tablet and 70,000 volumes of Buddhist sutras. Construction began in 1893 and took Burmese, Chinese, and Thai artisans more than two decades to complete.

Kek Lok Si's most celebrated feature is the magnificent seven-tier Pagoda of King Rama VI, completed in 1930 and named after the Thai monarch who laid the foundation stone. Also known as the pagoda of ten thousand Buddhas, it stands at a height of 100 ft (30 m). This impressive pagoda was designed in three different styles, with an octagonal Chinese-style base, middle tiers of Thai architecture, and a Burmese-style crown, symbolic of the unity of Mahayana and Theravada Buddhism.

The temple grounds contain lovely gardens and sacred ponds, including the Sacred Turtle Pond where the devout release captive turtles as an act of spiritual liberation. Dominating all is a massive bronze statue of Kuan Yin, the goddess of mercy.

Sir Francis Light, the founder of Penang, is said to have ordered the construction of a horse track to the top of the hill in 1788. Today, however, visitors can ride up the hill in a more spectacular and comfortable manner on the Penang Hill Railway, a steep funicular line built in 1923. Enthusiastic walkers can opt for a 3-hour hike up a tarred track that begins at the quarry at the entrance of the Penang Botanic Gardens.

The hill is an area rich in biodiversity and has a number of rare endemic species. Dipterocarp and coniferous trees are common, as are tree ferns. The summit offers panoramic views across the nearby Strait of Malacca to Penang Bridge, the mainland, and Butterworth. Also on the summit are a colorful Hindu temple and a mosque.

Also known as Foreigner's Rock, Batu Ferringhi is Penang's premier beachside destination and one of the most developed beach strips anywhere in Malaysia. Facing northwest into the Strait of Malacca, the shore at Batu Ferringhi was once a delightful coconut-lined sandy strand and a popular destination for hippies in the 1970s.

However, over the past three decades, it has changed dramatically into a bustling coastal strip, lined with high-rise hotels and a wide range of restaurants and shops. Although the beach is clean, the sea is a little murky and filled with jellyfish. The waves are not high enough for surfing, but this is a good place to sunbathe and relax.

The beach was hit by the 2004 tsunami, but has since completely recovered. Today, Batu Ferringhi's easy accessibility from Georgetown means that it is popular with day visitors and usually busy, especially at weekends. Prices are especially low on weekdays and off-season months (from around March to October).

Just a mile (2 km) west of Batu Ferringhi is the Tropical Spice Garden, where visitors can view more than five hundred species of plants from Malaysia, Thailand, and Indonesia. Three specially designed garden trails lead to 11 separate gardens that feature special plant collections with signboards indicating their common and botanical names and their various uses.

On the eastern side of Teluk Bahang is the Penang Cultural Center, which offers a glimpse of the diverse cultures of Malaysia through daily performances of traditional music and dance. Just south of the bus station, Craft Batik is a handicraft workshop and showroom where visitors can observe batik being made and also shop for sarongs and batik paintings. Bayan Lepas, 7 miles (12 km) S of Georgetown. 📶 66 from Komtar in Georgetown. ☐ 7am–7pm daily. 📶 anniversary of the birth of Chor Soo Kong, 6th day of First Lunar month (Jan/Feb).

Named Ban Kah Lan, meaning the temple of the azure clouds in the Hokkien dialect, this highly unusual temple was built in 1850 by Chinese migrants. It honors the memory of a venerated Chinese Buddhist monk named Chor Soo Kong who is said to have had healing powers. He was born in China's Fujian Province during the reign of the 11th-century Song Emperor Renzong. Chor Soo Kong later became an ascetic seeking spiritual enlightenment, which he attained under the guidance of Zen master Ming Song. Soon after he practiced as a doctor, catering to the needs of the poor. Chor Soo Kong retired to a monastery on Peng Lai Mountain, where he was sanctified after his death.

According to folklore, the statue of the deified Chor Soo Kong was brought to Penang by a monk from China in 1850, and was enshrined in a temple at Bayan Lepas. When the temple was complete, the pious monk allowed snakes from the surrounding jungle to take shelter there. The snakes were venomous Wagler's pit vipers called ular kapak tokong in Malay. Today, these vipers still inhabit the temple, and are its main attraction, especially during the festival season. About 3ft (1m) long in maturity, they are dark green with wide yellow bands. Devotees regard them as harmless guardian angels of the temple. Although rarely fatal, the bite of the vipers is painful. Fortunately, they are sluggish during the day, perhaps dulled by the incense smoke, but are active at night, when they descend from their perches in the eaves to consume offerings left by the pious.

He visited Pulau Penang during his exploration of Southeast Asia, the Indian Ocean, and the Red Sea. The footprint is said to mark the spot where he first stepped ashore. The rock is enshrined in the temple, which is surrounded by lush, well-maintained gardens close to the shore, overlooking the harbor and the jetty.

16 miles (26 km) NW of Sungai Petani. www.mykedah.com

Peninsular Malaysia's most important archaeological site, the Hindu-Buddhist remains at Lembah Bujang, or Bujang valley, reveal significant aspects of a major pre-Islamic civilization. First excavated by the British archaeologist H.G. Quaritch-Wales in 1936, this archaeological site stretches over a vast 87-sq mile (225-sq km) area extending from Gunung Jerai to Kuala Muda.

Bujang, which derives its name from a legendary winged dragon, was a notable kingdom and port in the 5th century AD. It had trade relations with India, Srivijaya (on Sumatra), and Cambodia, and was visited by the Chinese Buddhist monk I-Ching in AD 672. In the 7th century, it was absorbed into the Srivijaya Empire, and reached its zenith between the 9th and 10th centuries, before Islam gained a foothold on the peninsula.

Over 50 sites have been excavated in the valley. Among the finds, the most impressive are the candi, or two tomb-temples, which have been transported and reassembled at the Lembah Bujang Archaeological Museum in nearby Merbok. The 7th-century Candi Bukit Batu Pahat has a vimana, or inner sanctuary, with images of Hindu deities, and a mandapa, or open hall, with a stone roof supported by pillars. The candi performed the function of temples for Hindu or Buddhist religious activities, and honored the deceased rulers and members of the royal family. The museum preserves, chronicles, and explains the various excavations as well as displays collections of artifacts discovered at the site. These include Chinese porcelain, Shiva lingas, statues of the Hindu god Ganesha and goddess Durga, terra-cotta statues, and a bronze Buddhist image discovered here in 1976. It is possible to see the excavated sites through privately arranged guided tours from the museum. The neighboring waterfall is also a favorite picnic spot. At some point in the future, the whole area is scheduled to become an archaeological park.

Rising sharply out of the surrounding Kedah plains is the imposing 3,993-ft (1,217-m) Gunung Jerai. Formerly known as Kedah Peak, this massive forest-clad limestone outcrop that is a part of the Titiwangsa Mountain Range is clearly visible from the sea. It adds a touch of variety to the scenic flat plains visible throughout the area. In the past, it acted as a navigation point for sailors from southern India, and was considered sacred by the Hindu kingdom of Bujang. It marked the start of a cross-peninsula portage route between the Indian Ocean and the South China Sea that avoided the long voyage around the Strait of Malacca. Today, the peak is visited for its pristine splendor and panoramic view of rhododendron and pine-covered forests. On the summit is a dilapidated 6th-century Hindu shrine and bath called Candi Telaga Sembilan, or nine pool temple, which was discovered in 1884.

Another attraction on the mountain is the Muzium Perhutanan, or Forestry Museum, which is saturated with delicious balsamic fragrances from various types of coniferous and oak trees. Run by the Malaysian Forestry Commission, the museum has exhibits on trees of the surrounding Sungai Teroi Forest Recreation Park, which houses rare orchids and wildlife.

Kedah's state capital, Alor Star, is mainly a transit point to Thailand and a junction for the road west to Kuala Kedah, the ferry port for Pulau Langkawi. However, it also has several attractions. Among these is the padang, a lovely old colonial town square surrounded by a number of royal and religious buildings. Among these is the Balai Besar, or the royal audience hall, which stands on tall pillars embellished with Victorian iron lacework. The unique Balai Nobat, or drum hall, is an eight-sided tower topped by an onion-shaped dome. The building houses the Kedah Royal Orchestra. Masjid Zahir, or state mosque, incorporates elegant Moorish designs in its five black domes and slender minarets. Also by the padang are two municipal buildings that are open to the public. These are the Balai Seni Lukis Negeri, or state art gallery, which exhibits modern Malaysian art, and the Muzium Di Raja, or Royal Museum, featuring royal paraphernalia.

More interesting is the Muzium Negeri, or the State Museum, located a mile (2 km) north of the Padang. It displays exhibits dating back to the 19th century when Kedah was a tributary of neighboring Siam (now known as Thailand). Another reminder of the state's Siamese connections is Wat Syam Nikrodharam, a Theravada Buddhist temple which was built in the unmistakable Thai style, located at Kampung Telok Sena. Today, the city's considerably vast Chinese Buddhist population worships here.

As Kuala means river mouth in Malay, Kuala Kedah is an aptly named fishing port that is located at the northern bank of its namesake river. This small town serves as the convenient southern ferry point for travelers sailing to Pulau Langkawi. The crowning glory of the town is Kota Kuala Kedah, a fort dating to the mid-18th century standing on the right bank of Sungai Kedah. The structure was originally built to protect the kingdom against naval attacks by Siam (Thailand). However, the Thais invaded and captured the fort in the early 19th century. The town is guarded by thick walls and a moat, and comprises a number of buildings including the Royal Audience Hall. Six of the 19th-century British cannons are on display, resting on the crumbling walls, facing the river estuary. Today, Kuala Kedah is famous for the variety of delectable seafood, especially laksa, served at the numerous eateries that have cropped up at this ancient historic site.

ORANG SYAM

Malaysians of Thai ethnic origin, known in Malay as Orang Syam, have lived in northern Malaysia for centuries. When and how they came to settle in this predominantly Malay-speaking region remains unclear. Their dialect suggests that their roots go back at least four centuries to the Narathiwat province which neighbors Thailand. The Orang Syam are recognized as bumiputras, or indigenous Malaysians, having the same rights and status as Muslim Malays. They settled primarily in prosperous kampung syams, or Siamese villages in Kedah, Kelantan, Perak, Penang, and Perlis, dwelling harmoniously with their Muslim neighbors. One easy way to identify a kampung syam is the presence of elaborately sited Buddhist temples. They have quintessentially Thai curved roofs, lavishly gilded pagodas, tinkling wind-chimes, and edifices of the Buddha in various postures. The five-centuries old temple at Kampung Jubakar claims to have the largest Seated Buddha image in Southeast Asia.

Exploring Pulau Langkawi

The largest among a cluster of tropical islands, Pulau Langkawi is a mountainous, palm-fringed island peppered with paddy fields and sandy coves. In 1986, Pulau Langkawi was transformed from an isolated, overwhelmingly Malay rural area, into a duty-free zone in a successful attempt to make it a holiday destination, wooing backpackers and upmarket visitors alike. Access to the archipelago by air and ferry has never been easier, and Langkawi's excellent road network makes exploring the island convenient. Once-sleepy Kuah, Langkawi's capital, now boasts a slew of shopping centers, supermarkets, resorts, and luxury hotels catering to rising tourist demands.

Originally a small fishing village, Kuah is undergoing rapid development as a result of the island's growing tourism industry.

The most distinguished building in town is the Friday Congregational Mosque, Masjid al-Hana, located next to the tourist office. Built in 1959, the mosque incorporates Uzbek and Moorish elements along with traditional Malay design. The Langkawi History Garden, a theme park by the seafont, features sculptures and exhibits that recount the archipelago's history. The garden overlooks Dataran Lang, a landscaped square with a prominent statue of an eagle. Kuah is the best place on Langkawi to shop, change money, and rent vehicles for sightseeing. It also has a vibrant pasar malam, or night market. For those arriving by sea, Kuah is a useful transit point to Kuala Perlis, Kuala Kedah, and Penang.

🕌 Tomb of Mahsuri

Dedicated to the memory of a Malay princess, the tomb of Mahsuri is a simple white structure. According to legend, Mahsuri was unjustly accused of adultery and sentenced to death. Mahsuri was stabbed by the executioner with her own keris. Her blood flowed white as an indication of her purity, and with her dying breath she cursed the island to seven generations of bad luck. A tomb of fine marble was built on the spot where she was killed. Today, this is honored as a shrine by the islanders. Every day a cultural show depicting the legend is staged at the tomb, along with displays of traditional dancing and Malay silat, or martial arts.

🌿 Langkawi Rain Forest Canopy Adventure

9 miles (15 km) NW of Kuah.

One of Malaysia's most exhilarating outdoor activities, the Langkawi Rain Forest Canopy Adventure allows visitors to pass high above the rain forest floor on the Gunung Raya mountainside. This adrenalin-charged experience features a 492-ft (150-m) slide along metal cables and a 98-ft (30-m) vertical rappel. It is both exciting and safe as it is operated by skilled professionals and pre-activity training is provided on site.

🌿 Telaga Tujuh Falls

14 miles (22 km) W of Kuah. Langkawi Cable Car ☐ 10am–7pm daily. 📞

Set in an attractive spot on the west coast of Langkawi, Telaga Tujuh or seven wells, is ideal for freshwater bathing and picnics. Located west of Pantai Kok, it is a 30-minute walk to the seven waterfalls, which are joined by smooth, slippery stone sills that bathers can slide down. Legend has it that fairies bathe at these wells when humans are not present, which may account for the pleasantly sweet perfume that suffuses the air.

In the vicinity is the Langkawi Cable Car, which carries passengers over ancient rain forests to the summit of Gunung Machincang, at 2,315 ft (706 m), for fabulous views across the island to the sea and neighboring Thailand. At an incline of 42 degrees, with a vertical rise of 2,231 ft (680 m), the ride is among the steepest in the world. There are two stops, Middle and Top stations, where visitors can alight. The rocks here are some of Malaysia's oldest at 450 million years. The area is now a UNESCO Geopark.

The Coral Garden in the sheltered, clear waters off Pulau Payar is enduringly popular and is said to have the largest number of coral species in Malaysia. Here visitors can also feed baby sharks under the supervision of experts. To visit, it is best to book a day in advance with a tour group.

Covered with rain forest and mangroves, the island boasts over 90 species of birds, including hornbills, kingfishers, and woodpeckers. The highlight here is the freshwater Tasik Dayang Bunting, or lake of the pregnant maiden, surrounded by limestone cliffs and dense forests. A legend holds that the waters of the lake bestow fertility, and local women come to the lake to pray for children. Visitors can swim in the lake, explore it by pedalo, or simply picnic by its shores.

SOUTHERN PENINSULA

The southern tip of Peninsular Malaysia is also the southernmost extremity of continental Asia, encompassing the country's largest state, Johor, and the often overlooked state of Negeri Sembilan, stronghold of the Minangkabau culture. Cosmopolitan Malacca, the capital of the historically significant state of the same name, is on every tourist's itinerary, while on the east coast, the sandy beaches and colorful reefs of Pulau Tioman are a magnet for visitors from around the world.

With only the narrow Strait of Malacca dividing this side of Malaysia from Sumatra, there have always been close relations between the two cultures. Negeri Sembilan was settled by the Minangkabau people from Sumatra in the 15th century and their unique style of architecture, with upswept roofs imitating buffalo horns, is still seen across the state.

Malacca, too, was founded by an exiled Sumatran prince who introduced Islam to the peninsula in the 15th century. The city's strategic location on the busy trade routes between China and India made it phenomenally wealthy, as everything from tea, silks, and spices to gold, opium, and slaves was bought and sold here. Such riches attracted the attention of the Portuguese who captured the city in 1511. They were followed by Dutch and then British colonists, alongside Chinese and Indian ethnic groups who intermarried with Malays to create the distinct Baba-Nonya and Chitty communities. Malacca is famous today for its colonial architecture and an eclectic cuisine that draws on its multicultural influences.

After the fall of Malacca to the Portuguese, Johor became the most powerful state on the peninsula. Facing threats from the Minangkabau, Johor was forced to cede Singapore to Sir Stamford Raffles in 1819. Today, the hectic state capital, Johor Bahru, is Malaysia's second-largest city, but the islands of the Seribu Archipelago hold more appeal, offering some of the very best diving and snorkeling in the country.

Exploring the Southern Peninsula

Bounded on the west by one of the world's busiest shipping lanes, the Strait of Malacca, on the east by the open South China Sea, and on the south by the island city-state of Singapore, the Southern Peninsula offers everything from bustling cities to great tracts of jungle, lazy seaside resorts, and deserted islands. The top draw is historic Malacca, home to some of Malaysia's best museums, most varied cuisine, and earliest European buildings. The beautiful old palace, Istana Lama, in Sri Menanti is a prime example of Minangkabau craftsmanship, while Seremban, the capital of Negeri Sembilan, makes the ideal base for exploring the state. Johor's main attractions are its beach resorts and the beautiful islands of the Seribuat Archipelago off the east coast.

GETTING AROUND

There is a train line running between Kuala Lumpur and Johor Bahru, and Seremban lies at the end of the KTM line from the capital. However, the quickest and easiest way of getting around the region is by bus and there are regular services between all the main urban centers. Smaller towns, such as Kukup, are best reached by taxi while Pulau Tioman has an air link to Kuala Lumpur and Singapore and a ferry link from Mersing.

The capital of Negeri Sembilan state, Seremban is a busy and largely modern town that at first glance seems much like any other provincial Malaysian city. Although low on sights, Seremban is a center for the unique Minangkabau culture. The most obvious expression of this is found in the local architecture, such as the State Secretariat Building with its striking, traditional pointed roof made to resemble a pair of buffalo horns. Some original, relocated Minangkabau buildings are on show at the State Museum. These include the Istana Ampang Tinggi, with its beautiful carvings, built for a sultan's daughter in the 1860s, and the less ornate Rumah Negeri Sembilan. The State Museum also hosts exhibitions of costumes, musical instruments, weaponry, and stamps.

East of the town center are the attractively landscaped Lake Gardens and the circular State Mosque.

Environs

Port Dickson is a small port town 20 miles (32 km) southwest of Seremban. It is the main base for the 11-mile (18-km) beach strip running south to Tanjung Tuan, also known as Cape Rachado. As the nearest beach resort to Kuala Lumpur, it is hugely popular with locals at weekends so the beaches can get crowded. The water quality in the Strait of Malacca is not great, but there's always something going on, with several festivals and sporting events taking place throughout the year.

The old royal capital of Negeri Sembilan, Sri Menanti is today little more than a rustic village. The Old Palace, or Istana Lama, was used as the royal residence until 1931 and is a fine example of Minangkabau architecture. Now a museum, this magnificent wooden edifice was completed in 1908 without the use of a single nail. The palace stands upon 99 pillars representing the royal warriors, while the façade is decorated with elegant carvings of foliage and animals. The royal bedchambers and banquet hall can be viewed inside, along with displays of costumes and photographs. Balconies on the upper floors offer panoramic views over the neat palace gardens.

In the heart of Minangkabau territory, Kuala Pilah is a small provincial center with little to interest tourists, but it has an attractive collection of 1930s shophouses and a handful of minor sights. Among the most interesting is the Martin Lister Memorial Arch located just behind the bus station. This grandiose classical arch, topped with a Chinese roof, commemorates the state's first British Resident, Martin Lister, and dates from 1897. Nearby is the blue clapboard St. Joseph's Catholic Church.

The center of town hosts a number of temples, including the multicolored Sri Kanthaswamy Hindu Temple, filled with ornate statues of various deities.

Minangkabau Architecture

Negeri Sembilan is a stronghold of the Minangkabau people who originally came from the highlands of western Sumatra and settled here in the 15th century. Their name comes from minang and kerbau, translating as victorious buffalo and, according to legend, derives from a war with the Javanese in which the final battle was decided by a fight between two water buffalos. The Minangkabau won and adopted the buffalo horns as their national symbol. These stylized horns are used in traditional female headwear and, more notably, in their houses, which are supported on pillars and are always topped with an elaborate roof with pointed, upswept gables reminiscent of a pair of horns. These family homes are known as rumah gadang, or big house, and, as the Minangkabau are a matrilineal society, belong to the women and are passed down the female line.

The central tower once held the royal records and functioned as a look-out post. It is reached via steep wooden stairs.

ISTANA LAMA, SRI MENANTI

The Old Palace is the most impressive example of Minangkabau architecture in Malaysia. Built between 1902 and 1908, it remained the royal residence until 1931 and has been a museum since 1992.

The palace is supported on 99 pillars, each hewn from a cenjal tree trunk. Many are carved with elaborate designs.

Istana Ampang Tinggi, with its attap (thatched) roof, was built for a local 19th-century princess. It originally stood near Sri Menanti but is now at Seremban's State Museum.

The dramatic upswept gables of the State Museum in Seremban, erected in 1984, are typical of Minangkabau architecture. Older reconstructed houses can also be seen within the grounds.

The magnificent gateway straddling the main road into Sri Menanti has dramatic horn-shaped pillars.

Malacca 4

With its colorful, cosmopolitan heritage, the town of Malacca (also known as Melaka) is one of Malaysia's biggest tourist draws. According to legend, it was founded by the Sumatran Prince Parameswara in 1400 and named by him for the local malacca tree. The city grew quickly and by the 15th century it was one of the richest trading empires in the East. In 1511, it fell to the Portuguese, who in turn gave way to the Dutch in 1641 and the British in 1795. The influences of all the city's rulers can still be seen in its historic core around St. Paul's Hill. The city is known for its multicultural population, including Portuguese Eurasians and, most notably, the Baba-Nonyas who are descendants of early merchants from China who intermarried with local Malay women.

This magnificent, sturdy old building looming over the town square was built by the Dutch in the 1650s as the seat of colonial administration.

Today, it houses the city's Museum of History and Ethnography. Nonya tableware, Ming ceramics, Dutch furniture, pistols, and swords are among the exhibits, alongside dioramas illustrating the wedding ceremonies of local ethnic groups and a full-size replica of a traditional wooden Malay house.

Behind the Stadthuys, and included in the same entry ticket, are a number of small museums including the Museum of Literature, dedicated to Malaysian writers, and the Democratic Government Museum, hosting displays on the political history of post-independence Malaysia. Also included is the Seri Melaka, an impressive colonial mansion, which was the official residence of Dutch and British colonial governors, and, until 1996, was the home of local chief ministers.

St. Paul's Hill

Occupying a commanding site in the heart of town overlooking the sea, St. Paul's Hill was the site of the now almost entirely vanished Portuguese A'Famosa fortress. Its last remnant, Porta de Santiago, stands sentinel at the bottom of the mount.

At the summit of the hill is St. Paul's Church, originally erected in 1521 and then known as Nossa Senhora da Anunciada, or Our Lady of the Annunciation. Under Dutch rule the church was renamed St. Paul's, but was abandoned after Christ Church was built.

Sadly, St. Paul's Church is now a ruin, but it still holds a fascinating collection of elaborate 17th-century Dutch tombstones, as well as the empty tomb of St. Francis Xavier, the founder of the Jesuit order in the 16th century.

Outside the main entrance is an abandoned 19th-century lighthouse and a marble statue of St. Francis Xavier, erected in 1952. From here, a path leads down to the Dutch Cemetery at the bottom of the hill. Only five of the 38 tombs here belong to 17th-century Dutchmen; the rest are 19th-century British residents. Most are in a bad state of disrepair but an information board at the entrance lists the names of those who lie here.

Porta de Santiago

Jalan Kota.

One of four main gateways into the Portuguese A'Famosa fortress, the Porta de Santiago is the sole surviving remnant of those once massive defenses. It was built in 1512 by Alfonso de Albuquerque, the Portuguese viceroy, and the fortress was reused and redeveloped by the Dutch in the 17th century. The squat stone archway, now standing in isolation at the bottom of St. Paul's Hill, bears the coat of arms of the Dutch East India Company on both sides and there are several Dutch cannons on display in front.

The fortress, with its 10-ft (3-m) thick walls, was demolished by the British in 1807 in case the city fell into the hands of the French. It was only the intervention of Sir Stamford Raffles (see p38), the founding father of Singapore, that saved this small section for posterity.

scale models of other royal palaces from across Malaysia and displays of costumes and weaponry, including the fearsome tombak spears.

Upstairs is the sultan's bedchamber and another flight of stairs leads to a small room housing a display of keris, or traditional curved Malay daggers.

Built of local red laterite stone, the building is now painted red and the color scheme continues on the neighboring Stadthuys and Clock Tower. The temple is dedicated to the deity Vinayagar, also known as Ganesh, the elephant-headed god of wisdom. An image of Vinayagar stands on the main altar in the back of the temple, and his younger brother, Lord Murugan, appears at a side altar. The temple is a popular venue for weddings.

Like Malacca itself, the mosque draws influences from other cultures and its unique architectural features are based on Sumatran, Chinese, Malay, and European styles. The peculiar pyramidal roof with its green tiling shows a strong Hindu influence, while the striking pagoda-like minaret has recognizably Chinese and Moorish origins.

Also known as the temple of the green clouds and Kuan Yin Teng, this venerable building is the oldest Chinese temple in Malaysia.

Founded in the mid-17th century and dedicated to Kuan Yin, the goddess of mercy, it is a superb example of southern Chinese architecture, and is still a vital focus for the local Chinese community.

Taoism, Confucianism, and Chinese Buddhism are given equal status within the temple.

Restoration work on the main complex was completed in 2005, and its elaborate decorations can now be seen to their full effect. The main hall is richly adorned with beautiful paintings and symbolic carvings, with lions, golden phoenix, and other mythical creatures gracing the interior. There are also scenes from Chinese legend and literature including a prayer screen depicting the life of the Buddha, and a watercolor of Lao Tzu, the Chinese philosopher and founder of Taoism. Religious ceremonies take place here every day, and visitors are welcome to come in and watch.

There are stalls selling Chinese food, clothes, and souvenirs, while Chinese opera takes place on outdoor stages. Unfortunately, rapid tourist-oriented development has forced many traditional businesses out and historic buildings have been demolished. There are still some points of interest, including the Mausoleum of Hang Kasturi, dedicated to a local 15th-century hero, and the Tamil Methodist Church dating from 1908.

Formerly known as Heeren Street, and still referred to as such by many locals, Jalan Tun Tan Cheng Lock has retained much more of its original character than nearby Jalan Hang Jebat. The long, narrow street is now lined with shops, cafés, hotels, restaurants, and several art galleries.

The townhouses here date from the 18th century, and the narrow façades are a result of the tax on house widths that was imposed by the Dutch colonial authorities at that time. To make up for this, they also tend to have very deep interiors. The houses, with their colorful tiles, stucco work, and painted plaster, were once the homes of rich Baba-Nonya families and most are still in private hands.

A few of the historic buildings along this road are in a very poor state of repair. However, one of these townhouses, known simply as 8 Heeren Street, has been restored and now functions as a resource center. In the few rooms on show here, there are displays that explain the conservation and restoration processes, and document the traditional techniques and materials used by the artisans who worked on the project.

Farther along Jalan Tun Tan Cheng Lock is the Baba-Nonya Heritage Museum (see pp126-7), a preserved townhouse that provides a glimpse into a wealthy Malaccan home. One of the street's best art galleries is the Tham Siew Inn Artist Gallery, which displays beautiful watercolors by local artist Tham Siew Inn. Another gallery worth visiting is Malaqa House, a grand Baba-Nonya mansion with large rooms filled with Oriental furniture, carvings, paintings, and bric-a-brac.

The Maritime Museum is Malacca's most visually arresting museum, located on board an impressive, full-scale replica of the 16th-century Portuguese galleon Flora de la Mar, which sank in the Strait of Malacca overburdened with looted treasure. Displays recount the city's seafaring past from the time of the 15th-century Malacca Sultanate through the ensuing Portuguese, Dutch, and British colonial periods. Exhibits include dioramas depicting bustling dock scenes, cases containing scale-model ships and weapons, maps, and other nautical artifacts.

A modern building next to the galleon houses the second part of the museum's collection. On show here are traditional fishing boats, more model ships, and displays on Malaysian maritime life.

The museum ticket includes entry into the Royal Malaysian Navy Museum on the opposite side of the road, which has a specialist collection showing numerous uniforms, insignia, model ships, and photographs, as well as a naval helicopter. The collection continues in the garden outside, where the star exhibit, a 1960s British-built patrol craft, the Sri Terengganu, is on show. It is possible to climb aboard and look around the upper deck, although the vessel suffers from a lack of maintenance.

BETEL, "THE NUT OF LOVE"

Betel nuts, the dried seeds of the Areca or Pinang palm tree, are prized for their mildly narcotic and supposed aphrodisiac qualities. The ritual chewing of this nut was once common

Betel nuts, thought to be an aphrodisiac, growing in the wild across Malaysia but the practice is now mainly confined to rural areas. The nut is prepared during courtship rituals by combining it with herbs, cloves, tobacco, and ground lime, which are then wrapped in betel leaves. Chewing releases a sticky substance said to freshen the breath, relax the mind, and stimulate passion. In the past, brides would chew betel nut to blacken their teeth, considered an attractive sign of status. Today, a betel-nut decoration is still presented as a gift at weddings and festivals.

Malacca: Baba-Nonya Heritage Museum

This absorbing museum is dedicated to the unique culture of Malacca's Baba-Nonya, also known as Straits Chinese or Peranakan, community, who were born through the intermarriage of Chinese traders and local Malay women. The house dates from 1896 when three older houses were combined to create a grand home for a wealthy Baba-Nonya family. Opulent decor with gold leaf, mother-of-pearl, and exotic hardwoods is used throughout the house. The eclectic design incorporates traditional Chinese wall-hangings and woodcarvings alongside English tilework, heavy Dutch furniture, Italian marble, and colorful Baba-Nonya porcelain.

The bustling riverside town of Muar, also known as Bandar Maharani or Empress Town, is bypassed by most tourists, but its colorful history and elegant colonial architecture make it a pleasant stopover.

The town was once a major trading port, and its former status can be seen in the collection of impressive colonial buildings standing close to the waterfront on Jalan Maharani, including the grand Royal Customs and Excise Building, dating from 1909. Also here is a row of early 20th-century shophouses, and nearby is the magnificent Sultan Ibrahim Mosque, with its soaring four-story minaret, completed in 1930.

Muar is renowned as a center of Malay culture and the local dialect is considered to be the purest form of Malay in the country. The town is famous for the local ghazal music, which is sung by a female chorus. However, Muar is best known for its food, in particular the popular mee bandung Muar, a tasty concoction of noodles, eggs, prawns, and chili in beef broth, and ikan asam pedas, a sour and spicy fish dish. There is no shortage of kedai kopis (coffee shops) where these dishes can be sampled. Muar is also, allegedly, the only place in Malaysia where satay is served for breakfast.

Sitting on the southwestern tip of Johor close to the southernmost point of continental Asia, Kukup is a traditional fishing village, complete with old-fashioned kampung-style wooden houses on stilts strung along the waterfront.

The village is famous for its seafood, with chili crabs being the local specialty, and the many seafood restaurants do a roaring trade with weekend visitors, many coming from Singapore. Although this one-street town offers no other tourist attractions, just offshore lies Pulau Kukup, one of the world's largest uninhabited mangrove islands. Once the haunt of pirates, it has been declared a national park and wetland area of international importance. A regular ferry service to the island allows visitors a glimpse of this fascinating protected ecosystem. Its wildlife includes wild pigs, crabs, and numerous species of birds.

The capital city of Johor state, commonly known as "JB," sprawls across the southern tip of the peninsula facing Singapore over the narrow strait. Most visitors pass quickly through this big traffic-clogged border town after getting their passports stamped, but some sights are worth seeing. Chief among these is the Royal Sultan Abu Bakar Museum, housed in the sparkling white Victorian Istana Besar, or Great Palace, west of the city center. Built in 1866, it is one of the oldest buildings in Johor Bahru and is set in extensive landscaped grounds overlooking the Strait of Singapore. The palace is now a museum devoted to the royal family and is still used for occasional official ceremonies. Photographs, costumes, weapons, and other royal mementos are on show in the lavishly furnished rooms, such as the Hunting Room featuring stuffed tigers, elephant-foot umbrella stands, and suchlike.

Also of interest nearby is the Sultan Abu Bakar Mosque, an Anglo-Malay edifice that was erected in 1893 and can hold up to 2,000 worshippers. The Sultan Ibrahim Building with its 210-ft (64-m) high Mughal-style tower dominates the skyline. During World War II, it was used by the Japanese but today houses state government offices.

This fishing town is the main access point for Pulau Tioman (see pp130–31) and the islands of the Seribu Archipelago. Many people opt to spend a night here en route but there is little inducement to linger. Mersing is known for its kepek (fish crackers) and these are sold all around the town center.

Seribu Archipelago

59 miles (95 km) S of Kuantan.  from Mersing; each of the private resorts runs a ferry service for guests.

Off the east coast of Johor lies the Seribu Archipelago, made up of 64 volcanic islands, the largest being Pulau Tioman (see pp130–31). Most are tiny and uninhabited and can only be reached by chartering a private boat, but they are among the most beautiful islands in Malaysia.

Just a handful of the islands are big enough to support tiny villages and some secluded beach resorts, which range from simple beach huts to smart hotels with restaurants and swimming pools. The larger and more developed islands are Pulau Besar, Sibul, and Tinggi, renowned for their fine sandy beaches and excellent snorkeling and diving opportunities among the abundant coral reefs. Smaller islands provide a more sedate experience, such as Pulau Rawa, which has just one resort. The remote islands, including Pulau Pemanggil, Dayang, and Aur, have only basic facilities, but are rich in marine life and popular with more intrepid divers.

Tour operators in Mersing run island-hopping trips stopping off at a few of the islands, but otherwise access is restricted to guests at the private resorts. Ferries to Pulau Sibul depart from Tanjung Leman, 37 miles (60 km) south of Mersing, and take about an hour to reach the island.

Pulau Tioman 11

The largest of Malaysia's east coast islands, Tioman is famed for its soft, sandy beaches, warm waters, and coral reef. Its past is shrouded in myth – it is said that a dragon princess stopped here to break a long journey. She loved it so much that she stayed and her body was transformed into Pulau Tioman. Most of the resorts are strung out on isolated bays along the western coast. Diving and snorkeling opportunities in the protected marine park are superb, but jungle hiking and sunbathing are also popular activities. The island is a haven for wildlife – more than 140 different bird species live here. Monitor lizards, snakes, monkeys, and porcupines thrive in the jungle interior thanks to the absence of large predators, while the sea teems with countless varieties of tropical fish.

EASTERN AND CENTRAL PENINSULA

The Eastern and Central Peninsula is blessed with some of the most beautiful natural features in Malaysia. Rising in the west are the lush forested Titiwangsa mountains, to the east of which lie Kelantan, Pahang, and Terengganu. Dominated by a vast rainforest and flanked by an unbroken coastline with delightful beaches and islands, the region is considered the heartland of Muslim Malay culture.

The three states of this region share a similar early history, having been vassals of Siam (now Thailand) and under the rule of the Sultanate of Malacca in the 14th and 15th centuries. Thereafter, Pahang was ruled by the Sultans of Johor until the British took control and made it one of the Federated Malay States. Terengganu and Kelantan continued to be under Siamese rule through the 19th century. In 1909, they became part of the Unfederated Malay States. In 1963, all three states were incorporated into the Federation of Malaysia.

Physically cut off from the west coast by the jungle interior, and free from British control until the 19th century, the eastern and central states developed at a different pace, commercially and culturally. Separated from the tin and rubber boom of the 19th century, which attracted Asian immigrants, they retained a rural and predominantly Malay character. These states are still considered the conservative Malay Muslim heartland of the country. The interior regions are inhabited by Orang Asli and Orang Syam people.

The east coast possesses a rural tranquility and offers spectacular natural scenery. Pahang is home to Taman Negara, the country's premier national park, as well as a host of offshore islands and some of Malaysia's best beaches. While the towns and villages of Terengganu are centers for Malay handicrafts, those of Kelantan are the best places to see traditional activities, such as fishing. Trips along the east coast may become difficult during the rainy season, between November and March.

Exploring the Eastern and Central Peninsula

This region offers spectacular natural beauty with the magnificent Taman Negara and Endau-Rompin national parks located in its forested interiors and an endless coastline of white sand beaches and stunning offshore islands. Pulau Redang, Pulau Tenggol, and the Perhentian Islands are home to a fascinating underwater world and offer some of Malaysia's top diving and snorkeling. While Kuantan, the capital of Pahang, is a transport hub for the region and used mostly as a transit point, especially for nearby beaches and the picturesque Tasik Chini, the two other state capitals, Kuala Terengganu and Kota Bharu, are rich in Malay culture.

