Anti-censorship feminists also point out that the distinction between (unacceptable) pornography and (acceptable) eroticism varies widely from one person to the next: for conservatives, any sexually explicit material, such as a sex education textbook, would be pornographic. Conversely, since to outlaw certain productions one must clearly define them, anti-pornography feminists tend to claim that the distinction is easily made. Yet even within feminism, many competing definitions exist. One difficulty is intentionality: if representations of violent sexuality were outlawed, for example, what would be the status of a feminist documentary denouncing rape? What about consensual lesbian or gay sadomasochistic (S/M) sex? And how can the ambiguities, the ironies, the subtleties of art be weighed and judged?

Censorship is a double-edged sword, these feminists warn: our male-dominated court system is far more likely to target lesbian and gay erotica (generally published by small presses unable to afford legal fees) and feminist explorations than it is to ban Playboy or Penthouse. In fact, as often noted, most 1990s attacks on the National Endowment for the Arts (NEA) were aimed at explicit sexual images created by gay men or feminist women; under anti-pornography laws, Canadian customs officers have refused to allow books by Kathy Acker, Oscar Wilde, and Marguerite Duras, among others, into the country, and lesbian bookstores have been charged and convicted for selling magazines such as Bad Attitude.

More generally, anti-censorship feminists argue, censorship curtails women's freedom while claiming to protect them: censorship is an attempt to dictate what sexual behavior is acceptable, an attempt to control women themselves. Many fear that censorship will silence and disempower women interested in exploring the complexities of their sexual lives. Nadine Strossen sums up the classic First Amendment position: "Big Sister is as unwelcome in our lives as Big Brother" (15).

What then, if anything, should be done about pornography? Anti-censorship feminists who also oppose pornography have advocated or practiced other courses of action, including consumer boycotts, "Take Back the Night" marches, targeting the distribution chain, restricting public display of pornographic materials, working for better salaries for women so they are not tempted to do sex work, improving sex education in the schools, etc. But the best solution, some say, is woman-centered alternatives to standard pornography.

During the 1980s and 1990s, many feminists shifted the focus of debate toward the benefits for women of sexually explicit material. Women who practiced socially stigmatized sexuality, including lesbians, proclaimed their right to explore their sexuality from within the feminist movement. The editors of an early collective work, Coming to Power: Writings and Graphics on Lesbian S/M (first edition 1981), insist that writing about their S/M sexuality—against claims that all lesbian relationships are inherently tender and free from power dynamics—is a form of feminist inquiry. The book is a mixture of erotic fiction, political analysis, definitions, and safety tips; its authors, often under pseudonyms, speak of lesbian S/M sex as creative, spiritual, playful, loving, and empowering. This book is only one example of women redefining sexuality as a source of feminist energy and a positive self-image.

Coming to Power, with its punning double focus on pleasure and empowerment, captures the spirit of exploration and consensuality behind most pro-pornography writing. The focus is on reclaiming sexuality for women, thereby violating age-old taboos (symptomatic titles include Whores and Other Feminists, Bad Girls and Dirty Pictures, and Talk Dirty to Me). Much of this writing is by women directly involved in the sex industry, most of whom say they enjoy their work and chose it freely. Carol Queen and others have chided anti-pornography feminists for being anti-sex and anti-desire, inviting feminists to listen to sex-trade workers on issues like the body, sex, and female agency, as well as supporting them in their struggle to improve their working conditions.

Celebrating Pornography

While anti-pornography feminists have emphasized the links between pornography and real-life violence, pro-pornography feminists counter that pornography is fantasy and not reality. (For a nuanced view of pornography as both reality and fantasy, see Jane Ussher's Fantasies of Femininity; Drucilla Cornell's anthology Feminism and Pornography brings together a variety of feminist responses). Marcia Pally writes that fantasy provides catharsis, allowing desires and fears to play out harmlessly in words and images: "The idea that what happens in fantasy happens in life is neither science nor feminism but voodoo." Laura Kipnis defends various types of pornography—from images using obese people to Hustler—as both subversions of the reigning political order and defiant explorations of fantasies with deep personal and cultural resonance; pornography is about pleasure and freedom rather than violence and hatred, she says. Sallie Tisdale, in Talk Dirty to Me, attempts to destigmatize both sex and the act of watching it. Wendy McElroy calls pornography and feminism natural allies because both challenge institutions such as the family and traditional assumptions about sexuality. Many observers list ways in which pornography benefits women as well as men: on a personal level, in addition to providing entertainment and sexual release, it destigmatizes, educates, and serves as sexual therapy; on a political level, it pushes back the borders of acceptable thought, speech, and behavior, therefore providing more freedom for everyone.

Anti-pornography feminists often claim that women are not interested in pornography or that they are forced by their mates to consume it. But clearly, pornography is no longer a male-only preserve. By 1990, in the United States, close to half of all adult videotapes were rented by women in couples or women alone. In At Home with Pornography: Women, Sex, and Everyday Life, Jane Juffner focuses on women's consumption of pornography and erotica, including literary anthologies, cyberporn, and adult cable channels, resources which sometimes challenge and sometimes reinforce traditional values.

If women are dissatisfied with traditional pornography, some feminists say, they should make their own. And many have done just that. Whatever their sexual orientation and preferences, these women share the desire to reconcile their feminism and their sexuality while refusing to practice "politically correct" sex or downplay the sexual dimension of their lives. Before the 1960s, few women wrote erotica, although many, from Sappho to Gertrude Stein and Colette, included descriptions of desire and physical pleasure in their writing. One of the first works of female erotica, Histoire d'O (1954), published by the French woman Dominique Aury under the pseudonym Pauline Réage, was an international best seller and inspired a feature film. The tragic story of O, a career woman turned into a sexual slave, also aroused widespread feminist ire.

Since the 1980s, as taboos around women's and alternative sexualities have weakened (political backlash notwithstanding), many more women have begun producing erotica/pornography. Although the focus of this article is on written work, the women's erotic film industry deserves mention: for instance, 1984 saw the creation of Femme Productions (founded by Candida Royalle) and Fatale Video (launched by Debi Sundahl), nonsexist adult video production companies. That same year, Debi Sundahl and Susie Bright created On Our Backs, a lesbian sex magazine whose title is an irreverent response to off our backs, a feminist anti-porn newspaper. Susie Bright has also been involved with literary anthologies such as Herotica and the annual Best American Erotica. Specialized collections like the British “Black Lace” series are also widely read.

Capitalizing on the success of earlier works such as Nancy Friday’s My Secret Garden, while filling in the gaps in them, many specialized anthologies have appeared: collections of heterosexual, lesbian, and bisexual erotica, as well as African American, Latina, and Asian American erotic collections are all available in mass-market editions. Whether they feature established writers (as do the Penguin Book of Erotic Stories by Women and Pleasure in the Word: Erotic Writing by Latin American Women) or “ordinary” women, anthologies of literary erotica have provided a safe space for many women to explore sexual desires, realities, and fantasies. According to some observers, distinctions between men’s and women’s erotic writing do exist: women writers develop plots and characters more fully and tend to locate sexual practices within real-life situations such as work and relationships. However, women’s erotica is not limited to gentle “vanilla” sex: violence, S/M, and aggressive impulses are all frequent themes. Pornogothic, for example, relies on bondage, vampire imagery, black magic, fetishism, leather and latex, dungeons, and body modifications. Many texts, especially lesbian short fiction published in magazines and fanzines, play with the borders between genders, featuring consensual bondage, sex with gay men, strap-on dildoes, etc. A number of magazines, including Lezzie Smut, Lickerish, and Quim, to mention only a few, explore various facets of lesbian sexuality. As Judith Butler has shown, lesbian sexual power games (butch/femme, whips, leather) parody heterosexual practices and expose traditional male/female roles as cultural masquerade.

Throughout the Western world at least, women’s erotic writing is thriving. A very partial list of contemporary women’s erotic and/or sexually explicit writing, literary or not—much of which, like Andrea Dworkin’s graphic Mercy, deals with women’s sexual ills rather than attempting to arouse the reader—would have to include Angela Carter, Joan Nestle, Ann Oakley, and Jeannette Winterson (U.K.), Christine Angot, Catherine Breillat, Virginie Despentes, Annie Ernaux, Claire Legenre, Alina Reyes, and Françoise Rey (France), Joanna Russ, Pat Califia, Kathryn Harrison, and Anne Rice (United States), Isabel Allende, Laura Esquivel, Cristina Peri Rossi, and Silvana Ocampo (Latin America), Nelly Arcan, Dionne Brand, Nicole Brossard, Anne Dandurand, Claire Dé, Lili Gulliver, Evelyn Lau, and Daphne Marlatt (Québec/Canada), Elfriede Jelinek (Austria), and many others. In fact, in some countries, more women than men are writing about sex, a situation few would have predicted 20 years ago. Themes and approaches vary widely: some writers celebrate sex, others explore painful topics such as incest, rape, violence, and sexual rivalry. Stereotypes of women as naturally modest, gentle, and asexual have been widely challenged; explicit sex and violence, like crude language, are no longer a male preserve. While not all of this material is innovative or challenging, and some women’s writing reinforces the sexual status quo rather than questioning it, its sheer abundance is a sign of change. Despite taboos and censure, women’s explorations of sexuality would seem to be here to stay.

LORI SAINT-MARTIN

Further Reading

Anthologies

- Barbach, Lonnie, ed. Pleasures: Women Write Erotica. New York: Doubleday, 1984.
- Bell, Roseann P., Reginald Martin, and Miriam DeCosta-Willis, eds. Erotique Noire / Black Erotica. New York: Doubleday, 1992.
- Bright, Susie, ed. Herotica: A Collection of Women’s Erotic Fiction. San Francisco: Down There Press, 1988.
- . Herotica 3: A Collection of Women’s Erotic Fiction. New York: Plume, 1994.
- Bright, Susie, and Joani Blank, eds. Herotica 2: A Collection of Women’s Erotic Fiction. New York: Plume, 1992.
- Fernandez Olmos, Margarite, and Lizabeth Paravisini-Gebert, eds. Pleasure in the Word: Erotic Writing by Latin American Women. New York: Plume, 1993.
- Gonzalez, Ray, ed. Under the Pomegranate Tree: The Best New Latino Erotica. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1996.
- Kensington Ladies’ Erotica Society. Ladies’ Own Erotica: Tales, Recipes, and Other Mischiefs by Older Women. Berkeley, CA: Ten Speed Press, 1984.
- Kukada, Geraldine, ed. On a Bed of Rice: An Asian-American Erotic Feast. New York: Doubleday, 1995.
- Morris, Kathleen, ed. Speaking in Whispers: Lesbian African-American Erotica. Chicago: Third Side Press, 1996.

FERRATER, GABRIEL

- Sheba Collective, eds. Serious Pleasure: Lesbian Erotic Stories and Poetry. Pittsburgh: Cleis, 1991.
- Sheiner, Marcy, ed. Herotica 4: A New Collection of Erotic Writing by Women. New York: Plume, 1996.
- Slung, Michele, ed. Slow Hand: Women Writing Erotica. New York: HarperCollins, 1992.
- Taormino, Tristan, ed. The Best Lesbian Erotica, 1997. San Francisco: Cleis, 1997.

Critical Studies

- Assiter, Alison, and Carol Avedon, eds. Bad Girls and Dirty Pictures: The Challenge to Reclaim Feminism. London: Pluto Press, 1993.
- Brownmiller, Susan. Against Our Will: Men, Women and Rape. New York: Bantam, 1975.
- Burstyn, Varda, ed. Women Against Censorship. Vancouver: Douglas and McIntyre, 1985.
- Butler, Judith. Gender Trouble: Feminism and the Subversion of Identity. New York: Routledge, 1990.
- Coming to Power: Writings and Graphics on Lesbian S/M*. Boston: Alyson Publications, 1981, 1987.
- Cornell, Drucilla, ed. Feminism and Pornography. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Dardigna, Anne-Marie. Les châteaux d'Éros ou les infortunes des sexes des femmes. Paris: Maspero, 1981.
- Dworkin, Andrea. Woman Hating. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co., 1974.
- . Pornography: Men Possessing Women. New York: Perigee, 1981.
- Huston, Nancy. Mosaïque de la pornographie. Paris: Denoel-Gonthier, 1982.
- Jones, Richard Glyn, and A. Susan Williams, eds. The Penguin Book of Erotic Stories by Women. London: Penguin, 1996.
- Juffner, Jane. At Home with Pornography: Women, Sex, and Everyday Life. New York: NYU Press, 1998.
- Kipnis, Laura. Bound and Gagged: Pornography and the Politics of Fantasy in America. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1996.
- Lederer, Laura, ed. Take Back the Night: Women on Pornography. New York: Bantam, 1980.
- Wendy McElroy. XXX: A Woman's Right to Pornography. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1995.
- MacKinnon, Catharine. Only Words. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1993.
- Millett, Kate. Sexual Politics. New York: Ballantine, 1969.
- Nagle, Jill, ed. Whores and Other Feminists. New York: Routledge, 1997.
- Pally, Marcia. Sex and Sensibility: Reflections on Forbidden Mirrors and The Will to Censor. Hopewell, NJ: Ecco Press, 1994.
- Segal, Lynn, and Mary McIntosh, eds. Sex Exposed: Sexuality and the Pornography Debate. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1993.
- Stossen, Nadine. Defending Pornography: Free Speech, Sex, and the Fight for Women's Rights. New York: Scribner, 1995.
- Tisdale, Sallie. Talk Dirty to Me: An Intimate Philosophy of Sex. New York: Doubleday, 1994.
- Ussher, Jane. Fantasies of Femininity: Reframing the Boundaries of Sex. London: Penguin, 1997.
- Williams, Linda. Hard Core: Power, Pleasure, and the "Frenzy of the Visible". Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1989.

See also Women's Writing in French; Women's Writing in Spanish; Women's Writing in English; Réage, Pauline

---

FERRATER, GABRIEL

---

1922–1972

Spanish poet

In the mid-1950s, Gabriel Ferrater made the acquaintance of important Spanish and Catalan poets such as Jaime Gil de Biedma, Carlos Barral, and Joan Vinyoli. As a result of this friendship he also started to write poetry, although only for a few years, until 1963. Ferrater published only three books of poetry: Da nuces pueris (1960), Menja't una cama (1962), and Teoria dels cossos (1966). In 1968 he collected all his 114 poems in the volume Les dones i els dies [Women and Days] and decided to stop writing poetry. His work was quite different from Catalan poetry of the time, so it was some time before it gained recognition. However, after his death many contemporary Catalan poets have declared him a master, and now he has a pivotal position in contemporary Catalan literature.

Les dones i els dies, written over a short span of five years, contains all of his poems. It is not, however, a mere collection of his previous books, since Ferrater corrected and reorganized his poetry. The result, then, is a new work that conveys Ferrater's collected concerns. The title already shows the interests of the poet: the flow of time and his relationships with women. These are the axis of his work, which is very unitary. In Ferrater's poetry there are three main thematic groups: poems dealing with literature, poems devoted to describing the social situation of the time, and poems about his personal experience, which can be divided into two groups: those that focus on the flow of time and those that narrate erotic experiences. Ferrater's poetry is generally based on the moral reflection of a specific experience, but with a chronological detachment that allows the poet to analyze the lived experience. For Ferrater, moral life consists of exploring the space between the lived experience and the subsequent reflection in which this experience takes form. Furthermore, in his poetry the notion of passion acts as a central force. The energy produced by this force is interpreted by the poet as capable of taking man beyond love, morality, social observation, or sentimental frustration.

The poet often idealizes a teenager full of life who is aware and makes use of her body. Since Ferrater describes this young person when he is already a mature man, poetry also becomes a way to relive and explain adolescence.

In many of his poems, such as "Temps enrere," "Dits," "Ídols," and "Cambra de la tardor," Ferrater reflects in the present time about a past erotic experience by describing the place where it took place, usually a room with a view. The experience usually involved sexual intercourse, and the poet provides a brief and subtle description of his lover. Sometimes the poems also contain erotic moments without sexual intercourse, such as "El distret," where the poet, on a roof, observes a young woman who is combing her hair, or "Jocs," where the poet watches the sensual movements of a woman playing basketball. In many compositions, such as "Oci" and "Xifra," the poet observes and depicts his young lover when she is sleeping next to him. Other poems, such as "Joc," offer a direct, rejoicing, and jovial view of pleasure. Ferrater proposes an egoistical pursuit of the small pleasures of life as the only way to reach happiness. Ferrater's erotic descriptions are usually subtle. The poet is attracted to certain parts of the female body: thighs, feet, knees, and bellies. These are central to the poet's exploration of eroticism and sexual desire, and they often appear in his discourse. On a few occasions, however, he explicitly refers to the crotch area of his lover, such as in "Mädchen" and "Cançó idiota." There are even more explicit poems such as "Úter," a tribute to the uterus, in which the poet describes himself embracing the crotch of his lover, and "Mudances," in which the female lover is touching the erected penis of her partner.

The various topics that appear in Ferrater's poems reflect, in general, the incidence of time in his relationships. He feels especially attracted to youth, and in his poems it is easy to find feelings such as possession, unfaithfulness, and love. Ferrater's suicide at the age of 50 has been interpreted by Montserrat Roser as an answer to the physical decadence that menaced the way of existence explored in his poems. The sense of death is intrinsically linked to eroticism, because in life the only possible source of pleasure, the body, is being progressively destroyed. The poet has only the short relief of the sporadic erotic experiences.

It is also important to take into account the moral concerns of contemporary Catalan society, which are evoked in Ferrater's social poems. In the "Poema inacabat," for instance, the poet claims that he is not the perverse. Clearly he is referring to the Franco dictatorship, which promoted a sinful view of sexual relationships.

In Les dones i els dies the poet tries to reconstruct his identity through feelings. For Ferrater, this experience becomes inextricably linked with hedonism and eroticism, so he advocates a down-to-earth approach to poetry, and his own poems display a fairly comprehensive description of erotic encounters. In spite of the complexity of his work, his poems are easy to understand, because they offer a realistic portrayal of everyday life written in a more colloquial language.

Biography

Born in Reus, Spain. In 1954 he started to read in mathematics but did not finish this degree. Later on he obtained a degree in romance philology. Ferrater was a poet, art and literary critic, translator, linguist, and lecturer at the Universitat Autònoma of Barcelona. A man of vast culture and many interests, he translated works from German, English, Polish, and Swedish. Ferrater died in Sant Cugat del Vallès, Spain.

FERRÉ, ROSARIO

JORDI CORNELLÀ-DETRELL

Selected Works

Ferrater, Gabriel. Les dones i els dies. Barcelona: Edicions 62, 2002.

———. Women and Days. Translated by Arthur Terry. Todmorden, UK: Arc Publications, 2004.

Further Reading

Macià, Xavier, and Núria Perpinyà. La Poesia de Gabriel Ferrater. Barcelona: Edicions 62, 1986.

Perpinyà, Núria. Teoria dels cossos de Gabriel Ferrater. Barcelona: Empúries, 1991.

———. Gabriel Ferrater: Recepció i contradicció. Barcelona: Empúries, 1997.

Roser i Puig, Montserrat. "Eroticism in the poetry of Gabriel Ferrater." Journal of Catalan Studies, 2000. <http://www.uoc.es/jocs/3/articulos/ferrata2> (accessed February 27, 2006).

See also Catalan Literature

---

FERRÉ, ROSARIO

---

1938–

Puerto Rican novelist, essayist, poet, and short story writer

Rosario Ferré is known for her literary and political essays and poetry, but her greatest renown is as a writer of fiction. Since the publication of her first book of short stories in 1976, she has achieved fame as a keen observer of the history and culture of her native Puerto Rico. Her work centers on the balances and imbalances of power that are in conflict in all relationships, be they political, sexual, romantic, or familial.

Ferré was born into an established and influential Puerto Rican family. Her father, Luis Ferré, was a pro-statehood governor of Puerto Rico (1968–1972). Ferré's fiction often centers on the fading aristocracy of Puerto Rico and the divisive legacies of the plantation system. Though her own position is one of privilege, she is openly critical of the class system and racial discrimination in Puerto Rican society, and works like The Youngest Doll and Sweet Diamond Dust clearly portray the hypocrisy of the island's aristocracy.

Ferré's first collection of stories, Papeles de Pandora [The Youngest Doll], was published in 1976 and laid the foundation for many of the themes of her later works: the connection of the personal (and specifically, the sexual) with the political, the demystification of sexuality and eroticism, and the inherent power imbalances of most heterosexual couplings. In terms of erotic content, the most discussed story of the collection is "When Women Love Men," which employs one of Ferré's preferred literary devices, the double, or doppelgänger, to highlight the virgin/whore dichotomy imposed on women in Latin culture. Two women, one the wife and the other the lover of a dead man, meet years after the death of the man who linked them. Both women are named Isabel, and though their external differences are emphasized (one is black, the other white; one a prostitute, the other a society wife), as they take turns narrating each other's story, it becomes clear that they are two sides of the same coin, or two halves of a whole: "[E]very lady hides a prostitute under her skin. This is obvious from the way a lady slowly crosses her legs, rubbing the insides of her thighs against each other.... A prostitute, on the other hand, will go to similar extremes to hide the lady under her skin" (134). Isabel Luberza's life as a comfortable, asexual wife is made possible only through the heightened sexuality of Isabel la Negra, who satisfies the husband's sexual needs but also serves as a symbol of the physicality denied to "good" women. As Ferré makes clear, through the denial of women's sexuality, both the virgin and the whore have been "shortchanged both sexually and economically."

The publication of Papeles de Pandora, and particularly of "When Women Love Men," led to Ferré's work being labeled "pornographic" due to her frank use of sexual terminology. In "The Writer's Kitchen," an essay included in Sitio a Eros (1980), Ferré herself responds to such a categorization, stating that language considered sexually obscene has for too long been the exclusive domain of male writers and that women have both the right and the obligation to reclaim such language. She laments the absence of discussion of obscenity in women's literature and feminist literary criticism, and lays claim to the sexual insult as a tool to be hurled back in the face of the oppressors.

Other pieces in Sitio a Eros examine the role of eros in women's writing and lives. Ferré draws on Simone de Beauvoir in calling for an active, transcendental love that would free women from the constraints of passivity and dependence. She analyzes the works of women writers that she admires for their expression of this sort of self-assertive eros, such as Virginia Woolf, Mary Shelley, Julia de Burgos, and Alexandra Kollontai. In Ferré's view, these writers challenged the patriarchal system through their expressions of active feminine love. She calls for other women to allow their subjective, irrational, and distinctly feminine passion to come forth in their writing.

Ferré's later fictional and critical works continue to explore the topics laid out in Papeles de Pandora and Sitio a Eros. The collection of stories Maldito amor [Sweet Diamond Dust], published in 1987, again investigates the ties between political power, sexual and romantic relations, and Puerto Rican identity. Perhaps the most erotic language of the collection is reserved for the island itself, as she describes its almost orgasmic profusion of smells, tastes, and colors: "the honeyed yam and the thick-lipped one that leaves you monstuck if you eat it at night, the mysteriously aphrodisiac gingerroot, with emerald swords unsheathed and blooming lips pursed in blood, which afforded us a profitable smuggling trade all through the nineteenth century; the golden ripe plantain and the green one with silver tips, quivering on the branches of Mafofo and Malango trees" (5). Rather than portray Puerto Rico as an untainted Eden, she draws attention to the political realities behind the sensual "paradise"—the exploitation of African slaves and the native Taíno Indians at the hands of first the Spanish, and later the Creole landowners. The human relations in the stories mirror this exploitive dynamic, as complex networks of victimization and power supersede the possibility of romantic love.

Ferré made the somewhat politically controversial decision to begin writing in English in 1995, with the publication of The House on the Lagoon. This book, and her subsequent novel in English, Eccentric Neighborhoods, continue to explore the erotic in the context of multigenerational family sagas, but the broad historical sweep of the novels somewhat diminishes the focus on the erotic. Nevertheless, in these novels, as in her earlier works, sexuality is frequently presented as a tool too often employed in service of avarice, dominance, and betrayal.

Biography

Born in Ponce, Puerto Rico in 1938. Earned a Bachelor of Arts degree from Manhattanville College (1960), New York, a master's degree from the University of Puerto Rico, Río Piedras (1985), and a Ph.D. in Latin American literature from the University of Maryland, College Park (1987). Editor and publisher of Zona de Carga y Descarga, a journal of Puerto Rican literature. Taught Latin American literature at the University of California, Berkeley; Rutgers University; Harvard University; Johns Hopkins University; and the University of Puerto Rico, Río Piedras. Finalist for the National Book Award in 1995, for House on the Lagoon. Resides in Puerto Rico.

ALEXANDRA FITTS

Selected Works

Papeles de Pandora. 1976; translated as The Youngest Doll, 1991 Sitio a Eros, 1980
Maldito amor. 1987; translated by the author as Sweet Diamond Dust. 1988
El coloquio de las perras. 1990
La batalla de las vírgenes. 1993
The House on the Lagoon. 1995
Eccentric Neighborhoods. 1998
Flight of the Swan. 2001
A la sombra de tu nombre. 2001

Further Reading

Castillo, Debra A. "Surfacing: Rosario Ferré and Julieta Campos, with Rosario Castellanos." In Talking Back: Toward a Latin American Feminist Literary Criticism, edited by Debra A. Castillo. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1992.

FIELD, MICHEL

- Castro-Klarén, Sara. "Unpacking Her Library: Rosario Ferré on Love and Women." Review: Latin American Literature and Arts 48 (1994): 33–5.
- Fernández Olmos, Margarite. "From a Woman's Perspective: The Short Stories of Rosario Ferré and Ana Lydia Vega." In Contemporary Women Authors of Latin America: Introductory Essays, edited by Doris Meyer and Margarite Fernández Olmos. Brooklyn, NY: Brooklyn College Press, 1983.
- Gascon Vera, Elena. "Sitio a Eros: The Liberated Eros of Rosario Ferré." In Reinterpreting the Spanish American Essay: Women Writers of the 19th and 20th Centuries, edited by Doris Meyer. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1995.
- Guerra Cunningham, Lucía. "Sitio a Eros." Letras Femeninas 9 (1983): 57–9.
- Hintz, Suzanne S. Rosario Ferré: A Search for Identity. New York: Peter Lang, 1995.
- Jaffe, Janice. "Translation and Prostitution: Rosario Ferré's Maldito amor and Sweet Diamond Dust." Latin American Literary Review 23 (1995): 66–82.
- Umpierre, Luz María. "Un manifiesto literario: Papeles de Pandora de Rosario Ferré." The Bilingual Review 9 (1982): 120–26.
- Urrea, Beatriz. "El cuerpo femenino: Identidad(es) problematizada(s) en dos cuentos de Rosario Ferré." Revista de crítica literaria latinoamericana 22 (1996): 279–300.
- Vega Carney, Carmen. "Sexo y texto en Rosario Ferré." Confluencia 4 (1988): 119–27.

---

FIELD, MICHEL

---

1956–

French writer and journalist

Impasse de la Nuit

Divided into 12 chapters, organized as a journey through the night, from "Dusk" (Chapter 2) to "Dawn" (Chapter 12), Impasse de la Nuit is structured in an elaborate and dynamic way. The impasse of the title is both a literal one-way cul-de-sac as a typical setting for casual sex encounters and the metaphorical realization that the Night (occasionally personalized) is an alternative universe not compatible with mainstream life, heteronormative sexuality, and conventional relationships. Impasse de la Nuit is set in a busy, urban, labyrinthic, decadent Paris, whose topology of erotic landmarks revolves mainly around places with strong sexual connotations (such as the Rue Saint Denis, its sex shops, its seedy night clubs with lesbian peep-shows, and its cafés where prostitutes meet and relax between clients) and places where people have sex in public (Bois de Boulogne, car parks, porn movie theatres, and men's public toilets).

The narrator is a writer working on a book about the night, with a special interest in some of those "night people" who tend to become sexually active then: voyeurs, exhibitionists, prostitutes, and transvestites, all people who would otherwise be labeled as perverts or deviants. Doing research for his book, the narrator reflects on his surroundings and on his past experiences and adventures, and explores parts of his sexuality restrained so far. Such are the two dimensions of Impasse de la Nuit: the intellectual, if not philosophical, dimension, which makes the book a reflective essay on erotic literature, or at least a poetic treatise on voyeurism, and the embodied dimension, with the erotic narration of sexual scenarios, situations, and encounters.

Whereas the main part of the book appears as a journal in which the narrator records erotic stories (with limited linear narrative and no sense of chronology) and their analysis (like a flowing stream of consciousness), three chapters ("Correspondence I," "Correspondence II," and "Correspondence III") consist of extracts of letters exchanged between the narrator and a past female lover. These letters are directly reminiscent of Les Liaisons dangereuses, both because of the literary technique itself, not uncommon in erotic literature, and because of the sophisticated quality of the language and style, which could easily be read as a pastiche of Choderlos de Laclos. The letters powerfully relate some of their staged erotic adventures, all taking place at night, which is presented as the liberating factor, typically with her stripping and masturbating in public places such as car parks, watched by several men who also masturbate, whilst her lover stands anonymously amongst them.

A leitmotiv of Impasse de la Nuit, voyeurism is illustrated in numerous ways: there is, for example, the enigmatic café in the Bois de Boulogne where regular patrons only go to see exhibitionist couples touching each other up under the tables, with the approval of the old, seemingly bigoted landlady, as long as there are no children around; there is the episode of the narrator observing his half-naked female neighbor through the window whilst his girlfriend goes down on him and asks him to describe the scene until he comes; there is also the story of a couple straightforwardly having sex in a car whilst other men stand around and masturbate, creating a sort of complicity, if not bonding, between all the men present. Yet voyeurism is not just illustrated but also conceptualized, if not justified, both culturally and philosophically. With due reference to history and literature, voyeurism is explained as a socially constructed male privilege; the voyeur is defined as the best theoretician of desire, whose playful gaze, innocently perverted, bridges a gap between men and women. Albeit possibly sexist and arguable, this analysis nevertheless gives the book its intellectual edge and original quality, differentiating it from a mere pornographic novel, a process reminiscent of de Sade developing philosophical issues and arguments even in his most sexually explicit texts. This is certainly due to Michel Field's background as a philosophy teacher (if not as a philosopher), which comes to the surface here, as in all the passages where the text suddenly shifts from graphic erotic evocations to metaphysical evaluations of pleasure, gender identity, or sexual desire. A related characteristic of the author is his love of the French language, coupled with remarkable stylistic skills: his prose is highly poetic, and several passages are pure plays with puns, alliterations, and homonyms, exemplified in the first words of Chapter 2: "Nuitamment. Nuit, amant" [Nightly. Night, lover], which makes the translation of the book extremely difficult.

Eventually, it is worth noting that Impasse de la Nuit lends itself very well to queer reading and queer analysis, for three main reasons. Firstly, it presents and represents a vast array of culturally marginal forms of sexuality (such as leather fetishism and cross-dressing, exhibitionism, prostitution, casual homosexual and bisexual sex encounters), which perfectly fall under the umbrella term of "queer" as defined by queer theory. Secondly, the sexual scenes depicted and the accompanying comments repeatedly blur the male/female and straight/gay boundaries, a key tenet of queer theory with evident echoes of postmodernism. Thirdly, it problematizes notions of gender/sex/sexual identity, as in the last chapters, where the narrator (who used to wear leather clothes and flaunt his heterosexuality over gay men he would only have passive oral sex with) starts to dress up as a woman, carefully choosing female silk underwear ("Silk, my feminine identity.... Silk, my feminine double"), wearing a suspender belt, heavy makeup, high-heel shoes, and a sexy dress before courageously going out to sell his/her transvestite body to the night—the Night being again the liberating factor and the only way to gain a new identity, to achieve a metaphorical and metaphysical ascesis in an impasse from which it will not be possible to return.

Biography

Michel Field is a well-known journalist and cultural commentator on French radio and television, yet in the 1980s he also wrote three novels: Le Passeur de Lesbos (1984), Impasse de la Nuit (1986), and L'Homme aux Pâtes (1989). Originally released by Bernard Barrault, they have been republished by Editions Robert Laffont.

LOYKIE LOÏC LOMINÉ

---

FIELDING, HENRY

---

1707–1754

British playwright and novelist

Works

The sexual content of Fielding's works was evident in his own time, when he was excoriated for his "lowness" by Richardson, Johnson, and Hawkins, who said that Fielding's virtue "was that of a dog or a horse." His works are not erotic in the sense that Fanny Hill is, but they give sexual realities their force, generally with comic effect, against moral hypocrisy, especially in women.

His burlesque and farce plays depended on sexual humor as much as on political satire, and Shamela, his travesty of Pamela, focuses on the sexuality of Richardson's servant-girl heroine to portray her as a hypocrite working on the sexual responses of a gentleman so he will marry her for her profit and that of her lover. In Joseph Andrews, he portrays in Lady Booby, her servant Slipslop, and Betty the Chambermaid all the energy of female lust, directed at the young and handsome Joseph. A careful reading reveals even in the "pure" Fanny, who is in love with him, the same powerful drives at work. Indeed, Fanny is first introduced in a verbal picture that stresses her sexual attractiveness according to eighteenth-century criteria:

Fanny was now in the nineteenth Year of her Age; she was tall and delicately shaped; but not one of those slender young Women, who seem rather intended to hang up in the Hall of an Anatomist, than for any other Purpose. On the contrary, she was so plump that she seemed bursting through her tight Stays, especially in that Part which confined her swelling breasts. Nor did her Hips want the Assistance of a Hoop to extend them.

The long paragraph continues listing her physical delights. Throughout the subsequent adventures, only the continual presence of Parson Adams is what prevents Joseph and Fanny from consummating their desire for one another.

In Tom Jones the handsome hero does not remain even technically "pure." Women will not let him. Jones is first seduced by the sexually aggressive Molly Segrim, but then falls in love with Sophia Western, a beautiful young virgin who is the daughter of the owner of the estate adjoining the one on which he—a foundling—lives under the protection of Squire Allworthy. But the young Blifil, presumed heir to the estate and a cold sadist, hopes to marry Sophia himself, in spite of her detestation of him:

Now the Agonies which affected the Mind of Sophia rather augmented than impaired her Beauty; for her Tears added Brightness to her Eyes, and her Breasts rose higher with her Sighs.... Blifil therefore looked on this human Ortolan with greater desire than when he viewed her last; nor was his Desire at all lessened by the Aversion which he discovered in her to himself. On the contrary, this served rather to heighten the Pleasure he proposed in rifling her Charms, as it added Triumph to Lust; he had some further Views, from obtaining the absolute Possession of her Person, which we detest too much even to mention...

Jones, after Blifil has tricked Allworthy into expelling him, affirms his love for Sophia but nevertheless, after exciting himself thinking of her charms, goes off on a chance encounter with Molly into "the thickest Part of the Grove." Fielding tries to maintain that Jones's "imprudence" with women causes him all his subsequent troubles (and modern literary criticism, especially in the United States, has generally sided with Fielding's argument), but the circumstances in which Jones finds himself are always such that only a young man not homosexual—unless he is as cold as Blifil—could resist seduction. When she precedes him at an inn, even the "pure" Sophia gives Jones a trail to her by leaving a muff that has sexual significance for both of them. On his way to London, however, he is seduced by the naked breasts of Mrs. Waters, and in London is seduced by Lady Bellaston. But, out of desire for him, Sophia forgives him everything, and in the end the villainies of Blifil are exposed, Jones is to be Allworthy's heir, and Sophia marries him. Then transpires “that happy Hour which... surrendered the charming Sophia to the eager Arms of her enraptured Jones.” The sexual feelings of the men and women in the novel are usually revealed to the reader, for they function as the novel’s sure index of their characterization. Indeed, Tom Jones can be seen as a penetrating study of people in a society where the power and significance of sexual motivation is not acknowledged.

Fielding’s last novel, Amelia, lacks the comic gusto of Joseph Andrews and Tom Jones, because the London world he portrays is so grim that the good-natured, sexually warm man and woman are barely saved from destruction. Captain Booth is a Tom Jones after marriage. The novel opens with him in a debtor’s prison, where, though he adores his wife, Amelia (modeled as was Sophia on Fielding’s beloved Charlotte), he nonetheless is seduced by a former lover whom he encounters there. He tries to hide this lapse from Amelia and does not realize till the end that she knew of it and long ago forgave him. Very interesting are the quiet but powerful erotic feelings of Amelia herself, most often overlooked by readers. Certainly she gratifies Booth. “Here ended all that is Material of their Discourse,” we are told at one point, “and a little Time afterwards they both fell asleep in each other’s Arms; from which time Booth had no more Restlessness, nor any further Perturbation of his Dreams.” And another time, after his jealous fears have been allayed, he “caught her in his Arms and tenderly embraced her. After which the Reconciliation soon became complete; and Booth in the Contemplation of his Happiness entirely buried all his jealous Thoughts.” But also she is gratified by him. She says that as long as she has “such a Husband to make life Delicious” she can easily accept poverty: “Am I of a superior Rank of being to the Wife of an honest Laborer? Am I not one of common Nature with her?” Thus, she affirms her sexual nature in common with all women, and it is just this kind of affirmation which is truly at the center of Fielding’s novels.

Biography

Born April 22 at Sharpham Park, Somersetshire. Studied at Eton, 1719–1724. His first publication and first play appeared, 1728. Enrolled as student of letters, 1728, University of Leiden; ceased studies in 1729. Began career as dramatist, 1730. Marriage to Charlotte Cradock, 1734. Dramatic career ended by Licensing Act, 1737, brought on by his farces against Prime Minister Walpole. Edited the anti-Walpole The Champion, 1739. Called to bar, 1740. Death of Charlotte, 1744. Married Mary Daniel, 1747. Traveled to Lisbon, 1754, in hopes of restoring health. Died October 8 in Junqueria, near Lisbon.

GERALD J. BUTLER

Selected Works

Shamela. 1741
Joseph Andrews. 1742
Tom Jones. 1749
Amelia. 1751

Further Reading

Battestin, Martin C. Henry Fielding: A Life. London and New York: Routledge, 1989.
 Butler, Gerald J. Fielding’s Unruly Novels. Lewiston, NY: E. Mellen, 1995.
 Cross, Wilbur L. The History of Henry Fielding. 3 vols. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1918.
 Digeon, Aurélien. The Novels of Fielding [1925]. New York: Russell and Russell, 1962.
 Paulson, Ronald, ed. Henry Fielding: The Critical Heritage. London: Routledge and Keagan Paul, 1969.
 Rawson, C.J. Henry Fielding and the Augustan Ideal Under Stress. London and Boston: Routledge and Keagan Paul, 1972.
 Sherbo, Arthur. Studies in the Eighteenth Century English Novel. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1969.
 Smallwood, Angela J. Fielding and the Woman Question: Theory and Practice from Fielding to Freud. Tallahassee: Florida State University Press, 1985.
 Varey, Simon. Henry Fielding. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986.
 Wagner, Peter. Eros Revived: Erotica of the Enlightenment in England and America. London: Secker and Warburg, 1988.

---

FLAUBERT, GUSTAVE

---

1821–1880

French novelist

Precociously exposed to the sight of his surgeon-father dissecting a fresh young female corpse, Flaubert's erotic life was always deliriously complicated: a procession of the delicate and the brutal, a roaringly farcical quarrel between the romantic idealist and the cynical connoisseur of prostitution. An incident from the author's 25th year will serve to illustrate the achieved pattern of his imagination.

It was the summer of 1846 and Flaubert was walking across Brittany when he came upon an ancient fragment of Eros: "A few miles from the little village, hiding in the middle of a beech-wood, there stands a granite statue, six feet high, a naked woman, with her hands over her breasts. Seen in profile, with her fat thighs, her plump buttocks, her knees bent, she has a sensuality which is both barbaric and refined. At the foot of the pedestal there is a large basin, carved from the same granite, and it can hold sixteen barrels of water. The Breton peasants used to worship her as an idol: women who had just given birth came to bathe in the basin at her feet, and young people eager to marry would dive into the water. Then, under the eyes of the goddess, they would engage in the solitary entertainment available to the melancholy lover" (Wall 2002, 136–7). Flaubert was delighted with his peasant Venus. She was, he wrote, "the invigorating, exciting, healing idol, the incarnation of health, of the flesh, the very symbol of desire, the manifestation of that eternal religion rooted in the very bowels of man" (Wall 2002, 137). A century before surrealism, Flaubert had already understood, in the figure of this rough goddess, the secret harmony of the sexual and the sacred.

This would become the darkest and most potent theme of his work as a novelist. And Flaubert's refusal to sift the pure from the impure would soon land him in trouble. When Madame Bovary was prosecuted for offending against religious morality, it was specifically because "voluptuous images are mixed up with things sacred," because Emma "murmurs to God the adulterous caresses she has given to her lover," because the book would fall into the hands of "young girls and married women" (Wall, 234). Answering his accusers, Flaubert offered a defense judiciously adjusted to the spirit of the age. He declared that his work was eminently moral because it was written for educated men, not young girls. "Sincere books may sometimes have a certain salutary pungency. Personally I deplore rather those sugary confections which readers swallow without realizing that they are quietly poisoning themselves.... Readers in search of lascivious material, readers who may take harm, will never progress beyond the third page of what I have written. The serious tone will not be to their taste. People do not go to watch surgical operations in a spirit of lubricity" (Wall 2002, 349).

The psychosexual subject of Flaubert's next novel, Salammbô, was even more perilously explicit. Only the exoticism of the setting, Carthage in the third century BCE, would preserve it from the official censors of the French Second Empire. Flaubert's artistic purpose was clear. Privately, he explained that "the most furious material appetites are expressed unknowingly by flights of idealism, just as the most sordidly extravagant sexual acts are engendered by a pure desire for the impossible, an ethereal aspiration after sovereign joy. I do not know (nobody knows) the meaning of the words body and soul, where the one ends and the other begins. We feel the play of energy and that is all" (Wall 2002, 249).

In the real world, the free play of psychic energy was, of course, subject to the cramping effects of censorship, actual or merely anticipated. Having been found not guilty in his trial for Madame Bovary, Flaubert did not relish the possibility of another prosecution. At the center of Salammbô he placed a scene of sumptuously perverse fancy-dress eroticism in which the naked priestess of the moon becomes entwined with a large serpent. This image was remarkably congenial to the educated taste of the 1860s, raised on a rich diet of grand opera and history painting. Indeed, Salammbô resonated down through the collective fantasy life of a whole generation, producing a short-lived school of paintings and statues portraying women with snakes, still to be found in provincial museums and galleries (Dijkstra, 272).

In his next novel, L'Éducation sentimentale, Flaubert returned to his own day. This was to be a love story, but it was modern love, blighted, like the modern world, by a selfish, nervous habit of calculation. The hero is driven by an exalted, poetical, adolescent passion for an unattainable older woman. His sexual history is a tissue of perplexity, frustration, and betrayal. There is no climax, no release, no satisfaction: only a lingering finale of self-estrangement, intellectual exhaustion, emotional sterility, and a lugubriously ironic memory of a schoolboy escapade in a brothel. The chastened, greying protagonists agree emphatically that it was "the best time we ever had."

Ingeniously constrained in his fiction, Flaubert is gloriously unbuttoned in his letters. Here we catch the artist at play, turning the adventures of the flesh into words. Flaubert's surviving letters, their genitalia snipped away by a pious executor but restored by his twentieth-century editors, are exceptionally rich in the epistolary-erotic. Writing from Egypt to his stay-at-home friend Louis Bouilhet, Flaubert teased him with lingeringly detailed accounts of his experiments in the bathhouses and brothels of the East. "Out here it's quite the thing. People confess to their sodomy and talk about it over the dinner-table in the hotel. Sometimes you deny it mildly, then everyone gives you a rollicking and eventually you own up. Travelling for my own edification and entrusted with a government mission, we have considered it our duty to engage in this mode of ejaculation" (Selected Letters, 137).

Writing to his newfound mistress Louise Colet in the late summer of 1846 Flaubert combines amorous ingenuity, psychological refinement, and a murky ambivalence. The mix is typically both distressing and exciting. He stages the scene of his midnight rereading of her letters. In Flaubert's hands this becomes a comic-erotic ritual of great imaginative intensity, designed to stir the memory and quicken the pulse of writer and reader alike. When the house is asleep he unlocks the drawer of the cabinet where he hides his treasures. On the writing table, he arranges his collection: a miniature portrait, a lock of blonde hair, and a handkerchief, evocatively stained. Folded in an embroidered bag, here are his letters from Louise, the pages faintly scented with musk. And here is the most precious relic of all, a pair of her slippers. He gazes at them and his hand trembles as he reaches out to touch them. He inhales their bouquet of verbena. He imagines the warm feel of her foot inside them. Endearingly ridiculous, he eventually confesses to her, "I think I love them as much as I love you" (Wall 2002, 104).

Biography

Born in Rouen, France, December 12. Son of Achille Cleophas Flaubert, a wealthy surgeon and professor of medicine. Attended the Collège Royal, Rouen, 1831–1839; the École de Droit, Paris, 1841–1845. Abandoned legal studies because of ill health, 1845. Lived on private income. Traveled to Italy, 1845; Egypt, Palestine, and Greece, 1849–1851; Algeria and Tunisia, 1858. Maintained a sporadic relationship with the poet Louise Colet, 1846–1855. Published six novels, including Madame Bovary (1856), Salammbô (1862), L'Éducation sentimentale (1869), and Trois contes (1877). Died of a stroke at Croisset, near Rouen, May 8, 1880.

GEOFFREY WALL

Further Reading

There are no exclusively erotic works by this author, but the two following items are recommended. Flaubert, Gustave. Flaubert in Egypt: A Sensibility on Tour. Edited by Francis Steegmuller. London: Penguin Books, 1996. Selected Letters. Selected and translated by Geoffrey Wall. London: Penguin Books, 1997.

Secondary Reading

Bernheimer, Charles. Figures of Ill Repute: Representing Prostitution in Nineteenth Century France. London: Harvard University Press, 1989. Brombert, Victor. "L'Éducation sentimentale: Profanation and the Permanence of Dreams." In The Novels of Flaubert: A Study of Themes and Techniques. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1966.

FOUGERET DE MONBRON, LOUIS CHARLES

Dijkstra, Bram. Idols of Perversity: Fantasies of Feminine Evil in Fin-de-Siecle Culture. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

Heath, Stephen. Flaubert: Madame Bovary. Cambridge, Cambridge University Press, 1992.

Orr, Mary. Flaubert: Writing the Masculine. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 2000.

Tooke, Adrienne. Flaubert and the Pictorial Arts: From Image to Text. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 2000.

Wall, Geoffrey. Flaubert: A Life. London: Faber, 2002.

---

FOUGERET DE MONBRON, LOUIS CHARLES

---

1706–1760

French novelist, essayist, and satiric poet

Le canapé couleur de feu

Very quickly, after his arrival in Paris, Fougeret de Monbron patronizes the backstage of the Comédie-Italienne, the whorehouses, and the cafés. With his satirical mind, he likes the company of the girls and of the “bad subjects.” He is also seen joining the Bout-du-Banc society (see Caylus). It is here, no doubt, that he becomes acquainted with Crébillon’s novel, Le Sopha, which circulates under the form of manuscript copies. Fougeret was thus inspired to write his Canapé, which was published in 1741, one year before Crébillon’s novel.

Le canapé (which would afterward take the title Le canapé couleur de feu) is presented at first as a burlesque parody of fashionable fairy tales. For not having responded to the lubricious desires of the fairy Crapaudine, the knight Commode is transformed into a couch. Condemned to be the witness of the pleasures that will be taken on him, he will only be disenchanted when a lover will fail with his partner. Thus the novel opens, after the failure of a ridiculous new husband to satisfy his young wife. His failure causes the couch to transform itself into the young knight Commode, who then begins the narrative of his misadventures.

It can be seen that to the elegance of Crébillon’s language, and the refined environment Le sopha offers, Fougeret opposes the rudeness and the immediate vigor of the satire, as a challenge. The writer multiplies scenes ridiculing the nobility and revealing the vices of the clergy: the couch thus passes from one universe to another, in a comic rhapsody. Here, a “pious vagrant” deflowers a girl; there, a religious dressed up as a little boy who does not know his catechism is being whipped by a prostitute and then whips her in his turn; four monks have a rendezvous to meet the famed Fillon at her whorehouse; a pious bourgeois and her confessor are enema fans, leaving ill-smelling traces. Fougeret in Le Canapé denounces the hypocrisy of all religions, and in his depiction of the French Jansenists, the Convulsionaries appear as many “jesters,” skillful in misleading the world.

At the end of his adventures as a couch, after having suffered a thousand jogs and thrusts during sex between the lovers lying on him and celebrated his disenchantment with the young wife, Commode will be appointed by the fairy as Great Sarbacanier of the Crown.

Margot la ravaudeuse

In Margot la ravaudeuse: Histoire d’une prostituée, Fougeret de Monbron goes on stripping away the layers of dubious respectability concealing the vices of his time. Margot, a girl of the streets, is the illegitimate fruit of the union of a soldier and a seamstress. Through her own work as a mender of torn stockings, her little hand discovers the vanities and lies behind the lustrous garments. Then she herself is drawn into the world of pleasures. Very quickly, in the novel, the bodies tumble in fighting or in being carried away in pleasure. The beds cracking under the vigor of sexual intercourse and the screaming and whimpering of pleasure assure us that sex is a noisy and rowdy thing, which beautiful speeches seek to cover up in vain and which sets in motion the vast uproar of the world. Mender, prostitute, Opera dancer, maintained woman—thus does Margot tell of her tribulations.

The story of Margot's adventures fits in with the many novels giving the "girls of the world" (the expression dates from the Regency) the right to speak: La belle allemande by Antoine Bret (1745), Panfiche by Gimat de Bonneval (1748), Histoire de Mlle Brion (1754), and Les egarements de Julie by Jacques Perrin (1755). And all of these worldly belles share the same lucid and vigilant perspective on eighteenth-century European society—here and there the same temper flare-ups, the same taste for pleasure; the same reflections, bitter or violent, on social prejudice, on the miseries of the job; the same fear of the police and venereal disease; the same series of relocations; all marking the ups and downs of an existence submitted to the desire of men.

Fougeret (who translated Fanny Hill by Cleland) gives Margot a disillusionment in men, a sentiment he shares with her. However, his heroine is full of a conquering energy. Margot enjoys pleasure. She tears down facades. She launches a challenge to the world through her outspokenness. She is a woman who speaks and who does not allow herself to be duped. Hence, laughter runs throughout the novel. The overwhelming power of the "histoires comiques" that Margot la ravaudeuse tells makes the reader recall that laughter has its part in pleasure, that the comic is always sexual.

Biography

Fougeret de Monbron was born in Péronne on December 19. He arrives in Paris at the age of twenty. He sells back his office of a valet of the king's chamber, abandons all functions, and multiplies his trips across Europe, to Turkey, and to Russia. Watched by the police, imprisoned for his writings and satirical outspokenness, he appears to his contemporaries as a cynical and misanthropic writer. He dies in Paris on September 16.

PATRICK WALD LASOWSKI

Editions

Le Canape, par M. de.... La Haye: Papi, s.d [1741].
Le Canape couleur de feu, par M. de.... Amsterdam: Campagne des libraires, 1741.
Margot la ravaudeuse. Hamburg: n.p., 1800 [1750]

Selected Works

La henriade travestie en vers burlesques. Berlin, 1745.

Further Readings

Benabou, E.M. La prostitution et la police des moeurs au XVIIIeme siecle. Paris: Fayard, 1987.
 Cortey, M. L'Invention de la courtisane au XVIIIeme siecle. Paris: Editions Arguments, 2001
 Lasowski, P. Wald, ed. Romanciers libertins du XVIIIeme siecle. Paris: Gallimard, "La Pleide, 2000.

---

FOWLES, JOHN

---

1926–

English novelist, short story writer, and nonfiction writer

John Fowles's fiction consists of erotic quest romances in which sensitive, independent, and enigmatic women are pursued and captured, lost and recovered, betrayed and deserted, defiled and even destroyed by intellectually inferior, emotionally insulated, and sexually inept men. These men desire absolute power and control and possession of what they cannot fully understand, but they are also hypocritically self-punishing creatures who masochistically seek feminine correction of their masculine selfishness and ignorance. Their sibylline mistresses, whom they learn from but not of, set harsh tests from which some benefit nothing while the more discerning are given glimpses by their female anima of a superior intimacy of intelligence and desire, unfathomable by their own sex. The quest is never fulfilled, but the questors, freed from dependence on the objects of their passion, are educated into a difficult but more authentic freedom, learning from their losses and defeats about the mysterious nature of love, the impossibility of absolute knowledge, and the limitations of a left-lobe logic that categorizes and imprisons experience, whether in a locked cellar or on a pedestal.

In Fowles's England the Victorian age ends with the Second World War. The libidinal hang-ups of his questing anti-heroes are really hang-overs from the sexual manners and myths of an earlier, more repressed age and are exemplified in the narcissistic protagonist of The Magus, who rejects his nubile Australian girlfriend for an Edwardian wraith conjured from a magician's phantasmagoric masque. It is the secret wish and fear of the Fowlesian male, and of the surrogate author quarreling with his erotic muse in Mantissa, that his women should be simultaneously demure and provocative, virginal and promiscuous, tender and unforgiving. The conflicting pressures raging within the protagonal male psyche foist upon the female characters a mythic contradictoriness and unpredictability or, alternatively, polarize them into princesses and wantons, icons of magical unattainability debased by sexual access into seductresses and whores. Among these paired opposites are Charles's prim conventional fiancée Ernestina and the mysterious, dangerous Sarah in The French Lieutenant's Woman; the sensual and spiritual sisters Nell and Jane, and their alter egos Miriam and Marjory, with whom the hero of Daniel Martin enjoys parallel sexual relations; and, in the title story of The Ebony Tower, the septuagenarian painter's two young female acolytes, the mystic "Mouse" and the vampish "Freak," who arouse harem fantasies in the mind of a visiting art critic.

This pernicious sexual idealism is given its crudest form in Frederick Clegg, the lowly government clerk of The Collector who spends his lottery winnings kidnapping an upper-class art student. For the obsequious, depraved Clegg there are two kinds of women—those you respect and those you abuse—and Miranda, the captive object of his fixation, descends in his eyes from one to "the other sort" in the sadomasochistic drama of power and abasement, class guilt, and revenge which is played out in his secret cellar. When Miranda's failure to communicate with her captor drives her, in desperation, to sexual advances that reveal his impotence, he pruriently punishes her forfeiture of his "respect" by roping her naked to the bed and taking obscene photographs, to which he then masturbates, "taking" the woman in the only way he knows—through a camera lens. A butterfly collector, Clegg stalks, captures, chloroforms, photographically exhibits, and finally kills Miranda as if she were one of his specimens.

Nicholas Urfe, the hapless victim of an occult theatrical extravaganza, or "godgame," staged by the island mage Conchis in The Magus, is a more sophisticated, educated Clegg. An ogler of photographed female breasts, Nicholas also prefers the onanistic fantasy to the real thing (the actress who acts out whatever he wants the mysterious Edwardian Lily to be tells him, "The real me's a lot less exciting than the imaginary one"), and, as with Clegg, his self-abasement has its obverse side. When, during the degrading and humiliating ordeals of his "disintoxication," the virginal "Lily" metamorphoses into actress, schizophrenic god-daughter, and sadistic psychiatrist, Nicholas's darker desires—to flog her, to watch her perform in a pornographic film and copulate with a black lover—are brought into play and meta-theatrically enacted in the psychodrama of the masque.

In The French Lieutenant's Woman this schizophrenic sexual psychopathology is traced to its origins in the Victorian era, an age of sanctified womanhood and child prostitutes, bowdlerized literature and massive pornography, which was neurotically in "two minds" about women and sex. Mirroring the crisis of his age, Charles Smithson by turns douses and fuels the flames of his forbidden passion for Sarah Woodruff, the self-styled "scarlet woman of Lyme." When she offers him her love at the Undercliff and then herself at an Exeter hotel, he seizes both and then runs away (respectively, to his angelic betrothed and the nearest church). Sarah's story of her seduction by the French man Varguennes is a deliberate lie intended to seduce Charles, first vicariously, by making him a voyeur of the event who identifies with her seducer, and later in person, when she concocts a sprained ankle to set up the book's single, explosive sexual encounter in the hotel. A "pure" woman acting the role of a fallen one, Sarah, with knowing irony, fulfills the contradictory male desire for a virginal seductress (only at the moment when she ceases to be a virgin is she revealed, for the first time, to have been one). The trick is played so that Charles may remain, Victorianly, in two minds, unable to decide or even distinguish between his two figmentary Sarahs—the "innocent victim" and "wild abandoned woman," the femme fatale and melancholic hysteric—and he is kept in his confusion by the alternative endings which counterweight reconciliation with mutual rejection and abandonment.

The novel's narrator is also caught in two minds, waxing nostalgic for an age when sexual pleasure was sharpened by denial and recognizing fiction's complicity with repression. Mystery, says Fowles in The Aristos, energizes desire and fuels imagination; frustration nourishes fantasy, and this is equally true for writer, reader, and character. Fowles, who as French graduate, ex-naval lieutenant, and amateur naturalist combines features of Sarah's two lovers, has confessed to being ignorantly in love with and seduced by his heroine, and, as in The Magus, he places both the reader and himself in the position of the bewildered protagonist. Conchis, whom Fowles originally conceived as a woman, and the unknowable Sarah perform a conjuring striptease in which layer after layer of illusion is whisked away to reveal only another disguise; gratification is delayed, and denouements are deferred and dissolved to give the reader an unconsummated pleasure of the text. Even in A Maggot, where it is transcended by celestial history, the erotic plot is a powerful engine of narrative suspense and intrigue, driven by the prostitute's titillating tales of satanic orgies and her lord's voyeuristic threesomes (similar fantasies keep imagination alive in the dessicated Hollywood of Daniel Martin).

In The Ebony Tower the erotic origins of composition are indicated by the painter's nickname for his amanuensis, "Mouse," formed by inserting an O-shaped vulva into the word "Muse," but in the metafictional Mantissa the writer's muse is a figmentary creature of his will, not he of hers, so her costume-changes from sex therapist and punk dominatrix to pert nymph and geisha occur auto-erotically, in the grey cells of his brain, making this both the most explicitly erotic and aridly cerebral of Fowles's works.

Biography

Born John Robert Fowles in Leigh-on-Sea, Essex, March 31. Educated at Bedford School, 1940–44; Edinburgh University, 1944; New College, Oxford University, 1947–50: B.A. (honors) French, 1950. Lieutenant in Royal Marines, 1945–46; Lecteur in English, University of Poitiers, France, 1950–51; English teacher at Anargyrios College, Spetsai, Greece, 1951–52; various teaching posts in London, 1953–63, including Head of English, St. Godric's College, Hampstead. Married Elizabeth Whitton 1956 (died 1990). Received Silver Pen Award, 1969, and W. H. Smith Literary Award, 1970, for The French Lieutenant's Woman and Christopher Award, 1981.