GETTING AROUND

Kuantan, Kuala Terengganu, and Kota Bharu are served by domestic airports. Route 3, a major national road, runs the length of the three states, and a good bus network serves the region. While the condition of the major roads is good and traffic is safe, the quality of the minor roads that branch off to the interior tends to deteriorate, necessitating 4WD vehicles. It is easiest to visit the national parks with a tour group. The railroad is a pleasant travel option. Regular ferries connect the mainland with the offshore islands.

The capital of Pahang, Kuantan is a commercial town and a major transport hub, located at the mouth of Sungai Kuantan. The town has a few sites of interest and is visited mostly by travelers en route to the attractive beaches and river-side villages nearby.

Overlooking the padang at the heart of town is the stunning Moorish-style Masjid Negeri, or state mosque. It is crowned with a blue and white dome and is surrounded by four Ottoman-style minarets. It also features stained-glass windows, a rare feature in Malaysian Islamic architecture. The mosque is illuminated every night, lending it a magical quality. The town also has several streets of old Chinese shophouses. The redeveloped riverfront of Kuantan offers pleasant views and has shops that sell excellent local handicrafts. From the jetty, boat trips take visitors to the nearby fishing village of Tanjung Lumpur as well as to a mangrove forest reserve.

Environs

Just 3 miles (5 km) east of the capital, Teluk Chempedak, or jackfruit bay, is Kuantan's main attraction. It marks the beginning of the splendid beaches on the east coast and is famous locally for its sands and waves. The coastal strip is dotted with hotels and restaurants and also has a popular handicraft center specializing in batik. Besides an array of watersports, there are several walking trails, all leading south to the headland of Tanjung Tembeling.

Gua Charas ②

15 miles (25 km) NW of Kuantan.
 from Kuantan.

Near the small settlement of Panching, a short distance from Kuantan, Gua Charas is a series of deep caves set dramatically in a massive limestone karst outcrop. In 1954, the Sultan of Pahang granted permission to a Thai Buddhist monk to convert the main cave into a Buddhist shrine. A steep ascent up 200 steps leads to the enormous cave, which contains several religious images carved out of stone. Dominating the cave is a 30-ft (9-m) long Sleeping Buddha. Next to it are shrines dedicated to Kuan Yin, the Chinese goddess of mercy,

Tasik Chini ③

Nestled in the hills, deep in Malaysia's forested interior, Tasik Chini is a collection of beautiful lakes connected by waterways teeming with fish and birds and framed by giant trees. The best time to visit is between June and September when the lakes are covered with red and white lotus blooms. Around the shores live the indigenous Jakun people, belonging to the Orang Asli community.

Kampung Gumum is a small Orang Asli settlement at the northern end of the lakes, where friendly locals show visitors around their homes and display their traditional handicrafts. At the village, accommodation is also available offering an alternative to the resort at the edge of the main lake. Although public transport to the lakes is not conveniently accessible, once there, the entire lake system can be explored by boat, organized by the resort and the village. Several trails of

Pekan 4

Located on the south bank of Sungai Pahang, the longest river in Malaysia, is the town of Pekan, the former royal capital of Pahang.

Scattered along the busy riverfront street at the town's northern edge are many of its attractions, including a row of beautiful Chinese shophouses and the Sultan Abu Bakar Museum. The museum collection contains royal regalia, weapons, instruments, and Chinese porcelain. Nearby are two white marble mosques, the blue-domed Masjid Abdullah, which dates back to the 1920s, and the newer Masjid Abu Bakar. Farther away from the river is the royal quarter, with its lavish Istana Abu Bakar, or royal palace, overlooking a polo ground. As the residence of the royal family, the palace is not open to the public. About 3 miles (5 km) south of the town is a silk-weaving center Kampung Pulau Keladi, built in the traditional Malay style on stilts with wooden walls.

Well-provided with accommodation of all types, from budget guesthouses to high-end resorts, Cherating is an extremely popular destination. The waters here are ideal for surfing, especially during November and December. It is also an excellent base from which to explore the surrounding areas of Tasik Chini, Gua Charas, and the various points north of Kuala Terengganu. Named for the two rivers that mark its northern and southern frontiers, the 336-sq mile (870-sq km) Endau-Rompin National Park is among the last remaining stretches of lowland forest in Malaysia. It nurtures a splendid variety of flora and fauna and is one of the few habitats of the Sumatran rhinoceros. The park's varied landscape allows for a variety of activities, such as trekking, rafting, mountain climbing, and abseiling.

At the confluence of Sungai Endau and Sungai Jasir is the base camp, Kuala Jasir, 9 miles (15 km) from the park headquarters. From here, a 4-hour trail leads to Janing Barat Plateau while two other routes trace the Sungai Jasir leading to the park's most spectacular waterfall, Buaya Sangkut. Visitors are also welcome at the Orang Asli villages that dot the area.

All visitors must carry entry permits, which can be obtained for free from Kuala Rompin or the park headquarters, or for a fee from Johor Bahru. Paid daily permits are required to visit certain sites within the park. Although it is possible to visit the park independently, complicated travel arrangements mean that it is best to visit on an organized tour. Allow a period of three days to cover the park.

Taman Negara 7

Established in 1938, Taman Negara is Malaysia's oldest and largest national park. Extending across 1,660 sq miles (4,300 sq km) of pristine rain forest, the park encompasses parts of three states, Pahang, Kelantan, and Terengganu. A profusion of birdlife can be spotted here, along with rare animals such as the Indochinese tiger, Sumatran rhinoceros, Malayan gaur, and Asian elephant. Access to the park is spectacular, involving a 37-mile (60-km) boat journey along the lovely Sungai Tembeling, passing Orang Asli villages en route.

The blue waters around the densely forested islands harbor spectacular underwater cliffs, boulders, and coral reefs that shelter a variety of colorful marine life. A ban on fishing,

The best sites for snorkeling on Pulau Kapas are found around its northern shore as well as around Pulau Gemia. North of Gemia, a sunken World War II shipwreck is one of the most popular sites. All the resorts on Kapas can arrange diving trips. There is also a professional scuba diving center that offers training programs. The island

It was created by the construction of a dam on the Sungai Kenyir in 1985. Surrounded by lush tropical jungle, which is home to a number of wildlife species, Tasik Kenyir has been developed as an ecotourism destination. Today, there are some 15 resorts around the lake, offering quiet and comfortable retreats. Other options include houseboats and floating chalets. Among the highlights of the lake are 14 picturesque waterfalls, which cascade down into natural pools. These can be reached by boat from the lake's main jetty. Boat trips can also be taken to the limestone Bewah Caves at the southern end of the lake. Fishing is a popular activity here, as the lake teems with an abundance of freshwater fish. The best time to visit is between February and June when the water level is high.

A trained monkey selecting a ripe coconut

COCONUT-COLLECTING MONKEYS

It is common practice in Peninsular Malaysia to train monkeys to shin up palm trees, twist off the coconuts, and throw them to the ground where they are gathered up by the tree's owner. It has been estimated that coconut-collecting monkeys can harvest at least five times as many nuts per day than a human collector, chiefly due to their speed, agility, and ease with heights. Kampung Jenang, near Marang in Terengganu, has made a thriving business out of this technique. A monkey training school established almost three decades ago by Muda Mamat, a local villager, now even tutors monkeys belonging to coconut plantation owners from neighboring states for a steep fee.

The state capital and the seat of the sultans of Terengganu, Kuala Terengganu is a former fishing village that was transformed into an affluent city from the revenue of its South China Sea oilfields.

The city remains to this day a stronghold of Malay culture, with colorful markets and vibrant traditional handicraft workshops where visitors can buy batik, brocade, songket, brassware, and basketware. The busiest spot in town is the Pasar Payang, or central market. All kinds of foods including fresh fish, fruit, and vegetables are available here. It also has a number of craft shops. Said to be one of the largest museums in Southeast Asia, Kompleks Muzium Negeri Terengganu, or Terengganu State Museum Complex, consists of several buildings sprawled across landscaped gardens. The main building, which is a reproduction of a traditional Malay stilt house, contains displays of textiles, handicrafts, Islamic artifacts, and a gallery dedicated to the state's petroleum industry. Within the grounds are several traditional Malay boats and houses as well as a maritime museum. The highlight of the complex, however, is the Istana Tengku Long, a wooden palace that dates back to 1880, with exhibits of royal artifacts.

38 miles (62 km) N of Kuala Terengganu. ☒ from Kuala Lumpur. ☒ from Merang and Kuala Terengganu. 📶 📱 🗺

One of the largest and most beautiful of the east coast islands, Pulau Redang is also the most developed. It is set at the center of the Redang Archipelago, a group of nine islands that together constitute a protected marine park. With crystal clear waters and a wealth of marine life sustained by some of Malaysia's best coral reefs, the island offers excellent diving and snorkeling opportunities. Sadly, silt and building waste have damaged the coral, but active efforts are being made to prevent further damage and even snorkeling has been restricted to certain parts of the reef. The permitted areas do, however, offer superb opportunities for underwater exploration. The waters also contain the historic wrecks of two British warships, HMS Repulse and HMS Prince of Wales, which were sunk off Pulau Redang by the Japanese during World War II.

The island's beaches are set against a backdrop of verdant jungle-clad hills. Pasir Panjang and Teluk Dalam Kecil, two of the best beaches, occupy the eastern coast and have most of the resorts. Kampung Air, Pulau Redang's main village, sits at the center of the island.

Most travelers visit the island on a package tour but dive trips can also be arranged from the Perhentian Islands.

Perhentian Islands 15

12 miles (20 km) NW of Kuala Terengganu. ☒ from Kuala Besut. 📶 📱 🗺

Located off the Terengganu coast, Pulau Perhentian Besar and Pulau Perhentian Kecil together comprise the Perhentian Islands, which means stopping-place islands. Breathtakingly beautiful, the islands have inevitably attracted a great deal of development in recent years but still retain their appeal. Both islands feature white sand beaches and an aquamarine sea that is home to spectacular coral reefs teeming with an astounding variety of marine life. Besides diving and snorkeling, other activities available on the islands include sailing, windsurfing, and jungle walks.

Among the beaches on Pulau Perhentian Besar is the exquisite Three Coves Bay, a group of three beaches separated by rocky outcrops. This sheltered spot is where green and hawksbill turtles lay their eggs between May and September, when the bay is closed to visitors.

Pulau Perhentian Kecil is smaller than Pulau Perhentian Besar, but is otherwise an exact replica of it, with beautiful beaches, coconut palms, and azure waters. A small village on its southeastern coast is inhabited by people originally from Sulawesi in Indonesia. The island's main attraction is the east-facing Pasir Panjang, or Long Beach.

Of the two islands, the more expensive accommodations, with quieter ambience, are available in Perhentian Besar. Dozens of resorts and guesthouses are clustered around the southwestern shore. With the vast abundance of cheaper hotels and restaurants, Perhentian Kecil attracts backpackers.

The islands are usually packed during the peak season between late May and September, and finding accommodation is difficult. It is worth exploring options on both islands since the narrow strait separating them is easily crossed by boat. Getting around the islands is simple. There are some good walking trails but the best way to hop between beaches is by boat, which can be arranged by most resort and chalet owners.

Northwest of these islands lie the smaller, uninhabited Pulau Susu group covered in virgin forests. They provide one of the best diving sites in the region.

Boatbuilders of Pulau Duyung

Just off the western waterfront of Kuala Terengganu lies Pulau Duyung where an ancient tradition of boatbuilding still thrives. Decorated vessels, called bangau, were once made all along the east coast, from Kota Bharu to Kuantan and beyond. Primarily used as fishing boats, these wooden craft are constructed by master boatbuilders using techniques passed down through many generations and it is believed that they are built entirely from memory. Each boat is painted in bright colors and painstakingly decorated with individual designs, making them unique. The island is accessible via a causeway from Kuala Terengganu and by ferry from a jetty near the Seri Malaysia Hotel (see p279).

Carved and painted prow

Local shipyards and workshops are scattered throughout the island and visitors are usually welcome to see the boatbuilders at work. Most of the boats are used by local fishermen, but their exquisite craftsmanship has won them international acclaim.

BOAT DESIGN

Most boat designs feature representational characters, often derived from Hindu mythology. However, these are becoming rarer as boat designers are increasingly turning to non-representational Islamic art such as the elaborate geometric arabesque pattern.

Rows of vibrant fishing boats line the beaches of Pulau Duyung. Originally propelled by oars or sails, many of the boats today are fitted with removable motor engines, both for convenience as well as modernity.

Stylized prows are carved and painted to represent shadow puppets, birds, and Garuda, a bird from Hindu mythology.

Mythical creatures, such as dragons and demons, appear to be derived from Hindu epics such as the Ramayana.

The boats need to be brought ashore every day, far away from treacherous waves and close to the tree line. Therefore, they are created with an expert blend of functionality and aesthetics: sturdy in order to withstand the strongest of storms, yet light enough to be easily pulled out of the water.

Kota Bharu 14

Situated in the northeast corner of the peninsula, near the mouth of Sungai Kelantan, Kota Bharu, or new fort in Malay, is the state capital of Kelantan, and perhaps the most traditional Malay and predominantly Muslim city in the country. A modern city on the surface, Kota Bharu is a repository of culture, crafts, and religion. It is rich in palaces, museums, and mosques, and offers a fine regional cuisine. Traditional skills and customs such as kite-flying, silver-working, and weaving thrive here. Prayer times are rigorously observed, when all activity comes to a standstill, especially on Fridays, the Muslim holy day. Most of the city's attractions lie in its northeast section, at the heart of which is the Pasar Besar, one of the most vibrant markets in the country. Kota Bharu is also a good base to explore the surrounding region.

Located in a predominantly agricultural region, the little town of Tumpat in Kelantan is a center of the Orang Syam people. It is also an important transport hub for southbound travelers on the Jungle Railway track or northbound travelers to nearby Thailand.

Pantai Dasar Sabak 16

8 miles (13 km) NE of Kota Bharu.

To the north and east of Kota Bharu are several attractive beaches overlooking the South China Sea. One of the most easily accessible is Pantai Dasar Sabak. Situated near the Malay fishing village of Sering, it is a dazzling stretch of palm-lined beach and has a significant history. On December 8, 1941, the Imperial Japanese Navy troops landed here in one of Japan's first acts of aggression during World War II.

It is possible to combine an excursion to the beach with an opportunity to watch the return of the local fishing fleet in the afternoon, and perhaps to buy some fresh seafood for cooking on the spot. Visitors should bear in mind that the east coast of Kelantan is predominantly Malay Muslim, and dressing modestly is advisable.

Wat Phothivihan 17

2 miles (3 km) S of Chabang Empat, near Tumpat. from Kota Bharu or Tumpat. 7am–5pm daily. Vesak Day (Apr/May).

Within Kelantan, the lives of Thai Buddhists are organized around 20 or so monasteries. One of the most interesting of these, Wat Phothivihan is worth visiting for its elaborate temple roof and saffron-clad monks, both of which form a marked contrast to the surrounding Muslim villages.

Built in 1973 by chief abbot Phra Krurasapia Chakorn, the monastery attracts thousands of Thai pilgrims every year. As with most Thai temples, the buildings and grounds are large and imposing. The main attraction here is a 131-ft (40-m) long phra non, or Reclining Buddha that was built in 1975.

Wat Phothivihan is a social, cultural, and spiritual center for Thai, Chinese, and Indian worshippers. Its monks are always eager to show visitors around. The temples and groves also elicit the secular interest of Muslims who view it as a tourist attraction.

Wat Machimmaram 18

Kampung Jubakar, near Tumpat. from Kota Bharu or Tumpat. 7am–5pm daily. Vesak Day (Apr/May).

One of the many Buddhist temples in the Thai villages of Kelantan, Wat Machimmaram is located in the village of Kampung Jubakar on the main road between Kota Bharu and the Thai border. As in neighboring Thailand, the ketek, or temple, has familiar lotus-shaped corner stones, gilded spires of venerable chedi, or stupas, lacquered doors, and shuttered windows. Its most outstanding feature is a statue of the Seated Buddha, constructed by local Thai Buddhists and said to be the largest in Southeast Asia. At about 105 ft (32 m), the statue towers over the surrounding Kelantan plains, making a definite statement about the presence of Theravada Buddhism in this predominantly Islamic state.

The Jungle Railway 19

One of the most delightful ways of exploring the wild interior of Peninsular Malaysia is by the Jungle Railway, officially called the East Coast Line. Considered an engineering marvel when it was completed in 1931, it created links between the east coast state of Kelantan with the west coast states of Kedah, Perak, and Penang. This line winds its way south from Kelantan through the spectacular jungle gorges of Kuala Lipis to join the main line from Singapore to Kuala Lumpur at Gemas.

TIPS FOR TRAVELERS

Kuala Krai ②

The Railway passes by the banks of the Sungai Kelantan near the settlement of Kuala Krai, which is surrounded by rubber plantations and dense rainforest.

Kuala Lipis ④

SARAWAK

Teeming with natural wonders, including precipitous mountains, lush rain forests, abundant wildlife, and some of the world's largest caves, Sarawak is nicknamed the Land of the Hornbill. This diversity of flora and fauna, along with Sarawak's swashbuckling history and the cultural heritage of its indigenous people, attracts increasing numbers of visitors to the state.

Sarawak's first inhabitants were cave dwelling hunter-gatherers who lived here about 40,000 years ago. Evidence of the existence of early settlements was discovered in 1958 at Niah Caves in the northeast of the state, testifying to Sarawak's long, although largely unwritten, history of human habitation.

Until the mid-19th century, the region was governed by the Sultan of Brunei whose imposition of heavy taxes led to frequent rebellions by local indigenous groups. During one such outbreak in 1839, the English adventurer James Brooke entered the service of the Sultan and subdued the rebels. For this, he was rewarded with the title of Rajah, becoming the first of the White Rajahs (see p157) who ruled an area the size of Britain as their private kingdom for over a century. Sarawak joined the Federation of Malaysia in 1963. The state is blessed with an abundance of natural resources, and petroleum and forestry have been the mainstay of Sarawak's economy in the 20th century. Sarawak's population of 2.2 million largely comprises the indigenous people known collectively as Dayaks, while the remaining minority are the Orang Ulu. Most people live in the southwest of the province, in and around the historic capital of Kuching. The city is an excellent base for visiting the traditional Dayak longhouses, wildlife reserves, and national parks scattered throughout the province. The breathtaking ancient limestone pinnacles at Mulu National Park are excellent for trekking and rock climbing. These, together with Niah Caves and Bako National Park – one of Sarawak's oldest national parks – are the highlights of a visit to the state.

Exploring Sarawak

Located in northwest Borneo, Sarawak is the largest state in Malaysia and is famous for its diversity of flora and fauna. Within easy reach of its capital, Kuching, are beautiful national parks and scenic beaches. Flanked by longhouse settlements of the Dayaks, the Batang Rajang meanders through the heart of the state as the main channel of communication with the towns of Sibu, Kapit, and Belaga. In the northeast of the state, the Niah Caves are a site of archaeological significance, while the limestone outcrops at Mulu National Park are a climber's dream. To the northeast lies Brunei, one of the smallest countries in the world.

GETTING AROUND

Domestic flights connect most towns in Sarawak and are ideal for visitors with limited time. For those with a more leisurely schedule, boat rides are an exciting way of getting to the remote villages and national parks and are the most common mode of local transport. There are speedy passenger ekspres boats as well as longboats for long- and short-haul journeys. Because of the rugged terrain, the road network in Sarawak is limited to a highway between Kuching and the Brunei border, plus a few short routes from Kuching to places such as Bako and Semantan.

Kuching ①

The capital of Sarawak, Kuching is one of Malaysia's most attractive cities with historic buildings juxtaposed against modern high-rises and restaurants. It became the capital of Rajah James Brooke's empire in the mid-19th century and was known as Sarawak until 1872 when its name was officially changed to Kuching. Long a confluence of Malay, Chinese, Indian, and indigenous people, such as the Iban and Bidayuh, Kuching reflects its varied cultural influences. Although the city sprawls both to the north and south of Sungai Sarawak, the main sights of interest, such as the waterfront, colonial buildings, and ethnic souvenir shops, are all concentrated around the south bank of the Kuching waterfront.

The older section of the main building is a colonial mansion opened in 1891 at the suggestion of naturalist Alfred Wallace who discovered many of Sarawak's endemic species of flora and fauna. The natural science section, on the first floor, includes stuffed specimens of many of Sarawak's best-known species, such as rhinoceros hornbills, hawkbill turtles, and proboscis monkeys. On the upper floor is an introduction to the traditional lifestyles of Sarawak's main indigenous groups, with displays of handicrafts, traditional dress, ceremonial artifacts, musical instruments, and various tools such as the three-pronged pricker that is used by the Iban to create tattoos. Among the highlights on display are a replica of an Iban longhouse, Iban war totems, and early 20th-century Chinese glazed jars. Rotating art exhibitions are held in the new Tun Abdul Razak Hall, opposite the old wing, which is accessible by a footbridge.

On the north bank of the river lies Kuching's most important historical building, the impressive Astana. The name is a local version of the Malay word istana, meaning palace. The Astana was built in 1870 by Rajah Charles Brooke as a gift to his bride, Margaret. She later reminisced about her time here in her 1913 memoir, My Life in Sarawak.

Set among manicured lawns and offering a lovely view of the Courthouse on the south bank, the palace consists of three elegant bungalows with wooden shingle roofs. Charles Brooke is said to have grown betel nut on the palace grounds so that he could offer it to visiting Dayak chiefs. The Astana still functions as the official residence of the governor of Sarawak.

Cat Statues

Kuching means cat in Malay and although the origin of the city's name is uncertain, there are several statues of cats around the town, giving it a unique identity. The statues are all located on the south bank of Sungai Sarawak, and include a small statue on the waterfront just east of the Chinese History Museum, a larger one opposite the Hilton Kuching (see p283) on Jalan Tun Abdul Rahman, and a third at the base of a pillar farther east along Jalan Pandungan. The biggest statue, the 5-ft (1.5-m) tall Great Cat of Kuching, sits at the junction of Jalan Padungan and Jalan Central.

Located in the new town of Petra Jaya, on the north bank of the river, the Cat Museum moved here in 1993 and claims to be one of the few such museums in the world dedicated exclusively to cats. It covers everything to do with cats, and the exhibits include cat-related art, stamps, photographs, music, movies, and even Garfield comic strips.

THE WHITE RAJAHS

In 1839, British explorer James Brooke found Sarawak in the grip of a rebellion by the local Dayaks against the rule of the Sultan of Brunei. After his success in quelling the uprising, he was granted the title of Rajah of Sarawak in 1841, establishing an empire that was to last for over a century. At the time of James Brooke's death in 1868, his territory only covered what is now the southwest corner of Sarawak – the area around Kuching. It was his successor and nephew, Charles Brooke, who was responsible for expanding Sarawak to the current size, and also for commissioning most of the town's colonial buildings. A stickler for detail, he made frequent unannounced inspections of his officers, and any slack conduct was severely punished. Upon his death in 1917, Charles was succeeded by his son, Charles Vyner Brooke, and for a while Sarawak was run as a personal fiefdom. This ended with the Japanese invasion in 1941. After World War II, Vyner Brooke ceded the territory to Britain, and in 1963 it became part of the Federation of Malaysia.

After meandering through the plains around Kuching, Sungai Santubong flows through Sarawak into the South China Sea. During the dry season, between March and October, groups of the rare Irrawaddy dolphin are sometimes seen feeding and playing around the mouth of the river. These small, snub-nosed dolphins are often difficult to spot as they do not leap out of the water like their better-known seafaring cousins. Nevertheless, the experience of watching these unusual creatures is a major draw on the popular boat trips along the river.

Some cruises continue down the adjoining Sungai Salak to Kuching Wetlands National Park. Covering a vast expanse of saline mangrove swamps and patches of scrubland, the wetlands also include a network of small water channels and tidal creeks. The swamps are inhabited by a variety of wildlife, including proboscis monkeys, lorises, and colorful birds. In the evenings, large groups of fireflies illuminate the riverside trees. River cruises are the only way to explore the wetlands, and a number of tour operators in Kuching offer trips.

This fishing village sits near Sungai Santubong in the shadow of the 2,657-ft (810-m) Gunung Santubong.

During the Tang and Sung dynasties, which lasted from the 9th century to the 13th century, Santubong was an important trading center. Today, it is merely a small village but it is worth visiting for the colorful wooden houses built on stilts and fishing boats on the beach, which are very photogenic. The morning is the liveliest time in Santubong when the fishermen sell their daily catch at the quay. The cafés nearby are well known for their excellent seafood.

From the main road into Santubong is a small turning which leads to Sungai Jaong, one of the most important archaeological sites in Sarawak. Among its artifacts are ancient Buddhist and Hindu rock carvings, thought to be about 1,000 years old. A reclining human figure is still well-defined, but many other carvings have eroded.

On the west coast of the Santubong Peninsula, Damai is one of Sarawak's prettiest beaches. Only a short journey from Kuching, and featuring some beautifully designed resorts, the beach is a popular tourist destination and can get quite crowded on weekends. There is a wide selection of watersports on offer, including sailing, snorkeling, and windsurfing, as well as other activities such as mountain biking and golf. Cafés and restaurants here have gained a reputation for their superb fresh seafood dishes.

Picturesque trails around Gunung Santubong begin here and trekking is a popular activity for visitors to Damai Beach. The Santubong Jungle Trek, with blue trail markers, is an easy, circular 1-mile (1.6-km) walk that starts at the Holiday Inn Resort Damai Beach (see p282). A more challenging route that also begins here is the Gunung Santubong Summit Trek, winding up to the top. The trail, with red markers, takes 5- to 7-hours to complete. It also requires a good level of fitness, sturdy hiking shoes, and plenty of drinking water. The resorts at Damai can arrange for guides.

Located at the foot of Gunung Santubong, Sarawak Cultural Village serves as an excellent introduction to the cultural traditions of Sarawak. Erected by the Sarawak Development Corporation in the early 1990s to give visitors a taste of indigenous lifestyles, the village comprises seven houses clustered around a lake, each a good example of the traditional dwellings built by the main indigenous groups. Iban, Bidayuh, and Orang Ulu longhouses sit side by side with a Melanau tall-house, a Penan hut, a Chinese farmhouse and a Malay house. Women and men of respective groups live in these dwellings and also demonstrate art and craft skills, such as wood carving, textile and basket-weaving, sword-making, and beadwork. Outside the Melanau tall-house is a demonstration of a traditional sago press, while the process of blowpipe-making can be seen at the Penan hut. Visitors can take part in 3- to 4-day courses to learn a particular ethnic skill or craft. A cultural show featuring traditional music and dancers in elaborate costumes is also held daily at the indoor theater located in the village.

RAINFOREST WORLD MUSIC FESTIVAL

In July each year, Sarawak Cultural Village hosts this festival, which celebrates music from around the world. This 3-day event, which has been held every year since 1998, previously featured musicians from as far away as Mali, Mongolia, and Madagascar. The festival now also provides a rare opportunity to hear indigenous musicians from various regions of Malaysia. Seminars and workshops are held during the day, spontaneous jam sessions take place in the longhouses, and artistes perform on outdoor stages in the evenings. The exotic setting around a lake against the backdrop of Gunung Santubong makes for an electric atmosphere. Accommodation is available at the resorts on Damai Beach, and frequent buses run from Kuching for those who prefer to stay in town. It is advisable to check the official website (www.rainforestmusic-borneo.com) for information on events.

Encompassing 9 sq miles (22 sq km), Kubah National Park is one of the smallest parks in Sarawak. A sandstone plateau and three peaks – the 2,990-ft (911-m) Gunung Serapi and the smaller Gunung Selang and Gunung Sendok – form the backdrop to this wildlife haven. Among the dipterocarp (hardwood) forests and gentle waterfalls and streams are more than 90 species of palms and a wide variety of orchids. Although there are bearded pigs, mouse deer, and other wildlife, these are rarely seen. Visitors are more likely to spot birds such as the maroon woodpecker or the rufous-collared kingfisher.

Several trails crisscross the park and the mountains including the beautiful Waterfall Trail that leads through split-level falls and a 2- to 3-hour hike to the mist-shrouded peak of Gunung Serapi. The Rayu Trail links Kubah to the adjacent Matang Wildlife Center, a rehabilitation center for endangered species such as orangutans, sambar deer, hornbills, and proboscis monkeys. Along the Pitcher Trail are several varieties of the carnivorous pitcher plant. Accommodation for the parks may be booked in advance at the Visitor Information Center in Kuching (see p155).

🗓 Sematan Carnival (Aug).

The coastal village of Sematan is a popular weekend retreat for Kuching residents. There is a long, quiet beach lined with coconut palms and colorful fishing boats are harbored in the bay. The village itself is small, consisting of a few rows of shophouses, a local market with food stalls that serve delicious fish dishes, a busy timber dock, and a jetty. Boats go from Sematan to Teluk Melano, a Malay fishing village nestled in a pretty bay on the Datu Peninsula.

The village has a home-stay program that is organized by the Malaysian Fisheries Board, which enables visitors to stay with local families. Boat trips to Teluk Melano are not possible in the monsoon season, from October to March, as the sea is too rough.

Providing a boost to local tourism is the annual Sematan Carnival that takes place here in August. The 3-day event hosts a music festival, beach games, and an exhibition of local products.

Occupying just 14 sq km (5 sq miles) on the western-most tip of the state, Tanjung Datu is one of Sarawak's smaller national parks. It has two beautiful beaches, Pasir Antu and Pasir Berunpu, backed by towering peaks. The real highlight of the park are the beautiful coral reefs, visible in the crystal-clear water and close enough to the shore to walk around.

Artificial reefs farther out in the sea are accessible by boat. The park's lush rainforest is home to varied wildlife, so visitors are likely to hear gibbon-cries and may even spot dolphins and turtles near the shore.

Tanjung Datu has four trails of varying lengths leading through an unspoiled forest and coastline. There are currently no facilities for visitors at the park, but given its natural beauty and the idyllic landscape, a day trip to the park is worth the effort.

In 1983, Gunung Gading National Park was established as a conservation area for the world's largest flower, the rafflesia. Visitors can view the flowers from walkways which have been designed to prevent people from treading on the fragile young buds that sprout inconspicuously. The bud grows into a foul-smelling red flower with white specks, and reaches a width of up to 3 ft (1 m). This rare parasitic plant blooms at unpredictable times and lasts only a few days, therefore it is advisable to call the park ahead to check if one is in bloom. Visitors can also see Amorphophallus, a gigantic herbaceous plant of the aroid family.

The park sprawls across four jungle-clad mountains, Gunung Gading, Gunung Perigi, Gunung Lundu, and Gunung Sebuloh. Color-coded trails of varying levels of difficulty crisscross the park. The easiest is the Waterfall Trail which passes through seven cataracts. The challenging Gunung Gading Trail leads up to the summit of the 2,985-ft (910-m) hill. Visitors will also find a natural pool near the Park Headquarters.

Two caves formed in a range of limestone cliffs located near the former gold-mining town of Bau make an interesting day trip from Kuching. Wind Cave, 2 miles (3 km) west of Bau, is made up of a network of underground streams that pass through the cave before joining Sungai Kayan. The cave's smooth, tubular interior is filled with stalagmite and stalactite pillars. A boardwalk passes right through the cave to the river at the other end, which is a popular spot for picnics and swimming. To protect the cave and its surrounding limestone forest, which is home to a number of rare plant species, including some types of palms, Wind Cave has been designated as a nature reserve.

Fairy Cave, 3 miles (5 km) farther south, is larger and accessed by a flight of steps leading up to the cave mouth. Its main chamber also contains a series of stalagmite formations. One of these, thought to resemble Kuan Yin, the Chinese goddess of mercy, has transformed the chamber into a popular shrine. Neither of the two caves is illuminated and flashlights are essential in the dark interior.

Mother and baby orangutans at Semenggoh Nature Reserve

This reserve functions as a rehabilitation center for honey bears, orangutans, crocodiles, monkeys, gibbons, hornbills, and porcupines, all of which were either orphaned due to hunting or rescued from cages where they were kept illegally as pets. Reintroducing orangutans to their natural habitat is the primary aim of this nature reserve and its orangutan rehabilitation program has been particularly successful, resulting in a thriving population of semi-wild orangutans inhabiting the surrounding forest. With the forest having reached its capacity to hold the primates, the program has now been transferred to the Matang Wildlife Center (see p159). Since the orangutans roam freely, spotting them is not guaranteed. The best chance to see them is at feeding time, around 9am and 3pm.

There are also pleasant walking trails around the reserve. A Botanical Research Center here is dedicated to analysing jungle plants with medicinal properties.

THE BIDAYUH

The Bidayuh are one of the largest indigenous Dayak groups living in Sarawak and have traditionally been farmers and hunters. Concentrated in the area west of Kuching, their longhouses dot the slopes of Anna Rais. Unlike other Dayak groups of Sarawak, they build their longhouses at the foot of hills rather than on riverbanks. The British referred to them as "Land Dayaks" to distinguish them from the "Sea Dayaks" – such as the Iban – who traveled everywhere by boat. The Bidayuh are particularly skilled at bamboo-carving, basket-weaving, and beadwork. Women can be seen sitting on the ruai, or communal veranda, making bead-covered hats that are used for special occasions. Among these is the Gawai Padi festival, held in early June, when Bidayuhs give thanks to the rice goddess for a bountiful harvest. The celebration involves singing, dancing, and drinking.

Bako National Park 12

Established in 1957, Bako was Sarawak's first national park. Spread across 10 sq miles (27 sq km), it nurtures vegetation that ranges from rain forest to swampland and mangrove forests to kerangas, or scrubland. With steep rocky cliffs punctuated by deep bays, white sandy beaches, and a mangrove-fringed coastline, Bako is a nature-lover's paradise. It is also one of the best parks in Malaysia for spotting rare animals, such as proboscis monkeys, bearded pigs, sambar deer, and macaques, which makes it a popular destination for wildlife enthusiasts. Though the park can be visited on a day trip, the chances of wildlife sightings are higher in the early morning and in the evening, so an overnight trip is advisable.

KEY

★ Sea Stacks

These towering rock formations are a peculiar characteristic of Bako's coastline. They were formed by the action of the sea on the softer sandstone at the base of the cliffs, which eroded, leaving behind pillars of harder limestone.

★ Bako's Wildlife

Bako offers opportunities to spot a diverse range of wildlife, including flying lemurs, monitor lizards, and 150 species of birds. However, the stars of the park are the endangered proboscis monkeys, named for their prominent nose, who forage in groups for mangrove leaves.

Teluk Delima Trail is one of the best trails in Bako for spotting proboscis monkeys.

MONKEY BUSINESS IN BAKO

Relatively accustomed to the presence of visitors, long-tailed macaques are easy to spot as they scavenge for food near the Park Headquarters. While a close sighting can initially be thrilling, macaques can be intimidating and are likely to snatch bags or possessions if left unguarded for a moment. Even the garbage disposal system has to be specially designed to keep the macaques out.

Batang Rajang 13

From Kuching. Bintawa Wharf, daily boat from Kuching to Sibü at 8:30am. daily. Gawai Padi Festival (May–Jun).

Flowing 348 miles (560 km) through the heart of Sarawak, the vast Batang Rajang is Sarawak's longest river and the main artery of trade for towns in the central and southern parts of the province. The upper reaches are the heartland of the timber industry, and the river is often muddy with topsoil and littered with debris from various logging operations.

This region is populated largely by the indigenous people, and the banks of the river and its tributaries are scattered with longhouses. The lower reaches of the river are inhabited predominantly by the Iban people, while the upper section mostly contains the dwellings of the Kayan and Kenyah. Trips up the river to these longhouses can be arranged through tour operators in Kuching, Sibü, and Kapit. Independent travel is also possible, but it is essential that visitors wait to be invited in before entering a traditional longhouse.

Boats are a major form of transportation between the towns that flank the Batang

Rajang. The jetties of all the towns teem with huge ekspres boats as well as the smaller, motorized longboats. It is possible to travel the entire distance from Kuching to Belaga by boat. The first leg of this journey is up to the town of Sibü, the principal transport hub on the Batang Rajang. The jetties are divided between upriver and downriver traffic, which provides easy access to Kanowit and Kapit.

The journey from Kapit to the town of Belaga, a further six hours away, passes through the treacherous Pelagus Rapids, a 1.5-mile (2.5-km) stretch of cataracts and whirlpools caused by a sudden drop in the riverbed. Boats may not run at all on this stretch when the water level in the rapids is dangerously low, usually between May and August. Beyond Belaga, the Rajang divides into Sungai Belaga and Batang Balui.

The best time for a trip up the Batang Rajang is between late May and early June to coincide with the Gawai Padi (see p51) festival celebrated by the Dayak people in their longhouses.

The capital of Sarawak's largest district, Sibü is also the major port of the province and an important economic center, managing trade between the coast and the hinterland. The town's early growth was funded by the rubber industry, run mostly by Chinese merchants who were encouraged by Rajah Charles Brooke to set up businesses here. Later, they also established a thriving timber trade.