DEREK WRIGHT

Selected Works

The Collector. 1963
The Aristos: A Self-Portrait in Ideas. 1964; revised edition, 1968
The Magus. 1965; revised edition, 1977
The French Lieutenant's Woman. 1969
The Ebony Tower. 1974
Daniel Martin. 1977
Mantissa. 1982
A Maggot. 1985
Wormholes: Essays and Occasional Writings. 1999

Further Reading

Conradi, Peter. John Fowles. London: Methuen, 1982.
 Fawcner, H.W. The Timescapes of John Fowles. Rutherford, NJ: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1983.
 Huffaker, Robert. John Fowles. Boston: Twayne, 1980.
 Loveday, Simon. The Romances of John Fowles. London: Macmillan, 1985.
 Olshen, Barry N. John Fowles. New York: Ungar, 1978.
 Palmer, William J. The Fiction of John Fowles: Tradition, Art, and the Loneliness of Selfhood. Columbia, MO: University of Missouri Press, 1974.

FRANKLIN, BENJAMIN

Salarmi, Mahmoud. John Fowles's Fiction and the Politics of Postmodernism. Rutherford, NJ: Fairleigh Dickinson Press, 1992.

Tarbox, Katherine. The Art of John Fowles. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1988.

Wolfe, Peter. John Fowles: Magus and Moralist. Lewisburg, PA: Bucknell University Press, 1976; revised edition, 1979.

Woodcock, Bruce. Male Mythologies: John Fowles and Masculinity. Brighton, UK: Harvester Press, 1984.

---

FRANKLIN, BENJAMIN

---

1706–1790

American essayist, journalist, and memoirist

“Letter of Advice to a Young Man on Choosing a Mistress”

Written in 1745, a period that biographer Carl Van Doren calls Franklin’s “salty year,” “Letter of Advice to a Young Man on Choosing a Mistress”—published during its interesting history under a variety of titles, including “Old Mistresses’ Apologue”—may initially shock readers familiar primarily with the sage, staid voice the author employed in other writings. After it languished in obscurity for many years, several people who could have effected its publication in the 19th century saw it as too frank and indecorous for public consumption. In the 1880s, when Franklin’s papers were owned by the United States government, Secretary of State Thomas Bayard denied a request by John Bigelow to include it in a collection of Franklin’s papers. In 1895, Franklin scholar John Back McMaster, who deemed the piece “too indecent to print,” could not bring himself even to mention its name, but did offer this allusion: “Nothing in his whole career is more to be lamented than that a man of parts so great should, long after he had passed middle life, continue to write pieces so filthy that no editor has ever had the hardihood to print them” (Granger, 266, 278).

Even as “Choosing a Mistress” was judged too prurient for publication, however, it was surreptitiously printed and circulated among a small group of gentlemen. Secretary of State Bayard evidently shared it with a friend, and soon after several copies were produced and distributed via a private printing press owned by Paul Leicester Ford. Apparently, for a time in the late 19th century Franklin’s bagatelle was a guilty pleasure for the elite to enjoy out of earshot of decent society. By the time it was finally published in unexpurgated form in the 1920s and 1930s, the pleasure was no longer a secret. In 1938, Franklin enthusiast Abraham Rosenbach displayed it as part of his Free Library of Philadelphia exhibit “The All-Embracing Doctor Franklin.” His judgment of “Choosing a Mistress” as “[t]he most famous and the wittiest essay ever written by Franklin” indicates the degree to which standards of public taste had changed.

Perhaps the piece became more acceptable because, in addition to being less squeamish about matters of sex and the body, 20th-century readers had a greater appreciation for the complexity of Franklin’s satire. Addressed to an unnamed, unknown youth who has previously admitted to the writer “violent natural Inclinations” regarding the female sex, the letter recommends “Marriage [as] the proper Remedy.” Without a wife, a man “resembles the odd Half of a Pair of Scissars” (sic). Presuming that this advice will not satisfy his lustful associate, Franklin’s persona grudgingly offers an alternative: “But if you will not take this Counsel, and persist in thinking a Commerce with the Sex inevitable, then I repeat my former Advice, that in all your Amours you should prefer old Women to young ones.” He supports his position with eight reasons that, taken together, suggest a man of long experience in love, a utilitarian, and a unique kind of male chauvinist.

The older woman’s deep well of experience, claims the epistler, makes her a more capable conversationalist. As her beauty fades, she will work harder to be useful. She will maintain more discretion in her liaisons than a girl, and even “if the Affair should happen to be known, considerate people might be rather inclin’d to excuse an old Woman who would kindly take care of a young Man.” A bachelor need not worry about illegitimate pregnancy or the ruinous “debauching [of] a Virgin.” An older woman will not be embittered by a tryst, but will, whatever the outcome, be “so grateful!” These claims subtly belittle the fairer sex by suggesting that on the one hand, young women have nothing to recommend them except beauty and sex appeal, and on the other that older women may “have more Knowledge of the World,” but it is a positive attribute only insofar as it is employed in the service of a man.

The portion of the argument that likely accounted for the letter’s earlier scandalous reputation, however, emerges in an ironic version of the blason du corps feminin. A man should bed an older woman

Because in every Animal that walks upright, the Deficiency of the Fluids that fill the Muscles appears first in the highest Part: The Face first grows lank and wrinkled; then the Neck; then the Breast and Arms; the lower Parts continuing to the last as plump as ever: So that covering all above with a Basket, and regarding only what is below the Girdle, it is impossible of two Women to know an old from a young one. And as in the dark all Cats are grey, the Pleasure of corporal Enjoyment with an old Woman is at least equal, and frequently superior, every Knack being by Practice capable of Improvement.

While the bagatelle’s comic climax is certainly unflattering to women on a very literal level, it also satirizes both the letter’s writer and its addressee. The embarrassing scenario should serve to chasten the youth’s shallow sexual desires, against which his older friend has already warned. Moreover, the reader is almost certainly meant to cackle at the elderly male paramour’s exaggerated practicality in matters of love, reflected in his laughably clinical description of the body, his matter-of-fact solution to the problem of confronting a wrinkled face in coitus, and his use of the word “Improvement”—which suggests Franklin parodying his own well-known literary personae.

Biography

One of the most legendary figures in American history, Benjamin Franklin was born January 17 in Boston, Massachusetts. A renowned publisher, scientist, inventor, philosopher, diplomat, and civil servant, Franklin was also a prolific writer who demonstrated a fascination with human potential for self-improvement. His most famous works include his Autobiography, a series of New England Courant editorials produced under the pseudonym Silence Dogood, and the aphorisms and literary selections attributed to the fictional Richard Saunders in Poor Richard’s Almanack. Franklin also penned a variety of short, miscellaneous works, some of which he called “bagatelles,” trifles to amuse his friends. These bagatelles sometimes remind readers of the human foibles that balance the virtues Franklin is so revered for espousing. He died on April 17.

MARK S. GRAYBILL

Selected Works

Benjamin Franklin’s Autobiography. New York: Norton, 1986.
The Papers of Benjamin Franklin. New Haven, CT: Yale UP, 1954–.

Further Reading

Granger, Bruce I. Benjamin Franklin, an American Man of Letters. Ithaca, NY: Cornell UP, 1964.
 Huang, Nian-Sheng. Benjamin Franklin in American Thought and Culture, 1790–1990. Philadelphia, PA: American Philosophical Society, 1994.
 Middlekauff, Robert. Benjamin Franklin and His Enemies. Berkeley and Los Angeles: U of California P, c. 1996.
 Tise, Larry E., ed. Benjamin Franklin and Women. State College, PA: Pennsylvania State UP, c. 2000.
 Van Doren, Carl. Benjamin Franklin. New York: Viking Press, 1938.

---

FRENCH: SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

---

The impact of political developments in France during the seventeenth century on literary output can be likened to a rein encircling artistic expression. The assassination of Henri IV in 1610 resurrected widespread fears that the now unified nation could once again descend into the discord of the religious wars that had devastated late-sixteenth-century France. Largely as a precautionary measure to safeguard central stability, the delegates of the Estates-General of 1614–15, traditionally a body that forced royal compromise, effectively abandoned France to absolutism: this was the last gathering of the Estates until 1789. The growth of absolutism during the century is seen in the trend toward gathering artists, scientists, and writers under official patronage, as well as in the founding of official institutes to oversee and codify artistic endeavor. Cardinal Richelieu founded the Académie Française in 1635 in order to regulate and preserve the purity of the French language. It is no accident that its first official pronouncement was a judgment on Pierre Corneille's Le Cid (1636), demonstrating that policing the arts had become government business and that literary production was henceforward expected to conform to carefully determined guidelines.

With the backdrop of the Counter-Reformation and resultant burgeoning spiritual movements, together with the foundation of religious orders by notable figures such as François de Sales and Vincent de Paul, an identifiable group of writers, known by the disparaging term “libertines,” made their mark on the literary establishment. Libertinism during the seventeenth century is somewhat different from the notion of it during the Enlightenment, when it would be understood as much more of an organized, intellectual movement. During this period, libertinism was an all-enveloping concept covering a wide range of people, from freethinkers to atheists; in other words, the heterodox. Flushed with the success of officialdom turning a blind eye to their excesses—which included the public heckling of clerics preaching in the pulpit—due in part to the sympathy of Louis XIII (whose same-sex tendencies were an open secret), the libertines' situation was transformed as a result of the successful prosecution of Théophile de Viau. The poet, part of a group of libertines notable for works glorifying homoeroticism, narrowly escaped the death penalty, and his trial was conducted by secular authorities, marking the transition to state, rather than ecclesiastical, control of censorship.

Moralists, such as Samuel Chappuzeau, opined that certain subjects were to be excluded from the stage, and emphasized the function of theatre as moral instruction. By stressing the ethical dimension of drama, authors went on the counterattack. The appearance of the anonymous poetry collection Le Parnasse des poètes satyriques (1622), attributed to Viau, marked the beginning of the censorship battle in France, as this work was published without the privilège du Roi, or official permission. The licentious poems in this work include vivid descriptions and terminology for genitalia and the sexual act, using vulgar as well as more poetic euphemisms for sexual activity, including sodomy. This method is shared by Claude d'Esternod, who dedicates a poem, Le parfait macquereau suivant la cour [The Perfect Pimp Following the Court] (1619), to the beautiful Magdelaine, exhorting her to give away her favors for free, as she used to, instead of insisting on a high fee. This appeared in a collection published in 1619 as L'Espadon satyrique.

One of most celebrated anthologies of erotic verse during this period is Le cabinet satyrique [The Satirical Cabinet] (1618), with contributions from poets such as Régner. This anthology presents sexual freedom in a positive light: contributions deal with lesbianism, nymphomania, prostitution, and masturbation, in addition to a discussion of the speed of erection and ejaculation. The Nouveau cabinet des muses [New Cabinet of Muses] (1658) contains L'Occasion perdue recouverte, a sexually explicit poem probably written by Pierre Corneille around 1650. Jean de La Fontaine's Contes et nouvelles en vers (1665–74) detail lustful peasants, predatory clergy, and unfaithful wives, though the content is muted in comparison with earlier poetry collections (and it is for this reason that the work was granted a privilège du Roy), and the style is more bawdy than explicit. Le dortoir, for example, deals with a pregnant nun who is admonished by her abbess for having committed a sin. The transgression in question does not turn out to be fornication, but rather not having cried for help when the unfortunate nun was ravished in the convent grounds; this she did so as not to break the order's rule of silence. Clément's Relation du Voyage de Copenhague à Brême [Account of a Voyage from Copenhagen to Bremen] (1676) subverts travel writing with a verse account of a peculiar trip featuring morally dubious characters encountered in inns along the way.

While the seventeenth century is characterized by the flourishing of all branches of the theatre, both in tragedy and in comedy, this was accompanied by vehement disapproval from certain ecclesiastical quarters, culminating in open condemnation of the theatre. Suspicion of the stage often focused on actresses who were held to arouse libidinous feelings in their largely male audience. Unlike in England, where female roles were ordinarily played by boys, women played female roles in France, with the exception of older characters, whom actresses customarily refused to play. This meant that plots involving seduction or relations between the genders and love intrigues were afforded a realism that would have been impossible with an entirely male cast. Cross-dressing was a common motif in French theatre, invariably involving romantic intrigue and the "male" figure being courted by another male. Examples include Charles de Beys's L'Hôpital des fous [The Madhouse] (1636) and Jean-Baptiste Poquelin (Molière's) Le dépit amoureux [The Lovers' Quarrel] (1656). In the latter, the comedy's central character, Dorothee, engages in amorous talk with another man while disguised in male garb. Although subsequently unveiled as a woman, this does not exclude a homosexual reading. So prevalent was this leitmotiv in public theatre that it even filtered into religious drama (for example, Montgaudier's Natalie [1654]).

Works dealing with a homosexual theme, outside of moral treatises and confessors' manuals, are generally circumspect during the seventeenth century, though there are exceptions. A notable example is the treatment of Henri III's alleged sexual preferences and favorites, to interest of historians and public alike throughout the seventeenth century. Thomas Artus's Les hermaphrodites (1605) is a satire on Henri III's alleged transvestism, and although the monarch was assassinated in 1589, the work was published only in 1605, with a frontispiece of the king wearing a feminine dress complemented by makeup and jewelry. Several poems composed by Faucherand de Montgaillard, published posthumously in 1606 as Gaillardises du Sieur de Mont-Gaillard, satirize the licentious activities of courtiers and favorites at the late monarch's court. These works demonstrate an unintentional consequence of these late-sixteenth-century libels: a growing awareness of same-sex love. The topic is not entirely absent from drama: Michael Hawcroft has argued that Pierre Corneille's Clitandre (1632) portrays "a kind [of] love that prefaces, dictionaries, and other dramatists did not explicitly mention or depict."

While swiftly and meticulously repressed and destroyed, libels on the sexual peccadilloes of powerful figures continued to appear throughout the seventeenth century. Cardinal Mazarin was the namesake of the "Mazarinades," pamphlets published from small presses during the turbulent years of the Fronde (1648–1652) which escaped official scrutiny. Some attacked the cardinal for an addiction to sodomy, while others accused him of sexual relations with the queen mother and regent, Anne of Austria. A seven-page Mazarinade entitled La custode de la reine qui dit tout [An Account of the Queen Which Tells Everything] (1649) is a bitter, explicit account of the queen's alleged affairs, and though the author was caught distributing the pamphlet on the same day he had printed it, a menacing crowd prevented his execution. Similarly, Les amours d'Anne d'Autriche [Anne of Austria's Loves] (1692, though originally published around 1649), probably written by Eustache Le Noble, presents Anne as having fathered Louis XIV by a long-term lover, Count Rantzou. A later work in this tradition, Amours de Louis le Grand et de Mademoiselle du Tron [Loves of Louis the Great and Mademoiselle du Tron] (1697), sets out the purported circumstances of a love affair between the aging Sun King and a voluptuous young noblewoman, in which their passionate meetings are arranged by the complicity of a priest. This is a thinly veiled satire on Louis XIV and Madame de Maintenon. Such sexually charged polemics would persist to the period leading up to the French Revolution.

Writers entertaining heterodox opinions in matters of religion and philosophy faced a hostile and repressive climate, in which they were frozen out of the artistic mainstream. This resulted in an unusually steadfast sense of fraternity among figures who were ostracized or who identified themselves as libertines. A play that typified the tensions between moralists and libertine writers was Molière's Tartuffe. This comedy about an unscrupulous fraudster worming his way into a family by masquerading as a devout Catholic and playing to the head of the household's pious sensibilities was rightly viewed by the dévots (a secretive and powerful group of prominent Catholics) as a thinly veiled attack on their movement and its influence in contemporary society. The work was officially prohibited in 1664, a revised version suffered the same fate in 1667, and the text we possess now, the edition of 1669, is a watered-down version of the original. As with much satirical literature, Molière uses sexuality as the protagonist's downfall, in this case his lust for the wife of the head of household, Orgon. The fact that the dramatist persisted in rewriting the play into a version that eventually escaped censure, reveals that sexually charged drama was commercially successful. The link between political and sexual subversion is tantalizingly hinted at by the dramatist in the final act when Orgon is compromised through keeping some documents for a friend banished after the civil war of the Fronde. By the 1660s, trends in public taste had evolved, influenced by religious and cultural movements, resulting in the almost complete elimination of comedy relying on sexual (mis)behavior and bodily functions, though Molière relies on innuendo, double entendres, and older husbands obsessed with preserving their young wives' fidelity as his comic ammunition.

The execution of the libertine poet Claude Le Petit in 1662 for obscene and blasphemous writing was a reminder of the potential consequences of falling foul of the limits of what the authorities would accept. In Molière's Dom Juan (1665), at face value a play dealing with the comeuppance of a religiously and sexually deviant protagonist, the dramatist subtly undermines the moral implications of the last scene where Dom Juan is dragged down to Hell as divine retribution for his sinful ways; Sganerelle, his faithful servant, is affronted at not having been paid and shouts after his master: "Ah mes gages! mes gages!" [What about my wages?] (V, 6). The depiction of sexuality in the tragedies of Pierre Corneille and Jean Racine is on a more subtle level. It is interesting that Corneille sets his martyr-play Polyeucte (1643) only two weeks following the marriage of the protagonist rather than the gap of several years specified in the original legend, firmly emphasizing that the central couple operate on the level of a sexual rather than domestic relationship. Similarly, in Racine's Phèdre (1677), Hypolite is not presented as the youth vowed to celibacy in the legend, but is in love with a princess. However, both Corneille's Polyeucte and Racine's Britannicus (1669) neutralize homoerotic elements that may be detected in source accounts (Metaphrates and Tacitus).

Roger de Bussy-Rabutin's Histoire amoureuse des Gaules [Amorous History of the Gauls] (1665) records the romantic adventures of various ladies of Louis XIV's court, and was published without the author's knowledge after his mistress lent the manuscript to one of her friends. The published work, altered in places by Madame de La Baume, cost the author over a year in the Bastille, and a frosty welcome when he attempted to return to court life, ensuring a lifelong exile from Versailles. While it details the relative promiscuity of some courtly women, the work concentrates more on the political intrigue of such liaisons rather than offering any apology for sexual liberty. This case mirrors French society's attitudes to sexuality; while adulterous behavior was not uncommon among the ruling classes, this was firmly a taboo subject. Ostracism, not execution, was how the establishment dealt with its own. Rabutin's narrative derives from the genre stylized by Pierre de Brantôme (1540?–1614); the first seventeenth-century edition of his Recueil de dames galantes [Collection of Gallant Ladies] was published at Leiden in 1665 as part of his memoirs.

The distribution of such works, with the ensuing scandal they produced, typifies the relative ease with which works could appear without the necessary official permissions. Another method of bypassing the censors, employed by dissenters in philosophy and religion as well as sexual free-thinkers, was to have their monographs printed in the Netherlands (sometimes a false title-page was provided to give the appearance of a foreign imprint). Another alternative was to disguise a work's erotic content and present the imprint under the guise of an instructional manual.

Joan DeJean criticizes the common trend of categorizing nearly all seventeenth-century erotica as libertine writing. Charles Sorel's L'Histoire comique de Francion [Comic Story of Francion] (1623) may contain some erotic scenes, but this follows on, in style and content, from the Decameron, on which it is modeled. Exemplifying a tradition inherited from Rabelais, François Béroalde de Verville's Le moyen de parvenir [The Means of Succeeding] (1610) is essentially a sexual comedy which deals with virginity, chastity, and clerical celibacy in a bawdy and inventive novel, focusing on various sexual issues, such as a husband having to use a fork in order to break his new wife's hymen. The depiction of such incidents can be read as supportive of a greater degree of sexual education. The anonymous Les quinze marques approuvées pour cognoistre les faux cons d'avec le légitimes [The Fifteen Approved Methods for Recognizing False and True Cunts] (1620) is a narrative detailing how midwives determine, after a careful examination of the genitalia, whether a young rape victim's account of her ordeal is true. Nicolas Venette's Tableau de l'amour conjugal [Representation of Conjugal Love] (1686) similarly deals with the problem of a young man trying to decide the most suitable age to marry, and sets out the advice of various sages, including theologians, atheists, and men living in debauchery. However, the book contains outmoded medical opinions for curing sexually transmitting diseases, and a discussion of intercourse between a married couple is followed by a treatise extolling virginity.

The genre of the fairy tale, which flourished in France between 1690 and 1715, rarely portrays love in physical terms, though there is often a strong undercurrent of sexual suggestion. In Charles Perrault's "La Belle au bois dormant" [Sleeping Beauty], it is mentioned that the princess does not need to sleep much after she has met her prince. "Le Petit chaperon rouge" [Little Red Riding Hood] feels the wolf's naked body when she joins her "grandmother" in bed and is much amazed, though also curious, at the hairy figure. The author warns, in a moral at the end of this tale, that women need to be most wary of wolves that are not to be found in the forest, which highlights the sexual metaphor running through the story. Sexual aggression also defines many tales. Marie Catherine D'Aulnoy's "Vert et Bleu" is erotically charged: the amorous Prince Vert gazes at Bleu bathing naked. The tale contains muted eroticism in that hope for marriage is also desire for physical union. There is a concentration on male voyeurism, but D'Aulnoy presents independent heroines who need compatible partners to satisfy their lives; in "La Belle aux cheveux d'or" [Beauty with the Golden Hair], the protagonist rescues the king's favorite (explicitly called "mignon" by the unmarried monarch) from the control of his master and ends up marrying him when her husband inadvertently poisons himself. Free from the possessive machinations of his king, D'Aulnoy notes the couple is not only happy but also "satisfied," thus completing the heterosexualization of Avenant ("Comely").

However, the fairy tales' unapologetic presentation of romantic love accepts the dominant discourse of sexuality, with its implicit exaltation of patriarchy. The invariable elements are that of women needing to find a husband in order to become contented and whole, whereas men must discover or affirm their masculinity through daring exploits. Nevertheless, as with the novel, this form of fiction allowed writers to express liberal attitudes to sexual matters, albeit in a heavily disguised form reliant on tropes.

The seventeenth century saw the publication of a number of erotic libertine works, and the growing commercial popularity of the novel saw this literary genre used as an experimental vehicle by some writers wishing to test the limits of what the public would buy and, moreover, what the ever-vigilant authorities would tolerate. Three of the most notable, if not notorious, novels are Michel Millot's L'Escole des filles [The Girls' School] (1655), Nicolas Chorier's Le Mersius français ou l'académie des dames [The French Mersius, or the Ladies' Academy] (1680, originally published in Latin in 1660), and François Chavigny de la Bretonnière's Vénus dans le cloître ou la religieuse en chemise [Venus in the Cloister, or the Nun in Her Smock] (1683). The publication and subsequent international popularity of these books marks a shift from Italy to France as the most significant center of libertine activity. The first two of these works deal with the sexual education of an innocent teenaged girl by a more experienced woman of the world. These follow on from an earlier tradition exemplified by the anonymous Les secrettes ruses d'amour [Love's Secret Schemes] (1610), which discussed, from a male perspective, the seduction of women and concluded that widows made the best lovers, as they combined experience with independence. Millot's work (whose publication he paid for together with Jean L'Ange, though the authorship remains uncertain) is generally considered to be the first widely available pornographic literary text. Nicolas Foucquet, Louis XIV's disgraced finance minister, was found to have a copy preciously stored in a secret room in one of his mistress's houses.

FRENCH: SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

The pornographic genre had been created, and James Turner has described such works as "erotic-didactic fantasy organized around the fiction of the speaking agent." While Millot's work is relatively tame by libertine standards—it contains no blasphemous references or overt political subversion—it is marked by sexual explicitness, and official emphasis was laid on eliminating the work rather than those responsible for its publication, who were handed strikingly lenient sentences. It is possible to view the work as resisting the demands of a newly victorious absolutist establishment following the end of the recent civil war, and its obscenity as a defiant pose struck against the expectation for artists to render appropriate homage to the government. The title of Molière's Ecole des femmes [School for Wives/Women] (1662), a comedy about the romantic and sexual awakening of an innocent young girl, echoes that of Millot, which illustrates how far this work had permeated popular culture.

Chorier's Académie goes further than Millot in including lesbian acts and orgiastic scenes. Chorier is attributed with the authorship of Le putanisme d'Amsterdam [Whoredom in Amsterdam] (1681), a curious study of this city's prostitutes detailing their common ruses, makeup techniques, and way of life. The work takes the form of a mystical, nocturnal visitation to the red-light district led by a supernatural spirit, though the level of detail and familiarity suggests that the author was well acquainted with the world he was describing. This provides an unusual and incisive survey of seventeenth-century prostitution, together with an earlier work, Infortune des filles de joie [Misfortune of Goodtime Girls] (1624), attributed to Adrien de Montluc. As well as a glimpse into prostitutes' methods, and some moral reflections on the trade (which castigates clients as well as the women), the work concludes with a reflection on the attraction, and revulsion, attached to thin women.

Chavigny's Vénus is a work composed of dialogue between characters, in this case three conversations between two young nuns, Angélique and Agnès, who justify sexual activity as a natural gift from the Creator, and the pair view their relationship with young clerics as fulfilling normal desires. As well as presenting an apologia for free love, the work concludes with the pair initiating intimacy with each other. Through satire of established religion and its representatives, in particular through focusing on hypocrisy and sexual excess, writers gave new life to a long-standing criticism of Catholicism. In their struggle for liberty of artistic expression against the constraints of standards of decency set by Church and State, the endeavors of such libertine writers sowed the seeds of the Enlightenment.

PAUL SCOTT

Further Reading

- Bougard, Roger G. Érotisme et amour physique dans la littérature française du XVIIe siècle. Paris: Lachurie, 1986.
- DeJean, Joan. Libertine Strategies: Freedom and the Novel in Seventeenth-Century France. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1981.
- Hawcroft, Michael. "Homosexual Love in Corneille's Clitandre (1632)." Seventeenth-Century French Studies 15 (1993): 135–44.
- Lever, Maurice. Les Bûchers de Sodome: Histoires des "infâmes". Paris: Fayard, 1985.
- Phillips, Henry. The Theatre and Its Critics in Seventeenth-Century France. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1980.
- Schoeller, Guy, ed. Dictionnaire des œuvres érotiques. Paris: Laffont, 2001.
- Seifart, Lewis C. Fairy Tales, Sexuality, and Gender in France, 1690–1715: Nostalgic Utopias. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996.
- Turner, James Grantham. Schooling Sex: Libertine Literature and Erotic Education in Italy, France, and England, 1534–1685. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2003.

---

FRENCH: EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

---

Erotic literature flourished in 18th-century France, particularly after 1740, when a resurgence in explicitly pornographic writing was inaugurated with the publication of the best-selling novel Histoire de D[om Bougre], Portier des Chartreux [History of D(om Bougre), Porter of the Carthusian Monks] by Gervaise de Latouche. In fact, the flowering of French Enlightenment philosophy that took place toward the middle of the century corresponded with a renewed interest on the part of writers and publishers in the production of a wide variety of erotic works. Between 1747 and 1748 alone, the materialist La Mettrie put out his radically mechanist philosophical treatise Machine Man; Montesquieu finished The Spirit of the Laws; the most famous pornographic work of the century, Thérèse philosophe [The Philosophical Thérèse] (attributed to Boyer d'Argens), appeared in print; and Diderot published the erotic orientalist tale Les bijoux indiscrets [The Indiscreet Jewels].

Erotic and obscene writing played an important role within the culture of the French Enlightenment, both as a form of literate entertainment and as a vehicle for the development and diffusion of new modes of thought. Literary scholars and historians (including Robert Darnton, Jean M. Goulemot, Lynn Hunt, and Jean Mainil) have emphasized the close ties linking ancien régime erotic writing to the more canonically philosophical texts for which the period remains known. Not only did several of the most prominent philosophes produce erotic, obscene, or libertine writings, but the expression “livres philosophiques,” used by booksellers of the period to designate illicit texts, referred to obscene novels such as Margot la ravaudause [Margot the Darner] (1750), as well as to works of philosophy.

The corpus of 18th-century French erotic literature includes salacious poems (notably Ode à Priape [Ode to Priapus] by Alexis Piron, 1710), dialogues, short stories, and libelles or chroniques scandaleuses (the “libels” or “scandalous chronicles” of the activities of aristocrats and public figures). Of all these forms, erotic and obscene poetry has perhaps been the most neglected in treatments of the 18th century, even though the tradition is an impressively varied one which embraces verse from the mildly scabrous (Voltaire's La pucelle d'Orléans [The Maid of Orleans], 1755) to the openly indecent (La foutromanie [Fuckmania], attributed to Sénac de Meilhan, 1778). Eighteenth-century erotic poetry was read and appreciated for its ability to arouse and delight its readers. For instance, in his essay La volupté [Sensuousness] (1745?), La Mettrie discusses what he calls the “double happiness” of simultaneously perusing erotic poetry and frolicking in the “fresh, tufted” grass with his mistress. Erotic verse could be openly obscene and philosophical (as was the case with La foutromanie) or written in a more stylized idiom, like the Poésies érotiques [Erotic Poems] (1778) of Évariste Désiré de Forges, vicomte de Parny.

Despite the interest erotic poetry held for 18th-century readers, it is the erotic novel that represents at once one of the most popular and one of the most innovative genres of the period. While the designation “libertine novel” has been used to include everything from the allusive fiction of the abbé Prévost to the joyful bawdiness characteristic of Andréa de Nerciat, discussions of Enlightenment literary eroticism have traditionally distinguished between the libertine novel of worldliness and seduction (the roman mondain), on the one hand, and the obscene or pornographic novel on the other. Critics have historically been reluctant to associate the frank obscenity of the latter with the elegant suggestiveness of the former, even though the two genres share an Epicurean focus on sensual and sensorial pleasure as a summum bonum or greatest good.

The most representative examples of the libertine novel, whose practitioners include Claude-Prosper Jolyot de Crébillon, Charles Pinot Duclos, Claude-Henri Fuzée de Voisenon, and Claude-Joseph Dorat, highlight reiterated scenes of seduction, elegantly and sometimes elliptically

narrated, which take place in the opulent, idle, and highly stylized world of the most privileged classes of ancien régime France. The aesthetic that these novels promote (or in some cases, subtly call into question) is based on the valorization of an ethos of frivolity, ephemerality, and superficiality as the source not only of sensual gratification but of an aristocratic mastery of both self and other. This mastery comes about through the close study and careful imitation of social conventions, so that the libertine may more expertly manipulate those who are governed by them. The ritualized seduction of one libertine by another—or the equally ritualized education of a young man into the ways and means of this type of seduction by an older woman—expresses, in the roman mondain, an erotic hedonism that is also an understanding of the social world as malleable and transformable according to the disciplined will of the aristocratic individual. The rites of love, in libertine novels, are also rites of subjugation. Or, as the libertine Versac remarks to the young Meilcour in Crébillon fil's Les égarements du coeur et de l'esprit [The Wayward Head and Heart] (1736–38), “It is only by appearing to submit to all that [women] ask of us that we succeed in dominating them.” The best-known exemplar of the worldly libertine novel is probably Les liaisons dangereuses [Dangerous Liaisons] (1782), by Choderlos de Laclos, remarkable for its detailed and insightful portrayal of a libertine woman, the marquise de Merteuil, who describes the practice of seduction as a form of individual emancipation from the constraints placed by society on feminine sexual desire. Unlike many other libertine works, however, Dangerous Liaisons seems to conclude with an adherence to a sentimental moral perspective, in that the libertine protagonists end up either dead (the vicomte de Valmont) or disfigured and disgraced (Merteuil).

Libertine writings typically depict an aristocratic milieu in which the careful manipulation of strict social codes serves both to mask sexual desire and to facilitate seduction. Libertine ladies know that they must feign innocence with each new lover they take, while their male counterparts are obliged to show the signs of “authentic” passion even as they undertake their second or third sexual conquest of the day. Through the portrayal of a social environment in which appearance is valued above all else—a world in which even the most apparently sincere outpouring of sentiment is liable to serve only the instrumental function of accumulating sexual triumphs—libertine novels call into question the idea that words, expressions, or gestures can possess one true or essential meaning. The universe of libertinage is one of masks, disguises, and double entendres, in which the moral relativism of the libertines is heightened by the necessity of conforming to social norms themselves in constant flux. In the words of Crébillon fil's arch-libertine Versac, “Is it not necessary to have a lively, varied intelligence in order to take on unflinchingly the roles that each moment demands you play... to be passionate without having feelings, to cry without being moved, to seem tormented without being jealous?” The ideal of polite hypocrisy that is expressed in this passage—and elsewhere in libertine literature—perversely includes strong elements of social criticism. The absolute insincerity of the consummate libertine mirrors the pervasive bad faith of a society in which discourses of moral and religious piety often appear to be used to conceal rabid self-interest. This strain of ideological critique is perhaps most visible in the work of the marquis de Sade, an author who seems to deny the very possibility of an ethics that is not simultaneously a practice of domination.

The oriental tale—in which exoticism serves to heighten the narrative’s erotic effects—is an important and highly successful variant on the libertine novel of seduction. These texts participated in the wave of fashionable orientalism initiated, in France, by the translation of the Les mille et une nuits by Antoine Galland [The Arabian Nights] (begun in 1704). They include Diderot’s famous Indiscreet Jewels (set in a fantastical Congo), as well as Crébillon fil's erotic social satire Tanzai et Néadarné, histoire japonaise [The Skimmer, or The History of Tanzai and Néadarné] (1734) and his ribald Le sofa [The Sofa: A Moral Tale] (1742), Voisenon’s Le Sultan Misapouf [The Sultan Misapouf] (1746), and Jacques Rochette de La Morlière’s Angola [Angola: An Eastern Tale] (1746). The image of the “oriental” harem—which, for French authors, tended to evoke fevered visions of lesbianism and despotic patriarchal privilege—also figured prominently in novels whose primary focus was not always explicitly erotic. The latter include Montesquieu’s Lettres persanes [The Persian Letters] (1721) and Prévost’s Histoire d'une grecque moderne [The Story of a Modern Greek Woman] (1740).

Oriental tales usually (although not always) profit from the change of scenery they introduce to add elements of political and social critique to the serial depiction of libertine adventures. For instance, the Indiscreet Jewels, in which women's "jewels" are made to talk by way of a magic ring, is not only an investigation of what has been presented by writers from Diderot to Freud as the enigma of female sexuality; it is also a timely and satirical account of the morals, fashions, and rituals of the court of Louis XV (1710–1774). In the Jewels, Diderot uses the bawdy conceit of the talking jewel—the vagina as origin of both secrets and knowledge—to investigate an enlightened fascination with the search for rational, empirically verifiable truth in domains ranging from metaphysics to court politics. Diderot's dual strategy—partly frolicsome, partly analytical—is typical of a genre whose most playful aspects could serve as counterpoint to (and flimsy concealment of) critical accounts of the repressiveness of ancien régime orthodoxy. In the widely read Mémoires turcs [Turkish Memoirs] (1743) attributed to Claude Godard d'Aucour, the author produces a bracing critique of occidental prejudice and moral hypocrisy in the midst of a portrayal of an entirely fantastical (and often ridiculous) Orient populated by whirling dervishes, sacred prostitutes, and sexy slave girls.

The rise of the oriental tale, a widespread phenomenon in which the Indiscreet Jewels and the Turkish Memoirs played significant parts, gave evidence of a growing French fascination with the nature and cultural order of non-European societies. The popularity of the conte oriental persisted throughout the first half of the century and well into the second. In the most sophisticated versions of the genre, the eroticism of a fantastic Orient functions simultaneously as a reflection of what was perceived as the growing decadence of the French aristocracy and as a foil allowing for the construction of a vision of European society as characterized by rationality, orderliness, and a commitment to social progress.

The emphasis of libertine novels—worldly and orientalist—is on the witty manipulation of language and the playful evocation of an atmosphere of sophisticated and self-conscious sensualism. The obscene novel, traditionally considered somewhat beyond the pale by scholars of the period, is more explicit—both sexually and philosophically. In obscene works, sexual exploration combines with more or less daring intellectual experimentation. For instance, Thérèse philosophe is both a raunchy coming-of-age tale and a materialist tract, while La Morlière's Les Lauriers ecclésiastiques [Ecclesiastical Laurels] (1748) includes a scathing critique of clerical bigotry, as does History of D. Similarly, Pierre Nougaret's Lucette ou les progrès du libertinage [Lucette, or A Libertine's Progress] (1765–66), although its ending is grim and punitive, contains hints of a potentially transgressive moral relativism. Somewhat later, in the years around the French Revolution, Gabriel-Honoré Riquetti, comte de Mirabeau, produced a series of obscene works combining a Voltairean skepticism, a critique of oppressive ancien régime traditions (such as that of the lettre de cachet), and lively depictions of sexual practices, including male prostitution (in Ma conversion ou le libertin de qualité [My Conversion, or the Libertine of Quality], 1783), masturbation, bestiality, nymphomania, lesbianism (in the essay Erotika biblion, 1783), sodomy, group sex, and male homosexuality (in the short story Hic et haec, 1798). The marquis de Sade, also writing toward the end of the century, is well known (and increasingly canonized) for his pornographic texts which are intended to provoke the reader physically and intellectually.

While contemporary scholars have tended to see philosophy and pornography as fundamentally separate endeavors, 18th-century novelists (de Sade included) use the technique of obscene depiction as both empirical demonstration and persuasive rhetorical device. The reader is swayed by the obscene narrative to lend credence to the philosophical arguments of the text, thus proving conclusively the naturalness, forcefulness, and ubiquity of sexual desire. In many obscene novels (as in the work of the marquis de Sade), obscene passages are therefore interspersed with philosophical argument. The goal of the obscene novel is not only the arousal of the reader, but enlightenment in a broad sense: the reader, in ridding him/herself of prejudice and what was often perceived as the "veil" of superstition, emerges from the novel with a newly clarified understanding of the importance of the senses in the development of knowledge about the world, the naturalness of sexual impulses, and the hypocrisy of churchly condemnations of the free expression of sexual desire. In this sense, the pedagogical aims of the obscene novel are at one with those of the French Enlightenment as it has been traditionally characterized, and include a commitment to empiricism, the promulgation of limited individual freedoms, and the development of a moral law based in an understanding of natural processes. As Monsieur T*** remarks to Thérèse in the beginning of The Philosophical Thérèse, “these excessive ticklings that you feel in that part which rubbed against the column of your bed... are urges as natural as those of hunger and of thirst.” Obscene novels take an interest in sexuality as a natural “mechanism” of the human organism.

Because the sexual practices depicted in Enlightenment obscene writings (as well as in libertine novels) are often quite diverse, the delimitation of the domain of the “natural,” far from functioning consistently as a way of restricting the expression of sexual desire, reveals itself to be subject to almost infinite expansion. Both men and women are characterized, in obscene literature from the middle of the century in particular, as actively sexual and capable of experiencing a wide range of erotic pleasures. In The Philosophical Thérèse, the heroine’s mentor wholeheartedly recommends masturbation as a way for women to assuage sexual impulses without running the risks of penetrative heterosexual intercourse (including pregnancy, the loss of reputation, and disease). Women are described as having “the needs that men do; they are molded from the same clay, even though they cannot make use of the same resources.”

This egalitarian perspective on sexual desire is not unique to The Philosophical Thérèse. In La Mettrie’s philosophical essay L’Art de jouir [The Art of Pleasure] (1751), for instance, long passages are devoted to the joys of both male and female orgasm. Moreover, La Mettrie ends the essay with a discussion of the pleasure to be taken in acts of male homosexuality (although he condemns lesbianism as unnatural). “Believe me, my love,” he writes, “love makes of every beloved a woman; the empire of love recognizes no limits other than pleasure!” There is some evidence that the libertine ethos, as expressed in both ancien régime literature and aristocratic social life, included at least a limited acceptance of homosexual desire as a part of sophisticated sexual practice. In the La véritable vie privée du maréchal de Richelieu [The Authentic Private Life of the Maréchal de Richelieu] (1790), attributed to Jean-Benjamin de la Borde and Louis-François Faur, the maréchal, who was, along with Casanova, one of the most famous libertine figures of the century, is shown with relative equanimity on the part of the author(s) to have appreciated the charms of male and female lovers over the course of his many travels.

Lesbianism, on the other hand, was at once the object of a certain amount of fascination and—in theory, at least—entirely nonexistent as a sexual practice at the origin of a specific sexual identity or type. The libertine marquise de Merteuil, in Dangerous Liaisons, describes engaging in lesbian sexual relations with her naive pupil, Cécile, as a test of the girl’s sensual aptitude. In Diderot’s erotically inflected novel La religieuse [The Nun] (1796), the seduction of the heroine by another nun is depicted at length and in highly sensual terms, although Diderot ultimately portrays lesbian desire as a perverse consequence of the unjust and unnatural imprisonment of women in convents. In obscene novels, implicit or explicit lesbianism generally functions to heighten the erotic effect of voyeurism.

Obscene writing became progressively more political in the years leading up to the French Revolution, as pornographic critiques of despotism proliferated in the form of chroniques scandaleuses and libelles. In the 1770s and 80s, libelles were widely distributed throughout France by means of clandestine publishing networks. These writings portrayed the “private lives” of kings and courtiers as well as the amorous adventures of women of the court (from queens to royal mistresses) and included, as the century wore on, increasingly scabrous and explicitly anti-royalist components. One milder example, the Anecdotes sur Mme la comtesse du Barry [Anecdotes About Madame du Barry], probably by Matthieu-François Pidansat de Mairobert, focused on the infidelities of Louis XV’s mistress and portrayed the king as a cuckold periodically blinded by his own lecherous desires. The heedless libertinage characteristic of Louis XV’s regime in fact provided fodder for booksellers long after the king’s death, and Robert Darnton has pointed out that the defamation of Louis XV played a key role in the fall of Louis XVI in the Revolution. In the last decades of the century, the transfer of power from an absolutist monarch to a republican political order was accompanied by and narrated in vivid descriptions of the impotence of the king and the “depraved” promiscuity of Marie-Antoinette, as Lynn Hunt, Jean Mainil, and others have discussed. The revolutionary period witnessed an explosion in the production of obscene pamphlets and images portraying the pornographically debauched habits of the most privileged classes; in these works, the critique of the ancien régime is undertaken through the politicized description of sexualized bodies—from the decaying, syphilitic visages of aristocratic women to the virile nudity of the new citizens of the Republic.

Libertine and obscene novels, pornographic libelles, and bawdy tales continued to be written and circulated throughout the last decade of the 18th century. Nicolas-Edmé Restif de la Bretonne published his Anti-Justine, promoting a kinder, gentler eroticism in response to what the author deemed the “horrors” of the marquis de Sade, in 1798. Andréa de Nerziat, whose vivid and inventive prose references early forms of libertine eroticism with its insouciant epicureanism, was particularly active during the revolutionary period and beyond. Vivant Denon, author of the quintessentially libertine tale Point de lendemain [No Tomorrow] (1777), published a revised edition of this celebrated work as late as 1812. Denon’s story of a one-night affair between a cultivated older woman and a younger man manifests a characteristically libertine fascination with the ephemeral pleasures of the body, the fantastical trappings of great wealth, and the subtle manipulation of stylized language for seductive effect. Nonetheless, despite their extraordinarily refined tastes, the lovers of Denon’s tale act out a fundamental truth of sublunary human existence. “We are such machines,” declaims the hero. Although Point de lendemain is in one sense the tale of a young man’s passage into sophisticated adulthood, the lesson that the hero learns from his more experienced lover is simply that moral certitudes ring hollow in the face of pleasure. “I looked hard for the moral of this adventure,” he affirms, “and I found none.”

Notably, the beginning of the 19th century coincides with the publication of the first series of libertine novels known to have been written by a woman, the comtesse Félicité de Choiseul-Meuse. Her Julie, ou J’ai sauvé ma rose [Julie, or I Have Saved My Rose] (1807) contains explicitly erotic descriptions of many different varieties of feminine sexual experience, although the female protagonist is careful always to resist penetration (not unlike her predecessor, the philosophical Thérèse). As Julie explains, “To refuse the ultimate favor is to know how to experience true pleasure.” Yet the first decades of the 19th century also witnessed the intensification of a climate of political and intellectual repression. Just as the aristocratic tradition of libertine eroticism did not survive the demise of the monarchy, the era of “enlightened” pornography eventually came to an end with the transformation of obscene writing into an illicit private pleasure with seemingly little connection to public life.

Thematically, French erotic writing of the 18th century demonstrates specific interest in and curiosity about the minds and bodies of women in particular. In this sense, erotic literature of the Enlightenment shares the preoccupations of the 18th-century French novel more generally, since both genres are intimately concerned with feminine experiences, sentiments, and social roles of women. This concern is especially visible in the obscene novel—with its reliance on female narrators and scenes of voyeurism centered around women’s bodies—but is also salient for discussions of the libertine novel, in which what contemporaries increasingly saw as a debauched “feminization” of tone and focus was reflected in a precious prose style and a fascination with the study of female psychology. Twentieth-century feminist critics have nonetheless remarked on the fact that the explicit portraits of feminine sexuality that appear in what is commonly understood as the corpus of 18th-century erotic literature were exclusively produced by men. Women writers, on the other hand, tended to excel in a genre which has not always been included in discussions of eroticism: the roman sentimental, or the sentimental novel.

While the erotic aspects of the sentimental novel did not necessarily appear consequential to literary critics of later periods, 18th-century commentators showed a strong awareness of and anxiety about the effects of precisely this type of novel on feminine sexuality. The erotically stimulating (and indeed potentially dangerous) elements of the form were highlighted again and again. For instance, Jean-Jacques Rousseau famously remarked, “No chaste girl has ever read novels.” This comment targeted not obscene literature, as modern readers might expect, but precisely the kind of sentimental novel epitomized in Rousseau's own Julie, ou la Nouvelle Héloïse [Julie, or the New Heloise] (1761). It was feared that women, thought to be highly responsive to sensation and less amenable to the influence of reason, would be seduced by novels into cultivating a heightened state of sensibility that would leave them at the very least vulnerable to seduction, if it did not spur them to seek out the means to satisfy an increased desire for feeling of all kinds. The image of the woman reader, ubiquitous in the art and literature of the period, was itself a suggestive one, since the woman who read was seen as implicitly in a state of distraction and reverie (not unlike that presumed by 18th-century doctors to be brought on by masturbation). Rousseau writes, in the last book of his Émile (1762), of a woman who has fallen in love with a character from a novel and is thus unable to play her proper role as wife and mother. Similarly, the doctor D. T. de Bienville, in his famous treatise on La nymphomanie ou traité sur la fureur utérine [Nymphomania, or Dissertation on the Furor Uterinus] (1771), affirms the close relationship between excessive reading of novels and the development of uncontrollable sexual urges in women. In his discussion of the most dangerous kinds of novel, Bienville cites the "tender novel" (roman tendre) alongside the "lascivious" and the "voluptuous" types. In these and many other sources, it is clear that 18th-century critics and readers understood the sentimental novel to have significant effects on the stimulation of sexual desire; in other words, the novel of sensibility was thought to be as "erotic" as libertine and obscene texts. The similarities between the two genres may help to explain in part why the famously obscene marquis de Sade, who was himself the author of sentimental novels, did not hesitate to describe Rousseau's Julie as a literary chef d'oeuvre.

The vision of erotic pleasure outlined in sentimental novels is nevertheless distinct from that typical of libertine and obscene texts. While the latter tend to focus on sexual mastery and sexual knowledge, respectively, the eroticism of the sentimental novel inheres in the portrayal of feelings—particularly feelings of sympathy, longing, and unfulfilled (yet all-encompassing) desire. In Françoise de Graffigny's Lettres d'une Péruvienne [Letters from a Peruvian Woman] (1747), the female protagonist is wracked by love for her absent betrothed. In Marie-Jeanne Riccoboni's

Lettres de Milady Juliette Catesby [Letters from Lady Juliet Catesby] (1759), the heroine describes her struggle to resist her desire for a man she believes to be a rake; both her resistance and her erotic yearning are portrayed in evocative and voluptuous terms. In the sentimental novel, unlike its obscene and libertine counterparts, not only the gratification of desire but the endless deferral of it could incite eroticized feelings of sympathetic identification in readers. The masochistic pleasure to be taken in unfulfilled longing functioned as the feminine counterpart to the sadistic delight of sexual conquest. The differences between the sentimental and the libertine aesthetic are most neatly encapsulated in the marquis de Sade's twin masterworks, La nouvelle Justine [The New Justine] (1797) and L'Histoire de Juliette [The Story of Juliette] (1798–1801). In the former, the exaggeratedly sentimental Justine is repeatedly subjected to the most horrific of sexual tortures, while the latter depicts at length the sadistic delight taken by the libertine Juliette, Justine's sister and alter ego, in the misery of others. In these novels, de Sade parodically reveals the mechanisms by which the sentimental heroine gives erotic pleasure to readers through her masochistic resignation to suffering, while the libertine whose derives erotic joy from the sexual subjugation of her victims.

Over the course of the century, authors of literary, scientific, and legal texts became more preoccupied with what was coming to be seen as the fundamental distinctiveness of women's sexuality, which was often described as more enigmatic and disorderly than that of men. Twenty-five years after the publication of the adventures of the salacious and highly sexed Thérèse, Diderot explained in his article Sur les femmes [On Women] (1772) that women rarely experience orgasm, and are unlikely to feel the pleasure that men do even in the arms of a lover. Diderot writes of women, "Organized entirely differently from us, the mechanism that evokes voluptuous pleasure in them is so delicate and so difficult to reach, that it is not surprising that it should not work properly." The mechanistic and libidinous universe delineated by the obscene philosophical novel was giving way to a social domain marked by sexual difference as an explanatory principle. Women's mysterious sexual "organization" served in part to explain their social subordination, since, for both men and women, sexuality was emerging as a crucial component of behavior—a key that might unlock the secrets of human nature.

The most famous literary instance of the developing interest in the explanatory power of sexual desire is probably the autobiography of Jean-Jacques Rousseau, Les confessions [Confessions] (1782–1788). Here Rousseau describes in great detail the genesis and development of his sexual predilections. He discovers early on that he takes great pleasure in being beaten, particularly by older women. Rousseau writes, “Who would have thought that this childhood punishment, received at the age of eight at the hand of a girl of thirty, would have marked my tastes, my desires, my passions, my self for the rest of my existence?” Interestingly, Rousseau depicts his sexual and sensual life as essentially psychological: “I have possessed very few women, but I have nonetheless experienced much pleasure in my own way, that is to say, in my imagination.” This interiorization of sexuality—as an index of individual personality or identity—is a modern phenomenon (and one that is quite foreign to the libertine tradition, for instance). Rousseau goes on to recount other formative incidents in his erotic experience—an experience that later eras would characterize as perverse—including episodes of exhibitionism and prolonged masturbation. Even though Rousseau’s stated intention is not to arouse his readers, his work represents an important development in the literary portrayal of eroticism, since the extraordinary attention which Rousseau devotes to the presentation of his sexuality is a sign of a new interest in sexual desire as a crucial part of individuality.

The erotic literature of the French 18th century, in all its diversity, reflects the atmosphere of social transformation (and, ultimately, upheaval) in which it was produced. Libertines and their ilk functioned as the mouthpieces of a new Lockean empiricism and as the representatives of the most joyously superficial of aristocratic aesthetics, depending on the contexts in which they found themselves; the focus of the erotic novel may be subversively materialist (as in The Philosophical Thérèse) or apparently frivolous (as in Crébillon’s The Sofa). Protagonists range from sexually emancipated prostitutes (The Story of Juliette) to beautiful aristocratic ladies (The Wayward Head and Heart) to a talking bidet (Antoine Bret’s *Le *****, histoire bavarde* [The Bidet, a Talkative Tale] (1749); characters in Enlightenment erotic writing may be depicted as literal sex machines (driven to copulate by predetermined natural forces) or as sexual aesthetes (hypersophisticated masters of the cultivation of erotic sensation).

On the other hand, not all 18th-century eroticism includes explicitly transgressive or critical elements. While the libertine or obscene novel often flirts with the more or less obvious violation of the codes governing virtuous behavior, the sentimental novel deals with the difficulties (and pleasures) inherent in the perfect obedience to these same codes. What does unify these extraordinarily wide ranging genres, however—and what is perhaps also their most characteristic sign—is a belief in the close connection of the erotic life of individuals to modes of thought that appear to modern readers as philosophical and political. For 18th-century writers of all stripes, the portrayal of erotic desire is never innocent. During this period, even the most explicit description of sexual congress was understood to make a point about what was considered (or should have been considered) natural human behavior as well as about the justness of the social order in which this behavior took place. While the link between the political, the philosophical, and the erotic has appeared less inevitable in later periods, in 18th-century France it was the heightened awareness of this tie that gave erotic literature its critical bite—and gives it, ultimately, its continued relevance.

NATANIA MEEKER

Further Reading

- Cryle, Peter. Geometry in the Boudoir: Configurations of French Erotic Narrative. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1994.
- Cusset, Catherine, ed. Libertinage and Modernity. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1998.
- Darnton, Robert. The Forbidden Bestsellers of Pre-Revolutionary France. New York and London: Norton, 1995.
- Delon, Michel. Le savoir-vivre libertin. Paris: Hachette, 2000.
- Feher, Michel, ed. The Libertine Reader: Eroticism and Enlightenment in 18th-Century France. New York: Zone Readers, 1997.
- Goodden, Angelica. The Complete Lover: Eros, Nature, and Artifice in the Eighteenth-Century French Novel. Oxford: Clarendon Press, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Goulemot, Jean-Marie. Forbidden Texts: Erotic Literature and Its Readers in Eighteenth-Century France. Cambridge: Polity Press, and Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1994.

FRENCH: NINETEENTH CENTURY

- Hunt, Lynn, ed. The Invention of Pornography: Obscenity and the Origins of Modernity, 1500-1800. New York: Zone Books, 1993.
- Jaquier, Claire. L'Erreur des désirs: Romans sensibles au XVIIIe siècle. Lausanne: Payot, 1998.
- Mainil, Jean. Dans les règles du plaisir. . . Théorie de la différence dans le discours obscène, romanesque et médical de l'Ancien Régime. Paris: Kimé, 1996.
- Mauzi, Robert. L'Idée du bonheur dans la littérature et la pensée françaises au XVIIIe siècle. Paris: Armand Colin, 1960.
- Miller, Nancy. French Dressing: Women, Men and Ancien Régime Fiction. London and New York: Routledge, 1995.
- Nagy, Péter. Libertinage et révolution. Paris: Gallimard, 1975.
- Reichler, Claude. L'Age libertin. Paris: Minuit, 1987.
- Stewart, Philip. Engraven Desire: Eros, Image, and Text in the French Eighteenth Century. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1992.
- Trousson, Raymond, ed. Romans libertins du XVIIIe siècle. Paris: Laffont, 1993.

---

FRENCH: NINETEENTH CENTURY

---

Although Nineteenth century France was content to retain the anodyne but usefully Protean term amour, French life and culture in the new bourgeois age was saturated with an unprecedented concern with sexuality that manifested itself in every sphere of existence, assuming, on the part of moralists and hedonists alike, the status of a veritable obsession. In much French writing of the period, this obsession was intertwined with fundamental social and political concerns, though with the flourishing Decadent aesthetic of the fin-de-siècle, sexuality would increasingly become a specialized domain savored for its own sake and distinguished only with difficulty from the pornography in which the same authors sometimes engaged. From early in the century, the ever more widespread disregard for conventional restraints on sexual behavior encouraged by the new economic order, and the increasing readiness to depict it in words or in the visual arts, went hand in hand with both a more general loosening of literary constraints and the promotion of greater specificity and explicitness in the descriptions of the external world to be found in the related realms of journalism and "realist" fiction. These latter developments frequently led to the juxtaposition, within the same composition, of high and low genres and a mingling of language both elevated and crude, mundane and exotic, that not only permitted a representation of the tensions underlying the new social reality, but challenged taboos the roots of which went much deeper than the perspectives of either literature or polite society. Of equal consequence was the establishment of a new literary marketplace, in which the consumer's desires were indulged more or less subtly and with greater or lesser good grace, depending on the author's commitment to other aesthetic, philosophical, or moral imperatives.

Such examples of apparent restraint as existed in the literary treatment of love were rarely unrelated to this obsession with the sexual. As Roland Barthes observed of Eugène Fromentin's seemingly chaste "personal novel," Dominique (1863), if the explicit sexual dimension is erased, it nonetheless makes itself felt elsewhere in the writing, starting with bisexual name of the title character. Likewise, whereas the love poetry of Lamartine might seem to characterize the canonical image of French Romanticism, its wider historical significance derives from its representing one of the two extremes of erotic discourse, with the literal absence of the opposite extreme constituting an implied presence that both defines and questions it. The readiness with which "Le Lac" was felt to invite parody is noteworthy in this respect: an erotic version (complete with the French equivalent of four-letter words and an inevitable sexual play on the verb jouir) appeared in 1845, while Flaubert, in Madame Bovary (1857), has his Rouen boatman (an ironic counterpart of the Venetian gondolier of the Romantic stereotype) sing verses from the selfsame poem as he rows the adulterous couple who are his passengers. In the case of Alfred de Musset, the Romantic poet himself becomes an (anonymous) pornographer as the author of Gamiani ou deux nuits d'excès [Gamiani, or Two Nights of Excess] (1833). The phenomenon to be studied, therefore, is not merely the explicit manifestation of sexuality, but the more or less total eroticization of 19th-century French society, its interactions, and its relationships of power. That the eroticization of modern life and culture was identified by contemporaries as a specifically French phenomenon is illustrated by the way Victorian England was ready to demonize contemporary French literary production, though this attribution to France of the role of forbidden Other alerts us to the presence of mythmaking, an activity which also is unlikely to be absent from the ways in which French society constructed images of itself. In 1888, the English translation of Zola's novel La Terre (1887) earned its publisher, Henry Vizetelly, a prison sentence. The depravation of Oscar Wilde's Dorian Gray was attributed by his creator to his reading of French literature, while the same author's erotic drama Salomé was produced in Paris (in French) rather than London. Unsurprisingly, few of the most influential or widely read French novels of the period escaped the papal Index (though the latter seems to have been compiled in accordance with a rhythm of fits and starts that now seems quaintly quixotic). Yet it was not the case that the French authorities sanctioned sexual license. In different ways, according to the hue of the particular political regime, they remained largely committed to censorship. Though somewhat less so than stage productions or the press, books were regarded as potentially dangerous. In the later years of the Restoration, for example, amid justifiable fears of political insurrection, the owners of cabinets de lecture were ordered to destroy all titles that had been placed on the Index for being immoral or irreligious, categories that overlapped considerably in the mind of the censor.

Censorship was pursued with impunity, notwithstanding its nature as a double-edged sword. From the point of view of literary fame, it mattered little whether the authors of Madame Bovary (1857) and Les fleurs du mal [The Flowers of Evil] (1857) were acquitted on charges of obscenity. (Flaubert, who wielded the twin advantages of an aesthetic of indirect statement and a cultivated moral ambiguity, was; Baudelaire, whose poetry appeared more obviously inflammatory of the senses, was not.) In both cases, the work received unprecedented exposure, though Baudelaire was obliged to expunge some dozen poems whose erotic nature had given particular offense. As for the trial of Antony Méray, author of La part des femmes [The Woman's Share] (a novel serialized in a Fourierist newspaper in 1847), it was immortalized by the mention it received in Flaubert's L'Éducation sentimentale (1869). Censorship was, moreover, always ready to make an ass of itself. As Théophile Gautier recorded in his preface to Made-moiselle de Maupin (1835), the vicomte Sosthène de La Rochefoucauld attracted derision, in the closing years of the Restoration, for ordering the Opera dancers to wear longer skirts and for imposing a plaster fig leaf on every public statue. In Madame Bovary, Flaubert brilliantly catches the hypocrisy of much censorship: the outraged Homais, caught between his sense of propriety as the bourgeois père de famille and his self-congratulatory pose as a freethinker, castigates his young assistant Justin for reading a manual of conjugal love before informing the assembled company that in the right hands, the volume (the copy is presumably his) of course has a legitimate educational purpose.