Among the sights of Sibü is the 100-year-old temple dedicated to Tua Pek Kong, the patron saint of merchants. Located on the western end of the waterfront, the temple has a beautiful seven-story pagoda with fantastic views of the town and river.

North of the city center is the Sibü Civic Center Heritage Museum, which traces the town's history through old photographs and artifacts. The museum also has a rich collection of white ceramics that dates back to the 10th and 12th centuries.

Environs

Located about 40 miles (65 km) upriver of Sibul, Kanowit is a small place with few sights of interest. The main highlight is Fort Emma, built by Rajah James Brooke in 1859 and named after his sister. Constructed of bamboo and timber, it was an attempt to prevent Iban raids on Melanau tribes on the Batang Rajang. Eventually, the place became key to the success of the Rajahs' rule. The fort is not open to the public.

Kapit is a small but bustling riverside town, with an attractive waterfront lined with trees and plants. The town's main landmark is the historic Fort Sylvania, a whitewashed ironwood structure named after the wife of Vyner Brooke, the third of the White Rajahs. It was built in 1880 in an effort to control Iban head-hunting parties in the region. In 1997 the fort was listed as a historical monument, and now houses a museum and a training center for artisans. There is also an interesting museum at the town's civic center, which has displays of Iban and Orang Ulu longhouses as well as photographs of the early days.

Kapit is also a trading center for the indigenous people that inhabit the upriver areas. A lively market sets up daily, near the center of town, packed with vendors selling an assortment of jungle produce, such as vegetables, tropical fruits, and beeswax. A major draw for most visitors to Kapit is a chance to visit the remote longhouses along the upper tributaries of the mighty Batang Rajang.

Environs

Located just 6 miles (10 km) from Kapit, Rumah Seligi is an authentic Iban longhouse that is the home to about 40

Few foreign visitors make it so deep into Sarawak, but if they do, it is one of the best places to arrange visits to Kenyah and Kayan longhouses, common to this section of the river. These longhouses feature salong, or intricately carved tomb markers, which can be seen from a distance. Arrangements for a longhouse visit can be made at the Belaga Hotel.

Located on the coast north of Sibiu (see p164), Mukah is a quiet fishing town that offers a glimpse into the lifestyle of the Melanau, the indigenous group that predominates in this region. A few of their traditional tall-houses can still be seen in the area, although most Melanau prefer simple Malay dwellings now. The majority of the town's sights are clustered along the south bank of Sungai Mukah, and include the market and Tua Pek Kong Temple, whose walls are adorned with well-executed murals of Buddhist and Taoist deities.

Mukah springs to life in mid-April to celebrate the Pesta Kaul (see p51) festival, held annually to appease the sea spirits and mark the beginning of a new fishing season. As part of the festivities, the Melanau dance to folk rhythms on the beach and sway back and forth on a tibau, a tall swing used as part of a fertility rite.

A short distance from town is Kampung Tellian, a fishing village with colorful boats, winding lanes, and narrow bridges. Here, the Lamin Dana museum is dedicated to the preservation of Melanau culture with exhibits of textiles, betel nut boxes, and rattan baskets. Traditional tall-houses are available for overnight stays.

Also worth visiting are Masjid Assyakirin, a Moorish-style mosque bearing a distinctive blue dome and set in well-landscaped grounds, and Kuan Yin Tong Temple, which features a beautiful rock garden and an artificial waterfall.

Across the river, Kampung Jepak features Melanau stilt houses and is famous for its belaccan, a pungent shrimp paste used in Malay cooking. Taman Tumbina, a short distance north of town, is a compact recreational park, the ideal place to escape the bustle of town.

Occupying just 27 sq miles (70 sq km), Similajau National Park was established in 1976 to create a protected habitat for the green turtles that nest on its beaches each year. Visitor facilities were added only in the 1990s and Similajau is still one of Sarawak's least visited parks.

A 19-mile (31-km) strip of coastline lined by trees and punctuated by rocky headlands offers visitors some of the country's best beaches. The park's main walking trail is well marked and follows the coast. Interesting routes branch off from it, including the Viewpoint and the Selansur Rapids Trails. The path ends at Golden Beach, which is great for swimming. Walkers can look out for gibbons and banded langurs, as well as flying foxes, which are under threat in other regions due to excessive hunting. The park supports over 180 bird species, including the hook-billed bulbul and the wrinkled hornbill. Saltwater crocodiles live in some of the larger rivers and signs posted in the park warn against swimming here.

Dolphins and porpoises are occasionally found swimming in groups close to the shore, and are best viewed from a boat trip along the coast.

Iban Longhouses

Traditionally, all indigenous groups of Sarawak lived in communal longhouses that reflected the tight-knit nature of tribal culture. One of the largest Dayak groups, the Iban migrated to Sarawak from Kalimantan's Kapual River basin (now in Indonesia) between the 16th and 18th centuries. Most Iban longhouses, called rumah panjang, or rumah panjai, are located in the Skrang, Lemanak, Batang Ai, and Batang Rajang areas, and visiting them often involves a longboat trip. Generally erected next to rivers, most longhouses are still dwellings built of timber, with thatched roofs and bamboo or rattan woven walls tied together with fiber from creepers. Staying in a longhouse is the highlight of a visit to the province as the Iban make excellent hosts, often welcoming visitors with tuak, or rice wine, a meal, and providing a longhouse tour.

Traditional thatched roofs are now often replaced by the more durable corrugated iron.

Stilts support the structure, which is accessed by steps made of steeply-angled tree trunks.

A TRADITIONAL LONGHOUSE

The main internal division of the longhouse is created by a wall through the center of the building. On one side is a wide communal veranda, while on the other is a row of bilek, or private rooms, each entered by a single door. The kitchen area is inside the bilek.

The area beneath the living quarters has chickens and pigs, rooting for scraps which fall through the bamboo slats.

A wide public veranda, or ruai, runs down the middle of the longhouse, with all bilek facing out onto it. The ruai is used for socializing and making handicraft items.

An outdoor veranda called tanju fronts the longhouse and runs along the length of the building. The veranda's split-bamboo floor is exposed to rain and sun. This area is used mainly for drying rice, coffee, cocoa beans, pepper, and even clothes.

Originally a quiet fishing village, Sarawak's second largest city Miri emerged as a major commercial center when Malaysia's first oil well was drilled here in 1910. In the 1970s, the onshore oil-fields closed down and Miri shifted its focus to developing its tourism industry.

Packed with markets and cafés, the atmospheric old town around Jalan China is the liveliest part of the city. Among the most interesting markets is Tamu Muhibba, or local market, where upriver indigenous people come to sell jungle produce such as tropical fruits, rattan mats, and Bario rice. The city's biggest wet market on the northern end of Jalan China borders the simple red-and-yellow building of the Tua Pek Kong temple. The Al Taqwa Mosque, with its whitewashed arches and a huge golden dome framed by palm trees is also worth a visit. Perhaps Miri's most significant site, perched atop Canada Hill, is Oil Well No. 1. The site of Malaysia's first oil excavation, it is now a National Monument. Close to it, the new Petroleum Museum documents the growth of this industry. The discovery of a number of superb reefs around Miri's coast, teeming with electric-blue angel fish, and blue-spotted sting rays, has been a boost to its tourism industry.

Considered by many to be the most important archaeological site in Southeast Asia, the Niah caves are among Sarawak's most spectacular attractions. In 1958, Tom Harrison, curator of the Sarawak Museum in Kuching, discovered skulls and tools at the mouth of the Great Cave – evidence that the caves had been inhabited by humans 40,000 years ago. With the enormous Great Cave as its centerpiece, the national park was established in 1975, covering 12 sq miles (32 sq km) of dense rainforest and limestone outcrops.

From the Park Headquarters, a short boat ride across Sungai Niah takes visitors to the boardwalk that links the caves. The first is Traders' Cave, named for the guano and birds' nest collectors who once sold their harvest here. Farther along is the Great Cave, one of the world's largest caves. It measures a staggering 820 ft (250 m) in width and has a 196-ft (60-m) high cave mouth. It is home to several species of swiftlets and bats, and during the harvest season, nest and bat guano collectors camp inside the cave. From within the Great Cave, the trail continues to the Painted Cave, where ancient rock paintings made with red hematite stone cover a narrow 98-ft (30-m) strip on the back wall. Several small boat-shaped coffins called death-ships were also found in the cave, indicating that it may have been used once as a burial chamber. The paintings and the coffins are protected by a fence. The caves are dimly lit so it is wise to carry a flashlight.

With its range of rugged sandstone hills, mixed dipterocarp (hardwood) forest, low-lying kerangas, or scrubland, and teeming wildlife, Lambir Hills National Park is a popular weekend getaway from Miri. Among its main attractions are sparkling waterfalls that cascade into natural swimming pools. There are also some excellent jungle trails that lead to the falls, ranging from easy 15-minute strolls to all-day hikes. The longest is the 4-hour trek to the summit of Bukit Lambir for a scenic view of the park. Closest to the park headquarters is the Latak waterfall, with an enticing pool and sandy beach, while deeper into the jungle are the Pantu and Pancur waterfalls.

Although the animals here may be difficult to spot, the national park is home to flying squirrels, gibbons, pangolins, clouded leopard, and barking deer, as well as numerous species of birds. There are several Iban longhouses, including Rumah Nakat, which has an interesting traditional handicraft center.

Consisting of Bunut Lake, Sarawak's biggest freshwater lake, and the surrounding dense peat swamp and dipterocarp forest, Loagan Bunut National Park is a bird-watcher's paradise. A profusion of bird species inhabit this park, including herons, darters, kingfishers, egrets, magpies, robins, and hornbills. The lake is dependent on the water levels of the Bunut and Tinjar rivers, and often dries up completely for a few weeks in February, May, and June. At this time, the local fishermen practice a unique type of fishing called selambau to catch fish that are stranded in the receding waters. The fish are scooped up in huge nets mounted on spoon-shaped wooden frames. Boat cruises on the lake's tranquil waters, especially rewarding in the early morning and dusk, can be arranged at the park headquarters. A few trails, lined with tapang and belian trees, lead through the forest. Limited access makes this a seldom-visited park, but new roads and visitor facilities are being planned to attract tourists to the park.

One of Borneo's most isolated and unspoiled regions, Kelabit Highlands is a 3,281-ft (1,000-m) high plateau that is home to the hospitable Kelabit people. A visit to one of their longhouses is a highlight of a trip to this spectacular region. Among the most populous of the highland settlements is Bario, which nestles in a lush valley. The village has a small airport and a few lodging houses, and these make it a good base for exploring the region. Day trips from Bario include a visit to the beautiful longhouse at Pa Umor. A longer and much more challenging outing is the 5-day trek along the Bario Loop. The trail offers some delightful views, and trekkers have the option of making overnight stays at the Ramudu, Pa Dalih, or Long Dano longhouses. For serious mountain climbing head to Gunung Murud, located 12 miles (20 km) north of Bario. At 7,999 ft (2,438 m), Murud is Sarawak's highest peak and is regarded as a holy mountain by the indigenous people of the highlands. Scaling its sheer walls should only be attempted by fit and experienced climbers. There are two main trails up the mountain and having a guide is advisable. All the treks can be arranged through the lodges at Bario.

Mulu National Park 25

Listed both as a UNESCO World Heritage Site and a Rainforest Conservation Area, Mulu National Park is one of Sarawak's premier tourist destinations. Named for the sandstone peak of Gunung Mulu, it is a region of great natural beauty. The park encompasses over 200 sq miles (500 sq km) of rain forest and has two mountain ranges and some of the largest caves in the world. Gorges, valleys, and underground passages in the park provide the ideal habitat for an abundance of flora and fauna, including several species of orchids and hornbills. Trekking up to the limestone pinnacles of Gunung Api, exploring Clearwater and Deer Caves, and traversing the Canopy Skywalk are among the park's highlights.

Located on the northwest coast of Malaysian Borneo and hemmed in by the borders of Sarawak, the Sultanate of Brunei Darussalam is among the world's smallest countries. It played a pivotal role in Borneo's history, with its sultans having once controlled vast tracts of the island's north and west. Today, Brunei occupies a modest 2,226 sq miles (5,765 sq km). Most of the country is a low-lying coastal plain backed by rain forest and hills. Off the west coast lie vast oil fields, which are responsible for the country's affluence. It is divided into four districts: Brunei Muara which includes Bandar Seri Begawan, the capital; Tutong, an agricultural region; Belait, the center of the oil industry; and Temburong, an area of natural beauty.

SABAH

Malaysia's second largest state, Sabah sits on the northeastern tip of Borneo. Located just south of the typhoon belt, this Land below the Wind is geographically stunning, with magnificent caves, coral reefs, forests, and mountains. The state is also the ideal destination for a range of adventure activities including mountain climbing, white-water rafting, and diving.

Archaeological excavations reveal evidence of prehistoric human habitation in eastern Sabah approximately 40,000 years ago. This remote province, with over 30 indigenous groups, as well as immigrants from China, Indonesia, and the Philippines, was nominally ruled by the sultans of Brunei for centuries until the British negotiated the rights to exploit the region's reserves of rubber, tobacco, and timber in the late 19th century. Although the British never had a stable leadership over Sabah, they clung on to power, with the region continuing to be known as North Borneo until it joined the Federation of Malaysia in 1963.

Today, Sabah's economy lags behind that of other states in Malaysia because of an inequitable distribution of wealth between the state and federal governments, and an influx of immigrants from neighboring countries. However, with ecotourism contributing to the state's economy, and abundant agricultural produce, such as palm oil, Sabah is starting to catch up.

Sandakan, the administrative capital between 1883 and 1942, and Kota Kinabalu, the present state capital, were both almost completely destroyed during World War II, but today they have been rebuilt and are charming destinations. From Kota Kinabalu it is an easy journey north to the Tip of Borneo, south to the Padas River for white-water rafting, and northeast to Gunung Kinabalu for a challenging trek. Sandakan is a good base from which to visit the dive sites that lie off the east coast and the nature reserves at Sukau and Danum Valley. Sabah also offers visitors a cultural experience with its vibrant tamus held weekly, and fascinating longhouses.

Exploring Sabah

The state is characterized by steep mountains and lush valleys teeming with magnificent wildlife and marine life. The highlights of a visit to Sabah are a trek up Gunung Kinabalu, diving trips from the islands of Sipadan and Lankayan, and white-water rafting on the Padas River. Danum Valley is excellent for wildlife spotting while the villages of Kota Belud, Gombizau, Bawangazao, and Sumangkap offer an opportunity to interact with indigenous groups in exciting and memorable ways.

GETTING AROUND

Domestic flights are the best way of getting around Sabah. Daily flights connect Kota Kinabalu, Sandakan, Lahad Datu, Tawau, and Kudat. The state's main road connects Kota Kinabalu to Kudat in the north and Tawau and Sandakan in the east. The smaller roads often fall into disrepair, causing delays. The only rail line in Sabah is the short stretch connecting Kota Kinabalu to Tenom. Regular ferries connect Kota Kinabalu to most coastal towns, Menumbok to Pulau Labuan, and Sandakan to Turtle Island National Park.

The capital of Sabah, Kota Kinabalu occupies a narrow stretch of land between the western seafront and a range of forested hills. Formerly known as Jesselton, it became the provincial capital after World War II, and was renamed Kota Kinabalu in 1967. Most of its historic buildings were destroyed by bombing during the war and the city had to be completely rebuilt. Only three structures remain of the old town – the Land and Survey building, the General Post Office, and the Atkinson Clock, a 49-ft (15-m) tall timepiece built in 1905 and named for the city's first district officer. Despite the lack of historical landmarks, the city has charm, with friendly people, bustling streets, and a good range of accommodations, restaurants, and bars. The city center is small and easy to explore around on foot. The city's main attractions include the lively seafront tamus, or markets, such as the Filipino Market, as well as the Sabah Museum, and the State Mosque. The new and larger City Mosque, often referred to as the Floating Mosque, was built in 2000 beside Likas Bay. Also overlooking the bay is the magnificent 31-story glass building of the Sabah Foundation. An observatory on Signal Hill offers a sweeping view of the city and offshore islands. Kota Kinabalu is the best base from which to explore Sabah's northwest coast, including the magnificent Gunung Kinabalu (see pp184-7) and Tunku Abdul Rahman National Park.

Opened in 1985, the Sabah Museum is set amid spacious grounds, and is designed in the style of a Rungus longhouse. The museum has several floors, with sections on ethnography, natural history, ceramics, history, and archaeology. The ethnographic exhibits are among the highlights of the museum, and include examples of musical instruments, swords, spears, and blowpipes, ethnic costumes, and displays on the various uses of bamboo. The archaeology gallery displays intricately carved coffins. A "time tunnel" exhibit documents the arrival of Filipino and Indonesian immigrants, the colonial era, the Japanese occupation, and the incorporation of Sabah into the Federation of Malaysia in 1963. In front of the museum is a small but interesting collection of vintage cars.

The museum grounds also contain a Heritage Village, which has excellent examples of houses of Sabah's main indigenous groups. The Murut house features an unusual bouncing platform that is used for communal dances. Talks on a range of topics can be arranged for visitors by prior request.

A short boat ride away from Kota Kinabalu, Tunku Abdul Rahman National Park is made up of five beautiful islands that cover an area of 19 sq miles (50 sq km). Named for the country's first prime minister, the park was established in 1974 to protect the fragile coral reefs around Pulau Gaya, Pulau Sapi, Pulau Manukan, Pulau Mamutik, and Pulau Sulug. Several varieties of marine life thrive in these reefs, including parrotfish, clownfish, batfish, and lionfish. Wildlife on the islands include long-tailed macaques, bearded pigs, pangolins, and pied hornbills.

Pulau Gaya is the biggest of the five islands. Covered in dense forest, it has about 12 miles (20 km) of trails and dazzling white sand beaches such as Police Beach on the northeast coast. Although much of the coral around Pulau Gaya has been destroyed by dynamite fishing, the rest of the islands have reefs teeming with marine life.

Just off the southwest tip of Pulau Gaya, and linked to it by a sandbar at low tide, Pulau Sapi is tiny in comparison but has some lovely waters that are ideal for swimming and snorkeling, as well as a short nature trail. The three other islands are clustered together a little farther south. Pulau Manukan, where the park headquarters is located, is the most popular of the five islands, especially for day trips. This crescent-shaped island's facilities include a resort and restaurant. Among the many activities on offer are snorkeling, glass-bottomed boat rides, sea kayaking, and parasailing. Scuba gear and underwater scooters can be hired on the island. Pulau Manukan has particularly good beaches on its eastern shore, but the large number of visitors and constant movement of boats sometimes cause the reefs to become murky.

The last two islands are very small and attract fewer visitors, and are therefore quieter. Pulau Mamutik is the smallest of the five islands, while Pulau Sulug is the farthest, but both have beautiful coral reefs and are popular with snorkelers.

Located near the top of the 5,410 ft (1,649 m) high Sinsuron Pass in the Crocker Mountain Range, the Tambunan Rafflesia Forest Reserve was set up to protect the unique rafflesia flower. The botanical name of the commonest rafflesia, Rafflesia arnoldi, is derived from Sir Stamford Raffles, founder of Singapore, and naturalist Dr. Joseph Arnold, who discovered it in Sumatra in 1818. A 15-lb (7-kg) specimen was immediately sent back to the Royal Society in London. This parasitic plant is pollinated by carrion flies and emits a smell of rotting flesh to attract them. Its natural habitat is in moist, shaded areas. The flower takes about nine months to bloom into the world's largest flower, with brick-red petals and white dots. The display is short-lived as the petals begin to wilt within a few days.

As the blooming season is unpredictable and the rafflesia flowers only for a few days in a year, visitors are advised to enquire in advance if one is in bloom. The reserve has comprehensive information on the rafflesia and its habitat.

Guides are available at the information center, but are mostly not necessary, since the paths are well marked and staff can give directions.

Located on a peninsula south of Kota Kinabalu, the Klias Wetlands are a mangrove forest interspersed with countless channels of the Sungai Klias. It is among Sabah's relatively new attractions. Wildlife here is rich and diverse so visitors might spot several species of monkey, such as the silver-leaf and long-tailed macaque, an amazing variety of birds, and swarms of fireflies that illuminate the riverside trees in the evenings. The real highlight of the wetlands, however, is the chance to see the unique proboscis monkey, a species native to Borneo. They are timid but can be seen feeding on tender leaves near the edge of the water.

The monkeys are named for their long, drooping noses that are particularly prominent in males, often twice as large as the females. The males also have a bulbous belly. These distinctive features have earned the monkey the nickname orang belanda, meaning Dutchman, in some parts of Borneo. The Klias Wetlands are a relatively new attraction, but most tour companies in Kota Kinabalu now offer boat trips to these wetlands. Although independent travel is possible, joining a tour group is a preferred option.

Pulau Labuan 5

5 miles (8 km) W of the Klias Peninsula. 📞 86,000. ☑ 📷 (087) 423-445.

Located off the southwest coast of Sabah, Pulau Labuan is a small island with a significant history. In 1846, the Sultan of Brunei ceded the island to the British who were particularly keen to mine the island's large coal deposits to provide fuel for passing steamships. The island remained a British territory for almost 100 years, until it was overrun by the Japanese at the beginning of their occupation of Borneo during World War II. A few years later the Japanese surrendered here at the end of the war. In 1963, Pulau Labuan joined the Federation of Malaysia. Today, the island is a quiet, pleasant place, with nice beaches and popular as a duty-free shopping haven.

Labuan Town is the main settlement on the island. Just north of Labuan is the An-Nur Jamek Mosque, a distinctive, futuristic structure. The Peace Park at Layang Layangan, 2 miles (4 km) north of town, contains a war memorial which marks the site of the Japanese surrender. An Allied war cemetery on the east coast has nearly 4,000 graves of Allied soldiers who lost their lives in Borneo.

The island's waters are particularly popular among divers, especially for wreck-diving. Several World War II and other shipwrecks lie in the waters off Labuan's coast. Dive operators organize visits to these interesting sites. The Labuan Marine Park is centered around Pulau Kuraman, a small island near the south coast, accessible by boats from the Labuan jetty. A number of activities such as diving, sailing, fishing, and organized short jungle walks are offered at the park. It also has some beautiful beaches, perfect for picnics and sun-bathing.

The Padas River weaves through the southwest region of Sabah, linking the small, quiet towns of Tenom and Beaufort. Known to be a turbulent river, it has flooded Beaufort several times. As a result, shophouses in the town are now built on stilts. Early photographs show Beaufort resembling the canal city of Venice. The Padas River is popular as a destination for great white-water rafting (see p.327). The boulder-strewn river cuts through lowland rainforest, and between April and July, the water level of the river creates Grade II and III rapids. The access point for rafting trips on the Padas River is at the town of Pangi, near Tenom, which can be reached by train from Beaufort. From Pangi, challenging rapids, with names such as Merry-Go-Round, Washing Machine, and Headhunter, tumble downstream. The river has several gentle stretches as well, where it is possible to hop out of the raft and float downstream with the current.

White-water rafting down the turbulent Padas River

Rafting trips can be organized by tour companies in Kota Kinabalu who brief visitors well on safety procedures. As well as rafting trips, there is also the opportunity to take a tour of the southwest region of the state and ride on Borneo's only railway line from Beaufort to Tenom, tracing the Padas River and meandering through jungles.

THE NORTH BORNEO RAILWAY

When the British-run North Borneo Chartered Company began operating in the late 19th century, its managing director, William Cowie, developed a plan for a trans-Borneo railway stretching from Brunei Bay beside Pulau Labuan to Sandakan in the east of the province, cutting through steep ranges and uncharted jungles. Construction began in 1896 and by 1905 a line had been built from Weston, on Brunei Bay, to Beaufort in the southwest, and from there to both Jesselton, now known as Kota Kinabalu, and to Tenom, east of Beaufort. From Tenom it was extended a further 10 miles (16 km) to Melalap, where work came to a halt and was never continued. Cost of construction was high, and the rice tax levied on locals to pay for it resulted in rebellions against the British. The Chartered Company then ensured that the train paid for itself by refusing to build roads connecting Tenom, Beaufort, and Jesselton. The line still exists today, though more as a curiosity. Trains from Kota Kinabalu to Beaufort take about three hours, but it is the stretch from Beaufort to Tenom that is worth taking. Most trains are pulled by diesel engines, though the Sutera Harbour Resort (see p.285) has put an old steam train in service.

₹ 73,000. 📞 Sun. 📍 Tamu Besar (Oct/Nov).

Located on fertile alluvial plains, Kota Belud is a quiet town inhabited mainly by Bajau people, famed for their skill with horses. Gunung Kinabalu dominates the landscape to the east.

The town itself is small and unassuming, except on Sunday mornings when it springs to life during the weekly tamu, or market. Held at Jalan Hasbollah, a short distance from the town center, the tamu is the hub of local trade and is as much a social event as a commercial one. Local people from diverse ethnic groups such as Chinese, Indians, and Malay, come together to sell their goods while visitors soak up the atmosphere and enjoy a hearty breakfast at one of the many stalls.

Just about anything one can imagine is on sale, from livestock, fruit, vegetables, and meat to hand-crafted knives, musical instruments, bark waistcoats, and local textiles. Tempting snacks and drinks are also on offer. Vendors are very friendly, and expect potential buyers to haggle for their goods. The weekly tamu is busy from around 6am until early afternoon.

Tamu Besar, or the big market, is an annual festive event at Kota Belud which is celebrated amid cultural festivities and handicraft demonstrations. The highlight of the market are the stalls of horses for sale.

Located up the coast from Kota Belud on the Kudat Peninsula in the north of the province, Kampung Gombizau is one of several smaller villages in the area that are taking part in the local government's scheme of One Village, One Product. The program encourages the communities to produce and market unique handmade products and handicrafts made from locally available material. The villagers, most of whom are part of the Rungus minority, dedicate their time to the industry of beekeeping and the sale of honey and beeswax. Royal jelly, a bee secretion which is a good dietary supplement and an ingredient in several beauty products, is also cultivated and sold here. Visitors are shown around the carefully-tended beehives and can see how the bees are smoked out for the honeycombs to be removed.

A short drive from Gombizau is the village of Sumangkap, which resounds with the beating of metal being made into gongs and can thus boast the highest decibel count in Sabah. One of the most important elements of Sabahan music, the gongs feature in all traditional celebrations. These gongs are skillfully crafted by local artisans. Set horizontally in frames or suspended vertically, gongs come in all sizes,

The Rungus people, who live in the region around Kudat, have managed to maintain more of their traditions and culture than many other indigenous groups. A visit to a longhouse in the village of Bavanggazo, just off the road from Kota Belud to Kudat, is an excellent opportunity to appreciate Rungus heritage.

The longhouses are aligned in an auspicious east-west direction, with outward sloping walls to allow for maximum ventilation. One such longhouse is Matunggunng, which features traditional bamboo-slatted sides and a thatched roof, and contains the living quarters of approximately 100 families.

The Rungus are famed for their beadwork, and visitors to the longhouse can usually see women sitting on the communal veranda crafting shoulder bands, necklaces, and bracelets from multi-colored beads, using motifs from Rungus folklore. The older Rungus women wear brass coils as jewelry. They are also skilled textile weavers, and use locally grown, hand-spun cotton on simple looms for their clothes.

Organized tours, which can be booked in Kota Kinabalu, include a visit to the villages of Gombizau and Sumangkap as well as lunch at Bavanggazo. These tasty meals are made with fresh vegetables from adjoining fields. Visitors have the option of staying overnight to attend a cultural performance of traditionally dressed dancers and gong players.

A small port sitting at the northern tip of Sabah, Kudat is inhabited by a large number of Chinese and Filipino traders. Sheltered by the Marudu Bay, the Kudat Peninsula was deemed suitable enough to be selected as the administrative capital of British North Borneo in 1882. However, the town's era of importance was short-lived, as frequent pirate attacks and a lack of fresh water forced the provincial capital to be shifted in 1883 to Sandakan (see p190).

There are not many sights in town, although a stroll around the harbor, watching fishing boats come and go, can be refreshing. A walk along the Sidek Esplanade around the bay is also rejuvenating. Kudat's main street,

The northernmost tip of Borneo, known locally as Tanjung Simpang Mangayau, which means battle junction, makes an excellent day trip from Kota Kinabalu. Located in the Kudat district, the tip can be reached after stopping off at the Gombizau bee farm, at the gong village of Sumangkap, and along the way at the Rungus longhouse at Bavanggazo.

A few miles before Kudat, a branch of the road forks to the left, passing under towering coconut palms and leading directly to a lovely windswept promontory that looks out over the South China Sea to the west and the Sulu Sea to the east.

Just before the headland, the road passes behind a sandy crescent shaded by casuarinas to Kalamunian Beach, where the Irranun people sell colorful shells. At the Tip of Borneo itself, a flagpole stands beside a giant globe of the world. An inscription on the globe recounts that Ferdinand Magellan spent 42 days here repairing his ship during his circumnavigation of the world between 1519 and 1522.

Kinabalu National Park 19

A UNESCO World Heritage site, the 754-sq km (291-sq mile) national park protects the environment around Gunung Kinabalu. Popular for its trails and wildlife, the park is home to 4,500 species of plants, including 1,500 varieties of orchids and nine types of pitcher plants. Also found here are large mammals such as orangutans, gibbons, and clouded leopards, unusual birds such as the Kinabalu friendly warbler and the Bornean mountain whistler, and a dazzling variety of butterflies and insects. At its southeast corner lies Poring Hot Springs, the ideal place to relax after the rigors of the park's trails.

One of the richest areas in species diversity, the park's attractions include such mammals as tarsiers, squirrels, and tree shrews, birds such as hornbills, partridges, and mountain blackbirds, as well as a long list of colorful butterflies and beetles. The park is also home to several varieties of rare and exotic flora, including the extraordinary rafflesia (see p180).

Tarsiers are easily recognized by their long feet and large eyes.

They are nocturnal primates that feed on insects, birds, and snakes.

Slipper orchids are named for their bright slipper-shaped pouches that attract pollinating insects. These delicate plants are fast becoming an uncommon sight.

Climbing Gunung Kinabalu

The climb to the summit of Gunung Kinabalu begins at the power station, just above Park Headquarters. There is an alternative route, longer but less steep, which starts at Mesilau Nature Resort, 11 miles (17 km) to the east. The two trails meet at Layang Layang and continue to the Laban Rata Rest House, where most climbers break for the night. Some, however, travel another hour to the more basic rest house at Sayat Sayat, which has the benefit of a shorter clamber to the summit the next morning. The last, and toughest, part of the hike begins well before dawn to allow climbers to view the sunrise from Low's Peak. The descent takes five hours, so it is best to start back by noon to reach the base before dark.

The Summit Trail

From the power station to the summit at Low's Peak, this trail takes at least two days to traverse. Handrails are erected along the trickier stretches to help climbers.

South Peak, as its name suggests, is the southernmost of Kinabalu's peaks. A near-perfect pinnacle, it provides lofty views of the surrounding area.

LOW'S PEAK

The highest peak of Gunung Kinabalu, Low's Peak is named for Sir Hugh Low, a naturalist and British Colonial Secretary on Pulau Labuan. Ironically, he never stood on its summit despite three attempts during the 1850s. On his second attempt, in 1858, he was accompanied by Spenser St. John, the British Consul in Brunei, who made it to the top of South Peak only to see other peaks around it that stood still higher. It was not until 1888 that John Whitehead, a zoologist, conquered the highest peak while collecting new species of birds and mammals, some of which are also named for Sir Hugh Low.

CLIMBING THE SUMMIT TRAIL

Climbing the mountain is more fun when traveling light, but a few items are essential, including a hat, suntan lotion, sunglasses, and a flashlight. Warm, waterproof clothing is a must. Sleeping bags are provided free of charge at Laban Rata and Sayat Sayat rest houses, and the shop at Park Headquarters sells basic food. Allow a day for booking accommodation at Laban Rata and arranging a climbing permit (RM100), guide (RM60 for a small group), and porters (RM6 per kilo).

Sandakan 14

250 miles (400 km) E of Kota Kinabalu. 📍 12,500. 📞 (089) 229-751.

Lying on the northern edge of Sandakan Bay, Sandakan is sandwiched between a steep escarpment and the Sulu Sea. During the late 18th century, exports of timber, pearls, birds' nests, and hornbill ivory made Sandakan a wealthy town. It became the administrative capital of North Borneo between 1884 and 1942, but was bombed out of existence by the end of World War II, like Kota Kinabalu. Much of the modern town is built on reclaimed land, but its indiscriminate architecture of concrete grids lacks the sense of space of Kota Kinabalu. These days, trade is focused on palm oil and cocoa crops.

There is little to interest visitors in the center of town, though the waterfront is lively with the constant movement of barges and ferries, and a daily fish market which is the biggest in Sabah. On the escarpment behind the town center is an Observation Pavilion that offers a spectacular view across the town and the harbor front.

Overlooking the pavilion is a well-preserved colonial building known as Agnes Keith's House. An American author who lived here in the 1930s, Agnes Keith wrote several books on Sabah and its culture. The house has ornate furnishings and wooden flooring, and the author's study still exudes an aura of tranquility.

Next door, another slice of colonial memorabilia, the English Tea House is a refreshing stop for tired visitors.

For many, the most moving sight in town is the Sandakan Memorial Park, about 7 miles (12 km) east of the town center. In 1944, over 2,000 Allied British and Australian prisoners of the Japanese POW camp were marched to Ranau near Gunung Kinabalu. Only six Australians survived. The small museum in the park, built by the Australian government, is a grim reminder of the tragedy.

Occupying 17 sq miles (43 sq km) of lowland rain forest, the center was set up to care for orphaned and injured animals, and teach them the skills needed to survive independently. The center aims to eventually reintroduce the orangutans into their natural habitat. Located at the

The three small islands of Selingan, Bakungan Kecil, and Gulisan constitute this turtle sanctuary, commonly known as the Pulau Penyu National Park, where green and hawksbill turtles come ashore to nest.

The most rewarding time to visit the Turtle Island National Park is between July and October when visitors are most likely to see these creatures lay their eggs in the sand. Booking in advance is necessary. Vigilant rangers transfer the hatchlings to nurseries, from where they are regularly released into the sea. Sadly, the chance of survival for each hatchling is only about one in a clutch of 100 eggs, as they often fall prey to poachers as well as natural predators.

The park also nurtures an interesting variety of flora such as mangroves, lantana, the yellow-flowered sophora, and the furry-leaved tournefortia among others.

It is visited mostly by divers for its colorful world of marine life, and, with only one resort, the place is rarely crowded. Some of the species that divers might spot around the Lankayan shipwreck, one of the many dive sites near the island, are glassfish, painted frogfish, and marble stingrays. Gazing into the waters from the jetty, visitors can often see black-tip sharks, especially in the months of April and May. Lankayan is a part of the Sugud Islands Marine Conservation Area, and its lush tropical vegetation is also worth a mention. The island is covered with screwpine (Pandanus amaryllifolius), which has a bloom resembling a pineapple.

Sungai Kinabatangan is Sabah's longest river at 348 miles (560 km) and its lower reaches, bordered by dense forests, provide the largest corridor for wildlife in the country. A unique feature of the river are the oxbow lakes set back from the main course, creating abundant habitats for the diverse flora and fauna. Much of this area has been designated as the Kinabatangan Wildlife Sanctuary. It is easily visited on a day trip from Sandakan, but staying overnight in the nearby town of Sukau enables visitors to take a boat ride along the river in the early morning, the best time to spot wildlife. Sungai Menungal, a small tributary that joins the Kinabatangan just above Sukau, is a particularly successful spot for wildlife sightings. Proboscis monkeys, a species common in Borneo, and macaques that feed high up in the trees, are among the highlights. Visitors are almost certain to see a wide range of reptiles such as crocodiles, and birds such as the hornbill, oriental darter, and the blue-eared kingfisher.

Activities organized by the reserve in collaboration with Tabin Wildlife Resort are exciting ways to spot wildlife and include jungle walks, night safaris, and bird-watching trips.

lowland rainforest, one of the most complex ecosystems, which is why it features high on most nature-lovers' itineraries on their visit to Sabah.

The surrounding logging concession, run by the Sabah Foundation, which has now been mostly reforested, acts as a buffer zone for the fantastic range of wildlife. Visitors are likely to spot elephants, barking deer, and slow lorises on several guided walks along nature trails. Among the birds that are visible in this region are the great argus pheasant, the rhinoceros hornbill, and the crimson sunbird. Most visitors stay at the Borneo Rainforest Lodge (see p284), by Sungai Danum, where a network of trails offer multiple options for exploring the area. The ideal time to observe wildlife is early morning and evening, when even the most cautious of animals, such as bearded pigs, emerge to root for food, while orangutans and Bornean gibbons can be spotted often rustling about in treetops by the lodge. A steep 2-mile (3-km) climb leads to an ancient Kadazan Dusun burial site, high up in a cliff-top cave. The site contains old coffins and offers a spectacular view over the Segama River Valley.