Nonetheless the pursuit of indecency on the part of the authorities was invariably a response to an imagined political threat rather than an expression of general puritanism or prudery. A number of the political chansons Béranger wrote during the Restoration, and which led to his imprisonment, showed the censor to have been right to sense an ulterior motive behind obscenity. The Revolution of 1789, with the pornographic writings of Mirabeau and his imitators, the obscenities that peppered Hébert's newspaper Le Père Duchesne, and, above all, the crude pornographic satires depicting Marie-Antoinette engaging in incest, lesbianism, masturbation, and insatiable nymphomania, had provided some sulphurous examples. If the sexual scenes in Zola's early novel La confession de Claude (1865) attracted the attention of the censors of the Second Empire, the decision not to prosecute was due to their (correct) conclusion that the work was not politically subversive. One can, nevertheless, only conjecture how the same author's Rougon-Macquart cycle would have fared had the less repressive Third Republic not intervened.

FRENCH: NINETEENTH CENTURY

The erotic obsession marking out 19th-century French literature was closely linked to the new prominence accorded women in post-Revolutionary France and heralded in symbolic fashion by the way the cultural philosopher and writer Madame de Staël was considered by Napoleon an enemy of some consequence. Whether as an increasingly complex, not to say perverse, object of desire or as the embodiment of her own sexual desires, Woman, as her often superior vitality (or individuality) as a literary fictional character revealed, came to possess a significance that both conferred on her the potentiality of embodying multiple “novelistic” intrigues (in a society where dramatic changes in fortune were the hallmark of the new socio-economic reality). This posited her as a threat to what was still a world in which men—however inadequate (or “feminized”) Stendhal, Balzac, Flaubert, and Zola might show them to be—remained the dominant force.

The 19th-century French male was nonetheless at risk from the new status of women. His increasingly ludicrous formal attire, completed by phallic top hat and cane, was a gift for caricaturists and became viewed as a theatrical garb that connoted standing and respectability but which, especially in depictions of the demimonde, was at odds with the moral and physical grubbiness it concealed. Its function as the uniform of the dandy, who, according to a Baudelaire or a Barbey d'Aureville, represented a cultivated superiority that went beyond the realm of costume, nonetheless reinforced the sense of an uneasy relationship with the female sex. The threat represented by women in the 19th-century French imagination was all the greater in that Utopian thinkers such as Saint-Simon and Fourier explicitly advocated the emancipation of women, while their female counterparts, notably Flora Tristan, readily adopted a feminist agenda and terminology. The more extreme facets of these imaginary societies might justify the luxury of ridicule, but no such belittlement, nor the adoption of an age-old misogynistic discourse, could seriously dent the fixation of the age upon the figure of Woman, nor palliate the dread that patriarchal structures would prove as flimsy as those quarters of Paris reduced to rubble by the grandiose schemes of that other Utopian, Baron Haussmann. It is only with slight exaggeration for humorous effect that Balzac, writing in 1848, looked back to “the great female emancipation of 1830.” The new prominence of Woman would duly find further expression in Villiers de l'Isle-Adam's novel L'Eve future [The Future Eve] (1886), which featured a beautiful android indistinguishable from a real woman.

This did not mean that the course of historical inevitability ran as smoothly as reformers would have wished. It is significant that Zola, in Germinal (1885), has the body of the female mineworker clothed by the same overalls as the male miner's, thereby rendering her sexless, while in L'Assommoir (1877), Gervaise's descent into alcoholism reenacts a topos previously considered masculine. It is striking, too, that whereas novel writing in the first decades of the century was virtually the exclusive province of women, the reverse became true after 1830. Margaret Cohen has argued that the significance and value of “sentimental” writing by women have been obscured by the prestige of subsequent male-authored works of “realism.” Yet initially such works of realism represented a hijacking by male writers of the novel's specifically feminine concerns. Rather than eliding the female perspective, or relocating it in an unproblematic past, Stendhal and Balzac offer the female reader the delight of a bolder feminine individuality, with the added (if doubtless insidious) prestige of being revealed by a male gaze and therefore accorded a proof of its origin outside the cocoon within which female writer and reader enclose themselves. Yet Mathilde de la Mole's Romantic self-image in Stendhal's Le rouge et le noir [The Red and the Black] (1830), while it possesses the realist status that might appear to sanction that of an emancipated woman, is subtly subordinated, by virtue of constituting an extra layer of heroic imitation, to the depiction of Julien Sorel and his overweening ambition. It was Balzac who was regarded by his contemporaries as having, in Jules Janin's mocking words, “invented women.” The vast interlocking fictions of the Comédie humaine contain the most remarkable diversity of female personages, separated not only by individual temperament and circumstances, but by age, class, marital status, and sexual orientation and united only through the fascination they arouse as a result of the novelty of their exposure and the ways in which they use (or disdain to use) their sexuality for their advancement. As if dissatisfied with existing categories, Balzac created others, some of which, notably the hitherto unacknowledged “woman in her thirties” (la femme de trente ans), were gratefully received by the appropriate section of his readership. It was as if the novelist had usurped the privilege of access to the secrets of the woman’s bedroom accorded usually only to priest or physician. To judge by his fan mail, his female readers more generally felt gratitude for the extraordinary empathy he showed with regard to their desires and emotions. The fate of the liaisons he depicted was nonetheless shown to depend, disconcertingly or reassuringly according to one’s standpoint, on the prevailing social forces rather than on conventional morality.

The changing attitudes and behavior of women in a politically unstable world brought an unfamiliar compulsion to understand and redefine relations between the sexes, as may be seen in the way, for example, the century is marked out by such works as Stendhal’s De l’Amour (1822), the historian Jules Michelet’s L’Amour (1858) and La Femme (1859), and Paul Bourget’s Physiologie de l’amour moderne (1891). (Bourget’s writings were lampooned for their social exclusivity by Octave Mirbeau in Le Journal d’une femme de chambre [Diary of a Chambermaid], 1900.) At the key turning point in his career, Balzac published his humorous but insightful Physiologie du mariage (1829), a work he never repudiated and a topic to which he frequently returned. Its overtly sexual perspective serves as an appropriate introduction to the anarchy that had ensued from the way marriage had evolved. As Patricia Mainardi has shown, the combination of arranged marriages (often between partners of disproportionately different ages) and the lack of even limited divorce laws in France until 1884 inevitably led not only to adultery but also to a whole sexual subeconomy (involving married women and girls of easy virtue alike) catering to the young man denied more legitimate outlets. The unique figure of the accommodating grisette beloved by the Parisian Latin Quarter population, anatomized by Janin, nostalgically recalled by Théodore de Banville in his poem “L’Amour à Paris,” and lovingly drawn (along with her counterpart, the lorette) by Gavarni, was the uncomplicated response of the marketplace. Yet the obsessive desire for a mistress, recorded in the first part of Mademoiselle de Maupin, is also the cause of the hero’s downfall in Gustave Drouineau’s proto-Balzacian novel Ernest, ou le travers du siècle [Ernest, or the Distance of a Century] (1829). More fundamentally disruptive of established order, the liaison between a young man and an older married woman, based on reciprocal sexual attraction, establishes itself as a topos susceptible of some telling variations, notably in Le rouge et le noir and L’Education sentimentale. Such instances cannot be dismissed as copycat examples of a young male’s fantasy. They are, still more, the product of profound tensions within the way French bourgeois society ordered its sexual economy. Small wonder that the 19th-century French novel and the novel of adultery appear almost synonymous.

If it is easy for each new age to appear to be the first to discover sex, the erotic obsessions of the French 19th century contrasted strikingly with those of the ancien régime, albeit with certain strands of continuity that must be considered first. That the roman libertin of the previous century exerted a formative influence on the writers of Balzac’s generation cannot be denied. As for the Marquis de Sade, he was read both more and less often than he was mentioned. The existence of an ambiguous dividing line between the erotic and the pornographic explained the similar attraction of the “gay [happy] novels” (romans gais) of Pigault-Lebrun, though these, together with the novels of his much maligned but also much read “successor,” Paul de Kock, also tapped into a much older tradition of Gallic, anticlerical humor. In early-nineteenth-century France, as Balzac’s Physiologie du mariage confirms, both Rabelais and Sterne were immensely popular and were taken to license narratives that contained a certain elevated or learned smuttiness (grivoiserie). It is to this tradition that Balzac’s Contes drolatiques [Droll Tales] (1832–37), written in pseudo-Rabelaisian French, belong, as does Maupassant’s story “Mes vingt-cinq jours,” [My Twenty-five Days], which links a magnificent walnut forest to an ingenious penance imposed by the village priest on his female parishioners who “fall.”

Yet 18th-century concepts of the erotic, outside the realm of pornography, remain distinct from those of the century that followed. If poets such as Gautier and Gérard de Nerval (and to a certain extent Verlaine) looked back nostalgically to the 18th century, it was to an age when a largely visual representation of erotic activity emphasized a notion of “la vie galante” that stressed wit, sensual yet tasteful pleasures, and intelligent, self-conscious idealization. The physical activity of sex was not expunged but alluded to by witty innuendo which, while sometimes obscene, nonetheless addressed itself to the reader's intelligence with a clin d'oeil, a wink. It was the opposite of the explicit—the representation had to be “read” for it to reveal more than its picturesque exterior. As in the case of the roman libertin, the emphasis on intelligence was a mark of its aristocratic nature. The history of eros in 19th-century France is, in contrast, one of embourgeoisement, “bourgeoisification.” Nowhere is this more apparent than when Balzac, in La Cousine Bette (1846), dubs Valérie Marneffe a “Madame de Merteuil bourgeoise.”

As the bourgeois age progresses, there is an ever-increasing emphasis on the body and its secrets, as is shown by Balzac's comic portrait of Mademoiselle Cormon in La vieille fille [The Old Woman] (which makes much play with 18th-century grivoiserie), a temporarily uxorious spinster of advancing years who has to be cut out of her corset after fainting. The same fixation with the female body will later appear in certain of Mallarmé's poems, though in an infinitely more refined manner, with corporeal forms evoked suggestively as absences, thereby embodying the essence of “pure poetry.” Meanwhile, the progression of the nude from the polished classical and academic perfections of Ingres and Gérôme to Courbet's obese bathers (whom Barbey d'Aurevilly accused of “polluting the stream in which they bathe”) showed a development that responded to a call for greater realism, which in the eyes of some equated with ugliness. Yet nudity on its own achieved only a limited effect. A greater degree of erotic realism was achieved by that most “literary” of painters, Manet, when, in Le déjeuner sur l'herbe (1863), he surrounds his female nude with male picnickers who are fully clothed, or when, in his Olympia (1863), he has the courtesan (a forerunner of Zola's Nana) clothed by her nudity and her sexuality alluded to by a phallic cat who would make a reappearance in Zola's novel Thérèse Raquin (1867). Works by Balzac (Le chef-d'oeuvre inconnu [The Unknown Masterpiece], 1831) and Zola (L'Oeuvre [The Work], 1886) took the reader into the studio to see the very real (reluctant) nudity of the amateur model. The convention by which the beloved is little more than a name is left well behind as Baudelaire embraces with all his senses (but also his mind) those erogenous features of his mistress's body to which he finds himself obsessively drawn.

The femme fatale, that dramatic and exotic form of the newly “realist” fantasy of the dominant female (for example, Mérimée's Carmen, 1847; Rachilde's La Marquise de Sade, 1886; or Mirbeau's Clara in Le jardin des supplices [The Garden of Torments], 1898–99), was required to have a highly developed physical allure. The Bible and antiquity, coupled with a personal experience of exotic sexual tourism, provided Gautier and Flaubert with the inspiration for further awe-inspiring examples of female physicality, such as Cleopatra, the fictional Sallambô, and the Queen of Sheba (in Flaubert's La tentation de Saint-Antoine, 1874), just as other writers were drawn to Judith and Delilah. Joris-Karl Huysmans's exploitation, in À rebours [Backward] (1884), of the biblical story of Salomé, which he took over from the painter Gustave Moreau, led to his exploiting, in a decadent (and highly cerebral) manner, the use the character makes of her body to impose absolute power on the patriarch who engendered her. Female nudity is fundamental to the more accessible libertinism of Pierre Louÿs, in such popular works as Aphrodite (1896), the story of a courtesan in 1st-century Egypt.

It is nonetheless the explicit emphasis on physical sexual activity that most surely characterizes the 19th-century French novel. Mérimée in La double méprise [The Double Mistake] (1833) and Flaubert in Madame Bovary were ready to scandalize (and delight) the bourgeois public with the unmistakable evidence of sexual coupling behind the blinds of a moving coach. More generally, Flaubert, Maupassant, and Zola gave a new centrality to the sexual act itself and depicted both the preliminaries and the locations in which it took place with a new level of detail. The film directors Visconti and Godard were later able to find suggestive erotic scenarios amongst Maupassant's short stories, while Buñuel found inspiration in Le journal d'une femme de chambre (first published in La Revue bleue in a bowdlerized version) and Louÿs's La femme et le pantin [The Woman and the Puppet] (1898).

It is, arguably, the relentlessly erotic character of Zola's Rougon-Macquart novels that offers the most wide-ranging reflection of the frenzied eroticism of the age. Sex for Zola was not so much a subject as a vast metaphor for a society in the throes of autodestruction, though he was not unaware of the subject's allure. Even the evocations of the vegetables in Le ventre de Paris [The Belly of Paris] (1873) or the department-store window display in Au bonheur des dames [On the Happiness of Ladies] (1883) connote sexuality. The apparently regulated social order of the apartment block in Pot-Bouille [Pot-Face] is exploded by the unmasking of the building as the locus of illicit sexual desire, whether satisfied or frustrated. More generally, the living and working conditions of the modern city, in which the increasing encouragement of consumerist behavior, coupled with a new emphasis on the provision of entertainment, heightens expectations with regard to the satisfaction of appetites of every kind, bringing strangers into a new physical proximity that stimulates both sexual promiscuity and voyeurism. If scenes of undisguised voyeurism are frequent in Zola's novels, it is as if the Parisian environment makes voyeurs of us all, author and reader included. Yet, it was the anonymity of the city, and the stimulus of the chance encounter, that had been at the heart of Baudelaire's eroticization of the city. If his activity as flâneur was that of a dandy, aesthete, and refined connoisseur, subsequent writers and artists came to view the boulevards of Haussmann's Paris as locations in which individuals eyed each other up with a brazenness previously associated only with the world of prostitution. As the streets became the location for an ever-growing section of the population, there was a corresponding need for popular forms of leisure to be organized and controlled, as Huysmans shows in depictions of young working-class men and women both in the workplace and in places of entertainment such as the fairground (Les soeurs Vatard [The Sisters Vatard], 1879; En ménage [Some Housework], 1881).

Most indicative of the embourgeoisement of erotic activity in 19th-century France, however, is the intimate relationship between sex and money. Throughout the century, prostitution was the obsessive concern of the authorities and literary practitioners alike. Parent-Duchâtelet's report on prostitution in Paris (1836), published early in the July Monarchy, was widely read. Far from being a matter for automatic condemnation, prostitution was the subject of debate. Given the nature of marriage in 19th-century France, it is not surprising that it had its defenders. So central was it to the period's thinking that Fourier, in keeping with his practice of rehabilitating negative concepts through the simple tactic of overturning their marginal status, placed universal prostitution at the heart of his blueprint for relationships between the sexes. In the literary realm, with no such intention on the part of the authors concerned, the prostitute similarly progressed from being a minor to a major figure. It is scarcely an exaggeration to say that she became the premier female literary character of the age, and certainly satisfied its appetite for superficial variety. The widespread curiosity about the courtesan's superior expertise finds tangible expression in the scene in La Cousine Bette in which the naive and virtuous wife, Adeline Hulot, is stunned by the opulent domestic surroundings of her rival, Josépha. From deluxe objet d'art to the bargain-basement streetwalker, from those who exploited their position to gain wealth and influence to those who maintained a conscience and a capacity to love or those who set an example of repentance, the species spawned a rich set of subspecies. Balzac's Coralie, his Florine, or his Esther Gobseck, Flaubert's Marie (in his early story "Novembre") or his Rosanette (in L'Éducation sentimentale), Janin's Henriette (in L'Âne mort et la femme guillotinée [The Dead Ass and the Guillotined Woman], 1829), Hugo's Marion de Lorme, Sand's Lélia, the lorette Suzanne in Méray's La Part des femmes, Dumas fils's Marguerite Gautier (his "Lady of the Camellias"), Maupassant's Boule de suif, Huysmans's Marthe, the Goncourt brothers' Elisa, Zola's Nana, the list could easily be prolonged. The high-fashion locales of Parisian prostitution, the Palais-Royal and the Opéra, as well as the more humble red-light district that forms the backdrop for Gambara, are given due prominence by Balzac, while both the Goncourts and Maupassant took their readers inside a maison close, a "closed house." In both literature and the visual arts, the brothel was all but indistinguishable from the theatre in what was a vast spectacularization of life in the French capital. Balzac's totalizing vision, moreover, makes prostitution the dominant metaphor of the Comédie humaine, and one that incorporates rather than excludes literary production.

Sex was also ensured prominence by the employment of more empirical forms of scientific inquiry, especially in the realm of medicine. Yet medical attention continued to focus on masturbation in the wake of Dr. Tissot's celebrated 18th-century treatise on onanism. The portrait of a teenage boy in Balzac's Le médecin de campagne [Country Medicine] alludes to a need for him to be cured of the practice; while Mallarmé's evocation of poetic sterility and the dramatization of "disappearing vision" in "L'après-midi d'un faune" [Afternoon of a Fawn] and "Victorieusement fui le suicide beau" [Victoriously Fled the Beautiful Suicide] have been interpreted as an acknowledged punishment for adolescent masturbation. Balzac's theory of a limited vital fluid, together with the overtly sexual context of his tale of the wild ass's skin that shrinks with each satisfaction of a desire (La peau de chagrin [The Skin of Sorrow], 1831), may be regarded as forming part of a similar sexual pathology. The frustrating debate over the nature of female sexuality (and sexual pleasure) inevitably spilled over into nonmedical spheres. Flaubert's Emma Bovary, the Goncourts' Germinie (Germinie lacerteux, 1864), whose life was based on the inclination of their own maid to debauchery, Zola's Renée (his attempt at a modern Phaedra in La curée [The Quarry], 1872), to say nothing of Mirabeau's chambermaid, would have been inconceivable without the emergence of new views of female physiology. These views, and their fictional repercussions, indeed presented a challenge to what had previously prevailed as truth (vraisemblable).

The perception of an explosion of sexual activity was intertwined with questions of public hygiene as much as with those of morality (though the imaginary newspaper article included by Zola in Nana [1880] indicates how easily the same language could be made to do double service). In the 1830s morgue literature of Janin and Petrus Borel and his Romantic circle, as well as in other contemporary "social novels" (romans de mœurs), the prostitute's inevitable removal to the "hospital" was taken to indicate the venereal ward. If Dumas fils has the Lady of the Camellias die of consumption, this demands to be seen as a euphemistic allusion to a sexually transmitted disease, as must surely be the exotic infection passed on to Valérie Marneffe by her Brazilian lover, and, for all its superior realism, Nana's death from smallpox caught from her infant son. The plaster statue of a priest in Madame Bovary peels in giveaway fashion. But such cases are of minor importance alongside the way in which sex in 19th-century France was associated with disease and death through the fear and reality of syphilis, of which Flaubert laconically observed in his Dictionnaire des idées reçues [Dictionary of Generally Accepted Ideas]: "[M]ore or less everyone is affected by it." (In 1900, some 15 percent of all deaths were considered to be from the disease.) Literary syphilitics included Baudelaire, Flaubert, Maupassant, Alphonse Daudet, and Jules de Goncourt, with the disease being pronounced responsible for any evidence of a pessimistic outlook on life, also associated with the influence of Schopenhauer. Initially not always mentioned by name, it is plainly the cause of the husband's death in Balzac's Le lys dans la vallée [The Lily of the Valley] (1836). Chapter 8 of À rebours recounts Des Esseintes's nightmare vision of the disease. Daudet's posthumous Aux pays de la douleur [In the Land of Suffering] is an autobiographical account of a man in the painful tertiary stage of the disease. Less direct illustrations of a self-aware syphilitic imagination may be found in some of Baudelaire's imagery.

The morbidity of the closely related Naturalist and fin-de-siècle aesthetics likewise drew on scientific thinking that stressed the animalistic in man. In Zola's La Terre, the peasant is shown to display a quasi-sexual obsession with the soil, but there is nothing indirect about the author's choice of language to depict it. If sexual incontinence, including that of an (admittedly amnesiac) priest in La faute de l'abbé Mouret [The Sin of Father Mouret] (1875), a novel which reworks the Garden of Eden motif, is a constant presence in the Rougon-Macquart cycle, it is, in contrast to the case of the cynical journalist Georges Duroy in Maupassant's novel Bel-Ami (1885), rarely controlled; the sexual adventurer Octave Mouret (see Pot-Bouille and Au bonheur des dames) may be counted an exception. Yet there is a still more general association in Zola's fiction between sex and death. It is the emphasis on the proximity of the sexual urge and the desire to kill that takes Zola's fiction beyond a more mundane association of sex and violence. The desire for illicit sexual congress forms the background to the husband's murder in Thérèse Raquin, but it is in La bête humaine [The Human Animal] (1890) that the principal character's homicidal response to exposed female flesh, which is presented as the product of a tainted heredity, unites the two in a more modern perspective. His sexual relationship with his victim is moreover indissociable from the fact that she is urging him to murder her husband, just as she confesses to having, under duress, abetted the latter in the murder of an older man who had taken sexual advantage of her before she was married.

The fact remains that it is the sheer variety of sexual subjects that marks out 19th-century French literature, with those subjects that had previously invited ribaldry now becoming a matter of sexual pathology. In addition to the voyeurism and prostitution already highlighted, these included:

- Incest (the sibling example of Chateaubriand's René, 1802; the uncle and niece in Zola's Le Docteur Pascal, 1893)
- Undisclosed sexual secrets (Stendhal's Armance, 1827)
- Impotence (Mme de Duras's Olivier ou le secret, 1826; Balzac's La peau de chagrin and La Vieille fille)
- Sexual fiascos (the celebrated chapter in the 1853 edition of Stendhal's De l'Amour)
- Homosexuality (Custine's Aloys; Hugo's Claude Gueux; Balzac's Vautrin)
- Lesbianism (Balzac's La fille aux yeux d'or [The Girl with the Golden Eyes], 1834–5; Joséphin Péladan; Baudelaire's "Lesbos" and the two poems entitled "Femmes damnées"; the title originally envisaged for Les Fleurs du mal was Les Lesbiennes)
- Hermaphroditism/androgyny (updating the old fictional stratagem of cross-dressing and frequently associated with lesbianism and/or male homosexuality) (Latouche's Fragoletta, 1829; Balzac's Sarrasine, 1831, and Séraphita, 1835, and his George Sand-type character, Félicité des Touches; Gautier's Mademoiselle de Maupin and his poem "Contralto" in Emaux et camées, 1852; Péladan; Rachilde's Monsieur Vénus, 1884; Jean Lorrain's Monsieur de Phocas, 1901)
- Castration (Sarrasine; La peau de chagrin; Balzac's semi-autobiographical Louis Lambert, 1835)
- Bestiality (a female panther's infatuation with a soldier in Balzac's arguably jocular story Une passion dans le désert)
- Prolonged virginity (Balzac's old maids)
- Nymphomania (albeit with all due discretion, Emma Bovary)

- Frigidity (La peau de chagrin, which also incorporates hints of lesbianism and hermaphroditism)
- Fetishism (clothes and footwear in Madame Bovary; and the more literal (and fatal) case of boot fetishism in Le journal d'une femme de chambre).

Pornography as an entity, to which 19th-century literary eroticism inevitably relates, represents a special case, given its status as the "already written," and features as a thematically legitimized presence rather than as a properly constituted subject. A familiar topos, shared with pornographic fictions themselves, consists of the collection of curios locked away in the owner's library or with the pages (and, above all the plates) hidden behind rich bindings, the object themselves of fetishistic desire. An example may be found in the flagellation addict's library in Edmond de Goncourt's La Faustin (1881–2), with its "curious bindings stamped with phallic emblems." In a degraded version of such decadence, Mirbeau's chambermaid is exposed to obscene engravings by various predatory employers, male and female alike. (The same novel also contains the hilarious discovery by a customs official of a dildo in one of her mistress's jewel cases.) Such evocations of pornography partake of the tantalizing play of the hidden and the revealed and may, to an extent, be seen as emblematic of the period's conception of the book in general. More generally, the relationship between "nobler" forms of French 19th-century writing and the pornography with which its authors were so familiar remains to be studied, starting most fruitfully perhaps with the particular attraction exerted by Flaubert's representations of the "real."

As Mario Praz demonstrated with unprecedented erudition in The Romantic Irony, the predominant obsession within 19th-century French representations of sexual desire was with the sadomasochistic. The prevailing erotic sensibility was duly traced by him to the influence, both specific and general, of the Marquis de Sade. As early as 1824, a French Academician alluded to the latter's nefarious influence. This was further promoted by Janin's article of 1834 (duly read by Flaubert later in the decade). By 1843, the critic Sainte-Beuve felt authorized to claim that de Sade and Byron were the two principal influences on modern literature. In 1851 a conservative critic (Horace de Viel-Castel) produced a long list of those marked by de Sade's influence, including George Sand, Musset, Eugène Sue, and Dumas père. Depending on the specificity of one's criteria, the list was either too long or not long enough. A more exclusive survey would highlight Petrus Borel's "Sadification" of the stereotypes of the English gothic novel and the ambiguities of pain and pleasure that permeate the poetry of Baudelaire ("I am the wound and the knife," he writes in "L'Héautontimoroumenos"). The Goncourt brothers recorded Flaubert's obsessive delight in de Sade, whom he evidently regarded as a "dark comic genius" and whose presence is unmistakable in Flaubert's juvenilia as well as in La tentation de Saint-Antoine and Salammbô. Sadistic torture and flagellation are featured in Péladan's La vertu suprême (1900), Paul-Jean Toulet's Monsieur du Paur (1898), and Mirbeau's Le jardin des supplices. De Sade's name is never mentioned as such in Comédie humaine, but traces of Balzac's awareness of his writings are evident.

The examples given would appear to constitute a veritable (and largely complete) compendium of sexual particularities evoked for their own sake, a response to the compulsion to embrace the universal through an exhaustive compilation of diverse particularities, though one that was fated more often than not to remain stuck in a contemplation of diversity and fragmentation. (Thus the "Notice" to À rebours rehearses the different types of woman possessed by Des Esseintes but is obliged to recognize that the character fails to transcend a feeling of jadedness.) The obsession with categorization and differentiation permeates even the illicit, as may be seen in the attempts to distinguish between grisettes, lorettes, and insoumises, which, as in the case of the narrative discourse of Balzac's Comédie humaine, constitutes a response to the panic felt in the face of both the amorphous and the multiple difference. In 1842, Dumas père wrote a piece entitled "Filles, lorettes et courtisanes." The proliferation of codes and physiologies (there was a Physiologie de la lorette) showed the long reach of the Napoleonic legal and administrative example, while Fourier's sexual Utopia was ordered, almost parodically, by categories and numbers.

Sexual inquiry in imaginative literature was, in other ways too, generally synonymous with the fundamental epistemological inquiry underlying much of the literary writing of the age. It represented a means of pursuing inquiry beyond the familiar and beneath the surface, and was a means of entry rather than the end of the quest in itself. The exclusiveness of the sexual reference varied considerably, and the latter was by no means necessarily the foremost referent. The texts listed from the gerontocratic Restoration, for example, especially those involving scenarios of impotence, invite just as readily a reading in terms of political allegory (as does the shrinking of the skin in La Peau de chagrin, written in the wake of the July Revolution), while hermaphrodite and androgyne fictions may be regarded essentially as allegories of the divided Romantic artist. Yet the movement toward an ever more specialized form of sexual inquiry is undeniable. The Symbolist fin-de-siècle, with its fascination with the occult, spiritualism, and the Wagnerian, pursued a cult of the rarefied, the perverse, and the artificial for their own sakes rather than as part of the post-Rousseau dialectic that had formed the starting point of a Baudelaire. The focus on marginal sexual tastes nonetheless represented a continuation of the dandy's ambition to be the member of an elite.

In the final analysis, the erotic universe that has been surveyed, for all the prominence it gave to the nature and role of women, remained predominantly a male world, one in which Aurore Dudevant was led to dress in male costume and take the nom de plume George Sand. Not only were the vast majority of the authors men, they wrote mainly from outside the approved institution of marriage. Balzac teasingly attributed the authorship of his Physiologie du mariage to "a young bachelor" and remained a bachelor for virtually his entire life. If Zola sought to reduplicate his married life and surroundings in his additional life with his mistress, the many other bachelors included Sainte-Beuve, Stendhal, Mérimée, Baudelaire, Nerval, Flaubert, the Goncourt brothers, Maupassant, Arthur Rimbaud, and Jean Lorrain. The poet Paul Verlaine was hardly a model husband. Of these, few were exclusively homosexual, but the literary world they constituted was largely misogynistic and homosocial. Mérimée wrote letters of an explicitly sexual nature to Stendhal, whose own correspondence and personal writings did not want for a similar explicitness. The sexually scabrous exerted a strong attraction on Flaubert and still more so on the deeply misogynistic Goncourts.

A pornographic product of Musset's pen has already been noted. Maupassant had a justifiable reputation as an erotomaniac and, like Fourier, professed an attraction to lesbians (see, for example, his story "La Femme de Paul," 1881). He wrote some 40 risqué tales of varying complexion, mainly for the newspaper Gil Blas, together with pornographic poems and a light-hearted pornographic play entitled A la feuille de rose, maison turque [With the Sheet of Pink, Turkish House] (1875), privately performed with Flaubert in the audience and with fellow writers such as Mirbeau taking part. A whole section of Lorrain's work (he was a flamboyant dandy, homosexual, and ether addict) was pornographic, while his press pieces devoted to Parisian women took readers into the shadowy realities of the demimonde. Louÿs developed an expertise in French pornographic and libertine bibliography. Verlaine wrote two collections of obscene verse, Femmes and Hommes, published pseudonymously and posthumously, respectively, which celebrated sexual activity with both sexes. Certain of Rimbaud's prose poems have been decoded (controversially) to reveal obscene meanings.

Baudelaire recorded his misogynist views in Mon coeur mis à nu [My Heart Exposed]. Woman was presented by the poet as horrendous because she embodied the natural. In "Les Bijoux," one of his poems condemned in 1857, the attraction of the naked woman comes not from her unclothed body but from the artificial jewels decorating it. Barbey d'Aurevilly refused to be taken in by Baudelaire's evocation of the erotic charms of woman and dubbed him the "virgin poet." As for Michel Butor, writing a century later, he was led to suppose that the poet had discovered that although he was attracted to women, he was not able to perform as a man. Balzac's sexual orientation was for a time the subject of speculation by his contemporaries. Whether or not one accepts the claim that women sensed Flaubert to be a "feminine type," his writings support the view of him as a masochist. As for the seemingly pro-feminist Madame Bovary, Baudelaire claimed that Emma had the makeup of a man, and the novel can be read just as convincingly as the expression of a pervasive male fantasy as it can as a detached psycho-sociological study of female sexuality. It is this ambiguity that makes it the exemplary text with regard to the French 19th-century incarnation of the erotic.

Yet the particularities of many of the authors in question should not be allowed to undermine the significance of the obsession with sexuality in 19th-century France. This obsession intersected with all the other major discourses through which the period sought to confront the problem of knowledge in a world that was changing at an unprecedentedly rapid rate. If the location of sexual desire in the body was acknowledged unashamedly, it was the recognition of its twin location in the mind that ensured that 19th-century French writers probed its more profound dimensions. The changing face of sex provided a privileged indicator of a new socioeconomic reality, in which the creation and satisfaction of desire was paramount. Still more importantly, the dismantling of conventional boundaries rendered the sexual sphere an incomparable area for experimentation and discovery, as well as allowing it to present a powerful challenge to institutions wielding power. Reading itself, newly commercialized and increasingly a mass activity, became intertwined with the pervasive subject of prostitution through the conjoining of money and pleasure. And if desire was predominant at the level of subject, so the literary representation itself became an object of desire, thereby blurring provocatively the distinction between writing that was pornographic and writing that allegedly was not.

MICHAEL TILBY

Further Reading

- Angenot, Marc. Le Cru et le faisandé: Sexe, discours et littérature à la Belle Époque. Brussels: Labor, 1986.
- Barthes, Roland. Sade, Fourier, Loyola. Paris: Seuil, 1973.
- Bernheimer, Charles. Figures of Ill-Repute: Representing Prostitution in Nineteenth-Century France. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1979.
- Birkett, Jennifer. The Sins of the Fathers: Decadence in France and Europe, 1870–1914. London: Quarter Books, 1986.
- Bolster, Richard. Stendhal, Balzac et le féminisme romantique. Paris: Minard, 1970.
- Brooks, Peter. Body Work: Objects of Desire in Modern Literature. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1993.
- Busst, A.J.L. "The Image of the Androgyne in the Nineteenth Century." In Romantic Mythologies, edited by Ian Fletcher. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1967.

FRENCH CANADIAN

- Clayson, Hollis. Painted Love: Prostitution in French Art of the Impressionist Era. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1991.
- Cohen, Margaret. The Sentimental Education of the Novel. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1999.
- Corbin, Alain. Les Filles de noce: Misère sexuelle et prostitution (19e et 20e siècles). Paris: Aubier Montaigne, 1978. In English as Women for Hire: Prostitution and Sexuality in France after 1850, translated by Alan Sheridan. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1990.
- Duchet, Claude. "L'Image de Sade à l'époque romantique." In Le Marquis de Sade. Paris: Armand Colin, 1971.
- Felman, Shoshana. "Rereading femininity." Yale French Studies 62 (1981): 19–44.
- Foucault, Michel. Histoire de la sexualité, I: La Volonté de savoir. Paris: Gallimard, 1976. In English as The History of Sexuality. Vol. 1: An Introduction, translated by Robert Hurley. New York: Pantheon, 1978; London: Allen Lane, 1979.
- Jacob, Paul L., bibliophile [i.e. Paul Lacroix]. "La Vérité sur les deux procès criminels du marquis de Sade." Revue de Paris 38 (February 1837): 134–44.
- Janin, Jules. "Le Marquis de Sade." Revue de Paris 11 (November 1834): 321–60.
- Kelly, Dorothy. Fictional Genders: Role and Representation in Nineteenth-Century French Narrative. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1989.
- LaCapra, Dominick. 'Madame Bovary' on Trial. Ithaca and London: Cornell University Press, 1982.
- Laforgue, Pierre. L'Eros romantique. Représentations de l'amour en 1830. Paris: Presses universitaires de France, 1998.
- Mainardi, Patricia. Husbands, Wives, and Lovers: Marriage and its Discontents in Nineteenth-Century France. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 2003.
- Matlock, Jann. Scenes of Seduction: Prostitution, Hysteria, and Reading Difference in Nineteenth-Century France. New York: Columbia University Press, 1994.
- Overton, Bill. Fictions of Female Adultery, 1684–1890. Basingstoke: Palgrave-Macmillan, 2002.
- . The Novel of Female Adultery: Love and Gender in Continental European Fiction, 1830–1900. Basingstoke: Macmillan, 1996.
- Parent-Du Châtelet, Alexandre. La Prostitution à Paris au XIXe siècle. edited by Alain Corbin. Paris: Seuil, 1981. First published in Paris, 1836, as De la prostitution dans la ville de Paris.
- Perceau, Louis. Bibliographie du roman érotique au XIXe siècle. 2 vols. Paris: Foudrinier, 1930.
- Praz, Mario. The Romantic Agony. London: Collins, 1960 (first English edition, 1933).
- Rousset, Jean. Leurs yeux se rencontrèrent. Paris: Corti, 1981.
- Schor, Naomi. Breaking the Chain: Women, Theory and French Realist Fiction. New York: Columbia University Press, 1985.
- Segal, Naomi. The Adulteress's Child: Authorship and Desire in the Nineteenth-Century Novel. Cambridge: Polity Press, 1992.
- Tanner, Tony. Adultery in the Novel: Contract and Transgression. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1979.
- Viallaneix, Paul, and Jean Ehrard, eds. Aimer en France 1760–1860. Proceedings of an international symposium at Clermont-Ferrand. 2 vols. Clermont-Ferrand: Publications de la Faculté des Lettres et Sciences humaines, 1980.
- Waller, Margaret. The Male Malady. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1993.
- White, Nicholas. The Family in Crisis in Late Nineteenth-Century French Fiction. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999.
- Williams, Roger L. The Horror of Life. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1980.

---

FRENCH CANADIAN

---

There is neither a Marquis de Sade nor an Andréa de Nerciat in the literature of Québec for a specific reason: "Our literature will be solemn, meditative, spiritual, religious and evangelistic." This attitude, imposed by Mgr Henri-Raymond Casgrain as early as 1866 in the Le Foyer Canadien, served as a guide to all Québécois writers. One can easily understand that this advice did nothing to promote the emergence of eroticism in Québec's literature. For nearly a hundred years, several generations of literary critics, themselves loyal Catholics, continued to control and forbid eroticism in fiction. In this severe ideological context, a strong censorship inevitably came down hard on any novel containing erotic themes. For example, La Scouïne (1918) by Albert Laberge was denounced by Monsignor Bruchési as "vile pornography," primarily for a scene depicting sexual content, masturbation, and bestiality.

Despite this climate of moral control, eroticism still found its way into Québec literature at the turn of the 20th century under the guise of realism. Already discredited by Catholic ideology, which viewed sexuality solely as a means of procreation, the erotic theme was first represented as a trivial act. Henceforth, every pretext became justifiable for nudity: the genitalia of the virtuous heroines are exposed publicly by unexpected falls in Rodolphe Girard's Marie Calumet (1904) and Arsène Besette's Le débutant (1914); other female protagonists voluntarily exhibit their naked bodies to excite their partners, an act which was unthinkable in novels during the 19th century; prostitution in Montreal is described in great detail in Le débutant; morally forbidden sexual behaviors, like masturbation, fantasy ("evil thoughts"), adultery, and homosexuality, are described in such a manner that they appear as subtle and ironic commentaries on religious doctrine.

Another constant in Québec eroticism at the beginning of the 20th century was its fairly sadistic nature. The scenes of rape and brutal violence are numerous. Claude-Henri Grignon's Un homme et son péché (1933) is a good example of this phenomenon. Séraphin Poudrier, the protagonist, sexually tortures his wife, Donaldda: "Once, just once, Séraphin took her brutally." Donaldda is very similar to O, the heroine of the The Story of O, considered among the most sadistic French novels of the 20th century. "Completely frustrated in both body and soul, by her desire for love and maternity, Donaldda embodies a submission so absolute that her story is essentially a Catholic and French-Canadian version of The story of O" (Smart, Écrire). Lemont, another character in the same novel, repeatedly rapes a number of young peasant women. Rather than being filled with remorse, the memory of these aggressions contributes to the novel's erotic ambience: "He [Lemont] remembered the scene with sensual thoughts. His imagination enveloped him with pleasurable sensations. These bewitching and speedy moments sparked in him a most violent desire!" Several other novels portray the same type of realistic and violent sexual behavior. In Gabrielle Roy's classic Bonheur d'occasion [Luck of the Occasion] (1945), Jean Lévesque rapes Florentine Lacasse, and in André Giroux's Au-delà des visages [Beyond Visages] (1948) the rape and murder of a young woman is followed by a somber post-coital mood. In fact, it is as if although paradoxical, "this realistic literature also agrees with the essentials of moral discourse: yes, sex is violent, perverse, ridiculous, vile or pathological" (Angenot, Le cru).

In examining the French Canadian literature of the period from 1900 to 1960, it is important to discuss a reoccurring and more positive erotic figure: the stranger. In the Catholic world of guilt and secrecy, the characters who come from elsewhere are the only ones who can bring the liberating power of eroticism. In Louis Hémon's Maria Chapdelaine (1916), a young fur trader, François Paradis, appears out of nowhere in the close-knit village of Péribonka, where he captivates and seduces the young virgin Maria. Overwhelmed by her desires, she attempts to imagine "the first gestures of love that would unite them." In Le survenant by Germaine Guèvremont (1945), the eponymous character arrives in Chenal du Moine, where he literally irradiates his erotic energy: "Everything was happening as if Le Survenant, Eros incarnate, did nothing but awaken the sensuality and the latent eroticism of the villagers like the wild forces of their universe" (Major, p. 203). Finally, in Adrienne Choquette's La coupe vide [The Empty Cup] (1948), it is Patricia, an American woman in her prime, who arrives and seduces a group of four young college students who hover around her with excitement: "She offered her hands, coquettishly, so that they might help her stand up. Patricia quivered: stealthy lips brushed her wrist. Resolutely, the woman took the lead and decided to ignore the young man who had stolen her scent." These erotic games are possible only in the presence of the strangers, because they are not influenced by Catholic doctrine.

In the 1960s, this literary trend adapted itself to the sweeping winds of liberal change, known as the Quiet Revolution, which blew over Québec society. The representation of eroticism became much more openly disobedient. Here we find scenes of necrophilia and sadism in Marcel Godin's La cruauté des faibles [The Cruelty of the Weak] (1961); lesbianism in Louise Maheux-Forcier's Amadou (1963); incest, rape, and pedophilia in Marie-Claire Blais's Une saison dans la vie d'Emmanuel [A Season in the Life of Emmanuel] (1965); consummate and guiltless adultery in Roger Fournier's Le journal d'un jeune marié [Diary of a Newlywed] (1967); multiple rape scenes in Hubert Aquin's L'Antiphonaire (1969); homosexuality in Blais's Le Loup [The Wolf] (1973); bloody and sadistic murders in Victor-Lévy Beaulieu's Un rêve québécois [A Québécois Dream] (1972).

All of these novels, and many others, voluntarily exceed the dogma of normative sexuality and explore a variety of unusual sexual practices. Here, the sacred mingles with the profane but no longer in a hierarchical relation, but rather in an interrelationship which generates desire and erotic pleasure. Transgression also arises, obviously, but without the guilt traditionally associated with the censure of the Catholic Church toward any representation of carnal/erotic pleasure. Eroticism separates itself simultaneously from the can(n)ons of literary aesthetics and religious ideology.

The Quiet Revolution, along with the sexual revolution, offers a new type of first-person narrator, who exhibits a liberated eroticism and aggressively demands a larger place in Quebecois fiction. However, it would be naive to narrow our discussion to a celebration of the liberating aspects of eroticism, which relies primarily on sexual punishment imposed on the weak—usually women and children who feed the erotic transgressive excitement. In the revolutionary eroticism of the 1960s, the ancestral fear of feminine erotic strength—which came directly from the Christian mentality—was still alive: “[B]ecause of her power to awaken masculine desire and therefore upset the order of male domination of the world, the female body must then be—following masculine logic—subdued, dismembered, mutilated” (Smart, Écrire). Whether it be rape, adultery, murder, or necrophilia, the sexual cruelties of revolutionary eroticism are inevitably perpetrated on women's bodies, which, as Anne-Marie Dardigna (1981) states, “serve as the best target for sexual aggression.”

In the early 1970s, eroticism distanced itself from the world of politics. Yves Thériault's Oeuvres de chair [Works of the Flesh] (1975) was the first text in Québec that overtly displayed its erotic content by featuring the subtitle “Erotic Tales” on its cover. The collection is composed of 16 erotic short stories whose inventive titles rely on double entendres that play on both culinary and sexual themes: “The Prepubescent Partridge,” “The Seductive Steak au Poivre,” “The Nubile Quail Terrine,” “The Adulterous Ham,” etc. Most of these stories take place during the Middle Ages in an abbey or monastery where the religious characters prepare elaborate feasts that often transform into orgies. Transgression serves again to create an erotic climate in the texts, although in Thériault's stories it imbues joy and pleasure rather than destruction and guilt. Other tales may have more contemporary settings, but they all combine culinary and sexual sensuality. The meals, like the sexual acts, are meticulously detailed to highlight the pleasurable effect that each bestows on the protagonists. In Oeuvres de chair, it is thus the abounding details of the narration which create the collection's erotic climate.

The same phenomenon of excess in erotic writing is apparent in Les cornes sacrées [The Sacred Horns] by Roger Fournier (1977). Since the publication of his first novel, À nous deux (1963), eroticism has held a major role in Fournier's works. In Les cornes sacrées, the thematic takes on a magnitude previously unequalled. Both a tale of sexual initiation and a mythological allegory, Les cornes sacrées follows the adolescence of Nobert, who leaves the lower St. Lawrence River Valley with his young bull, Pigeon. Along their journey, each experiences his first sexual encounter. The apotheosis occurs in Greece as an orgy erupts including all of the villagers. A river of sperm literally flows into the fields from the collective sexual encounter. Everything is in superlative form in Fournier's text; eroticism is spread excessively. The characters' genitalia are enormous; the sexual positions, Olympian (having intercourse on the back of a bull); and the entire world is united in orgasm: “The cry is a caress that will cause the entire world to have an erection.” Eroticism intensifies to the point that it becomes what Gaëtan Brulotte (Oeuvres de chair) calls a commonplace of the genre: “In erotic literature, excess is a common theme and sexual prowess is beyond the reach of normal mankind. Excessive genitalia size, overstimulated characters, complex or often impossible coital positions, and abundant sexual energy all greatly exaggerate the human reality.” In fact, with this type of novel, eroticism essentially exceeds all forms of realism and thus becomes its own particular genre of literature.

Continuing throughout the 1970s, the feminist movement and a new generation of female writers greatly contributed to the creation of a new form of eroticism. In French Kiss (1975),

Nicole Brossard associates the pleasure of language with that of sexuality. Erotic play is interwoven with linguistic play, in this case, alliteration: “Encore qui vient à suivre dans le texte ainsi que sur la langue, des substituts érotiques, encore que l’on sent basculer dans l’ombre des joues, des jouissances mouvementées comme je jouis dans le jus” [What follows in the text as well as on the tongue are erotic substitutes to such a degree that one feels thrown into the shade of cheeks, turbulent pleasures, like when I have an orgasm in my juices]. More than ten years later, the narrator in Dandurand’s Un coeur qui craque [A Heart That Breaks] (1990) explains the effects that composing erotic literature has on her: “[W]riting, in the scorching heat of summer, stories like the one in the previous chapter, still wet with fresh ink, make me moisten and drip all over, too!... Sad madwoman that I am, lock me up and give me a straitjacket to keep me from masturbating.” Like conjoined twins, writing and erotic experience are fused together, making both from the creation of pleasure, which is exactly what the female narrator in Harvey’s Un homme est une valse [A Man Is a Waltz] (1992) means when she describes this particular phenomenon to her readers: “Writing while performing fellatio is difficult, but possible.”

Within the erotic texts penned by, usually postmodern, women, the female narrators are themselves authors who write about their own erotic adventures. Shoshana Felman (1981) explains the intimate relationship between text and sex: “That which is erotic is always linguistic.... The sexual act always connotes an act of language.... The sexual act of the narrator can be nothing but a linguistic exercise.” In the particular case of erotic literature, the sexual encounter is inevitably an act of language; these narrators are quite conscious of this, and for that reason they create a form of sexual excitation in their texts and vice versa.

Another discovery in the female version of eroticism in Québec was the male body! Eroticism had previously been the domain of the masculine perspective on the woman’s body—but along came a feminine vision which describes men. In this literature there is often a great deal of commotion at the discovery of the phallus:

It’s round! It’s long! It’s firm! It’s like marbled steel!
This is what they call a charming cock! This is what is meant by an erection! And the head! Red and shiny, dotted with stars, of liquid diamonds. The foreskin is pulled taut by the force of erection. The phallus is placed on a pedestal, decorated with bushy hair; his hot and heavy testicles, tucked into their pouch of brownish skin, dangle like ripe figs. (Boisjoli, Jacinthe, 1992)

As the sex point of view changes, the male body becomes lasciviously desirable and is therefore described, objectified, and broken down into its constituent parts. Abdomen, skin, hair, chin, butt, hips, hands, pubic hair, testicles, butt crack, neck, shoulders, arms—all of the male anatomy participates in the erotic encounter. The five senses are also included: the sight of the naked male body; the countless sounds of orgasmic delight that resonate in a partner’s ears; the smells of men evoked by every imaginable metaphor from the woods to tobacco; the taste of a lover’s salty skin and of almond-like or peppery sperm; and finally, the touch of every caress, lengthened in meticulous detail.

Since the 1980s, a new erotic perspective has emerged in which a heroine like Pauline Harvey’s in Un homme est une valse (1992) is not afraid to demonstrate her desire for her companion or her own sexual pleasure: “A man is a tool for reaching orgasm, if there are lovers, they shall be called pleasure, sexuality. A man is a waltz.” Because of the dynamics of movement between partners, dance is the best metaphor to illustrate a style of eroticism most commonly found in feminine writings. The greatest joy in the realization of an erotic ballet is the opening and abandonment of oneself. This time, however, it is the male that is opened: “He wants the belly, he wants the vagina, to open himself inside,” and the woman’s body is inhabited by a new presence. With nipples and clitorises erect, flowing vulvas and vaginas, flesh and bottoms caressed or tortured with delight, a new world is offered to discover: “She teaches me the geography of the land of Women” (Boisjoli, Jacinthe), a world which spins on the axis of pleasure.

Here, the notion of sexual fulfillment is not directly oriented to a single and final orgasm; the dynamics of “the waltz,” of a dance, would not permit it. One must be careful, however, not to limit this point of view to an erotic otherworldliness where women participate uniquely in relationships based on love, stormy or insipid, but always romantic. Feminine eroticism is quite similar to the masculine with regard to its practice. The major difference is that it appears under the aegis of values considered exclusively feminine, such as love and sharing. As with the masculine model, transgression always serves as an impetus of desire—without, however, also being tragic.

Examples of transgression joyously gleaned from erotic works of several Québécoise writers include: the title character in Jacinthe corrupting her young 15-year-old neighbor and destroying everything traditionally viewed as authority—a nun, a pastor, a bishop, a professor, a psychologist—while confessing a fondness for sodomy; the heroine of Un coeur qui craque performing fellatio on a handicapped person while in a restaurant; and the protagonist in Un homme est une valse fantasizing about the adulterous acts she could perform with all of the men in her life. There is nothing to fear in the transgression in these texts because it is not performed in a context of guilt or fear; it has only one goal: pleasure beyond the norm, be it accepted or forbidden.

Amidst the explosion of erotic texts plumed by female authors in Québec during the 1990s, one in particular would stand out from the pack and help erotic literature gain acceptance from the literary establishment of Québec as a genre in its own right. The “sexplorer” Lili Gulliver, created by Diane Boissoneault, travels to the four corners of the Earth searching for sexual adventures in the tetralogy titled Gulliver's Universe. The first novel of the series, Paris (1990) tells of her vacation in the City of Lights, where she successively has sexual relations with Gérard, a psychiatrist; Francis, a wine steward in a restaurant; and Carl, an escort. Nothing is off-limits to her because she is on a mission to catalog the performance of her lovers and to create the Gulliver Guide to International Intercourse. Her ultimate goal is to find the world's greatest lover, or at least to provide a list of suggestions to her girlfriends.

In the second volume, Greece (1991), Lili finds herself in a place she lovingly refers to as the Land of Cocks, where she, among other activities, takes advantage of the local resources to create a cheerful description of the male genitalia: “Among the cocks I have known, there have been big ones, enormous ones, small ones, and tiny ones, malleable ones, soft ones, round ones, those that were bent like a boomerang, erect ones and limp ones, etc.” The third book in the series is Bangkok, Hot and Humid (1993), which deals with the “sexploits” of Lili in Asia. Her tales overflow with clichés of small penises and the carefree sexuality of the Taiwanese. Lili eventually falls in love with Richard, an American.

In the fourth volume, Australia Topsy-Turvy (1996), Lili finally meets the world's greatest lover, Tarzano Rambo, a composite of the love-hate aspects of the ideal man. With her mission accomplished, Lili returns to Québec but refuses to abandon her erotic activities and international projects: “I can do it under any circumstance and in every position. I allow myself to be taken everywhere and come what may! I no longer try to make sense to myself; I abandon myself to pleasure. Always make me come and let it never end, Please! That will be my Australian vacation, after which we'll see.... Who knows, Lili in Africa?”

During the second half of the twentieth century, eroticism had its unveiling in Québec's literature. After a rough start of being ostracized by religious literary authorities, several courageous or naive authors were able to bypass these restrictions by using guilt or a moral when portraying the thematic. It was not until the 1960s, along with the liberating trend in Québec society, that eroticism became a common and accepted literary theme. Later, in the 1970s, fueled by the feminist movement, with its entourage of women writers, eroticism became a true literary genre. The erotic texts written by women brought with them a new dimension on a thematic often viewed with a guilt that was the fruit of the Judeo-Christian tradition which had had such a hold on the imagination of the Québec people. At the end of the millennium, Lili Gulliver appears in Québec's literature like a sexual adventurer who travels around the world seeking pleasure for herself and for the benefit of all the women of Québec. From that point on, eroticism has been rightfully recognized by several institutions in Québec: sections in libraries have been dedicated to eroticism, publishers have printed collections of erotic works, and many newspaper articles have been devoted to erotic themes. From the limits of Catholicism and censorship, eroticism in Québec has become, throughout the years, feminine and joyous. Who can complain?

ÉLISE SALAÜN

Selected Works

- Aquin, Hubert. L'Antiphonaire. Montréal: Le Cercle du Livre de France, 1969; as The Antiphony, translated by Alan Brown. Toronto: Anansi, 1973.
- Beaulieu, Victor-Lévy. Un rêve québécois. Montréal: Éditions du Jour, 1972; as A Québécois Dream, translated by Ray Chamberlain. Toronto, Exile Editions, 1978.
- Bessette, Arsène. Le débutant. Roman de mœurs du journalisme politique dans la province de Québec. Saint-Jean, Québec: Le Canada français, 1914; Montréal: Éditions HMH, 1976.
- Blais, Marie-Claire. Une saison dans la vie d'Emmanuel. Montréal: Les Éditions du Jour, 1965; Paris: Grasset éditeur, 1966; as A Season in the Life of Emmanuel, translated by Edmund Wilson, New York: Farrar, Strauss and Giroux, 1966.
- . Le Loup. Montréal: Éditions du Jour, 1973; Paris: Éditions Robert Laffont, 1973; as The Wolf, translated by Sheila Fishman, Toronto: McClelland and Stewart Limited, 1974.
- Boisjoli, Charlotte. Jacinthe. Montréal: Éditions de l'Hexagone, 1990.
- Brossard, Nicole. French Kiss. Montréal: Éditions du Jour, 1974; as French Kiss or a Pang's Progress, translated by Patricia Claxton, Toronto: Coach House Quebec Translations, 1986.
- Choquette, Adrienne. La coupe vide. Montréal: Éditions Fernand Pilon, 1948.
- Dandurand, Anne. Un Coeur qui craque. Journal imaginaire. Montréal: VLB éditeur / Messidor, 1990.
- Fournier, Roger. À nous deux. Montréal: Le Cercle du Livre de France, 1963.
- . Journal d'un jeune marié. Montréal: Le Cercle du Livre de France, 1967.
- . Les cornes sacrées. Paris: Albin Michel, 1977.
- Girard, Rodolphe. Marie Calumet. Montréal: n.p., 1904; Montréal: Serge Brousseau, 1946.
- Giroux, André. Au-delà des visages. Montréal: Les Éditions Variétés, 1948; Montréal: Éditions Fides, 1966.
- Godin, Marcel. La cruauté des faibles. Montréal: Éditions du Jour, 1961.
- Grignon, Claude-Henri. Un homme et son péché. Montréal: Éditions du Totem, 1933; Montréal: Éditions du Vieux Chêne, 1935.
- Guèvremont, Germaine. Le Survenant. Montréal: Éditions Beauchemin, 1945; Paris, Librairie Plon, 1946.
- Gulliver, Lili. Paris. Montréal: VLB éditeur, 1990.
- . La Grèce. Montréal: VLB éditeur, 1991.
- . Bangkok, chaud et humide. Montréal: VLB éditeur, 1993.
- . L'Australie sans dessous dessus. Montréal: VLB éditeur, 1996.
- Harvey, Pauline. Un homme est une valse. Montréal: Les Herbes rouges, 1992.
- Hémon, Louis. Maria Chapdelaine. Récit du Canada-français. Original illustrations by Suzor Côté. Montréal: J.-A. Lefebvre, 1916; Paris: Librairie Delagrave, 1916.
- Laberge, Albert. La Scouine. Montréal: Privately printed by Imprimerie Modèle, 1918.
- Maheu-Forcier, Louise. Amadou. Montréal: Le Cercle du Livre de France, 1963.
- Roy, Gabrielle. Bonheur d'occasion. 2 vols. Montréal: Société des Éditions Pascal, 1945; Montréal: Éditions Beauchemin, 1947; Paris: Flammarion, 1947.
- Thériault, Yves. Œuvres de chair. Montréal: Stanké, 1975; Montréal: VLB éditeur, 1982; as Ways of Flesh, translated by Jean David, Agringourt, Ontario: Gage Publishing, 1977.

Further Reading

- Angenot, Marc. Le cru et le faisandé : sexe, discours social et littérature à la Belle-Époque. Brussels: Éditions Labor, 1986.
- Brisson, Marcelle. Éros au pluriel. Montréal: Hurtubise-HMH, 1984.
- Brulotte, Gaëtan. Œuvres de chair : figures du discours érotique. Paris, L'Harmattan, 1998.
- Collective. "De l'Érotisme." Liberté 9 (November-December 1967).
- Dardigna, Anne-Marie. Les châteaux d'Éros ou les infortunes des sexes des femmes. Paris: Maspero, 1981.
- Hamel, Réginald. "L'Érotisme dans les romans, contes et nouvelles entre 1900 et 1940." Parti Pris 1, nos. 9, 10, 11 (1964).
- . La littérature et l'érotisme suivi d'un cours essai bibliographique. Montréal: Institut de Réhabilitation de Montréal, 1968.
- Major, André. "'Le Survenant' et la Figure d'Éros dans l'œuvre de Germain Guèvremont." Voix et Images, Vol. II, no. 2, (1976), 195–208.
- Paterson, Janet. Moments postmodernes dans le roman québécois. Ottawa: Les presses de l'Université d'Ottawa, 1990.
- Pelletier, Jacques. "Une exploration de l'enfer québécois." Voix et images 3 (December 1977).
- Saint-Martin, Lori. "Mise à mort de la femme et 'libération' de l'homme : Godbout, Aquin, Beaulieu." Voix et images 10 (1984): 107–17. Reprinted in Lori Saint-Martin, Contre-voix : essai de critique au féminin, Québec: Nuit blanche éditeur, 1997.
- Salaün, Élise. La Chair triomphante : discours religieux, juridique et critique sur l'érotisme dans le roman québécois (1940–1960). Sherbrooke, Québec: Université de Sherbrooke, 1995.
- . "La passion selon elles." In Lectures du genre, edited by d'Isabelle Boisclair. Montréal: Éditions du Remue-Ménage, 2002.
- Smart, Patricia. Écrire dans la maison du Père. Montréal: Éditions Boréal, 1990.
- Von Flotow, Louise. "Tenter l'érotique : Anne Dandurand et l'érotisme hétérosexuel dans l'écriture au féminin contemporaine." In L'autre lecture, la critique au féminin et les textes québécois, edited by Lori Saint-Martin. Vol. 2. Montréal: XYZ éditeur, "Documents" collection, 1994.

FRENCH (UP TO THE RENAISSANCE, INCLUDING THE MIDDLE AGES)

---

Despite the dominant moral influence of the Catholic Church in medieval France, the literature of the period, ranging roughly from the 10th through the late 15th centuries, foregrounds erotic relationships in a wide variety of genres. That France was not a united country, politically or linguistically, explains the existence of two distinct, yet interrelated literary traditions—one written in the various dialects of langue d’oc (Provençal), the linguistic group of southern France, the other in langue d’oil, the group of dialects ranging across northern France and into what is now England. The earliest manifestation of a literature explicitly concerned with sexual pursuits appeared in the southern dialects. By the 10th century, the langue d’oc gave birth to the troubadours, whose erotic poetry would spread both north and south. As the troubadours’ works became better known in the north, partially as a result of political alliances, erotic themes found their way into the works of the northern French poets, the trouvères. Celtic literature and Arthurian legends also play a significant role in northern French literature, finding their greatest expression in lays and romances. By the late 11th century, the adulterous erotic triangle was commonplace. The themes articulated in the poetry of the troubadours and trouvères and composers of lays and romances dominate nearly all French medieval texts, although some specific variants developed. In contrast, the epic neglects most references to the erotic. As a parallel to these serious genres, the comic literature of medieval France, first in the fabliau, then in the nouvelle and the farce, treat these same themes in an irreverent fashion.

Whether serious or comic, attitudes toward sexual relations in medieval French literary texts were heavily influenced by the notions of gender and sexuality that society held. At the same time, those texts contributed to the construction of those same notions. One of the most pertinent questions revolved around the ideal of female chastity and the implications for those women who did not remain chaste. Should a lady, whatever her social status, engage in a sexual relationship before marriage? What are the consequences for her? Further, what are the consequences of an adulterous relationship? A second aspect of this literature also merits attention. The vast majority of these texts deal only with heterosexual erotic relationships. Nonetheless, same-sex relations, primarily male, haunt many of the most representative erotic relationships and also are hinted at in the epic.

Troubadour poetry developed in and around the affluent courts of the southern French nobles. Partially because of trade, partially because of favorable geographic situation, and partially through the greater romanization of the area during the Roman Empire, the courts of southern France displayed a refinement in the late 10th and early 11th centuries that was not as evident as their northern counterparts. It was in this setting that a new genre of love poetry flourished, the canço. The poets themselves were frequently members of the nobility. The lyric poems of such early troubadours as Bernard de Ventadour and Jaufré Rudel posit an idealized love between a humble lover and a lady who is distant either emotionally or geographically to the point of being unobtainable. Frequently, she is married. Although frustrated in his efforts to approach her, the humble lover remains faithful and maintains a cloak of secrecy to protect his beloved’s reputation. The troubadours created an erotic discourse of fin’ amors (refined/“good” love) that continued into the 16th century. Its poetics are those of desire and deferral.

Alain’s Chartier’s “Belle Dame sans mercy” (c. 1424) captures the essence of the troubadour lyric, taking it to the logical conclusion of the rejected lover’s death. (Indeed, some 400 years later, Yeats would take Chartier’s title as his own for one of his greatest poems). Yet, there are counterpoints to the cruel lady. Christine de Pizan's Cent balades d'amant et de dame [100 Ballads Between a Lover and a Lady] (c. 1409–10) creates a dialogue and traces the evolution of the relationship. Refusal leads to acquiescence and abandonment, and it is the lady who faces death, betrayed by her lover. Between these two extremes lies the alba, or "erotic dawn song." Troubadour poets created a feminine voice, and the conceit continued on in northern lyrics as well. The coming of the dawn signals the end of the night that the lady has spent with her lover and a moment of separation. The genre subverts both social structures and the stereotypical cruel lady, creating a thematic that is at once transgressive and erotic. Typically, a watchman alerts the couple of the impending dawn and possible discovery of the adulterous affair. The male lover and his lady bid farewell, consoled in anticipation of another night together.

Early northern poets, trouvères such as Gace Brulé, Conon de Béthune, and Adam de la Halle, retained love as a theme; but it is in the romance and the lays that the clearest shift from the canso occurs, and fin'amors changes into amour courtois, or courtly love. Where the troubadour's canso sings nearly exclusively of un consummated desire, northern texts focus on a passionate, all-consuming love, which may lead to exile or death. While not all relationships in the literature are adulterous, through the legends of Tristan and Iseut and of Lancelot and Guinevere the erotic triangle of husband/wife/lover becomes the model for romantic love. The locating of desire and love outside of the marriage bond reflects the social structures of the period. Marriage was most often a business transaction in which women served as a type of currency. And although no single complete text of Tristan and Iseut has survived in Old French, the fragmentary versions from the late 12th century clearly establish the conflict between love and marriage in the Western literary tradition. In spite of her betrothal to Tristan's uncle Marc, Iseut falls passionately in love with Tristan and he with her. The lovers struggle: on the one hand they try to resist their desire; on the other hand, they attempt to overcome the obstacles that separate them. This struggle eventually leads to their deaths, inextricably linking the notions of love, death, and the lovers' willingness to die for their love.

Chrétien de Troyes (d. 1185), one of the most influential courtly writers, composed verse romances firmly locating the Knights of the Round Table in the French literary canon. His chevalier de la charette [The Knight of the Cart] (c. 1180) recounts the story of Lancelot, Guinevere, and Arthur. Like Tristan and Iseut, the adulterous lovers struggle, unsuccessfully, to curb their desire and to break off the relationship. The tale of Lancelot and Guinevere, like that of Tristan and Iseut, would be written and rewritten throughout the medieval period, beginning with the anonymous prose Lancelot in the early 13th century. Yet, not all of Chrétien's romances focus on the adulterous liaisons of the protagonists. In Yvain, ou le chevalier au lion [Yvain, or the Knight of the Lion] (c. 1178), he poses the problem of how to reconcile erotic desire with social duties. The beginning of the romance hints that Arthur is a weakened king because of his excessive desire for Guinevere. The hero of the tale, Yvain, marries and, after losing himself in physical pleasure with his wife, begins a series of adventures, eventually leading him back to a balance between the erotic and the social. Chrétien also condemns marital infidelity (on the part of the husband) and rape in his brutal tale of Philomela (c. 1165). An integration of erotic desire also motivates the protagonists in his Erec et Enide (c. 1165) and Cligès (c. 1176), the latter proclaiming itself to be an anti-Tristan. Thus, while working within the courtly tradition, Chrétien expands its limits and attempts to deal with the more problematic nature of sexual relationships in a highly structured society.

Adulterous triangles and illicit sexual encounters infuse nearly all examples of courtly literature. The Lais (c. 1170) of Marie de France, a collection of twelve short verse tales, exploit this theme in varied ways. As in Chrétien's works, the Celtic and Breton legends that inspired many of these tales bring with them a supernatural element. That a lover turns himself into a bird so that he might spend the night with his beloved, as in Yonec, or that a wife learns that her husband is a werewolf, as in Le bisclavret, heightens the erotic tension in the tales. Le chèvrefeuille [The Honeysuckle] relates an episode of Tristan and Iseut, using the metaphor of the two entwined as the honeysuckle is around the tree to symbolize their desire, blurring the metaphor of love and death.

FRENCH (UP TO THE RENAISSANCE, INCLUDING THE MIDDLE AGES)

One important subgenre of the medieval lyric poem, the pastourelle, complicates the thematic of the suppliant lover by reversing many of its conventions. In a typical scenario, a knight recounts his encounter with a shepherdess. Invariably he asks for her favors, mimicking the discourse of the trouvères, and frequently she acquiesces; the poem thus relates a successful seduction. In a number of pastourelles, the shepherdess refuses the knight's advances, but unlike the idealized lady who receives respect for her refusal, thus generating another series of poems, sexual desire dominates and the shepherdess is taken by force. These poems of rape often reflect class relationships. Whereas in the courtly model the lover and object of his affection are of similar social status and the lady herself is frequently revered and feared for the erotic power she exerts over her lover, a shepherdess suffers by her inferior position. Nonetheless, in some instances a shepherd is the sexual aggressor. Thus the pastourelle articulates conflicts along class and gender lines, hinting at the tensions around the eroticism in the genre.

At the opposite end of the erotic spectrum are the fabliaux, a genre that flourished from the 12th to the 14th century. The corpus consists of some 170 short comic tales in verse, the majority of which are anonymous. As examples of bawdy humor—the “esprit gaulois”—the storylines regularly echo the courtly erotic triangle, although the characters that populate these texts are normally members of the bourgeoisie or clergy or are peasants, with occasional appearances by nobles. Yet, as in “La Bourgeoise d’Orléans,” the resolution often leads to possibilities of continued infidelity as the wife outmaneuvers her jealous husband. Jean Bodel, one of the first authors of fabliaux, establishes the lubricity of the clergy in his “Gombert et les deux clercs” [Gombert and the Two Clerks] (c. 1190). Satire of the clergy’s sexual mores is a major theme of the genre, one that continues on into the 14th- and 15th-century short tales in prose—“nouvelles”—and on into the Renaissance. Language also furnishes a theme for sexual comedy in the fabliaux, which sometimes are elaborated around a sexual metaphor, based on the renaming of sexual organs. A young man attempting to trick a girl into a sexual relationship relies on a metaphor of an animal and food, as in “L’Escuirrel” [The Squirrel] or “La dame qui abevra le polain” [The Lady Who Watered the Horse]. Similar sexual metaphors figure in fabliaux such as “Porcelet” [Piglet] and “La dame qui aveine demandoit pour Morel” [The Lady Who Asked for Wheat for Morel], but here they function as linguistic games to initiate sex in a married couple.

To a certain extent, the prose nouvelle (short story) and the farce, two genres which grew in popularity in the 14th and 15th centuries, carried on the sexual themes of the fabliaux. Les cent nouvelles nouvelles [The Hundred New Tales] (c. 1460) took inspiration in length from Boccaccio’s Decameron, albeit eschewing its complex structure. The 45th nouvelle offers a typical example of the use of Italian sources: it relates the story of a young man who disguises himself as an itinerant washerwoman in order to gain access to the ladies of the house. As in an anecdote, these tales create an erotic scenario that is usually played out with little detail or development. What the nouvelle supplied to a population that was slowly becoming literate, the farce staged in the public square. A farce such as the 15th-century “Le ramoneur de cheminées” [The Chimney Sweep] plays out the double entendre of the work of the chimney sweep as he visits the houses of townswomen while their husbands are away. In “La confession Margot” [Margot’s Confession], the eponymous heroine whose name indicated a loose woman recounts her sexual adventures to a priest who revels in the account. Overall, as in the fabliaux and the nouvelles, the farces rely primarily on stereotypes and stock situations, with little nuance.

Perhaps the most unique text of the period is the 22,000-line Roman de la Rose, begun in the 1130s by Guillaume de Lorris and then completed some 40 years later by Jean de Meung. In it, the courtly tradition collides with a rationalist, realist approach to relations between the sexes which focuses on reproduction. This highly controversial and popular text is read through the filter of either courtly love (for Part 1) or Christine de Pizan’s late-14th-century literary debate over its misogyny and vulgarity (Part 2). Guillaume de Lorris’ beginning (only a bit over 4,000 lines) articulates the central trope of the Lover trying to obtain his goal, the Rose, who is enclosed in a garden. Allegorical figures such as False Friend or Fair Welcoming people the garden and help or hinder the lover on his way to his goal. Taking up Lorris’ unfinished work, Jean de Meung expanded the dialogues to a more philosophical discourse, highlighting Reason and Justice as important figures. Where Guillaume de Lorris' lover might have been content to gaze from afar, Jean de Meung's lover determines to pluck the Rose, encapsulating the conflict between idealized woman on the pedestal and the carnal nature of desire.

While heteroerotic relationships dominate the literature of this period, an underlying tension, suggesting the possibility of the homoerotic, pervades many of the most "heterosexual" of the texts. Few examples in medieval French literature deal explicitly with homosexual relationships. A single poem from the 13th century by Beiris de Romans, a trobaritz (female troubadour), addressed to Lady Maria, "her source of all happiness," uses the same language and imagery as her male counterparts to express longing and desire. Sexual ambiguity appears in a number of romances, in which a cross-dressed woman develops an erotic relation with a woman and may marry her. Cross-dressing in these tales does not originate from lesbian desire. For example, in Heldris de Cournuaille's Roman de Silence, the daughter is raised as a boy for purposes of ensuring her inheritance. In Huon de Bordeaux, the Virgin Mary intervenes and changes the cross-dressed woman into a man at the moment of her marriage. The 14th-century Roman d' Yde et Olive presents a more complex set of variables. Yde dresses as a man to flee from her father's incestuous affections. As a man, she marries, and her wife must navigate the erotically ambiguous marriage without revealing her husband's gender. In terms of medieval society, it could be suggested that a female same-sex relationship may well have been less threatening than incest.

Male homoaffective relationships often appear to coexist with the suggestion of a possible homosexual one. The chanson de gestes (epic poems) depict the world of knights and soldiers, downplaying the role of female characters. One of the earliest examples is Ami et Amile (c. 1200), in which the eponymous heroes form an idealized couple. Even though they each marry a woman, at the close of the poem it is Ami and Amile who share a tomb, as they had earlier shared a bed. Queer readings of courtly literature point up the closeness between Tristan and Marc (who had remained unmarried), the ties between Yvain and Gauvain, between Lancelot and Galehaut or Lancelot and Arthur. The world of companion knights leads to strong homoaffective ties that may have been a literary equivalent of the closet. These types of relationships (like their adulterous heterosexual counterparts) most frequently end in separation, exile, or death. Even the Roman de la Rose does not resist a queer reading. Fair Welcoming, a male figure, attracts the Lover nearly as much as does the Rose, and rosebud itself is described in phallic terms. A number of Marie de France's lays present characters of suspect sexuality. Lanval is accused by Guinevere of preferring young men to women. The lay offers a heteronormative conclusion, with Lanval having a lover, although it is she who appears to have the active role in the partnership. "Le Bisclavret" [The Werewolf] offers the most provocative conclusion: the werewolf who had been kept like a beloved dog by the king who found him receives loving kisses from that same king when he is again transformed into a man. The homosocial bonds that were the fabric of medieval French society offer possible glimpses into a homoerotic subculture.

The themes found in French medieval literature are consonant with many of the overarching social structures. Marriage appears frequently in these texts, but it functions as an obstacle to love, or at least to sexual pleasure. Erotic relationships within marriage can be as threatening as extramarital ones, for they may cause the husband to neglect his social duties. As woman's access to power was, in the main, limited in medieval French society, so is her role in many of these texts. Exercising choice in her sexual relationships usually leads to condemnation. Where she does succeed, it is most often as a negative example, a warning. Same-sex eroticism appears to exist primarily in the margins. While male homoaffective relationships develop in many of the texts, they are never fully articulated as erotic. Thus, the overwhelming effect of this literature is to reinforce normative gender roles and to manage erotic desire within a markedly limited range of possibilities.

EDITH J. BENKOV

Further Reading

- Allen, Peter L. The Art of Love: Amatory Fiction from Ovid to the Romance of the Rose. Middle Ages Series, edited by Edward Peters. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1992.
- Ariès, Philippe, and Andr Bjin, eds. Western Sexuality: Practice and Precepts in Past and Present. Oxford: Blackwell, 1985.

FRIDAY, NANCY

- Baldwin, John W. The Language of Sex: Five Voices from Northern France around 1200. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1994.
- Bloch, Howard R. Medieval Misogyny and the Invention of Western Romantic Love. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1991.
- Boswell, John. Christianity, Social Tolerance and Homosexuality: Gay People in Western Europe from the Beginning of the Christian Era to the Fourteenth Century. Chicago: Chicago University Press, 1980.
- Brundage, James A. Law, Sex, and Christian Society in Medieval Europe. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Burgwinkle, William. Sodomy, Masculinity, and Law in Medieval Literature: France and England, 1050–1230. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- Duby, Georges. Love and Marriage in the Middle Ages. Translated by J. Dunnett. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1994.
- Furber, Donald, and Anne Callahan. Erotic Love in Literature: From Medieval Legend to Romantic Illusion. Troy, NY: Whitston Publishing Company, 1982.
- Gravdal, Kathryn. Ravishing Maidens: Writing Rape in Medieval French Literature and Law. Philadelphia: University of Philadelphia Press, 1991.
- Lochrie, Karma, Peggy McCracken, and James Schulz, eds. Constructing Medieval Sexuality. Minneapolis and London: University of Minnesota Press, 1997.
- Murray, Jacqueline, and Konrad Eisenbichler, eds. Desire and Discipline: Sex and Sexuality in the Premodern West. Toronto, Buffalo, and London: University of Toronto Press, 1996.
- Paden, William D. The Voice of the Trobairitz. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1989.
- Payer, Pierre. The Bridling of Desire: Views of Sex in the Latter Middle Ages. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1984.
- Sautman, Francesca, and Pamela Sheingorn, eds. Same Sex Love and Desire among Women in the Middle Ages. New York and London: Palgrave, 2000.
- Sigal, Gale. Erotic Dawn-Songs of the Middle Ages: Voicing the Lyric Lady. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1996.
- Taylor, Karen J., ed. Gender Transgressions: Crossing the Normative Barrier in Old French Literature. New York and London: Garland, 1998.

---

FRIDAY, NANCY

---

1937–
American novelist

My Secret Garden

In the first chapter of My Secret Garden, Nancy Friday argues that the inception for the book came from two rejections of the idea that women have sexual fantasies, both by men—the first private the second public. When she told a lover a fantasy, he put on his trousers and left. When she made a heroine of a potential novel have a fantasy, the editor rejected it as making her a freak. In many ways, My Secret Garden: Women's Sexual Fantasies was compiled to prove these men wrong: to show that most women do have a rich fantasy life. Published in 1973, at the beginning of the Women's Liberation Movement in America, it was joined by Shere Hite's Hite Report: A Nationwide Study of Female Sexuality (1976) as part of the attempt to establish what women's sexuality was actually like, as opposed to what a phallogocentric society inferred it should be. Compiled from interviews and questionnaires publicized through the newspapers, My Secret Garden seeks to give voice to an area of femininity silenced by cultural expectations. Consisting of a series of transcribed fantasies, identified only by the women's first names, the book is divided into six chapters which are introduced by the author, as she seeks to explain why women fantasize, the childhood source of these, and the female guilt around male anxiety that often accompanies such fantasies when they are not accepted. The main strength and interest of the book lies in the fantasies themselves. Sex with an anonymous stranger or in front of an audience, rape fantasies, and the thrill of the forbidden top the favorite ones reported. As Friday is keen to stress, the irrational world of sexual fantasy is very different from the actuality of sexual practice, and the fact that so many women report the thrill of being forced to enjoy sex has more to say about their guilt over the cultural prescription of feminine decorum and frigidity in the early 1970s than about a real desire to be raped. Black men, young boys, dogs, and other women were favored partners for white women. Friday, who rejected a college education because of her desire to be closer to her audience as a writer, has no real model of how to analyze the fantasies she presents, though she does articulate a superficial Freudianism, but her refusal to pathologize is one of the book's strengths. Coming at the time of white middle-class women's banding together in sisterhood, the book, with its first name terms, as Jane Gallop argues, "brings women together as confidantes and sisters" to help create a climate where it is safe for women to confess to having a rich and lush fantasy life.

My Secret Garden was a best seller, and soon gave rise to a sequel, Forbidden Flowers: More Women's Sexual Fantasies, in 1975. Less groundbreaking, it followed the same format and compared the sexual fantasies of a younger generation, those who grew up in an era of sexual expression, with the Beatles and Elvis Presley, to see if they carried the same guilt factor translated into being "forced" to enjoy their sexuality. Again the fantasies themselves are the interest, interleaved with Friday's encouraging comments about how they show not that the women are neurotic but that they are enjoying their bodies. The fantasies range from being initiated into sex in church, as a religious ritual, to incestuous relationships involving dogs. Again, Friday refuses to pathologize or analyze, taking them all at face value, though her Freudian model now posits the disapproving mother as inhibiting women's sexuality.

In 1980, Friday varied the format by turning her attention to male fantasies, Men in Love: Men's Sexual Fantasies—The Triumph of Love over Rage. Arguing that men's sexual excitement, "his secret garden," formulates itself in ways that women may not recognize as love and may at times find disturbing in its aggression, Friday posits a scenario where men are independent and their need for love forces them to abandon this security and bind themselves to women, in settling down. The conflation of love and sex in this work and the normative view of marriage make this the most conservative of Friday's work, as she explains to women that they need to realize how much men "worship women's beauty" and long for women who will share responsibility for sex. The most favored fantasy was a voyeuristic watching of a woman masturbating.

Friday's final compilation to date, Women on Top, was issued in 1991. It situates the early 1990s as a much more somber sexual climate, due to AIDS, abortions, and unwanted pregnancies, than was the heady sexual curiosity of the 1960s and 70s. But the younger generation of women accept fantasies as a natural part of their sexuality. Female fantasies in this new society, "wallpapered with sex," focus less on guilt and anxiety at being in control (i.e., rape fantasies) and more on women in control, women with women, and women as sexually insatiable. Young women now take masturbation as a normal part of their sexuality, and part 2 of the book, "Separating Sex from Love," is in praise of masturbation, for allowing women to become more sexual and orgasmic and to distinguish sex from love and thus, like men, separate from the mother. Friday's continuing to place all blame for sexual inhibitions on the child's early relationship with the mother is a pop Freudianism which fails to see mothers as also inflected by social prescriptions, and equally vulnerable. Asserting that while women are changing and are now more in control of their sexuality, men are not and are being frightened by women's assertiveness, she claims that this is "women's responsibility, having started the sexual revolution, to finish the job."

Where Friday's first book, My Secret Garden, helped give voice to the burgeoning feminist demands for rethinking cultural prescriptions of femininity, her stance has become increasingly questioning of feminism. Many of her assumptions, models, and conclusions lack a sophistication that in the climate of the 1990s is more problematic than it had been in the 1970s. Women's fantasies about having sex with other women are linked to a "nostalgia for the mother's breast" that obscures and silences a whole range of erotic desires. As Andrea Stuart argues, her lack of cultural specificity and her bland assumption that she speaks for every woman, of whatever age, ethnicity, or sexual orientation, makes the project prescriptive in its own way: "Yes she has put women's erotic lives on the map; but I suspect that by enshrining women's sexuality in this particular way, Friday may have helped to cut us off from the possibility of creating our own erotic language." But where the explanations unwittingly censor, the fantasies themselves continue to demonstrate the wild diversity and complexity of real women's sexual fantasies, and in documenting and publishing them, Friday has helped to change the climate of opinion on women's sexuality and their erotic desires.

FRITSCHER, JACK

Biography

Born in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, August 27, she attended Wellesley College. She began as a reporter and magazine editor in the early 1960s, before becoming a freelance writer. She is most well known as a compiler of best-selling books of women's emotional and sexual experiences, from the 1970s through to the 1990s. She has been married twice, to W.H. Manville (October 1967) and Norman Pearlstine (July 1988).

MERJA MAKINEN

Editions

My Secret Garden: Women's Sexual Fantasies. New York: Trident, 1973; London: Virago in association with Quartet, 1975; 25th anniversary issue, Pocket Books, 1998

Selected Works

My Secret Garden: Women's Sexual Fantasies. 1973
Forbidden Flowers: More Women's Sexual Fantasies. 1975
My Mother/My Self: The Daughter's Search for Identity. 1979
Men in Love: The Triumph of Love over Rage. 1980
Jealousy. 1985
Women on Top: How Real Life Has Changed Women's Sexual Fantasies. 1991
The Power of Beauty. 1996

Further Reading

Bright, Susie. "Rape Scenes." In Sexual Reality: A Virtual Sex World Reader. Pittsburgh, PA: Cleis, 1992.
Gammell, N.F. "My Secret Garden." English Studies in Canada 25 (March 1999).
Gallop, Jane. "Snatches of Conversation." In Women and Language in Literature and Society, edited by Sally McConnell-Ginet et al. New York: Praeger, 1980.
Stuart, Andrea. New Statesman and Society 4, December 6, 1991.

---

FRITSCHER, JACK

---

1939–

American novelist and editor

Jack Fritscher has been many things: tenured university professor, novelist, writer of short stories, biographer, magazine editor, maker of more than 200 erotic videos, photographer, chronicler, and critic of American pop culture. His writing links all these activities into an exploration of eroticism, which is, for Fritscher, an arena of masculine-identified sexuality. His approach is twofold. On the one hand he is the formally trained critic and ethnologist, curious about all aspects of human behavior, as demonstrated in his nonfiction titles Popular Witchcraft: Straight from the Witch's Mouth and Mapplethorpe: Assault with a Deadly Camera. On the other, he is the writer-artist dramatizing a personal vision—expressed, for example, in his ambitious signature novel, Some Dance to Remember. There, as well as in all of his writing and photography, his focus is on what he calls "homomascularity"—less the act of sex itself, more a complete state of being.

He sees in the very males who attract him—bodybuilders, cowboys, cops, men in sports gear and uniform—ritualized totems of the potent American Dream, taken from his own dream visions, as well as from the dreams of the intense cult following whose tastes he has recorded and reflected for many years on page and screen. He believes, as the author of the award-winning novel The Geography of Women, that just as women now investigate gender, similarly many men have become increasingly curious about their own gender identification. In his view, true homomascularity, far from canceling out the female principle, offers the valid gender balance of male animus that the female anima demands and deserves. His writing dramatizes the fact that there is in male-to-male sex an underlying current of violence—that sexual relationships between grown-up men, the bulls and bears of the herd, often veer toward displays of brute strength, and even beyond this to episodes of action-adventure that outsiders might view as violence. As an American erotic writer, he also perceives that these outbursts of physical competition are intrinsic to the nature of American life. Usually quite cinematic, his style is often as challenging as his content. So naturally does he fit eros into revelations of what it is to lead a sexual human life that he refers to his literary erotica as “men’s adventure stories.” In Burning Pen: Sex Writers on Sex Writing, Fritscher, distancing himself from autobiography, explained his gonzo journalistic approach to reflexive erotica in his essay “Porno Ergo Sum”: “I inhale experience. I exhale fiction.”

In another gay-studies essay, “Erotic Writing Manifesto,” he added: “The gay erotic writer is to gay non-erotic writers what Ginger Rogers was to Fred Astaire: gay erotic literature does everything gay literature does, but does it backwards and in high heels adding to its Olympic degree of difficulty and pleasure.”

“One hopes,” he writes, “when one works in erotic literature to constantly redefine what we consider to be erotic. I often develop fetish-based stories, perhaps foreign at first to the reader who ultimately gets seduced by this strange alternative-angle approach to orgasm. This freshens the surprise and delight of the genre with both beauty and terror—and for many readers, terror is their only hard-on.”

Fritscher mixes his first-person verisimilitude with character development, screenplay-like story arcs, and dialog typified by stories such as “Wild Blue Yonder,” “How Buddy Left Me,” “Daddy’s Big Shave,” and “Foreskin Prison Blues.” Stylistically, he creates erotic rhythms through word choice and precise punctuation, as in the comic erotica of the 3,000-word short story “Three Bears in a Tub (A One-Sentence Romance)” in Best American Erotica, 2003. His images of sex comment on human life: eroticism is means toward humanism.

As San Francisco editor-in-chief of Drummer, Jack Fritscher developed, and in some cases brought to print for the first time, themes that have since become staples of gay literature: the concept of “gay pop culture” itself; the gender identity of homomascularity; the fetish analysis of bondage, cigars, rubber, bears, and edge play. His writing of erotic interviews and feature articles balances his erotic fiction.

As he wrote, in his role as founding adviser to the Erotic Writers Association, 2002: “Erotica is the essential writing of lesbian culture the way that blues and rap are essential to African-American culture. No one successfully dares censor blues or rap. Yet both the puritan ‘straight mainstream’ of publishing, as well as the exclusionism of the self-anointed ‘gay literary establishment’ have too long censored lesbian gay erotic writing by denying both its cultural essence and its literary nature. Historically, everything has been rigged against erotica—agents, publishers, printers, distributors, bookstores, reviews, and awards. Yet erotica is a quintessential form of human expression, because it is the subtext of life, as much as erotica is always the avant garde of art.” His Catholic-school education—as well as his longtime career commitment to the Catholic priesthood—may explain how, though Fritscher’s erotica may seem Freudian, it is really more Jungian and basically Platonic in its ejaculatory ideal. “My S&M erotica,” he has written, “spins out of the central image and the main archetype of Western culture: the handsome, muscular, masculine, nearly naked Christus, bound, whipped, and crucified.”

Biography

Jack Fritscher was born in Jacksonville, Illinois, June 20. Educated for the Catholic priesthood at the Vatican’s Pontifical College Josephinum, 1953–1963; first published, 1958; received doctorate in philosophy, Loyola University, Chicago, 1968, having written his thesis on Love and Death in Tennessee Williams; founding member, American Popular Culture Association, 1968; wrote novel, I Am Curious (Leather), 1969, published 1972, and republished as Leather Blues, 1984; wrote Popular Witchcraft: Straight from the Witch’s Mouth, 1973; university professor, teaching American literature and cinema, 1967–1976; founding editor-in-chief of San Francisco–based Drummer magazine, 1977; wrote signature novel Some Dance to Remember using his own erotic journals, 1970–1982; created and edited with Mark Hemry first 'zine of the eighties, Man2Man Quarterly, 1980–1982; from 1977 onward, wrote short stories, features, poems, plays, and screenplays later anthologized in six volumes, including the canonical Corporal in Charge of Taking Care of Captain O'Malley, 1978; in addition wrote transgender erotica, "Aqua-Nymph," 1981, and lesbian novel, The Geography of Women, 1998, as well as cross-cultural Celtic fiction, "Chasing Danny Boy," 1999; wrote erotic memoir Mapplethorpe: Assault with a Deadly Camera, 1994; wrote benchmark essay on erotic theory, "Porno Ergo Sum," 2001; since 1969, has been an erotic photographer shooting covers and centerfolds; created Palm Drive Video, 1982, writing and directing more than 200 erotic feature and gay documentary videos; founding member advisory board, Erotic Authors Association, 2002; Story Teller of the Year Award, 2002, for priest sex-abuse novel, What They Did to the Kid: Confessions of an Altar Boy; wrote erotic pop-culture history of Drummer magazine in the documentary anthology Eyewitness Drummer: A Memoir of the Gay History, Pop Culture, and Literary Roots of the Best of Drummer Magazine, 2003. His books have sold more than 110,000 copies, and his erotic videos more than 250,000 copies. Two of his videos, including Dureau in Studio, produced by Mark Hemry, profiling the erotic painter-photographer George Dureau, New Orleans, are in the permanent collection of the Maison Europeene de la Photographie, Paris.

EDWARD LUCIE-SMITH

Selected Works

- "Love and Death in Tennessee Williams." Ph.D. dissertation, Loyola University of Chicago, 1968. Available at <http://jackfritscher.com>
- I Am Curious (Leather): A Novel*. New York: Target Studio, 1971; as Leather Blues: A Novel, San Francisco: Gay Sunshine Press, 1984.
- Popular Witchcraft: Straight from the Witch's Mouth*. Bowling Green, OH: Bowling Green University Popular Press, 1972; as Popular Witchcraft, Secaucus, NJ: Citadel/Lyle Stuart Inc., 1973; as Popular Witchcraft (revised second edition), Madison: University of Wisconsin Press/Popular Press, 2005.
- Corporal in Charge of Taking Care of Captain O'Malley and Other Stories*. San Francisco: Gay Sunshine Press, 1984; as Corporal in Charge and Other Stories, London: Prowler Press, 1998; San Francisco: Palm Drive Publishing, 2000.
- Stand by Your Man and Other Stories*. San Francisco: Leyland Publications, 1987; as Stand by Your Man, San Francisco: Palm Drive Publishing, 1999.
- Some Dance to Remember*, Stamford, CT: Knights Press, 1990; as Some Dance to Remember: A Memoir-Novel of San Francisco 1970–1982. New York, London, Oxford: Haworth Press, 2005.
- Mapplethorpe: Assault with a Deadly Camera*. Mamaroneck, NY: Hastings House, 1994; as El fotografado del escandalo, translated by J.A. Bravo, Barcelona: Ediciones Martinez Roca, 1995.
- Jack Fritscher's American Men*. Photography selected and introduction by Edward Lucie-Smith. London: Gay Men's Press, 1995.
- Rainbow County and Other Stories*. San Francisco: Palm Drive Publishing, 1997.
- The Geography of Women: A Novel*. San Francisco: Palm Drive Publishing, 1998; as Geographia Gynaikon, translated by Andreas Pikakes, Athens: Periplous Publishing, 2000.
- Titanic: Forbidden Stories Hollywood Forgot*. San Francisco: Palm Drive Publishing, 1999.
- What They Did to the Kid: Confessions of an Altar Boy*. San Francisco: Palm Drive Publishing, 2001.
- Jacked: The Best of Jack Fritscher*. Collected and edited by Jesse Grant. Los Angeles: Alyson Books, 2002.
- Eyewitness Drummer: A Queer Studies Memoir of the Gay History, Pop Culture, and Literary Roots of Drummer Magazine*, 2005. Available at <http://jack-fritscher.com>
- "Corporal in Charge: The One-Act Play." In Gay Roots: Twenty Years of Gay Sunshine: An Anthology of Gay History, Sex, Politics, and Culture. edited by Winston Leyland. San Francisco: Gay Sunshine Press, 1991.
- "Erotic Artist Chuck Arnett: His Life/Our Times." In Leatherfolk: Radical Sex, People, Politics, and Practice, edited by Mark Thompson. Los Angeles: Alyson Publishing, 1991.
- "Chasing Danny Boy." In Chasing Danny Boy: Powerful Stories of Celtic Eros, edited by Mark Hemry. San Francisco: Palm Drive Publishing, 1999.
- "Introduction." In The Leatherman's Handbook: Silver Jubilee Edition, edited by Larry Townsend. Los Angeles: LT Publications, 2000.
- "Mapplethorpe." In Censorship: An International Encyclopedia, edited by Derek Jones. London: Fitzroy Dearborn Publishers, 2001.
- "Porno Ergo Sum" and "Wild Blue Yonder." In The Burning Pen: Sex Writers on Sex Writing, edited by M. Christian. Los Angeles: Alyson Publications, 2001.
- "Three Bears in a Tub." In Best American Erotica 2003, edited by Susie Bright. New York: Touchstone/Simon & Schuster, 2003.

“Homomascularity: Framing Erotic Keywords of Queer Popular Culture.” Queer Keyword Conference, April 15, 2005, at University College Dublin, Ireland. Available at <http://jackfritscher.com>

Further Reading

Denoyelles, Bill. “Gay Art, Robert Mapplethorpe and the Titanic 70s: An Interview with Jack Fritscher.” In

The Archive No. 9. New York: Leslie-Lohman Gay Art Foundation, Winter 2002.

Lucie-Smith, Edward. “Introduction.” In Jack Fritscher’s American Men. London: Gay Men’s Press, 1995.

Thomas, Claude. “Afterword: Gay American Literature.” In Rainbow County and Other Stories. San Francisco: Palm Drive Publishing, 1999.

---

FURNITURE

---

It might be thought, on the basis of modern stories, that erotic literature tells about people doing things in bed, but the bed is not usually the main focus of interest in stories written before 1850. The most common piece of furniture in classical boudoirs, as described in French libertine literature, is the sofa, or divan. When paintings and engravings of the time show people making love, and when literature describes them doing so, they are not usually “in” bed, as in modern stories, but sometimes leaning on or spread across a divan or some other piece of furniture, using it as support. Even where a bed is present, the characters are likely to have one foot on the floor.

Furniture is often described in seventeenth- and eighteenth-century stories as providing, so to speak, a ready-made shape, waiting to be adopted. Women are said in French to be “curved” on sofas, turned into seductive shapes by aligning themselves with the contours of the furniture. If it is remembered that another vital element of boudoir decor was the mirror, one can begin to understand that classical libertines were quite deliberate and self-conscious about the poses they were adopting. Literature, engravings, and paintings on the walls showed how it was done; the furniture provided material support; and mirrors allowed people to see that they were doing it properly.

In the latter half of the eighteenth century, erotic stories began to tell more and more of furniture that broke during the action. Instead of the classical stability that allowed poses to be taken up like tableaux and enjoyed for themselves, one finds incidents in which the furniture cracks and falls apart. It may be just a chair, or perhaps some kind of light bed made of webbing, but the furniture now appears quite unstable. And lest this might appear simply as a comical turn of events, deflating erotic tension, readers are continually told that the resulting collapse is a good thing. Rather than pulling the lovers apart, disturbing their erotic poise, it actually throws them together. As they fall, the man penetrates more deeply, the woman yields more completely; it is in fact the happiest of accidents. The point of this rather new kind of story, which flourishes in French around 1790–1800, seems to be that true, natural pleasure does not need to follow ready-made boudoir shapes. But the breaking bed or the chair that comes crashing down is in its own way a model for using furniture erotically, suggesting that the best positions are not the ones that lovers adopt with care, but the ones they fall into.

The historical change in erotic furniture described in stories has a technical dimension. Instead of the firmness and stability associated with classical sofas, the furniture described around 1790–1800 is noteworthy for its resilience. Beds are often sprung and made for bouncing on. Making love in coaches also comes into vogue in stories of that time, and it was sometimes said then that coaches were better than boudoirs, precisely because of their continual movement.

Late-nineteenth-century stories in French describe a different kind of boudoir from the classical one, which had clean lines, pastel hues, and plenty of mirrors. Fin-de-siècle boudoirs are generally dark places, with walls of deep pink or red, heavy drapes, and soft, deeply capacious furniture. This is the time when erotic stories are filled with atmosphere, in the quite literal sense of the word. The sensations of the outside world hardly penetrate at all, and the air is thick with perfume, if not with ether or opium. Around 1880–1900, the bed becomes the archetypal centerpiece, the surrounding decor being barely visible, and therefore, in the proper sense, hardly a decor at all. In libertine stories of 1750, and even as late as de Sade's novels, around 1800, boudoirs are well-lit places in which the characters perform erotic routines with theatrical overtones. But at the end of the nineteenth century, the action usually takes place deep inside the bed, with the rest of the room lost in a haze. What matters most is no longer the shape of the furniture, but its rich material qualities.

FURNITURE

Quite a lot of erotic stories actually feature items of furniture as central characters. Le sofa (1740), by Crébillon, and Le canapé couleur de feu [The Fire-Colored Sofa] (1741), by Fougere de Montbron, are stories typical of their time. Crébillon's novel, which continues to be widely read, tells the story of a man whose soul is imprisoned in sofas by a magic spell. He can gain release only if a virginal woman gives herself to a man for the first time on a sofa in which the hero is currently residing. In the kind of libertine world described by Crébillon, there is a shortage of virgins, and it seems as if the hero will never find release, try as he might to find the right sofa, the right house, and the right woman. But he eventually does so, and the story is able to end. There is no mention in Crébillon's novel of sweat or strain, or wet patches: the sofa is simply a support for love-making, and a perfect vantage point from which a "soul" can tell erotic stories.

It was still possible for a piece of furniture to be the narrator-hero in a fin-de-siècle novel, but the thematic role became quite different. Les Mémoires d'une chaise longue (1903), by Victorien Du Saussay, focuses on the rivalry between a chaise longue and a bed. They stand side by side in the apartment of a promiscuous bachelor, and each can be used for seduction. The chaise longue, which tells the story, sees itself as the proper place for libertine dalliance, and regards the bed as a vast, unthinking place of sleep and death. The chaise longue tells proudly of its own erotic sensitivity, of its capacity to vibrate in sympathy with any who might make love on it. So sensitive is the sofa, indeed, that it suffers from the kind of nervous disorder which is widespread in literature of the time, and acutely present in erotic stories. The chaise longue admits to being hysterical. Its springs are its nerves, and they are so hypersensitive that the chaise longue's condition eventually degenerates into neurasthenia. It also develops a drinking problem. Such erotic pathos would have made no sense to eighteenth-century libertines. It represents the most extreme development of sympathetic, atmospheric furniture. In the fin-de-siècle, eros crosses over into sickness, and the furniture is caught up in the epidemic: the chaise longue itself is sick with desire and pleasure. As the dominant notions of pleasure changed over time, so did the furniture.

PETER CRYLE

Further Reading

- Brulotte, Gaëtan. Œuvres de chair: Figures du discours érotique. Quebec: L'Harmattan, Les Presses de l'Université Laval, 1998, pp. 361–64.
- Cryle, Peter. "Breaking the Furniture in Erotic Narrative: Towards a History of Desire." French Studies 52 (October 1998): 409–24.
- Delon, Michel. "Luxe et luxure: Réflexions à partir de Sade." Nottingham French Studies 37 (1998): 17–25.
- . Le Savoir-Vivre libertin. Paris: Hachette Littératures, 2000.
- Renard, Jean-Claude, and François Zabaleta. Le Mobilier amoureux ou la volupté de l'accessoire. Briare: Chimères, 1991.

G

---

GARCÍA LORCA, FEDERICO

---

1898–1936

Spanish poet and dramatist

The most popular poet in Spain at the time of his death, Lorca's successful literary career lasted only eighteen years. His juvenilia, much of it prose, reveals his early preoccupation with the vicissitudes of love and desire, and his letter correspondence often expresses the voice of a subject who struggled with the social implications of sexuality. His relationships with Salvador Dalí, Emilio Aladrén, and Rafael Rodríguez Rapún, as well as with Phillip Cummings while he was in New York, reflect Lorca's poignant and frustrated sense of love as expressed in his poetry and plays. The principal characteristic of Lorca's concept of eros is frustration: love and desire, heterosexual and homosexual, are at best, unrequited, at worst, fatal. Although it is now commonly accepted that Lorca was gay, until the 1990s, literary critics generally silenced his homosexuality, either by ignoring it altogether or suppressing it in favor of a more "universal" interpretation of his concept of eros.

In his poetry Lorca adopted both traditional and avant-garde techniques, drawing on predecessors such as Shakespeare and Góngora, employing forms such as the ballad and the sonnet, yet also seeking innovation by turning to free verse and surrealism. In Romancero gitano (1928), Lorca engages in a poeticization of the mythic figure of the gypsy, infusing the traditional form of the romance with his profound passion for Andalusia. Lorca transforms the popular traditions of Andalusian culture and the figure of the gypsy into a poetic expression of eros as anguished and violent, producing a collection suffused with sexual desire, violence, and death. Desire appears as a masculine "wind" wielding a heated sword, and sexual relations are characterized by deception, adultery, and incest; in "Thamar y Amnon," for example, Lorca draws on the Biblical theme of incestuous love in which Amnon violently rapes his sister and flees. In Poeta de Nueva York, written in New York between 1929 and 1930, Lorca eschews the traditional form of the ballad for free verse and surrealist symbolism, exchanging Andalusia for the urban space of New York. He leaves behind the narrative quality of the ballads and strives for a personal yet highly hermetic expression of his tragic, anguished vision of eros; the gritty urban space of New York reflects his sense of alienation. Several of the poems convey the poet's struggle with his own homosexuality, juxtaposing the happiness of his childhood and former friendships in contrast with his present emotional state. Yet it is the famous "Ode to Walt Whitman" that offers the most explicit engagement with homosexuality as a source of frustration and alienation: Lorca extols the virile, masculine image of Walt Whitman from Leaves of Grass and rejects the depraved, promiscuous urban homosexual. Between 1935 and 1936, Lorca worked on a collection of sonnets that has come to be known as Sonetos del amor oscuro. The lyrical voice speaks to an absent beloved, expressing the anguish and frustration provoked by the beloved's absence; the gender of the poem's addressee is not specific but in many instances suggests a male recipient. Love oscillates between corporeality and spirituality, between a desire for physical contact that is rarely achieved and a vision of love as a spiritual connection that extends beyond the body. In Diván del Tamarit (1933–1934), the poet, influenced by Emilio García Gómez's anthology Poemas arabigoandaluces, draws creative inspiration from the traditional forms of the ghazal and the qasida to extol the virtues of homoerotic passion. In spite of formal and thematic differences in his poetry collections, Lorca's works in verse consistently employ nature imagery (rivers, barren trees, the moon) as symbols of human desire.

Lorca's dramatic works share the same vision of love and desire as his poetry: Homosexual and heterosexual love suffers from frustration, social opprobrium, and fatal destinies. El público (1930), an avant-garde theatrical work influenced by surrealism, is Lorca's most explicit treatment of homoeroticism as various male characters ask each other what would happen if they were to declare their love for one another. As a metatheatrical work, it dramatizes the possible phobic reactions of the public to the theatrical representation of homosexuality. La zapatera prodigiosa (1930) and Amor de don Perlimplín con Belisa en su jardín (1933) take inspiration from the traditional narrative of the "old cuckold" whose youthful wife seeks amorous and erotic attention from virile paramours. While comedic in tone, the plays nevertheless announce Lorca's profound engagement with the asymmetry of erotic relations in which the subject's desires are stronger and thus remain unrequited by the emotionally vacant other. Así que pasen cinco años (1931) portrays the fatality of a desire in a surrealist guise as the central protagonist; a young man must wait five years before being reunited with his beloved, who in turn scorns him. In a card game at the drama's denouement, he is forced to play his Ace of Hearts (symbolic of love) and dies. Similarly, in Bodas de sangre (1932), the female protagonist's marriage plans end in death as her former lover and future husband kill each other in a violent, jealousy-driven battle. In La casa de Bernarda Alba (1936), the youngest of the five Alba sisters, Adela, maintains a passionate affair with her sibling Angustias's suitor, Pepe the Roman. At the end, Adela, believing that her mother, Bernarda, has shot and killed Pepe, commits suicide. Desire is also linked to sterility in Lorca's dramas, his plays populated by female characters who lament the absence of men and the failure to bear offspring. In Yerma (1934), the eponymous protagonist anguishes over the failure to bear offspring and ultimately kills her husband, Juan. In Doña Rosita la soltera (1936), the titular character vainly waits for her cousin to return from America to marry her, only to discover after her youth has passed that he is engaged to another woman. Lorca's poetic and dramatic works thus strike a consistent chord: love is a wound, a transient source of happiness whose rapid passing leads to pain and despondence, and at its most tragic, to destruction and death.

Biography

Federico García Lorca was born on June 5, 1898, in Fuentevaqueros, near Granada. Lorca originally wanted to study music but followed his father's wishes and initiated his studies in law and humanities at the University of Granada in 1914. In 1918, Lorca published his first book, Impresiones y paisajes, a work of prose that was followed by his first poetry collection, Libro de poemas, in 1921. An uninspired student, Lorca moved to the Residencia de Estudiantes in Madrid in 1919, enjoying the greater freedom that Madrid offered and completing his law degree in 1923. In 1924, he wrote the highly successful Romancero gitano, published in 1928. A dramatic shift occurred in 1929 when Lorca undertook a year-long trip to New York, prompted in large part by his struggles with homosexuality. Enrolled at Columbia University, he composed the surrealist-inspired Poeta en Nueva York and worked on the dramas Así que pasen cinco años and El público; he also composed a first version of Yerma, later revised and staged in December 1934 in Madrid. Upon his return in 1931, Lorca collaborated with the university theater group La Barraca, representing plays of the Spanish Golden Age around the country. Focused more on theater than on poetry, Lorca wrote Bodas de sangre in 1932, first performed in 1933 in Madrid, and Doña Rosita la soltera in 1935, which premiered the same year in Barcelona. In 1935, he also worked on a collection of sonnets, commonly known as Los sonetos del amor oscuro. In 1936, Lorca composed his last play, La casa de Bernarda Alba (not staged until 1950 in Madrid), and continued working on the sonnets. In the midst of increasing political turmoil Lorca returned to Granada in July 1936, against the advice of friends who urged him to leave Spain. On August 19, just days after the outbreak of civil war, Lorca was assassinated by members of the right-wing Falange. The motives for his murder—whether punishment for his left-wing political leanings or his homosexuality—remain a matter of historical debate.

PATRICK PAUL GARLINGER

Selected Works

Romancero gitano [Gypsy Ballads]. 1924, published 1928.
Poeta en Nueva York [Poet in New York]. 1929–1930, published 1940.
La zapatera prodigiosa. [The Shoemaker's Prodigious Wife]. 1926.
Amor de don Perlimplín con Belisa en su jardín [Love of Don Perlimplín with Belisa in the Garden]. 1925.
El público [The Public] (1930).
Así que pasen cinco años [Thus Five Years Pass] (1931).
Bodas de sangre [Blood Wedding] (1932).
Yerma (1934).
Doña Rosita la soltera [Doña Rosita the Spinster] (1936).

Sonetos del amor oscuro [Sonnets of Dark Love] (1984).
La casa de Bernarda Alba [The House of Bernarda Alba] (1936).
Diván del Tamarit [Divan of Tamarit] (1933–1934, published 1940).

Further Reading

Anderson, Andrew A. Lorca's Late Poetry: A Critical Study. Leeds: Francis Cairns, 1990.
 Degoy, Susana. Lo más oscuro del pozo: figura y rol de la mujer en el teatro de García Lorca. Granada: Ediciones Miguel Sánchez, 1999.
 Eisenberg, Daniel. "Federico García Lorca," in Spanish Writers on Gay and Lesbian Themes: A Bio-Critical Sourcebook. Edited by David William Foster, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood, 1999.
 Garlinger, Patrick Paul. "Voicing (Untold) Desires: Silence and Sexuality in Federico García Lorca's Sonetos del amor oscuro." Bulletin of Spanish Studies. 79 (2002): 709–730.
 Gibson, Ian. Federico García Lorca: A Life. New York: Pantheon, 1990.
 Gibson, Ian. Lorca-Dalí: El amor que no pudo ser. Barcelona: Plaza & Janés, 1999.
 Herrero, Javier. "The War of the Stars and the Birth of the Moon: Homosexual Poetics in the Early Lorca." Bulletin of Hispanic Studies 77 (2000): 571–583.
 Morris, C.B. Andalusian Son: The Lyrical Landscapes of Federico García Lorca. Nashville: Vanderbilt University Press, 1997.
 Newton, Candelas. "Los paisajes del amor: Iconos centrales en los Sonetos de Lorca." Anales de la literatura española contemporánea 21.1–2 (1986): 143–159.
 Sahuquillo, Angel. Federico García Lorca y la cultura de la homosexualidad masculina: Lorca, Dalí, Cernuda, Gil-Albert, Prados y la voz silenciada del amor homosexual. Alicante: Instituto de la Cultura Juan Gil-Albert, 1991.
 Smith, Paul Julian. The Theatre of García Lorca: Text, Performance, and Psychoanalysis. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
 Soufas, C. Christopher. Audience and Authority in the Modernist Theater of Federico García Lorca. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1996.
 Walsh, John K. "A Logic to Lorca's Ode to Walt Whitman." In ¿Entiendes? Queer Readings, Hispanic Writings. Edited by Emilie L. Bergmann and Paul Julian Smith. Durham: Duke University Press, 1995.

GARCÍA MÁRQUEZ, GABRIEL

---

1928–

Colombian journalist and novelist. Nobel Prize in Literature (1982).

Cien años de soledad [One Hundred Years of Solitude], García Márquez's most successful book, was written within a framework of social crisis, censorship, repression, and the tyranny of successive Right-wing governments, all necessary elements for this new stylistic literary mode. Magic realism allowed writers to, apparently, "depoliticize" their work and create magical and marvelous worlds which invite the suspension of disbelief.

One Hundred Years embraces a range of universal themes encompassed in this novel: solitude, love, sex and desire, and the circularity. These themes are encompassed within the story of the decline and fall of a family who have founded a new town 100 years before.

"Many years later, as he faced the firing squad, Colonel Aureliano Buendía was to remember that distant afternoon when his father took him to discover ice." With that opening sentence an omniscient narrator evokes the end of a vital cycle from the very outset. This chronological confusion, the present seen from the perspective of the past, will continue throughout the main recurrent episodes of the novel.

One of García Márquez's recurrent themes is the failure of collective memory and the lack of accountability for actions taken in the past. Yet, the most outstanding theme is incest. The story begins with Úrsula and José Arcadio's incestuous marriage (they are direct cousins). The family dynasty is not only founded in incest; the physical consummation will occur at least once in each of the seven generations. Driven by irresistible physical urge brothers, sisters, cousins, aunts, and nephews intermarry and procreate. Aureliano José will marry Pilar Ternera. Yet he is in love with Amaranta, his aunt, who in turn is madly jealous of his wife. José Arcadio will marry Rebeca, who was adopted by his parents and brought up with the rest of the siblings as a blood sister. Amaranta, although she dies still a virgin, can only experience sexual arousal while playing with her nephews. Finally, as he faces the firing squad, Colonel Aureliano will try to evoke the memory of his wife but feels ashamed when he can only recall the smell of his mother.

Sexual relations are rarely simple and straightforward between members of the clan. Choice of sexual partner is frustrated by various taboos such that sexual intercourse rarely goes hand in hand with love. It takes Úrsula and José Arcadio more than a year to consummate their marriage, haunted as she is by the fear of giving birth to a baby with a pig's tail—a curse which has already manifested itself once before in the family. Colonel Buendía seeks physical solace with Pilar Ternera because of lack of interest by Remedios. Aureliano consoles himself with Rigromanta before he turns to Amaranta Úrsula. Indeed, Amaranta Úrsula and Aureliano are the only couple that are in love and manage to physically consummate that love. Ironically, Amaranta gives birth to the last Buendía, the one who bears a pig's tail, and whose story closes the cycle of the family and the town of Macondo.

El amor en los tiempos del cólera [Love in the Times of Cholera], the story of a love triangle, is perhaps the most autobiographical of García Márquez's books. Florentino Ariza must wait fifty years before finally marrying the love of his life, Fermina Daza, who rejected him in favor of a better match. But Florentino Ariza, after having spent a lifetime securing his economic success, seizes his opportunity when her husband dies. They set out on Florentino's ship and he puts up the flag indicating cholera so that nobody will bother them in their renescent lives and long-awaited sexual reunion.

Florentino Ariza, however, is essentially an erotomaniac. The principal way in which it manifests itself is with regards to his ability to compose love letters, not just on his own behalf, but for others as well. Although he had dedicated his heart to one person, he abandons himself physically to some 622 (García Márquez is quite precise about the number) passionate and sometimes long-standing love affairs, devoting himself to this amorous antiquarianism with the same intensity as the passion he professes for Fermina. Given that Florentino Ariza is an excellent letter writer, logorrhea plays an important role in his long courtship process. In fact, Florentino Ariza might best be likened to Cyrano de Bergerac, who it might be remembered composed poetry on behalf of star-crossed lovers. Indeed, he brings so many couples together that he soon finds himself composing replies to his own love letters.

García Márquez is also concerned with the depiction of social imposture. He is particularly mocking of Fermina's husband Juvenal Urbino. Urbino is an educated and well-traveled man who knows how to treat women. He is especially patient with their first lovemaking experience, as realizes his wife is terrified of physical intimacy.

Although most of García Márquez's stories are set within a fictional time and place, they can be read as ironic and humorous but also tragic epics that reflect, often negatively, and denounce Latin American and particularly Colombian social and political reality. Other works include the novella and various collections of short stories No One Writes to the Colonel, The Stories of Big Mama's Funeral, Innocent Eréndida and Other Stories and the recent Memorias de mis putas tristes. In this short novel, García Márquez's first after ten years, an elderly journalist decides to celebrate his 90 years in a grand way; an expensive treat only his long-time friend Rosa Cabarcas, who runs the most prestigious brothel in town, could arrange for him. His life changes radically, however, when he sees the young woman lying in bed, completely naked, and he finally meets himself, close to dying, not of old age but of love.

Biography

Born in 1928 in Aracataca, in the province of La Guajira, Colombia, his career commenced in journalism. Between 1947 and 1955 he published regularly in various Colombian newspapers such as El Espectador, Crónica, and El Heraldo. In Spain, he contributed to El País. In 1955, he published his first book La Hojarasca, followed in 1958 by El Coronel no tiene quien le escriba. He founded the magazine Alternativa in 1974 and the short lived El otro [The Other] in 1982

(closed for political reasons) and was editor of the Semanario Crónica in 1950.

The 1940s, 1950s, and 1960s witnessed a wave of innovative, young Latin American writers who, influenced by modernists such as Proust, Joyce, Woolf, and Faulkner, became known as "el boom." Miguel Angel Asturias was considered the precursor of this group; other members included Agustín Yanes, Alejo Carpentier, Juan Rulfo, Carlos Fuentes, Julio Cortázar, Mario Vargas Llosas, Guillermo Cabrera Infante, and Manuel Puig.

García Márquez's relatively low profile career as a journalist ended in 1982 when he won the Nobel Prize for Cien años de soledad which, by its twentieth anniversary in 1987, had sold 30 million copies and had been translated into 36 languages. During the intervening years, with an international spotlight firmly fixed on South American literature, García Márquez continued to write steadily.

Editions

Cien años de soledad. Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1967; as One Hundred Years of Solitude, translated by Gregory Rabassa. New York: Harper & Row, 1970.
El amor en los tiempos de cólera. Bogotá: La Oveja Negra, 1985; as Love in the Time of Cholera, translated by David Campbell, 1997.

Selected Works

La hojarasca. Bogotá: Ediciones S.L.B., 1955; as Leaf Storm and Other Stories, tr. Gregory Rabassa. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.
El Coronel no tiene quien le escriba. Medellín, Colombia: Aguirre Edit, 1961; as No One Writes to the Colonel (contains No One Writes to the Colonel and The Stories of Big Mama's Funeral). Tr. J.S. Bernstein. New York: Harper & Row, 1968.
La mala hora. México: Ediciones Era, 1966 as In Evil Hour, tr. Gregory Rabassa. New York: Harper & Row, 1979.
El otonio del patriarca. Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1975; as The Autumn of the Patriarch. Tr. Gregory Rabassa. New York: Harper & Row, 1976.
La triste historia de cándida Eréndira y su abuela desalmada. Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1972; as Innocent Eréndida and Other Stories. Tr. Gregory Rabassa. New York: Harper & Row, 1979.
Crónica de una muerte anunciada. Bogotá: La Oveja Negra, 1981; as Chronicle of a Death Foretold. Tr. Gregory Rabassa. New York: Knopf, 1983.
Collected Stories. Tr. Gregory Rabassa. New York: Harper & Row, 1984.
Memorias de mis putas tristes. New York: Vintage Español, Random House, 2004.

Further Reading

- Bollettino, Vincenzo. Breve estudio de la novelística de García Márquez. Madrid: Playor, 1973.
- Ludmer, Josefina. Cien años de soledad de G. García Márquez: una interpretación. Buenos Aires: Tiempo Contemporáneo, 1972.
- Méndez José Luis. Cómo leer a García Márquez: una interpretación sociológica. Puerto Rico: Editorial de la Universidad de Puerto Rico, 1989.