With most of its houses perched on wooden piles over the water, Semporna is a town juxtaposed between land and sea. This picturesque fishing town hovers over an ancient coral reef that supports a diverse variety of fish, soft corals, sponges, anemones, echinoderms, and mollusks.

The inhabitants are mainly the Bajau, a seafaring people who fish in the Celebes Sea to earn their living using delicately carved, traditional boats called lipa lipa, which they adorn with bright sails and colorful festoons.

Semporna is frequented by visitors who use it as a base for diving and snorkeling day trips to the offshore islands of Mabul and Sipadan (see pp194–5). Tawau sits on the coast in the extreme southeast of Sabah. It is a transport hub and a transit point for visitors heading toward Semporna and the offshore islands of Sipadan (see pp194–5).

This bustling port began life as a modest Bajau settlement, but in 1878 the British North Borneo Company, attracted by the fine natural harbor and rich volcanic soil found in the region, settled in Tawau. They shipped in elephants from Burma to assist with logging in the forest.

Timber has always been the prime produce of this town, although the rich soil also sustains plantations of rubber, coconut, cocoa, and palm oil. In fact, Tawau is the cocoa capital of Borneo, and the cocoa estate at nearby Quoin Hill admits visitors to see the stages of processing cacao beans to chocolate. Palm oil is cultivated even more extensively in Tawau, and plantations of its fan-like fronds are scattered around the state of Sabah.

Tawau faces Kalimantan across the strait and has a high percentage of Indonesian and Filipino residents. While there are some squalid areas, the town center is a tidy blend of traditional wooden shophouses and modern concrete blocks. The cheerful street markets offer a wide mix of goods such as herbs, vegetables, clothes, and toys sold by mobile traders. Tawau's fish market is always busy, and exotic seafood is available at the open-air stalls seen all over town.

Tawau is the jumping-off point for trips to the Maliau Basin to the west, which is dubbed “Sabah's lost world”

A lush stretch of low hills and thick mossy rainforest, Tawau Hills State Park was established here in 1979 to protect the watershed of the Tawau, Merotai, Kinabutan, Mantri, and Balung rivers.

Occupying about 104 sq miles (270 sq km), the park is a favorite among birders. The blue-banded kingfisher, wattled pheasant, blue-headed pitta, and the Bornean wren-babbler can be spotted here. Sightings of monkeys are also common.

The highest hill is the 4,268 ft (1,300 m) high Gunung Magdalena. A lower peak, Bombalai Hill, just 1,739 ft (530 m) high, is an extinct volcano that can be reached following a half-hour trail from the park headquarters. A 3-hour trek leads to some hot springs and Table Waterfall, where the crystal clear river makes for a good swimming spot.

Being so close to a big town, this park is very popular and gets crowded during weekends, making a mid-week visit advisable.

A PORTRAIT OF SINGAPORE

The small city-state of Singapore is bustling, cosmopolitan, trendy, modern, and plays a part on the world's financial and political stage that seems disproportionate to its size. Its varied traditions and intriguing mix of the old and new (in its people and way of life) make Singapore a great multicultural city in the truest sense.

Located at the tip of the Malay Peninsula on the Strait of Malacca, Singapore consists of one large island encircled by several smaller islets. Gleaming high-rise buildings and a fascinating diversity of foliage are crammed into a tiny area of just 269 sq m (697 sq km), some of it reclaimed land. Humidity and heavy downpours define its climate; showers are so sudden that the umbrella is a regular accessory.

When Sir Stamford Raffles of the British East India Company landed on its shores in 1819, Singapore was little more than a nondescript fishing village. However, the town soon went on to become a British stronghold. After gaining independence from the British, Singapore was incorporated into the Federation of Malaysia in 1963, and went on to become a wholly independent nation in 1965.

GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

Singapore is a democratic republic that follows the British parliamentary system, with a government led by a prime minister. Political affairs have long been dominated by the People's Action Party, which was led by statesman Lee

Pink orchid Vanda Miss Joaquim, the national flower of Singapore

Kuan Yew from its inception in the 1960s right up to the 1990s. Even with the presence of an active opposition, a one-party system has prevailed on the whole. While critics deem it autocratic, the party is seen as having been instrumental in helping Singapore become the super-developed, modern nation that it is today.

Singaporeans give credit to Lee Kuan Yew who has enjoyed unrivaled popularity as a nation builder.

THE ECONOMY

Singapore has a highly successful and transparent economy. Despite accusations of the government having too many stakes in the market, the economy is believed to be among the most powerful in the world, chiefly because of government efficiency, the exceptional infrastructure, minimal corruption, and a skilled workforce.

Towering skyscrapers dominate Singapore's skyline

Singapore's economy thrives on the electronics and chemical sectors, as well as business and financial services. Due to its strategic location linking the mainland and the islands of Southeast Asia with the rest of the world, Singapore has the busiest port in the region. Canned food, biotechnology, rubber processing, and, lately, tourism have emerged as other key revenue generating industries.

PEOPLES, LANGUAGES, AND RELIGIONS

Singapore is a country of immigrants, with a multiracial ethnicity comprising mainly 77 percent Chinese, 14 percent Malay, and 7.6 percent Indians, with a small number of Western expatriates. Ethnic neighborhoods, the norm in the 19th century, have given way to government-provided public housing. Old enclaves that have been left behind are now used only for shopping or entertainment that is unique to that particular community. The cultural heritage of the British colonialists is also deeply woven into the Singaporean lifestyle.

Malay, Chinese, English, and Tamil are all official languages in Singapore. The unique "Singlish" – a patois that combines English with Malay and Chinese words and intonation – is understood by most resident Singaporeans but rarely by visitors.

Except for certain radical groups that are banned, religion is freely practiced. Mahayana Buddhism is the most common, followed by Islam, Christianity, and Hinduism. Since the racial riots of the 1960s, society has been considerably harmonized, with the government making every possible effort to keep it so.

CULTURE AND THE ARTS

The arts flourish in this diverse city. Chinese opera and drama, Western classical music, Indian classical dance forms, and English theater are all part of local culture, and several theater and dance ensembles keep Malay culture alive. However, government censorship is rigid; each performance needs a seal of approval before being shown to the public. A plethora of museums, festivals, and religious places complement the visual arts.

Food is an integral part of Singaporean culture, and eating out is considered the best way of socializing. Although Chinese, Indian, and Malay flavors dominate, international cuisine ranging from African to Eastern European is also widely available. Being a food haven has added to the popularity of this gateway between the East and the West, and it remains as alluring today as it was centuries ago.

SINGAPORE THROUGH THE YEAR

Singapore's multicultural heritage has resulted in a calendar studded with holidays and vibrant festivals, both secular and religious. Many of the religious festivals are based on the lunar calendar (see p333), so their dates vary annually. Check with the Singapore Tourism Board for exact timings. While some festivities, such as Chinese New Year and Hari Raya Puasa, are celebrated with pomp and pageantry all over the island, others are quieter local market and temple affairs. Visitors are welcome in temples and mosques as long as customs are respected. Other cultural events such as the Singapore Arts Festival further add to the year's festivities.

Paying respect to elders on Hari Raya Puasa

JANUARY TO MARCH

Ponggal (Jan/Feb). A Tamil (south Indian) harvest festival celebrated at temples such as the Sri Srinivasa Perumal Temple (see pp230-31). Rice is cooked in new pots and allowed to boil over to symbolize prosperity. It is then offered to the gods as thanksgiving.

Thaipusam (Jan/Feb). A Hindu festival of penance in honor of Lord Murugan. Male devotees carry kavadis, or steel arches, anchored to their skin with hooks, in a long colorful procession from the Sri Srinivasa Perumal Temple to the Chettiar Temple (see p217).

Chinese New Year (Jan/Feb). This vibrant Chinese festival is a two-week celebration culminating with Chap Goh Mei, marked by a final dinner and prayers. Chinatown is ablaze with lights and packed with shoppers.

dancers, floats, and other multicultural performers travels down Orchard Road.

Qing Ming Festival (Mar/Apr). Chinese families visit temples and ancestral graves to clean and restore them. Red candles and joss sticks are lit and offerings of rice, wine, and flowers are made.

APRIL TO JUNE

Vesak day (May/Jun). Buddhists commemorate the birth, enlightenment, and death, of the Buddha on this day. Monks chant prayers at packed Buddhist temples and caged birds are set free to symbolize kindness. In the evening, candlelit processions set out from the temples.

Thian Hock Keng Temple (see pp222-3) is a good place to see celebrations.

Singapore Arts Festival (May/Jun). Organized by the National Arts Council, this premier arts festival has a captivating program of local, regional, and international art, drama, dance, and music.

Dragon Boat Festival and Boat Race (Jun). This festival commemorates the death of the 4th-century Chinese poet Qu Yuan, who drowned himself in protest against political corruption. It is said that people searched for him in boats, beating drums and throwing rice dumplings into the water to distract the fish from attacking his body. Today, international teams compete in dragon-shaped boats to honor this event. Drums are still beaten and rice dumplings wrapped in bamboo leaves are the festival's traditional snack.

JULY TO SEPTEMBER

Great Singapore Sale (May/Jun). Shops throughout the island hold sales during this period – the discounts can be extremely enticing (see p247).

National Day (Aug 9). Singapore's Independence Day is celebrated with a spectacular show at the Padang. The highlights include military parades, an airforce flypast, and cultural performances, with a laser and fireworks display as a final flourish.

Festival of the Hungry Ghosts (Aug/Sep). The Chinese believe that during the seventh lunar month, souls of the dead return to earth to feast. Joss sticks, red candles, and paper money are burnt, and lavish feasts and dramatic Chinese street operas, wayang (see p254), are held to appease the spirits.

Mid-Autumn Festival (Aug/Sep). The full moon on the 15th day of the eighth month in the Chinese calendar is celebrated with mooncakes and lanterns. Traditionally a thanksgiving for a bountiful harvest, the festival also commemorates a 14th-century Chinese patriot who is said to have hidden notes to his companions in mooncakes while trying to overthrow the Yuan Dynasty.

Mooncakes, pastries filled with lotus seeds or red bean paste, and sometimes a duck egg, are sold in hotels and in Chinatown, and children parade with brightly-colored lanterns. A lantern display and competition are held at the Chinese Garden.

OCTOBER TO DECEMBER

Hari Raya Puasa (variable). A day of celebration for the Muslim community to mark the end of Ramadan, the Muslim holy month. Areas such as Sultan Mosque and Arab Street (see p228) come alive with festivities.

Offerings at the family altar during Deepavali

Lantern competition at the Chinese Garden during Mid-Autumn Festival

Deepavali (Oct/Nov). The Hindu festival of lights marks Lord Krishna's victory over Narakasura – a triumph of good over evil. Homes and temples are decorated with oil lamps to attract Lakshmi, the goddess of prosperity, and Little India dazzles with lights and decorations. The precise date is established each year according to the Indian almanacs.

Thimithi Festival (Oct/Nov). A festival procession begins at the Sri Srinivasa Perumal Temple and makes its way to the Sri Mariamman Temple (see p218) where devotees prove the strength of their faith by walking barefoot across a stretch of burning hot coals.

Festival of the Nine Emperor Gods (Oct/Nov). A nine-day festival in honor of the Nine Emperor Gods, thought to bring good luck and longevity, is celebrated at Kiu Ong Yiah Temple on Upper Serangoon Road. Prayers, feasts, and Chinese opera performances are followed by a procession of the nine gods seated on elaborate chairs, led by temple mediums with swords and whips.

During this festival, many devotees also make a pilgrimage to the temple of Tua Pek Kong on Kusu Island (Turtle Island).

Christmas (25 Dec). From November onwards, Orchard Road is transformed into a stunning stretch of fairy lights and Christmas decorations. Shops and hotels join in the festivities. Christmas is celebrated in the traditional way, with late-night mass, carols, and presents.

Hari Raya Haji (variable). A festival in honor of those Muslims who have made the pilgrimage to Mecca. It is marked by animal sacrifices and prayers at mosques.

SINGAPORE AT A GLANCE

While most of Singapore's attractions lie at the heart of the city, south of the island, its compactness and efficient infrastructure make it easy to visit the outer reaches. The north, west, and east are studded with older suburbs, nature reserves, and historic sites. Despite being a model modern metropolis with skyscrapers, glitzy shopping malls, museums, and contemporary entertainment, a traditional Singapore survives beneath its glossy exterior. At its core is a multicultural heritage, revealed in the timeless elegance of colonial architecture, Chinatown's shophouses, and the uniquely juxtaposed temples, mosques, and churches.

The Singapore River winds through the heart of the main city and has long been the hub of its life and commerce. Flanked by the towering skyscrapers of the financial district on the southern bank and the stately colonial buildings on the northern bank, the river is lined with leafy walkways, shops, and eateries. River cruises depart from several piers along the bank.

THE COLONIAL CORE AND CHINATOWN

Sir Stamford Raffles' city plan of 1822 designated the south of the river as the commercial district, and reserved the north for administrative offices. This northern area is known today as the Colonial Core. It is the heart of downtown Singapore and is dotted with historical landmarks. The Padang and Fort Canning Park are focal points of this area and have witnessed major events in Singapore's history. To the south of the river lies the flourishing Central Business District, also known as the Golden Shoe due to its shoe-shaped district boundary. Adjoining the business district lies Chinatown. As trading houses grew along the south bank in the 19th century, coolies and Chinese merchants settled in the area and Raffles officially allocated it to the community. It is characterized by distinctive shophouses, temples, and markets.

Street-by-Street: Around the Padang

The heart of Singapore's colonial district is the Padang, or square, which was once used by the 19th-century colonials as a site for big sporting events as well as National Day parades. Sporting activities from cricket and field hockey to soccer and rugby still take place here on a weekly basis. The square is flanked by grand structures such as the domed Supreme Court, the Neo-Classical City Hall, the Parliament House, and the exclusive Singapore Cricket Club. Also of interest here is Esplanade Park, which lies on the eastern side of the Padang. One of the oldest parks in Singapore, it is home to many historical landmarks.

Home to over 1,600 artifacts that trace the history of the varied cultures and civilizations of Asia, the second wing of the Asian Civilizations Museum is housed in the Empress Place Building. Named in honor of Queen Victoria and completed in 1867, the Palladian structure was built by convicts and first functioned as a courthouse. Over the years, the building housed many colonial administrative departments.

Today, this Neo-Classical structure showcases a wealth of exhibits in 11 themed galleries and four ACE (Asian Civilizations Education) Zones: South Asia, West Asia/Islam, Southeast Asia, and China. There is also a fascinating Singapore River Interpretive Gallery where the story of generations of immigrants who settled and worked on the banks of the Singapore River is told using old photographs.

Running along Connaught Drive from the underpass at Anderson Bridge to Stamford Road, Esplanade Park was one of the most popular outdoor spots for both the European and Asian communities during the colonial era.

The park contains Queen Elizabeth Walk and several landmarks, including the Cenotaph, which commemorates those who lost their lives during the two World Wars; the Lim Bo Seng was the center of controversy when Esplanade – Theaters on the Bay was built, sparking debate over the radical architecture of the new building. Located on the waterfront, the huge, spiked shells of the complex contain a plethora of performing arts venues, including a concert hall, theater, outdoor theater, and recital studio, as well as gallery space, a performing arts library, and a shopping mall.

In 2002, the park

A splendid example of colonial architecture, Victoria Theater was built in 1862 by the British to showcase amateur dramatic productions and Gilbert and Sullivan operettas. The Victoria Memorial Hall was added in 1905 to celebrate Queen Victoria's jubilee. The Memorial Hall was renamed Victoria Concert Hall in 1980 when it became home to the Singapore Symphony Orchestra (see p254).

Over the years, the hall has been put to a variety of uses. During World War II, it was converted into a hospital. Its clock tower was set to Tokyo time when Japan occupied the island, and after the Japanese surrender, it was here that the war crimes tribunals were held.

The two buildings are the venue for a range of concerts, performances, and multi-cultural extravaganzas (see pp252–5). Details of events held here are posted on the billboards, and tickets can be obtained at the box office or at outlets in Singapore's main shopping areas.

Singapore's oldest surviving government building, the Old Parliament House was originally built as the residence of Scottish merchant John Argyle Maxwell in the late 1820s. It was designed in Neo-Palladian style by G.D. Coleman, an architect who was to shape much of Singapore's urban landscape.

Maxwell leased it to the government for use as a courthouse. In the 1950s, it became the colonial government's Assembly House, and, in 1962, the Parliament House of the independent state. The bronze elephant outside the building was a gift from the Thai monarch, Rama V, after his 1871 visit to Singapore.

A new Parliament House was built nearby in 1999. In 2004, after careful restoration, the old building was converted into The Arts House, an elegant arts and heritage space. The center offers a range of contemporary visual and performance arts, art house movies, and improvisational theater.

Although an Anglican church, St. Andrew's was named for the patron saint of Scotland in recognition of the Scottish merchants who contributed funds to build it. The gleaming cathedral of today is actually the second ecclesiastical building to be built on this site. The first church, designed and built by G.D. Coleman in the late 1830s, was declared unsafe and closed in 1852 following two lightning strikes. In 1862, it was replaced by the present-day cathedral. Designed by Colonel MacPherson in Early Gothic style and built using convict labor from India, its lancet windows, turret-like pinnacles, and decorated spire are reminiscent of England's Salisbury Cathedral. The exterior was coated with chunam plaster, a mixture of eggwhite, shell, lime, sugar, coconut husk, and water, which was molded into the ornate façade and polished to a smooth finish.

Within the church are brass plaques dedicated to families of past congregations, and memorials to soldiers who lost their lives in the Sepoy Mutiny of 1915 and in the two World Wars.

Raffles Institution, a school founded by Sir Stamford Raffles and built in 1835 by G.D. Coleman, was demolished in 1984 to make way for Raffles City, a huge complex comprising a shopping mall, high-rise offices, and two hotels – Raffles the Plaza and Swissôtel the Stamford, which was the world's tallest hotel when it was completed in 1985. Perched atop the Stamford are lavish bars and restaurants, including The Equinox on Level 69, which offers stunning panoramic views of the city and parts of Malaysia.

Popularly dubbed the Tin Can for its metallic appearance, Raffles City was designed by I.M. Pei, the Chinese-American architect who is famous for his designs of the glass pyramid in front of the Louvre in Paris and Bank of China skyscraper in Hong Kong. Four levels of stores at the complex offer everything from electronics and premier labels such as Mont Blanc and Armani Exchange to cafés and specialty stalls selling Thai silk and Chinese handicrafts. There is also a shop of New York City's Metropolitan Museum of Art. To the east of Raffles City stand the four dignified 229-ft (70-m) high white columns of the Civilian War Memorial.

Chijmes (pronounced “chimes”), an elegant walled complex of shops, restaurants, bars, and gallery spaces, was once the Convent of the Holy Infant Jesus. Founded by a French Jesuit priest in 1854 and run by nuns, the convent functioned as a school and a women's refuge, as well as a home for babies who were abandoned at its gates. In 1983, when the convent was relocated to the suburbs, the buildings, including a school, a chapel, and a private residence, were redeveloped into what is now one of Singapore's most beautiful public spaces.

Quiet courtyards, cobbled paths, fountains, and covered Italianate walkways encircle shops that sell arts and crafts from China, the Philippines, Thailand, Malaysia, and India, as well as restaurants that serve everything from sushi to tapas.

The most striking building in the complex is the former chapel, designed in Neo-Gothic style by Jesuit priest Father Nain. Most of this historic building has been restored, including the beautiful 19th-century stained-glass windows. The chapel's lofty columns are decorated with intricate plasterwork and it is capped with a magnificent spire. It is now Chijmes Hall, a venue for art exhibitions, recitals, and weddings.

A bronze statue of two schoolboys with 17th-century saint John Baptiste de la Salle stands above the porch of the Singapore Art Museum, a reminder that until 1987 this was St. Joseph's Institution, a Catholic boys' school.

Today, the building is a showcase for contemporary Asian art. Since the museum's opening in January 1996, its permanent collection has grown from under 2,000 works of art to over 7,000 pieces, making it one of the world's largest public collections of modern and contemporary Southeast Asian art. The core of the museum's art, which includes sculptures, installations, and paintings, is richly supplemented by a regular roster of local and international traveling exhibitions, featuring 20th-century art from American and European compilations. Works from the museum's own collection are loaned out to international exhibitions.

Usually only a selection of works are on display at any given time. There are works by artists such as Georgette Chen, Liu Kang, Chen Chong Swee, Lim Tze Peng, and Huang Yao from Singapore, and those by regional artists such as Wong Hoy Cheong from Malaysia, Affandi from Indonesia, and Bui Xian Phai and Tran Trong Vu from Vietnam.

The old Classical-style building has been restored and skillfully converted for use as a museum. The former school chapel is used as an auditorium. While the chapel's original character has been retained, its central window has been replaced by a modern stained-glass work by Filipino artist Ramon Orlina. The building's two courtyards are used as exhibition spaces, arranged on either side of the Glass Hall, which is a glass-enclosed converted veranda decorated with blown-glass installations by American artist Dale Chihuly. The old classrooms are now galleries. The state-of-the-art E-mage Multimedia Gallery provides information on the history and techniques of contemporary Southeast Asian art. The museum also has a library and a shop which sells souvenirs showcasing the works of renowned artists.

The Dome Café, ensconced in one of the naves of the museum, serves excellent sandwiches, cakes, and coffee drinks. There is also the Venezia restaurant, which serves excellent fusion cuisine and offers set dinners. A trendy alfresco wine bar adds to the pleasant ambience.

Singapore's oldest Catholic place of worship, this cathedral was built between 1843 and 1847. It was administered by French missionary Father Jean-Marie Beurel, who also established the Convent of the Holy Infant Jesus and St. Joseph's Institution. Designed by noted colonial architect D.L. McSwiney in a Latin-cross pattern, the church combines a Renaissance-style exterior with Doric columns, Palladian porches, and a beautifully crafted timber ceiling. The octagonal steeple was a later addition by Charles Dyce.

The church, which was accorded cathedral status in 1897, served as an emergency hospital during World War II, and was listed as a national monument in 1973.

Three interesting buildings stand within the church compound. The Archbishop's House, a 19th-century double-story bungalow with a projecting portico, casement windows, and enclosed verandas, is a simple structure in contrast to the cathedral. The Resident's Quarters, a U-shaped single-story building with Doric columns, and the Priest's House are more ornate and decorated with elaborate plasterwork.

Raffles Hotel ⑧

Singapore Sling

A legendary hotel and a national monument, Raffles, which opened in 1887, is a tranquil haven of white, veranda-enclosed, colonial-style buildings with terra-cotta tiled, pitched roofs. It was once the venue for grand colonial balls and dances, and its guest list boasted such names as Noel Coward, Somerset Maugham, Rudyard Kipling, Joseph Conrad, Charlie Chaplin, and Michael Jackson. The cool, calm refuges of its courtyards, gardens, and covered walkways can still be enjoyed by residents and visitors alike.

Housed in a Neo-Palladian structure and crowned with a stunning stained-glass dome, the island's oldest museum opened in 1887. Known as the Raffles Museum and Library, it was famed for its remarkable collections of natural history, ethnology, and archaeology.

Following Singapore's independence in 1965, the museum was renamed the National Museum to reflect its new role and altered its focus to exhibitions that concentrated on the history and peoples of Singapore. The museum has a permanent collection and various exhibitions on a range of subjects from Chinese secret societies to botany, but the highlights of the museum are the 11 artifacts that have collectively been christened the "Treasures of the National Museum." Among these rare pieces are 14th-century east Javanese-style gold ornaments excavated at Fort Canning, the 20th-century Xin Sai Le Puppet Stage, and William Farquhar's collection of 477 natural history drawings. Other exhibits include a Peranakan house exhibit, a Children's Discovery

Gallery, and a History of Singapore Gallery, which displays a series of 20 model dioramas.

This museum was originally the Tao Nan School, established in 1910 by three Chinese philanthropists for the education of boys from the Hokkien region of China. In 1997, this Neo-Classical building was opened as the first wing of the Asian Civilizations Museum. Having undergone a recent overhaul, it is now a Peranakan-themed museum representing a pan-Southeast Asia perspective of Peranakan culture with a focus on its main centers, which include Singapore, Malacca, and Penang.

The museum explores the history and ethnology of the culture of these regions and also provides an interesting glimpse into their heritage, including language and religious customs. Exhibits include silver artifacts, porcelain, jewelry, and textiles.

The Armenian Church of St. Gregory the Illuminator was the first permanent place of Christian worship in Singapore. The church was built in 1835 and the spire was added later, in 1850. It was able to seat a congregation of only 50 people, a reflection of the minority status of the local Armenian community then.

Designed by G.D. Coleman, the architect responsible for other landmarks of early Singapore such as St. Andrew's Cathedral (see p211), the church is an elegant example of tropical Neo-Classical architecture. The interior contains a photograph of the Armenian community from around 1917, as well as portraits of the patriarchs of the Armenian Church. In the church's compound is the grave of Agnes Joaquim, who discovered an orchid hybrid in 1893. The flower was later named Vanda Miss Joaquim for her and adopted as Singapore's national flower (see p198).

Once the seat of Temasek, a 14th-century Malay kingdom (see p34), Fort Canning Park is now a verdant, tranquil oasis in the heart of the city. Because of the lovely view the site commands, Raffles built his bungalow here, and until the mid-19th century, it was home to Singapore's governors. The park was also the first site of Raffles' botanical garden.

In 1860, Fort Canning was built here; only the fort gate still stands. Nearby is the Fort Canning Center, formerly a barracks that now serves as a performance space and gallery. Another historic landmark is the Battle Box, a World War II bunker containing a museum that uses animatronics to recreate the 1942 surrender of the city to the Japanese. Also worth a visit is the ASEAN (Association of Southeast Asian Nations) sculpture park.

Built in 1984, this Shaivite Hindu temple replaced a much older one, founded in 1860 by wealthy Indian Chettiars (moneylenders). Dedicated to Lord Subramaniam (also known as Murugan), the colorful temple is believed to be one of the wealthiest and grandest in Singapore.

Craftsmen from southern India were specially brought in to create the temple's distinctive architectural features, which include a striking five-tiered gopuram, or entrance archway, massive patterned rosewood doors, and columns and prayer halls richly decorated with sculptures of

Hindu deities. The ceiling has 48 etched-glass panels of gods that are angled to catch the rising and setting sun. Another feature, a rarity for Hindu temples, is the presence of a thoonganai maadam, a representation of the rear of an elephant at rest. The dominance of the temple's main deity is apparent throughout the temple, with Lord Murugan represented in six of his holy abodes. Inside the temple are two connected rooms, the mandapam and the antarala, through which worshippers move to perform their devotions. The antarala leads to the innermost sanctum, the garbhagraba, which only priests may enter.

The Chettiar Temple plays an important role in the life of Hindu Shaivites as it is the culmination point of a spectacular procession that begins at Sri Srinivasa Perumal Temple (see pp230–31) during the annual Thaipusam festival, which occurs between January and February and honors Lord Murugan (see p200).

Named for Sir Andrew Clarke, the second governor of Singapore, Clarke Quay is an upscale area along the banks of the Singapore River with waterfront shops and eateries. Lying near the mouth of the Singapore River, the site of Clarke Quay was a commercial hub during the late-19th century, containing warehouses run by Chinese traders. It was redeveloped in the early-1990s into an entertainment precinct offering restaurants, wine bars, retail stores, craft stalls, street performers, and cruises in authentic bumboats (boats that bring provisions and commodities to ships at port). While it is relatively quiet during the day, Clarke Quay offers a lively atmosphere at night.

The southern end of South Bridge Road is dominated by the gopuram, or entrance gateway, of the Sri Mariamman Temple, vividly decorated with about 72 Hindu deities. The complex is encircled by a boundary wall topped with figures of sacred cows.

The oldest Hindu place of worship on the island, Sri Mariamman dates back to 1827 when the first temple, a simple wood and attap, or thatched-roof, was built on this site. The land belonged to an Indian merchant, Narain Pillai, who arrived in Singapore on the same ship as Sir Stamford Raffles. It was replaced by the present structure in 1843. The temple has been repaired several times over the years. In its early days, the temple gave shelter to new immigrants and also served as a social center for the community.

Although many of the splendid friezes and statues depict the Hindu divine trinity of Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva, as well as other Hindu deities, the temple is dedicated to the goddess Sri Mariamman (an incarnation of Shiva's wife Parvati), known for her power to cure disease. The temple is famous for the annual Thimithi festival (see p201) in autumn, during which devotees walk on hot coals as a sign of faith.

The area bounded by Mosque, Pagoda, Temple, Terengganu, and Smith Streets is the place that Sir Stamford Raffles had first earmarked for the Chinese community. It grew into the hub of Chinese life and culture, with streets that were lined with temples, traditional craft stores, kongsis, or clan houses, restaurants, and shophouses, shuttered buildings where the ground floor was occupied by a shop while families lived on the upper floor. Some shophouses contained opium dens and brothels, giving the area a somewhat colorful reputation.

Sensitive restoration has meant that much of the original character of these shophouses has been retained. Many are painted in bright, contemporary colors. While escalating rents have driven out some of the traditional businesses, the area still features a variety of shops selling souvenirs, antiques, porcelain, and clothing. There are also several pleasant restaurants and cafés. The surrounding housing blocks also offer an authentic flavor of the old Chinatown. These streets come alive during Chinese New Year, with festivities, vibrant decorations, and food and gift stalls.

On the corner of Terengganu Street and Sago Street, the Chinatown Complex houses one of the most boisterous wet markets in the city, where a bewildering variety of fresh produce is on sale, including fruit, vegetables, and seafood. The most startling meat and fish, including freshly skinned frogs, is on sale in the mornings. Above the wet market are stalls offering silk sarongs, jade jewelry, DVDs, and more.

Next door is Sago Street, named for its factories that once produced sago, starchy granules obtained from palm. The street was also infamous for its “Death Houses,” hospices where the terminally ill came to die. Today, rattan mat-makers and paper kite sellers operate here.

shophouses, especially along the impressive sweep of Tanjong Pagar Road and around Duxton Road. One of the first of the old neighborhoods to be renovated, Tanjong Pagar is now home to many lively restaurants, bars, and hotels including the beautiful Berjaya Duxton Hotel (see p288).

At the corner of Neil Road and Tanjong Pagar Road is the former Jinrickshaw Station, built in 1903. Jinrickshaws were first imported from Shanghai in the 1880s. By 1919 there were about 9,000 rickshaws and 20,000 rickshaw-pullers. The rickshaws were phased out by legislation after World War II and soon disappeared from the streets of Singapore.

A highlight of Tanjong Pagar is a visit to one of the traditional tea houses on Neil Road, where visitors can take part in the rituals of tea-drinking.

SHOPHOUSE STYLES

The shophouse is a memorable feature of Singapore’s local architecture. Five styles, roughly chronological, have been identified – the Early, First Transitional, Late, Second Transitional, and Art Deco styles.

The Early Style (1840–1900) shophouse is a squat, two-story building. The windows and façade are plain.

The First Transitional Style (early 1900s) shophouse is three stories high, such as this unit at Telok Ayer Street.

The Late Style (1900–1940) shophouse is flamboyantly ornamented with eclectic styles, as seen in this unit (No. 21) on Bukit Pasoh Road.

The Second Transitional Style (late 1930s) shophouse, such as this unit (No. 10) on Stanley Street, is much simpler and less ornate.

The Art Deco Style (1930–1960) shophouse is typified by classical geometric motifs, as illustrated by this unit (No. 30) located on Bukit Pasoh Road.

Once a clove and nutmeg plantation, Ann Siang Hill and its neighboring streets are today a hub of Chinese life and activity. The gently curving street, flanked by shophouses, makes for an interesting walking tour. Some of the shophouses feature pintu pagar, or half doors, reflecting Malay influence. Club Street nearby is noted for its dining and upmarket boutiques. It is also famous for its temple-carving shops and the clan associations and guilds that gave the street its name. Some, such as the Victorian Chinese Weekly Entertainment Club, still survive on the hill, their walls plastered with photographs of former members. Also striking are house numbers 33 and 35, designed by architect Frank Brewer, famed for his skilled plasterwork.

Originally located on the seafront before modern land reclamation, Telok Ayer Street, which means water bay in Malay, retains much of the feel of 19th-century Singapore. On the street are a number of traditional businesses, as well as temples and mosques where early immigrants gave thanks for their safe passage. One of the most famous is the Hokkien Thian Hock Keng Temple (see pp222–3), the city's oldest Chinese temple. The neighboring Al Abrar Mosque was built between 1850 and 1855 by Indian Muslims, who also built the nearby Nagore Durgha in the 1820s, a blend of Classical architecture and Indian-Islamic details such as arches and perforated grills. All three are national monuments. Farther down the street is the Fuk Tak Ch'i

Museum, standing on the site of the Hock Teck Ch'i Temple. Among its display of Chinese artifacts is a diorama depicting Telok Ayer Street as it would have been in the 1850s. Far East Square, on Amoy Street, offers a variety of shops and restaurants housed in renovated shophouses.

Singapore's first municipal market, Telok Ayer Market, now renamed Lau Pa Sat, is an architecturally impressive food court offering an extensive variety of Asian cuisines and is a favorite lunch venue for locals. Originally commissioned by Raffles in 1822 on reclaimed land, the elegant octagonal cast-iron structure was designed by James MacRitchie and shipped over from a Glasgow foundry in 1894. It was declared a national monument in 1973. The market was dismantled during MRT tunnel construction and was later painstakingly reassembled. The adjacent Boon Tat Street is closed off to traffic in the evenings for traditional hawker stalls to set up shop.

Nowhere is Singapore's transition from a colonial backwater to a cutting edge, booming economy more apparent than in the gleaming skyscrapers of Raffles Place. This is the heart of the city's financial world, packed with well-known multinational corporations and financial institutions. Among the first banks to open here were the Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank and Standard Chartered Bank. The three tallest buildings in Singapore are located here – UOB Plaza, OUB Center, both designed by renowned Japanese architect Kenzo Tange, and Republic Plaza. All the buildings are 920 ft (280 m) high. The Bank of China building is one of Southeast Asia's earliest skyscrapers.

Dotted around the area are installations of modern sculpture, including Salvador Dali's Homage to Newton (1985) and Fernando Botero's Bird (1990). The Merlion statue, symbol of the city, is also located nearby.

CONRAD'S LORD JIM

Born to Polish parents in what is now Ukraine, Teodor Josef Konrad Korzeniowski sailed to many places, including the Malay states, between 1874 and 1894, becoming a mariner and a British subject in 1886. Joseph Conrad is perhaps the most celebrated English writer on late 19th-century Southeast Asia, and Singapore figures prominently in his works, especially in the novel Lord Jim. It was in this region that he heard of an English merchant navy officer, Austin Podmore Williams, who earned lasting disgrace by abandoning the steamer Jeddab, along with 953 Muslim pilgrims, in the Red Sea in 1880, dooming himself to a life of exile. He became the tragic model for Conrad's Lord Jim.

A thriving strip of restored shophouses converted into restaurants, shops, and bars, Boat Quay today is very different from the riverfront area of a century ago. The center of the city's commercial activities in the 1860s, most of its trading was handled from here.

Shophouses crowded the curve of the south bank, the shape of which was thought to resemble the belly of a carp, an indicator of prosperity according to Chinese belief. The river teemed with bumboats, which were used to load and unload ships anchored on the river. By the 1960s, however, technological advances had changed the face of the shipping industry. New, high-tech container ports opened up farther up the river, claiming Boat Quay's role in the river's trade. Trading houses moved out and the area slowly declined. The government embarked upon a river-cleaning program which cleared out all the bumboats and the barges, leaving Boat Quay a desolate region.

In 1986, the government started restoring the area as part of a conservation project, renovating the old shophouses and godowns (warehouses) and revitalizing the riverfront area by pedestrianizing it. Today, there are plenty of little shops and restaurants with enchanting views of the river. A taxi service also plies between Boat Quay and Clarke Quay.

Thian Hock Keng Temple 26

Carving of a gilded Buddha on the temple's roof

Built in 1839, Thian Hock Keng Temple is the oldest Chinese temple in Singapore. Constructed by Hokkien sailors on the site of a joss house, it was the most important center of worship for immigrants from their community. It was also where seafarers gave thanks for a safe passage to Singapore. Construction was paid for by individual donors, the main one being Hokkien leader Tan Tock Seng (1798–1850). The temple itself is laid out along a traditional north-south axis and has shrines dedicated to several deities. Today, people of all ages come to this temple to give their thanks to Ma Zhu Po, the goddess of the sea.