- Murray, G.R., ed. Critical Essays on Gabriel García Márquez. Boston, MA.: G. K. Hall, 1987.
- Oyarzun, K. and Megenney, W.W. (ed). Essays on Gabriel García Márquez. Riverside, CA.: University of California, Latin America Studies Program, 1984.

---

GAUCLÈRE, YASSU

---

1907–1962

French essayist and novelist

Gauclère's literary career suffered many misfortunes which delayed its reception (L'Orange bleue was only republished once, almost twenty-five years after it was written), as did her untimely death which limited her work and its influence. She wrote only three novels, the first two of which are dominated by erotic themes. Eroticism in Gauclère's work serves as a counterpoint to a perverted innocence, marked by a questioning of abjection, secrets, suffering, and guilt. It appears within the narrative as a figure of sin (in L'Orange bleue) or as the tyranny of the flesh (in La clé), creating in Gauclère's œuvre, an eroticism of anti-eroticism. In the same way as Jean Paulhan remarked the surprising respectability of Histoire d'O by Pauline Reage, Gauclère's eroticism could be branded as pitilessly respectable. Her mastery of form both exposes and contains the exhibition of the intimate.

The cover of L'Orange bleue, carries the word 'Récit..' Written between 1933 and 1939, the novel, in a manner reminiscent of André Gide's autobiographical Si le grain ne meurt (1926), tells the first person account of the gradual sexualization of the subject. In Gauclère, however, this process is one of an objectification, even a reification of the body. The narrative depicts the very young boarding school girl, innocently falling prey to several practices and abuses, with an increasing sense of estrangement. The main theme of the novel is the displacement of the fatherless girl, who moves from one place to another and often from hands to hands. Barely eleven years old, she is presented with a succession of abusive substitute fathers, who despicably introduce themselves as 'petit papa' or 'Uncle Joseph' and try to take advantage of her. Interestingly, the attempt to pervert her involves making her read erotic books, namely the series of Claudine by Colette, since 'a little girl who reads Claudine can see everything..' The young girl converts to Catholicism, and later experiments with the repressive order of several religious institutions, where she tries to escape the sin of the flesh through mysticism. She also hopes to redeem her Jewish father, and yearning for the vocation of celibacy, prays that if she ever is to get married, the marriage will remain white.

The quasi-sacrificial interiorization of values imposed upon her is also undermined by the sensitive portrayal of the unavowed eroticism of the meticulous school rituals, such as the nuns' curiosity, the discipline, the common stripping of the boarders, and the everyday humiliations. Predating Foucault, Gauclère demonstrates the erotic potential existing in the inscription of power relationships on the girls' bodies. The teaching of feminine behavior by the nuns, the corporal punishment, and prohibitions such as not crossing one's legs, prove to be an instruction into temptation and an incitation to representations of impurity. This awareness helps to transform a victimized eroticism into an eroticism of conquest, and to regain freedom from the infinite casuistic of religion. Yet such conquest leads her only to be rejected into a world dominated by the aggression of desiring and objectifying looks: 'Then I was able to understand the world which had been depicted as being so dangerous. I'd had no money, no books, no friends and I'd meet disgusting gentlemen, who'd call me doll.'

An even more tragic form of eroticism is at the core of her novel La Clé, dedicated to Etiemble. As the title suggests, the novel, set in Paris and in Mexico, deals with closure. The failure of a metaphoric key to open the prison built around the main female character, in her desire to be untouchable, is rendered in the opening chapter by the discovery of her putrescent body two months after her suicide. Once an object of unwanted desires, she has been reduced to a stanching corpse. Dominated by this figure of decomposition, physical love in the novel finds a parallel with a process of corruption, degradation, and physical pain. The recurrence of animals involved in or as inspiration for sexual acts (a parrot, a bull, a man disguised for sexual rituals as a cock, another as a horse), suggests an identity between copulation and bestiality she cannot accept: 'Love was male and female blinded by the species.' However, the only real escape is death.

The diversity of erotic themes interwoven in Gauclère's novels, their rich psychoanalytical content, and the quality of her style makes her œuvre particularly original. Its neglect by critics appears completely undeserved and calls for a systematical rediscovery.

Biography

Léonie (aka Yassu) Gauclère, was born on the 10th of January 1907 in Paris. She studied Philosophy at the Faculté des lettres de Bordeaux and obtained the Agrégation de Philosophie in 1931, in the same year as Ferdinand Alquié, Claude Lévi-Strauss, Robert Derathé, and Simone Weil. She taught Philosophy in several high schools, including Lycée de Moulins in 1931, Lycée de Toulouse, (1932–1936) and Lycée de Sèvres (1936–1938). She met her future husband, Etiemble (*), at the Moscow International Writers' Congress, in 1934 with whom she wrote a remarkable biography of Rimbaud in 1936. Etiemble's scandalous debut novel L'Enfant de chœur (1937), which tells of the sexual education of a young boy, is dedicated to her, while Gauclère's first novel, L'orange bleue, deals with the sexual apprenticeship of a young girl. Published in June 1940, during the French exodus before the arrival of the Nazi armies, copies of the book could reach neither the public, nor the critics. Fearing for her life because of her Jewish background, she left France for America where Etiemble was teaching. She taught in Hamilton College until 1943. After leaving teaching, she worked as a civil servant, as an attaché in the Government Press service, in Alger and Paris (1944), and at the French Embassy, in Cairo (1945–1947). She divorced Etiemble and became a civil servant for UNESCO in Paris, continuing to write and was awarded the Prix Sainte-Beuve in 1951 for her second novel, La Clé, dedicated to Etiemble. L'orange bleue was republished in 1961. She died young on the 22nd of September, 1962.

DOMINIQUE JEANNEROD

Selected Works

Novels

L'Orange bleue. Paris: Gallimard, 1940 (Nouvelle édition, Gallimard 1961).

Sauve qui peut. Paris: Gallimard, 1955.

La clé. Paris, Gallimard: 1951.

Other Works

Étiemble, René and Yassu Gauclère. Rimbaud, Paris: Gallimard, 1936.

'Une petite fille et Dieu.' Lettres françaises. n.3, janvier 1942. Buenos Aires: SUR, 1942.

Lawrence, Thomas Edward. Lettres de T. E. Lawrence. Translated by René Etiemble and Yassu Gauclère. Paris: Gallimard, 1948.

Further Reading

Pia, Pascal. Dictionnaire des œuvres érotiques. Paris: Robert Laffont, Bouquins, 2001.

Who's Who in France. Paris: J. Lafitte, 1951.

Temerson, H. Biographie des principales personnalités, décédées en 1961. Paris: H. Temerson, 1962.

Nourissier, François. 'Portrait de l'aventurier.' La chronique littéraire. Le Figaro, 29 octobre 2004.

Philipponnat, Olivier and Patrick Roger Lienhardt. Stéphane: enquête sur l'aventurier. Paris: Grasset, 2004.

Wattel, Béatrice and Michel Wattel. Qui était qui, XXe siècle: dictionnaire biographique des Français disparus ayant marqué le XXe siècle. 2e éd., Levallois-Perret: J. Lafitte, 2005.

---

GAUTIER, THÉOPHILE

---

1811–1872

French poet, novelist, and journalist.

Though Mademoiselle de Maupin must be considered Gautier's most important discussion of eroticism, the subject, often in a highly veiled manner, is omnipresent in his work. A number of the contes fantastiques [fantasy tales] of the 1830s and 1840s consist of opium-induced reveries which seem to be leading to imaginary (and, invariably, frustrated) erotic encounters. 'Omphale' (1834) and 'Clarimonde' (1836) are best described as erotic ghost stories. The erotic is, in fact, also the theme of Gautier's 1835 novel: D'Albert, a young poet, finds the embodiment of his ideals of love and physical beauty in Théodore, a charming young squire (who is, of course, the Mademoiselle de Maupin of the title). D'Albert's choice of an androgyne as love-object, however, gives rise to all manner of aesthetic, intellectual, and psychological paradoxes which Gautier explores with relish in his diffuse and complex novel. While Mademoiselle de Maupin was shunned by the general public, its influence on French Romanticism and the decadent movement (especially Sainte-Beuve, Baudelaire, and Swinburne) was considerable.

Gautier's most overtly erotic (or offensive) work, however, was a long communication which he sent from Rome in October 1850 to Apollonie Sabatier, an enchanting demi-mondaine who was maintained by a rich banker. She also numbered Baudelaire and Flaubert among her devoted admirers. Surprisingly, given its Rabelaisian content, hand-written copies of this letter would seem to have circulated more or less freely in the Parisian literary milieu for a number of years (a version was read to the Goncourts in December 1857, for example). Though it did not make its way into print during the lifetime of either the author or the recipient, Augustus Brancart, the celebrated clandestine bookseller who had recently moved his center of operations from Brussels to Amsterdam, issued it as Lettre à la Présidente in 1890. ('La Présidente,' perhaps in honor of her capacity as a hostess, was Gautier's own affectionate nickname for Mme. Sabatier). Later editions (now as Lettres à la Présidente) are often augmented by a further seventy or so short notes by Gautier to Mme Sabatier, mainly dealing with matters such as tickets for the opera, together with the handful of erotic poems that the author had been wary of publishing under his own name during his lifetime.

Given the capital importance of the Lettre à la Présidente, it is surprising that literary critics and biographers still tend to make little or no reference to it. Nowhere else, however, does Gautier reveal himself so unreservedly. This is especially important with regard to an author such as Gautier who, though his work is dedicated to the cult of beauty and amorous encounter, was apparently not only incapable of commitment (except perhaps to women who were unattainable) but also haunted by images of disease, physical deformity, scatological excess, and the frustration of desire. In many respects, the Lettre à la Présidente represents the very antithesis of Mademoiselle de Maupin.

The letter itself begins by recounting one of the nocturnal fantasies ("fantasmagories nocturnes") that Gautier experienced in Geneva involving the use of a wire pulley (of the kind employed by acrobats on the stage) for the purpose of coition. A few days later, in the countryside, he is fantasizing about a woman with three nipples. More alarmingly, a picture of a military battle that he notices in an auberge at the Simplon Pass metamorphoses before his eyes into a pornographic image: "The cannons were transformed into ejaculating penises, the wheels became testicles, the barrels erections, and the smoke simulated the frothy cream of spurting semen" (my translation). At Domo d'Ossola, the glimpse of a bottle of olive oil gives rise to some speculative remarks on its possible employment in the hands of aristocratic pederasts, a vice he seems to identify with English travelers. This is followed by a bewildering kaleidoscope of images: an erotic marionette theater; animals copulating in the street; and a description of a nine-hour coach journey during which time he is continually aroused by the rubbing of the upholstery (the vehicle's suspension, apparently, is to blame). In Venice, he employs a pimp to take him and his traveling companion (Louis de Cormenin, though he is never formally identified) on a tour of the back streets, where a heavily-pregnant woman offers herself. Though only 22, she has already given birth to six children. Mercifully, the offer is declined: "Be as enterprising as you like, you can hardly ram a fetus back into it's mother's belly; and it's no fun to feel some brat treating the end of your penis as a trampoline" (my translation). Florence, Rome, and Naples offer a similar variety of exotic experiences.

Why did Gautier send this curious missive to his friend in Paris? Internal evidence would seem to suggest that Gautier had never made love with Mme. Sabatier (or "trinqué du nombril," i.e., rubbed navels, in Gautier's curiously childish expression), so one suggestion must be that the Lettre à la Présidente was merely an exercise in masculine bravado. The recipient, however, would not seem to have been in the least scandalized by the letter. This implies, perhaps, that such matters were talked about fairly freely in front of her. More generally, Gautier's fascination with such images is clearly part of a broader phenomenon: the nineteenth-century bourgeois male fascination with dirt and prostitution.

There are a number of late nineteenth-century and early twentieth-century translations of Mademoiselle de Maupin into English, but readers should be aware that many of these will not be very reliable. Lettre à la Présidente remains untranslated.

Biography

Gautier was born in Gascony in 1811 but spent most of his childhood in Paris. Along with writers such as the temperamental Pétrus Borel and the nomadic Gérard de Nerval, he belonged to the young Romantic school of the early 1830s (Le Petit Cénacle) whose members looked to Victor Hugo as their spiritual leader while actively seeking to surpass him on the strength of their own macabre or aesthetic excesses. Gautier's first book, a collection of poetry, passed almost unnoticed in 1830; Albertus, a bizarre fantasy about a young poet who sells his soul to the devil for love, suffered a similar fate two years later; while Les Jeunes-France, romans goguenard (1833), essentially a collection of sketches satirizing the aesthetic pretensions of his Parisian literary friends, was too narrow in its appeal to attract a wide audience. The same might be said of his most important literary work of this early period, Mademoiselle de Maupin (1835). Though Gautier's preface is now considered one of the principal manifestoes of Art for Art's Sake, the licentious subject matter of the novel (which deals with the myth of the androgyne) caused the book to be shunned by middle-class readers. The commercial failure of this novel may have pushed Gautier towards developing a career as journalist, critic, and travel writer. Though he continued to publish fiction throughout his life (including Le Capitaine Fracasse, 1863, an engaging picaresque novel), French readers in the mid-nineteenth century would have been equally aware of his work as a theater reviewer and art critic. He died in 1872.

TERRY HALE

Selected Works

Lettres à la Présidente. Preface by Pascal Pia, in Jean-Jacques Pauvert (ed.), L'Érotisme Second Empire, Paris: Carrere, 1985.

Mademoiselle de Maupin, (ed.) Geneviève van den Bogaert. Paris: Garnier-Flammarion, 1966.

Further Reading

Richardson, Joanna. Théophile Gautier: His Life and Times. London: Max Reinhardt, 1958.

Barsoum, Marlene. Théophile Gautier's Mademoiselle de Maupin: Towards a Definition of the "Androgynous Discourse." New York: Peter Lang, 2001.

---

GAY (MALE) WRITING

---

Although gay erotic writing undoubtedly shares many of the characteristics of straight writing, the marking of homosexuality in terms of object choice gives any gay eroticization of the male body a different political, social, and ethical edge. By putting the sex (back) into homosexuality, gay erotic writing makes a statement about itself and about sexual identity which arguably has more in common with women's erotic writing than with much straight male writing about women. Such eroticization is, however, a two-edged weapon. On the one hand, it foregrounds a sexuality which has been traditionally subject to censorship, self-censorship, and stigma. On the other hand, it can give the impression that male gays are at least as phallographic as heterosexuals. Gay male erotic writing can, therefore, be seen to be treading a fine line between, on the one hand, using "men are beautiful" (or at least, sexy) to show that "gay is beautiful" and, on the other, making it look as if gays are unreconstructedly phallographic. In many cases the writing discussed here will not simply fall into one of these categories and be either hegemonic or counter-hegemonic but be rather, in a variety of ways, both: by combining modes of identification and distance, much of the writing charted here will combine pleasuring the male body with an awareness, analysis, and even alienation of that pleasure. Erotic fantasies will be constructed as they are demystified, demystified as they are constructed and, as a result, the simplistic assimilation of sex(uality) and identity will be simultaneously asserted and questioned. Even some gay pornography—and this is doubtless one of the reasons for its interest for literary and cultural critics—can be seen as operating at these different levels and giving its readers and viewers opportunities for the demystification of its (and their) seemingly most visceral fantasies.

One way of simultaneously asserting and demystifying the assimilation of sexuality and identity is to allow gayness to be submerged into a generalized, universalized homoeroticism.

Although, for instance, Grant Foster's collection of short stories, Long Slow Burn (2001), is trailed as "masterful gay erotica," gayness as such recedes before "a tidal wave of testosterone" where each man has a "piece" with "a life of its own" and, with wives and families at least temporarily removed, can surrender to the "beast trapped within [him]": boys will be boys and locker-room horseplay leads to irresistible sex between inexperienced narrators and a series of muscled sportsmen, truckers, and bodyguards. This emphasis on immediate physical and emotional connection between men is, in William J. Mann's short story, By the Numbers, attributed to "the libidinous network that makes up the queer nation" (Lawrence Schimel, The Mammoth Book of Gay Erotica, 1997). With their "gaydar" and "secret scent" all gay men are linked "dick to dick" across the United States and, according to Steven Saylor writing as Aaron Travis, also across the centuries: the homoeroticism of Roman statuary is repeated in the equally accessible sculpted beauty of present-day Italians (Do as the Romans Do, ibid., pp. 58–66). If, in Neil Bartlett's acclaimed Ready to Catch Him Should He Fall (1990), the young protagonist, Boy, immediately connects with the older but equally beautiful O(ther), this is also seen as part of the feverish—some would say promiscuous—homoeroticism of The Bar where they meet, which gaybashers seek, in vain, to eradicate. Even in this quintessentially gay novel, the sexual aura of the symbolically named Boy and O extends, as in the previous texts, over time, space, and specific identities: here again, boy(s) will be boy(s) and gay sex(uality) merges with a universalized male-to-male eroticism, presided over by a similarly generalized "Mother."

At the same time as implicitly turning the Boy into an archetypal Cupid or Eros himself, gay narratives also deconstruct the tautology that "boys will be boys," notably in childhood or adolescent (auto-)fictions such as Edmund White's celebrated A Boy's Own Story (1982). Whereas "real" boys are characterized by their “reedy, sinewy, scruffy maleness” (p. 119), the physically retiring narrator combines the alienation of precociously internalized stigma with the self-distancing of coruscating adult prose: however pleasurably he “cornholes” with fellow youngsters and experiments with local hustlers, the narrator wants to be and remain heterosexual. Struggling to distinguish sincerity from insincerity, real identity from fantasized romances, the narrator finally becomes himself through a gratuitous act of betrayal—thus echoing the links between homosexuality and deviance/deviousness suggested by Gide’s youthful “counterfeiters” (Les Faux-monnayeurs [1926]) and Genet’s young criminals (Notre-Dame-des-fleurs [1944]). Relatedly, A Boy’s Own Story recalls a whole series of schoolboy narratives by authors as different as Emmanuel Carrère, Jean Cocteau, Éric Jourdan, Håkan Lindquist, Yukio Mishima, Henri de Montherlant, Alain Peyrefitte, and Michel Tournier, where self-questionings combine with erotic awakenings, and also texts where a mature narrator seduces compliant Arab boys, from Gide’s L’Immoraliste (1902) to Tony Duvert’s Journal d’un innocent (1976), or where he simply admires one from afar as in Thomas Mann’s Tod in Venedig (1912). By charting the conflict between the beauty of the boy and “the world’s spleen and deceit” (White) such texts ask: Where is the homosexual? On the side of beauty or on the side of deceit?

Although such adolescent self-questionings can be discarded when the boy becomes a man, homoerotic hedonism is still problematized in “adult” fictions—for example, by other forms of (self-)destructiveness, by the implications of promiscuity, and by AIDS. In James Baldwin’s Giovanni’s Room (1957), for example, a combination of Giovanni’s murder of his employer and the narrator’s eventual preference for a relationship with a woman, Hella—who still rejects him—results in the execution of Giovanni and the isolation of the other protagonists: the gorgeous Giovanni is seen by Hella as “a sordid little gangster” and the narrator is left alone. While ostensibly very different in period and in tone, gay men’s penchant for a handsome “bit of rough” also leads to betrayal, unfulfilment, and even prison in Alan Hollinghurst’s The Swimming-Pool Library (1988). Even if youth, beauty, money, and connections give the narrator-hero, Will, access to repeated good sex, that sex concentrates on a relatively underprivileged, well-honed waiter, who betrays him, and on a homeless, sensuous Black, who is, like Giovanni, also drawn into murder. If, at the same time, other characters’ minor misdemeanours lead to arrest or imprisonment, then gay sex is shown to be either semi-innocently exploitative or unjustly persecuted, by gay-bashing in the streets or in the courts. Since, moreover, homoeroticism crosses time—from the images in Lord Nantwich’s Roman pavement to The Shaft—and space—from 1930s Egypt to contemporary London—and indeed class—from Wormwood Scrubs to the gentleman’s club—homosexual desire is shown to be constantly linked not just to arbitrary, hypocritical, social oppression but, even more dangerously, to elegant, hedonistic self-oppression. Equally ambivalent is the fiction dealing with ageing and AIDS—often taken together as in Pier Vittorio Tondelli’s Camere separate (1989) and Andrew Holleran’s The Beauty of Men (1996). On the one hand, Holleran’s mid-fifty-year-old protagonist, Lark, agonizes over the deaths of his friends and over fellow gays’ continued emphasis on youth, beauty, and the appropriate body parts. On the other hand, writers such as Ramon Fernandez in La gloire du paria (1987) celebrate the dignity and loyalty of AIDS-affected couples and others, such as Hervé Guibert, even see AIDS as a “marvellous disease,” giving AIDS an aestheticized, eroticized aura. Whether AIDS is seen as unalloyedly calamitous or strangely empowering, it is, in both cases, eroticized: if only because of the very nature of AIDS, the AIDS patient’s combination of self-analysis, self-contemplation, and self-withdrawal is, like the gay adolescent’s self-questioning and the gay adult’s (self-)oppression, a constant reminder of the link between eros and gay identity.

As can be seen from the presence of young if often unpremeditated gay killers in The Swimming-Pool Library, Giovanni’s Room, Tônu Õnnepalu’s Piiririik (1993) and Fernando Vallejo’s La Virgen de los Sicarios (1994), and from the related, recurring appeal of “rough trade,” gay eroticism can be more than tinged with a suggestion of violence, whether in the choice of partner (compliant boy initiated by older man), in the sexual act itself (active/passive and accompanying dress codes), or in the socio-cultural-historical context of the relationship: internalized oppression, AIDS, or war. Internalized stigma, as in Mishima (where hypermasculinity is close to ultra-nationalism), and in Fernandez, is often accompanied by references to the archetypal “gay” martyr, Saint Sebastian, and, from the earliest known epic, Gilgamesh, to Pierre Guyotat’s Tombeau pour cinq cent mille soldats (1967), male-to-male bonding is often accompanied by warfare and death. Although gay violence sometimes seems to figure in the writer’s life as much as in his art—Gilles de Rais, Sade, Genet, Mishima—and although some gay serial killers have themselves generated more publications than many actual authors—Jeffrey Dahmer, John Wayne Gacy, Dennis Nilsen—it is the carefully coded, ritualized forms of what might be broadly called sado-masochism which have prompted most fictional representations, from the prolific output of John Preston (Mr. Benson, 1992) to the parodic but deeply disturbing fictions of Dennis Cooper (Frisk, 1991). While the latter exposes the inseparability of desire and violence and of representation and pornography, the former is an apologia of ritualized S/M between the narrator-slave and the master-Mr. Benson, in contrast with “real” sadists represented by a vicious German, Hans. By associating gay bonding with violence—whether the supposedly instinctual violence of the untamed boy as in Éric Jourdan’s Les Mauvais Anges (1984) or the cultivated violence of the older man as in Joël Hespéy’s letter-novel S.M. Roman (1994)—the male homosexual is shown to be more, rather than less, masculine than his heterosexual equivalent. Thus Hespéy’s older Sylvain repeatedly urges his trainee, Marc, to “take it like a man”: submissiveness and pain give unprecedented access to a physical and psychological virility which Marc can then pass on to future trainees in an unending transfer of male empowerment. This enhanced masculinity is, moreover, achieved through an inseparable combination of violence and writing: Marc is instructed to write his own S/M novel and he literally “gets off” on a sheet of paper he sends to Sylvain with every letter on which their relationship depends. Hespéy’s text thus demonstrates the inseparability of violence, male-to-male sex, and representation. Put differently, the real or symbolic tear shed by the “submissive” male reinforces the “money-shot” of gay fiction.

Despite this enhancement of masculinity—and corresponding elimination of any suggestion of the effeminized gay—much gay fiction still blurs or questions the compartmentalization of sexual difference (Guy Hocquenghem’s Ève (1987)), gender roles (the novels and plays of Jean Genet), and homosexuality and heterosexuality. In Cyril Collard’s Les Nuits fauves (1992), for example, the presumably bisexual hero, Jean, is sexually active with Laura, Samy, and a host of other men, and in Hespéy’s S.M., Marc identifies neither as homosexual or heterosexual, but as, simultaneously, Sylvain’s slave and heterosexual lover of Nicole. Indeed, part of the excitement of such fiction is to lure the supposedly heterosexual man into a more erotically fulfilling gay affair—witness Grant Foster’s “The Wedding Thief” in Long Slow Burn and the gay tryst of the handsome, married Beauchamp in Armistead Maupin’s Tales of the City (1972). What seems to matter here is less the relevance of precise sexual categories than a general increase in erotic activity amidst an equally general “gaying” of sexuality and thereby a general “queering” of the community, society, and even the world. If gay men have been oppressed, then liberation means global gay sex—not just for self-identified gays, but for all. In this welcome reversal of conventional sexual hierarchies it is the straight who joins the gay out of the closet of sexual hypocrisy and inhibition.

OWEN HEATHCOTE

Further Reading

- Aldrich, Robert. The Seduction of the Mediterranean: Writing, Art and Homosexual Fantasy. London: Routledge, 1993.
- Griffin, Gabriele. Who’s Who in Lesbian and Gay Writing. London: Routledge, 2002.
- Haggerty, George E. (editor). Gay Histories and Cultures: An Encyclopedia. New York: Garland, 2000.
- Heathcote, Owen, Alex Hughes and James S. Williams, (editors). Gay Signatures: Gay and Lesbian Theory, Fiction and Film in France, 1945–1995. Oxford: Berg, 1998.
- Hines, Derrek. Gilgamesh. London: Chatto & Windus, 2002. Inverses. Littératures, Arts, Homosexualités. 1, 2001.
- Larrière, Michel. Pour tout l’amour des hommes: Anthologie de l’homosexualité dans la littérature. Paris: Delétraz, 1998.
- Lilly, Mark. Gay Men’s Literature in the Twentieth Century. Basingstoke: Macmillan, 1993.
- Malinowski, Sharon (editor). Gay and Lesbian Literature. Detroit, MI: St James Press, 1994.
- Murray, Stephen O. and Will Roscoe. Islamic Homosexualities: Culture, History, and Literature. New York: New York University Press, 1997.

Phillips, John. Forbidden Fictions: Pornography and Censorship in Twentieth-Century French Literature. London: Pluto, 1999.

Plummer, Ken. Telling Sexual Stories: Power, Change and Social Worlds. London: Routledge, 1995.

Robinson, Christopher. Scandal in the Ink: Male and Female Homosexuality in Twentieth-century French Literature. London: Cassell, 1995.

Woods, Greg. A History of Gay Literature: The Male Tradition. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1998.

GE HONG

283–343
Chinese poet

Baopuzi

Ge Hong is a famous Taoist writer of the Jin dynasty. His works are plentiful, and many of them, such as his writings on poetry and strategy, have long disappeared. But fortunately the two books for which he is known, Baopuzi neipian and Baopuzi waipian, have come down to us. The Baopuzi neipian [The Inner Chapters of the Master Who Embraces Simplicity] is certainly the most interesting of the two. This book, which is well known in Taoist circles, remained hidden for many centuries, but has become the object of close studies during the last hundred years or so, in China, Japan, and in the West. It is nothing less than an immortality handbook in twenty chapters, and deals with all possible aspects of the subject: technical, moral, philosophical, etc.

About half of the book concerns the techniques one has to master in order to become immortal. As Ge Hong himself puts it (Chapter 8), “He who seeks immortality only has to acquire the essential, that is treasuring your essence, circulation of breath, and absorption of one great medicine. This is enough, there is no need for more.” The three arts Ge Hong mentions here have occupied the minds of Taoists during at least two millennia. Put into plain words, they make reference to Taoist sexual techniques, the Chinese yoga known today as qigong, and alchemy. If the last of these is seemingly no longer studied in China, the first two are still practiced by many Chinese, especially qigong.

The art we are interested in here is that of the bedchamber (fangzhong shu), which is essential, according to Taoist belief, to attaining immortality, but also in avoiding diseases and enjoying a long life. Ge Hong remains very discreet about the details of Taoist sexual techniques, but does give us a few hints, which we shall examine here. First of all, he reaffirms, as the famous Confucian philosopher Mencius (or Mengzi) did many centuries before him, that eating and having sex are part of human nature: “Mankind’s way wants you to eat exquisite food, to wear light and soft clothes, to unite yin and yang, to gain a position in society (...). To abandon wife and children, to live alone in the mountains and swamps, to remain hidden and cut off with human nature, to be lonely, having nothing but trees and stones as neighbors, all this is unworthy” (Chapter 3). But more than a hedonist activity, sex, just like qigong and alchemy, is a therapy against old age, if practiced properly. For both abstinence and debauchery cause damage to a man’s health: “Man should not abstain completely from yin and yang. If he does so, he will soon develop obstructive diseases. Those who live reclusively and in celibacy often suffer from illness and do not live to old age. On the other hand, to abandon oneself to a life of pleasure is a danger to one’s life. He alone who knows the balance between economy and waste can avoid damages” (Chapter 8).

As to the right way of having sex, it is simple in theory, though somewhat disconcerting for a twenty-first-century westerner. The idea, which one finds throughout Chinese sex history, is for the man to retain his semen, and send it through his spine up to his brain. Sperm has very little chance, we know, of running up one’s spine to one’s brain, but there are various ways of retaining it, “As for the arts of the bed-chamber, there are more than ten schools. One uses them to compensate for loss and to cure illness. If one can collect yin [positive energy] to fortify his yang [negative energy], he will prolong his life. The gist of it consists of one thing: returning your essence to reinforce your brain. True Men (Taoist immortals) pass on their methods mouth to ear but never write them down.” Fortunately, others beside Ge Hong have written down some of these secret methods, making it possible for all to learn and practice them.

Ge Hong incidentally mentions a rather simple way of extending one’s life span: “Zhang Cang, minister under the Han dynasty, discovered by chance a very simple method: he used to suck his wife’s milk, and thus lived up to a hundred and eighty years” (Chapter 5). (Book of Han [Han shu], written in the 1st century CE). However, the author exaggerated the effect of this particular practice, for the Book of Han talks about it being ‘only’ a hundred and twenty years.

The longest and perhaps most interesting passage about sex in Ge Hong’s work is a kind of poem, willingly obscure but full of imagery. Just like many ancient Taoist texts, one needs a number of clues to understand its exact meaning, but most of them have long disappeared, and we can only call upon our imagination in order to appreciate this pure piece of erotic poetry:

“He chews and sips the precious flower,
In the infinite sky purifies his mind,
Outside himself meditates on the five lights,
Inside himself preserves his nine essences;
He reinforces the jade lock into the gate of life,
Links the pole star to the yellow court,
And brings the three lights into his clear room.
The breath of the origin flies to him and purifies his body,
On his golden beam he collects the divine liquor, Repudiating the white forever and retaining the black,
He freezes his limpid fountain into his cinnabar field,
And leads his submerged pearls to the five cities.

The alabaster cauldron comes down onto the furnace,
The adorned bird raises its head and cries;
The jasper flower raises its ear,
The heavenly deer spits out jade.
He keeps the primal laws in his scarlet palace,
Conceals the nine lights in the darkness of his cave,
The cloud loft increases and joins heaven,
The long valley fills itself and the fabrics are mixed.
(...)
He sits down, then lies in his purple chamber,
Chews and sucks the golden flower,
Shining autumn mushroom,
Rosy flower and emerald stalk,
Precious ointment clear and pure,
Quiet overflowing and continuous rain from the clouds.
He appeases his hunger, quenches his thirst,
Travels to the heart of things,
Nourishes himself with peace and harmony,
And retains hun and po souls.
Filled are his bones, light his body,
He can whip wind and clouds to fly up to the sky,
And ride the chariot of chaos and live eternally.”
(Chapter 5)

Biography

Ge Hong was born in Jurong in 283 to an influential family. He became a minor southern official during the Jin dynasty but often retreated for years at a time to Mount Luofu where he did most of his writing. He died there in 343.

PHILIPPE CHE

Further Reading

- Che, Philippe. La Voie des Divins, Immortels, les chapitres discursifs du Baopuzi neipian. Gallimard, Paris, 1999.
- Needham, Joseph. Science and Civilisation in China. vol. 5/3, Cambridge, 1976.
- Saley, Jay. The Master who Embraces Simplicity: A Study of the philosopher Ko Hung, A.D. 283–343, Chinese Materials Center, San Francisco, 1978.
- W, James. Alchemy, Medicine and Religion in the China of A.D. 320, the Nei p'ien of Ko Hung. Cambridge, MA:MIT Press, 1966; New York, 1981.
- Van Gulik, Robert. Sexual life in ancient China. E.J. Brill, Leiden, 1961.

---

GENDER

---

Gender Roles in Erotica

From ancient erotica to modern-day erotica, male and female sexuality takes a wide variety of guises. Whores are to be found in brothels; virgins wait in family homes to be seduced by libertines; gullible virtuous nuns find their introduction into libidinous abandonment through secular paramours or villainous priests; female flagellants are found in parlours, boarding-schools, and vice dens disciplining their charges; while morally unencumbered rustic peasants occupy the Arcadian landscapes free from guilt. All of these images present complex views about gender and male/female sexuality.

Gender disparities are distinctly evident in the treatment of the sexual roles of men and women. Women were, and continue to be, portrayed alternately as passive/submissive, wild/passionate, Madonna/Whore in ancient and modern depictions. In erotica, frequently, women are seen as being overpowered by men, a line which followed the sexual attitude dominant in society throughout the ages. However, as well as indulging in the conquered virgin themes (see Virginity), erotica frequently transgresses these traditional submissive roles, depicting women as sexually assertive or as unbridled nymphomaniacs. More recently, from seventeenth-century erotica onwards, both qualities are combined in anti-religious erotica, as seen in the nun's character in Venus in the Cloister (French original, 1683; English reprint, 1692). The innocent female religieuse is initially portrayed as submissive, gullible, and a victim. Once introduced to sex, she becomes as lascivious as the other female characters, their sexual downfall being blamed on the men. The male religious characters are invariably cast in a poor light, as tyrannical debauchers of young innocent girls. This was a reflection of seventeenth- and eighteenth-century anti-Catholic sentiment which fired the production of images of sexually depraved priests.

The notion of an essential female lasciviousness is routinely expressed throughout erotica.

Women have long been believed to be connected to nature and, as such, have been portrayed seen as unrestrained and sexual wanton. For example, the landscaped female (a concept influenced by the ancients such as Ovid) was updated in the eighteenth century. In A New Description of Merryland (1741) the land is depicted as wild, unpredictable, and unruly, echoing the uncontrollable force of the Hippocratic humoral female body. The female flagellant as seen in Exhibition of Female Flagellants (1777; J.C. Hotten reprint, 1872) is dominant, elegant, and refined whilst gradually unleashing her passions. In twentieth-century erotica, the female dominatrix clad in leather wielding a whip has overshadowed the more refined version of the eighteenth-century flagellant.

The most prominent image of masculinity was, and still is, one of self-possession and control, the polar opposite of its female counterpart. The male body is often depicted as the principal force for reproduction, as in Arbor Vitae, Or the Natural History of the Tree of Life (1732); conversely in some erotic satire, men are made completely redundant, as in John Hill's Lucina Sine Concubita (1750), in which women reproduce independently via parthenogenesis, echoing men's concern over female sexual autonomy. Although men are frequently depicted as aggressors, despite their control and power within the sexual hierarchy, they are often seen as less energetic sexually and easier to weaken physically. Erotica through the centuries has contained subtle warnings to men to be restrained or women would sap their strength.

By the nineteenth century, erotica was becoming increasingly aggressive. Rape themes became more common and included violent scenes which placed women in a subordinate role. A further change over the last two hundred years can be seen in flagellation fantasies. In the eighteenth century, women were the most likely victims of the female dominatrix character but during the Victorian era, men were also being depicted in roles of both victim and aggressor.

GENDER

Homosexuality is rarely mentioned in seventeenth- and eighteenth-century erotica, except disparagingly. By the nineteenth century, explorations of homosexual love are being made in works such as Teleny, or the Reverse of the Medal (1893), a work by a number of authors, one of whom is sometimes said to have been Oscar Wilde; and Priapeia (1889).

Gender and Readership

It is generally assumed that erotica was traditionally written and read by men. It is generally well-known that in eighteenth-century England, groups of libertines such as Sir Francis Dashwood, Paul Whitehead, John Wilkes, and the members of a notorious “hell-fire” club kept an extensive library of erotica. However, there is plenty of evidence to suggest that women both wrote and read erotica.

Seventeenth and eighteenth-century erotica frequently targeted women in their prefaces with an “address to the ladies” indicating that the writers of erotica either aimed their material at a female readership or wished to create the allusion of one in order to add another layer of fantasy for male readers. Female characters in Venus in the Cloister, Thérèse Philosophe (1748) and Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure (1749) are depicted as enjoying pornographic books. Mainstream books also portrayed women as reading erotica, as in Fielding’s fictional Shamela (1741) who favored Venus in the Cloister.

Although the creation of a female persona who read about sex was a literary device in order to establish the sexual nature of a character, evidence exists that some women were writers and readers of erotica. Sarah Lennox liked to read anything she regarded as “wicked,” such as Voltaire’s Candide (1759) or the pornographic le Canapé (1741) of which she exclaimed, “Tis the filthiest most disagreeable book I have ever read.” Women gave and received pornographic books and particularly appreciated fine copies. Women read about sexual intrigues in women’s magazines which occasionally carried risqué trial reports, racy poems, and sexual satires. Francis Place noted that The Ladies Magazine: or, The Universal Entertainer (1749–1753) carried all three, including Hill’s Lucina Sine Concubitu. The anonymous late seventeenth-century sex guide, Aristotle’s Master-Piece, was thought decent enough to give as a present to engaged couples despite the fact that young apprentices masturbated over it.

Women also played a role in its publication. Paula McDowell has traced the activity of women in Grub Street between 1678–1730 whence erotica emanated. During the 1980s, the debate about reading erotica became a complicated feminist debate with dispute over the opinions of Dworkin and McKinnon who posited the view that pornography is a violence against women and should be banned. This ignores the notion that some women want to continue enjoying reading it. By the turn of the twentieth century, it was clear that many women wrote and read pornography and female fantasies were more likely to be included in erotica for the enjoyment of women.

Transvestism itself has a long history (see Transvestism) but transexuality has become a more prominent issue in the west towards the end of the twentieth century, although ‘Lady Boys’ have a much longer standing history in the east in places such as Thailand and India. With the advent of the Internet, pictures and scenes of transsexuals within an erotica content have become common-place and add to a distinctly more diversified understanding of gender, in which gender is no longer a bipolarized state but is made up of many layers of self-identification.

JULIE PEAKMAN

Further Reading

- Butler, Judith. Gender Trouble. Feminism and the Subversion of Identity. London: Routledge, 1990.
- Corfield, Penelope. “History and the Challenge of Gender History.” In Rethinking History, Vol. 1, No. 3 (1997), pp. 241–258.
- Darnton, Robert. The Forbidden Best-Sellers of Pre-Revolutionary France. London: HarperCollins, 1997.
- Dworkin, Andrea. Pornography: Men Possessing Women. London: Women’s Press, 1981.
- Foxon, David. Libertine Literature in England 1660–1745. New York: University Books, 1965.
- Goulemot, Jean Marie. Forbidden Texts. Erotic Literature and its Readers in Eighteenth-Century France. Cambridge: Polity Press, 1994.
- Kendrick, Walter. The Secret Museum: Pornography in Modern Culture. New York: Penguin, 1987.
- Kraakman, Dorelies. “A Historical History of Sexual Knowledge for Girls in French Erotic Fiction, 1750–1840.” Journal of the History of Sexuality, Vol. 4, No. 4, 1994.
- Laqueur, Thomas. Making Sex. Body and Gender from the Greeks to Freud. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1992.

- MacKinnon, Catherine A. Only Words. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Marcus, Steven. The Other Victorians: A Study of Sexuality and Pornography in Mid-Nineteenth Century England. New York: Basic 1964.
- Moulton, Ian Frederick. Before Pornography: Erotic Writings in Early Modern England. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Porter, Roy and Lesley Hall. Facts of Life. The Creation of Sexual Knowledge in Britain, 1650–1950. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1995.
- McDowell, Paula. The Women of Grub Street. Press, Politics and Gender in the London Literary Marketplace 1678–1730. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Norberg, Kathryn. “The Libertine Whore: Prostitution in French Pornography from Margot to Juliette” in Lynn Hunt (editor). The Invention of Pornography: Obscenity and the Origins of Modernity, 1500–1800, New York: Zone Books, 1993.
- Peakman, Julie. Mighty Lewd Books: The Development of Pornography in 18th Century England. London, Palgrave, 2003.
- Peakman, Julie. Lascivious Bodies: A Sexual History of the Eighteenth Century. London, Atlantic, 2004.
- Sigel, Lisa Z. “Name Your Pleasure: The Transformation of Sexual Language in Nineteenth-Century Pornography.” Journal of the History of Sexuality, Vol. 9. No. 4, October 2000.
- Tillyard, Stella. Aristocrats: Caroline, Emily, Louisa and Sarah Lennox 1740–1832. London: Vintage, 1995.
- Trumbach, Randolph. Sex and the Gender Revolution. Heterosexuality and the Third Gender in Enlightenment London. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1998.

---

GENET, JEAN

---

1910–1986

French novelist and dramatist

Genet’s work is remarkable for the incendiary tone which characterizes plays, novels, and rhetorical essays alike. Although Genet shocks through the explicit depiction of gay sex, sexuality is always accompanied in his work by the shadow of criminality: the Journal du voleur tells the story of a homosexual thief and prostitute who wanders across Europe in a state of unremitting poverty and extreme solitude. Because of the correspondence of the narrative to the myth surrounding Genet in the post-war years, and in part due to Jean-Paul Sartre’s account of Genet’s life and work, the book has frequently been considered as an autobiography. While the links between Genet’s own lived experience and the events of the Journal are more problematic than at first appears, the Journal is central to Genet’s concerns in its juxtaposition of criminality and homosexual identity.

Notre-Dame-des-Fleurs (1948) is set in gay Montmartre, and is concerned, like most of Genet’s fiction, with relationships of power as well as with sexuality. The relations of the drag queens and their lovers and pimps operate according to a rigid social framework. Here, as in Genet’s prison fiction (notably Miracle de la rose (1946)), passive homosexuals occupy the lowest position in the hierarchy. In the homosexual milieu of the prison or the penal colony, social hierarchies are reproduced: the prisoners adopt a strict, self-imposed pecking order in which specific roles are adhered to. Prisoners are categorized according to active or passive roles in sex, the despised “cloche” becoming a chattel borne proudly by the dominant “marle.” In Notre-Dame-des-Fleurs, passive partners and queens are not simply promoted to the most powerful roles in an effort to reverse preconceptions regarding their status. Much of the subtlety and power of Genet’s work lies instead in the insidious confusion wrought in power relations by those who are apparently most marginalized by them. In a Montmartre café, Divine, the queen upon whom the narrative centers, is gushing with camp eloquence when her false teeth fall out. Placing them upon her head, she reverses the humiliation of the situation, announcing “je serai reine quand même.” The humiliating stigmatization of gay characters paradoxically becomes the means by which their identity is most powerfully asserted.

Genet’s most famous works, the plays Les bonnes, Le balcon, and Les nègres, go still further in questioning the social categorization of sexual behavior. In Le balcon, sexual role-play consists of assuming the trappings of the different representatives of social authority who pass through Madam Irma's brothel, including the General, the Chief of Police, and the Bishop. While the "real" action (including a muted revolution) is happening elsewhere, the main players in that action periodically return to the brothel. Each is crucially dependent on the baroque fantasy realm which it creates: when the General rides into a fantasized battle on the back of one of the prostitutes, sex has become simply the means of assuming identities, of projecting images. The radical sidelining of the "real" produces the uncomfortable suspicion that the real is forged precisely within the deluded role-play of the brothel scenes. The array of appearances and uniforms denoting social authority exactly mirrors those in the brothel, and their bearers' identities can only be maintained through the theatrical performances which the brothel permits. The sexual becomes the domain in which the inherent theatricality of power structures is exposed.

Elsewhere, meanwhile, sexuality is an aberrant field in which power is no longer functional. For most of the Journal du voleur, power relations seem to have been abandoned entirely: it seems that everything that Genet's character "Jean" does will, instead of redeeming him, drag him further into social and sexual humiliation. The scandalous war-time novel Pompes funèbres (1947), meanwhile, contains Genet's most graphic and complex treatment of sex, including ludicrous vignettes of Hitler engaged in a variety of sexual acts. Homosexuality is an essential part of Genet's universe and yet it is betrayal, more than solidarity, that characterizes the relationships of his gay characters. In Pompes funèbres, the narrator-protagonist is trying to come to terms with the death of his lover, Jean Decarnin, killed by the Nazi militia. His extraordinary solution is the fantastic creation of Riton, the militia man whom he imagines to have killed Jean, and who becomes the subject of extended sexual fantasies; in order to take control of his grief at the death of Jean, the narrator perversely exacerbates it, striving to make of his imaginary betrayal of Jean the site of an ironic pleasure. The narrator's ruminations on Riton's sexual relationships are imbued with a powerful charge which hovers between eroticism and violence. Although Pompes Funèbres is perhaps Genet's most explicit and barbed book, it resonates with his other novels in its exploration of sexuality as an arena in which power relations may be played out, tested, and ironised. The quasi-erotic betrayal of Jean is a means of mastering the fact of Jean's death, and therefore of reversing the condition of disempowerment which it entails.

Biography

Born Paris, 1910. Given up to the Assistance Publique by his mother; raised by a foster family in the Morvan region; primary school education. Abortive apprenticeships; runs away and is sent to the children's penal colony Mettray (Tours region), 1926; Signs up for the army, 1929; Postings in Syria and Morocco; deserts, 1936. Series of journeys through Europe, including Italy, Albania, Yugoslavia, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, and Germany. Returns to France and is imprisoned, 1938. Dates the beginning of his writing from this period. Meets Cocteau and Sartre, 1943–1944. Publication and premier of Genet's play Les bonnes, 1947. Publication of novels Miracle de la rose (1946), Pompes funèbres (1947), and Notre-Dame-des-Fleurs (1948). Publication of Journal du voleur, in part based on wanderings in the thirties, 1949. Directs Un Chant d'amour, the only film which he will both write and bring to fruition, 1950. Publication of Jean-Paul Sartre's Saint Genet: comédien et martyr, Sartre's "existentialist biography" of Genet, announced as the first volume of Genet's Œuvres complètes, 1952. Publication of the plays Le Balcon (1956) and Les nègres (1958). First Paris performance of Les paravents, at the Odéon, accompanied by violent protests due to its portrayal of the French military and of the Algerian War, 1966. Genet's first major political writings, 1968. Involvement with the Black Panthers and with the Palestinian cause, 1970. Publication of Quatre heures à Chatila, one of Genet's most important political pieces, concerning the massacre of Palestinians at Chatila refugee camp, 1983. Death (Paris), 15th April 1986. Posthumous publication of Un captif amoureux, 1986.

DAVID HOUSTON JONES

Selected Works

- Miracle de la Rose* (Paris: Marc Barbezat-L'Arbalète, 1946); as Miracle of the Rose, translated by Bernard Frechtman (London: Faber, 1973).
- Les Bonnes* (Paris: Marc Barbezat-L'Arbalète, 1947); as The Maids, translated by Bernard Frechtman (London: Faber, 1953).
- Pompes Funèbres* (Paris: Gallimard, L'Imaginaire, 1947); as Funeral Rites, translated by Bernard Frechtman (London: Faber, 1969).
- Notre-Dame-des-Fleurs* (Paris: Marc Barbezat-L'Arbalète, 1948); as Our Lady of the Flowers, translated by Bernard Frechtman (London: Paladin, 1963).
- Journal du voleur* (Paris: Gallimard, 1949); as The Thief's Journal, translated by Bernard Frechtman (London: Faber, 1965).
- Les Paravents* (Paris: Marc Barbezat-L'Arbalète, 1961); as The Screens, translated by Bernard Frechtman (London: Faber, 1963).
- Querelle de Brest* (Paris: Gallimard, L'Imaginaire, 1953); as Querelle of Brest, translated by Gregory Streatham (London: Blond, 1966).
- Oeuvres Complètes* 6 vols. (Paris: Gallimard, 1952–1991).

Further Reading

- Bersani, Leo. Homos. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1995.
- Bickel, Gisèle A. Jean Genet: Criminalité et transcendance. Saratoga: Anima Libri, 1987.
- Bougon, Patrice. 'Le travail des mots et la décomposition narrative dans Pompes Funèbres.' Roman 20/50, 20 1995.
- . 'Le cliché, la métaphore et la digression dans Pompes Funèbres et Un Captif amoureux.' L'Esprit créateur, 35, no. 1, 1995.
- Bradby, David. Modern French Drama 1940–1990. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990.
- Coe, Richard N. The Vision of Jean Genet. London: Peter Owen, 1968.
- Creech, James. 'Outing Jean Genet.' Yale French Studies, special issue, Genet: In the Language of the Enemy, ed. Scott Durham. 91, 1997.
- Davis, Colin. 'Genet's Journal du Voleur and the Ethics of Reading.' French Studies, XLVIII, no. 1 (January 1994), 50–62.
- Davis, Colin. Ethical Issues in Twentieth-Century French Fiction: Killing the Other. Basingstoke: Macmillan, 2000.
- Dichy, Albert and Pascal Fouché. Jean Genet: Essai de chronologie 1910–1944. Paris: Bibliothèque de littérature française contemporaine de l'université de Paris VII, 1988.
- Durham, Scott (ed.) Yale French Studies, special issue, Genet: in the Language of the Enemy, 91, 1997.
- Fredette, Nathalie. 'Jean Genet: les Pouvoirs de l'Imposition.' Etudes Françaises, 31/3 (1995–1996), 87–101.
- Gaitet, Pascale. 'The Politics of Camp in Jean Genet's Our Lady of the Flowers' in Bougon (ed.) L'Esprit créateur, numéro spécial, Jean Genet: Littérature et Politique, 35, no. 1 (1995), 40–49.
- Jones, David Houston. The Body Abject: Self and Text in Jean Genet and Samuel Beckett. Oxford: Lang, 2000.
- Knapp, Bettina L. Jean Genet. Boston: Twayne, 1989.
- Lucey, Michael. 'Genet's Notre-Dame-des-fleurs: Fantasy and Sexual Identity.' Yale French Studies, special issue, Genet: In the Language of the Enemy, ed. Scott Durham. 91 (1997), 80–102.
- Magedera, Ian. 'Seing Genet: a propos Glas by Jacques Derrida.' Paragraph, 21, no. 1 (March 1998), 28–44.
- Magazine Littéraire*, numéro spécial, Jean Genet, no. 313 (septembre 1993).
- Meitinger, Serge. 'L'Irréel de jouissance dans le Journal du Voleur de Genet.' Littérature, no. 62 (mai 1986), pp. 65–74.
- Millot, Cathérine. Gide, Genet, Mishima: Intelligence de la perversion. Paris: Gallimard, 1996.
- Oswald, Laura. Jean Genet and the Semiotics of Performance. Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1989.
- Read, Barbara (ed.). with Ian Birchall. Flowers and Revolution: A Collection of Writings on Jean Genet. London: Middlesex University Press, 1997.
- Robinson, Christopher. Scandal in the Ink: Male and Female Homosexuality in Twentieth-Century French Literature. London: Cassell, 1995.
- Roman 20/50*. numéro spécial, Jean Genet, no. 20 (décembre 1995).
- Running-Johnson, Cynthia. 'Genet's "Excessive" Double: Reading "Les Bonnes" through Irigaray and Cixous.' French Review, 63, no. 6 (1990), 959–966.
- Sheringham, Michael. 'Narration and Experience in Genet's Journal du Voleur' in Robert Gibson (ed.) Studies in French Fiction in Honour of Vivienne Mylne. London: Grant and Cutler, 1988.
- Stewart, Harry E., and Rob Roy McGregor. Jean Genet: A Biography of Deceit 1910–1951. New York: Peter Lang, 1989.
- Thody, Philip. Jean Genet: A Study of His Novels and Plays. London: Hamish Hamilton, 1968.
- Watts, Philip. 'Political Discourse and Poetic Register in Jean Genet's Pompes Funèbres.' French Forum, 17, no. 2 (May 1992), 191–203.
- White, Edmund. Genet. London: Picador, 1994.

---

GEORGE, STEFAN

---

1868–1933
 German poet

From his earliest verses, written when he was still a schoolboy, to his last collection, published in 1928, Stefan George's poetry bears witness to his same-sex inclinations. Although the nascent homosexual rights movement claimed him as one of their own as early as 1914, for decades later critics preferred to overlook this pervasive aspect of George's poetry. In 1987, Marita Keilson-Lauritz corrected these decades of homophobia in her work Von der Liebe, die Freundschaft heißt: zur Homoerotik im Werk Stefan Georges [On the love called friendship: the homoerotic in Stefan George's work]. As Keilson-Lauritz mentions in A Companion to the Works of Stefan George, "there is no doubt that the concept of love in the texts of Stefan George is a homoerotic one. That is to say, even if George never would have called himself a 'homosexual,' the main subject of his texts is love of men and boys."

George's earlier work is symbolist, having been strongly influenced by Mallarmé and his circle. The collections Hymnen [Hymns], (1890), Pilgerfahrten [Pilgrimages], (1891), Algabal (1892), and Die Bücher der Hirten-und Preisgedichte [The Book of Eclogues and Eulogies], (1894) reflect this influence of symbolism, an influence which ends with the publication of Das Jahr der Seele [The Year of the Soul], (1897) and Der Teppich des Lebens [The Tapestry of Life], (1900). In this earlier period many poems dealing with queer desire and identity do so in a decadentist and medievalist context. This picture changed in 1902 when George met the precocious 14-year-old Maximilian Kronberger, who died of meningitis two years after. George deified the youth as "Maximin" in Der siebente Ring [The Seventh Ring], (1907) and in subsequent collections, Der Stern des Bundes [The Star of the Covenant], (1914) and Das neue Reich [The New Empire], (1928). Here George expressed queer sexuality often in more religious language representing an increasing vatic and pedagogical vocation in his late work.

Queer sexuality in all of his poetry is, however, strategically disguised. George dubbed this "übergeschlechtliche Liebe" [supersexual love], encompassing homosexual love, platonic love, friendship, and love transcending sex, gender, and age, all frequently connected to "lust und peim" [lust and pain]. As Keilson-Lauritz notes, one of George's strategic disguises lies in the use of the gender-neutral second person singular. The poet also played with ambiguous metaphors and allegory. Far beyond simply creating ornamental and ultimately substitutable lexical deviance, George's use of metaphor helps to blur the boundaries of gender and desire. His poetry grapples with the tension between the heterosexual reality of Wilhelmine Germany and a repressed same-sex sensitivity.

These strategies both mask and signal a profound social conflict. Since George lived in a period of extreme social, political, and economic change, this is particularly significant. His times saw strong challenges to conventional concepts of sex, gender, and sexuality fueled by the emergence of the sexology of Tardieu, Ulrichs, Westphal, Tamassia, Charcot, Magnan, Havelock Ellis, Krafft-Ebing, Raffalovich, and others. The growth of psychoanalysis added further to this competition of ideas. Magnus Hirschfeld's Jahrbuch für sexuelle Zwischenstufen [Yearbook for Intermediary Sexual Stages] appeared at roughly the same time as George's Blätter, 1899 to 1923, and Freud published his Drei Abhandlungen zur Sexualtheorie [Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality] in 1905, only two years before George's Der siebente Ring.

As homosexual acts were still outlawed in Germany, however, the fear of being singled out makes George's preference for metaphor and more oblique forms of presentation understandable as self-protection. George's oblique expression contrasts sharply with the direct autobiographical articulation championed by his contemporaries. This allowed George to deal with a variety of queer subjects such as pederasty (in poems like “Sieh mein Kind ich gehe” [See my child, I leave] and “Mein kind kam heim” [My child came home]), hermaphroditism (So sprach ich nur in meinen schwersten tagen [These words were said when living was a loss], “Der du uns aus der qual der zweiheit löstest” [You took away the pain of inner schism], “Ist dies der knabe längster sage” [Is this the boy of oldest legend], and “Ich bin der Eine und bin Beide” [I am the One, I am the Two]), and sadomasochism (“So werd ich immer harren und verschmachten” [And must I always thirst and wait], “Lobgesang” [Encomium], “Empfängnis” [Conception]). While accepting same-sex sexuality and other queer phenomena as neither pathological nor sinful and reviving Greek models of platonic love and love of boys, the range of queer performativity and the complexity of the queer strategies at work nonetheless betray an internalization of late nineteenth- and early twentieth-century European scientific and religious discourses on sexuality.

This multifaceted treatment of same-sex eroticism, which found its real-life corollary in the ambiguous cultural politics of the male-bonded George-Kreis, makes George a moderne à contre-cœur. His work, despite its general antimodernist position, fits into the larger picture of queer modernist poetry by Verlaine, Rimbaud, Cavafy, Kuzmin, Lorca, Crane, Saba, Cernuda, and the like. The elitist forms of Männerphantasien inherent in George’s eroticism, torn between utter devotion and self-preservation, also place him in the aesthetic and moral vicinity of Jean Genet, who might at first glance appear to be an antipode.

In the still topical controversy surrounding George that resulted from the Nazi appropriation of his work, it is a vérité inavouable for certain apologists that his work has a proto-fascist character and that his treatment of same-sex eroticism relates to this character. Other critics who consider George an ideological precursor of Nazism have usually done so from a heterosexist perspective. However, the link between George’s notion of a “Secret Germany” and his understanding of sexuality must be avowed. Thus a queer—not gay hagiographic—approach to George’s output and its wider political ramifications becomes all the more necessary.

Biography

Born into a Catholic family of wine merchants of partly French heritage in the village of Budesheim near Bingen, Germany, 12 July 1868. Attended Gymnasium in Darmstadt (1882–1888), becoming proficient in Greek and Latin while continuing courses in French and English, and teaching himself Norwegian and Italian. Upon graduating, traveled throughout Europe. In Paris (1889) met Albert Saint-Paul, Paul Verlaine, Stéphane Mallarmé, and other symbolist poets. Subsequently studied Romance literature for three semesters at Friedrich-Wilhelm University in Berlin (1889–1891). While in Berlin, co-founded the Blätter für die Kunst [Pages for Art], which was to become a prominent literary journal in the years between 1892 and 1919. In 1891, met Hugo von Hofmannsthal in Vienna, starting an intensive friendship lasting until 1906. All through the rest of his life remained a wanderer, continually on the move mainly between Heidelberg, Munich, Berlin, and Switzerland. In 1927, received the Goethe Prize of the city of Frankfurt am Main. In 1933, declined the Nazis’s offer of membership in the Preussische Dichterkademie, reflecting a complex antipathy and sympathy for German National Socialism. Died near Locarno, Switzerland, on December 4, 1933.

MAX D. KRAMER

Selected Works

The Works of Stefan George. Translated by Olga Marx and Ernst Morwitz. New York: AMS Press, 1966 (first edition 1949).

Poems. Bilingual edition translated by Carol North Valhope and Ernst Morwitz. New York: Schocken, 1967 (first edition 1943).

Further Reading

Aarts, Jan. “Alfred Schuler, Stefan George and Their Different Grounds in the Debate on Homosexuality at the Turn of the Century in Germany.” Among Men, Among Women, (editors: Mattias Duyves et al.). Amsterdam: Sociologisch Instituut, 1983.