★ Roof Decorations

On the temple's roof ridge stand twin dragons that embody the principles of yin and yang. Between them is the "night-shining pearl," a glass globe that represents the sun.

Rear Hall

Dedicated to the moon goddess, Yue Gong Niang Niang, Rear Hall houses a shrine to the goddess. She is worshiped alongside Kuan Yin, the goddess of mercy. The sun god, Ri Gong Tai Zi, is also worshiped here.

★ Secondary Shrines

LITTLE INDIA AND ORCHARD ROAD

Originally occupied by Europeans and Eurasians, Little India was settled by the Indians when they set up brick-kilns and cattle yards in the latter half of the 19th century. Packed with lively restaurants, shops, and ornate temples, the area is a heady mix of sights, scents, and sounds. With colonial architecture and a Middle Eastern ambience, Kampong Glam provides some of the best insights into Singapore's Malay community. Arab traders were the earliest settlers, joining Buginese, Boyanese, and Javanese arrivals, to create a Muslim enclave. The ethnic area of Little India is the spiritual heart and commercial center of the local Indian community. Orchard Road lies to the north-west of the Colonial Core. In the 1840s it was a dirt road, lined with orchards and nutmeg plantations, but today it constitutes Singapore's most famous shopping district. Lavish hotels, cafés, pubs, and shopping malls with a tempting array of luxury brands are located here.

Stone guardian at Ngee Ann City

Street-by-Street: Kampong Glam

Kampong Glam is the focal point of Muslim life in Singapore. Its name is derived from the Malay words kampung, or village, and gelam, a tree that once grew abundantly in the area. In 1819, the area was given to Sultan Hussein Shah as part of a treaty by which Singapore was ceded to the British. The Sultan built his palace, the Istana Kampong Glam, and the stunning Sultan Mosque here and soon the area was filled with Muslims from diverse ethnic backgrounds. This early impact is reflected in the distinct Islamic flavor of its street names, shops, buildings, and restaurants. Arab Street is a major draw, with its intricate textiles, fine leather, and caneware. Good Malay food stalls can be found on Kandahar Street.

It was replaced a century later by the present structure, designed by Irish architect Denis Santry. Arabesque in style with Moorish overtones, golden domes, balustrades, and arches, as well as a minaret at each corner, Singapore's largest mosque accommodates 5,000 worshippers in its main hall. Visitors are welcome in the lobby except during Friday prayers.

Istana Kampong Glam was the official royal residence of Sultan Hussein Shah who ceded the sovereign rights of Singapore to the British. As part of this historic agreement, the Sultan built a wooden palace in 1820 and named the area Kota Raja, or the King's Enclave. In 1840, his son, Sultan Ali Iskandar Shah, the last Sultan of Singapore, built the present palace. The Istana presides over extensive grounds. Several smaller Malay village-style houses were built within the walled compound. These housed the Sultan's large entourage which included his family of hundreds of relatives and servants. Also on the premises was the Kota Rajah Club, a sports club founded by one of the descendants of the Sultan, where young men of good breeding could enjoy recreational activities such as badminton.

According to the provisions of the 1904 Sultan Hussein Ordinance, enacted by the British Government, the Sultan's descendants were entitled to live in the palace and receive an annual government stipend. Over the years, however, disputes and dwindling fortunes led the palace to gradually fall in ruins.

The Istana Kampong Glam has now been reclaimed by the government, which has compensated the Sultan's descendants for their displacement. The palace has been transformed into the Malay Heritage Center, to celebrate Malay history, culture, and arts.

Located within the smallest of Singapore's ethnic quarters, this street acquired its name from the Arab merchants who settled here when they came to trade in the 19th-century. The vibrant colors of Arab Street are striking. It is a maze of shops that sell all manner of Middle Eastern and Islamic wares. Religious items such as prayer mats, holy beads, copies of the Koran, and skull caps jostle for space with excellent basketware, rattan, cane and straw work, leather products, jewelry, precious and semi-precious gems, and perfumes. Visitors should be prepared to bargain. The majestic Sultan Mosque looms over this pedestrianized tourist market strip.

Arab Street is most famous for its textile stores. Bales of colorful cotton, chiffon, organza, and silk cloth cram the shopfronts and spill onto the pavement. Batik from Indonesia and Malaysia, handmade or machine-printed with traditional designs, is typically sold in sarong lengths of 6 ft (2 m). Shops also sell readymade batik shorts, shirts, dresses, ties, and table linen. To complement the fabric sellers, specialist shops sell ostrich feathers, dazzling lamé in several shades, various types of sparkling sequins, and thread in a profusion of colors. Traditional Malay wedding outfits can also be found in shops on Arab Street.

and mother-of-pearl replica of what is believed to be the footprint of the Buddha. Beyond, a 50-ft (15-m) seated statue of the Buddha is illuminated by the colored electric lights that give the temple its popular name.

Another relic that draws devotees here is a branch believed to be from the bodhi, or peepul, tree under which the Buddha gained his enlightenment. In a chamber behind the Seated Buddha is a statue of the Reclining Buddha. About 25 scenes from the Buddha's life are portrayed on the base of the statue. The early Indian migrants to Singapore in the 19th century settled along the banks of the Rochor Canal. The area eventually became a trading and cattle-breeding center, evident from street names such as Kerbau Road, which means Buffalo Road in Malay. Over time, as more Indians arrived, Serangoon Road became the heart of “Little India,” the religious, cultural, and economic center for the local Indian community.

One of the oldest roads in Singapore, Serangoon Road is a kaleidoscope of quintessential Indian life. Vying for attention are elaborate Hindu temples and ornate shophouses. The shopkeepers hang mirrors above their doors to ward off evil influences and sell jewelry, textiles, and Bollywood movie soundtracks. The area is full of restaurants, such as the Komala Villas Restaurant for vegetarian food. The noise of fortune-telling parrots, street pedlars, and a heady aroma of spices and flowers fill the air.

This temple, built in 1881 by Bengali laborers, is dedicated to the Hindu goddess Kali, who epitomizes the struggle of good over evil and is the consort of Shiva, the god of destruction. The name of the temple means Kali the Courageous.

The main altar of the temple has a black statue of Kali with each of her many arms and legs holding a weapon. She is flanked by her two sons Ganesh, the elephant god, and Murugan, the child god riding a peacock. The temple is especially crowded on Tuesdays and Fridays, which are Hindu holy days when devotees throng the temple to worship.

Sri Srinivasa Perumal Temple 6

One of the most important religious buildings in Singapore, this Hindu temple is devoted to the worship of Lord Vishnu (also known as Perumal). It is also one of the oldest temples in Singapore. Built in 1854, the temple was originally a simple structure with a mandapam, or a prayer hall, and the area around the temple had many ponds and vegetable gardens. In 1966, when the temple was consecrated, a six-tiered gopuram, or entrance tower, was built, funded by one of the earliest Indian migrants, P. Govindasamy Pillai. The temple is the starting point of the annual Thaipusam festival parade.

This Hindu festival begins at dawn at the temple. Male devotees enter a trance-like state, carrying ornately decorated kavadis, or steel arches, attached by metal hooks to their torsos, with skewers pierced through their tongues and cheeks. Devotees take part in this act in penance for their sins and in honor of Lord Murugan, the god of bravery, power, beauty, and virtue. Women carry coconut milk pots, also fulfilling vows relating to penance. Accompanied by chanting and singing, they walk to Sri Thendayuthapani Temple on Tank Road, about 2 miles (3 km) away.

The area known as Dhoby Ghaut takes its name from the dhobies, or Indian laundrymen, who worked here many years ago, and ghaut, which means landing place in Hindi. Dhobies used to go door-to-door, collecting clothes from residents and recording the items in a book. They washed the clothes in the nearby stream, which ran down the side of Orchard Road, and dried them on land that is now occupied by the YMCA. This land was also once the site of detention and interrogation rooms used by the Japanese during World War II. Next to the YMCA is a white Presbyterian church established by Scottish settlers in 1877. It was once used as a supply base for Japanese civilians.

An upscale neighborhood of traditional residences, plush boutiques, and pricey eateries today, Peranakan Place and Emerald Hill were originally granted in 1845 to Englishman William Cuppage, an officer in the postal service. Emerald Hill was later acquired by the Peranakans (see p20). Between 1900 and 1930, 30 different owners built residential units along Emerald Hill Road resulting in a street lined with unique Peranakan architecture. Interesting features include the wooden pintu pagar, or half doors, often elaborately carved, across unconventional doorways. Also visible are richly colored ceramic tiles, shuttered windows, mirrors above doors to ward off evil spirits, and animal reliefs across brightly-painted façades to invite good luck. Toward Orchard Road, these typical terrace houses were converted into shophouses, with the first floors occupied by small provision stores, seamstresses, and dry-goods stores. Other roads on Emerald Hill that developed between 1900 and 1930 were Hullet Road and Saunders Road.

In 1984, the buildings on Peranakan Place were carefully restored to their former glory, making this area the only stretch of old shophouse architecture left on Orchard Road. Peranakan Place now comprises a group of modern air-conditioned shops with an eclectic mix of retailers offering Eastern and Western goods. A French café, Chinese barbecue shop, Mediterranean restaurant and wine cellar, and an outdoor pub and restaurant combine to offer a varied streetscape. Farther along, a row of shophouses at the pedestrianized Cuppage Terrace have become flourishing bars and interesting sidewalk cafés.

Originally the Teutonia Club for German expatriates in the early 1900s, the Goodwood Park Hotel was declared enemy property and seized by the government when World War I broke out in 1914. In 1929, the club was converted into a hotel.

Designed by J. Bidwell, the architect who also designed its famous rival, Raffles Hotel, Goodwood competed furiously for famous guests – Charlie Chaplin stayed at Raffles while Goodwood boasted the Duke of Windsor as a patron.

When World War II broke out, Goodwood was again seized, this time by the occupying Japanese forces. After the war, it was chosen to be the venue of a court dealing with war crimes.

Today, this landmark, the only colonial hotel apart from Raffles, has returned to its former incarnation. Its elegant corridors are lined with art and antique furniture and in 1989, the Tower Wing of the hotel, distinguished by its gable ends with ornamental plaster work, was selected as a national monument. The hotel has also grown from its original 60 rooms into a 234-room luxury retreat with a fantastic range of restaurants.

Set in refreshingly green and peaceful surroundings, the Singapore Zoo is one of the world's few open zoos, where animals roam freely in landscaped enclosures that simulate their habitats. Dry and wet moats camouflaged by waterfalls and vegetation separate the animals from visitors. While some animals, such as leopards, jaguars, and pumas still have to be kept in glass enclosures, others such as monkeys and peahens roam freely.

The zoo houses about 3,000 animals, representing 290 species. Several of them are rare such as the white (Bengal) tiger and clouded leopard, while others are endangered species such as the Komodo dragon and the Malayan tiger.

Major exhibits include Wild Africa with its white rhinos and magnificent lions, the Fragile Forest, which is a walk-through rain forest filled with butterflies, bats, and birds, and the Primate Kingdom featuring lion-tailed macaques, brown capuchins, and golden-lion tamarins. There is also a children's petting zoo and aquariums offering clear underwater views of sea lions and penguins. The zoo's breeding program is well-known and it has the distinction of fostering the world's first tropical birth of a polar bear cub. There are daily animal shows and feeding times featuring sea lions, elephants, primates, and reptiles. Visitors also have the opportunity to have breakfast or tea with the orangutans, which makes it a wonderful and memorable visit.

The Night Safari, sprawled over 100 acres (40 ha) of lush secondary forest next to the zoo, is a night zoo and a wild-life park combined. This unique sight allows visitors to observe the nocturnal activities of over 1,200 animals belonging to over 110 different species. A 45-minute guided tram ride (with a hop-on-hop-off option) takes visitors through eight habitats designed to resemble the Himalayan, Indian, Nepalese, African, Indo-Malayan, Southeast Asian, South American, and Burmese geographical regions. Those who prefer to walk can choose from three designated walking trails for a closer, moonlit encounter with the park's inhabitants.

One of the only two rain forests in the world that are within city limits, Bukit Timah was established as a reserve in Singapore in 1883 to protect the native biodiversity. Today, about 410 acres (164 ha) of the verdant rain forest, which once covered the entire island, still exist, containing a cornucopia of flora and fauna, and providing a refuge for a variety of mammals, birds, and reptiles. The view from the disused quarry lake is not to be missed. Bukit Timah has cycling and walking trails, one of which leads to the highest point, Bukit Timah Hill, 540 ft (164 m) above sea level. Free trail maps are available at the visitor center.

The park has four aviaries, including the Waterfall Aviary, the world's largest walk-in aviary. Here, visitors can walk among 1,500 free-flying birds against the backdrop of the world's tallest man-made waterfall. Other highlights include the Southeast Asian Birds Aviary, where a tropical thunderstorm is simulated daily at noon. This enclosure showcases one of the largest collections of Southeast Asian birds in the world. The penguin enclosure has a recreated Antarctic environment. Daily birdshows include the World of Hawks, which features a demonstration of the hunting skills of birds of prey.

Not far from Jurong Bird Park is the Jurong Reptile Park. Previously a crocodile park, the area now houses over 50 different species of reptiles and amphibians from around the world in a lush natural environment. The park's inhabitants include giant tortoises, 15-18 ft (4.6-5.5 m) crocodiles, king cobras, chameleons, iguanas, and anacondas.

Both children and adults enjoy the thrilling reptile shows and feeding sessions daily, when crocodiles leap up to snatch their food from the keepers.

Singapore Botanic Gardens 6

Dendrobium sonia

The Singapore Botanic Gardens are located close to the bustling city and serve as a peaceful sanctuary. This idyllic garden sits on 130 acres (52 ha) of land and is dotted with lakes inhabited by swans, ducks, and turtles. The park is excellent for a stroll around its pretty waterfalls, landscaped fountains, and well-situated rest spots. Refrains of orchestral music can at times be heard from outdoor concerts. It has both primary jungle and manicured lawns. The gardens' orchid breeding program, begun in 1928, has produced more than 2,000 hybrids, with more being added each year. The garden has a reference library containing journals, rare books, and botanical illustrations dating back to 1875.

According to legend, Kusu Island, otherwise known as Turtle Island, was actually a giant turtle which transformed itself into land to save two shipwrecked sailors, one Chinese and one Malay.

Kusu Island receives most of its visitors during the ninth lunar month (October or November), when Taoist and Muslim devotees flock to the island on an annual pilgrimage. Taoists visit the Tua Pek Kong Temple located on the island. The temple is dedicated to Tua Pek Kong, the patron saint of merchants. Devotees pray for prosperity, good luck, and wealth, light joss sticks, and make offerings of flowers and food.

Muslim devotees climb 122 steps up a steep hill to visit a Malay shrine of Keramat Kusu. Childless couples mark their prayers by tying pieces of cloth around trees on their way up to the shrine.

The island is known for its two blue lagoons, its vast pristine beaches, and a wishing well. It has undergone much development and has a pleasant spot for picnics. However, overnight stays are not permitted on the island.

The stretches of beach along East Coast Park are considered among the best in the country. The park stretches for more than 6 miles (10 km) along the coast from Changi Airport to Marina Bay. The seafront is lined with palm trees, shady rest areas, and park benches. For the fitness-conscious there are walking and jogging paths, as well as well-marked cycling and in-line skating tracks. Bicycle hire shops in the area offer a choice of racers and mountain bikes or tandems for couples. There is also an in-line skate rental and repair store.

Fishing enthusiasts can set up their rods; picnickers can pitch tents on the beach; health buffs can work out at the outdoor fitness stations, and bird-watchers can take a walk through designated bird sanctuaries.

The pleasing sea breezes and scenic views of the East Coast Park make this a very fashionable place to live. The area is well-provided with bars, chic restaurants, and a host of recreational facilities. The food on offer ranges from fast food and hawker fare to seafood and Western snacks. At the East Coast Recreation Center, indoor activities such as bowling, snooker, and children's games can be enjoyed. For watersports, the Pasta Fresca Seasports Center offers windsurfing and sailing (see p256). Holiday chalets can be rented for short-term stays. These chalets on the beachfront also provide facilities such as swimming pools, spas, and barbecue pits. The East Coast Park is a local favorite, especially for weekend family outings.

Changi Prison, which once served as a World War II prisoner-of-war camp for Allied troops, is still in use. Changi Museum is located just up the road from the prison, at the site of the Old Changi Prison Chapel. The museum is dedicated to all those who lived and died in Singapore, in particular the prisoners who suffered unspeakable torture at the hands of Japanese jailers during their internment here.

Over the years, the museum has amassed a valuable collection of photographs, paintings, and personal effects donated by former POWs and their families. A selection of photographs by George Aspinall, then a young Australian trooper, and more than 400 sketches by W.R.M. Haxworth are among the works of art by various prison artists that are showcased here. Replicas of the Changi Murals, which were originally drawn by prisoner Stanley Warren on the walls, are also on display.

In the museum's courtyard is a replica of the simple thatched-roof wooden chapel built by the POWs. The brass cross at the wreathed altar was crafted out of spent artillery casings.

Tour groups of ten or more people are required to inform the museum of their visit, at least three days in advance.

Singapore's second largest offshore island, Pulau Ubin, which sits in the Johor Strait between Changi and the mouth of the Johor River, is perhaps the last place left for a peek into the rustic atmosphere of Singapore as it was in the 1960s. A Malay and Chinese community once engaged in farming, granite quarrying, and fishing on the island.

Today, only about 200 people live on Pulau Ubin. Measuring only 5 miles (8 km) across and 1 mile (1.5 km) wide, Pulau Ubin is the site of a traditional Malay fishing village. The remnants of rural kampung life can still be seen here: attap, or thatched-roof, and zinc-roofed wooden houses stand on stilts; sampans, or wooden fishing boats, line the beach; and fishing nets spread out to dry in the sun.

The island has a variety of flora and fauna and includes species that once existed on the mainland but now can only be found here. These include various fruit trees such as coconut, durian, rambutan, and jackfruit, wild berries, wild orchids, the insect-trapping pitcher plant, several medicinal plants and herbs, and mangrove flora. The island's wildlife includes monkeys, monitor lizards, water hens, squirrels, fruit bats, and snakes such as pythons and cobras. The waters around the island teem with fish, crabs, and prawns. Pulau Ubin is also a good spot for bird-watchers as birds of prey such as eagles, kites, and hawks, and migratory birds nest here during the northern winter months. Bicycles can be rented from the jetty. The community center nearby has a good collection of photographs of life on the island during its heyday. There are also a few seafood restaurants, old-style coffee shops, and sundry shops that offer necessities for the visitor, such as insect repellent, sun-block, hats, canned drinks, and snacks. A couple of taxis ply the gravel tracks. Campsites, chalets, and lodges provide overnight accommodation on the island.

Sentosa 9

Sentosa Island was once called Balakang Mati, which means “behind the dead” in Malay. One of the theories about the origins of this name speaks of a mysterious disease that claimed the lives of nearly all the original settlers. The British used the island as a military base until 1967. Today, Sentosa, which means “peace” in Malay, has been transformed into a recreational playground with attractions that include museums, historical sights, theme parks, nature trails, and sporting activities. All the sights can be reached by the island’s monorail, beach trams, or internal bus network. Sentosa has two major hotels (see p291) as well as chalets.

SHOPPING IN SINGAPORE

Singapore is a shopper's paradise. Scores of shops at every turn offer almost unlimited choices. Whether you want to immerse yourself in the plush shopping arcades of Orchard Road or Raffles City, or scour the flea markets and back alleys of the ethnic quarters, Singapore caters to all tastes and budgets. Best known for its array of attractively priced electronic goods, such as computers, mobile phones, and cameras, Singapore also offers a tantalizing choice of luxury brands, art, antiques, curios, jewelry, and more. Away from the exclusive stores and boutiques, some of the most exciting shopping can be found in Little India, Chinatown, and Arab Street. A rich selection of traditional Southeast Asian handicrafts, such as fine caneware, batik, and textiles, is sold from stalls and specialist stores. Singapore is also famous for its bargains and sales, especially on electronic goods, but do spend some time browsing to find the best deals and only buy from reputable dealers.

A traditional Oriental happy coat

The upmarket Tanglin Mall on Orchard Road

DEPARTMENT STORES AND MALLS

Orchard Road (see pp232-3), with its vast stretch of glitzy department stores and malls, such as Tanglin Shopping Center, Ngee Ann City, and Wisma Atria, is packed with just about everything one could want – shoes, clothes, books, music, jewelry, carpets, curios, and especially branded luxury items. Tangs (see p234) and Robinsons at Centerpoint are two of the oldest department stores on Orchard Road. Park Mall specializes in furniture and interior decoration. Major shopping malls can be found in the city center, including Parco Bugis Junction, Raffles Hotel Shopping Arcade, and Raffles City Shopping Center. Suntec City Mall is farther out near Marina Bay. For electronic goods, head to Sim Lim Square or Funan Digitalife Mall. Little India's Mustafa Center, a Singapore favorite, sells every conceivable item, from electrical to household goods. Japanese chain stores Isetan, Takashimaya, and Seiyu are very popular, as is the British retail outlet Marks & Spencer. Singapore's department stores and malls are well organized, with obliging staff, and usually an informative help desk.

SHOPPING HOURS

Most shops and malls are open every day from 10am to 9pm, though a few stay open until 10pm or later. Mustafa Center in Little India is an exception – it is open 24 hours a day, making it great for a midnight shopping excursion. The revamped Clarke Quay opens around 5pm and stays open until midnight. Little India and Arab Street are best avoided on Fridays as several shops may be closed for the Muslim holy day. All 7-Eleven convenience stores are open 24 hours a day.

HOW TO PAY

International credit cards are accepted at most shops – MasterCard, VISA, American Express, Diners Club, and Citibank. If a surcharge is charged by the shop for the use of credit cards, the customer is often allowed to call the local office of the card company for a discount.

However, some of the smaller shops and the hawker stalls insist on being paid in cash.

Bargaining is an accepted practice in Singapore. Department stores generally have fixed prices, but most other shops, even in high-end malls, may be open to bargaining. It is best to be knowledgeable about the correct value of a product. Start by asking the shopkeeper for his best price and then negotiate a suitable deal. Keep the exchange good-natured. Though several high-end shopping centers may accept traveler's checks in major currencies, it is always preferable to use the Singapore dollar. Traveler's checks can be cashed at a number of banks, which are open from 9:30am to 3:30pm on weekdays, and 9:30am to 11:30am on Saturdays. Currency can be exchanged at all banks and hotels which display the "Licensed Money Changer" sign.

SALES

Daily newspapers such as The Straits Times have listings of all current sales. The free monthlies, Where Singapore and Singapore Shopping Guide, published by the Singapore Tourism Board, also give details on shopping options. But for the true thrill of Singapore's best bargains, time your trip during the Great Singapore Sale, held every year in June and July and promoted by the Singapore Tourism Board. This super-sale offers discounts of up to 80 percent on almost all goods and is the perfect chance to strike off all those things crowding your wish list. Visitors from neighboring countries are known to fly in just for this sale.

GOODS RETURN POLICIES

Most large stores provide shoppers with a receipt, and accept returns of unused goods in original condition within three days of purchase. Of course it is better to be sure of a purchase to avoid complications later. Keep all receipts until the end of your stay. Ensure that a warranty card that is recognized internationally is provided with any electronic product and is properly dated and stamped.

CONSUMER CLAIMS

Several stores display the "Gold Circle" which means they have been certified by the Singapore Tourism Board for the quality of goods and services they offer visitors. Hotels, tourist offices, and the airport can provide a free listing of these stores. The country has an excellent redress policy for tourist complaints, such as being cheated by a retailer or finding that an international guarantee card has not been properly filled out. Advice and assistance are available from the Retail Promotions Center. Visitors' complaints against retailers can also be registered at the Consumer Association of Singapore. The Small Claims Tribunal has a fast-track system for visitors, where claims can be filed for a fee of S$10 up to 1 percent of the claim amount. Visitors can avail themselves of the "electronic mediation" service at the E@DR Centers in the subordinate courts. Claims can be filed with this center by email at any time during the trip or after returning home.

PERMITS AND LAWS

Singapore has a reputation for stringent laws against the purchase and transport of weapons, endangered species, and narcotics. Even the smallest offence is not overlooked and can result in a fine, caning, or brief imprisonment. Visitors should be very careful about what they buy and where they make their purchases.

A busy Sunday flea market in Singapore

TAXES AND REFUNDS

In Singapore, a 7 percent Goods and Services Tax (GST) is levied on most goods and services. A tax refund can be claimed on purchases worth S$100 or more made at shops that display a "Tax Free Shopping" logo. Claims can be made at GST counters at Changi International Airport and cash refund centers across the country, including those at Funan Digitalife Mall, Sim Lim Square, and Wisma Atria. Receipts and purchased items should be retained as they will be needed for verification before a refund is given. Refunds are limited to S$500 per person, and a credit card will be required as proof of identity.

Where to Shop

Malls and shopping centers are considered convenient places to shop, as an extensive range of products is available under one roof. Some malls have become popular for a particular product, such as Sim Lim Square and Funan Digitalife Mall, which are known for electronic goods. There are several smaller boutiques and specialist outlets to choose from. Many warehouses and traditional shophouses throughout the city, such as those that line the river, have been renovated into shopping venues. Little India, Chinatown, and Arab Street brim with shops and galleries that sell handicrafts from their respective regions as well as from other Asian countries.

CLOTHES AND FABRICS

In Singapore, you will find international designer brands, such as Gucci, Calvin Klein, Burberry, Emporio Armani, Hugo Boss, Giordano, and Chanel, located along Orchard Road and at the other major shopping areas. Local designers, including Vera Wang, stock a blend of contemporary Chinese and Western fashion. The latest collections from top Indian fashion designers are displayed at the upscale Mumbai Se.

For a great selection of textiles, the best areas are Arab Street (see p228) and Serangoon Road (see p229) in Little India. Indonesian and Malaysian batik silks are available on Arab Street, sold mostly by the meter. *Batik*s are also sold in sarong lengths (about 6 ft/2 m) and as readymade garments. Indian saris (a 6 yard/5.5 m length of cloth) can be found in Little India. Chinatown (see pp218–21) specializes in Chinese silk and traditional garments such as cheongsam and samfoo, which can be bought readymade. Chinese silk garments are available at Tangs. Sizes of readymade garments are in keeping with the petite Asian body frame.

JEWELRY

For exclusive platinum and 18-carat gold jewelry, luxury brands such as Bulgari and Tiffany have outlets at Raffles Hotel Shopping Arcade, Orchard Road, and Raffles City Shopping Center. Local jewelers Larry Jewelry and Lee Hwa are reputed for their excellent craftsmanship. For antiques or gold fashioned in ethnic designs, such as Chinese ornaments and Indian jewelry, Chinatown and Little India offer the best selection. Cheaper imitations of the gold jewelry are available as well. Chinatown is also a good place to buy Chinese jade jewelry. The hawker stalls at Clarke Quay (see p217) offer a good range of trendy silver pieces.

SHOES AND BAGS

All the international designer labels offer a superb selection of shoes and bags at their stores on Orchard Road and other upmarket shopping arcades. Louis Vuitton, Fendi, and Ferragamo are popular with shoppers. Charles & Keith and Substance are among the sought-after brands for shoes. Singapore is also known for its wide range of footwear at affordable prices especially at Tangs and On Pedder. Arab Street is the place to head to for fine leather products.

ANTIQUES AND CRAFTS

Antiques and handicrafts available in Singapore are predominantly Southeast Asian.

Tanglin Shopping Center (see p235) is the popular place for antiques and art. Old maps and curios from the Southeast are stocked at Antiques of the Orient. The many shops at Clarke Quay, the renovated warehouses along Dempsey Road, and Lim's Arts & Crafts are also good places. For good handmade Kashmiri, Persian, and Turkish carpets, Amir & Sons in Kampong Glam, the oldest carpet shop in Singapore, is worth a visit. Arab Street is known for Southeast Asian crafts such as fine cane products. Chinatown offers religious and architectural artifacts. Brass statues and lamps can be found both in Little India as well as in Chinatown.

A display of high-end audio equipment

ELECTRONIC GOODS

The absence of import duties makes Singapore one of the most popular places to buy electronic gadgets. Several stores stock the latest high-tech audio-visual products. Latest models are available at specialist centers such as The Sony Center. Sim Lim Square and Mustafa Center are the best for music systems, televisions, and DVD players. The Adelphi Shopping Center is good for audio products. Make sure a worldwide guarantee is provided and that your purchase is compatible with the voltage system in your country.

CAMERAS AND WATCHES

Most electronics shops and dedicated camera shops stock brands such as Nikon, Canon, and Olympus. Cathay Photo Store and Mustafa Center have a good range of all the popular camera brand names. The shops also offer equipment for professional photographers. A huge range of watches is available at most shopping centers. Many companies such as Rolex and Swatch have their own outlets, while The Hour Glass stocks an expensive range, including the exquisite Gerald Genta, De Bethune, and steely Daniel Roth pieces. The bustling Lucky Plaza is known for cameras and watches. Branded second-hand watches can also be bought at Peng Kwee. The Camera Workshop at Peninsula Shopping Center sells second-hand cameras and collector's models.

COMPUTERS

Funan Digitalife Mall, the main computer shopping center in Singapore, also claims to be the largest computer store in Asia. Located between the Excelsior and Peninsula Hotels in the Colonial Core, it has five floors packed with shops selling computers, software, and other electronic equipment. The prices here are somewhat lower than those elsewhere and a number of special deals and offers are available so it is a good idea to compare prices. Two popular computer shops are Proton-Wisma Computers and The Mac Shop at the Funan Center. Other good places to buy computers include Suntec City Mall and Sim Lim Square (see p249). As with many stores, bargaining is an accepted practice.

BOOKS AND MUSIC

HMV has the most extensive selection of music with over 200,000 CD titles. Separate floors are dedicated to different genres of music, including sections on classical music, jazz, rock, and pop. Borders also has a good selection. It is also popular for its excellent children's books section. For the best range of titles on Southeast Asian subjects visit Select Books. Japanese bookstore Kinokuniya stocks a number of titles in several languages. They sell Chinese books and also have a bargain section. Times the Bookstore is another favorite.

SINGAPORE MEMORABILIA

The ubiquitous Merlion, the half-fish, half-lion symbol of Singapore, is the most popular souvenir. A wide range of items sporting the symbol is available, including coffee mugs, T-shirts, pendants, stuffed toys, musical trinket boxes, china plates, key rings, and much more. There are gift shops at most Singapore national gardens and museums, which also offer an interesting collection of mementos. Museum shops such as those at the National Museum of Singapore offer an array of products inspired by the collections on display. The Garden Shop at the Singapore Botanic Gardens (see pp240-41) stocks an eclectic range of books on natural history. Raffles Hotel has an excellent Raffles Hotel Gift Shop.

ORCHIDS

Orchids are the country's national flower and more than 3,000 varieties of this exotic flower are grown at the National Orchid Garden and the Mandai Orchid Garden. The 5-acre (2-ha) Mandai Orchid Garden has a vintage garden and even a tropical orchid fruit garden. Part of Singapore Botanic Gardens, the National Orchid Garden has over 1,000 species and 2,000 hybrids. Every year new hybrids are added to the garden's collection. The gardens have gift shops where the orchids can be packed and shipped home upon request. Unique gold-plated orchids can be purchased at the RISIS Store at Suntec City Mall or the Mandai Orchid Gardens gift shop.

GOURMET FOOD

Singapore is a renowned gourmet destination and a number of specialty foods are available as gifts and souvenirs. Aromatic ground spices from Little India can be used to flavor curries and marinades. Singaporean delicacies such as kaya, a toast spread, and the Hainan chicken-rice paste mix, along with other ready-to-serve foods are available at all Bee Cheng Hiang outlets, Kee's Gourmet Boutique, Chinatown Heritage Center (see p218), and Faber Forest Gift Shop. The Tea Chapter in Chinatown has a delightful selection of teapots, cups, accessories, and fine teas for sale. Brown Rice Paradise and Tierney's Gourmet are also worth a visit. Handmade chocolates and premium quality caviar are some of the gourmet foods from around the world stocked at Thos. S.B. Raffles.

ENTERTAINMENT IN SINGAPORE

In its endeavor to become a regional center for the arts, Singapore delights visitors with a diverse array of entertainment, ranging from classical to contemporary. Professional and amateur theater groups, dance troupes, and orchestras offer Asian performances and Western productions. The lively scene is enhanced by the presence of international artists, who come to participate in the many arts festivals held throughout the year. Performance venues are scattered throughout the island, but among those that hold pride of place are the Riverside Arts District, the striking Esplanade – Theaters on the Bay, and the open-air Fort Canning Park. Singaporeans love their nightlife and its increasingly eclectic mix of venues – jazz clubs, blues bars, nightclubs, karaoke lounges, and traditional pubs – will satisfy all tastes.

INFORMATION

Daily newspapers, such as The Straits Times, carry comprehensive listings of current and upcoming events. Brochures at hotels and free publications including Where Singapore, Juice Magazine, Think Magazine, and I-S (Inside Singapore) also carry detailed listings and reviews. Internet websites, such as singaporetheatre.com, are also an excellent resource for all the latest information.

TICKETS

It is best to purchase tickets at least two days in advance at the venue itself, though some shows may be totally booked out months ahead. Internet booking is now a convenient option. TicketCharge and SISTIC are two outlets that handle tickets for most events. Check the schedules on their websites, by telephone, or by visiting one of their many locations across the island. Tickets, once purchased, are not usually refundable or exchangeable. For Indian cultural shows, the Annalakshmi Restaurant hands out free tickets at the restaurant.

DISABLED ACCESS

Although most entertainment venues are located in heritage buildings or renovated warehouses, several of them have added disabled access. In newer venues, such as the Esplanade, such facilities have been provided. It is always best to call ahead and confirm.

Access Singapore, run by the National Council of Social Services has a detailed list of venues with amenities.

VENUES

Ever since its opening, Esplanade – Theaters on the Bay has been the focal point for the performing arts, though the elegant Chijmes Hall, Jubilee Hall, and Victoria Theater & Concert Hall are still traditional favorites for theater and musical performances. Cox Terrace at Fort Canning Park and the Shaw Foundation Symphony Stage, perched on a lake at the Singapore Botanic Gardens, are popular outdoor venues. Singapore Indoor Stadium, Kallang Theater, and the University Cultural Center are preferred for large concerts, especially for visiting international artists, while the DBS Arts Center, The Room Upstairs, and The Substation specialize in more offbeat acts.

FESTIVALS

Singapore hosts several performing arts festivals throughout the year. The riveting Singapore Arts Festival, held every June, is one of the highlights, drawing international acts, as does the four-day, open-air WOMAD (World of Music, Arts, and Dance). The Buskers' Festival for street performers is held by the riverside every November. The Singapore International Film Festival, which screens about 300 movies, has been held every April for over 15 years. It showcases mainstream cinema, documentaries, and animation from around the world. More recently, The Substation has been organizing an alternative Singapore Short Film Festival. The most popular, and allegedly Asia's largest, outdoor cinema festival is held by Starlight Cinemas every June at the Fort Canning Park. The Singapore Piano Festival also draws crowds.

FREE PERFORMANCES & OPEN AIR SHOWS

Free events are held regularly at Esplanade – Theaters on the Bay. A list of the frequently changing performances, including world music and drama, is available on their website (see Directory). Indian classical music and dance shows, such as Bharatnatyam and Odissi, are organized at different venues by the Temple of Fine Arts, a non-profit making arts organization. Tickets for shows hosted by Temple of Fine Arts are also available at Annalakshmi Restaurant. The Singapore Dance Theater's "Ballet under the Stars" is a delightful event at Fort Canning Park. Classical music concerts, including performances by the Singapore Symphony Orchestra, are held at the Singapore Botanic Gardens, while street musicians often play by the Singapore River. Every Sunday, the Chijmes Lawn and Fountain Court hosts jazz and Latin music recitals.

Wayang (Chinese Opera) performance on an elaborate stage on Teochew street

WESTERN CLASSICAL MUSIC & DANCE

The Singapore Symphony Orchestra (see p253) was founded in 1979 and performs regularly at its home base, the Esplanade, and the Victoria Concert Hall. The concerts often feature special guest conductors, composers, and soloists. The Singapore Dance Theater (see p253), the state's foremost dance company, presents classic and contemporary Western ballet, while the Odyssey Dance Theater and Ecnad stage contemporary and fusion dance performances.

CHINESE OPERA, MALAY & INDIAN MUSIC

Traditional Chinese opera, or wayang, is a cultural street event best seen during the Festival of the Hungry Ghosts (see pp200–201). The Chinese Opera Institute and the Chinese Theater Circle also stage a two-hour opera every Friday and Saturday, complete with explanations. The Singapore Chinese Orchestra, the island's only professional Chinese orchestra, plays Indian and Malay music as well as Chinese pieces.