David, Claude. Stefan George, son œuvre poétique. Lyon: IAC, 1952; as Stefan George. Sein dichterisches Werk, translated into German by Alexa Remmen and Karl Thiemer. Munich: Carl Hanser, 1967.

Hamecher, Peter. “Der männliche Eros im Werke Stefan Georges.” Jahrbuch für sexuelle Zwischenstufen, 14 (1914).

Keilson-Lauritz, Marita. Von der Liebe, die Freundschaft heißt: zur Homoerotik im Werk Stefan Georges. Berlin: Rosa Winkel, 1987.
Kiefer, Otto. "Der Eros bei Stefan George." Geschlecht und Gesellschaft, 14 (1926/1927).
Norton, Robert E. Secret Germany: Stefan George and His Circle. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 2002.

Rieckmann, Jens (editor). A Companion to the Works of Stefan George. Rochester, NY: Camden House, 2005.
Travers, Martin. "Fascism and Aesthetic Self-Fashioning: Politics and the Ritualised Body in the Poetry of Stefan George." Renaissance and Modern Studies, 42 (1999).

---

GERMAN: TWENTIETH AND TWENTY-FIRST CENTURIES

---

Erotic literature is defined here as a genre with three progressively explicit types of text: the erotic, the sexual, and the pornographic imaginary in its linguistic expressions and versions; progressively explicit is understood as the representations of the erotic imaginary from the implicit (i.e., erotic) to the more explicit (i.e., sexual) to the most explicit (i.e., pornographic) in content and form. The designation of erotic literature is thus employed as an umbrella term and is understood by the levels of linguistic explicitness of the imaginary from the erotic to the sexual to the pornographic. It is in this context that our focus in describing German-language erotic literature in the twentieth- and the first years of the twenty-first century is to be understood.

While there are many examples of the erotic text in twentieth-century German-language literature, for example passages about Madame Chauchat in Thomas Mann's Magic Mountain or in Robert Musil's descriptions of youthful confusions and experiences of sexuality in his novel Törless or his allusions to incest in The Man without Qualities or in Frank Wedekind's Pandora's Box, our focus is on texts where the imaginary, the thematics, and their descriptions are linguistically and in the imaginary explicit from erotic to sexual to pornographic in form and content. It should be mentioned, however, that perhaps the best example of the low-key sensual-erotic belletristic text par excellence in German is Arthur Schnitzler's (1862–1931) Traumnovelle (1925) [Dream Story, trans. Otto P. Schnitnerer, 1927] — the short novel adapted to the film Eyes Wide Shut by Stanley Kubrick (1999).

In German-language literature of any period erotic texts as defined here are a minor genre in form, content, and numbers published. For example, while at the end of the eighteenth century German erotic texts acquired the themes and forms of the roman libertine, they did not achieve the aesthetic and linguistic elegance of the French texts and that with regard to the nineteenth century — and perhaps even to date — it can be argued that only one author's work, Leopold von Sacher-Masoch's (1836–1895) Venus im Pelz [Venus in Furs] (1870) has acquired world-wide renown while the memoirs of opera singer Wilhelmine Schröder-Devrient (1804–1869), Memoiren einer Sängerin [Memoirs of an Opera Singer] (1862), are in some sources noted as the most famous text of German-language erotic literature (although the authorship of Memoiren einer Sängerin by Schröder-Devrient is contested). The memoir shows the influence of the Marquis de Sade's Justine with numerous descriptions of sadomasochism.

Twentieth-century German-language erotic literature (including the first few years of the new millennium) can be described by the following characteristics: 1) the translation of foreign texts of erotic literature dominates while original German-language texts are scarce; 2) although German-language erotic texts are frequent before World War I, the most active period where erotic texts and the publishing of such occur is in the period of post-World War I to 1933 when the Nazi government is installed, 3) most texts are published in private editions and the criticism that these texts are of popular literary quality when compared with high-brow/canonical texts — as argued by Englisch already in 1927 (see below) — remains a characteristic of the genre up to several decades after World War II, and 4) with the arrival of new media in the 1990s, in online material where text and visuals represent a type of Gesamtkunstwerk, an innovative period is in the making whose developments are yet to be seen.

In twentieth-century German literature the most prominent erotic text is Josefine Mutzenbacher. Lebensgeschichte einer wienerischen Dirne, von ihr selbst erzählt [Josephine Mutzenbacher: The Life Story of a Viennese Prostitute, as Told by Herself] published in 1906 and attributed to the novelist and theater critic Felix Salten (pseudonym of Siegmund Salzmann, 1869–1945). Heavily influenced by Cleland's Fanny Hill (1749), the text is written in Viennese dialect with sexual and pornographic descriptions about the heroine's life who by her thirteenth year had already had more than two dozen lovers. A sequel entitled Josefine Mutzenbacher und ihre 365 Liebhaber was published in 1925, with similar descriptions of pornographic content. Another text of some renown of the period is C.W. Stern's 1909 collection of thirty tales taken from the fairy tales of the Brothers Grimm where the tales in the collection are re-written in sexualized language. Also interesting is the four-volume translation of the 1001 Arabian Nights entitled Tausend und eine Nacht. Arabische Erzählungen (1913, trans. Gustav Weils, ed. V. Ludwig Fulda, and illustrated by Fernand Schulz-Wettel) where the erotic content is not the text itself but the illustrations. There are also B. Stern's (no relation to C.W. Stern mentioned above) 1908 Illustrierte Geschichte der erotischen Literatur aller Zeiten und Völker [Illustrated History of Erotic Literature of all Times and Peoples], a compendium with excerpts of texts and with much German-language material and Fritz Foregger's novel published in 1913, Die Liebespredigt [Sermon of Love] with love poems about oral sex, masochism, homoeroticism, necrophilia, aphrodisiacs, etc.

Since the mid- to late-nineteenth century, when in literature the urban environment and urbanity became dominant themes and the main locus of literature, also in erotic literature it has been city life that has become the most frequent setting and theme. In particular, Berlin and Vienna, the two largest German-speaking cities of Europe, have become both the location of the stories in the texts as well as the location of the publication of the texts. Here are the most prominent examples of this genre of erotic literature: the loves and sexual exploits of the Berlin prostitute are the theme of Richard Werther (pseudonym of Ernst Klein) who has published since 1907 novels such as Freudenmädchen [Women of Pleasure], Tagebuch einer Bordell-dirne, Lore [Diary of a Woman of Pleasure, Lore], Durchtollte Nächte, durchjubilte Tage [Crazy Nights, Wild Days], and Der lüsterne Detektiv [The Horny Detective]. The usual plot is about the exploits of prostitutes in city night life, with the sexual and pornographic description of stereotypical excesses. Another popular novel of the period before World War I, also attributed to Richard Werther, is Memoiren eines Arztes [Memoirs of a Physician]. Loosely connected descriptions written in a retrospective mode, the story is about a physician whose sexual interest is in under-aged girls and who oversees a sanatorium for women where he enjoys life as a peeping tom. A further example of urbanity and sexuality in literature from the period before World War I is the novel James Grunert. Ein Roman aus Berlin W [James Grunert: A Novel from Berlin West] (1908) not the least because of the biography of its author, Werner von Bleichröder, who was the son of Bismarck's banker Gerson von Bleichröder (1822–1893), the first Jew who was ennobled without having to convert. Werner von Bleichröder describes in first-person narrative his life as the son of a banker named James Grunert. The novel's setting located in Berlin's high society and aristocracy, James begins his sexual life when as a ten-year-old he is seduced by the mother of one his school friends. Attracted to women with power, Bleichröder's alter ego Grunert's stories are about wild sexual lust in Berlin's affluent upper class including many a coming-of-age young woman. The at times unflattering description of the upper-class teenage women and their sexual promiscuity suggests the author's intention to criticize the Berlin society he obviously knew well as the son of a wealthy banker who in turn has had several kept mistresses.

As mentioned previously, German-language erotic literature of the twentieth century has been dominated by translations: the genre begins with the publication of Pietro Aretino's I Ragionamenti [The Dialogues] about the life of the courtesan, translated by Heinrich Conrad, published in 1903. Conrad also published the German translation of the prototype of the roman libertin, Nicolas Chorier's Académie de dames, and Casanova's memoirs. By the 1920s, following the liberalization of society in the Germany of post-World War I including the abolition of censorship in 1918, many French and Italian texts of the Renaissance were published in translation in private editions but also regular publishers took advantage of the new interest of the reading public in erotic literature. For example, the Decameron was published in 1924 by the Berlin publisher Neufeld and Henius (translated by Klabund).

A prominent author as translator of classics of erotic literature is Franz Blei (1871–1942; Blei used the pseudonyms Medardus and Dr. Peregrinus Steinhövel) — known today as a supporter of Franz Kafka, Robert Musil, and Hermann Broch, and their literary legacies. During his life, however, Blei was decried as a “pornographer.” Blei's translations include Lucian, Laclos's Liaisons dangereuses, Vivant Denon's Point de lendemain, Antoine de la Salle's Quinze joyes de mariage, the amorous poems of Johannes Secundus, etc. In several anthologies, he published mainly French classics of erotic literature but authored erotic comedies himself, wrote commentaries about Franz von Bayros's erotic-sexual drawings, and published various other erotic material in Ametyst and Opale, magazines he founded. Examples of his own writing of erotic literature include Lesebuch der Marquise [The Reader of the Marquise] and Von amourösen Frauen [About Women in Love]. In his autobiography, Erzählung eines Lebens [The Story of a Life] (1930) he describes his first love with a Viennese girl in sexual detail.

Of importance is that for Blei erotic literature is framed within a social context and in his autobiography he discusses the meanings and functions of social mores in philosophical excursions where one of his arguments is the negation of the moral necessity of monogamy altogether. Further, in a scholarly context, in his Formen der Liebe [Shapes of Love] (1930), Blei presents in essays his thoughts on the meaning and history of eroticism. Further examples of translations in the period include translations such as the anonymous Roman de mon alcôve (1869) translated as Die Geheimnisse meines Alkovens (trans. Fred Marr, 1910).

Arguably, the most significant German-language contribution to erotic literature is scholarship and not fiction per se, namely Paul Englisch's 1927 Geschichte der erotischen Literatur [History of Erotic Literature], a work that to date is considered the largest and most reliable source of the topic. Little is known about the author and the name is likely a pseudonym: he was born in 1887, studied law and accumulated wealth in the retail business, a cultivated man who acquired a large private library. In his history of erotic literature, he defines the genre as “the description of sexually charged feelings of love — owing to the excitation of the nervous system and as a result of the stimulation of sensual desires — to one's self, to one's own gender, or to the opposite sex” (3, trans. Totosy). The book contains shorter chapters about Greek and Roman antiquity, French erotic literature is described in no less than twenty-one chapters whereby the most detailed description is devoted to the eighteenth century, six chapters are devoted to Italian material, and three chapters to English erotic literature while the periods of German erotic literature are detailed up to the 1920s. Non-European erotic literature is discussed in an appendix of the book. In addition to an overwhelming amount of information and detail, Englisch shows no prejudice and mixes descriptions of content with his critical remarks and his observations about historical contexts. Further, in 1932 Englisch published an anthology of erotic short stories, Anthologie der erotischen Literatur aus vielen Jahrhunderten [Anthology of Erotic Literature], with a preface by Franz Blei, in Vienna (private edition; rpt. in 1966). Blei's preface is of interest because he not only reiterates his objection to monogamy but discusses pornography and argues that owing to its fictional representation of sexual acts, pornography as mere “virtual reality” ought to be understood as a kind of “idealistic romanticism.” Although the texts in the anthology are from a wide array of sources and cultural geographies, the selections are mostly tame and even from Josefine Mutzenbacher, the selected text is the most unerotic possible.

In German language scholarship about erotic culture, it is of note that for the first two decades of the twentieth century, the best source of primary as well as secondary literature is Hugo Hayn and Alfred N. Gotendorf's eight-volume Bibliotheca Germanorum erotica et curiosa (1912–1929). Another scholar whose work is internationally renowned is Eduard Fuchs (1870–1940) who published the six-volume Illustrierte Sittengeschichte vom Mittelalter bis zur Gegenwart [An Illustrated History of Morals from the Middle Ages to Contemporary Times] (1909–1912) and Geschichte der erotischen Kunst [History of Erotic Art] in 1920. What makes the classification of these works of scholarship erotic literature is the visual representation of sexuality in the books which at the time would have had considerable impact. Although Fuchs's depictions in categories such as "Prostitution in the Renaissance," "The Business of the Brothel," or "The Lust of Monks and Nuns" indicate an intention to polemicize, the pictures would have had undoubtedly an erotic impact on readers and viewers of the time.

In his History of Erotic Literature, English credits Fritz Thurn (the pseudonym of either Adolf Gruss or Fritz Foregger) as the best author of erotic literature of 1920s Germany. Thurn's Weisheiten der Aspasia [Aspasia's Wisdom] (1923) suggest an author with a classical education while at the same time his text attests to his knowledge of the genre aimed at the "Erregung sinnlicher Begierde" [awakening of erotic/sexual desire]. The locus of the novel is ancient Athens and we are in the palace of antiquity's most famous courtesan, Aspasia, later the wife of Pericles. The text is a quasi-historical novel whereby focus is on the description of sexual exploits and pornographic imagery. With Aspasia, the main character is Alcibiades who is invited by Aspasia to partake in her activities as a matron to virgins whom she educates in the art of love, in theory and in practice. Alcibiades participates in Aspasia's lessons by a string of sexual acts such as the deflowering of a Spartan prisoner of war and similar exploits and he responds to Aspasia's flirtations with his ability to withhold his orgasm until his lover and himself arrive at the highest levels of pleasure and satisfaction. What is interesting in the narrative is that Thurn's language is elegant and that he uses no common or coarse vocabulary when describing body parts or sexual acts. In the next chapters of the book, Alcibiades is allowed to partake in the lessons Aspasia offers to her young virgins and in eight lessons we read about body hygiene, particularities of the sexual organs, positions of lovemaking, the "auxiliary arts of Aphrodite" (fellatio, the relationship of desire and pain, etc.), and about the various duties and prescriptions for the behavior of a courtesan. While these descriptions are highly entertaining, the text also includes various stories of sexual escapades, dispersed throughout the narrative and the author's intention is to present auto-reflective responses to his narrative. Perhaps of ironic dimensions is the description of the final scene of an orgy where participants include Aristophanes and Euripides. Aspasia is a complete hostess who satisfies all artistic and life desires of the event which includes members of the Spartan envoy to Athens. Instigated by Pericles, the hosts' objective is to subvert the resolve of the Spartans by engaging them in sexual pleasures in order to have them sign the Athenians' demands for a truce scheduled for the day after. Thus, the text connects the art of love and excesses of desire with politics and art to the common good versus war. The message is, of course, "make love not war," in 1923, an example of the ideas of the 1960s flower generation, here located in antiquity.

Other examples of the erotic novel in the inter-war period include Heinrich Wandt's Erotik und Spionage in der Etappe Gent [Erotica and Espionage in the Headquarters at Gent] (1929), a novel about the sexual escapades of a group of military officers. A novel of aesthetic quality as well as social and historical value is the autobiographical novel of Erica Fischer, Aimee und Jaguar. Eine Frauenliebe [Aimee and Jaguar: A Women's Love Story] (1943; rpt. 1994), a novel about lesbian love during World War II in Germany (the novel was adapted to film, directed by Max Farberbock [1999]). A prominent example of fetishist literature is Hanns von Leydenegg's 1932 Der gestiefelte Eros. Lebensbeichte eines Schuhfetischisten [Eros with Boots: Confessions of A Shoefetichist], illustrated by Paul Kamm, a text about transvestitism, flagellation, etc.

In the history of sexuality in general, the work of Magnus Hirschfeld (1868–1935) is of great importance. An early scholar of sexuality, Hirschfeld has published—primarily for scholarly as well as educational purposes—much work in the field, for example his Die Homosexualität des Mannes und des Weibes [Male and Female Homosexuality] (1914), the annual of scholarship Jahrbuch für sexuelle Zwischenstufen (1899–1923), the learned journal Zeitschrift für Sexualwissenschaft [Journal of Scholarship about Sexuality] (1908–1913) as well as, with Maria Krische, the educational magazine Die Aufklärung [Enlightenment; with the parallel meaning of sexual education] (1929–1930), and his principal work, Die Geschlechtskunde [Study of the Sexes] (1926). Further, Hirschfeld cooperated in the making of Richard Oswald's 1919 film about homosexuality, Anders als die Anderen [Different from the Others] and founded the world's first institute of research into sexuality, the Berlin Institute for Sexual Science (Institut für Sexualwissenschaft), 1919–1933. Hirschfeld frequented the avant-garde group of the "Friedrichshagener Dichterkreis" in the 1890s where many other writers, intellectuals, and artists congregated, such as Lou Andreas-Salomé, Max Baginski, Leo Berg, Max Dauthendey, Gerhart Hauptmann, August Strindberg, Rudolf Steiner, or Frank Wedekind for example, and many of whom have published various genres of texts with erotic or sexual content. In 1931, Hirschfeld went on an American lecture tour and at the time he was hailed as the leading expert of the field. A practicing homosexual, Hirschfeld supported the theory that hormones may be a source of homosexuality and his notions led other researchers to attempt to cure homosexuality with hormone injections. Hirschfeld died in exile in France and his Institute was destroyed by the Nazis. Among numerous other publications by Hirschfeld and his collaborators, the educational and scientific journal Die Ehe [Marriage], edited by Ludwig Levy-Lenz 1929–1932 is of note (the journal contained a large amount of nude photography). Founded in 1982, Hirschfeld's legacy is continued with the Magnus-Hirschfeld-Gesellschaft in Berlin. In a similar way, in the intersections of culture and erotic literature, the efforts and successes of feminist and pacifist Helene Stöcker (1869–1943) are to be mentioned because of her work in women's rights and women's sexuality: Stöcker's autobiographical novel Liebe [Love] (1922) contains many of her ideas about women's sexuality, for example. With the arrival of the Nazi government in 1933, all eroticism and of course sexuality and pornography, literary or other, have been banned and destroyed.

After World War II, the work of 1999 Nobel Prize recipient Günter Grass (1927–) — for example, Die Blechtrommel (1959) [The Tin Drum, trans. Ralph Manheim] (1962), Der Butt (1977), [The Flounder, trans. Ralph Manheim] (1985), etc. — are of relevance of the first order as they contain numerous sexual and pornographic descriptions.

In the context of the sexual revolution it was, in particular, the business activities of one woman, Beate Uhse (1919–2001), who contributed much towards the acceptance of erotic culture in Germany, first via a mail-order company and later in sex shops, in cities throughout the country, where books and now, of course, videos and magazines of pornographic content are sold. The quality of printed material sold in the Beate Uhse shops is mostly in the category of popular/vulgar pornography. The Beate Uhse Erotic Museum in Berlin exhibits excellent material from the popular to the highly artistic: for instance, the museum's first catalogue Sodom Berlin (2002) is interesting as it contains an essay, "Sodom Berlin: Berlin as a Place of Eroticism and Erotic Art" by Hans Jürgen Döpp, and a series of reproductions of sexual and pornographic drawings by artists such as Charlotte Berend-Corinth (1880–1967), Michel Fingesten (1884–1943), George Grosz (1893–1959), Rudolf Schlichter (1890–1955), Erich Goldmann (1899–?), Otto Schoff (1884–1938), Hans Bellmer (1902–1975), and drawings by artists whose biographies are to date as yet unknown such as "Ernst Gerhard" and "Hildebrandt."

In the genre of popularizing knowledge about sexuality is the work of Oswald Kolle, who in the 1960s and 1970s published popular books and appeared in films where he attempted to explain the mysteries of relationships and sexuality (Kolle, in his '70s, lives in Amsterdam today). In the 1970s, the sexual prose about lesbian sadomasochism by Marlene Stenten (1935–) found a following with her novel Albina. Monotonie um eine Weggegangene [Albina: Monotony about One Gone Away] (1986) and in the 1980s Elfriede Jelinek's (1946–) novel Lust [Lust] (1989) and Brigitte Blobel's (1942–) collection of erotic short stories in Venusmuschel (1982) received acclaim as well as created debate and controversy. Of interest are also texts by Dorothea Zeemann (a.k.a Dora Holzinger, 1909–1993), theater critic, novelist, journalist, nurse, and author of two autobiographies Einübung in Katastrophen [Practice in Catastrophe] (1979) and Jungfrau und Reptil [Virgin and Reptile] (1982) where she describes in sexual detail her affair with the novelist Heimito von Doderer and author of the trilogy Das heimliche Fest [The Secret Celebration] (1986), Eine

Liebhaverin [The Lover] (1989), and Reise mit Ernst [Travels with Ernest] (1991), all with sections of sexual descriptions.

Visual texts of eroticism and sexuality published in the 1980s include Robert Lebeck's (ed.) Playgirls von damals. 77 alte Postkarten [Playgirls of Past: Seventy-Seven Postcards] (1987), Uwe Scheid's multi-volume book about nudes in photography, Das erotische Imago [The Erotic Imagination] (1986, 1991).

In the 1990s, Doris Lerche (1945–) who published the volume 21 Gründe, warum eine Frau mit einem Mann schläft [Twenty-One Reasons Why a Woman Beds a Man] (1993) and Doris Dörrie's (1955–) collection of short stories Bin ich schön? [Am I Beautiful?] (1994; adapted to film in 1997) achieved some renown where a women's point of view and voice are stressed although sexual or pornographic descriptions are not to be found in her text; rather, it is the reference to such domains of life that make the text of interest. Dörrie has also achieved renown with her films and her interest in erotic and sexual matters in Germany with texts such as Liebe in Duetshland: Deutsche Paare im Gespräch mit Doris Dörrie [Love in Germany: German Couples in Interviewed by Doris Dörrie] (1995). Other examples of erotic prose of the 1990s include Ulla Hahn's Ein Mann im Haus [Man in the House] (1991), Marlene Streeruwitz's Frauenjahre [Women's Years] (1996), and Karin Rick's collection of short stories Sex, Sehnsucht und Sirenen [Sex, Desire, and Sirens] (1991) and Regine Nössler's collection of short stories Wie Elvira ihre Sexkrise verlor [How Elvira Got Rid of Her Crisis of Sex] (1996). Increasing acclaim is accorded to the erotic texts of Sophie Andresky who focuses on the female voice such as in her novel Feucht. Erotische Verführungen [Moist: Erotic Seductions] (2000) and in her collections of short stories In der Höhle der Löwin [In the Cave of the Lioness] (1998) and Das Lächeln der Pauline [Pauline's Smile] (1997).

As mentioned previously, it is translated texts that dominate German-language erotic literature of the period after World War II and up to the 1980s. At times, however, the translation of a canonical erotic text results in exceptional quality and in literary historical advance. For example, the Chinese classic, Chin Ping Mei's The Adventurous History of Hsi Men and His Six Wives (in mainland China only recently taken off the list of censored books), was published in an unexpurgated German translation in 1967 (Djin Ping Meh. Schlehenblüten in goldener Vase, trans. Otto Kibat and Artur Kibat, rept. 1987) at a time when the novel's English translation did not include the text's pornographic sections. Or, already in the 1960s, translations appeared also of such texts as Guillaume Apollinaire's pornographic novel Les Onze mille verges ou les amours d'un hospodar [Die elftausend Ruten], trans. Rudolf Wittkopf] (1970).

Texts of erotic literature were available for readers in communist East Germany to a much lesser extent than to readers in West Germany of course. An exception was the monthly Magazin für Lebenskunst [Magazine of the Art of Living] (founded in 1924, after 1945 published in East Berlin) that published photography, articles, and short stories of rather tame eroticism. However, nude photography, for example, otherwise hardly available in East Germany, appeared in this publication and thus its existence is of some importance in the history of East German literature and culture and represents an exception to the rule. A few writers, despite censorship, were able to write and publish texts with erotic and sexual content and language. Examples include Irmtraud Morgner's (1933–1990) feminist novels Hochzeit in Konstantinopel [Wedding in Constantinople] (1968), the trilogy Leben und Abenteuer der Trobadora Beatriz nach Zeugnissen ihrer Spielfrau Laura [The Life and Adventures of Troubadura Beatriz According to her Ioculatrix Laura] (1974, 1983; one critic calls the trilogy "socialist magical realism"), and Amanda. Ein Hexenroman [Amanda: A Witchnovel] (1983) and Gabriele Stötzer (1953–) who in her novels with a feminist outlook mixes German dialect, the lower-case writing of nouns, and sensual–sexual language when describing love and lovemaking.

Just before the collapse of communism, the East German government allowed, in 1988, the publication of translations of erotic classics such as by Octave Henri Marie Mirbeau and Andréa de Nerciat as well as Josefine Mutzenbacher and August Maurer's 1799 novel Leipzig im Taumel. Nach Originalbriefen eines reisenden Edelmanns [Leipzig in Swing: The Correspondence of a Traveling Nobleman], a text with sexual and pornographic descriptions.

In the 1980s and 1990s, anthologies represent efforts by diverse publishers to market erotic literature. For instance, between 1986 and 1996 several editions were published of Die klassische Sau. Das Handbuch der literarischen Erotik [The Classic Sow: A Manual of Erotic Literature] and its sequel Die neue klassische Sau [The New Classic Sow], edited by Eva Zutzel and Adam Zausel (pseudonyms). Texts in these volumes are not arranged by historical periods but thematically with selections from antiquity (Catullus, Ovidius), the Renaissance (Aretino), the eighteenth century (Cleland, Diderot, Restif de la Bretonne, de Sade), and, in volume two, focus is on contemporary literature where also some German authors such as Gottfried Benn, Robert Gernhardt, Eckhard Henschel, Elfriede Jelinek, Eugen Neter, Peter Rühmkorf, Cora Stephan, and Kurt Tucholsky are included. Material selected in these anthologies at times also include erotic texts from canonical literature such as by Flaubert, Joyce, Proust, and Musil. Other anthologies of interest include Hansjürgen Blinn's ich will dich. Die hundert schönsten erotischen Gedichte [I Want You: One Hundred of the Most Beautiful Erotic Poems] (2001).

The 1991 anthology put out by the publisher Haffmans, Komm. Zieh dich aus. Das Handbuch der lyrischen Hoherotik deutscher Zunge [Come, Take Your Clothes Off: The Manual of German Erotic Lyrics], contains texts of some interest (the volume appeared previously in a shorter form in 1970, entitled Dein Leib ist mein Gedicht [Your Body is My Poem]). It contains material from the Middle Ages (these are actually of lesser pornographic content and are more in the vein of the Carmina Burana) and selections of poems by Conrad Celtis, Johannes Secundus, Paul Fleming, and Hoffmann von Hoffmannswaldau. In the second volume where the focus is on the twentieth century, we find the erotic poetry of canonical authors such as Dehmel, Brecht, George, Rilke, Wedekind, Lasker-Schüler, Benn, etc., and examples of sexual word games by Arno Holz. However, these examples of German erotic poetry are either very low key or coarse rather than sexual or pornographic: a line in one of Berthold Brecht's poems illustrates this best: "Am besten fickt man erst und badet dann / [Best is to fuck first and bathe later] ("Sauna und Beischlaf"). An exception are the more sexual poems about lovemaking of Karl Krolow (1915–1999) although despite his light and popularizing style his poetry is with a serious tone.

An important role in the publishing of erotic literature is Claudia Gehrke's publishing house

Konkursbuch, founded in 1979. Based on principles of feminism and on the commitment to support new ways and forms of literature, Gehrke's support of erotic literature includes lesbian writing such as Cornelia Saxe's ClitClip (1994). The book is engaging aesthetically with photographs by Mayanne Konst. Similarly, the 1993 volume of verse by the Japanese-German author Yoko Tawada, Das Bad [The Bath] (1989), contains drawings of nudes of exceptional quality and her novel Opium für Ovid. Ein Kopfkissenbuch von 22 Frauen [Opium for Ovidius: A Pillow of Twenty-Two Women] (2000) is about female eroticism and sexuality, or, the novel about sadomasochism and love among lesbians by Regina Nössler, Strafe muss sein [Punishment is a Necessity] (1994) contains color photography of high aesthetic standards. Gehrke also publishes, first in 1982 and annually since 1988, Mein heimliches Auge. Das Jahrbuch der Erotik [My Secret Eye: The Annual of Eroticism]. The volumes contain uncensored texts of many types, prose, lyrics, essays, photographs, pictures of paintings, and drawings by renown and lesser-known authors. Aesthetically, the books are of high quality and of importance is that the books are a forum for new authors. For example, it is in these annuals that work by Alissa Walser, Dagmar Fedderke, and Sybille Szymanski first appeared. Fedderke has published several novels and collections of short stories with Konkursbuch such as Pissing in Paris. Eine Reiseleiter [Pissing in Paris: A Travelbook] (1994) and Die Geschichte mit A. [The Story with A.] (1993), a novel also taking place in Paris and a take on Pauline Reage's The Story of O. In Fedderke's novel, too, the story is about a woman's slavery to a man but here the events occur in every-day life rather than in privileged and secluded settings. The description of the protagonist's angst when participating in group sex, in a public establishment, or the ridicule of some male participants' bath robes are parts of the text as well as the description of the orgy itself. Of interest is that Fedderke employs the narrative strategy where she Germanizes the original French terms she has introduced at the beginning of the novel.

In twenty-first-century German-language erotic literature, instead of the description of sexual acts or that of erotic imagery, sexual desire is the dominant theme whereby it often appears as the focus of anthologies and so-called "erotische Lesebücher" (a reader of erotic stories). An example of this genre is Susanne Rehlein's collection Bitte streicheln Sie hier! [Would You Please Fondle Hier!] (2000) of twenty-two short stories. The young authors of this type of erotic literature attempt to show that eroticism takes place in one's imagination rather than in physical and raw sex while at the same time the imagination is capable of exploding in the wildest fantasies. For example, Katrin Röggla, in her short story "Bettgeschichten" ["Bedtime Stories," in Rehlein's collection] uses few explicitly sexual or pornographic words with the effect that her descriptions appear analytical rather than erotic and certainly not pornographic. Thomas Hettche—who rendered Aretino's Sonetti lussuriosi in German—presents in his novel Nox (1995) a text where he describes the orgies of his protagonists in such a way that the textual characteristics of the narrative, together with the protagonists, attain a surreal and virtual quality. Thus, dissimilar to the consciously organized breaking of taboos in current French-language erotic literature (e.g., Michel Houellebecq, Christine Angot, Catherine Millet, or Philippe Djian), in contemporary German erotic literature attention appears to be on the aestheticization of narrating the sexual act and its surrounding imaginary, whereby the said aestheticization occurs mainly on linguistic levels. This is particularly evident in Thomas Lehr's Nabokovs Katze [Nabokov's Cat] (1999) or in Ulrike Draesner's Mitgift [The Dowry] (2002), for example. This turn to the aesthetics of the word is perhaps best exemplified in Norbert Kron's Autopilot (2002), where the narrative is distanced and analytical in the extreme in descriptions such as the protagonist's lovemaking with his girlfriend. Of note are Detlev Meyer (1950–1999) who wrote homoerotic texts such as the trilogy Im Dampfbad greift nach mir ein Engel [An Angel Grabs Me in the Sauna] (1985), David steigt aufs Riesenrad [David Climbs the Ferris Wheel] (1987), and Ein letzter Dank den Leichtathleten [Last Thanks to Athletes] (1989), and a volume of poetry, Stern in Sicht [Star in View] (1998) and Ralf König (1960–) who writes homoerotic comic strips, several of which were adapted to film. The trend in contemporary German-language literature to narrate sexuality continues and, for example, at the 2003 Frankfurt Book Fair, texts with descriptions of sexual and pornographic detail appeared in abundance (e.g., Michael Lentz, Liebeserklärung, Alban Nikolai Herbst, Meere, Hans-Josef Ortheil, Die grosse Liebe).

A sub-genre of erotic literature is erotic science fiction and in German there are some examples of such as presented and discussed in Jürgen vom Scheidt's (ed.) Sex im All [Sex in Space] (1987).

As everywhere, also in German-speaking countries, the Internet is a medium where erotic material including pornography—visual as well as text—has exploded since the 1990s. It is thus not surprising that Web sites abound with erotic writing. New media technology allows for the presentation of text and visuals and thus there are many online sites where text is presented with paintings, photography, pictures of sculpture, and drawings. Similarly, the multi-media situation encourages the presentation of erotic texts with film and sound and while there are few such available as of yet, it is an obvious development yet to come. Also, Web sites include the presentation of the reading of texts similar to tapes or CDs with prose read by authors or actors. Web sites of interest where erotic literature, mostly short stories, can be found in German include Das Literatur-Café. Erotische Literatur. Kurzgeschichten und Gedichte (2002):

<<http://www.literaturcafe.de/>>,  Erotische Literatur für Frauen (2002): <<http://www.frauenerotik.de/literatur.html>>,  Erotisches zur Nacht. Die Erotik-Vorleseshow in Berlin (2002): <<http://www.erozuna.de>>,  Erotik für Frauen (2002): <<http://www.arte-erotica.de>>,  Erotische Literatur Seiten (2002): <<http://www.erotische-literatur-seiten.de/>>,  Erosa. Das Online-Magazin für erotische Literatur (2002): <<http://www.erosa.de>>,  Erotische Geschichten.de (2002): <<http://www.erotische-geschichten.de>>, or  Aranitas erotische Geschichten (2002): <<http://www.aranita.de/>>.

CAROLIN FISCHER and
STEVEN TOTOSY DE ZEPETNEK

Further Reading

- Aresin, Lykke, and Kurt Starke. Lexikon der Erotik. München: Knaur, 1996.
Barrantay, Alexander. Lieben, aber wie? Das Liebes-, Lehr- und Lesebuch für schwache Stunden. München: Schmitz, 1957.
Bolen, Carl von: Geschichte der Erotik. St.Gallen: Allgemeiner Verlag, 1952.

GERVAISE DE LATOUCHE, JEAN CHARLES

- Borneman, Ernest. Ullstein-Enzyklopädie der Sexualität. 1969. Berlin: Ullstein, 1990.
- Borneman, Ernest. Sex im Volksmund. Die sexuelle Umgangssprache des deutschen Volkes. Reinbek bei Hamburg: Rowohlt, 1971.
- Broggi Beckmann, Giuliana, ed. Das große Lesebuch der Erotik. München: Wilhelm Goldmann, 1994.
- Busch, Marion, and Gerhard Müller. "Dekadente Erotik in Hermann Bahrs Roman Die gute Schule." Dekadenz in Deutschland. Ed. Dieter Kafitz. Frankfurt: Peter Lang, 1987. 51–71.
- Duca, Lo. Das moderne Lexikon der Erotik von A–Z. Eine reich illustrierte aktuelle Enzyklopädie in zehn Bänden. München: Desch, 1969.
- Eder, Franz, and Sabine Frühstück, eds. Querschnitte 3. Neue Geschichten der Sexualität. Wien: Turia + Kant, 1999.
- Fischer, Carolin. Gärten der Lust. Eine Geschichte errgender Lektüren. Stuttgart: Metzler, 1997.
- Flotow, Luise von. "Translating Women of the Eighties: Eroticism, Anger, Ethnicity." Culture in Transit: Translating the Literature of Québec. Ed. Sherry Simon. Montréal: Véhicule, 1995. 31–46.
- Freibeuter*. Special issue 21 Geilheit. Berlin: Klaus Wagenbach, 1984.
- Gorsen, Peter. Sexualästhetik. Grenzformen der Sinnlichkeit im 20. Jahrhundert. Reinbek bei Hamburg: Rowohlt, 1987.
- Graeff, Max Christian, ed. Der verbotene Eros. Unstatthafte Lektüren. Ein Lesebuch. München: Deutscher Taschenbuch, 2000.
- Jauch, Ursula Pia. "Jenseits der Puderquaste. Franz Blei, Literat mit vielen Eigenschaften." Neue Zürcher Zeitung (22 June 2002).
- Lederer, Rosemarie. Grenzgänger Ich. Psychosoziale Analysen zur Geschlechtsidentität in der Gegenwartsliteratur. Wien: Passagen, 1998.
- Linklater, Beth V. "Erotic Provocations: Gabriele Stötzer-Kachold's Reclaiming of the Female Body?" Feminist Studies in German Literature & Culture 13 (1997): 151–170.
- Palmer, Craig Bernard. The Significance of Homosexual Desire in Modern Literature. Ph.D. Dissertation. Seattle: Washington University, 1997.
- Riess, Curt. Erotica! Erotica! Das Buch der verbotenen Bücher. Hamburg: Hoffmann und Campe, 1968.
- Risholm, Ellen, and Erin Crawley. "Lust and Jelinek: Violating the Commonsensical." High and Low Cultures: German Attempts at Mediation. Ed. Reinhold Grimm and Jost Hermand. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1994. 107–113.
- Strack, Friedrich. "'Aber das Fleisch ist stark!': Zur erotischen Lyrik des Expressionismus." Annäherungsversuche. Zur Geschichte und Ästhetik des Erotischen in der Literatur. Ed. Horst Albert Glaser. Bern: Haupt, 1993. 279–300.
- Vesela, Gabriela. "E.E. Kisch und der deutschsprachige Prager erotische Roman." Philologica Pragensia 28.4 (1985): 202–215.

---

GERVAISE DE LATOUCHE, JEAN CHARLES

---

1716–1782
French novelist

The only positive attribution of Histoire de Dom Bougre, portier des Chartreux [The Story of Friar Bugger, Porter of a Charterhouse] to Jean Charles Gervaise de Latouche comes from the Mémoires secrets, often well-informed, for November 1782: "Monsieur Gervaise, author of the Portier des Chartreux, that famous book that caused him such trouble, has died." Whoever the author was, he had very good reason for trying to keep his identity a secret. As for another book attributed to Gervaise in some reference works, Mémoires de Mlle de Bonneval (1738), all that can be said is that there is no known evidence for this.

The Histoire de Dom Bougre is perhaps, the most famous and infamous of all erotic novels of the eighteenth century. The first known edition was printed probably in December 1740. The name Bougre, a near-homonym of the English bugger or sodomite, was thinly veiled as B<sup>1/4</sup> or *B**** in the first editions; nineteen other editions have been listed in the eighteenth century, some under the variant titles Mémoires de Saturnin, Le Portier des Chartreux, and Histoire de Gouberdom. It became paradigmatic for pornography in general; allusions to it are found everywhere, and there appears to have been an early English translation. Not the least scandalous aspect of the *Histoire de Dom B**** was the eighteen illustrations made for the first edition, two of them fold-outs; others followed in 1748 and later for subsequent editions.

Like L'École des filles, an anonymous work of 1655, and the sixteenth-century Ragionamenti of Aretino, the story of Dom Bougre takes the form of a process of sexual initiation. The narrator, Saturnin, is a monk and son of a monk whose awakening is first provoked when he accidentally witnesses, through a convenient hole in the partition, a monk joyously copulating with Toinette, the woman he believes to be his own mother, while her husband is off in the fields. So inspired, Saturnin undertakes to educate his putative sister, Suzon; she in turn relates her own introduction to many things sexual, while a pupil in a convent, by Monique, in the process quoting the latter's own story. Among Monique's discoveries during her unhappy convent days is the use of dildos, not to mention priestly lovers, among the nuns.

Although he never gets Suzon, all the other women Saturnin encounters in the first half of the book lust actively after him. The first is Toinette herself: "and so it was that my very first time, I cuckolded my putative father, but so what?" Toinette thinks it wise to pack him off to a monastery, and thus ends Part One: but not before he cavorts with Madame Dinville, Suzon's godmother, as well as the parish priest's mistress and governess Françoise, and their daughter Nicole. Others he can enjoy vicariously through masturbation: "Your imagination plays, skips about among all those who have charmed your eyes: the brunette, the blonde, the petite, the tall one: with a turn of the wrist you fuck anyone you want: your desires know no social barriers; you can go all the way to the throne, and the proudest beauties, forced to yield, give you whatever you ask."

The book does not want for style, most evident in portraits of apparently pious churchmen; but when it comes to sex everything is not only highly explicit but vulgarly blunt. Where some erotic novels resort to sometimes playful euphemisms, here it is just cunt, prick, fuck:

always the crude word; even the women say "Let's fuck" rather than something more delicate or roundabout. There are just enough mock-heroic metaphors to suggest a tongue-in-cheek approach to it all, such as the moment when Saturnin is caught with Nicole behind a locked door:

I said to Nicole that, since we had been discovered, there was no reason to hesitate. She approved this courageous resolution by her silence and, herself giving me an initial thrust of her loins and putting her tongue back into my mouth, challenged me to rise to the occasion. And like proud warriors who in the line of fire, defying deadly artillery aimed at them on a rampart, calmly continue their work and laugh at the harmless sound of the canon fire roaring overhead, we labored intrepidly to the sound of Françoise pounding against the partition.

Eight years later, in Part Two, when he has finished his training and is about to be ordained, Saturnin is initiated into the orgiastic rituals of his Benedictine monastery. Despite his name, Bougre is not attracted to men, though he delivers a limited apology of buggery: "everyone takes his pleasure where he finds it; mine is to empale a woman when I see one; but if a handsome lad appears, should I give him a foot in the butt? No, simpleton: a dick in the butt." Still, the only bugger explicitly mentioned is Father Casimir, of whom it is said that when he saw a handsome lad he "went into rut and whinnied." Saturnin learns that there are not one but two circles of debachery in the monastery, supplied with their own pool of women, not to mention plenty of fine food and wine. One, who invites him to mount her, admits to being his very own and still active mother, but he will not go that far. He is also the beneficiary of disculpatory speeches not only about Biblical precedents for incest, but more generally the desirability of providing ample sexual opportunities within the monastery, the better to maintain an edifying appearance austerly without.

Ultimately, Saturnin becomes so sated that he is unable to perform even when surrounded by lewd women. It is then that the elderly Father Simeon tells him of the joys of seducing sweet, pious women from his privileged position in the confessional. Indeed he quickly identifies a target, a most devout young woman who absolutely throws herself at him: she turns out to be Monique. But just as, having taken his private pleasures with her, he is about to add her to the monastic harem, he is discovered, and expelled. In Paris, he is picked up by a prostitute who turns out to be Suzon; from her he contracts syphilis, during the treatment for which she dies and he is castrated. In this sorry state he appeals to a Charterhouse which takes him in and makes him its porter, whence the book's title.

Although inherently anticlerical or at least antimonastic, with its numerous unrepentant stagings of orgies in convents (Saturnin refers to monks as "sacred hogs, abundantly fed by the piety of the faithful"), the book has no ostensible religious or philosophical posture. Its single driving argument is for the naturalness and joy of orgasm and everything conducive to or associated with it. This motivation is equal among men and women, who live for virtually nothing else, without the slightest sentimental overlay. As Monique says: "when they say 'Monsieur is in love with Madame,' it's exactly as if they had said 'Monsieur saw Madame; the sight of her aroused desire in his heart, and he can't wait to stick his prick in her cunt.' That is the true meaning of the phrase: but since as decorum would have it, such things not be said, the custom is to say 'Monsieur is in love.'"

Biography

The only three things we know about Gervaise de Latouche—that he was born in Amiens in 1716, that he was a secretary of the barrister Lambotte, and that he was one of the prime suspects for authorship of the Histoire de Dom Bougre, portier des Chartreux—all come from police files. He was not among the dozen colporteurs or possible authors who were sent to the Bastille for some weeks or months in 1741 as the police tried to track down the culprits and quash the book, perhaps because he had a discreet and powerful protector.

PHILIP STEWART

Editions

*Histoire de Dom B*** portier des chartreux, écrite par lui-même.* Montréal, Quintal Associés. 1969.

Histoire de Dom Bougre, portier des chartreux. Paris: Fayard. "L'Enfer de la Bibliothèque Nationale," t. III, 1985.

Romanciers libertins du XVIIIe siècle. Dir. Patrick Wald Lasowski. Paris, Bibliothèque de la Pléiade, 2000, t. I.

Le Portier des Chartreux. Arles: Actes Sud, 1993.

Translations

Patrick Kearney (The Private Case, London: Jay Landerman, 1981, p. 193) lists a translation entitled The History of Don B. and dated 1743, of which there is no known copy; also The Life and Adventures of Silas Shovewell, London, 1801 and 1907. An abridged translation by Howard Nelson was published in 1967 under the title The Adventures of Father Silas (Le Portier des Chartreux) by Beauregard de Farniente (!) (Los Angeles: Holloway House), and later under the title The Lascivious Monk (London: W. H. Allen, 1970).

Further Reading

Clerval, Alain. notices in the Pléiade edition listed above, pp. 1104–1120.

---

GHAZALI, MEHEMMED

---

Turkish poet
c. 1460–1535

Ghazali was the pen name of a certain Mehemed, who was also known as Deli Bira-der [Crazy Brother] among the Turkish learned circles of the early sixteenth-century Ottoman Empire. There is little information about this Ottoman poet's youth but he was probably born around 1465 in Bursa, in the northwest of what is today Turkey. He was educated in religion in Istanbul, the educational center of the time. He taught in several Anatolian institutions of higher education, and he later attended the court of Sultan Bayezid II's son, the crown prince Korkud (1467–1513), in the provincial town of Manisa in western Anatolia. There he composed two works commissioned by Korkud's courtier Piyale Bey. When Prince Korkud was executed on the orders of his brother Selim I, Ghazali was assigned to a dervish lodge in his birthplace, Bursa, though he left this post to return to teaching. Upon retirement, he organized a fund-raising campaign in which he wrote panegyric poems for different patrons, using the money to found a mosque, a dervish lodge, a garden, and a bathhouse in Beshiktash, a small suburban district of Istanbul. Ghazali's bathhouse was most probably designed to serve sailors, since the Empire's naval forces were anchored on the shores of this neighborhood.

During the peak of his fame, Ghazali enjoyed the patronage of the state elite, among them the Grand Vizier Makbul Ibrahim Pasha and the bureaucrat Iskender Çelebi. In his later years, the gatherings in his bathhouse created an uproar in Istanbul, and eventually gossip about Ghazali and Memi Shah, a male attendant in the bathhouse, forced Ghazali to move to Mecca in 1531. Once in Mecca, using money he had raised through a second 'poetry campaign,' Ghazali founded a mesjid and a garden. Not long after, Ghazali died in the Holy City circa 1535, when he was approximately 70 years old.

Ghazali authored the first Ottoman Turkish literary composition on sexuality. Publicly suppressed and privately reproduced for centuries, this prose composition, embellished with several passages in verse, was presented to the aforementioned Piyale Bey. The work, titled Dâfi'ü'l-gumûm ve râfi'ü'l-humûm [Repeller of sorrows and remover of anxiety], is a mock sex manual. It classifies several illicit sexual practices grouped in seven chapters, the titles of which read as follows: (1) The benefits of marriage and sexual intercourse; (2) The war between the pederasts and the fornicators; (3) How to enjoy the company of boys; (4) How to enjoy the company of girls; (5) Masturbation, nocturnal emissions and bestiality; (6) The passive homosexuals; and (7) The pimps.

Dâfi'ü'l-gumûm ve râfi'ü'l-humûm was intended for the all-male learned circles of the sixteenth-century Ottoman Empire. Throughout the work, constant reminders of the illicit character of the sexual practices described are balanced with Ghazali's inclination to tickle the sexual passion of its readers. The titillating character of the work becomes apparent in the detailed depictions of sexual organs in the form of longish odes; the painstaking directions on how to seduce boys or girls; descriptions of the sexual positions, which yield maximum pleasure; and other such subjects. The alternation of funny stories and poems of mockery adds to the playfulness of this sexually impulsive work. In Dâfi'ü'l-gumûm ve râfi'ü'l-humûm, the conspicuous misogyny underpins the general pederastic discourse prevalent among the learned men in the Ottoman Empire. In this work, boys figure as the most prominent objects of sexual desire, primarily for reasons of accessibility—while women were excluded from the exclusively masculine public space of the sixteenth-century Ottoman Empire, boys moved freely in this public sphere. Short anecdotes, poems, and stories exploring pederasty all focus on sexual pleasure, and on ways of tricking unassuming boys into sexual acts, whereas the sections on adultery bear messages of caution, highlighting the discourse of 'the wiles of women.'

Here is an example of an erotic verse from the Dâfi'ü'l-gumûm ve râfi'ü'l-humûm:

With a glance the beloved roasted the bird of heart you won't even eat it, the poor pigeon
 Seeing the beloved it tumbles up to the sky
 So that he would be attracted to the pigeon
 O Gazali, the fire of your words burned its wings
 It can't carry the message to the beloved, the pigeon

In this three-verse lyric poem, the pigeon symbolizes the lover's heart, his sexual organ, and a messenger between the lover and the beloved respectively. However, the straightforward nature of the following selection that contains a comparison of vagina and anus from the same work is in stark contrast to the playfulness of the preceding one:

True, the pussy vomits blood once a month
 But the anus always shits from its mouth
 True, the pussy widens when it delivers
 But any boy's anus with shit shivers.

While Dâfi'ü'l-gumûm refers to and relies on works in Arabic, Persian, and Turkish, and is referred to and quoted by subsequent Ottoman Turkish works, there is nothing comparable to it in the Ottoman Turkish literary tradition.

GIDE, ANDRÉ

Of course, this apparent uniqueness may reflect the reductive modernist reconstruction of the Ottoman literary canon, which suppresses works of this character.

Apart from this forgotten text, Ghazali composed a religious treatise in verse. In a letter written while in Mecca to friends in Istanbul, Ghazali addresses them one by one, and mocks them jokingly, using sexual metaphors. This unruly Ottoman poet stands out among his contemporaries with his command of Ottoman Turkish prose and poetry, and his composition of a work, Dâfi'ü'l-gumûm, that gives expression to the suppressed erotic voice in this particular early modern tradition (see Turkish Literature).

Biography

Born in Bursa, Turkey, c. 1460. Educated as a religious scholar in Istanbul. Taught in various Anatolian educational institutions and attended the court of the crown prince Korkud, [1510s?]. Upon retirement, moved to Istanbul and constructed a mosque, a bathhouse, and a dervish lodge; relocated to Mecca in 1531 upon rumors of impropriety; died there in 1535.

SELIM S. KURU

---

GIDE, ANDRÉ

---

1869–1951

French novelist. Nobel Prize in Literature (1948)

André Pul Guillaume Gide described himself as being simultaneously like a young boy having fun and a disapproving Protestant minister. This duality is found in many of his individual works (e.g., Les nourritures terrestres [Fruits of the Earth], 1897, expressing the symbiosis of sensuality and asceticism in lyrical prose) and in his literary output as a whole. In Si le grain ne meurt...[If It Die...] (1920) he records, among other details of his early life, his idealized love for his cousin Madeleine Rondeaux. He declared that she was the heavenly pole of his life, the antithesis to which was his own erotic Hell. This conflict informs the background to L'Immoraliste [The Immoralist] (1902), paired with La porte étroite [Straight is the Gate] (1909). Furthermore, Si le grain ne meurt... contains a description of his sexual liberation in North Africa, recording an encounter with an Arab youth in the dunes (1894) and visits with Oscar Wilde and Lord Alfred Douglas to a sordid male brothel (1895). This autobiography, which stops short at his marriage, is designed as a 'private' confession to run parallel to the public argument in defence of pederasty put forth in

Corydon (first, incomplete and limited edition, 1911; first full public edition, 1924). In Corydon, a series of four 'Socratic' dialogues, a homosexual doctor argues from the biological, ethical, and historical (mainly ancient Greek) standpoints that same-sex love, here restricted to male adult and adolescent, is not only natural but is in fact desirable. When it is controlled and does not entail excess, it is respectful of the masculine selfhood of each participant, reveres women, and, in the case of the youth, leads to successful marriage. The book denies that there is any truth in the then current medical model of 'moral disease,' takes issue with the feminization of the homosexual allegedly portrayed in Proust's À la recherche du temps perdu, and challenges the widespread hypocrisy and cowardice Gide saw among his contemporaries. Doubtless from his awareness of his own sexual nonconformity Gide developed a parallel interest in criminality and moral anarchy. These elements are also frequently present in his works, being used to orchestrate the irresolvable conflict between desire and self control, Nature and Culture, duty to the self and duty to society, freedom and repression. Seldom far removed from the theme of sexuality is the closely associated idea of education, this being again an element inherited from the tradition of pederastic Greek love. An allusive example of this occurs in the play Philoctète (1899). Here the young Néoptolème is being taught the virtue of self reliance by the hero Philoctète, and, although there is nothing sexually explicit, there was enough to encourage Gide's friend Paul Valéry to half expect the youth would in due course be seduced. There are noteworthy homosexual elements in another of his plays of this period (Saül, 1903), but the case for including Le roi Candale (1899) is problematic. L'Immoraliste tells in confessional form the story of Michel who follows the path from sickness to health, from constraint to freedom, from sexual repression to the acknowledgement of desire. The book contains the portrait of an Outsider, Ménélaque, who has been ostracized by society and who was modeled partly on Oscar Wilde and partly on a close friend, Eugène Rouart. But more significantly Gide makes the link between nonconformity in general and healthy self knowledge. Michel is attracted to Arab youths, and the description of them is suggestive: indeed the text ends by expressing the thought that even after an affair with a local girl he finds her brother more attractive. The 'drama' of Michel's life is exacerbated by the love he bears his wife which is in conflict with his half-expressed desires and hope for freedom. As a contribution to the novels of the time with more or less overt homosexual themes L'Immoraliste, with its Nietzschean title, is among the best, allowing the moral issues it raises to transcend the particular nature of the hero's sexuality. More obviously subversive and outrageous are certain elements in Les caves du Vatican [The Vatican Cellars] (1914), where the youthful Lafcadio appears naked (in a photo), and receives an education from various uncles (friends of his mother's), some of whose attentions are ambiguous and 'comradely,' to borrow Walt Whitman's term. Lafcadio is urged by the arch-criminal Protos to use his good looks to blackmail his male admirers. The book contains innuendoes on a priest's liking for boys, which so offended the Catholic writer Paul Claudel that he broke off his friendship with Gide. On the whole, however, this is a burlesque story where suggestiveness forms only one strand of a complex web of anarchy. Les faux monnayeurs [The Coiners] (1926), originally conceived as a sequel to Les caves du Vatican, expresses a more mature and comprehensive treatment of sexual relationships than its antecedent. The hero of the book, the novelist Édouard, is in love with Olivier, the close school friend of Bernard. A range of emotional situations is presented, and the feelings of both boy and adult are explored from subjective points of view. Apprehensive uncertainty that one's feelings may not be reciprocated is followed by episodes where Olivier deserts Édouard for Passavant (a rival, rather camp, author), and Bernard replaces him momentarily. The reconciliation and mutual declaration of Édouard's and Olivier's love is effected after the young man's suicide attempt on the brink of happiness (a Dostoievskian motif). Gide's achievement here is not to have written a gay novel, but to have explicitly presented a major homosexual subject in an innovative work about society, its complexity, and its open-ended eventfulness. A lesbian theme appears in Geneviève (1936), a novella forming part of the trilogy L'École des femmes [The School for Wives]. Taking the form of a schoolgirl's infatuation, the episode in question bears witness to Gide's intention to explore a woman's point of view under the influence of a group of feminist English friends who included Dorothy Bussy, author of the novel Olivia (sent to Gide in manuscript in 1933, but only published in 1948), which develops a similar story. In 1946, Thésée, a burlesque prose narrative, appeared, describing in a mythological and symbolic form the course of Gide's life. Although the hero Thésée declares himself to be uniquely interested in women, including the famous Phaedra, and Ariadne who is shown here as a nymphomaniac, the book includes a description of Cretan homosexual customs which are worked into the plot structure. Gide asserted that an understanding of his pederasty held the key to many of his writings. Overall, his treatment of erotic episodes and themes is suggestive, rather than explicit (the recent French editions of his Journal and Si le grain ne meurt have nevertheless published previously omitted material). He is careful to relate sexuality to more general issues of behavior, although this does not prevent him from often celebrating in various forms the joys and delights of same-sex relationships between adult and adolescent.

Biography

Born 22 November 1869 in Paris. 1877, enrolled briefly at the École Alsacienne (Paris), but was expelled for 'bad habits.' His education was thenceforward disrupted. He returned to the École Alsacienne in 1887 (Rhétorique). 1880 (28 October), death of father. 1888, Lycée Henri IV (Philosophie). 1891 (January), first substantial publication: Les cahiers d'André Walter, and (December) first met Oscar Wilde in Paris. 1892, rejected for military service on grounds of health (tuberculosis). 1895, death of mother and marriage to his cousin Madeleine Rondeaux. 1916, significant religious crisis (Numquid et tu... ?), the beginning of his love for Marc Allégret, the son of a Protestant minister, close friend of the family. 1918, traveled to Cambridge with Marc, finding on his return that his wife had burned all his letters to her. 1923 (18 April), birth of Catherine, daughter of Gide and Elisabeth van Rysselberghe (adopted after the death of Madeleine Gide). 1932, Gide became increasingly involved in Communist activity, culminating in his visit to the USSR (1936). He published his travelogue (Retour de l'URSS, 1936) and further criticisms (Retouches..., 1937). 1938 (7 April), death of his wife. 1947 (5 June), was awarded an honorary doctorate at Oxford University, and (13 November) the Nobel Prize for Literature. 1951 (19 February), died in Paris. Buried at Cuverville (Normandy), his friends objecting that a Protestant minister had conducted a religious service over him. 1952 (24 May), his complete works were placed on the Index librorum prohibitorum by the Catholic Church.

GIDE, ANDRÉ

PATRICK POLLARD

Selected Works

- Essais critiques*. Edited by P. Masson. Paris: Bibliothèque de la Pléiade, 1999.
- Journal 1887–1950*. Edited by E. Marty and M. Sagaert. Paris: Bibliothèque de la Pléiade, 1996–1997.
- Romans, Récits et Soties. Œuvres lyriques*. Edited by Y. Davet and J.J. Thierry. Paris: Bibliothèque de la Pléiade, 1961.
- Souvenirs et Voyages*. Edited by Pierre Masson. Paris: Bibliothèque de la Pléiade, 2001.
- (1897 Les Nourritures terrestres). Fruits of the Earth. translated by Dorothy Bussy (1949).
- (1902 L'Immoraliste). The Immoralist. Translated by Dorothy Bussy (1930).
- (1903 Prétextes). Pretexts. Reflections on Literature and Morality... selected by Justin O'Brien. (1949).
- (1909 La Porte Étroite). Straight is the Gate. Translated by Dorothy Bussy (1924).
- (1914 Les Caves du Vatican). The Vatican Swindle [aka The Vatican Cellars]. Translated by Dorothy Bussy (1927).
- (1919 La Symphonie Pastorale). Two Symphonies... Translated by Dorothy Bussy (1931).
- (1920–1921 Si le grain ne meurt...). If it dies... Translated by Dorothy Bussy (1935).
- (1923 Dostoïevski). Dostoevsky. Translated [anon.] (1925).
- (1924 Corydon). Corydon. Translated by Richard Howard (1983).
- (1926 Les Faux-Monnayeurs). The Counterfeiters [aka The Coiners]. Translated by Dorothy Bussy (1927).
- (1927 Voyage au Congo). Travels in the Congo. translated by Dorothy Bussy (1929).
- (1931 Œdipe and 1946 Thésée). Two Legends, Theseus and Oedipus. Translated by John Russell (1950).
- (1932–1954 Journal). The Journals. Translated by Justin O'Brien (1947–1951).
- (1936 Retour de l'URSS). Back from the USSR. Translated by Dorothy Bussy (1937).
- (1952 Ainsi soit-il ou les jeux sont faits). So Be It; or, The Chips are Down. Translated by Justin O'Brien (1960).