For traditional Malay culture, the Malay Village has a program on weekends, which includes the traditional Kudu Kepang dance. Other features include the Orchestra Melayu and the Malay opera, Bangasawan, based on folktales. The rich repertoire of Indian classical dance and music is presented by the Temple of Fine Arts (see p253), as well as the Nrityalaya Aesthetics Society.

THEATER & MUSICALS

Singapore's vibrant theater scene ranges from runaway Broadway and West End hits on international tour to local groups performing contemporary productions by local playwrights. Well-known companies are the Action Theater, Singapore Repertory Theater, TheaterWorks, Toy Factory, and The Necessary Stage. While most productions are in English, albeit with an all-Asian cast, vernacular Chinese dialects, as well as Malay and Tamil theater, are represented too. Troupes such as The Singapore Stage Club, set up in 1945, with members from around the world, perform pantomimes, especially at Christmas.

CINEMA

Most of the films shown in Singapore are in English, with Chinese subtitles. Other language films have both English and Chinese subtitles. Hollywood blockbusters and Indian films are extremely popular and there are many multiplex cinemas to choose from, such as the Golden Village and Shaw Beach Road theaters. Art-house films in European languages are screened by the Singapore

Film Society at the Alliance Française, or Goethe Institute. The British Council organizes regular shows of critically acclaimed movies. Local cinema's popularity gained momentum after the success of the comedy Money No Enough in 1998. Today, films by young directors such as Royston Tan and Kelvin Tong draw large audiences. Special midnight showings are also held.

NIGHTLIFE

Orchard Road is the mainstay of nightlife on the island, while some pubs, clubs, and bars on the riverside quays are more suited for cozy get-togethers, and are largely frequented by young professionals in the evening. Swing to the blues and rock and roll at Crazy Elephant and Harry's Bar. Singapore's first Irish pub that plays Irish music, Molly Malone's, is located by the riverside. Sanctuary Bar on Orchard Road, Bar Sa Vanh in Chinatown, and Sunset Bay on Sentosa Island are a few of the favorite venues. The wine bars offer friendly service and intimate ambience. Most of them are located in renovated shophouses. Though all are fairly popular, the ones that attract the most crowds are No. 5, the city's first wine bar which has a rustic feel to it with unpolished wooden floors and Persian carpets, Barcelona, and the busy Bisous. Karaoke rooms (also known as KTV stations) are hugely popular, and even the smallest pub will feature a karaoke station.

Dance clubs are always packed and tend to play alternative music – trance, progressive trance, and garage. Dbl O has one of the largest dance floors in Singapore and its resident DJs dominate the scene. For a mind-thumping dance night, Thumper is also one of the venues that top the list of favorites. The trendy Zouk complex houses Velvet Underground and Phuture. The Velvet Underground has a main dance floor and a separate bar for chilling out. Enter a futuristic world with trendy murals on Phuture's walls and enjoy all sorts of hip music, hip-hop, and drum 'n' bass at the club. The Ministry of Sound establishment, famous for featuring electronic music, has an avant-garde super-club at Clarke Quay.

OUTDOOR ACTIVITIES IN SINGAPORE

Singapore is not only a place for shopping and dining, but also for a range of exciting outdoor activities. Being a tropical island, all the favorite watersports such as diving, sailing, water-skiing, and wakeboarding are available throughout the year. The most popular spots for these are the Kallang River located to the east of the city, East Coast Park, and Sentosa. Ample cycling trails are provided around the outer reaches of the island and within its beautiful nature reserves. Golf and fitness activities are widely enjoyed here. Tennis is also a popular sport but can be strenuous and it's best to play early in the day. The tropical sun can be strong, so adequate protection is required.

GOLF

Singapore has a number of beautifully kept golf courses. Visitors are permitted to play at most clubs, but only on weekdays. However, the Seletar Country Club is open to non-members on the weekends. The other popular golf clubs include Laguna National Golf & Country Club, Sentosa Golf Club, and the Raffles Country Club where there is a spectacular view of the South China Sea.

DIVING

Singapore is one of the most economical places in the world for diving lessons. PADI (Professional Association of Diving Instructors) courses for beginners as well as advanced divers are available. There are a number of reputable dive schools to choose from, including the Big Bubble Center, Blue Wave Sports, Waikiki Dive Center, Scuba Corner, Scuba Connection, Friendly Waters Seasports Services, Sentosa Water Sports Center, and Marsden Brothers which has the only custom-made dive boat in Singapore. Besides offering dive lessons, most schools also rent out equipment and organize dive trips. These excursions range from a day's outing to explore local Singapore waters to longer dive tours and live-aboard trips that cover popular dive spots off Malaysia's east coast, Thailand, or Indonesia's Riau Archipelago.

WATER-SKIING AND WAKEBOARDING

Several individual operators rent out equipment and offer professional instruction. The facilities of the Cowabunga Ski Center are among the best in Singapore. William Water Sports Center offers waterskiing every day and conducts all-day wakeboarding lessons every Tuesday and Thursday.

Diving, a popular activity in Singapore

SAILING AND WINDSURFING

Most sailing and windsurfing facilities are located on the east coast of the island. Among these are the Pasta Fresca Seasports Center, National Sailing Center, Keppel Marina, Raffles Marina, Republic of Singapore Yacht Club, SAFRA Seasports Center, and Changi Sailing Club, which offer various marine activities, including sail boat charters (permits may be required), windsurf boards for hire, and boat berthing docks. Some hold large regattas and many conduct training courses. Call or check websites for details.

ADVENTURE SPORTS CLUBS

Singapore Adventurers' Club organizes a range of exciting activities such as trekking, cycling tours, canoeing, and sailing. Most of its activities are open to all, with the exception of a few members-only events. Intensive courses in kayaking, rock climbing, and abseiling are offered all year round by Outward Bound Singapore located at Pulau Ubin and East Coast Park.

NATURE WATCH

Nature Society (Singapore) organizes bird-watching trips twice each month to various locations. Call or check its website for more details. In addition, spotting the diverse species of animals, birds, and plants protected within Singapore's stunning nature reserves can be a truly rewarding experience.

CYCLING

Cycling is an excellent way to explore the attractions that lie outside Singapore's city limits. Hiring a bike on Sentosa is a good alternative to the island's monorail system. For a leisurely ride along the seashore of the East Coast Park, bikes can be rented at the Sunport Center or SDK Recreation. The varied landscape of the tracks at the Bukit Timah Nature Reserve (see p238) offers a more challenging experience, but you will need to bring your own bike. Pulau Ubin (see p243) off the northeastern coast is a favorite cycling destination. With its maze of trails, it is particularly good for mountain biking. Bikes can be hired on the island near the dock or from Changi Village.

TENNIS

Tennis courts can be booked every day between 7am and 10pm at various centers, such as the Kallang Squash and Tennis Center, and Farrer Park Tennis Court. The Singapore Tennis Center offers one-on-one coaching, and you can put your name on a partner list and hire a court. An Instant Tennis course for beginners is available at a very reasonable fee.

WHERE TO STAY

Both Malaysia and Singapore offer a variety of accommodations, from luxury hotels to simple guesthouses. Prices are fairly reasonable, although Malaysian Borneo and Singapore tend to be more expensive than Peninsular Malaysia. Top international hotel chains are well-represented, and there are some beautiful resorts in idyllic settings. Mid-range options include government rest houses, an echo of the countries' colonial past, and some lovely boutique hotels. Budget travelers will find excellent guesthouses offering dormitory beds, and in some parts of the country, homestays can be arranged. An overnight stay in a longhouse is a wonderful way of experiencing Dayak culture. Malaysia's national parks provide cabins and campsites, making it possible to stay in the heart of the rain forest. For more information, refer to the detailed listings on pages 272–91.

The well-designed Sutera Harbour Resort, Sabah (see p285) have spas, watersports and fitness facilities, golf courses, and a range of shops, restaurants, and bars, giving guests no reason to step out of the resort during their stay.

MID-RANGE HOTELS

Some of the mid-range hotels have facilities comparable to top-end hotels, but with the opening of a slew of international chains, they have had to reduce their prices to stay competitive and now provide extremely good value for money. This category includes boutique hotels, which focus on generating an exotic and relaxing ambience. They are usually more intimate than the chain hotels, and can offer personalized services. Also in this category are former government rest houses, which once lodged colonial officials. Most of them have now been renovated and are managed by Seri Malaysia Hotels, and are good options for visitors keen to get a sense of heritage during their stay.

BUDGET HOTELS AND HOMESTAYS

All the cities and towns of Malaysia have budget hotels and guesthouses in tourist areas. Not only are these economical, but they can also be a good source of local information. While the facilities offered by most guesthouses are basic, some include free breakfast and Internet access. Homestays are becoming increasingly popular as they present an opportunity to get to know Malaysians outside the tourist industry. The local tourist offices always have a list of homestay programs.

LONGHOUSES

Travelers to Malaysian Borneo, particularly Sarawak, can experience a night in a longhouse, the traditional dwelling of many indigenous groups, such as the Bidayuh (see p161) and the Iban (see p167). The majority of visitors to longhouses organize their trips through tour agents, such as

RATINGS

All hotels in Malaysia and Singapore follow the star grading system. Top- and mid-range hotels are accredited with star ratings according to the level of luxury, facilities, and services they offer but guesthouses have no such ratings. While these ratings help in selecting accommodations, it is wise to visit the official websites of individual hotels for the best deals.

INTERNATIONAL AND RESORT HOTELS

Several of the world's best known international hotel chains are represented in Malaysia and Singapore, offering luxurious rooms and impeccable service. Many of them incorporate features of local architecture in an effort to make their rooms more personal. The resorts, located in beautiful surroundings,

The Planters Inn restaurant, Crowne Plaza, Kuala Lumpur (see p274)

Suite at Royal Mulu Resort, Sarawak (see p282)

Borneo Adventures (see p329) and Sabah Tourism Board (see p335), who arrange stays at working longhouses. Facilities provided are generally very basic, consisting of little more than a floor mattress and mosquito net, although some longhouses have now installed western-style toilets to make the stay a little more comfortable for their guests.

Some top-end international hotels are also constructed in the form of longhouses, duplicating the traditional structure while including a range of urban luxuries and comforts.

NATIONAL PARKS AND CAMPING

National Parks and reserves throughout Malaysia offer reasonably comfortable accommodations in lodges or cabin-style huts, usually located around the Park Headquarters. They also have campsites where visitors may either rent a tent or pitch their own. Few other campsites in Malaysia or Singapore permit travelers to put up a tent on a beach, but facilities are basic. For information, bookings, and permits, it is wise to contact the Department of Wildlife and National Parks, Sarawak Forestry Corporation, and Sabah National Parks.

RATES AND RESERVATIONS

Room rates tend to remain steady throughout the year, increasing only slightly during festivals such as Hari Raya Puasa, Chinese New Year (see pp28-9), and Christmas, when all levels of accommodations fill up and advance booking also becomes necessary. At quieter times of the year, especially during the monsoon season between November and February, rates drop significantly and discounts can be obtained on the east coast of the peninsula. Prior reservations are essential at top-end hotels, for the best prices.

HIDDEN COSTS

Most budget and mid-range hotels quote net prices that include all taxes. However, top-end hotels in Malaysia display a price amount with the symbol “++” after the rate, which means that 10 percent service charge and 5 percent government tax will be added to it. In Singapore, this symbol becomes “+++”, which refers to 10 percent service charge, 17 percent Goods and Services Tax, and 1 percent government tax. Food and beverage items in luxury hotels and restaurants also have taxes and service charges added on.

Cabin-style huts, Sepilok Nature Resort, Sandakan (see p285)

TRAVELING WITH KIDS

Hotel staff in both Malaysia and Singapore tend to indulge younger guests, and will occasionally also give preferential treatment to their parents. Even at basic hotels, children under the age of 12 years can often stay for free in their parents' room. Not all hotels have playgrounds and other special facilities for kids, but most are very flexible about providing extra beds in rooms and arranging special meals. Baby cots and high chairs are available with some notice. Some resort hotels organize activities for kids and offer babysitting services.

SPECIAL NEEDS

Apart from top-end hotels, few places offer special facilities for the disabled in Malaysia or Singapore (see p334). For the mobility impaired, facilities are limited to ramps for wheelchairs and lifts to all floors. Some five-star hotels have rooms fitted with wider doors, low-level light switches, and wheelchair access. It is rare for budget hotels and dormitories to have any such provisions.

WHERE TO EAT

With their clever combinations of textures and flavors, the cuisines of Malaysia and Singapore offer exciting dining discoveries for the visitor. Dishes of Malay, Chinese, and Indian origin are widely available, reflecting the three major communities that make up the population of the two countries. The type of restaurant varies but the quality is usually good, whether it is a sumptuous restaurant in a top hotel or a simple street stall in a local market. Major centers such as Kuala Lumpur, Singapore, Kota Bharu, Georgetown, and Malacca usually offer a good variety, including Italian, French, Mexican, Vietnamese, and Japanese eateries. However, even the smaller towns have a decent choice of cuisines at remarkably cheap prices.

TYPES OF RESTAURANTS

Though the cuisines available in Malaysia and Singapore are amazingly varied, eateries are essentially of three types: street hawker stalls, kedai kopi, or coffee shops, and restaurants that range from the simple to the lavish.

Street hawker stalls are not only the cheapest, with food often as good as the best eateries, but also a real cultural experience as this is where most locals eat. Kedai kopi are no-frills neighborhood cafés that usually offer a limited range of dishes at cheap prices, but are not much by way of service and ambience. However, culinary standards are reasonably high.

Restaurants vary from simple shopfronts to establishments that serve gourmet food in elegant surroundings. The most expensive are the restaurants in Kuala Lumpur and Singapore. Some excellent seafood restaurants can be found in beach resorts and big cities, serving superb local delicacies, such as fish head curry, shark's fin soup, and freshly-caught fish.

In the bigger tourist centers, such as Singapore, Kuala Lumpur, Sarawak, and Penang, visitors can often combine a meal with a cultural show. The shows feature traditional musicians and dancers, who perform during peak dinner hour. Although some visitors may not enjoy watching a performance while dining, these shows offer short-stay travelers a chance to experience a bit of the local culture. Prices at such dining establishments tend to be higher than budget restaurants with regular meal offers.

READING A MENU

Virtually all restaurants and coffee shops, and many hawker stalls, display the names of the dishes they offer in English. If they don't have English menus, it is acceptable to just point at your choice of dish. The problem is not so much finding out what is on offer but what to select.

Satay, a popular Malay delicacy

Customers relaxing in a kedai kopi, or traditional coffee shop

Menus are often organized according to the main ingredient, such as chicken, beef, pork (though Muslim restaurants do not serve pork at all), seafood, and vegetables. There is usually a small selection of individual meals, but most people tend to eat in groups and choose a variety of food in order to sample more dishes. Portions are relatively generous and for a couple, three dishes will usually suffice.

TABLE ETIQUETTE

Eating in restaurants where food is not served on a single plate in front of them may be uncomfortable for some people, but adapting to the dining customs of Malaysia and Singapore is not difficult. Generally a fork and spoon are the preferred eating utensils, although chopsticks are useful for noodle dishes. Most Malay, Chinese, and Indian food is cut into small pieces, so a knife is not required. Diners are presented with an individual plate or bowl of rice, and expected to help themselves, a spoonful at a time, from the bowls of stir-fried dishes, curries, soups, and salads in the center of the table. Seniority is important, so when eating with locals, it is advisable to wait for the oldest member of the group to help himself first.

RESERVATIONS

Reservations are not generally necessary except at the most popular or upscale restaurants. Weekends can be busy, when most families go out for a meal. People with special dietary needs should mention it to the restaurant manager before making a reservation.

WINE AND DRINK

With the growth of tourism in Malaysia and Singapore, many restaurants are beginning to serve alcoholic drinks. Muslim restaurants, however, serve no alcohol at all. It is generally easy to get a beer or fresh fruit juice at hawker stalls. The variety of exotic tropical fruits has an irresistible appeal, and many restaurants and food stalls use them to concoct shakes and smoothies. Tuak, or rice wine, is brewed in the longhouses of Sabah and Sarawak, but visitors should note that it is extremely potent.

PAYMENT AND TIPPING

Few restaurants, apart from mid-range and top-end hotels, accept credit cards, so it is best to carry sufficient cash to pay the bill. While tipping is not common among locals in Malaysia and Singapore, as the bill almost always includes service tax and government tax, staff at restaurants in tourist areas have become used to the custom.

STREET FOOD

Sampling street food is one of the highlights of a visit to Malaysia and Singapore, not just because many dishes served at hawker stalls are unfamiliar to foreign visitors, but also because the food is generally prepared with great expertise. Another advantage of hawker stalls is that it is possible to sample Malay, Chinese, and Indian cuisine in just one sitting. Most of the stalls are inexpensive and specialize in just one rice or noodle dish, along with satay. Those called cze char, or pick-and-mix, however, offer a range of items on their menu, including meatballs, spring rolls, tofu, and stuffed chilies.

Champagne and wine

VEGETARIANS

Despite the abundance of fresh fruit and vegetables available in markets throughout the region, it can often be difficult for vegetarians to find items on a menu that do not contain meat or seafood. However, authentic Indian restaurants serve vegetarian dishes and all Chinese restaurants have at least one dish of mixed vegetables on their menu. Little India in both Singapore and Kuala Lumpur have a wide range of meal options for vegetarians. Most hawker stalls prepare food on the spot, so dishes can be cooked without meat upon request.

EATING WITH CHILDREN

There are no restrictions on children entering restaurants in Malaysia and Singapore; in fact, in most places they are welcome. Some restaurants offer special children's meals. Mild Chinese soups and rice dishes are best for those unaccustomed to spicy food. High standards of food preparation and quality control are maintained, yet care should be taken as children traveling here could be prone to food and water-related ailments.

SMOKING

Smoking is prohibited in enclosed, air-conditioned environments, which comprise two-thirds of the restaurants in Malaysia and Singapore. However, about one-third of the eateries have a terrace or outdoor smoking area.

The Flavors of Malay Cuisine

Malaysians and Singaporeans live to eat, so it is not surprising that markets offer an abundance of fresh tropical fruit and vegetables, meat, and seafood. Mounds of cabbages, eggplants, mangoes, and pineapples are stacked up beside bowls of dried shrimp and fresh crabs, slabs of beef, and marinated ducks. Some stalls specialize in types of rice, the staple of Malay cuisine; others in flavorings and pastes, such as rempah and belacan, essential to Malay cooking. Though many dishes are unknown outside the region, satay has become a worldwide favorite.

NASI AND MEE

Rice (nasi) and noodles (mee) form the basis of any Malay meal, though the preparation of both is almost as varied as the sauces, broths, and curries that accompany them.

Rice may be served fried, steamed, glutinous, or boiled into bubur, a savoury soup or porridge. It is commonly steamed, and eaten with a selection of toppings (nasi campur). It is also sometimes enhanced with coconut milk (santan), in nasi lemak.

Noodles may be made from wheat, wheat and egg, rice, or mung beans and are served fried or as a soup with vegetables and meat or seafood. Typical Malay noodle dishes are laksa and

mee rebus, both of which are usually served with scrumptious spicy sauce.

REMPAH AND SAMBAL

The carefully blended seasoning pastes are the secret to the mouth-watering flavors of Malay food. The most widely used paste is

MALAY DISHES AND SPECIALTIES

Chicken satay

Breakfast can be almost anything in Malaysia and Singapore, but a couple of favorites are laksa (spicy noodle soup) and nasi lemak (a rice dish). Lunch is usually a one-dish meal, which might easily be nasi campur or mee goreng. Dinner generally brings family groups or friends together to share a variety of classic Malay dishes, such as satay (spicy meat skewers with a peanut sauce), rendang, and ayam panggang (chicken marinated with garlic and lime, grilled and served with a hot sambal). This is likely to be followed by an ais kacang or a plate of fresh fruit. Constantly passionate about food, locals don't miss out on a late-night supper, indulging in anything from a steaming hot bowl of rice soup to a plate of barbecued chicken wings.

Mee goreng are yellow noodles, stir-fried with vegetables and meat, fish, or tofu, and garnished with lime.

rempah, for which garlic, lemongrass, shallots, galangal, and ginger are pounded in a mortar. Cinnamon, coriander seeds, cloves, and peppercorns are added to thicken curries, or are fried in oil until fragrant before being added to meat or vegetables.

Sambal is a chili paste that is served as a side dish. Sambal ulek is a blend of chili, salt, and vinegar, while the hugely popular sambal belacan is made of chili, salt, and sugar pounded with fermented shrimp paste, and served with a wedge of lime.

PERANAKAN AND BORNEAN CUISINE

Malay cuisine is influenced by Chinese, Indian, Thai, Indonesian, and other cultures, but there are several regional variations, of which

Bornean and Peranakan, or Straits Chinese, food are the most distinctive. In Malaysia, Peranakan cuisine came into existence when Chinese traders settled in the region and married local Nonya women. They combined spicy Malay pastes with ingredients that are usual in Malay food, such as pork and duck, using Chinese cooking techniques but adding elements of Portuguese, Indian, and Thai cuisine. A typical Peranakan dish is mee siam, or fine rice noodles in a spicy, sweet-sour gravy.

Visitors to Malaysian Borneo can sample local specialties such as limut (in Sarawak) and ambuyat (in Sabah), both translucent pastes made of sago starch, paku (jungle ferns), and jaruk (wild boar mixed with salt and rice and cooked in a bamboo tube).

REGIONAL LAKSAS

Every state has its own version of this noodle soup, a national favorite, including:

Asam laksa From the Penang region, this uses tamarind to give a sour edge, as well as flaked fish, wild ginger buds, and belacan. Pineapple is shredded for a sweet garnish.

Laksa Johor A very rich fish laksa flavored with coconut milk, cumin, coriander seeds, and turmeric. It is garnished with cucumber, bean sprouts, and Vietnamese mint.

Sarawak laksa This features chicken, and prawns in tangy kalamansi lime. Toasted rice and coconut give the soup a brownish color.

Singapore laksa Deep-fried anchovies, belacan, and coconut milk are used to make a rich, sour soup that is topped with fish cakes.

Rendang, influenced by Indonesian cuisine, is a fiery, dry curry made with chicken, mutton, or beef.

Laksa lemak, found around Kuala Lumpur and known as curry laksa, features prawns, tofu, and egg.

Ais kacang is a vivid dessert concoction of shaved ice with syrup, jelly, corn, red beans, and evaporated milk.

The Flavors of Malay-Chinese Cuisine

The Chinese had been trading in the region for centuries, but it was not until the 19th century that immigrants began settling in large numbers, attracted by tin- and gold-mining, and plantation agriculture. The greatest concentration of settlers was in Singapore, where Chinese cuisine still predominates, though its influence is apparent throughout Malaysia. In Malay cuisine, rice and noodles are a staple in most meals, of which the latter is a major Chinese import. Key elements in all regional variations of Chinese food are the use of fresh produce and the balance of tastes and textures.

Dried shiitake mushrooms

Deep-fried bean-curd is a Hakka specialty, and pork (especially belly) is the preferred meat.

Hainanese food features fresh ingredients and the sparing use of spices. It has given Malaysia and Singapore one of their most common dishes – Hainanese chicken rice, garnished with cucumber, and chili and ginger dips. Hokkien, sometimes called peasant food, is still the source of delicate spring rolls. Noodles are found in many dishes, such as Hokkien mee, thick wheat noodles stir-fried with seafood or pork.

Teochew cuisine, from Chiuchow, is famed for muay porridge – a pale rice broth served with side dishes of crayfish, salted eggs, and vegetables.

REGIONAL INFLUENCES

The Chinese food found in Malaysia and Singapore is usually Cantonese, which is noted for its mild flavorings and specialties such as dim sum (steamed or fried filled dumplings).

Hakka cuisine, from the provinces of Guangdong and Fujian, mixes fresh and preserved ingredients.

The Flavors of Malay-Indian Cuisine

The main period of Indian immigration was the 19th century, when laborers were shipped across to work on rubber plantations operated by the British. Most were Hindus from southern India and, like the Chinese, they became a major influence on Malay cuisine. Although rice is a staple, Indian food is also characterized by its use of pulses and various types of flatbread, such as roti, naan, and chapati. The most commonly used flavorings are chili, cumin, garam masala, coriander, mustard seed, turmeric, yogurt, coconut, and ghee.

In contrast to the emphasis on bread and meat in the northern Indian diet, southern Indian food is always accompanied by rice and many vegetarian dishes. Despite the hotter climate, dishes from south India tend to be spicy and are distinguished by the liberal use of coconut milk, lentils, and curry leaves. The thali is a popular southern Indian meal, comprising small portions of a variety of dishes and condiments.

MAMAK CUISINE

A third type of Indian food frequently found in Malaysia is that produced by Indian Muslims. These dishes are mostly sold at hawker stalls, and include mee goreng (spicy-fried noodles), rojak (deep-fried vegetables and seafood in a sweet and spicy sauce), and mee rebus (a mix of yellow noodles and beansprouts in a sweet potato gravy, topped with a boiled egg).

NORTH AND SOUTH

Northern Indian cuisine is characterized by the use of dairy products to make rich, thick sauces. Many dishes are baked in a cylindrical clay oven called a tandoor; these include naan breads and the famous Tandoori chicken, now enjoyed worldwide. Breads are eaten in preference to rice.

INDIAN FAVORITES IN MALAYSIA

Red lentils

From early morning, cooks at roti stalls throughout Malaysia can be seen spinning dough into a flat disk, folding it in on itself, then frying it on a griddle to make roti canai, which can either be dipped in a bowl of curry sauce or sprinkled with sugar for a less spicy breakfast.

At lunchtime, one of the most popular dishes sold at Indian Muslim hawker stalls is the vegetarian mee rebus. For dinner, among the many delicious and filling options are biryani and a thali. The former has a base of seasoned rice cooked with saffron, nuts, and vegetables, and is served with meat or seafood, and vegetables. The latter consists of a tray or banana leaf, laden with vegetable, fish, or meat curries, pulses (dal), pickles, and yogurt (raita), as well as rice, breads, or poppadoms.

SHOPPING IN MALAYSIA

Malaysia is an affluent country with a rapidly developing economy. It has an astonishing variety of shopping options, from the latest electronic gadgets to a wealth of traditional art and handicraft items. Differences exist between the range, quality, and prices available in the various regions, with the large cities on the western coast of Peninsular

Woven bamboo products for sale

Malaysia, notably Kuala Lumpur, Penang, and Johor Bahru, offering sophisticated malls, and the smaller east coast cities, such as Kota Bharu and Kuala Terengganu, acting as the repository of Malay artistry, especially batik, colorful kites, and shadow puppets. Sarawak and Sabah in Malaysian Borneo are unrivaled for their array of ethnic products, skilfully crafted by the indigenous people.

DEPARTMENT STORES AND SHOPPING MALLS

Shopping malls, ranging from modest establishments to plush, air-conditioned, multistory buildings, are ubiquitous in Malaysian towns and cities. They contain a mix of large department stores that sell branded goods, supermarkets offering both local and imported food, and dozens of smaller shops that stock everything from mobile phones, computers, electronic goods, and English and Malay books, to a wealth of souvenirs, clothes, shoes, and accessories, such as bags and watches. Nearly all shopping malls have fast-food outlets, while the upmarket ones also feature expensive restaurants. Many have multiplex movie theaters, food courts, Internet cafés, and branches of banks with facilities such as money changing and ATMs. Malls in west coast cities, especially those in Kuala Lumpur, compare with the glitziest outlets in the Western countries and are an excellent source of a wide range of international luxury brands.

Besides those in the malls, there are several independent department stores, such as Kuala Lumpur's Isetan, which is part of a Japanese chain.

LOCAL MARKETS (TAMUS) AND STALLS

Malaysia is brimming with local markets, or tamus. Almost every town and village has at least one bustling central market, usually containing a multitude of stalls offering a bewildering selection of goods, from local crafts to clothes and household items. Very often there is also a wet market selling fresh meat, fruits, and vegetables. Numerous hawker stalls offer an array of local delicacies. Prices are reasonable, the quality is generally good, and standards of hygiene are very high, even in fish markets, which are regularly hosed.

Another enduringly popular feature and a highlight of a trip to Malaysia are its pasar malams, or night markets. The most fascinating of these are in Kuala Lumpur (see pp56–77), Johor Bahru (see p128), Penang (see pp100–109), Kuching (see pp154–7), and Kota Kinabalu (see p178).

Most state capitals and larger towns of Malaysia and Singapore often have ethnic enclaves, such as Chinatown and Little India, which are excellent places to buy Chinese and Indian products.

SHOPPING HOURS

Business hours for shops can vary substantially, but most establishments are open from

The Sungei Wang Plaza in Kuala Lumpur's Golden Triangle (see p318)

9am to 6:30pm, Monday to Saturday. Malls and major emporia open later, usually between 10 and 10:30am until 9:30 or 10pm. In most states in Malaysia, including Sabah and Sarawak, Saturday is a half day and Sunday a holiday. Shops in the conservative Islamic east coast states of Kelantan and Terengganu are closed on Friday, the Muslim Sabbath.

METHODS OF PAYMENT

Cash, preferably the Malaysian ringgit, is universally accepted although many places also take US dollars. However, money changers are found everywhere. Credit cards are widely accepted except in the smallest of stores. The preferred cards include VISA, MasterCard, and JCB, while larger establishments also accept American Express and Diners Club cards. A few shops levy a 3 percent service charge, but this tendency is becoming less common.

SALES TAX

Currently Malaysia does not impose a general sales tax on goods, but VAT, ranging from 5 to 10 percent, is being introduced on all types of imported goods. For food and accommodation, however, customers can expect to pay a service tax of 10 percent at luxury hotels and restaurants, in addition to the government tax of 5 percent. Malaysia has some designated duty-free areas, including Pulau Langkawi in the west and

Fresh fish sold at a market in Tawau, Sabah

Pulau Labuan in the east, designed to attract shoppers. There are also duty-free areas in Kelantan at Rantau Panjang and Pengkalan Kubur, as well as in Kedah at Padang Besar and Bukit Kayu Hitam.

BARGAINING

In Malaysia, bargaining is an accepted practice. However, whether to bargain or not depends on the kind of market shoppers are in. Top-end department stores, shopping malls, and government emporia have fixed prices, though the latter offer good fixed-price deals.

In most local markets and stalls, bargaining is not just accepted but is also expected. Buyers can often obtain a substantial reduction in the original price. Remember to keep the exchange polite and good-natured, and it is always a good idea to browse in several shops and know the fair price of a product before negotiating.

GUARANTEES

Buyers should always be careful with their selection at the time of purchase to avoid problems later. Most government shops and large department stores will accept the return of faulty goods, but it might not be as easily done for products bought at street stalls, especially antique shops that are not recommended or guaranteed by the government.

PHOTOGRAPHY

Malaysia, like Singapore, tends to be at the cutting edge of photographic technology. Deals are just as great as in Singapore, and sometimes better, due to good exchange rates. The range of products is excellent, though digital technology has swept aside slide film. Print film remains available, and film-developing facilities are ubiquitous, fast, and cheap.

IMITATIONS

Although the sale of imitation goods and knock-offs is illegal in Malaysia, and there is a growing clampdown on the sale of illicit goods, such products continue to be sold at small stores and stalls. Since most of these products are very cheap and of poor quality and because such trade breaches property rights, the purchase of fakes, such as faux designer bags, clothing, and illegal copies of VCDs and DVDs, although tempting, is best avoided.

What to Buy in Malaysia

Glitzy shopping malls, bustling local markets, vibrant pasar malams (night markets), and small craft shops across Malaysia offer a good range of souvenirs for visitors to take home. Traditionally-styled Malay, Chinese, and Indian artifacts are widely available; however, some craft items are restricted to specific regions. The country can boast an astonishing range of products, including antique furniture, ikat cloth, batik prints, wood carvings, and shadow puppets, besides handicraft items produced by indigenous people.

MALAY PRODUCTS

With the rising demand for ethnic Malay goods, aided by Malaysia's thriving tourism and patronage offered by the country's leading banks and oil companies, art in Malaysia is flourishing like never before. Malay goods are available almost everywhere, but are especially visible in Kuala Lumpur, Johor Bahru, Kelantan, and Terengganu.

Silverware

Batik Fabric

Malay batik uses wax and dyes to print on fabrics. Shirts, skirts, and sarongs in batik-print are best bought from Malaysia's east coast.

Kites
While the principal designs of traditional Malay kites are derived from nature, decorations are unique to each craftsman. Kite-making shops can be found in villages along the east coast of Peninsular Malaysia.

Masks

Traditionally, Malaysian and Southeast Asian masks represent people, demons, and deities. They are cultural icons that help preserve tradition, religion, and history. Malay ceremonial masks are commonly available in Malacca.

Wayang Kulit

Shadow puppet theater; or wayang kulit, is a Malay folk art whose traditions are passed on orally. These colorful leather puppets are available in Kelantan and Kuala Lumpur.

Songket Silk Fabrics

Belonging to the brocade family of textiles, songket is handwoven on looms and features elaborate patterns created with a gold and silver weft.

Ceramic Items

PRODUCTS FROM MALAYSIAN BORNEO

Sabah and Sarawak are unrivaled for items crafted by indigenous people and by Malay Christians, including fine ikat cloth, shamanistic religious paraphernalia, and wood carvings.

Bamboo Products

Items made of bamboo, palm leaf, and rattan, including finely woven baskets and hats, are available in bazaars throughout Sarawak and Sabah.

CHINESE PRODUCTS

Malaysia is especially popular for locally produced Peranakan or Straits Chinese goods, including antique furniture and ceramics. Standard Chinese wares are imported from Hong Kong and the Chinese mainland.

Chinese Antique Furniture

Antique furniture of the Baba-Nonya tradition, made from hardwood with exquisite carvings, is available in Malacca, where Jalan Hang Jebat (see p124) is a treasure-house for antique lovers.

INDIAN PRODUCTS

Indian enclaves in Penang, Kuala Lumpur, and Johor Bahru exude a heady aroma of spices and have several authentic silk stores recreating an ambience similar to that in Southern Indian states.

Indian Silk Sarees

Traditional southern Indian kanchipuram silk sarees are available in the fabric stores of Little India in Georgetown as well as in shopping malls across Malaysia.

Ikat Design

Often a symbol of status and power, ikat, meaning to tie in Malay, is a style of weaving created by dyeing the warp. The best ikat is produced in Sarawak.

Wood Carvings

Wood carvings depicting people, spirits, and animals in the shamanistic tradition are widely available in Kuching, Kota Kinabalu, and at Selangor's small Orang Asli Museum.

Good Luck Charms

Chinese good luck charms in bright, attractive colors make cheap and fun purchases. They are available almost everywhere.

Chinese Ceramics

Baba-Nonya vases, which are unique to Malaysia, and imported chinaware are available in big retail outlets in Malacca, on the west coast of Peninsular Malaysia.

Brassware

Fine brass goods, a Tamil tradition transplanted to Malaysia, comprise household objects, decoratives, and religious items.

Indian Spices

Spices, such as pepper, cardamom, saffron, cloves, mace, nutmeg, and cinnamon, are widely available in Malaysia.

Where to Shop

There are good shops just about everywhere in Malaysia, from big cities on the peninsula to smaller towns and villages in Malaysian Borneo. The larger metropolises, especially Kuala Lumpur, Penang, Johor Bahru, and Kuching, have fantastic malls selling a fine range of products. The smaller east coast cities, such as Kota Bharu and Kuala Terengganu, are the center of traditional Malay arts and crafts, while Sarawak and Sabah are unrivaled for their ethnic goods.

KUALA LUMPUR

The main shopping areas in Kuala Lumpur are around Bukit Bintang and Jalan Sultan Ismail in the heart of the Golden Triangle. Major shopping malls here include Bukit Bintang Plaza, Lot 10, Starhill Gallery, and the huge new mall, Berjaya Times Square. Sungei Wang Plaza and Low Yat Plaza, also in the Golden Triangle, specialize in electronic goods. Among the upmarket malls, Suria KLCC inside the Petronas Towers (see p73) is stunning, and the Mid Valley Megamall is also worth visiting. Perhaps the best market in Malaysia is Central Market, which is the place to shop for local souvenirs. There is a great variety of batik and handicraft goods for sale at Kompleks Budaya Kraf (see p75). The market at Jalan Tuanku Abdul Rahman (see p70) offers great bargains, with the Globe Silk Store popular for tailor-made clothes. The street springs to life at night with a pasar malam. Jalan Petaling (see p64) is great for DVDs.

PENANG

After Kuala Lumpur, the best place to shop is Penang, with outlets selling local crafts, antiques, and electronic items at competitive prices. Jalan Penang is the best shopping street in Georgetown, with Komtar, a shopping mall located in a massive 56-story building, and Chowrasta Bazaar for spices. 100 Cintra Street (see p104) has an interesting antique and curio center, while Little India (see p103) offers an array of southern Indian products. Batu Ferringhi (see p108) has a vibrant night market.

An antiques store displaying Peranakan artifacts, Malacca

PULAU LANGKAWI

One of the major attractions of Pulau Langkawi is its status as a duty-free shopping zone. The island's capital, Kuah, is where most duty-free shops are located. Popular outlets include the Langkawi Fair Shopping Mall and the Jetty Point Duty-Free Complex, both in Kuah. The Zon DutyFree Shopping Paradise at Pantai Cenang and Sunmall at Pantai Tengah are worth visiting, although they mainly stock cosmetics, cigarettes, and alcohol.

MALACCA

The restored Chinese district in Malacca is the place to look for antiques, both genuine and imitation, as well as all kinds of Chinese and Peranakan goods. Jalan Hang Jebat (see p124) sells beautiful porcelain, coins, old lamps, songket fabric, and antique furniture. There are a range of handicraft and souvenir shops in Taman Merdeka and a pasar malam on Jalan Paramesawara. The Mahkota Parade shopping complex on Jalan Merdeka is Malacca's largest shopping venue.

JOHOR BAHRU

Regarded as one of Malaysia's most prosperous towns, Johor Bahru is located across the causeway from Singapore, whose citizens often come to shop, notably at Komplex Lien Hoe, Pelangi Leisure Mall, Perling Mall, and Plaza Pelangi in Johor Bahru. All

KOTA BHARU AND KUALA TERENGGANU

The east coast of Peninsular Malaysia abounds with shops selling traditional Malay crafts such as batik and songket fabric, silverware, wood carvings, and colorful kites. The handicraft workshops along the road to Pantai Cahaya Bulan and Kompleks Bazaar Buluh Kubu in Kota Bharu are good stops for their displays of batik items.

In Kuala Terengganu, Jalan Bandar near the Central Market has several small shops selling local handicrafts and batik cloth, which are open on all days except on Fridays. The Noor Arfa Craft Complex is also a favorite for traditional crafts, especially batik and songket.

KUCHING, SARAWAK

Kuching is one of Malaysia's best shopping destinations, rivaled only by Penang and Malacca. The city is filled with stores selling souvenirs, ikat cloth, and Asian antiques. It also specializes in artifacts made by indigenous peoples. Jalan Satok's Sunday market sells a variety of crafts and fresh produce. Demonstrations of these crafts are held daily at Sarawak Handicraft Center.

KOTA KINABALU, SABAH

The capital of Sabah, Kota Kinabalu, has several local handicraft shops selling goods of reasonable quality. The Filipino Market (see p179) at the waterfront is the best market and sells basketware and colorful woven ponchos. The products on display serve as a reminder of how much closer Sabah is to the Philippines than to Peninsular Malaysia.

ENTERTAINMENT IN MALAYSIA

Entertainment in Malaysia can range from a traditional dance performance by the indigenous Iban people to the hip nightclubs in Kuala Lumpur. As the capital, Kuala Lumpur boasts a wide choice of entertainment, including theater, concerts, and art exhibitions. However, state capitals such as Johor Bahru, Kuching, and Kota Kinabalu also cater for night-time revelry with a variety of nightclubs and karaoke bars. Malaysia's festivals through the year (see pp50–53) are often accompanied by traditional performing arts. Theme parks, such as the one at Genting Highlands, are a great way to enjoy an all-day outing with children, while cinema enthusiasts can watch the latest Hollywood films at multiplexes.

EVENT LISTINGS

For comprehensive listings of current and upcoming events including art exhibitions, theatrical performances, and concerts in Kuala Lumpur, check English-language dailies such as The Sun, The Star, and New Straits Times. Other useful publications are KLUE, a monthly arts review, and Juice, a monthly magazine that lists the trendiest clubs. Up-to-date listings from all these publications are also available on their official websites. In addition, the Kakiseni and KL This Month websites also offer a wealth of information regarding places to stay, restaurants, outdoor activities, and street maps.

There is no central ticket booking organization in Kuala Lumpur, so it is necessary to contact each venue directly or ask hotel staff for help with booking tickets. Unfortunately, not many entertainment venues are equipped with facilities for the disabled, although most new establishments provide such amenities. Call individual venues in advance to check for details before booking.

ART EXHIBITIONS

There are several art halls in Kuala Lumpur, which host frequently changing exhibitions. The National Art Gallery (see p71) showcases works of over 2,500 artists and painters, especially works by contemporary Malaysian artists. The gallery also hosts rotating exhibitions throughout the year. Another impressive art gallery is Galeri Petronas at Suria KLCC (see p73), which has three separate halls of international standard. It houses Malaysia's largest private art collection. For detailed information on Kuala Lumpur's other art galleries it is best to visit the Kakiseni website.

THEME PARKS

Peninsular Malaysia has several theme parks that offer exciting all-day amusement for the entire family. Children especially enjoy the action-packed environment. One of the more popular venues is the Genting Theme Park (see p90), Malaysia's first and biggest theme park, which has both indoor and outdoor activities. Among the extensive entertainment choices are roller-coaster rides, amusement arcades, a 32-lane bowling alley, the Awana Equestrian Ranch, and a cineplex, as well as music and theater performances. Another favorite hangout is the Mines Wonderland, which has a Snow House filled with ice sculptures, ice skating rinks, and exciting rides. It also presents Light Fantasy on Water, and a sound and light show. Wet World Water Park in Shah Alam (see p76) and Sunway Lagoon are water theme parks with water chutes and wave pools.

THEATER

Kuala Lumpur hosts a great variety of theatrical performances throughout the year. Apart from touring Broadway hits, traditional and experimental musicals, comedies, and tragedies written by international as well as local playwrights, are also staged. There is a particularly active fringe theater scene in Kuala Lumpur, with groups such as Instant Café producing thought-provoking plays. The venues are as varied as the productions, ranging from the state-of-the-art Kuala Lumpur Performing Arts Center to the simple Old China Café.

Traditional Malaysian theater is the shadow puppet play, or wayang kulit, accompanied by a gamelan, music played by a traditional Indonesian percussion orchestra. Once the main form of entertainment in Malay villages, it is now mostly performed in some rural parts of the east coast states of Terengganu and Kelantan. One good place to catch a show is at Gelanggang Seni in Kota Bharu (see pp146-7) and a typical performance often lasts about 8 hours. Chinese opera, or wayang, a mix of dialog, dance, and music is also traditionally performed in the country. Street shows are held mostly during festivals such as the Chinese New Year (see p28).

CINEMA

Kuala Lumpur and big towns around the country have numerous movie halls and multiplex cinemas, which screen the latest Hollywood releases, usually with the original soundtrack and subtitles in Malay and Chinese. Movies from China, India, and other Asian countries are also screened. Most cinemas have air conditioning. Some of the biggest cinema chains are Golden Screen Cinemas, Tanjong Golden Village, and Cathay Cineplexes. The oldest cinema in Kuala Lumpur, still functioning today, is the Coliseum Cinema (see p70). Cinema listings, show times, and tickets are available on the Cinema Online website.

TRADITIONAL AND CLASSICAL MUSIC

Reflecting a blend of cultures, predominantly Indian, Chinese, Muslim, and Indonesian,

Musicians playing a traditional Malay instrument traditional Malaysian music is based largely around several types of drums – an influence of the gamelan – and other percussion instruments. Modern composers are constantly experimenting with a fusion of new and traditional instruments such as synthesizers in an attempt to keep classical music popular among the younger generation. Traditional music performances are frequently held at the Malaysian Tourism Information Complex (see p74) and the National Theater (see p71) both in Kuala Lumpur. Occasionally the National Theater hosts classical music concerts featuring the National Symphony Orchestra. The main classical venue in Kuala Lumpur is Dewan Filharmonik Petronas. This was Malaysia's first classical concert hall and is home to the Malaysian Philharmonic Orchestra. It stages classical concerts and hosts local and international cultural performances.

CONTEMPORARY MUSIC

Extremely popular among Malaysian youth, contemporary western music often provides inspiration for local groups who create songs in Malay that are set to pop, rock, hip-hop, or underground beats.

Touring pop stars of international repute occasionally perform in Kuala Lumpur. The Arena of the Stars stadium in Genting Highlands (see p90) is a popular venue for such concerts. Some of the most popular contemporary live music venues in Kuala Lumpur are the Hard Rock Café, No Black Tie, and Titus Blues. Many famous DJs from Europe also visit Kuala Lumpur's hippest clubs.

TRADITIONAL DANCE

Like its music, Malaysia's traditional dances are strongly influenced by Islamic, Indian, and Chinese cultures, though they have evolved into their own unique styles. Many of these dance forms continue to enjoy widespread popularity in the country and are performed during special occasions and festivals. Perhaps the most popular traditional dance is joget, which has its origins in Portuguese folk dance and is performed by couples who blend fast and graceful movements with playful humor. Mak yong combines romantic drama, dance, and operatic singing. Originally presented only in Kelantan's royal courts, it is now enjoyed by all. Silat is an elegant dance that developed from martial arts and is accompanied by percussion music. It is often performed at weddings and festivals. One of the most popular dances from Sarawak is the datun julud, or hornbill dance. Created by the Kenyah people, it is based on the story of a prince blessed with a grandson and involves a single female dancer who waves fans of hornbill feathers to the sound of a sape, or a traditional guitar. A good place to enjoy traditional music and dance in Sarawak is the Sarawak Cultural Village (see p159).

PUBS, BARS, AND KARAOKE

Kuala Lumpur has a dizzying range of nightlife haunts that cater to every taste. The greatest concentration of pubs and bars is in the Golden Triangle (see p74). Located here is Planet Hollywood, an international bar and restaurant chain that sprawls over three floors, as well as the Beach Club Café, which mostly plays old favorites and is often packed to the rafters. The capital's other pulsating night-spot is around Bangsar. Bars such as Finnegan's serving Kilkenny beer and La Bodega with its Spanish ambience infuse it with a cosmopolitan feel. Another bar worth a visit for lovers of rhythm and blues music is Modesto's.

Karaoke is hugely popular in most Asian countries, and Malaysia is no exception. Among Kuala Lumpur's chic, luxurious, and commonly visited karaoke bars are Cherry Blossom, Deluxe Nite Club, and Club De Vegas.

Other main towns in the country with a fair choice of pubs and bars are Kuching, Johor Bahru, Kota Kinabalu, and several in Penang. Since drinks can be expensive in Malaysia, it is worth looking out for places that offer happy hour prices, typically two drinks for the price of one. Generally, happy hour is between 5 and 8pm. Many bars feature live music, especially at weekends, for which there is usually a cover charge of around RM20.

NIGHTCLUBS AND DISCOS

Although nightclubs and discos can be found in all large Malaysian towns, Kuala Lumpur has the widest choice of venues. Most places don't pick up pace until around 10pm, but are throbbing with life until the early hours of dawn. Several locations feature Ladies' Nights when women can get free entry. The popularity of individual clubs tends to fluctuate, but the hottest spots in town can usually be found around the junction of Jalan P. Ramlee and Jalan Sultan Ismail. Most places play European and British house music, and frequently feature well-known international DJs. Among the trendiest places are Zouk, The Loft, Maison, Atmosphere, and Bliss, the last two of which are situated in Twelve SI, Kuala Lumpur's biggest clubbing complex. Discos tend to be located in upmarket shopping malls or in hotels, and among the most popular clubs are Liquid and Sugar Club.

OUTDOOR ACTIVITIES IN MALAYSIA

From the summit of Gunung Kinabalu to the depths of the South China Sea, Malaysia offers an array of opportunities to enjoy the country's natural wonders. Pristine offshore islands such as Langkawi, Tioman, and Sipadan attract divers with their stunning coral reefs and rich marine life. Most beach resorts offer adventure sports such as windsurfing, parasailing, waterskiing and snorkeling. The oldest rain forests in the world with their towering trees, tangled vines, and gaping limestone caves are wonderful to explore. Tour agents cater to the needs of special interest groups, from climbers to bird-watchers, while river cruises are a comfortable way of visiting the mangrove swamps on the coast of Malaysian Borneo. The agreeable climate is perfect for golf enthusiasts.

GUIDED TOURS

Tourism in Malaysia is well developed and tour operators, such as CPH Travel Agency and Asian Overland Services, offer a wide range of choices. Depending on a visitor's time and budget, everything from a half-day city tour to a 10-day tour of the country is available.

Independent travelers can join tour groups, such as S.I. Tours and Exotic Adventure, to visit sights and participate in activities that would otherwise be prohibitively expensive. For example, a tour is the best way to access Sarawak's Mulu National Park (see pp170–71), hike up Gunung Kinabalu (see pp184–7) in Sabah, or join a white-water rafting expedition down Sungai Padas (see p181). The advantage of joining a guided tour is that the local guide's knowledge can enrich the experience of visiting a place you may never return to.

BOOKINGS AND PERMITS FOR NATIONAL PARKS

At most national parks and reserves in Malaysia, visitors can pay the entry fees at Park Headquarters within the reserve's boundaries or at the entrance. However, booking in advance is necessary for a few of the parks, such as Tanjung Datu National Park (see p160) and Semenggoh Nature Reserve (see p161). Permits and entrance tickets can be obtained at the National Parks Booking Office in Kuching (see pp154–5) or at its branch in Miri. Visitors entering Endau-Rompin National Park (see p137) from Johor also have the option of buying a permit from the Johor State Economic Unit. Some parks require official permits for professional filming and photography, as well as for activities such as trekking and fishing. These can be obtained either at the park itself or, if in Sarawak, from the National Parks Booking Offices. Many parks offer accommodations and, while it is not mandatory to book in advance for all, it is advisable to do so as preserves and parks tend to get busy, especially during weekends and holidays. Some parks may require permits for camping. The National Parks Booking Offices also handle accommodation bookings.

TREKKING

Malaysia's national parks are ideal for those wishing to trek through scenic landscape and observe the country's wildlife. At over 13,436 ft (4,095 m), Sabah's Gunung Kinabalu is one of the highest peaks in the world that can be climbed without special climbing equipment, so it is not surprising that hundreds set out every day with the intention of standing on its summit. Park authorities advise against climbing Kinabalu independently and hiring a guide is recommended. A climbing permit can be purchased on arrival at Park Headquarters. Most climbers take two days to reach this summit with an overnight stay in one of the mountain huts, such as the one at Laban Rata, 10,738 ft (3,273 m) above sea level. It is essential to pre-book, particularly in the peak season (April). Wear good walking boots and warm, waterproof clothing, and bring a sleeping bag, water, and high-energy food. A flashlight is invaluable since climbs can start early in the morning to catch the sunrise at the summit.

Braving the Pinnacles at Mulu National Park

For less strenuous climbs, there are alternatives, ranging from a trek up Taman Negara's Gunung Tahan (see pp138–9) to the climb up Sarawak's Gunung Mulu (see p171) or the Pinnacles on Gunung Api (see p171). Malaysia's terrain is challenging, and it is wise to trek with local tour companies, such as Suniland Travel and Tours Sdn Bhd.

In parks that lie within the protected area of Sarawak Forestry Corporation, such as Mulu National Park, guides are mandatory while trekking. Taman Negara is best for beginners as it has trails for every level of ability. Bako National Park (see pp162–3) in Sarawak has several easy trails, while Gunung Mulu and Gunung Kinabalu test the fittest of walkers. Peradayan Forest Reserve in Brunei also offers many good trails.

Most of Malaysia's forests are ecologically fragile and protected by the Department of Wildlife and National Parks. While many visitors opt to trek on their own following color-coded trails, treks can be organized by the department or private companies, such as Borneo Adventures or Utan Bara Adventure Team.

Hikers should shield themselves from the sun and drink lots of water to avoid dehydration. Leech socks can also be very useful, especially during the wet season.

CAVING

Malaysia's landscape, riddled with some of the world's largest limestone caves, lures spelunkers from around the world. Many guas, or caves, such as Lang's Cave in Gulung Mulu, are covered with beautiful stalactites and stalagmites, while others, such as the nearby Deer Cave, offer opportunities for adventure caving, following rarely visited routes.

The caves at Niah (see p168) and Mulu National Park in Sarawak attract millions of bats and birds, which roost in their dank interiors. Sabah's Gomantong Caves (see p191) are famed for their swiftlet nests. Locals clamber up bamboo poles to retrieve the nests, considered a gastronomic delicacy by some. The best time to see the cave's wildlife is at dusk, during the changeover when bats come hurtling out for their night feeding and swiftlets return to their nests.

Though smaller than the caves in Borneo, the illuminated caverns at Tempurong in Selangor and the Hindu shrines at Batu Caves (see p90) are remarkable. For those intrigued by their hidden recesses, the Malaysian Nature Society Caving Group offers quick courses and arranges cave explorations.

Diving in Malaysia

The idyllic islands scattered around the coast of Malaysia provide easy access to the country's spectacular dive sites. While Malaysia is a strong draw for experienced divers, it is also a good training ground for amateurs, with numerous diving outfits offering lessons (see p329) in the waters around islands such as Pulau Tioman, Pulau Redang, and the Perhentian Islands. Some of the more common marine creatures that divers can hope to spot are whale sharks, manta rays, starfish, and a variety of sea turtles. The monsoon season reduces visibility and makes diving less rewarding. The best time to visit the west coast of Peninsular Malaysia is from November to May, while March to October are the ideal months for a trip to the east coast of the peninsula and around Sabah and Sarawak. The islands off the southwest coast of Sabah are suitable for diving all year round.

TYPES OF DIVING

Malaysia's coastline offers wreck diving, snorkeling, and coral reef diving. While wreck dives enable experienced divers to glimpse Malaysia's underwater treasures, coral reefs can be explored by snorkelers and scuba divers.

Wreck dives allow divers to explore old shipwrecks. The easiest wreck to navigate is the Cement Wreck, which sank in 1980 off the coast of Labuan.

MALAYSIA'S BEST DIVE SITES

- Perhentian Islands see p142
- Pulau Kapas see p140
- Pulau Labuan see p180
- Pulau Lankayan see p191

- Pulau Sipadan see pp194-5
- Pulau Sulug see p179
- Pulau Tenggel see p140
- Pulau Tioman see pp130-31

Snorkeling needs only a mask and a snorkel. It is the best way to watch underwater life at close quarters.

MARINE LIFE

The waters off Malaysia are a treasure trove of marine species. East coast islands such as Tioman are home to black marlin and yellowfin, schools of barracuda, and reef sharks.

Whale sharks are gentle and slow plankton-feeding sharks. The largest living fish species, they grow to 39 ft (12 m) in length.

Green sea turtles are an endangered species. The adult turtle's algae diet is responsible for its green color.

Starfish, also known as sea stars, are bright and vibrantly colored. These boneless species glide across the ocean floor.

White-water rafting along one of Malaysia's rivers

DIVING AND SNORKELING

Diving in Malaysia has grown in popularity in recent years. Numerous scuba diving and marine clubs as well as beach resorts offer equipment for hire. Most dive operators have five-day PADI courses leading to certification as a diver and also organize trips to dive sites. Borneo Divers and Sea Sports, Pulau Sipadan Resort and Tours, and Borneo Sea Adventures are some of Malaysia's best tour operators.

In several places, coral reefs are in shallow water, making it easy for snorkelers to get among them and explore the pristine vistas and vibrant corals. However, care should be taken not to touch the corals as they can sting and are easily damaged. The number of divers permitted at any one time in Pulau Sipadan (see pp194–5) is limited, and booking in advance is wise.

WATERSPORTS

Paragliding, windsurfing, waterskiing, wakeboarding, and jetskiing are just some of the watersports on offer at Malaysia's beach resorts. Sea Quest Tours and Travel organizes glass-bottom boat cruises along the coast. They also arrange sunset cruises and island-hopping tours.

Some travel insurance companies do not cover injuries sustained while indulging in watersports, so policies should be checked before signing up.

WHITE-WATER RAFTING

The frothing rivers that tumble out of Malaysia's rugged mountains become rapids en route to the sea. They once formed an impassable barrier for many explorers. Today, however, they form the perfect setting for a white-water rafting adventure. Rapids are graded from Class I to V, but anything above Class III will need an expert guide. One of the top sites is Sabah's spectacular Padas Gorge (see p181) with Class III–IV rapids that leave paddlers exhilarated. Sungai Sungkei and Sungai Kampar in Perak, north of Kuala Lumpur, feature gentler rapids.

No previous experience is necessary for white-water rafting, as tour operators such as Nomad Adventure and Exotic Adventure run through safety procedures before setting off. Rafters wear helmets and protective jackets and have to be good swimmers. The experience varies, as rivers offer a sedate drift in the drier months and a soaking roller-coaster ride after severe rain. Children above 12 are allowed on such trips provided they are good swimmers and are accompanied by parents or legal guardians.

RIVER CRUISES

A comparatively recent phenomenon on Malaysia's ecotourism scene is a cruise through lush rain forests and mangrove swamps. These cruises usually set out in the early mornings or late afternoons, and as the boat glides over the water, knowledgeable guides help spot long-tail macaques, silver langurs, and proboscis monkeys, as well as birds such as hornbills feeding in the trees close to the water's edge.

Such cruises are available in Pulau Langkawi (see pp112–5) and Taman Negara (see pp170–1) on the peninsula, or at the Klias Wetlands (see p180) and Kinabatangan Wildlife Sanctuary in Sabah (see p191). Irrawaddy dolphins are occasionally seen splashing in the shallows around the mouth of the Sungai Santubong in Sarawak. On disembarking from the cruise, tour groups such as S.I. Tours and Borneo Eco Tours often treat their guests to a buffet dinner before driving them back to their hotels.

GOLF

With affordable caddies, low green fees, and equipment hire at reasonable rates, the country's well-planned courses attract golfers from all over the world. Day visitors can usually enjoy a game of golf by paying a fee.

Almost 200 golf courses are currently available in the country, with locations ranging from the cool Fraser's Hill (see p91) to the sandy coastline of Borneo. A few of the most popular courses in Peninsular Malaysia include the Royal Selangor Golf Club and Cameron Highlands Golf Club. On the outskirts of Kuala Lumpur is the designer Mines Resort Golf and Country Club course. North Borneo Tours and Travels Sdn Bhd provides information about the Damai Golf Club and the Borneo Golf and Country Club.

WILDLIFE VIEWING

People visit Malaysia in great numbers to view its tropical biodiversity comprising over 200 kinds of mammals, many thousands of flowering plants, and a spectrum of butterflies. Malaysia's wildlife includes orangutans, Borneo gibbons, proboscis monkeys, and hornbills. It may be necessary to trek through jungles or climb up mountains to spot rarer species. Fraser's Hill and Taman Negara (see pp138-9) are both easily accessible wildlife-spotting areas.

Another popular activity is an organized tour to spot orangutans in their natural habitat at Semonggoh Nature Reserve in Sarawak (see p161), or at Sepilok Orangutan Rehabilitation Center (see p190) in Sabah. Wildlife enthusiasts can also see green and hawksbill turtles nesting and observe hatchlings being released by rangers on islands such as Gulisan, Bakungan Kecil, and Pulau Selingam, and on a trip to Turtle Island National Park (see p190).

WWF, the global conservation organization, plans events to support the terrain threatened by poaching and deforestation.

BIRD-WATCHING

With more than 600 identified species, Malaysia is a paradise for bird-watchers. Part of the reason for this great diversity is that Malaysia has many different habitats, including montane forests, lowland forests, mangrove swamps, and wetlands, which provide good nesting conditions for all kinds of birds. Apart from the eight varieties of hornbill that can be seen gliding over the rainforest canopy, crested serpent eagles, mangrove pittas, kingfishers, and trogons delight bird-watchers.

In Malaysian Borneo, Sarawak is the perfect place for a wildlife holiday and is often referred to as the Land of the Hornbill. Kinabalu National Park (see pp184-5) in Sabah has a fantastic variety of flycatchers and magpies. Among the best locations on Peninsular Malaysia for bird-watching are Kuala Selangor Nature Park and Fraser's Hill, where swiftlets and cuckoos predominate. Enthusiastic twitchers might like to join in one of many birding events, such as the Fraser's Hill International Bird Race (see p90) that takes place annually in June.

Borneo Mainland Travel and Tours, Kingfisher Tours, Malaysian Nature Society Birding Group, and Wild Asia are among the tour operators and groups that organize bird-watching. Binoculars, a good field-guide, and a hat will prove to be very useful on a bird-watching trip.

PRACTICAL INFORMATION 332-341

PRACTICAL INFORMATION

Malaysia is one of Asia's top tourist destinations, appealing to package tourists and independent travelers alike. The government of Malaysia, long aware of the country's potential as a tropical paradise, has been promoting tourism for decades. Visitors will find that the tour operators are notably efficient, hotels are well maintained, traveling around is usually smooth, and local people are generally friendly in Singapore, Malaysia, and Brunei. Singapore is an exceptionally safe country, largely free of violent crime, dirt, and most tropical diseases.

The Malaysian government is especially keen to demonstrate how the country has developed into a well-integrated and sophisticated modern society, offering all the conveniences that visitors are used to at home.

WHEN TO GO

Malaysia, Singapore, and Brunei fall entirely within the tropics, so all three countries have a hot and humid climate all year round, with temperatures hovering around 30° C (86° F) and rarely dipping below 20° C (68° F). Visitors keen to lounge on a beach or participate in adventure sports should avoid the monsoons. The rainy season affects the west coast of the peninsula between May and September. On the east coast and in Malaysian Borneo, the monsoon falls between November and February. It is worth timing a visit to coincide with one of the country's major festivals, such as the Merdeka Eve celebration (see p60) or the Rainforest World Music Festival (see p159). Chinese and Hindu festivals in Singapore take place in January and February.

VISAS AND PASSPORTS

Visitors need a passport that is valid for at least six months from the date of arrival. A visa can be obtained overseas at Malaysian embassies, though many nationalities are granted one on arrival. Citizens of some European, African, South American, and ASEAN countries can stay in Malaysia for a month without a visa. Citizens of the UK, USA, New Zealand, Australia, Canada, and Ireland are automatically issued 3-month tourist visas on arrival which can be extended for another three months by applying to the Immigration Department. The Malaysian Foreign Office website has further details.

Although an integral part of Malaysia, Sarawak has its own immigration system, and officials stamp all passports granting a month's stay. A special permit required to travel in some remote parts of Sabah and Sarawak is generally available from the Resident's office in the relevant areas.

Brunei issues visas on arrival to citizens of the UK, USA, Australia, Canada, and New Zealand. The initial stamp is valid for between two weeks and three months, and can be extended by applying to the Immigration Department in Bandar Seri Begawan, the capital of Brunei. Citizens of most other nationalities are given 72-hour transit visas.

Singapore stamps in citizens from the UK, USA, Australia, New Zealand, and Canada for an initial two weeks, although visitors can request a month.

CUSTOMS INFORMATION

Duty-free limits are 50 cigars, 200 cigarettes, or 250g of tobacco, as well as a liter of both wine and spirits in Malaysia. Duty is payable on all tobacco in Singapore. Visitors who are carrying over US$2,500 need to fill a Declaration Form on arrival.

Possession of illegal drugs can result in a prison term or the death penalty in Malaysia, Singapore, and Brunei.

VISITOR INFORMATION

Anyone considering a visit to Malaysia, Singapore, and Brunei will find useful information on the official websites of Tourism Malaysia, the Singapore Tourism Board, and Tourism Brunei.

The websites provide details of festivals, hotels, and resorts. The tourist boards, aided by their efficient network of domestic and overseas offices, offer a wide range of pamphlets on the most attractive tourist destinations. For information on Malaysian Borneo, both the Sabah Tourism Board and the Sarawak Tourism Board have detailed websites. Most hotels operate a tour service or can make arrangements for guests while backpackers' lodges are generally excellent sources of local information.

OPENING HOURS

Government offices in Malaysia are open between 7:30am and 5:30pm, Monday to Friday. Museums keep similar hours, though it is worth checking specific locations for details. In Malaysia's more devout Muslim states, such as Kedah, Terrangganu, and Kelantan, offices are closed on Friday. Post offices are generally open between 8am to 6pm, from Monday and Saturday.

In Singapore, government offices remain open between 8:30am and 5pm, Monday to Friday. In Brunei, government offices are open between 7:45am and 4:30pm and remain closed on Friday and Sunday. For details on the opening hours of banks see pp340–41, and for shops see pp314–5.

Guide of Singapore

ADMISSION CHARGES

Most museums charge a nominal entry fee both in Malaysia and in Singapore. Most national parks charge RM10, except Kinabalu National Park, where the fee is RM15. Some of the more developed attractions charge a higher entry fee, including the Sepilok Orangutan Rehabilitation Center (RM30) and Sarawak Cultural Village (RM25). Night safaris tend to be expensive. Both countries have lower rates for children.

LOCAL TIME

Malaysia, Singapore, and Brunei are eight hours ahead of Greenwich Mean Time (GMT), 16 hours ahead of US Pacific Standard Time (PST)

and 13 hours ahead of Eastern Standard Time (EST) in the USA. However, Malaysia does not have daylight saving time, and visitors should note that these differences will change when countries observing daylight saving time move their clocks forward.

LUNAR CALENDAR

Malaysia and Singapore use the Gregorian (Western) calendar for administrative purposes, but many of their festivals, particularly Islamic or Chinese, are celebrated according to the lunar calendar. This means they fall on a different day each year. The main difference between the Chinese and Islamic lunar calendars is that the former uses an intercalary month, so that festivals occur mostly at the same time each year, while Islamic festivals occur about 10 days earlier each year. Most festivals are planned to coincide with the night of the full moon. To find exact dates of any festival, it is best to check the tourist board website of the country concerned.

ELECTRICITY

The electrical current in the region is 220–240 volts at 50 hertz. Equipment using 110 volts requires a converter. Adaptors are cheap and available in most big towns. Most wall sockets accommodate three-pronged square pin plugs as used in the UK.

Family boat ride on Sungai Santubong

TRAVELING WITH CHILDREN

Many Asians are fond of children, and parents traveling with children will often be surprised and delighted to find that their children are usually treated with affection and care almost everywhere in Malaysia, Singapore, and Brunei. An example of this is in restaurants, where the staff are often helpful, and willing to occupy children while parents have their meal. Malaysia is particularly child-friendly, with lots of places to visit that interest people of all ages. Childcare products are available throughout the region except in rural areas and remote destinations. Children's health, however, requires protection, especially against exposure to heat, and food- and water-related ailments.

WOMEN TRAVELERS

Malaysia, Singapore, and Brunei are reasonably safe for women traveling alone. It is important to bear in mind, though, that due to the conservative nature of Malaysian culture, unaccompanied Western women may attract attention, particularly in rural districts and Muslim areas. Women travelers are unlikely to be harassed if they are considerate of local customs, wear modest clothing, and avoid taking risks such as hitchhiking and walking alone at night.

DISABLED TRAVELERS

Singapore provides the best facilities for the disabled, while Malaysia unfortunately offers little in the way of assistance. Many hotels, banks, cinemas, and shopping centers in Singapore provide ramps and other amenities for those with special needs, but these are less common in Malaysia. Facilities are slowly improving, but only at high-end hotels. Public transport lacks wheelchair accessibility, and towns have high kerbs and uneven pavements. Access Singapore is a free guide that gives a list of amenities. Travel websites for the disabled, such as Global Access News, also offer guidance.

GAY AND LESBIAN TRAVELERS

Officially, neither Malaysia nor Singapore welcomes gay and lesbian travelers, and delivers strict punishment for homosexual acts. Nevertheless, a number of bars and clubs in Singapore and Kuala Lumpur bolster a thriving gay scene. For more information on gay and lesbian issues and events across Asia consult the website Utopia.

WHAT TO WEAR

Light, casual clothes in cotton and other natural fibers are ideal for the tropical climate of Malaysia, Singapore, and Brunei, which are hot and humid year-round. Hats and sunglasses are also advisable. A sweater and windproof jacket are recommended for those visiting hill stations. As there is some rainfall throughout the year in Malaysia, a raincoat is handy. It is also important to carry a few long-sleeved shirts and pairs of trousers or full-length dresses, not just as protection from the sun, but also for visits to conservative rural areas and religious venues as well as visits to smart restaurants and hotels. As a rule, especially in Malaysia and Brunei, it is best to dress modestly at all times.

Since laundry services are available in most hotels and guesthouses and cheap clothing, such as T-shirts and batik shirts, can be bought everywhere, it is best to travel light.

PHOTOGRAPHY

Natural beauty, teeming wildlife, and stunning architecture ensure that most places in Malaysia, Singapore, and Brunei are extremely photogenic. People are generally quite happy to have their picture taken, but to avoid unpleasantness it is always best to request their permission first, especially while visiting the indigenous people. Similarly, it is advisable to ask a priest or imam at all temples and mosques before taking pictures there.

Photo shops in Malaysia's big cities and in Singapore are well-stocked with equipment, memory cards, and print film; prices are cheaper than in the West. Professional slide film is only available in big cities, and even then it might be better to carry your own, as it tends to be improperly stored. It is worth using photographic services, such as film processing, before heading home. It is also easy and cheap to get images on a memory card transferred onto a DVD and to get prints from digital images.

SOCIAL CUSTOMS

The majority of the Malaysian population is conservative, but visitors will find most social customs flexible and generally easy to comply with. Loud behavior is considered rude. As a rule, do not point at people or objects using the index finger; instead indicate with the thumb or the whole hand. Although men shake hands, wait for a hand to be offered. Also note that in Muslim company it is impolite to touch people with the left hand or on the head. Public displays of affection such as hugging and kissing are also frowned upon. Topless sunbathing and nudity on beaches are taboo.

Before entering a Malaysian home, visitors should take their shoes off. Never help yourself to food without it being offered first and avoid eating with the left hand.

While most big cities have a modern outlook in terms of fashion, Muslim women still dress conservatively. Care must be taken to dress modestly, with arms and legs covered, when visiting rural areas, temples, mosques, and other religious places, as well as in Muslim areas or homes. Non-Muslim women may be forbidden to enter mosques in some places.

LANGUAGE

Bahasa Malaysia, which means Malay language, is the official language of Malaysia and Brunei. In Singapore, English and Mandarin are widely spoken, though visitors may also hear Tamil, Cantonese, Hindi, or any number of indigenous languages that are still used by the multi-ethnic population. Visitors who learn even a few Malay phrases will endear themselves to their hosts.

CONVERSION CHART

Imperial to Metric

1 inch = 2.5 centimeters
 1 foot = 30 centimeters
 1 mile = 1.6 kilometers

Personal Security and Health

Tourist police logo

Malaysia, Singapore, and Brunei are all relatively safe to travel in as crime rates are low. However, the same common-sense safety rules apply here as anywhere else and visitors need to be vigilant in big cities where pickpockets and bag-snatchers may operate. Avoid wearing expensive jewelry. There are no particular health dangers in these countries as the health and hygiene standards are among the highest in Asia. However, while hospitals in major cities are well equipped there are limited medical facilities in rural areas.

Singapore policeman and a patrol car

POLICE

Most visitors never have cause for dealings with the police, unless reporting a theft or loss. In Malaysia, areas with large numbers of tourists are also patrolled by special tourist police who offer extra protection.

Singapore has strict laws that prohibit smoking in public places, littering, and even chewing gum, for which steep fines ranging from S$50–1,000 are imposed. The police here are particularly vigilant. Although sometimes tourists may be let off with a warning for these offences, it is best to respect local laws.

GENERAL PRECAUTIONS

While traveling in the region is relatively safe, some basic precautions should be followed. Avoid carrying large sums of money or wearing expensive jewelry; leave them in your hotel safe. Keep money and passports in a money belt beneath clothing to prevent the risk of pickpocketing. Valuables such as cameras and mobile phones should be hidden from view. Avoid walking along dimly-lit streets after dark or leaving purses unattended. It is a good idea to photocopy travel insurance papers, passport, and documents, in case of theft or loss.

LOST AND STOLEN PROPERTY

If you are robbed, report the theft immediately to the local police station. A police report will be necessary to make an insurance claim later. Lost or stolen credit cards and traveler's checks must be reported to the issuing bank to prevent withdrawals and cards must be cancelled thereafter for replacements. If a passport is lost or stolen, contact your embassy or consulate in order to obtain a replacement (see p335).

Tourist police in Malaysia

NARCOTICS

Malaysia and Singapore are two of the strictest countries in the world when it comes to penalties for possessing or smuggling narcotics, and anyone caught carrying them can expect either a long time in prison or possibly the death sentence. Brunei, too, carries the death penalty for drug trafficking.