Further Reading

- Brée, G. André Gide, l'insaisissable Protée. Paris: Les Belles Lettres, 1953.
- Copley, A. Sexual Moralities in France (1780–1980). London: Routledge, 1989.
- Delay, J. La Jeunesse d'André Gide (1869–1895). Paris: Gallimard, 1956–1957.
- Goulet, A. Fiction et vie sociale dans l'œuvre d'André Gide. Paris: Minard, 1986.
- Martin, C. André Gide ou la vocation du bonheur (1869–1911). Paris: Fayard, 1998.
- Pollard, P. André Gide: Homosexual Moralist. New Haven: 1991.
- Robinson, C. Scandal in the Ink. London: Cassell, 1995.
- Savage, C. André Gide. L'Évolution de sa pensée religieuse. Paris: Nizet, 1962.
- Sheridan, A. André Gide. A Life in the Present. London: Hamish Hamilton, 1998.
- Stambolian, G. and Marks, E. Homosexualities and French Literature. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1979.
- Walker, D. André Gide. London: Macmillan, 1990.
- Martin, C. Bibliographie des livres consacrés à André Gide 1918–1995. Lyon: Centre d'Études gidiennes, 1995.
- Savage-Brosman, C. An Annotated Bibliography of Criticism on André Gide 1973–1988. New York: Garland, 1990.

---

GILGAMESH

---

The longest and best known work in Mesopotamian literature was based on oral and written narratives concerning Gilgamesh, the king of Uruk. The standard version of the epic was discovered in the library at Nineveh (eighth–seventh centuries BCE). It incorporates some but not all known Sumerian Gilgamesh stories, episodes from the Old Babylonian version from the early second millennium, and completely new material. The colophon mentions the authorship of a scribe called Sin-leqqe-unini, a scholar who lived during the Kassite period, around 1500 BCE. The work is not primarily an erotic novel. The main theme is the problem of death and dying and the quest for immortality. It deals with heroism and kingship and the values of Mesopotamia's urban civilization. However, episodes describing sexual encounters and the ambiguous love between Gilgamesh and Enkidu raise fundamental and subtle questions about eroticism and human relationships. There is now a vast secondary literature about the epic, and numerous translations in different modern languages have appeared. The following summary inevitably reveals my own subjective understanding of the original text which is fragmentary in many places and thus still poses many unresolved difficulties of interpretation. Gilgamesh as introduced in prologue, is two-thirds divine (his mother is the goddess Ninsun) and one-third mortal. His vitality is likened to that of a rampant bull who gives no rest to the young men and women of Uruk. The gods answer the complaints of the people by specially creating a being that will match his ardour. This is Enkidu, shaggy-haired and wild, who lives far from the cultivated plains in the semi-desert. He eats and drinks like the beasts and destroys the traps of the hunter. He is thus described as the antithesis to Gilgamesh, who as king of the ancient city of Uruk, represents the values of urban civilization. The king hears about Enkidu and rather than sending a group of young warriors he dispatches Shamhat, the voluptuous one, a courtesan, to meet the beast-like creature. She lies down uncovered, opens her legs and is encouraged to take wind of him, to do for him, the primitive man, as women do. Their love-making lasts for six days and seven nights and thereafter the wild animals turn away from Enkidu and he has lost the power of his legs to run as before. He realizes that he has been transformed and the courtesan takes him to the city, where Gilgamesh is perfect in strength which arouses Enkidu's desire to challenge him. Shamhat tries to modify his aggression towards Gilgamesh by revealing to him two dreams which Gilgamesh recounted to his mother who interpreted their meaning for him. Both dreams involve an object falling from the sky which he is unable to lift but which he loves as a wife and treats as equal. In both cases the word for the object can be construed as a pun referring to male and to certain cult personnel attached to Ishtar who may have had connotations with ambiguous sexuality. Shamhat reiterates Ninsun's interpretation that Gilgamesh is about to gain a male friend and advisor, a companion in strength, and that they will love one another. Enkidu completes his transformation by drinking beer and eating bread for the first time, having his hair cut and donning clothes. When he finally meets Gilgamesh, barring his way to father-in-law's house (where presumably Gilgamesh intends to claim his droit de seigneur), he bars his way and they wrestle in the public square until the doorframe quake. The text becomes broken here and when it resumes the two protagonists acknowledge each other's strength and qualities and seal their friendship with an embrace. Enkidu weeps, and again a gap on the tablet obscures why. The text then describes their first adventure, to cut down cedar trees in a forest sacred to the god Ellil. They succeed, having killed the guardian spirit monster Huwawa, and return triumphant to Uruk. The next episode concerns Gilgamesh and his relationship with the city-goddess Ishtar, who in Sumerian literature was described as the one whose love legitimized and blessed the ruler of the city. In the epic Ishtar's proposal of marriage is rudely rejected by Gilgamesh who recounts the miserable fate of her human and animal ex-lovers and expresses his fear that he would be treated in the same way. The goddess vows revenge but Gilgamesh and Enkidu kill the Bull of Heaven sent to destroy them. The heroes return to the palace where they lie down to sleep. Enkidu dreams that the gods had decided to punish him for the slaying of their creatures and that he will die. The dying Enkidu curses the huntsman and courtesan for bringing him to Uruk. She shall suffer deprivation and humiliation, to be slapped by drunkards and suffer homelessness. But he relents when he remembers that she had brought him to Gilgamesh and he blesses her instead, that she should grow wealthy and prominent in society, with husbands leaving their wives for her sake. Enkidu dies and the grief-stricken Gilgamesh leaves his city and begins his quest for Utnapishtim, the survivor of the great flood, to ask him how he obtained eternal life. The story then unfolds, incorporating numerous adventures as well as the flood-narrative. Gilgamesh realizes that human destiny is death and returns to his city, where he inspects the ramparts and orders his story to be written on copper tablets, thus securing another kind of immortality.

GILGAMESH

The erotic content of Gilgamesh, apart from the initial seduction of Enkidu, is marked by ambivalence. The homo-erotic tenor of Gilgamesh's love for Enkidu as communicated by the dreams and is more complex if one considers that Gilgamesh takes on the role traditionally held by female personages who marry the outsider or steppe dweller. The eroticized notion of the Other is here projected onto Enkidu, but their own identities undergo a profound transformation in the process. In the Sumerian narratives, the female representative of urban civilization brings about the assimilation of the outsider. Here, the value system of the steppe clashes with that of urbanism—Gilgamesh rejects Ishtar and turns himself into a creature of the wilderness in his quest for knowledge.

His failure to find the answer opens up the possibility of return to Uruk where he will complete his destiny on earth.

GWENDOLYN LEICK

Editions

- Parpola, Simo, with the assistance of Mikko Luukko and Kalle Fabritius. The Standard Babylonian Epic of Gilgamesh: Cuneiform Text, Transliteration, Glossary, Indices and Sign List, Helsinki: Neo-Assyrian Text Corpus Project, 1997.
- George, Andrew. The Epic of Gilgamesh. Harmondsworth: Penguin Classics, 2003.
- George, Andrew. Kalle Fabritius The Babylonian Gilgamesh Epic: Introduction, Critical Edition and Cuneiform Texts. 2 vols. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2003.

Translations

- Bottéro, Jean. L'épopée de Gilgames: le grand homme qui ne voulait pas mourir. Paris: Gallimard, 1992.
- Dalley, Stephanie. Myths from Mesopotamia. Oxford, New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Ferry, David. Gilgamesh: A New Rendering in English Verse. Newcastle upon Tyne: Bloodaxe Books, 1993.
- Foster, Benjamin. The Epic of Gilgamesh: A New Translation, Analogues, Criticism. New York: Norton, 2001.
- George, Andrew. The Epic of Gilgamesh. The Babylonian Epic Poem and Other Texts in Akkadian and Sumerian. Harmondsworth: Allen Lane, 1999.
- Kovacs, Maureen Gallery. The Epic of Gilgamesh. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1989.
- Jackson, Danny P. The Epic of Gilgamesh. Verse rendition (Introduction by Robert D. Biggs). Wauconda, IL: Bolchazy-Carducci Publishers, 1992.

Further Reading

- Harris, Rivkah. Gender and Aging in Mesopotamia: The Gilgamesh Epic and Other Ancient Literature. Norman, OK: University of Oklahoma Press, 2000.
- Leick, Gwendolyn. Sex and Eroticism in Mesopotamian Literature. London and New York: Routledge, 1994.
- Maier, John. Gilgamesh: A Reader. Wauconda, IL: Bolchazy-Carducci, 1997.
- Tigay, Jeffrey H. The Evolution of the Gilgamesh Epic. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1982.

---

GIMFERRER, PEDRO

---

1945–

Spanish poet, novelist, essayist

The underlying poetics to all of Pedro Gimferrer's writings is the centrality given to language. For Gimferrer, literature is primarily an act of language, something that is created solely by language; consequently its only reality is linguistic. Contextual approaches to literature fail if they dismiss the importance of language. Thus the reader can understand his preference for writers whose devotion towards language is paramount, as well as his interest in literary movements that ascribe a central role to language, like Surrealism, or authors such as Lautréamont, Arthur Rimbaud, or Stéphane Mallarmé. Gimferrer's poetry is marked by the mentioned writers and movement, while at the same time shows its concern for decadent scenarios as can be read in Arde el mar [Sea Burning] (1966) or for the cinema in La muerte en Beverly Hills [Death in Beverly Hills] (1968). It can be perceived that his is an attempt to create a reality independent from everyday reality, based on an artistic past or on cinema. That is the reason why his journal, Dietari, does not contain any reference to himself but to the books he kept reading during those years.

Eroticism in Gimferrer's writings is present as a central theme and also as subordinate or supplementary. Sometimes it pervades the atmosphere that the poem creates, but in others it plays an active part. There are two different approaches to eroticism. In poems of an early period of his career, decadence rules over ambience, characters, and actions. Thus, it is a soft eroticism that is present as for example in "Oda a Venecia ante el mar de los teatros" [Ode to Venice before the sea of the theaters], it is easy to perceive that the ambient is charged of decadence and that the mention to the naked or dead body in line 19 intends to be part of the decorative setting of a poem in which the main subject matter is that of the remembrance and the loss of youth. "Cuchillos en abril" [Knives in April] also presents some features of a very soft and delicate eroticism in which the poet declares his hatred by adolescents because of the physical distance between them. The loss of youth means also the loss of passion and the physical decay that the poet feels and makes him grow angry against young people.

Later on, in La muerte en Beverly Hills, there is a slight change and decadence is not that of fin-de-siècle, but the golden age of American cinema already vanished by the 1960s. Eroticism is present fragmentarily. It is desire that moves the narrator and creates a series of hallucinated images, some of them erotic, as I have said, with no relation to reality. There can be found female bodies stripped of their psychological features, since only physical indications are to be read in the poems. These bodily characteristics reinforce the impression of femme fatales, as were imagined when seen in films (see poem II). Eroticism in the book is linked to the loss of a paradise, that of adolescence, as can be seen in poem IV, and that of cinema, since for Gimferrer and other writers of his generation, cinema was so important that during some years they thought of the prevalence of cinema over literature.

Nonetheless, these are lesser examples of his erotic poetry. The other erotic current present in his poetry has to do with unconventional sex. In 1976, Gimferrer publishes L'espai desert [Desert Space] in which sexuality is present in unconventional forms. He acknowledges the subtle and indirect importance of William Butler Yeats's poem "Crazy Jane Talks with the Bishop": "But love has pitched his mansion in / the place of excrement." Soft eroticism has turned into something less exquisite. Desire has left its place to unconscious impulses of death. In Mascarada [Masquerade], section 37, Gimferrer describes an act of coprophilia. He is describing a teenager's buttocks. There is a gap between the vulgar action and its exquisite description. El callejón de la guardia prusiana [The Backstreet of the Prussian Guard] is no doubt his best erotic text. It is a short novel written in 1969 but not published until 2001. The novella is a catalogue of unconventional sexual practices such as coprophilia in the first chapter or masochism (Chapter 4), plus homosexuality (Chapter 6) during an uncertain early twentieth century in Middle Europe.

In general, eroticism is bound on the unconventional, as is Gimferrer's poetics and life. His clear preference for Surrealism, both in literature and life, makes him explore the dark side of sexuality. He moves from decadent eroticism towards hard porn, though always described by means of a literary language that can lessen its disgusting facets. The dissociation that the poet perceives between his self and society, and its consequent rebellion, is not expressed in political terms, but in terms of social costumes. Thus, the prevalence of unconventional sexual practices is the reflection of the poet's rebellion, different from the Romantics, though inspired by them and by the ideas of the early twentieth century, that is, by Surrealism and Sigmund Freud's essays on culture and sex.

Biography

Born in 1945 in Barcelona, Pedro Gimferrer stands as the most gifted and important poet of the generation of 1970s, and the one who brought new life to Spanish poetry in the late 1960s. In 1969, he quit writing in Spanish in favor of his native Catalan. His activity as a reviewer, editor, and poet marked the path that Spanish poetry was to follow in the 1970s. Besides, he has written articles for journals, collected in Dietari 1979–1980 (1981), [Accounts book], two novels, Fortuny (1983) and El callejón de la guardia prusiana (1999) [The Backstreet of the Prussian Guard] and a number of essays, La poesía de J.V. Foix [J.V. Foix's poetry] (1974), Radicalidades [Radicalities] (1978), Lecturas de Octavio Paz [Readings on Octavio Paz] (1980), Perfil de Vicente Alexandre [Profile of Vicente Aleixandre] (1985), Cine y literatura [Cinema and literature] (1985), among them. Nonetheless he is better known for his poetry.

SANTIAGO RODRÍGUEZ GUERRERO-STRACHAN

Selected Works

Arde el mar [Sea burning]. 1966.
La muerte en Beverly Hills [Death in Beverly Hills]. 1968.
Poemas 1963–1969 [Poems 1963–1969]. 1969.
Els miralls [Mirrors]. 1970.
Hora fosca [Dark hour]. 1972.

Foc cec [Blind fire]. 1973.
L'espai desert [Desert space]. 1977.
El vendaval [Gale]. 1988.
La llum [The Light]. 1990.
Mascarada [Masquerade]. 1998.

Further Reading

- Amorós, Amparo. "La retórica del silencio," Los cuernos del norte. 16 (1982): 18–27.
 Barella, Julia. "Pedro Gimferrer: poesía en catalán." Peña Labra, 39 (1981): 17–22.
 Barella, Julia. "La reacción veneciana: poesía española en la década de los setenta." Estudios Humanísticos, 5 (1983): 69–76.
 ———. "Un paseo por el amor en venecia y por La muerte en Beverly Hills." Anthropos, 140 (1993): 50–54.
 Beltrán Pepió, Vicente. "Poética y estadística: nuevos y novísimos poetas españoles." Revista de literatura, 88 (1982): 123–141.
 Bou, Enric. "P.G. día a día: del escritor a la escritura." Anthropos, 140 (1993): 41–44.
 Busoño, Carlos. "Estudio preliminar a Guillermo Carnero." Ensayo de una teoría de la visión. Poesía 1966–1977. Madrid: Hiperión, 1983: 11–68.
 Carnero, Guillermo. "Culturalism and 'New' Poetry. A poem by Pedro Gimferrer: 'Cascabeles' from Arde el mar." in Andrew P. Debicki, (ed.) Quaderni di Letteratura Iberiche e Iberoamericane 11–12 (1992): 19–36.
 Castellet, José M. (ed.) Nueve Novísimos. Barcelona: Barral Editores, 1970.
 Castellet, José M. "Pere Gimferrer." Els escenaris de la memòria. Barcelona: Edició 62, 1988: 249–262.
 Debicki, Andrew P. "Una poesía española de la post-modernidad: los novísimos." Anales de literatura española contemporánea, 14 (1989): 33–50.
 Debicki, Andrew P., ed. Studies in 20th Century Literature. Contemporary Spanish Poetry: 1939–1990. 16 (1992).
 Debicki, Andrew P. "Arde el mar como índice y ejemplo de una nueva época poética." Anthropos, 140 (1993): 46–49.
 García de la Concha Víctor. "Primera etapa de un noísimos: Pedro Gimferrer, Arde el mar." Papeles de Son Armadans, 190 (1972): 45–61.
 Gracia, Jordi. "Introducción." in Pedro Gimferrer, Arde el mar. Madrid: Cátedra, 1997: 11–98.
 Jiménez, José Olivio. "Redescubrimiento de la poesía: Arde el mar de Pedro Gimferrer." in Diez años de poesía española 1960–1970. Madrid: Ínsula, 1972: 364–374.
 Lázaro Carreter, Fernando. "De Arde el mar a Exili." En Creació i crítica en la literatura catalana. Barcelona: Publicacions de la UB, 1993: 123–128.
 López, Ignacio Javier. "El olvido del habla: una reflexión sobre la escritura de la metapoética." Ínsula, 505 (1989): 17–18.
 Martínez Torrón, Diego. "La poesía de Pere Gimferrer (1963–1982)." in Estudios de literatura española. Barcelona: Anthropos, 1987: 451–474.
 Moral, Concepción G. y Pereda R.M., eds. Joven poesía española. Madrid: Cátedra, 1987.
Peña Labra, 62 (1986–1987).

Pritchett, Kay. ed. Four Postmodern Poets of Spain. A Critical Introduction with Translations of the Poems. Fayetteville: The University of Arkansas Press, 1991.
 Provencio, Pedro. Poéticas españolas contemporáneas. La generación del 70. Madrid: Hiperión, 1988.

Siles, Jaime. "Ultimísima poesía española escrita en castellano: rasgos distintivos de un discurso en proceso y ensayo de una posible sistematización." Iberoromania, 34 (1991): 8–31.

Talens, Jenaro. "Reflexiones en torno a la poesía última de Pedro Gimferrer." Ínsula, 304 (1972): 15.

---

GINSBERG, ALLEN

---

1926–1997
 American poet

Allen Ginsberg's many talents induced him to assume a variety of cultural roles in his lifetime, arguably more such roles than any other writer in the history of American literature. He was a social critic and scholar, a professor, a polemicist, an activist for both general and sexual politics, a religious and cultural guru, a literary critic, promoter, and publicist, a photographer, a counter-culture icon, a blues-pop-rock singer, a prosodist, and, of course, a poet. He began his career as a poet, and the other roles followed. His celebrity was such, however, that it rivaled and at times eclipsed his poetic achievements. This was in large part because his critical posture was not just insistently Left and anti-establishment, but also self-consciously transgressive. This synthesis informed his poetry and poetic theories, and frequently his poetry was the voice of his critique. In general, his stances were liberally to the Left of social norms, as they were in his satirizing polite "queer society" ("In Society," 1947), his lyricizing drugs and drug culture ("Paterson," 1949), his jeremiad against American materialism (Howl, 1955–1956), his parody of America's Red-scare, Cold War, homophobic, racist xenophobia ("America," 1956), his critique of the Vietnam War ("Wichita Vortex Sutra," 1966), his exorcism of nuclear reactors and waste ("Plutonian Ode," 1978), to say nothing of his paeans to bisexuality ("Love Poem on Theme by Whitman," 1954), homosexuality ("Love Comes," 1981) and various other "unnatural acts" over the years.

Ginsberg's transgressive stance persistently raised an interrogation of the individual's relation to the social order. Whether his theme was war, pollution, CIA drug dealing, governmental malfeasance, censorship, sex, history, or love, his address was essentially to the individual and collective state of being. This was articulated succinctly in his early poem, "Metaphysics": "This is the one and only / firmament; therefore / it is the absolute world. / The circle is complete. / I am living in Eternity. / The ways of this world / are the ways of heaven." Notwithstanding the occasional patina of Buddhist or transcendental mysticism, Ginsberg's vision is anchored in this dialectic of the ways heaven reflects this world, rather than the other way around. And the ways of this world are often down and dirty. Accordingly, a near systemic use of obscenity is one, perhaps the most pervasive, function of transgression in Ginsberg's work. In "Wichita Vortex Sutra," for example, a poem of high seriousness indicting the Vietnam War, the prologue declaims the need that a new "Man of America, be born," with "No more fear of tenderness" as manifest in an image of bisexual eroticism, which is abruptly emphasized by varying an old epithet, "How big is the prick of the President?" And two lines later he further satirizes one of the most conspicuously vigorous American chauvinists, J. Edgar Hoover, with a punning version of a phallic joke, "How little the prince of the FBI, unmarried all these years!" A few pages later in that same volume, The Fall of America, he proposes resolutions to the Vietnam War, environmental abuses, and racism not so much via obscenity as meticulously calculated vulgarity in four precise lines under the title "Kiss Ass," "Kissass is the Part of Peace / America will have to Kissass Mother Earth / Whites have to Kissass Blacks, for Peace and Pleasure, / Only Pathway to Peace, Kissass.” His inclusion of pleasure in so unlikely a venue is vintage Ginsberg, a satyric indication that even such noble causes as racial justice should not be all work and no play.

One aspect of Ginsberg’s jouissance, then, is the tactical deployment of more obscenity or less to vivify the appeal of his social critique, which often simultaneously functions as a validation of homosexuality. “America” is a paramount instance. In this raucous send-up Ginsberg brilliantly satirizes the paranoia of cold war chauvinism and concludes, “It’s true I don’t want to join the army or turn lathes in...factories, I’m nearsighted and psychopathic anyway. / America I’m putting my queer shoulder to the wheel.” In its adroit deconstruction by parody of normative assumptions about “perversity” and the good order of political economy this image is characteristic Ginsberg. Even where critique is not an object there is the frequent implication that celebrating hedonism is a political validation of it. In his 1974 song “Hardon Blues,” for example, he gets right in the reader’s face with his first line, “Blues is like a hardon comes right in your mouth,” winds on that motif for several choruses and concludes by widening his focus to include geriatrics, “If I don’t get it off right now, someday it’ll all be gone.” In Howl, madness and self destruction victimize a whole generation, caused by the cultural materialism symbolized in “Moloch.” Moloch’s dominance is countered by Neal Cassady, who has so “sweetened the snatches of a million girls trembling in the sunset” that the poem is essentially a tribute “to the memory of his innumerable lays of girls.” Be that as it may, the appeal of Moloch and madness is potent, so Ginsberg trains the tactical weapon of obscenity on both sexual politics and its cultural context.

For all of Ginsberg’s self conscious transgression of poetic and social norms, however, his work also has a distinctly erotic dimension, that is, one focused more on love than on obscenity. While Kaddish, his great lament for the death of his mother Naomi, is not erotic as such, it does imply via the degenerative state of his mother’s life a motif of cultural desexualization. Naomi’s madness subsumes her vitality, the sexual aspect of which is suggested by her youthful sensuous spontaneity, subsequently lost in her alienation from her husband. The motif of psychic confusion and sexual dysfunction is at once substantiated and dispatched in the poet’s brief moment of Oedipal temptation when in the hospital Naomi’s gown slips upward revealing her vagina. This image is obliquely erotic and contextualized by what is in general a tender elegiac tone. This stance is in fact characteristic of Ginsberg’s erotic works although it is also informed by sexual longing or activity. “The weight of the world,” Ginsberg observed early on, “is love.” After an invocation of this “burden” and its “solitude,” in which he evokes images of sex where “the hand moves / to the center / of the flesh... and the soul comes / joyful to the eye,” he concludes “yes, yes, / that’s what / I wanted, / I always wanted... / to return / to the body / where I was born.” Love, for Ginsberg, is indeed, as the saint says, on the arm. “Love Poem on Theme by Whitman” is an explicitly sexual poem evoking bisexual eroticism, and “Many Loves” is yet more elaborately explicit a reminiscence of Ginsberg’s initial seduction by and of Neal Cassady, a passion he sustained and declaimed for a lifetime. Other poems describe Ginsberg’s sexual relations with various, usually young men, and some similarly address his relations to his longtime lover Peter Orlovsky, and one, “This Form of Life Needs Sex” (1961), is an idiosyncratic apologia for his homosexuality. Perhaps his most famous erotic poem, “Please Master” (1968), is simultaneously an elegiac love poem to Cassady and a celebration of masochistic submission. As so often with Ginsberg, it accordingly confers a double legitimacy on “perverse” pleasure with its implicit wink at the straight world and its interrogation of “normal” pleasures.

Biography

Allen Ginsberg was born in Newark, New Jersey, the son of Louis—teacher and poet—and Naomi—a radical Russian emigree—Ginsberg, and both parents were to figure prominently in his work, especially his mother. The elder Ginsberg took the young Allen to neighboring Paterson and introduced him to William Carlos Williams, whose advice to leave off imitations of Renaissance poets and attend to the cadences of his own voice and ear became a touchstone for Ginsberg’s verse composition. Similarly, his early exposure to socialist thought and causes, which permeated his extended family, profoundly impressed him and became the intellectual foundation of his life and work. While still in primary school his mother's mental health began to deteriorate, and much of the trauma of her agonistic relation to capitalist culture is evoked in his epic poem, Kaddish, published in 1961. He matriculated to Columbia University in 1944, the same year he met William Burroughs and Jack Kerouac. He was expelled briefly from Columbia in 1945 for drawing obscene graffiti, a pertinent foreshadowing of later years. He returned to graduate in 1948. He had a good academic record, but perhaps obtained his most vital literary instruction from Burroughs, who introduced him to such writers as Kafka, Celine, Rimbaud, and Kerouac, who encouraged him further along the lines of the spontaneous composition Williams had earlier recommended.

There followed a period of odd jobs and drifting, during which he was a merchant seaman, a dishwasher, and welder among other things. He went to San Francisco in 1953 and was for a time a market researcher, at which he had some success. By 1954, he had again met up with Kerouac and Burroughs there and had in addition met Kenneth Rexroth, Robert Duncan, Gregory Corso, Gary Snyder, Michael McLure, and Lawrence Ferlinghetti. This group of friends and acquaintances became the core of the "San Francisco Renaissance," the "Beat Generation," and its writers. His public reading of Howl in San Francisco in 1955 at once inaugurated the Beat movement and stamped Ginsberg as its foremost figure. When Howl and Other Poems was published in 1956, it was sufficiently popular to warrant Ferlinghetti's City Lights Books' publication of a second edition, which was indicted for obscenity. The trial exonerated the poem, its author, and its publisher, but in its course made all three icons of the Beat Generation and the "counterculture" it reflected.

With the publication of Kaddish and Other Poems in 1961, Ginsberg had added two of the most important poems of the post-war or postmodern period to the canon of American literature. Acknowledgment was by no means uniform, as the taint of obscenity clung to his works and was enforced for many by the flamboyance of his personality (e.g., removing his trousers at a public reading of his works), his self-proclaimed homosexuality, his public apologies for hallucinogens, and his radical, confrontational style of politics. In addition to the two major works, by the end of the sixties Ginsberg had published Empty Mirror (1961), Reality Sandwiches (1963), and Planet News (1967), the latter two only slightly less popular than Howl and Kaddish. As the Vietnam war continued through the decade Ginsberg was a vocal critic and conspicuous protestor against it, most famously in Chicago during the 1968 Democratic convention.

By 1970, Ginsberg was an international celebrity and an index of countercultural potency. The Fall of America, Poems of these States was published in 1972, Allen Verbatim, interviews and conversations about poetics, politics, and such cultural institutions as the CIA's involvement in drug trafficking' in 1974, and Mind Breaths, Poems, 1977. After the United States withdrew from Vietnam in 1974, Ginsberg devoted considerable time and energy to the Jack Kerouac School of Disembodied Poetics that he had founded in conjunction with the Buddhist Naropa Institute in Colorado. He was its director for many years, and under his aegis many of his old Beat comrades—including Burroughs, Corso, Snyder, Ferlinghetti, and others—came to teach there on occasion. His Collected Poems were published in 1984, and subsequent poems appeared in White Shroud, 1986, and Cosmopolitan Greetings, 1994. He died April 5, 1997 in New York City at the age of 70. A National Day of Remembrance was held in 25 cities across the United States and around the world on April 13, 1997.

PETER MICHELSON

Selected Works

Collected Poems, 1947–1980. New York, 1984.
Selected Poems, 1947–1995. New York, 1996.

Further Reading

Breslin, James E. From Modern to Contemporary. Chicago, 1984.
Howard, Richard. "Allen Ginsberg." Alone with America. New York, 1980.
Hyde, Lewis, ed. On the Poetry of Allen Ginsberg. Ann Arbor, MI: 1984.

GODARD D'AUCOUR, CLAUDE

Kramer, Jane. Allen Ginsberg in America. New York, 1969.
Merrill, Thomas F. Allen Ginsberg. Revised edition. Boston, 1988.
Miles, Barry. Ginsberg: A Biography. New York, 1989.
Mottram, Eric. Allen Ginsberg in the Sixties. Brighton, England: Unicorn Bookshop, 1972.

Pearloff, Marjorie. Poetic License. Evanston, IL, 1990.
Portugese, Paul Cornel. The Visionary Poetics of Allen Ginsberg. Santa Barbara, CA, 1978.
Schumacher, Michael. Dharmation: A Biography of Allen Ginsberg. New York, 1992.

---

GODARD D'AUCOUR, CLAUDE

---

1716–1795

French novelist, satirist, playwright, and financier.

There is no known echo of Lettres au chevalier Danteuil et de Mademoiselle de Thelis (1742), or of d'Aucour's other early works. His Mémoires turcs of 1743, on the other hand, enjoyed some notoriety to which numerous subsequent editions testify. This novel is in some ways an imitation of Montesquieu's Lettres persanes (and of its imitations such as Poullain de Saint-Foix's Lettres d'une Turque à Paris), but clearly his model is even more Claude Crébillon, whose Le Sopha had appeared just the previous year. Composed in the form of a diptych (first the adventures of Dely, then the letters of Achmet), the novel features Muslim initiations into the loose sexual mores of Parisians, and other kinds of contrasts between amorous and religious ways of the Turks, Persians, and French. It is thus largely a piece of social satire, much of it directed at the Church and the clergy, none of which is particularly scintillating compared with d'Aucour's distinguished predecessors.

His only work that is at all remembered today is Thémidore, which was published clandestinely—that is, without authorization of the book police—in 1744. It is a fairly short novel, the witty story of a few months in the gamboling life of a handsome libertine magistrate (conseiller au Parlement) of twenty-four, and rife with allusions to contemporary Parisian life. Thémidore enjoys all the insolent privileges of rank, including that of having his enemies locked up when needed. The protagonist's dissolute behavior appeared on several counts to reflect that of the real Alexis Dubois d'Anisy, also a conseiller au Parlement, whose father, a powerful judge, had the police seize the book and send the bookseller, named Mérigot, off to a fortnight in prison.

These adventures (mainly amorous), which make no claim other than to entertain, are described at the outset as being written with discretion: in other words, crude language is always avoided in favor of metaphorical suggestion; but nevertheless “sometimes risqué and apt to provoke coquettish thoughts.” Nevertheless, “love” in this book never refers to anything other than sexual desire, and denotation of sexual activity is more explicit than anything one would find in Crébillon or Duclos. The emphasis is not on seduction but on variety and performative prowess; one variation on the lovers' virtuosity is to copulate through the grill of a convent parlor where Thémidore's father has had Rozette confined.

Less laden with hedonistic philosophizing than many other erotic novels, this one is notable for its unusually frank lyricism about sexual pleasure: “How often, amidst these delights one can only feel, did I wish to be consumed in what I was feeling! Why has nature limited our strength, while extending our desires so far? Or rather, why do they not come in equal proportion?” The protagonist has no principles, but also no doctrine.

There is, however, a sort of mechanistic theory at work. “You can make men do what you wish, once you have discovered the art of setting in motion certain springs that power their whole machine." Like other literary libertines in the wake of Versac (in Crébillon's Égarements du cœur et de l'esprit), Thémidore claims perfect knowledge of women and can therefore explain specific events through general rules: "Tears are contagious: if one woman weeps, another will too, as well as any others who happen along, ad infinitum." Even the pious have their particular sensual vulnerabilities (echoes of Marivaux's Le paysan parvenu and Crébillon's Le sophia); indeed Thémidore recommends devout women to any friend who is "sensual, delicate, and refined in his pleasures."

The text is rich in metaphors so graphic that they are almost not metaphorical at all: "She frolics with pleasure, but she holds it back as long as she can from its true destination: what an unusual taste, to prefer caressing a good fruit to squeezing out its juice!" Watching Laura play the flute, Rozette protests the "indecent" way it is done: "she objected to the tonguing, and insisted that a woman should never touch a flute in company." Indeed much of the book's humor, and good humor, lies in its frankly joyful metaphors: "We had promised each other to wait until that night; but unmindful of that, we borrowed against the future. She led me from one pleasure to another, and strewed with flowers the avenue to the palace, where I was received with full honors." One could almost call it a comic novel, such is the levity and gaiety that temper its licence.

Another notable feature of the work is the expectation of expertise on the woman's part. Rozette is technically accomplished and knows how to modulate her roles to maximize pleasure: "Rozette knew the map of my journey; she had seen me point to the spot where I intended to go, and had decided to provide me some entertainment along the way." It may be that some of her delaying tactics hint at the art of awaiting moments of infertility so as to limit her own exposure to risks of pregnancy. An original aspect of this skill is the erotic function of decor: the mirrors and violet sofa, not to mention the lace Rozette wears and the heady perfume filling her boudoir and, are integral parts of the sensual atmosphere, in this way foreshadowing Vivant Denon's Point de lendemain.

Biography

Claude Godard was the son of a cloth merchant and civic leader in Langres; he took the name d'Aucour from Jean Barbier d'Aucour, perhaps his uncle, a member of the Académie Française who had died in 1694. In his youth, determined to succeed as a writer, he produced a flurry of works in several genres, particularly plays and satires; but he did not pursue. In 1747 he made a rich marriage to Claire Poisson (distant cousin of Madame de Pompadour) and became a highly successful financier, trading at first in foodstuffs and military supply, and finally a Fermier Général (partner in the national tax franchise) in 1754. He was ennobled in 1756, and acquired the title of Marquis de Plancy in 1764. He joined a Masonic lodge in Paris called "Les Amis Réunis" in 1776 and managed somehow to survive the Revolution.

PHILIP STEWART

Selected Works

Mémoires turcs, avec l'histoire galante de leur séjour en France, 1743. Thémidore, 1744.

Editions

The original text of Thémidore is included in two anthologies: Romanciers libertins du XVIIIe siècle, edited by Raymond Trousson (Paris: Robert Laffont, 1993), and vol. I of the Pléiade edition by the same name, directed by Patrick Wald Lasowaki (Paris: Gallimard, 2000). The former, like a separate edition of 1980 (Paris: Lattès), bears a dubious subtitle, Mon histoire et celle de ma maîtresse, which is not found in editions prior to 1781.

Further Reading

Trousson, Raymond. introduction to Thémidore in Romans libertins du XVIIIe siècle. Paris: Robert Laffont, 1993.

Dictionnaire de biographie française. T. XVI (1985).

Dufrenoy, Marie-Louise. L'Orient romanesque en France 1704-1789. Montréal: Beauchemin, 1946.

---

GOMBROWICZ, WITOLD

---

1904–1969

Polish novelist and playwright

Pornografia

Gombrowicz's third novel, Pornografia [Pornography], was written in 1958 and published in 1960 by Kultura, Paris. It is representative of the intense eroticism without sex which permeates Gombrowicz's writing. In his preface to Pornografia, the author describes it as a "noble," "classical," "sensually metaphysical novel" (9). "Man, as we know, aims at the absolute. At fulfillment. At truth, at God, at total maturity (...) [In Pornografia] another of man's aims appears, a more secret one, undoubtedly, one which is in some way illegal: his need for the unfinished... for imperfection... for inferiority... for youth..." (5). This peculiar twist on Socrates' understanding of eros in Plato's Symposium is dressed in an absurdist plot and poetic imagery.

The action of Pornografia takes place in Poland, during World War II. Fryderyk and Witold, who before the war were men of theater and letters, are visiting acquaintances at a country estate. There they become fascinated with the teenagers Karol and Henia and, in particular, with the undeveloped potential for a sexual attraction between the two youths. Starving for creation, but deprived of their normal creative means, the two guests immediately recognize in the young people perfect material for molding and fall into a passionate fictionalizing of reality. They make the teenagers perform a series of symbolic acts that are supposed to rouse the latent erotic urge between them: from Henia's turning up Karol's trousers to performing an erotic pantomime designed for a single voyeur, Henia's official fiancée Waclaw, to committing a murder together.

The four characters form a quadrangle of half-admitted, half-suppressed erotic magnetism: Henia and Karol are attracted to each other only in so far as they are watched and dominated by the two directors of the performance. They are obedient and at the same time playfully aware of their erotic power over Fryderyk and Witold: "(...) if the Older is submitted to the Younger—what darkness! What perversity and shame! How many traps! And yet Youth, biologically superior, physically more beautiful, has no trouble in charming and conquering the adult, already poisoned by death" (Preface, 9). The two elderly men are embarrassed to communicate directly about this, and exchange secret letters to compare notes on recent events and design their plot. From the very beginning of the novel, there is a sense of suppressed homoerotic attraction between them that is vented through their shared watching of the young couple.

The voyeurism in the novel is described by Witold as "żerująca pornografia"—pornography that feasts on the object of desire. The exact object of desire remains, however, obscure. Nothing really happens between the two young people. It is precisely the potential relationship between Henia and Karol, and between themselves, that keeps Fryderyk and Witold aflame. A painful and sweet sense of blockage escalates toward a series of absurd deaths in the end of the novel.

Lady Amelia, Henia's would-be-mother-in-law, is the first to die. The last pillar of propriety in the novel, under Fryderyk's influence she loses her decorum and fights with a farmboy caught in the pantry. Fatally wounded by him with a kitchen knife, she dies, indifferent to the crucifix, with her eyes fixed on Fryderyk. Three more homicides follow with no tragic significance whatsoever. According to Witold, killing is "no less sensual, no less guilty, no less ardent than love" (188). In the eroticized world of the novel, the murders have the relieving function of orgasms. This pattern—essentially a parody of tragic death in drama—can be observed also in Gombrowicz's plays Iwona, Księżniczka Burgunda [Iwona, Princess of Burgundia], Ślub [The Marriage], and Operetka [Operetta].

"I do not believe in a nonerotic philosophy. I do not trust any desexualized idea," the author confesses in his Diary. In Pornografia, as well as in his other novels, Gombrowicz explores erotic desire as a creative force. Pairs of creator figures similar to that of Fryderyk and Witold, and linked by a relationship of erotic attraction and uncertainty, appear in Trans-Atlantyck [Trans-Atlantic] and Kosmos [Cosmos]. This model can be traced back to Gombrowicz's first novel, Ferdynand, in which the grotesque relationship between the teacher and his thirty-year-old student has sadomasochistic overtones. In Trans-Atlantyck, Witold, a fresh exile in Argentina, observes Gonzalo's game of seduction. Its object is a simple-minded adolescent Polish boy. The act of observation and Witold's role as a narrator, however, gradually lead to a symbolic collaboration with Gonzalo whose first aim is to liberate the boy from the authority of his father and fatherland. The foreign and the strange are presented as a source of irresistible erotic appeal. The relationship between Fryderyk and Witold in Pornografia is less asymmetrical, but the creative initiative remains in Fryderyk's hands. In Kosmos, Witold takes over. He both generates the plot and narrates it, while his partner and roommate Fuks, is a passive, but needed witness. Significantly, in this novel Witold tends to divide himself into an acting and narrating consciousness, none of which is fully aware of the causes and meaning of the events (for example, he himself hangs a cat and afterwards wonders who of the other characters could have done this). As the story progresses, the narrating voyeur Witold becomes more and more fascinated with the acting Witold's erotic perception of the world. Witold falls in love with himself—a kind of narcissism both admitted and parodied in the Diary. Thus, paradoxically, the mechanism of the novel's creation is exhibited to the reader, but appears to be a mystery to its creator. By undressing the devices of his own literary imagination, in Pornografia and Kosmos, Gombrowicz seduces the audience into a voyeuristic participation in his creative process.

Biography

Born August 4 1904 in Małoszyce, Poland. Studied at Warsaw University, 1922–1927; law degree, 1927. Studied philosophy and economics at the Institut des Hautes Études Internationales, Paris, 1927. Contributed to Warsaw newspapers, from 1933. In 1939, visited Argentina and remained there until 1963. Wrote for Buenos Aires newspapers, from 1940. Secretary, Polish Bank, Buenos Aires, 1947–1953. In 1963, moved to Berlin, then to Vence, France, 1964–1969. Married Marie-Rita Labrosse, 1969. Awards: Kultura Prize, 1961; International Literary Prize, 1967. Died in Vence, 25 July 1969. Author of five novels, short stories, four plays, and a Diary (1953–1966).

KATIA MITOVA

Editions

Pornografia. Paris: Kultura, 1960; edited by Jan Błoński, Kraków: Wydawnictwo Literackie, 1986; as Pornografia translated from the French by Alaistar Hamilton. New York: Grove Press, 1966; republished in Cosmos and Pornografia, New York: Grove Press, 1985.

Selected Works

- Pamiętnik z okresu dojrzewania*. 1933; new extended edition under the title Bakakaj, 1957, 1986.
- Ferdynand*, 1937, 1957, 1986; as Ferdynand. translated by Eric Mosbacher. New York: Grove Press, 1961; translated by Danuta Borchardt. 2000.
- Iwona, księżniczka Burgunda*. 1938 (in Skamander); as a book, 1958, 1986; as Iwona, Princess of Burgundia, translated by Krystyna Griffith-Jones and Catherine Robins. 1969.
- Trans-Atlantyck*. 1953, 1957, 1986; as Trans-Atlantyck, translated by Carolyn French and Nina Karsov. 1994.
- Ślub*. 1953, 1986; as The Marriage, translated by Louis Iribarne. 1969.
- Kosmos*. 1965, 1986; as Cosmos, translated by Eric Mosbacher. 1985.
- Operetka*. 1966, 1986; as Operetta, translated by Louis Iribarne. 1971.
- Dziennik 1953–1966*. In Kultura, Paris, 3 vols, 1969, 1986; as Diary, edited by Jan Kott. translated by Lillian Vallee. 3 vols, 1988–1993.
- Entretiens avec Dominique de Roux* (in French). 1968, 1969; as A Kind of Testament, translated by Alastair Hamilton. 1973.
- Przewodnik po filozofii w szesc godzin i kwadrans*. 1971.
- Wspomnienia polskie. Wedrowki po Argentynie*. 1977.
- Gombrowicz filozof*. 1991.
- Dziela zebrane*. 15 vols. In progress, 1986—
- Aforyzmy, refleksje, myśli i sentencje*. 1994.

Further Reading

- Boyers, Robert. "Aspects of the Perverse in Gombrowicz's Pornografia." Salmagundi 17 (1971): 19–46.
- Dedieu, Jean-Claude. Witold Gombrowicz. Paris: Marval, 1993.

GOVARDHANA

- Głowiński, Michał. "Parodia konstruktywna (O 'Pornografii' Gombrowicza)" in Gombrowicz i krytycy, edited by Zdzisław Łapiński. Cracow: Wydawnictwo literackie, 1984: 365–383.
- Gomori, George. "The Antinomies of Gombrowicz."
Modern Language Review 73 (1978): 119–129.
- Hultberg, Peer. "Pornografia i alchemia: prolegomena do analizy Pornografii Gombrowicza." Pamiętnik lit-eracki 64 (1973): 179–188.
- Jarzębski, Jerzy. Gra w Gombrowicza. Warszawa:
Państwowy Instytut Wydawniczy, 1982.

- Jeleński, Constanty and Dominique de Roux (editors).
Gombrowicz. Paris: l'Herne, 1971.
- Legierski, Mihał. Modernizm Witolda Gombrowicza: Wybrane zagadnienia. Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiskel, 1996.
- Pawłowski, Janusz. "Erotyka Gombrowicza" in Gombrowicz i krytycy, edited by Zdzisław Łapiński. Cracow: Wydawnictwo literackie, 1984, pp. 531–560.
- Thompson, Ewa. Witold Gombrowicz. Boston: Twayne, 1979.

---

GOVARDHANA

---

Twelfth–Thirteenth century
Sanskrit poet

Govardhana composed one work that we know of, the Āryāsaptaati (The Collection of Seven Hundred Verses in the Āryā Meter). Apart from this we have only a handful of stray verses in the anthologies. The anthology the Saduktikar-amata [The Ear-Nectar of Good Verse] compiled at the court of his patron contains the majority of these, but verses are also to be found in an anthology from the Cāhamāna court, the Çār gadharapaddhati (c. fourteenth-century Rajasthan) as well as Ropa Gosvām's Padyāvali (c. seventeenth-century Bengal).

The third verse of Jayadeva's Gotagovinda lists and praises the prominent poets of the literary salon of Lakṣma'asena's court. While Jayadeva says of himself "only Jayadeva knows the perfection of verbal arrangement," he remarks that Govardhana "has no rival for his crafting of true subjects of supreme erotic sentiment." Āryāsaptaat verse 39 is a panegyric to Lakma'asena. Thus we have positively conclusive evidence for placing these poets together. Verses of all the Sena court poets abound in the Saduktikar'āmata. This is one of a handful of such conclusively documented literary salons in the history of Sanskrit letters, and the poets bore in common a commitment to intense and finely crafted eroticism.

Govardhana's poetry is well known for its explicit, even risqué description of sexuality.

The sex scenes of his poetry are embedded in ironic vignettes of rustic life.

Govardhana is an exquisite commentator on the contradiction between rural and urban modes of comportment. He mocks the context-sensitivity and potential absurdity of Sanskrit ideals of feminine allure in a sardonic verse:

Straighten your gait. Leave off, girlfriend, all your urban ways. Here, thinking you a witch, the village-head will beat you just for casting crooked glances.
(140)

The sidelong glances so basic to erotic communication in Sanskrit poetry, lose their eroticism in the village; they are deprived of their august universality, and revealed to be nāgara "urban." In the wrong locale, a woman could be identified as a witch, when she is simply trying to seduce—a hilarious sequence of events.

The precedent for this style of rustic erotic description was originally set in the third century by the Prakrit poet and Sātavāhana king Hāla who composed his Sattasa in Mahārār Prakrit. Hāla's collection contains seven hundred some odd verses, and the sections, arranged alphabetically, are called Vrajyā-s. These are elements Govardhana adapted to his Sanskrit composition. He himself comments on his Prakrit antecedents:

Speech whose flavor is suited to Prakrit has been forcefully drawn into Sanskrit, as if the Yamunā, whose waters naturally flow downward, were drawn forcibly to the firmament of the sky.

(1.52)

What Govardhana had dragged into Sanskrit from below was also a frank and bawdy mode of depicting sexuality, verging on the vulgar (what in Sanskrit literary theory is referred to as “grāmya” ‘of the village’). He is fond of puns and this punning verse even verges on the pornographic:

Pressed to her ample thigh, your hand making the shape of an elephant with extended trunk; like an elephant butting against a riverbank, gāra[eroticism/red decoration made on elephants’ bodies] adorns you.

(505)

In the introductory and closing portions of his poem, Govardhana reflects on his art, characterizing his poetic departure; at one point valorizing a poetic nakedness:

Naked for the erotic style, like a beloved naked for lovemaking, is pure language full of aesthetic emotion conducive to pleasure. Language without aesthetic emotion, but replete with rhetorical figures, is unpleasant like a lifeless, ornamented doll.

(1.54)

Govardhana’s poetry often conforms very much to what he has to tell us about it. His pithy and realistic descriptions abandon the often-stereotyped character of classical Sanskrit poetry and he is at pains to define the matter of poetry as unalloyed worldly experience:

A sotra is composed by the crooked glance of a young girl. The corner of a wanton lady’s eye composes a commentary thereon. Poet-boys study the sense from the sub-commentary strung together by her messenger-girl.

(1.50)

He goes as far as to advocate a hands-on approach for poets:

Only of a poet who has tasted the nectar of a beloved’s lips are the verses sweet. A cuckoo does not sing a sweet tone without tasting the mango blossom.

(1.49)

He likewise defends the relevance and practical importance of his worldly poetry:

Those proud-minded men who lack respect for this Āryāsaptaat, like men who lack a female go-between, they do not enter the heart of a lover-girl.

(1.53)

Lakma’asena’s kingdom was invaded in 1204/5 by the Turkish conquistador Muhammad

Bakhtiyar Khalji, ushering in a new era in Bengal and South Asia as a whole. The Delhi Sultanate was founded in 1206, eclipsing the sovereignty of the regional states of the medieval period. A new era had likewise begun in the Sanskrit poetry of this period. At the Sena court an unprecedented poetic experimentation took place, characterized by a mixing of the high and the low, courtly and rustic varieties of eroticism. Govardhana was the practitioner and commentator par excellence on this new variety of erotic verse and that he was among the cleverest Sanskrit poets of the tradition is attested by his title “ācārya” master. Some of the greatest scholars of a later period of Indian intellectual history were to compose commentaries on his work, including such luminaries as the grammarian Nāgeabhaa and the scholar of law and custom [dharmāstra] Anantapa<sup>a</sup>ḍita.

That Govardhana was widely read in the wake of his lifetime is attested by the broad diffusion of manuscripts of his work. There have been some works modeled on the Āryāsaptaat, including Bihār Lāl’s Hind Sattasa (c. seventeenth century) and Viçvevara’s Sanskrit Āryāsaptaat (c. eighteenth century).

Biography

Flourished in the latter half of the twelfth century CE at the court of king Lakma<sup>a</sup>asena of Bengal (present India/Bangladesh).

JESSE ROSS KNUTSON

Further Reading:

Chowdury, Abdul Momin. Dynastic History of Bengal c. 750–1200 A.D. Dacca: Asiatic Society of Pakistan, 1967.

De, Sushil Kumar. “Bengal’s Contribution to Sanskrit Literature and Studies in Bengal Vaisnavism.” Indian Studies Past and Present, Calcutta, 1960.

Ingalls, Daniel H. “A Sanskrit Poetry of Village and Field: Yoçeçvara and his Fellow Poets.” Journal of the American Oriental Society, vol. 74 no.3, 1954.

———. An Anthology of Sanskrit Court Poetry: Vidyākara’s Subhāḍitaratnakōṣa. Harvard Oriental Series 44, Harvard University Press, Cambridge, 1965.

Lienhard, Siegfried. A History of Classical Poetry: Sanskrit—Pali—Prakrit. Vol. 3 fasc. Of History of Indian Literature ed. Jan Gonda. Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1983.

GRAINVILLE, PATRICK

---

1947–
French novelist

Les Flamboyants

From his early “mythical biography,” Patrick Grainville has drawn attention to the luxuriance of his vocabulary, and to the wealth of his metaphors. His novel Les Flamboyants reveals a use of sensuous images, particularly vivacious when the king Tokor and his mistress Helen are describing men or women. Helen is portrayed through Tokor’s desire, her legs are compared to “sweet whips.” At this moment, his style becomes vigorous like Claudel’s verve. Provocative women form the bulk of the splendours of Tindjili Palace: they are compared to water flowing from one room to another; they become like “fetishes” with manes of hair, tufts, bush, and perfumes. Some are “tall,” “carnal,” or compared to mermaids, daurades, or fleshy fruits. Tokor, the “king of women,” wants to be named “the great Analogist,” and his words are lush and fertile: Helen is a female Python, a “pythonne,” and “La Méza” is “the great Cantharid.” Helen decides to cast a refined and gourmet eye on reality, and it is the principle in which the whole novel has been written.

The location of the novel, an African and equatorial country, enables the author to draw the main outlines of an erotic, violent, and lively society. The novel begins with a hurricane, like a kind of Nature’s climax above the capital of Mandouka. Its people are at the same time animated and voluptuous, with a huge, muddy, and stinky shantytown. Most of the novel is located in the “completely naked Hourla, fur-lined with massive green,” and hypnotized characters leave the capital to penetrate the “flesh of the Yali country.” Tokor dreams about the bush as if it was a hairy female body. African nature seems to be ruled by animal forces and sexual impulses, like the night violated by sudden yells. Tokor dreams of a “phallocratic Arcadia” on the river-side of Maloumbé. In the Toura villages, a sexual ritual initiation between teenagers is described in a visual and ethnographic way.

An intense excitement, linked to animality, lifts up the story, with wild imagination fired by the tropical aspects of nature and by the strange behavior of king Tokor.

He is well known for his “pansexualism,” his passion for rape, and frolicsome games, like swallowing hummingbirds and expelling them through his anus, half alive. Tokor is much like an animal, unlike his guest, William, compared to an angel. The king of Yali loves lying in the mud of Maloumbé, being licked and tramped by wild animals who come to drink at night. He loses consciousness and is assaulted by carnal and humoral sensations. Just like what used to happen when he was alive, King Soloa dies covered by thousand of butterflies. Nicknames enable the metamorphosis of some characters into animals: Lucy is called “dragonfly” and Moanda the “serpent-eater.” The “female forces” of the shantytown are compared to “antilopes,” and the Méza is an “animal queen” with an exciting fur. The countryside is often compared to animals, like the savannah crossed by fugitive furs. Exotic animals suggest sexual images, like girafes, compared to “telluric necks,” or to “golden phallus.”

One reason for the omnipresence of nature and animality in this novel is that eroticism is regarded as sacred in a dionysian sense. The Yali country, a carnal abyss, is often compared to flesh. The five hundred special guards are virile and naked: in order to prepare for war they are kept prisoners of the fleshy and soft embrace of flowers for two days. A woman called “la Bou-boubou” is compared to a volcano, and a lake turns into a real volcano which Tokor enters, like “the rapist of the Prometheus fire.” The king introduces himself as “the great Concupiscent of the kingdom.” When he desires to sleep with Helen, he does so “tellurically,” and everybody around him goes into raptures over his telluric ecstasy. The Yali country is considered as sacred, and even the teenagers of the slum dream of lying naked in the dust, in a sort of intercourse with Earth. King Tokor is so excited that he strokes the impalas and sits among them as if he were on a sofa. He then, of embracing the stellar heaven mass, pierced by stellar splinters after having shared saucy stories with his officers. The dionysiac eroticism culminates with the Diorles, a tribe hidden in the equatorial forest.

They are seen bathing, naked, clasped in each other's arms, before they are massacred by the "yulmatian bestiality." They glitter with golden mud; men hold their genitalia in a small purse, whereas females exhibit shared vaginas with an artificially erected and painted clitoris. More astounding are the Ludies met by William at the end of the novel: they have thin thighs, fair skin, and only exhibit pure emotions. Androgynous, they have a clitoris that can be used as a penis, and practice all manner of sexual, oral, anal, and incestuous relations, until they die at the age of eighteen. They do what they want with their bodies and symbolize a longing for a lost Eden, located in the Hourla. This place is at the same time real and part of a fairy-tale. Tokor is perhaps too crude to see them, but he is pointed out as "the king of the Hourla and of the Diorles," or as the "uncounscious" of the Yali country. Therefore, his dead body is cut into different pieces put in various points of the Hourla, to be eaten and swallowed by wild beasts.

The lost paradise represented in this novel can be found in the forest with the young Diorles, and with the licentious creatures called Ludies, but the ultimate and extreme love of Tokor for Helen is part of it too. Their love is compared to "a vast fireplace of eternal embers."

Biography

Born in 1947, at Villers (Calvados), he is a certified art teacher. He published his mythical biography in three volumes. Received the Prix Goncourt for Les Flamboyants (1976).

Selected Works

La Toison. Gallimard, Paris, 1972.

La Lisière. Gallimard, Paris, 1973.

L'Abîme. Gallimard, Paris, 1974.

Images du désir. Playboy/Filipacchi, Paris, 1978.

L'orgie, la neige. Seuil, Paris, 1990.

L'Ombre de la bête. Balland, Paris, 1993.

Further Reading

Radioscopie with Jacques Chancel. 1977.

Hutton, M.A. "Cultural Metissage: Victor Hugo, Egon Schiel and the Egyptian in Patrick Grainville's Les Anges et les faucons." Texte/Image, Durham, University of Durham, 1999.

---

GRANDES, ALMUDENA

---

1960 –
Spanish journalist, novelist, and short-story writer.

Grandes' literary career was launched in 1989, while still working at a publishing house when her first book won the XI La Sonrisa Vertical prize for Las edades de Lulú [The Ages of Lulu] (1989). Powerfully written, Grande's debut novel had immediate impact: it has not only been translated into 21 languages but also adapted for film by Spanish director Bigas Luna that same year. In 2002, Grandes won three prizes for her Los aires difíciles; the XI Premio Arzobispo San Clemente, the Premio Salambó and the IV Premio Julián Besteiro de las Artes y de las Letras. Los aires difíciles debuted at the top of the Spanish bestseller lists when it was published in February 2002, and remained on the lists until June. Since then, translations have been published in Italy, France, Germany, Israel, and the Netherlands.

Grandes is known for her journalistic work; she frequently writes for the Sunday magazine of

El País newspaper, but her greatest renown comes from her fiction. Grandes mainly concentrates socially and geographically in Madrid—the city background often becomes an essential part of the story—painting a colorful picture of the life of the bourgeois family, particularly the sexual, romantic, and familial relationships. At times, the characters and the atmospheres Grandes writes about could be compared to the Spanish social novel of the 1960s, although Grandes avoids moralistic comment or judgment. Grandes' main characters are usually women, whom she often presents as almost asexual. These protagonists tend to tackle the constant allusions to their somewhat unfavorable physical aspect with a positive attitude, acceptance of personal appearance, sense of humor, and irony which usually pays off, as they never fail to find sexual and sensual balance.

Las edades de Lulú [The Ages of Lulú] is an intensely erotic novel chronicling the sexual awakening and subsequent sexual adventures of María Luisa Ruiz-Póveda y García de la Casa. Brought up in a middle class family in Madrid, Lulú, her family nickname, foreshadows her precocious sexual awakenings. Deprived of her mother's love and affection, Lulú turns to her older brother Marcelo who would never be without his best friend Pablo, the person who would trigger Lulú's obsession, longing, and relentless search for validation and acceptance.

It is Pablo, who is 12 years older than 15-year-old Lulú, who inspires Lulú to explore her own sexual fantasies so deeply that by the end of the book she will reach unfathomable depths.

Pablo decided not to take her back home after a concert. Instead, he leads her to his apartment and then prepares her in a way he finds suited to her age. Pablo disappears and when he comes back he is "bearing a bowl of lather on which a mirror and a razor lay crossed." Pablo's obsession with a lack of pubic hair, school uniforms, and the look of innocence will become a trademark: "...He took off my knickers, pulled me abruptly towards him, [...] 'Why are you doing this?' 'Because you don't have a little girl's cunt. And I like little girl's cunts, especially when I am about to debauch them.'"

The book begins with an explicit description of a gay porn video Lulú is watching at home. A series of flashbacks reveal the protagonist's torrid sexual adventures. Led by the hand of sexual mentor Pablo, first boyfriend, then husband and father of her only daughter, Lulú's darkest desires are fostered by him who enjoys and promotes the ludic sexual hunting that depicts Madrid's most obscure night life: their cruising includes gay bars, pick up joints, and illegal brothels.

Pablo would be her corruptor and eventually her savior; Lulú's thirst for sexual discovery takes them through voyeurism, homoeroticism, and the power-plays of incest and degradation. As years go by, Lulú becomes more perverse, becoming addicted to sodomy not only dominated by Pablo but also by other men including a threesome: Pablo induces the blindfolded protagonist to her own brother Marcelo. Other heterosexual partners become her usual exercise, more often than not preferring homosexuals and transvestites which become Lulú's fascination.