HEALTH PRECAUTIONS

Standards of health and hygiene are high in both Malaysia and Singapore, so visitors have little to fear. No inoculations are necessary, unless you have recently visited countries where yellow fever is prevalent. If so, you will be required to show proof of vaccination to immigration authorities on arrival.

Most areas of Malaysia have no risk of malaria. However, if visiting remote areas, it is advisable to begin a course of malaria tablets at least two weeks before traveling. Since these tablets are only partially effective, it is also advisable to use insect repellent and ensure that sleeping areas are equipped with mosquito screens on the doors and windows or mosquito nets over the beds.

The most common problem for travelers is diarrhea and stomach upsets caused by a change in diet, water, and climate. To reduce the risk of diarrhea, drink only bottled or boiled water, avoid ice in drinks and raw food, and eat only in clean places.

For people from temperate climates, the greatest danger of traveling to the tropics is the heat, which can easily cause dehydration and sunburn. Drink plenty of water, stay in the shade, and protect yourself from direct sunlight with a hat, sunscreen, and sunglasses. The tropical climate can also play havoc with open cuts and burns, so treat them immediately. Bring a well-stocked medical kit, which should include personal medication, painkillers, antiseptic, antibiotics, anti-diarrhea tablets, and insect sting relief to help tackle most minor problems. However, if a problem persists, seek medical advice immediately.

HOSPITALS AND MEDICAL TREATMENT

All large towns in Malaysia have a district hospital as well as private clinics. Most are clean and all doctors speak some English. These hospitals also have an emergency department, where foreigners are usually given priority. Clinics catering specifically for expatriates and tourists are usually more expensive than local facilities. However, while amenities in the major cities are well developed, with hospitals in Kuala Lumpur such as Gleneagles Medical Center and Pantai Medical Center being among the best, reliable medical care can be difficult to find in rural areas. Brunei has adequate health care facilities but serious health problems are better treated in Singapore, which has world-class medical facilities. Major hospitals here include Raffles Hospital and Singapore General.

PHARMACIES

Even the smallest towns in Malaysia have well-stocked pharmacies. The Guardian Pharmacy has a large number of outlets in Malaysia. The well-known pharmacies in Singapore include Changi General Hospital Pharmacy and AM Pharmacy. Medication may be bought over the counter in Malaysia without a doctor's prescription, but that is not possible in Singapore. When traveling, carry a good supply of your prescription medicines from home.

TRAVEL AND HEALTH INSURANCE

It is best to take out travel insurance before traveling to the region. Ensure that it covers you for injury, sickness, accident, emergency hospital treatment, and repatriation as well as medical assistance. You will need extra coverage if you participate in high-risk activities such as diving or mountain climbing.

Banking and Currency

Banks are generally easy to find in Malaysia, Singapore, and Brunei. Commercial and merchant banks freely allow non-residents to open foreign currency accounts without too many restrictions on the movement of funds through these accounts. Visitors can bring any amount of foreign currency into or out of Malaysia or Singapore, although it must be declared at customs. However, there is a limit of RM1,000 on the amount of ringgit allowed into or out of Malaysia.

Citibank, one of the many international banks in Singapore

BANKS

Maybank is Malaysia's largest bank. International banks, such as Citibank, are also established in all three countries. Malaysian banking hours are from 9:30am to 4pm from Monday to Friday and 9:30 to 11:30am on Saturday. In the Muslim states of Kedah, Terengganu, and Kelantan, however, the banks are open from 9:30am to 4pm from Saturday to Wednesday, and from 9:30 to 11am on Thursday; they remain closed on Friday. Banks in Singapore are open from 9:30am to 3pm from Monday to Friday, and from 9:30 to 11:30am on Saturday.

CHANGING MONEY

Cash and traveler's checks can be exchanged at large branches of all banks for a small service fee. Most major currencies such as dollars and euros are easily exchangeable, though outside the big cities, it can be difficult to exchange other currencies such as the Thai baht or the Indonesian rupiah. Top-end hotels will also exchange dollars and some common currencies, but rates are usually less favorable than at banks. Licensed money-changers generally stay open until 6pm and often offer the best rates. Exchange facilities can be difficult to find in remote areas, especially in Sarawak and Sabah, so carry adequate cash at all times.

ATMS

Automatic teller machines (ATMs) are becoming ubiquitous in Malaysia, except in isolated areas, and have long been so in Singapore. ATMs only issue the currency of the respective country, and there is a daily withdrawal limit of around US$800. A fee is levied for each transaction, usually about US$3.

CREDIT CARDS AND TRAVELER'S CHECKS

Major credit cards can be used in most urban and tourist areas, with VISA and MasterCard being the most widely accepted. They can also be used at ATMs for withdrawals and at major banks for cash advances. Traveler's checks, commonly issued by American Express and VISA, can be exchanged at major banks, and many hotels and shops will also accept them as cash on presentation of a passport. Lost or stolen traveler's checks and credit cards must be reported to the issuer.

CURRENCY

The Malaysian unit of currency is the ringgit, denoted by RM before the price of an item. Locals often refer to it, rather confusingly, as dollars. It is further divided into 100 sen although tourists are unlikely to need these small denomination coins unless shopping in a local market. In Singapore, the unit of currency is the Singapore dollar, written S$, which is made up of 100 cents. The Brunei dollar is at par with the Singapore dollar and is legal tender in Singapore.

Communications and Media

The communications network in Malaysia, Singapore, and Brunei is fast and efficient, offering a variety of local, national, and worldwide services. Local and international calls can be made from public telephones in all but the smallest of islands. Mobile phone facilities and Internet access are particularly impressive, with networks that compete with the best in the West. The postal system is reliable and well organized. International publications and several locally published English newspapers and magazines are available in big cities.

INTERNATIONAL AND LOCAL PHONE CALLS

Public telephones can be found all over Singapore, Malaysia, and Brunei. They are both phonecard- and coin-operated, and most also accept credit cards. Telekom Malaysia is a national operator while SingTel is Singapore's main telephone company. Local calls in Malaysia cost 10 sen for unlimited time, and 10 cents for three minutes in Singapore. Public telephones in all three countries offer international direct dialing (IDD), and it is best to use a phonecard for these calls. Phonecards of several companies are available at petrol stations and convenience stores, such as 7-Eleven, in denominations of between RM5 and RM50 in Malaysia, S$2 and S$50 in Singapore, and B$10 and B$100 in Brunei. Collect calls from Malaysia can only be made from a Telekom Malaysia office, which can also be used for regular long-distance calls.

Most big hotels in the region also have IDD facilities, but this service is extremely expensive. Faxes can be sent from telecom offices in major cities and hotels.

Malaysian phone numbers generally consist of six or seven digits, except in Kuala Lumpur which has eight-digit phone numbers. All numbers are preceded by a two- or three-digit area code. Phone numbers all across Singapore consist of eight digits and there is no area code within the country.

CELL PHONES

Generally, cell phone network coverage is good in Malaysia, except in the remote regions of Sarawak and Sabah where some networks work better than others. There is complete coverage across Singapore. Cell phones with international roaming service will automatically tune into one of the local networks, but this service is very expensive. It is best to buy a local prepaid SIM card, such as Maxis and Celcom in Malaysia, or SingTel and M1 in Singapore; these are all widely available. Text messaging is cheap, and many local network companies offer a certain amount of free messages as promotions.

INTERNET FACILITIES

The entire region has fully embraced the use of the Internet and cheap Internet access is available even in remote locations. Internet cafés in Malaysia charge by the hour and most places offer broadband connections. Rates in Singapore are comparable, and broadband is even more widespread. Bigger hotels often have Internet access in rooms or in a business center, but this is usually more expensive than the Internet cafés. Many backpacker lodges offer free Internet access to their guests. For those traveling with laptops, Wi-Fi (wireless Internet connection) facilities are highly advanced in Singapore, but uncommon outside Kuala Lumpur in Malaysia. Note that wall sockets accommodate three-pronged, square-pin plugs, and adaptors are easily available in most big towns.

POSTAL SERVICES

Post offices are found all over Malaysia and Singapore, and are generally very efficient. Each Malaysian town has a General Post Office (GPO) with poste restante, as do the GPOs in Singapore and Brunei. In Malaysia, post offices are open from 8am–5pm Monday to Friday, and some Saturdays, though in the states of Kedah, Terengganu,

A well-equipped Internet café in Malaysia and Kelantan they close on Friday instead of Sunday. The opening hours in Singapore are from 8am to 6pm Monday to Friday, and from 8am to 2pm on Saturday. Brunei post offices open from 7:45am to 4:30pm Monday to Thursday and Saturday, and from 8 to 11am and 2 to 4pm on Friday.

Letters and parcels posted from Malaysian towns usually take a week to reach overseas destinations. Anything posted from remote places in Sabah and Sarawak may take a few weeks to reach its destination. Postcards and aerograms cost 50 sen from Malaysia, and 50 cents from Singapore for the same service. Postcards from Brunei to any destination cost 30 cents. Most major post offices in the region have fax facilities too. Several well-known international courier services such as DHL, Federal Express, and United Parcel Service (UPS) operate in both Malaysia and Singapore as do local courier companies such as Nationwide Express.

TELEVISION AND RADIO

Both Malaysia and Singapore have a huge selection of satellite television channels. Terrestrial TV stations are closely monitored for signs of criticism of the respective governments. RTM1 and RTM2 are Malaysia's government-run TV stations, which broadcast uncontroversial programs in Bahasa Malaysia. Commercial stations such as NTV7 feature English news, and international soaps and films.

Six government-run radio stations air programs in various languages including English. Singapore's television and radio channels offer a mixture of English, Tamil, Chinese, and Malay programs. Brunei has one TV channel with many imported programs and two radio channels.

NEWSPAPERS AND MAGAZINES

A wide range of international publications is available in most major hotels, bookstores, and newsstands in Singapore, and big cities in

The colorful Virtual Malaysia, packed with useful information

Malaysia, such as Kuala Lumpur. These include magazines such as Newsweek and Time and newspapers such as the International Herald Tribune. Both countries have local newspapers in English, though government censorship is strict, and dissenting views are rarely published. The leading English daily in Malaysia is The Star, besides The New Straits Times, Sun, and The Malay Mail. These are all good sources of information for upcoming events. In Sabah and Sarawak, the leading newspapers are New Sabah Times and the Sarawak Tribune. Malaysia also publishes some English magazines, including Virtual Malaysia. Singapore's main English papers are Straits Times and New Paper, while Borneo's main newspaper is Borneo Bulletin.

TRAVEL INFORMATION

Most overseas visitors to Malaysia and Singapore arrive at Kuala Lumpur International Airport (KLIA) and Changi Airport, respectively. Many visitors prefer to arrive overland taking a train or a bus from Thailand, and a few opt for cruise ships. Although most towns in Malaysia are well-connected by domestic flights and buses, remote areas in Sarawak and Sabah suffer from poor road conditions. These days, increasing numbers of tourists opt for low-cost carriers, such as

MRT logo

Tiger Airways in Singapore and AirAsia in Malaysia, to make short hops within Southeast Asia from places like Bangkok and Hong Kong. Traveling by rail can be fun, with comfortable sleeper compartments for long journeys, though the network is limited to a couple of lines. Both Singapore and Kuala Lumpur have good public transport services, such as the Light Rail Transit (LRT) and the Mass Rapid Transport System (MRT), that make life easy for first-time visitors to these cities.

ARRIVING BY AIR

Over 50 international carriers connect Singapore and Malaysia to most continents. Some of the international carriers that operate out of the two countries are Air Canada, Cathay Pacific, China Airlines, Emirates Airlines, Japan Airlines, Garuda Indonesia, British Airways, KLM, Qantas, Thai Airways, and United Airlines.

Low-cost carriers such as AirAsia, Silk Air, Tiger Airways, and Jetstar offer several options for passengers flying in from other Southeast Asian countries. There are flights from Singapore to Langkawi by Silk Air and to Kuching by Singapore Airlines as well.

Malaysia Airlines (MAS) and Singapore Airlines, the national carriers, are well-connected to most parts of the world. There is a regular service between Kuala Lumpur and Singapore, operated by both official airlines, leaving at half-hour intervals during peak hours.

Many international airlines use either KLIA or Changi Airports as their gateways to Southeast Asia, or as stopover points from Europe to New Zealand and Australia. Both airports are super-modern and well equipped with all the facilities that travelers might need, such as shops, restaurants, and Internet access. Passengers arriving at Changi Airport, 10 miles (16 km) from central Singapore, have a choice of transport to reach the city, including MRT, limousine services, and airport shuttles.

AIR FARES

There is a wide range of tickets available for travel to and around Singapore and Malaysia, but the prices vary seasonally. During the peak months from July to August, and December to January, prices soar for flights from the USA and Europe.

With over 50 international carriers using the main airports there is stiff competition, and it makes sense to compare the rates of different airlines before booking a flight. For travelers already in Southeast Asia, it is worth considering budget airlines such as Tiger Airways and AirAsia, which offer fares comparable to those on buses and trains. The ticket price is usually exclusive of an international departure tax. It is best to book in advance and check with online booking services.

ARRIVING BY LAND

Traveling by train is a popular way for visitors from Thailand to enter Malaysia, crossing the border at Padang Besar. Passengers can change at Butterworth for Penang or continue to Kuala Lumpur's Stesen Sentral or Singapore

Airport arrival hall sign

Luxurious interior of the Eastern & Oriental Express

Train Station. The Eastern & Oriental Express (E & O), combining luxury with classic sightseeing, covers the route from Bangkok to Singapore, passing through Kuala Lumpur's Stesen Sentral.

The main route for buses and taxis from Thailand is via Bukit Kayu Hitam at the Malaysian border. A causeway connects Johor Bahru at the southern tip of Malaysia to Singapore. From Pontianak in Kalimantan (Indonesian Borneo), it is possible to enter Sarawak in Malaysian Borneo. The main terminals are Puduraya Bus Station in Kuala Lumpur and the Singapore Bus Station.

ARRIVING BY SEA

Both the countries can be reached by sea. Malaysia has several authorized entry points. Some cruise liners, such as Star Cruises, travel regularly between Singapore, Port Klang, Penang, Pulau Langkawi, and even Phuket in Thailand. A ferry link connects Penang and Malacca on the peninsula with Medan and Dumai in Sumatra (Indonesia). There are regular longboat services between Pulau Langkawi and Satun in South Thailand. Ferries and small boats also connect Singapore to Tanjung Belungkor in the state of Johor in Malaysia.

ORGANIZED TOURS

The most economical way to visit Malaysia and Singapore is via an organized tour. A package deal usually includes flights, hotels, road transport, guides, and admission fee to tourist sights for little more than the cost of a flight. Tour companies such as Borneo Adventures (see p.329) and Thomson Worldwide offer exciting itineraries.

Traveling by Air

Malaysia has a very good network of internal flights, making air travel a comfortable and convenient way of getting around. The national carrier, Malaysia Airlines (MAS), is well-connected to almost all popular tourist destinations. Singapore itself is too small to require internal flights. With the advent of budget airlines, such as the hugely successful AirAsia, the much smaller Berjaya Air, and the new Fly Asian Xpress (FAX), the cost of flying has reduced considerably. Most big towns in Malaysia now have an airport, and it is easy to get tickets either through local travel agencies or by booking online. Flights are generally punctual, efficient, and inexpensive, which is particularly useful for visitors who want to see as much of the country as possible within a limited period of time.

DOMESTIC AIRLINES

Until recently, Malaysia Airlines (see p342) had a virtual monopoly on all domestic flights throughout Malaysia. The situation has now changed with the arrival of AirAsia (see p342) and Fly Asian Xpress (FAX), both of which offer low-cost, no-frills flights with limited seating space and payment for in-flight refreshments. AirAsia has now started to fly short-haul international routes, while FAX has taken over turbo-propeller plane services in Malaysian Borneo from Malaysia Airlines.

Berjaya Air offers a few flights from Kuala Lumpur and Singapore to some of the offshore islands, but prices are quite steep. Berjaya Air also claims that its Dash 7 aircraft is the biggest commercial aircraft to fly to the Tioman and Pangkor islands. Fares and availability can be checked and tickets booked online.

DOMESTIC AIRPORTS

All Malaysian Airlines domestic flights depart from the state-of-the-art Kuala Lumpur International Airport (KLIA) (see p342), the largest and most well-connected airport in Malaysia. AirAsia operates out of its main base at the Low-Cost Carrier (LCC), located 12 miles (20 km) from KLIA, to which it is connected by shuttle buses. Berjaya Air operates out of Sultan Abdul Aziz Shah Airport, Kuala Lumpur's former international airport.

In Peninsular Malaysia, there are airports at Ipoh, Penang, Kuala Lumpur, Alor Setar, Langkawi, Kota Bharu, Kuantan, Kuala Terengganu, and Johor Bahru. Airports in Sarawak include Kuching, Sibu, Mukah, Miri, Bintulu, Belaga, Lawas, Mulu, Ba Kalalan, Long Akah, Long Banga, Long Lellang, Long Seridan, Bario, and Limbang. In Sabah, there are airports at Kota Kinabalu, Labuan,

Kudat, Sandakan, Lahad Datu, Tawau, as well as Semporna.

The larger airports in all these states are serviced by both MAS and the fast expanding network of AirAsia. However, the smaller towns are connected in most cases only by the services of FAX.

FLIGHT NETWORK

While most major Malaysian towns are linked by direct flights, smaller towns also have connecting networks. In Peninsular Malaysia, most flights originate in Kuala Lumpur, flying to Pulau Tioman, Pulau Redang, and Pulau Pangkor. There are additional flights to Pulau Tioman from Selatar Airport in Singapore. Johor Bahru provides services to Penang, Ipoh, Kuala Lumpur, Kota Bharu, Kuching, Sibu, Miri, Kota Kinabalu, Sandakan, and Tawau.

In Malaysian Borneo, while the majority of flights originate in the provincial capitals of Kota Kinabalu and Kuching, it is also possible to make short hops without returning to the original point using the rural air services. Several 19-seater and 50-seater planes help maintain communications with the remote provinces. A visitor in Sarawak can therefore go from Kuching to Mulu via Sibu and Miri, or from Kota Kinabalu to Semporna via Sandakan in Sabah. There are also regular direct flights between both Miri and Mulu in Sarawak and Kota Kinabalu in Sabah.

TICKETS AND RESERVATIONS

Tickets for flights on any of the airlines listed in the directory can be purchased from travel agents, although these days it is easier to book online with a credit card. All airlines permit online booking through their websites and e-tickets are becoming more common. While there is usually some flexibility about changing dates for reservations with major carriers such as MAS and Singapore Airlines, budget airlines do not allow rescheduling. Changing the date of the flight after making a booking with a budget airline requires payment of a penalty.

FARES AND SPECIAL DISCOUNTS

With the introduction of budget airlines in Southeast Asia, travelers have a wide range of travel options. However, there are no low-cost long-haul carriers to the region from Europe or USA. Also, by the time tax and fuel surcharges are added, flights are no longer as cheap as they first appear. Potential travelers need to weigh carefully the pros and cons of traveling with different carriers. It is also worth checking promotions and offers from MAS and Singapore Airlines before making any reservations. Passengers arriving by international flights can also get a Discover Malaysia pass issued by MAS, which entitles them to five domestic flights for just US$199. Groups of three or four passengers can get a 50 percent discount from MAS, applicable on trips between the peninsula and Malaysian Borneo and also between Sabah and Sarawak. For other routes in Malaysia a 25 percent discount is applicable. The Singapore Stopover Holiday offered by Singapore Airlines includes free bus rides and admission to several tourist attractions as well as special hotel rates and discounts at shopping outlets.

TRAVEL AGENCIES

Both countries have travel agents who assist visitors with travel arrangements, hotel bookings, and guided tours. Asian Overland Services, Crest Travel and Tours, Discovery Tours and Travel, East West Executive Travellers, Excellence Holidays, Ezz Travel, J3 Travel, Honeyworld Holidays, Planet Travel, Jetliner Travel, Kennex Travel, Malaysia Tourism, STA Travel, Skyzone Tours and Travel, Transtar Travel, Pedati Saujana Holidays, Star Holiday Mart, TDK Travel and Tours, and TVI Holidays offer planned holidays.

Traveling by Train and Boat

While domestic flights are cheap and convenient for visitors with limited time, boat and train travel offers travelers a sense of the geographical variety and richness of Malaysia and Singapore. The railway connects many major towns in Peninsular Malaysia, while visitors to Sabah can experience rail travel on a short stretch from Kota Kinabalu to Tenom. A range of boats is available to tourists, from dugout canoes to luxury cruise liners. Many, such as the ekspres boats of Sarawak, have a distinctive character found nowhere else in Malaysia. Boat and train journeys take longer than flights and are suitable for travelers on an extended holiday.

RAILROAD NETWORK

The Malaysian railroad system, Keretapi Tanah Melayu Berhad (KTM), is a modern, economical, and comfortable mode of transport. The railroad was the only way to get around the country before the construction of the peninsula's road network, and many of the stations in the interior still retain their original colonial architecture.

The network consists of two main lines, with a few minor branches running down to the west coast. From its starting point in Singapore, the West Coast line heads north to Kuala Lumpur, then on to Ipoh and Butterworth, before finally connecting at the border town of Padang Besar with Thai Railways.

The second route is the East Coast line, popularly known as The Jungle Railway (see p149). Branching off the West Coast line at Gemas, about 37 miles (60 km) northeast of Malacca, it heads north through Kuala Lipis to Tumpat on the northeast coast near the Thai border. Most travelers heading to Thailand use the West Coast line, but it is possible to take the East Coast line up to Pasir Mas, and take a bus or taxi over the border to Sungei Golok, Thailand's southernmost railroad station.

In Borneo, the only railroad line is in Sabah, and visitors can ride the short stretch from Kota Kinabalu to Tenom, passing through the long gorge of the Sungai Padas (see p181).

KTM also runs Komuter trains, an electrified short-distance train service connecting Kuala Lumpur to the surrounding suburban areas.

TRAINS

There are two types of trains: express trains that stop only at the main stations, and the slower and cheaper local trains that also stop at smaller stations. Express trains run only on the West Coast line, but local trains operate on both lines. Express trains usually consist of first and second class, while local trains are generally third class. All first- and second-class carriages have sleeper berths on overnight trains. All classes have air conditioning, which is generally very cold, making a jacket or blanket a necessity. Third-class carriages usually have fans. Free time-tables are available online and at all KTM stations.

In a class of its own is the Eastern & Oriental Express (E & O), which takes three days to get from Singapore to Bangkok. This train makes brief stops at Kanchanaburi in Thailand, Kuala Lumpur, and Butterworth, to allow passengers some time to sightsee in these towns.

TRAIN TICKETS, FARES, AND RESERVATIONS

Tickets can be purchased at all mainline stations, through the KTM website, or from travel agents. Fares depend on the type of train and class of carriage. Fares for first-class travel are about double the price of second class, which is approximately double that of third class. Sleeping berths are available for a small charge in addition to the basic fare.

Tourist rail passes offering unlimited train travel are also available. Visitors can pay US$35 for 5 days, US$55 for 10 days, and US$70 for 15 days. The passes are discounted by almost 50 percent for children. The fare from Singapore to Bangkok on the luxurious Eastern & Oriental Express is over US$1,500.

Advance booking is advisable for express trains if a sleeping berth is required.

BOAT FACILITIES, SERVICES, AND FARES

With regular services to popular destinations, boats and ferries are among the most popular ways to get to riverside towns and offshore islands. Most traditional bumboats have been replaced by faster and sleeker ekpres boats that offer basic seating with canopies for protection from the elements. Since they are intended to be used only for short journeys, there are usually no toilets or facilities for buying refreshments.

Although most boats are quite modern, safety precautions can be somewhat lax, with some operators overloading their vessels or not insisting on the use of life jackets. Services are also likely to be temporarily suspended due to inclement weather during the monsoon.

Boat fares vary according to the length of the journey and the condition of the vessel, but an average hour-long journey costs about RM15. Advance booking for tickets is not required, and payment can be made at the jetty or on board.

BOAT ROUTES AND CRUISES

In Malaysia, many major towns along the coasts and along rivers are connected by ferry, or ekspres boats. On the west coast of the peninsula, Butterworth is linked to Pulau Penang by a car ferry, which remains popular despite the existence of a road bridge between the mainland and the island. There is a twice daily ferry service to Pulau Langkawi from Penang, and hourly services both from Kuala Kedah and Kuala Perlis. Regular ferries run between Lumut and Pulau Pangkor.

On the east coast, there are several daily ferries from Merang to Pulau Redang and from Kuala Besut to the Perhentian Islands. Visitors to Pulau Tioman can get a ferry either from Peninsular Malaysia or take a catamaran from Singapore. There are no boat services connecting Peninsular Malaysia with Malaysian Borneo.

In Sarawak, longboats and ekpres boats are the principal methods of travel. They link Kuching with Sibul, Kapit, and Belaga along Batang Rajang, while in the north of the province, they are the main modes of transport along Sungai Baram. While there are no riverboat services in Sabah, a regular ferry runs between Menumbok and Pulau Labuan.

Visitors to Singapore can enjoy a cruise on a traditional bumboat along the Singapore River or around the southern islands. Several companies organize these cruises, including River Boat, River Cruises, Watertours, Cruise Ferries, Penguin Ferry Services, and Eastwind Organization.

Traveling by Road

The roads in Malaysia and Singapore are generally in very good condition and the network is comprehensive, making it easy to get around. There is an extensive and inexpensive bus system, and both state-run and private companies operate services that connect many major towns in Malaysian Borneo and most towns on the peninsula, with good connections to Singapore as well. Long-distance taxis are a good option for group travel, while car hire is reasonably priced and a good alternative for those who prefer flexible itineraries.

ROAD NETWORK

Peninsular Malaysia's road network is excellent, offering one of the best ways of exploring the country. The main road that runs along the peninsula is the North-South Highway, a six-lane toll road between Johor Bahru in the south and the Thai border. Route 8 goes up the east coast, linking Bentong, near Kuala Lumpur, with Kota Bharu in the north. Route 4 and Route 145 connect the east and west coasts of the peninsula. Various other roads connect towns in the interior.

Due to the rugged terrain, the network in Malaysian Borneo is limited. In Sarawak the only long-distance road runs up the coast between Kuching and Miri, although there are numerous good roads around Kuching itself. Sabah has a comparatively weak network, especially the roads in the interior; however, the road heading north and south along the coast from Kota Kinabalu is good.

Malaysia has two land bridge connections with Singapore – a causeway between Johor Bahru and Singapore and a second link between Tuas in Singapore and Geylang Patah in Malaysia.

LONG-DISTANCE BUSES

Traveling around Malaysia by bus is fast, comfortable, and cheap. Several private operators, including Plusliner and Transnasion, run air-conditioned luxury buses between major towns. Buses linking smaller towns make more stops and are not all air-conditioned. In rural areas, regular buses are replaced by minibuses or converted pick-up trucks. Other major bus operators include Sri Maju, Transtar, Aeroline, Hasry Express, Biaramas, Tung Ma Express, and Tuaran United Transport.

There are bus services to Singapore from several Malaysian towns, including Kuala Lumpur, Malacca, Ipoh, and Penang. Buses from Malaysia stop at the Ban San, Golden Mile Complex, or Lavender Street terminals.

Travelers should note that long-distance bus terminals are often located on the outskirts of a town, requiring a local bus or taxi ride to get there, and that long-distance buses tend to set out in the early morning or evening.

BUS TICKETS AND FARES

Reservations for travel on buses are usually not necessary in Singapore and Malaysia, except during public holidays such as Christmas and Chinese New Year when many locals are traveling. Most people buy their tickets at the bus company office located at each bus station just before boarding a coach, but it is possible to book in advance to guarantee a place. Departure times are displayed on a placard in front of the office. Fares are reasonable and depend on the comfort provided by the bus.

LONG-DISTANCE TAXIS

Long-distance taxis or share taxis are worth considering, especially when traveling in groups of three or four. Solo travelers will need to wait until the driver has a full complement of four passengers, as these taxis operate on a shared-cost basis. The waiting time is usually not long, and is shorter early in the morning. It is also possible to charter the whole taxi for the price of four single fares. There is usually a long-distance taxi stand right next to the long-distance bus station in each town, with fares for various destinations posted on a board. Taxi fares are about double the bus fare, but the service is much quicker. Night journeys may have an additional fare.

CAR AND MOTORBIKE RENTALS

Renting a car is an appealing way of exploring Malaysia, as it offers travelers the freedom to change their travel plans at will. Rental agencies usually require that drivers be over 23 years of age and have held a clean driving license for at least a year. Overseas visitors will need an International Driving License.

Car hire rates are higher in Malaysian Borneo than on the peninsula. While insurance is generally included in the price, it is wise to spend extra for Collision Damage Waiver (CDW) insurance, which covers costs resulting from accidents. Renting a car in Singapore costs more than in Malaysia, with rental and fuel costing almost double. There are also surcharges for driving hired cars from Malaysia to Singapore and vice versa.

owners or shops who rent them out rarely ask to see a license. Rental rates are reasonable, and this can be a good way of exploring islands, such as Pulau Penang and Pulau Langkawi, or attractions on the outskirts of cities.

All major rental agencies, including Budget, Hertz, Avis, and Thrifty are represented, along with local agencies, such as Mayflower, Orix, Hornbill, Pronto, Extra, Kinabalu, and Popular, which sometimes offer cheaper rates.

While renting from a local firm may be tempting, it could be a problem if the vehicle breaks down far from the rental office and the company has no local backup, so enquire about their network before signing a deal. Visitors should note that 4WD vehicles for rent are scarce, so those heading for the hills should employ a reliable tour operator who can provide an appropriate vehicle with a driver.

RULES OF THE ROAD

Vehicles drive on the left in both Singapore and Malaysia. The use of seat belts is obligatory, and within cities, the speed limit is 31 mph (50 km/h). Most road signs are self-explanatory, except for the ubiquitous awas in Malaysia, meaning "be careful." The permissible level of alcohol in the blood is 0.8 percent in Malaysia and there are heavy penalties for those convicted of drinking and driving.

Getting around KL & Singapore

Both Kuala Lumpur and Singapore are relatively easy to get around, as there is a variety of transport methods at a visitor's disposal. The Light Rail Transit (LRT) and Mass Rapid Transit (MRT) metro systems are swift and efficient. Bus lines cover both cities quite thoroughly, and metered taxis are convenient and easy to find. Some trishaws, or three-wheeled bicycle taxis, still ply the streets offering fun but expensive rides for tourists. The most enjoyable way of getting around is walking, but while Singapore is pedestrian-friendly, Kuala Lumpur is not easy to walk around. For travelers with limited time, it is worth considering an organized tour.

Pedestrians window-shopping in Kuala Lumpur's Chinatown

WALKING

All the main areas of interest in Kuala Lumpur, such as the colonial district, Chinatown, and Little India, are close together and can easily be covered on foot. However, as six-lane roads and flyovers divide Kuala Lumpur into sections unconnected by side-walks, strolling beyond these areas is unviable. Traffic is fast-moving and heavy, so visitors should always be alert.

The situation is better in Singapore. The city center is pedestrian-friendly and conducive to strolling around or window-shopping, especially along Orchard Road. The hot and humid climate of both cities requires precautions such as using sunblock, carrying enough drinking water, and limiting walks to a few hours to avoid exhaustion.

METROS

In Kuala Lumpur the LRT is a fast and economical way of getting around the city, with trains arriving every 5 to 15 minutes between 6am and midnight. It is possible to pay for a single trip, but it is better to get a Touch 'n Go card which is a stored-value ticket that can also be used on City Shuttle buses. LRT maps are available at all stations.

Singapore's MRT is often acclaimed as the best metro in the world because of its clean carriages, speedy service, and low prices. The most convenient way to pay is the stored-value ticket, called an EZ-link card worth S$15, which includes a S$3 deposit and is valid on all MRT and bus journeys. Any credit on the card can be reclaimed at a card outlet on departure. A Tourist Day ticket available for S$10 at MRT stations allows up to 12 bus or MRT rides a day regardless of the distance traveled. Smoking, eating, and drinking are prohibited on the MRT.

BUSES

LRT ticket, Kuala Lumpur

information can occasionally cause visitors some confusion. One of the most useful lines for tourists is the City Shuttle, which links many downtown locations. The shuttle is operated by Rapid KL, who also run the LRT. A day ticket costs RM2, while the integrated bus and LRT daily pass costs RM7. City Shuttle route numbers are 101 to 115 and these buses can be identified by a red disk on the windscreen.

In Singapore there are two major bus companies, SBS and SMRT, who also run train and taxi services. As on the MRT, the easiest way to pay the fare is the EZ-link card, which must be tapped against a machine when boarding and leaving the bus. If paying by cash, drop the exact fare in the box as no change is given. A more tourist-oriented form of transport is the Singapore Trolley, which runs between the Singapore Botanic Garden and Suntec City, with a daily pass costing S$14.90.

Passengers waiting to board a city bus in Kuala Lumpur

TAXIS

Taxis can be particularly useful when arriving in an unknown city as they spare the need for prior knowledge of the city's layout, though such service comes at a price. In Kuala Lumpur, red and white taxis charge an initial fare of RM2 for the first mile, and 10 cents for every 220 yards (200 m) thereafter. Drivers often decline to use the meter with tourists, and try to agree on a fixed fare that is inevitably higher than the meter rate. Note that meters are also occasionally doctored. It is wise to confirm the usual fare for a planned journey with your hotel before setting out. Most fares in the city should be RM10, but 50 percent extra is charged after midnight.

Taxis are easily available on the streets of Singapore. They have a flag fare of S$2.50 for the first kilometer, and S$0.50 for each subsequent kilometer. There are, however, provisions for additional surcharges. SBS Transit, Comfort Cabs, Sunlight Taxi, Radio Teksi, City Cab, and Smart are among the taxi service providers here.

ORGANIZED TOURS

Taking an organized tour is the ideal way of seeing a city's major sights in relative comfort, and there are plenty of companies that offer such tours in both Kuala Lumpur and Singapore. In Kuala Lumpur, apart from grand full-day tours or 3-hour city highlight tours, which take in the Petronas Towers, the Royal Palace, Chinatown, the Lake Gardens, and the National Museum, there are walking tours, architectural tours, and museum tours. Tour East, Reliance Travel, Angel Tours, and Borneo Travel in Kuala Lumpur offer a variety of engaging tour options.

In Singapore tours usually take in Orchard Road, Little India, and Chinatown, though specialist tours are also available, covering themes such as World War II sights, Asian cuisine, and Singapore's throbbing nightlife. For a more personalized tour, with a tailor-made itinerary, it is best to contact the Registered Tourist Guides Association of Singapore. Holiday Tours, RMG Tours, and SH Tours also organize packaged excursions of Singapore.

Phrase Book

Malay belongs to the Austronesian family of languages whose several hundred distinct variations cover the Indian and Pacific oceans. It is the national language of Malaysia, Brunei, and Singapore, and for many centuries has been the language of learning, diplomacy, and commerce in this region. One of its earliest scripts, a modified Perso-Arabic script called Jawi, was the means by which Islam was disseminated. Jawi is still widely used in Brunei today. Elsewhere, it has been replaced by the Latin script Rumi, which was not spelled uniformly until Malaysia, Indonesia, and Brunei agreed on a standard form of spelling. Prior to the 19th century, international trade and relations would have been unthinkable without the use of Malay, but after 1800, large-scale immigration from China and India resulted in the widespread use of Chinese and Tamil in Malaysia. Today, English is widely spoken, mostly in urban centers, but any effort made by visitors to speak Malay is usually appreciated, particularly in more remote parts of the country. Malay, whose official name is Bahasa Melayu, is often incorrectly called Bahasa, which means language.

Malay Pronunciation Guide

There are no strong stresses in the Malay language and most letters are pronounced in the same way as English. As a general rule, beginners are advised to stress the penultimate syllable. However, if this syllable contains a mute e, the stress moves to the final syllable.

or as in the
or as in but

e like the "a" in machine
when unstressed;
or as in bell when stressed

au as in out or as two separate sounds, as in ba-ut

j in between due and June

k as English "k" except in a final letter, when it becomes a glottal stop (brief pause)

GETTING AROUND

Kuala Lumpur is served by an efficient network of Light Rail Transit (LRT) and monorail lines. For visitors, the most useful LRT routes are the Ampang and Sri Petaling lines, linking Plaza Rakyat with Puduraya Bus Station, Masjid Jamek with Merdeka Square, and Bandaraya with Little India. KLCC is on the Kelana Jaya line. The LRT operator, Rapid KL, also runs bus services, and a combined one-day pass for the LRT and bus is available. The separately run KL Monorail is useful for exploring Chinatown and the Golden Triangle. However, very few interchange stations are connected and often new tickets have to be purchased to continue the journey. All trains run from 6am to midnight, but services are less frequent on weekends.