Lulú's obsession with gay multi-partner sex continues even after their marriage with Pablo has collapsed: she sets out on her own in an even darker, at times frightening, quest to satisfy her insatiable desires. Lulú, now cruising solo, takes part in all sorts of orgies introducing the reader to a most peculiar S/M Madrid community. Her new friends, a bunch of transvestites, gigolos, and taxi boys offer her to take part in "little parties" they would hold. At the beginning these would be just for the sake of having some fun for free: Lulú's financial situation was beginning to decline as a result of her expensive sexual practices as she would hire two or three people at a time.

Yet, this last time, Lulú is invited to take part in a mega party that would be sponsored by an unanimous, perverse, rich gentleman—an invitation she cannot turn down but which will almost kill her.

At the time The Ages of Lulú was published, Grandes was already working on her second novel Te llamaré Viernes (1991) followed by Malena es un nombre de tango (1994) and a short story compilation Modelos de mujer (1996) representative of Spanish postmodernism about seven women that give an overview about the way in which different generations of Spanish women act and interact in a society that witnessed historical changes. Atlas de geografía humana (1998) and Los aires difíciles (2002) came out next. Her most recent work is Castillos de cartón (2004).

Other stories by Grandes have also been taken to the cinema: Malena, a film based on her Malena es un nombre de tango (1996, dir. Gerardo Herreo) and Aunque tú no lo sepas (2000, dir. Juan Vicente Córdoba) based on “El vocabulario de los balcones” were produced.

In March 2002, Grandes was awarded the IV Julián Besteiros literary prize in recognition for her work as a writer and journalist.

Biography

Almudena Grandes Hernández was born in 1960 in Madrid, Spain. Grandes studied History and Geography at the Universidad Complutense in Madrid. A “daughter of Franco,” as women of her own generation who were brought up under Franco’s regime are usually called, Grandes was reborn after the Generalísimo’s death, in 1975, when Spain awoke to a radical change in uses and customs.

CAROLINA MIRANDA

Editions

Las edades de Lulú, Barcelona: Tusquets, 1989; as The Ages of Lulu (Lurid & compelling story of the sexual awakening of Maria Luisa Ruiz-Poveda y Garcia de la Casa)tr. Sonia Soto. New York: Grove Press, 1989.

Selected Works

Te llamaré viernes. Barcelona: Tusquets, 1991.
Malena es un nombre de tango. Barcelona: Tusquets, 1994.
Modelos de mujer. Barcelona: Tusquets, 1996.
Atlas de geografía humana. Barcelona: Tusquets, 1990.
Los aires difíciles. Barcelona: Tusquets, 2002.
Castillos de cartón. Barcelona: Tusquets, 2004.

Further Reading

Carballo Abengózar, Mercedes. “Almudena Grandes: sexo, hambre, amor y literatura.” in Mujeres novelistas, edited by Redondo Goicoechea, Alicia. Madrid: Narcea, 2003.

---

GRANDVAL, FRANÇOIS-CHARLES RACOT DE

---

1710–1784

French actor and dramatist

In 1752, Grandval acquired a property in the rue Blanche and had it joined to the house that his mistress, Mlle Dumesnil, a tragedienne at the Comédie-Française, had purchased some time previously. It was in this place, designated the Barrière Blanche, that the two actors founded a private theater where, it is widely held, several of Grandval’s erotic pieces were staged or otherwise recited. Because of the clandestine nature of Grandval’s works, questions surrounding their origin persist to the present day. There are, however, eight pieces of which he is the undisputed author.

The originality of Grandval’s dramatic work stems in large part from the spirit of burlesque that informs each of his plays. A pervasive, strictly sexual eroticism together with a raunchiness of dialogue sometimes bordering on the scatological are used to parody seventeenth-century writers and, in particular, the great tradition of French classical tragedy. Grandval’s theatrical experience had given him a thorough knowledge of drama, enabling him to rewrite famous scenes and celebrated tirades in an erotic and parodic context. Based on a borrowing of some of the best-known verses of the classical tradition, this poetics of ironic and playful imitation reveals a wish to discredit the prestige of the tragic genre, and indeed of tradition in general. Accordingly, Grandval's erotic plays are unforgiving in their criticism of all forms of authority, a theme at the core of Enlightenment thought. This point of view is particularly conspicuous in four of his most important pieces.

Les Deux Biscuits (The Two Cookies), a one-act tragedy in verse, takes the audience to the kingdom of Astracan and into the palace of Abusef. We first learn that Dilazal, son of the late king of Astracan, is hiding under the bed of the princess Abusef. Gaspariboul, a usurper who has cuckolded all the husbands in the kingdom, is courting the princess without knowing that Dilazal, her lover, is still alive. The play opens with the princess awaking from sleep as Dilazal leaves his hiding place, irritated with his mistress for having showered Gaspariboul with her favors the previous evening. But the princess defends herself well. Yes, she had organized a supper with Gaspariboul; Dilazal had, despite himself heard everything from his hiding place. However the pastry-cook, Rissole, had prepared two cookies for the occasion: "L'un était composé de mouches cantharides / Qui redonnent la force aux amants invalides, / Dans l'autre dominait l'opium et le pavot" [One was made of Spanish flies / Which return strength to impotent lovers / In the other were mainly opium and poppy seeds]. Abusef had simply eaten the wrong cookie. Satisfied, Dilazal asks the princess to organize another meeting with Gaspariboul in a tone that calls to mind Act II, Scene III of Racine's Britannicus: "À travers ce rideau je verrai votre foi / Madame, en lui parlant, songez que je vous voi." [Through this curtain I will see how true you are / Madame, while you speak to him, remember that I am watching.] Gaspariboul is deceived, and the lovers then decide to emasculate him as punishment for his career as a cuckold. A critical element underscores the association with this extract from Racine's play. Finally, the acrostic formed by the names on the list of actors removes any doubt as to authorship by allowing Grandval to sign his work with brio.

For Grandval, the main function of eroticism was its use as a tool for spoofing—and so further subverting—seventeenth-century values. This is clearly the case in La Nouvelle Messaline, a one-act burlesque tragedy in verse. The play features a heroine so debauched that her lovers are incapable of satisfying her sexually. Disappointed, she feigns a call to the religious life in order, she affirms, to "tâter du moine" [try out the monks] in a Carmelite convent. Before proceeding with her plan, however, the lady curses the inadequacy of her lovers by crying out in fury: "Ô rage ! ô désespoir ! ô Vénus ennemie !/ Étais-je réservée à cette ignominie ?/ N'ai-je donc encensé ton temple et tes autels/ Que pour être l'objet du faible des mortels ?" [O fury! O despair! O hostile Venus! / Have I then been destined for this ignominious fate? / Have I worshipped at your temple and your altars / Only to end up an object of mortals' feebleness?] This borrowing from Corneille's Cid (1636) and, notably, from the monologue of Don Diego, one of the most celebrated tirades in classical drama, highlights the function of eroticism in Grandval's works: the erotic element adds to the parody and so helps overturn and criticize the authority enjoyed by the tragic genre a century earlier. This "ô rage! ô désespoir!" also appears in La Médecine de Cythère, a two-act vaudeville show.

Corneille's Cid is again a target for parody in La comtesse d'Olonne. Inspired by an episode concerning the countess in the Histoire amoureuse des Gaules (1665) by Bussy-Rabutin, this short piece falls within the same subversive vein. The sleeping Madame d'Olonne (Argénie) dreams she sees the ghost of the Duke of Candale, her first lover. Upset at having been deceived so many times, he announces that "un chancre confondra [s]on con avec [s]on cul." [a canker will confuse her cunt with her arsehole.] In the following scene, we learn that the countess is in love with the Count de Guiche (Bigdore) but is in doubt as to his sexual orientation. She asks advice of the Countess de Fiesque (Gélonide) who knows him well and is told that the Count "par inclination,[...] est un branleur de pique." [The Count "...has a liking [...]for jerking off dicks."] Nevertheless, Madame d'Olonne is determined to offer herself to him. Scene III is a parody of Act II, Scene II of the Cid. Here, certain famous passages from the Cid are caricatured as follows: "Je suis jeune, il est vrai,/ À peine ai-je vingt ans, mais aux couilles bien nées,/ La valeur n'attend pas le nombre des années." [I'm young, it's true, / Not yet twenty, but to well-born balls, / Value's not measured by the count of years.] Unfortunately for Argénie, the count remains impotent. In the last scene, however, he returns and acquits himself successfully: "Je fais des cons aux culs beaucoup de différence, / Et si jusqu'à présent j'ai mieux aimé les culs, / Reine, c'est que les cons ne m'étaient pas connus." [I definitely distinguish between an arsehole and a cunt, / And if until now I have preferred arseholes, / Majesty, it's because cunts were unknown to me.] Here again, eroticism is used in the service of parody to overturn the Cornelian heroic ethic.

Biography

François-Charles Racot de Grandval was born in Paris on October 23, 1710, the son of Marie Macé and Nicolas Racot de Grandval, a harpsichordist and dramatist. The younger Grandval first made a name for himself as an actor. His career began on November 19, 1729 when, under the name Duval, he performed the title role in the tragedy Andronic by Campistron. On December 31st of the same year, he was admitted to the Comédie-Française, where he remained until 1762. As an actor, Grandval excelled in the role of petit-maître; he was so good that his work served as a model for interpreting this type of character. He returned to the stage on February 6, 1764 to play Alceste in The Misanthrope but left for good in 1768, apparently because of the "dégoût que son grasseyement inspirait au public, dont il avait été l'idole" [the disgust his throaty manner of pronouncing the "r" inspired in the public, which had at one time idolized him"] (Mlle Clairon). He died in the rue Blanche, Paris, on September 24, 1784.

MARC ANDRÉ BERNIER

Selected Works

La comtesse d'Olonne. Comédie en un acte, en vers. 1738.
L'Eunuque ou la fidèle infidélité. Parade en vaudevilles, mêlée de prose et de vers, Montmartre, 1750. [Brenner: Représentée chez Mlle Dumesnil, 1749]
Sirop-au-cul ou l'heureuse délivrance. Tragédie héroï-comédique, 3 actes en vers. Au Temple du Goût, 1751.
Les deux biscuits. Tragédie traduite de la langue que l'on parloit jadis au royaume d'Astracan, et mise depuis peu en vers français, 1 acte, se vend à Astracan, chez un Libraire, 1752 [Brenner: Représentée chez Mlle Dumesnil, 1749]

La nouvelle Messaline. Tragédie, 1 acte, en vers (par Pyron dit Prepucius). A Ancone, chez Clitoris, librairie rue du Sperme, vis-à-vis la Fontaine de la Semence, à la Verge d'Or, 1773 [1752].

Léandre-Nanette ou le double qui-pro-quo. Parade en un acte, en vers et en vaudevilles, achevée en 1755. A Charlotte de Montmartre, Clignancourt, 1756.

La médecine de Cythère. Parade, 2 actes en vaudeville, tirée des fastes de Syrie. Clignancourt, 1756.

Le tempérament, tragi-parade, traduite de l'Egyptien en vers français et réduite en un acte. A Charlotte de Montmartre, en octobre 1770. Au Grand Caire. [Brenner: en octobre 1755. Au Grand Caire, 1756].

Further Reading

Alexandrian, Sarane. Histoire de la littérature érotique. Paris: Seghers, 1989.

Alméras, Henri d' et Paul d'Estrée. Les théâtres libertins au XVIIIe siècle. Paris: H. Daragon Éditeur, coll. "Bibliothèque du vieux Paris," 1905.

Brenner, Clarence D. A Bibliographical List of Plays in the French Language, 1700–1789. California: Berkeley, 1947.

Capon, G. et R. Yve-Plessis. Les théâtres clandestins. Paris: Plessis Libraire, coll. "Paris galant au dix-huitième siècle," 1905.

Clairon, Hippolyte. Mémoires. Genève: Slatkine Reprints [réimpression de l'édition de Paris: Ponthieu Libraire au Palais-Royal, 1822], 1968.

Dictionnaire des œuvres érotiques, domaine français. Préface de Pascal Pia, Paris: Éd. Robert Laffont, coll. "Bouquins," 2001 [Mercure de France, 1971].

L'intermédiaire des chercheurs et curieux: correspondance littéraire, "notes and queries" français, questions et réponses, communications diverses à l'usage de tous, littérateurs et gens du monde, artistes, bibliophiles, archéologues, généalogistes, etc. Paris: Vve B. Duprat [puis] Libraire de la Suisse romande [puis] Sandoz et Fischbacher, 1864–1940. [XVIIe année, 25 mai 1884].

Grente, Georges, dir. Dictionnaire des lettres françaises. Le XVIIIe siècle, édition revue et mise à jour sous la direction de François Moureau, Paris: Fayard, coll. "La Pochothèque," 1995 [1960].

Pauvert, Jean-Jacques, éd. Théâtre érotique français au XVIIIe siècle, Paris: Terrain Vague, 1993.

Weller, Émile. Dictionnaire des ouvrages français portant de fausses indications des lieux d'impression et des imprimeurs depuis le XVIe siècle jusqu'aux temps modernes, Hildesheim/New York: Georg Olms Verlag, 1970.

---

GRASS, GÜNTER

---

1927[-]

German novelist, dramatist, poet, essayist, and artist

One of Germany's most prolific and political authors, Günter Grass is perhaps best known for the Danzig trilogy of The Tin Drum, 1959, Cat and Mouse [Katz und Mouse], 1961, and Dog Years [Hundejahre], 1963. The Tin Drum, while certainly controversial, is the least erotic of these works, focusing on a self-proclaimed savant named Oskar who purposefully stunts his growth at the age of three so that he can avoid entering the world of adults. The work has achieved its greatest notoriety through Schlöndorff's Oscar-winning 1979 film, which purportedly shows a pre-teen male performing oral sex on a teen girl. On the basis of this scene, an Oklahoma County district judge ruled in 1997 that the film constituted child pornography (a decision that was overturned in the following year). In the latter two works, erotic imagery is explored more directly through male characters caught in the transition from adolescence to adulthood, and from peace to war, each embodying the extremes of virility, violence, and impotence. An extraordinarily political author, Grass uses these characters metaphorically to examine Germany's own right of passage from the beginning of World War II through its conclusion.

Like The Tin Drum, both Cat and Mouse and Dog Years are presented through the eyes of unreliable narrators. Grass creates polarized male friendships in each of these works, with one figure being especially virile and the other largely impotent. The narrator of Cat and Mouse, Pilenz, comes to idolize his best friend, Mahlke, when the latter transforms from a sickly youth who is unable to swim or ride a bike into the strongest diver (and overall athlete) of their group. In the work's most erotic, and homoerotic, scene, Pilenz and Mahlke join their male friends in group masturbation on an abandoned minesweeper. At first Mahlke does not take part in the ritual, but he is spurred on by Tulla, a young girl who is also present (and who reappears as a sexually promiscuous adult in Dog Years). The other adolescents, and Pilenz in particular, are awed by both Mahlke's pronounced physical endowment and the strength of his orgasm. It is noteworthy that Mahlke remains, according to the untrustworthy narrator, uncomfortable around females and dedicated to one unattainable female figure: the Virgin Mary. This brief, defining scene of male masturbation later contrasts Pilenz's admittedly unsuccessful attempts at love-making, and magnifies his own hero-worship of the reportedly chaste Mahlke. Indeed, Pilenz's impotence is attributed to his having been the sexual object of a priest, which intensifies his interpretation of Mahlke as a religious but sexually potent figure.

Few critics have considered the relationship of Pilenz and Mahlke from a primarily homoerotic perspective, perhaps in part because it can be difficult to reconcile this interpretation with the heterosexual Grass's tendency to construct characters based upon his personal and political background. This aspect of their relationship is best symbolized by the abandoned minesweeper, an image that frames the story and signifies the suppression of those potentially explosive emotions that should not be detonated. Of particular note, the minesweeper is partially submerged and contains a radio room that is above water-level, but only accessible through a prolonged and dangerous dive. Mahlke is the only one of the adolescents capable of making this dive. As a sexual metaphor, he is therefore the only one who can enter this otherwise forbidden area, and, once inside, radio contact-emotional, verbal communication-are no longer possible.

Just as the two friends began their emotional journey on the minesweeper, they are brought back to it for the conclusion. They are separated when Mahlke steals a soldier's medal and is transferred to another school by the principal, Dr. Klohse. A few years later, Mahlke returns as a successful soldier with his own medal, but Klohse will not allow him to speak at his former school. Mahlke slaps him across the face, and chooses not to return from his military leave. At the urging of his childhood friend, Mahlke agrees to go briefly into hiding, returning to the scene of their group masturbation and Mahlke's earlier diving triumphs. Mahlke and Pilez are once again on the minesweeper, but this time Pilez seems to be the one in control. He encourages Mahlke to dive again into the radio room, and he gives him provisions so that he can stay submerged for a long period of time. The story ends ambiguously, however, and Pilez reports that Mahlke never resurfaces. In the mind of Pilez, Mahlke is completely consumed within the minesweeper, much as Pilez is consumed by telling the story of the great Mahlke.

In Dog Years, Grass moves beyond the stunted childhood of The Tin Drum and the pained adolescence of Cat and Mouse into the adulthood of post-War Germany. Themes of guilt, trust, and retribution are explored through the long, complex friendship of Eddi Amsel and Walter Matern. Their relationship spans several decades and is characterized by a subtler current of homoeroticism than that which connected Pilez to Mahlke, with Grass focusing here on the balance of the introspective, creative male artist (Amsel) and the hyper-masculine, destructive soldier (Matern).

Although they begin as literal blood brothers, the two are consistently brought into conflict by the ideologies around them. Matern alternately protects and bullies Amsel, who is half-Jewish, at one point leading a Nazi gang in beating his friend so severely that all of his teeth must be replaced. Yet his volatility is tied explicitly to his virility: at the conclusion of the war, Matern seeks vengeance against all ex-Nazis (except himself) largely by sleeping with their daughters, wives, and girlfriends. In contrast, Amsel's sexuality seems suppressed into the creation of terrifying sculptures and scarecrows. The name "Matern" appears naturally and ironically tied to "maternal," but it is Amsel who evokes the image of a mother, giving birth to his art. It is significant that their aspect of the narrative concludes with a ceremonial bath that cannot cleanse them from the past.

Much literary criticism centers on Grass's political statements and artistic struggles. However, he also infuses a number of his works with an erotic (and often homoerotic) undercurrent that is inextricably tied to the violent and sexualized masculinity that defined much of Nazi Germany. The dangerous and forbidden male friendships of Pilez/Mahlke and Amsel/Matern, in particular, should also be analysed within this erotic context.

Biography

Born in Danzig, October 16, 1927. Attended elementary school (Volksschule) and high school (Gymnasium) in Danzig, 1933[-]1944. Member of the Hitler Youth (Hitlerjugend), 1937[-]1941. Served as anti-aircraft gunner and soldier in World War II and visited Dachau concentration camp [Konzentrationslager], 1944[-]1945. Studied sculpture at Düsseldorf Academy of the Arts, 1948[-]1951. Traveled to Italy and France, 1951 [-]1952. Continued study of sculpture at Berlin Academy of the Arts, 1953. Married Swiss ballet dancer Anna Schwarz, 1954 (divorced 1978); three sons and two daughters. Befriended Willy Brandt and supported the Social Democratic Party (Sozialdemokratische Partei Deutschlands), 1961; officially joined the Social Democratic Party, 1983. Elected to the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, 1970. Controversial film version of Grass's first novel, The Tin Drum [Die Blechtrommel], directed by Volker Schlöndorff premiered, 1979. Married German organist Ute Grunert, 1979; no children. Elected president of the Berlin Academy of the Arts. Major awards and honors: Berlin Critics' Prize, 1960; Berlin Fontane Prize, 1968; honorary doctorate from Harvard, 1976; honorary doctorate from the University of Poznań, 1990; honorary doctorate from the University of Gdańsk (formerly Danzig) and honorary Polish citizenship, 1993; Literature Prize of Bavarian Academy of Fine Arts, 1994; the Nobel Prize for Literature, 1999.

WALTER RANKIN

Selected Works

- Die Blechtrommel*. 1959; as The Tin Drum, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1961.
Katz und Maus. 1961; as Cat and Mouse, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1963.
Hundejahre. 1963; as Dog Years, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1965.
Hochwasse. 1963; as Flood in Four Plays, translated by Ralph Manheim and A. Leslie Willson, 1967.
Örtlich betäubt. 1969; as Local Anaesthetic, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1969.

GRAY, ALASDAIR

Further Reading

- Arnold, Heinz Ludwig editor. Blech getrommelt: Günter Grass in der Kritik, Göttingen: Steidl, 1997.
- Cunliffe, Gordon W. Günter Grass. New York: Twayne, 1969.
- Keele, Alan Frank. Understanding Günter Grass. Columbia, SC: University of South Carolina Press, 1988.

- O'Neill, Patrick. Günter Grass Revisited. New York: Twayne, 1999.
- Preece, Julian. The Life and Work of Günter Grass: Literature, History, Politics. New York: St. Martin Press, 2001.
- Reddick, John. The "Danzig Trilogy" of Günter Grass: A Study of The Tin Drum, Cat and Mouse, and Dog Years. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1974.

---

GRAY, ALASDAIR

---

1934–
Scottish novelist

Sexuality is a recurring theme of Gray's fiction. Two of his novels, 1982 Janine and Something Leather, are especially erotic.

1982 Janine

1982 Janine consists of the sexual fantasies and reminiscences of Jock MacLeish which take place during a night he spends at a hotel in Greenock, a small town outside Glasgow. Jock is an alcoholic with a failed marriage who has not been with a woman for many years. In order to beat chronic insomnia and sexual frustration, he resorts to masturbation.

The first ten chapters of the book present Jock's fantasies. These involve various plots. In the first fantasy plot Janine has a job interview at an exclusive millionaires' club in Scotland. She is dressed in revealing clothing. During the interview, one of the members of the club makes sexual advances towards her, but the fantasy has an anticlimactic ending which brings no satisfaction to Jock.

The same premature ending characterizes the second fantasy plot, set somewhere in America. Superb intends to meet her lover. But her all-powerful policeman husband has her arrested and brought to a police station, where she is tortured and raped by Big Momma. The two fantasy plots are combined in a third one. Here, Helga is a director of erotic films in which the other women of Jock's fantasies appear.

The unresolved fantasies and the depressing recollections drive Jock to a suicide attempt. But an inner voice, referred to as God, helps him pull through. After this turning point, Jock reviews his formative years and by dawn he is a new man, determined to quit his job and seek out Denny, his first love.

It is also Gray's most overtly political novel. The date 1982 of the title points to the specificity of Jock's experience. The night that the novel unfolds is set around the time of the Falklands war. Jock has a vested interest in voting for Thatcher, yet he hides the fact because of his uneasy moral conscience. He justifies his crypto-conservatism by adopting the winner-versus-loser dialectic which also underlies his sexual fantasies. Gray does not so much parody Jock, as sympathize with his struggle to escape the vicious circle of the domination logic which is manifest in masturbatory fantasizing and in Thatcherite politics. At the end, Jock is transformed into a new man.

Something Leather

Something Leather is written from the points of view of women. In the first chapter, June is shopping for a leather outfit. She comes across a specialist shop "The Hideout." In a photograph album of patterns, June sees provocative pictures of a woman which excite her. Later, Donalda, an employee of "The Hideout," delivers June's order and seduces and handcuffs her. Donalda summons her accomplices Senga and Harry to June's apartment. The chapter ends at the point "where the reader was likely to be most intrigued."

Gray provides flashbacks to the stories of the four women whose lives have converged. Harry's aristocratic mother neglected her. When a Scottish nanny was found smacking Harry, the mother sent her to boarding school. Harry viewed the smacking as the only act which took her into account, so she tried to have someone whip her again. When this failed, she devoted all her energy into art, particularly her "bum garden" project. Eventually she became a famous artist.

June is a clever and attractive woman who was always entangled with self-promoting, egotistical men. Her marriage collapsed when she realized that her husband was intent only upon his own satisfaction. Donalda and Senga came from poor families in Glasgow. They both have had failed marriages. Donalda was forced to prostitute herself. They both ended up distrusting men and eventually team up in "The Hideout" business.

Harry came to Glasgow in order to prepare an exhibition as part of the European Cultural Capital shows—an event which really took place in 1990. The Glasgow accent reminded her of her nanny and the spanking experience. So, Harry hired Senga to fulfil her fantasies. It was Senga who organized the capture of June in order to satisfy Harry.

Chapter 12 continues the story from the end of chapter 1: Harry, Senga, and Donalda sexually torture June—they hang her from a swing, cane her, shave her hair, and Harry tattoos bees on June's back and face. But June is not really hurt because all of the women show her affection. When June wakes up alone and is longing to meet them again, she realizes that she feels gratified. She is now a new June, converted to new erotic practices and excited to start a relationship with Harry.

Gray's juxtaposition of Queen's English and the Glaswegian accent is witty and entertaining. Something Leather can be read as a satire of the Englishness of the remodeled Glasgow as "Europe's Culture Capital." But below the surface humor, there is Gray's pessimistic denial of any real progress or change. Thus, the revamped Glasgow is only a temporary makeover which hides the squalor, repression, and desperation of its citizens. And, like Glasgow, June's conversion to S&M and homophilia, does not signal a deeper transformation: June is attracted to Harry, who, like June's old husband, is self-centered and quick to use people to further her ends.

Gray does not outright condemn his characters. He is happy for June, because she has found individual satisfaction in her niche of erotic pleasures. And, at the same time, Gray is unhappy with June's individualism and un-self-awareness. Something Leather's open end relies on this ambivalence, which engenders the unresolved opposition of private versus public satisfaction.

Biography

Born in Glasgow, December 28, 1934. His first novel, Lanark, was published in 1981. He graduated from the Glasgow School of Art in 1957. He has written novels, poetry, plays, short stories, an historical-political book, and has edited a collection of prefaces. All are illustrated by himself. He was awarded the Whitbread Novel Award and the Guardian Fiction Prize for Poor Things in 1992. The University of Glasgow appointed him Professor of Creative Writing in 2001.

DIMITRIOS VARDOULAKIS

Selected Works

Lanark. 1981.
1982 Janine. 1984.
Something Leather. 1990.
Poor Things. 1992.

Further Reading

Axelrod, Mark, editor. The Review of Contemporary Fiction, special issue, 15/2 (1995).
 Bernstein, Stephen. Alasdair Gray. Lewisburg, PA: Bucknell University Press, 1999.
 Craig, Cairns. The Modern Scottish Novel: Narrative and National Imagination. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1999.
 Crawford, Robert and Thom Nairn, editors. The Arts of Alasdair Gray. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1991.
 Jansen, Carola M. "Die Welten und Mikrokosmen des Alasdair Gray." Scottish Studies vol. 31, Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang, 2000.
 Loyns, Paddy and John Coyle, editors. The Glasgow Review: Alasdair Gray and Other Stories. Special issue, 3 (1995).
 Whiteford, Eilidh. "Engendered Subjects: Subjectivity and National Identity in Alasdair Gray's 1982, Janine." Scotlands, 2 (1994): 66–82.
 Witschi, Beat. Glasgow Urban Writing and Postmodernism: A Study of Alasdair Gray's Fiction. Scottish Studies vol. 12, Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang, 1991.

---

GREEK ANTHOLOGY

---

The Greek Anthology ('bouquet') is a collection of some 4000 epigrams written between the second century BCE and about 900 CE. The history of the transmission of the texts is complex: the Anthology, as we now have it, is composed of the 'Garland' of Meleager of Gadara (Syria), who died on the island of Cos in about 100 BCE, together with the 'Garland' of Philip (collected in the reign of Nero in the first century CE) and other groups of poems composed by Asclepiades (about 300–270 BCE), Strato (third century CE), Paulus Silentiarius and Agathias (both sixth century CE), and a number attributed to Anacreon (sixth century BCE) but written in the second century CE. In about 900 CE, Constantine Cephalas, a Byzantine, made a major collection of the foregoing material to which he added more. Another, enlarged, version of his edition was put together shortly afterwards, and it is this which is known as the Palatine Anthology. But in 1301 a Byzantine scholar, Maximus Planudes, produced a reduced version, probably based partly on previous abridgements, which omitted some heterosexual erotic items as well as the pederastic poems which constitute book XII of the Palatine collection. Planudes's Anthology was first printed in 1494 and was the standard text for the Renaissance. The full Palatine Anthology was not rediscovered until 1606 and was only completely published early in the nineteenth century (selections from Strato's 'Pederastic Muse' were first published separately in 1764 and 1774). Although there are some differences in the sequences of poems according to the variations in the manuscript tradition, the contents of the Anthology are divided into fifteen books: Christian epigrams (I), descriptions of statues (II), temple inscriptions (III), the prefaces of Meleager, Philip and Agathias (IV), curses (VI), epitaphs (VII and VIII), oracles, riddles and problems (XIV), and miscellaneous topics (IX, X, XIII, and XV). Book XI, which contains a number of erotic subjects, is composed of two parts: sympotic (1–64) and satirical (65–442) epigrams, while book V is devoted to mainly heterosexual erotic epigrams and book XII contains poems uniquely relating to the love of boys and youths. In the latter, some 94 epigrams in two substantial sections can be attributed to Strato, the rest belonging to Asclepiades, Melager, and others, making a total of 258. They are presented in no particular order or grouping. 'Some of the epigrams of Strato are elegant and clever,' wrote Philip Smith in a widely used handbook of Greek biography and literature in the nineteenth century, 'but nothing can redeem the disgrace attaching to the moral character of his compilation.' These pederastic epigrams cover a variety of situations, but they do not idealize their subject matter or give it a spiritual or philosophical disguise reminiscent of Plato or Socrates. The object of one poet's passion is an adolescent (12–18 years old), whose loss of attractiveness is confirmed by the sprouting of a beard (e.g., epigrams XII.24 to 27: Polemo's lover had promised to make a sacrifice if his beloved boy should return safely from his travels, but when he comes back bearded the lover retracts his vow. XII.30: Nicander is told his legs are getting hairy, and if his backside does likewise he will have fewer lovers). Some boys play hard to get, some ask for payment, some are only too happy to agree immediately. Youths are considered to bring more pleasure than women, for, in addition to being more natural in their behavior and appearance, they are vigorous, candid, straightforward, and smell honestly of the gymnasium. This does not mean that they can be relied on to be faithful, however, and the poets often complain about their fickleness. Praise and blame of this sort was, in fact, a commonplace in the Alexandrian period (third century BCE to second century CE) in debates on the relative merits of the love of women or boys. The poems celebrate the boys' bodies: lips, smooth buttocks (XII.37, 38), Diocles's cock seen at the baths (XII.207), or Alcimus's—once like a little pink finger, it now resembles an enormous arm (XII.242). Eyes dart flames (XII.110), or flash like stars (XII.196). Boys are dangerous tempters (XII.139), and dishes worthy of the gods

(XII.68). The rapacity of the beloved is such that he can only be caught by a well-baited hook (XII.42), or perhaps he acts as if arse means gold (XII.6). The love of boys is fleeting, and fades like roses in the heat (XII.195). The lovers are jealous, become impatient, are enslaved, fall regretfully out of love. They engage in combat with the beloved, enjoy his kisses, and during drinking and feasting (the 'symposia' and the 'comoi') they celebrate him with wine and song. Several epigrams in books XI and XII are aimed sarcastically (and perhaps sometimes rather enviously) at teachers who take advantage of their pupils (XII.34, 219, 222). Others are more simply scurrilous (XI.225—three men on a bed make four if you count the middle one twice; XI.272—on passive males). The love of boys is described as fire, tempest, and wounding in battle, while the pursuit of them is variously compared with hunting and snaring. Among a certain amount of conventional imagery, the pederastic poems of the Anthology often convey their message with realism, wit, and pointed plays on words. The situations they describe may now seem to us daring, but this adds to their vigorous charm. The 310 erotic poems of book V are, with few exceptions, heterosexual and are addressed to women who may be the poet's beloved, his adored sexual object, his difficult mistress, his unattainable ideal beauty. The occasions tend to be described more conventionally than in book XII, and there is less room given to naturalistic elements. The reason for this may well be that the poets are imitating models of sophisticated dalliance and sensual love, so that we may often doubt whether particular poems are expressions of real feelings rather than exercises in rhetoric. There are certain similarities with the gallant poetry of seventeenth and eighteenth-century England and France. The names of the beloved women are often conventional, and so, too, is the range of imagery used: night, moon, shipwrecks, arrows of desire, the dawn arriving all too soon, and so on. So we read that Doris has chained the poet with a strand of golden hair (V.230), and that Asclepias's eyes are blue like the sea and invite him to sail on waves of love (V.156). Despite this, many poems avoid banality, while, together with several epigrams in the satirical section of book XI, some are frankly obscene: Lydia says she can satisfy three men simultaneously (V.49); Conon's wife is taller than him, so in bed where are his lips when their feet are level? (XI.108); on cunnilingus (XI.329); the poet advises sodomy if the beloved is pregnant (V.54). With its wide range of subjects and variations in tone and style, the Greek Anthology can justly be ranked among the great books of Western literature.

PATRICK POLLARD

Further Reading

- The Greek Anthology*. With an English Translation by W.R. Paton. London and Cambridge (MA): Loeb Library, 1916 (reprinted and revised 1979).
- Anthologie grecque*. Texte établi et traduit par Pierre Waltz [et Robert Aubreton] en collaboration avec Jean Guillon [Félix Buffière et Jean Irigoien]. Paris: Les Belles Lettres (Collection Budé): vol.II (livre V) revu et corrigé 1990; vol.X (livre XI) 1972; vol.XII (livre XI) 1994.
- The Greek Anthology and other ancient Greek epigrams*. A selection in modern verse translations, edited with an introduction by P.Jay [Revised edition]. Harmondsworth: Penguin Books, 1981.
- Buffière, F. Eros adolescent. La Pédérastie dans la Grèce antique. Paris: Les Belles Lettres, 1980.
- Cameron, A. The Greek Anthology from Meleager to Planudes. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1993.
- Symonds, J.A. Studies of the Greek Poets. Third edition. London: A. and C. Black, 1920 (1893).
- Tarán, S.L. The Art of Variation in the Hellenistic Epigram. Leiden: Brill, 1979.

---

GREEK: MODERN

---

For a long time Modern Greek writers faced the difficult task of incorporating in their works the heritage of ancient Greece with that of Byzantium, which has decisively shaped post-classical Greek experiences. To a certain degree this struggle, especially when done consciously, dominated and often suppressed the free expression of erotic feeling. Inextricably intertwined with Greek history, Modern Greek literature often chose to channel eroticism through reflection on national issues. Lyric and gentle tones of tender desire, allusions, and youthful memories often suffice in order to relate the erotic experiences of a nation preoccupied with preserving its identity. The yearning for the beloved is often compared with the desire for freedom; explicit sexual descriptions, especially in works relating the foreign occupations suffered by the Greeks, tend to carry negative connotations, often associated with lack of modesty or crimes that fuel the anger of the enslaved people. On the contrary, sanctioned relationships undergo consummation amid passionate descriptions of feelings; explicit references are limited to the physical changes that the enamoured witness on their bodies. In addition, during the few carefree moments that the Greeks celebrated in their recent history, they gave precedence to a humorous approach of love, which allowed the writers to become slightly more descriptive and even obscene. In addition, in all their literary history Greek writers, almost unanimously, praise youthful love and the first erotic experience, perhaps because reality and social pressures were soon to impose their pace on the erotic mood of the individuals. It could be said that by way of continuing the Hesiodic notion of Eros, Modern Greek writers still classified love, romantic or more sensual, as the unwanted affliction that tortures the body and the mind with reminders of a short-lived youth and social issues that often remain unresolved.

Nevertheless, in more recent years, eroticism found more substantial expression in Greek literature and indeed produced some excellent descriptions of sensual fulfilment. In particular the feminine erotic experience found its voice in the works of Freddy Germanos' (1934–1999) such as his Tereza of 1997, in Mara Meimaridi's Magisses tis Smirnis (2001) and in Kostas Karakasis' Athina (2000). These novels, among numerous others, focus on the exceptional stories of unusually strong women that succeeded in a masculine world of different social norms. The heroines' search for love and pleasure becomes the mirror for the customs of their epoch which they set to overcome. In the following pages the history of Modern Greek Erotic Literature is reviewed chronologically with emphasis given on the more recent centuries.

The Byzantine Heritage

The fall of Constantinople in 1453 arguably signifies the start of Modern Greek literature, sealed with the epic of Digenis Akritas and the chivalric romances of the fourteenth century. This tradition is believed to continue unbroken until 1669 when Crete fell to the Turks.

Digenis Akritas, published in 1875 from a manuscript at Trepizond (K.N. Sathas and E. Legrand), survived in five more versions: two from Andros, from Grottaferrata near Rome, from Oxford and Escorial. The middle of the eleventh century is a firm terminus ante quem for the original text. The main hero is Vasilis Digenis Akritas: the first three books talk about his origin; the other five relate his adventures and his love story, an elopement, with the girl's cooperation. In book six (Grottaferrata ms.) or seven (the other mss.) Digenis narrates his duel with the Amazon Maximo with erotic overtones. Sexual references are frequent and explicit in a celebration of youthful virility and passionate bravery.

From 1204 to 1261, Constantinople was occupied by Frankish Crusaders. Despite their short stay, they exercised a strong influence in literature from the thirteenth to the fifteenth century. Under the influence of the Chronicle of the Morea, a series of Romances of Love and Chivalry were produced: they typically depict the separation of two lovers, who suffer trials and adventures until they are happily united. Unlike the Epic of Digenis, the romances represent a more romantic orientation in Modern Greek reminiscent of the French roman courtois and the ballads of the Arthurian cycle. The erotic element is dominant, with its melancholy and oppression, but also with its sensual fulfilment. The love of adventure and the fairytale motifs, employed profusely, indicate a strong eastern influence. The writers also knew the romances of the Second Sophistic from which they borrow their long and detailed descriptions (ecphrasis). In some romances we find katalogia, apparently independent demotic songs of the time. Five romances came down to us: Libistros and Rodamne, probably written in the fourteenth century in demotic Greek; Kallimachos and Chrysorrhoe by Andronicus Palaeologus with its abundant legendary elements dates between 1310 and 1340; and Belanthros and Chrysantza, with its sensual tone, distinguished for its demotic language. The two other romances are adaptations of popular western originals of the twelfth century: Imperios and Margarona, a version of the French Pierre de Provence et la belle Maguelone, and Forios and Platziaflora, a recension of the French romance Floire et Blanchefleur. The Greek adapter, who wrote just before the middle of the fifteenth century, drew directly on a metrical Tuscan version of the early fourteenth century, Il cantare di Florio e Biancifiore. His focus on youthful love and the spiritual affinity between the couple seems to herald a new spirit. These romances introduced the Greek public to then contemporary European notions of love, although the endless and often unnecessary adventures of the couple, tend to be tiring for the reader. Once more, love gradually falls into the background as the incentive that fuels the tenacity of the enamoured couple, often leaving essential issues of sexual maturation and compatibility unanswered. In a way, these works carry back to Greek speaking audiences the spirit of Menander, mostly evident, in cases of lost children who are finally recognized and have their social status reinstated.

Krumbacher also referred to 'romances with a national subject' such as the Life of Alexander, a metrical version of the well-known Hellenistic romance of Pseudo-Callisthenes dated in 1388.

The Tale of Achilles or the Achilleid of the fifteenth century is a love romance about the mythical hero Achilles. Despite their intentions, these romances fail to persuade the reader in the emotional depth of the passions they describe.

In the places which remained in Frankish domination after 1453 (mainly on the coasts and islands) literary production was little affected by the great disaster. There in the second half of the fifteenth century, Byzantine tales gradually gave way to erotic lyric songs, both demotic and more artistic. The earliest (ca 1450) and most remarkable collection, the Erotopaignia, survives in a British Museum manuscript and paves the way for the poetry of the second half of the fifteenth century. It may be a collection of entirely demotic lines or, possibly, the original works of a learned poet.

The autobiographical poems of S. Sachlikis date in the late fifteenth and early sixteenth century and draw on his rather prodigal life. Kastro or Chandax (nowadays Heraclion) features his quarrels with courtesan Koutagiotaina, while his Strange Story satirizes the courtesans. His lines revive the underground life of this great harbor, a then colony of Venice. Interestingly, his exaggerated images are more convincing, perhaps because he focuses on realistic figures rather than dainty daughters of the nobility. Marinus Falieros wrote two similar poems distinguished for their original erotic imagery and their allegorical mood: the poet sees in his dreams (one of the poems is entitled History and Dream) his beloved together with Destiny and Pothoula (personification of love). An important, yet anonymous, erotic composition appears to have been The Rimada of the Girl and the Youth (which Legrand called La séduction de la jeune fille), a lyric work distinguished for its narrative skill and genuine demotic expression. Its sensual realism, full of freshness and grace, shows close affinity with demotic love songs.

At the same period in Cyprus, a series of exceptional lyric love-poems was produced under the spell of Petrarchism. The poems were written in the Cypriot idiom, the Italian hendecasyllable (instead of conventional decapentasyllable) and in a variety of Renaissance forms: sonnets, octaves, terzinas, even canzones, sestinas, ballades, barzelettas etc. The Italian influence on these poems is marked; some are direct imitations of Petrarch and his followers (J. Sannazaro and P. Bembo); others full of the spirit of Petrarchism. The love-poems of Cyprus are one of the highest points of Renaissance literature in Greece, but had no sequel after 1571 when Cyprus fell to the Turks.

In 1570, almost the only Greek lands left under Venetian domination were Crete and the Ionian islands. Both were to play an important role in literature, Crete at once, the Ionian islands later. Cretan literature of the late sixteenth and of the seventeenth centuries is a Golden period in the history of Modern Greek literature. The writers of this period elevated the demotic idiom to pure literary language. Theater, which returned to Europe only under the free spirit of the Renaissance, was introduced in Crete by George Chortatsis, a near contemporary of Shakespeare. His earliest work, Gyparis or Panoria (c.1585–1590), was a pastoral play modeled on La Calisto of Luigi Grotto (Venice, 1583), a typical Italian tragicommedia pastorale, with the exception that the plot involves two pairs of enamoured shepherds: Gyparis loves Panoria and Alexis, Athousa. The shepherdesses scorn their love and prefer to live hunting in the woods. Chortatsis' Erofilo (c. 1585–1600) was based on the Italian Classical Orbecche of Giambattista Giraldi (1547), which he handled with complete originality: the secret marriage of Erofilo and Panaretos is tragically brought to an end when her father, king Philogonos, kills the groom and serves his limbs to Erofilo, who commits suicide. The chorus of girls kills the king. Between the acts four intermezzi dramatized the episode of Rinaldo and Armida from the Gerusalemme Liberata of Torquato Tasso. In Chortatsis' works love becomes the incentive for extraordinary adventures and amazing turns of fortunes that can transform with its magic the dull lives of his young protagonists. In addition, in correspondence with literary movements in the west, love becomes the tool for exploring novel literary forms. His two other tragedies that survived are later than Erofilo and inferior in poetic worth. King Rodolinos by Joannes Andreas Troilos of Rethymno, printed in Venice in 1647, drew on the late dramatic work of Tasso, Il Re Torrismondo (1587), which relates the conflict between love and friendship. Chortatsis also engaged with erotic themes in his most popular comedy Katzourbos (c.1595–1600) which originates in the Italian comedia erudita of the sixteenth century. Fortounatos of Markos Antonios Foskolos is clearly indebted to Katzourbos. Stathis, an anonymous play written before 1648, is akin to Shakespeare's A Midsummer's Night Dream and revolves around the erotic adventures of two couples.

All the works of this period are dramatic, apart from the early Voskopoula and the more mature Erotokritos. Voskopoula, first printed in 1627, was popular despite its naïve treatment of pastoral love. Erotokritos by Vitsentzos Kornaros has been characterized as a love poem but Politis insists on calling it, a verse-romance. In his introduction the poet states his subjects as 'power of love' and the 'troubles of arms.' The poem relates in five parts and 10,000 lines the love of Erotokritos and Aretousa, their toils and troubles until the final happy ending. The tale could be seen as the most successful epilogue to the romances of the early Byzantine period, now fully adjusted to the Cretan reality of the seventeenth century; long descriptions convey the yearning of the two lovers and their unbreakable devotion to each other in almost lyric tones. Erotokritos, written c. 1640–1660 at Sitia and Kastro, takes its theme from a medieval French romance of chivalry by Pierre de la Cypède, Paris et Vienne. The Turkish occupation of 1669 begins a decline in poetry for a century and a half. After 1669, the tradition of Cretan literature was preserved in the Ionian Islands, but it was not continued. The 150 years between 1669 and 1821 (Greek Revolution) may be divided in two main periods, the division coming c. 1770–1780. In 1774, the Russo-Turkish treaty of Kutchuk Kainardji gave special privileges to the Greeks in the Turkish Empire, thus ensuring the rise of a new, prosperous urban class. During the next fifty years, a new energy was manifested in all fields and of course, in erotic composition. Greek Enlightenment entered into its peak in the last decades of the eighteenth century.

All along these centuries, the demotic song that defies chronological classification was continuously popular. It flourished for the last time just before the War of Independence, chiefly in mainland Greece. The demotic paraloges, songs more artistically accomplished, often treated the themes of love and marriage. The marriage songs are closely connected with the wedding ritual, but the love songs are distinguished for their lyricism and grace. They are often confined to distichs, lianotragouda or amanedes, patinades or mantinades, but many are longer ballads.

In most songs the erotic element appears suppressed by the war-like environment of the heroes; yet the widespread ballad of Chartzianis or the Sun-born maiden introduces erotic themes along with transvestism. Baud-Bovy places it in the Dodecanese in the twelfth century. Here and more generally in the islands of the Aegean, a whole series of love songs had its origin. They belong to the time of the Frankish occupation, from the thirteenth to the fifteenth century, the age of the romances of love and chivalry, among which we find many katalogia. The Frankish influence is strong; their lyrical tone is reminiscent of the Erotopaignia. Among the love-songs, Baud-Bovy distinguishes a group evolving around the unconventional figure of the mistress or the unfaithful wife. These songs bring to mind the poems of Sachlikis; their origin must be Crete, from the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries (the earliest songs) to the sixteenth. Demotic songs will continue to be written and reproduced throughout the seventeenth and eighteenth century favoring detailed physical descriptions in order to convey eroticism: the eyes, the way she walks or dances, her elaborate clothing, the beloved's beauty spots, all excite the pain and impatience of the lover in a pastoral environment that exhibits pathetic fallacy for his suffering.

The Nineteenth Century

The last decade of the eighteenth century and the first two of the nineteenth were most critical for modern Hellenism. The Greek nation was slowly but surely approaching a new unity and was nearing the final liberation. Rigas Velestinlis or Pheraios, born c. 1757 in the Thessalian village of Velestino, published in Vienna after his arrival in 1790–1791. Rigas was devoted to the national cause and became, after his murder in 1798, the first martyr of Greek liberty; however, his first work, The School for Delicate Lovers (Vienna, 1790), was a collection of six short love-stories, the first in modern Greek literature. A translation, apparently, from Restif de la Bretonne, a less known French author, it had considerable success. In 1792, also in Vienna, an unknown writer published a similar work, The Results of Love, three original tales that drew more on the Greek social life of Constantinople and Wallachia, where flirting was fashionable among the youths of the elite. A new class of wealthy traders enjoyed for the first time the luxury of playful, feminine company in an ambience of almost Parisian eroticism. The unknown writer inserted in his stories short popular poems which combine eastern melancholy with a premature and confused romanticism.

Athanasios Christopoulos, born in 1772 at Kastoria, published his Lyric in 1811, thus inaugurating a new period in Modern Greek poetry. At first glance, his 'Erotic' and 'Bacchic' songs (his own division) belong to the realm of contemporary European classicism. The 'Bacchic' songs, for which his contemporaries called him the 'new Anacreon,' were imitations of the numerous post-classical anacreontics. He sings of love and wine, and represents himself as continuously lovesick; his love is never a grand passion, but rather a sport or amusement. His poems, full of mythological details, lack passion, as critics often pointed out. Yiannis Vilaras, born in 1771 at Ioannina, published in 1814 the Romaic Language which included erotic verse. Dionysios Solomos was born in 1798. He had an Italian education, but upon his return to Greece in 1818 at the age of twenty, he taught himself to compose poetry in Greek. His themes are full of the revolution of the Greeks against the Turks and he wrote the National Anthem. In 1834, a large part of his poem Lambros was published in the Ionian Anthology: Lambros, a minor Don Juan, who seduces young Maria, is wicked in conduct but great in soul. At the time of composition, Solomos was tormented with romantic visions, but the piece was later reworked. Solomos' poetry remained fragmentary and never reached completion. We have a sketch of La Donna Velata, his one real love-poem. Generally the Heptanesian School initiated with Andreas Kalvos (born in Zakynthos in 1792) was far too preoccupied with national and social problems to produce erotic verse. Antonios Matesis (1794–1875), a friend of Solomos, wrote a drama called The Basil Plant (1830) commenting on social contrasts at the beginning of the eighteenth century: a young man from the second-best families loves a girl from the best. Julius Typaldos in his Divers Poems (1856) also produced some erotic verses. Aristotelis Valaoritis from Leucas (1824–1879), a politician and poet, was inspired by the romanticism of Victor Hugo.

After the establishment of the Greek state, intense intellectual and literary activity was developing side by side with political life. Romanticism dominated French and soon Greek literature around 1830–1840. Greek Romantic poets opted to compose in the Katharevousa. Their erotic visions like their language often seems restrained and lacks sincere passion and vivacity. Panagiotis Soutsos (1806–1868) wrote lyric, erotic poems in the manner of Christopoulos. In 1827, he wrote the Traveller in Greece, published in 1831. The two protagonists, the Traveller and Ralou, meet again, fail to recognize each other, faint, suffer delusion, commit suicide, exchanging with their last breath the most heart-rending words of love. In 1835, he published the poetic collection Guitar including love-poems. Alexandros Rizos Rangavis (1809–1892) was of a noble Phanariot and a cousin of Soutsos. Among his work that amount to 19 volumes, Dimos and Eleni (1831) combined Byron's Romantic structure with an overlay of Greek culture. George Zalokostas (1805–1858) from Epirus wrote some erotic poems. Demetrios Vernadakis (1834–1907) and Spyridon Vasiliadis (1845–1874) wrote romantic plays in classical speech forms. Achilles Paraschos (1838–1895) represents the end of Romanticism in Greece. In his love poems, the Myrtles, included in his Complete Works (1881) romanticism almost collapses into a parody of itself.

In the nineteenth century, important writers of fiction like Emmanuel Roidis (1836–1904) with his Pope Joan (1865), Alexandros Papadiamantis (1851–1911) with his Fonissa (1903), and Georgios Vizyinos (1849–1896) with My Mother's Sin touch upon issues of gender and social oppression. Here again sexuality and procreation are depicted as harshly imposed by social norms that the individuals never questioned; mute suffering and self-inflicted guilt do not allow for any romantic escape from a miserable, disorientated life. Only tragic highlights signify the rotten side of sexual occurrences. Other writers of the period include Ioannes Papadiamantopoulos, a symbolist writing under the name Jean Moréas. He influenced several writers such as Konstantinos Hadzopoulos (1868–1920) and the poet Miltiades Malakasses (1869–1943). The eroticism of their works is often reduced to an exploration of feelings, while sensual innuendos linger in the misty weather as painful memories. Georgios Souris (1853–1919) was a political satirist in the tradition of Aristophanes but also wrote humorous, obscene rhymes.

The Twentieth Century

Until the middle of the twentieth century Greek literature was preoccupied with social issues; hence, Andreas Karkavitas (1866–1922), known for his sea tales, published only two erotic stories, the Lygeri (1890) and the Old Loves (1900). Argyris Eftaliotis (1849–1923), influenced by Shakespeare, wrote his Words of Love, a series of sonnets addressed to his wife. In his verses love and conjugal affection overcome sexual passion. The novelist Gr. Xenopoulos (1867–1951) recognized as his masters, realists Balzac and Zola, along naturalists Dickens and Daudet. Some of his novels were: Margarita Stefa (1893), Laura (1915), Anadyomeni (1923), and Teresa Varma Dakosta (1925). From all his works, The Secrets of Countess Valeraina (1904) and Stella Violanti (1909) were most influential. At the end of his life, using demotic for the first time, he wrote the lyrical novel First Love (1920) drawing on his early memories of Crete. Yiannis Vlachogiannis (1867–1945) wrote in demotic prose erotic stories such as The Cock (1914), distinguished for its psychological nuances. On stage, for about ten years from 1888 a new kind of play, the Comidyll, became a popular vehicle of eroticism; it was a kind of comedy with songs introduced, which hoped to escape Romanticism. The first real such musical is the very popular Fortune of Maroula by D. Koromilas (1850–1898). The erotic element functions almost complementarily in a play that evolves around a central erotic theme, indeed the paradox of most of Greek literature. On stage as in literature, love is chosen to exemplify and ridicule oppressive social norms. In 1891, Koromilas wrote a dramatic idyll, the Lover of the Shepherdess, in bombastic decapentasyllables, offering a beautified picture of pastoral life in the mountains.

Kostas Krystallis (1868–1894) published two collections, Poems of the Fields (1890) and the Singer of the Village and the Pasture (1892) attesting his strong influence from the demotic songs. After his death sonnets became particularly popular, under the sway of Parnassianism. Lorentzos Mavilis of Corfu (1860–1912) wrote his most successful sonnets around 1895–1900. Ioannis Gryparis (1870–1942) also made a triumphant appearance in Modern Greek poetry with a series of sonnets, under the title Scarabs. The influence of Heredia or Theophile Gautier

(they belong to Parnassianism) is evident both on his Scarabs and the Terracottas. But in Inter-media (1899–1901) he favored the technique of symbolism. One of the most popular lyric poets in the early part of the twentieth century was Georgios Drosines (1859–1951). His work includes the poetic volumes Photera skotadia (1903–1914) and Klista Vlephara (1914–1917). The poet Maria Polydouri (1902–1930) also gained renown for her intense, love lyrics. The eroticism of her verses is a fresh breath of uninhibited sexual gratification.

Palamas (1859–1943), born in Patras, is one of the best known Greek poets of the twentieth century. His death in 1943 during the German occupation was attended by thousands. He published The Songs of My Fatherland in 1886 and his Lambs and Anapaests in 1897. His best poetry is contained in Asalephti Zoi (1904). His long poem Phloyera tou Vasilia (1910) presents a pageant of Byzantine history; his epic masterpiece The Twelve Words of the Gypsy (1907) relates the aspirations of Modern Greeks. His poetry is full of subtle eroticism associated with a classical concept of beauty. While Palamas was at his zenith in Athens, Konstantinos Kavafis (Cafavy) (1863–1933), who succeeded him in importance, was working at Alexandria, an isolated area of Hellenism. His first publications in katharevousa begin in 1886; their romantic and pessimistic tone is close to the poetry of Dimitrios Paparrigopoulos (1843–1873), with clear influences by Hugo and Musset. In 1891, Kavafis published in a pamphlet the Builders and in 1896 he wrote the Walls, poems synonymous with his unique style. The corpus of his acknowledged poems amounts to 154 given that he disowned much of his work. His poems divided in philosophical, historical, and erotic, are short and were often circulated in small pamphlets. Much has been written about his homosexuality and the role it played in the composition of his poems, but later criticism drew attention on other elements of his work. His purely erotic poems are few, although the figure of a beautiful youth, or most typically his memory, is omnipresent in his poetry. Fundamentally Kavafis is preoccupied with transmuting his erotic sentiment into poetry. Dinos Christianopoulos (1931–) found in Cavafis a model of homosexual expression. Angelos Sikelianos from Leucas sprang from the tradition of the Heptanesian School. His early works, influenced by late Parnassianism and Symbolism, were omitted from his Collected Works, the Lyric Life (1946). His first real poem, The Light-Shadowed of 1907, was published in 1909. Sikelianos' obsession evolved around the identification of the poet with nature, a theme anticipated in his early Hymn of the Great Return and his long composition, Prologue to Life. In 1915–1917 he published four parts, each entitled Consciousness —of the earth, of race, of woman, and of faith (the fifth, the consciousness of personal creativity, was published much later). Sikelianos conceived in his poetry a universal vision of a world evolving around love. He wished the erotic element to claim its place in the universe and allow for an 'erotic,' a cosmic union between the poet and divine creation. In his Study of Death (1936–1939) he appears as searching for the primal essence of the feminine and for an identification of body and soul, which could eventually conquer mortality. He also wrote a series of lyric poems called Orphic (1927–1942), the Sacred Way (1935) and the Attic (1942). Sikelianos' search for the primordial feminine element is a recurrent theme in Greek literature, typically associated with classical nuances of fertility and motherhood.

Nikos Kazantzakis (1883–1957), a contemporary of Sikelianos, reflected in his numerous works on social immorality and the hypocrisy of the clergy. Love and lust, described with vivid detail, are seen as covered with the guilt society attached to them. Kazantzakis always envisioned the liberation of man through his own humanity and sensual love is for him a most powerful expression of our mortal boundaries. Among his most popular novels, are Zorba the Greek (1943), The Greek Passion (1948), and The Last Temptation of Christ (1951). Other novelists that contributed to the literature of this period are: Elias Venezis (1904–1973) with his realistic descriptions in Galene (1939), Aioliki Gi (1943), Number 31328 (1924), Dido Sotiriou (1909–2004) with Matomena Chomata among other works, Stratis Myrivilis with his romantic charm in The Teacher with the Golden Eyes (1932), Vasilis Arvanitis (1934–1943), Small Flames (1942), and The Mermaid Madonna (1955) are inspired by the Greek disaster of 1922 in Asia Minor. First loves are doomed to remain unfulfilled due to the Turkish massacre and ensuing mass migration or sadly coincide with the introduction to the German Resistance.

GREEK: MODERN

Kosmas Politis with his insight into the character of women in his Lemonodasos (1928), Hekate (1933), and Eroica (1938); George Theotokas (1905–1968) with his Demon (1938) and Leonis (1940) also celebrates the first love which in classical mode afflicts the limbs as well as the mind of the enamoured. Kostas Varnalis (1884–1974) introduced in poetry a spirit of destruction that was to characterize poets of the First World War, like Romos Filyras (1889–1942), the pseudonym of J. Ikonopoulos, who published his first works in 1911. Despite his eroticism and idealism, his poetry is ruled by grief and a sense of loss. Nostalgia for lost prospects is also expressed in the poetry of neo-Romantic Kostas Ouranis (1890–1953) while melancholy and despair dominates the mature works of Napoleon Lapathiotis (1888–1943). The greatest representative of this movement is Kostas Karyotakis (1896–1928) with his Pain of Man and Things (1919), and Nepenthe (1921). Just before his suicide he published the Elegies and Satires (1928); his poetry expresses an overflowing desire for life in stark contradiction with a sense of vanity. Tellos Agras (the pseudonym of Evangelos Ioannou, 1899–1944) belonged to the same world.

At the same period, I. Dragoumis (1878–1920) produced samples of psychological writing in his Booldof Heroes and Martyrs (1907), Samothrace (1909), and Those Living (1911). Penelope Delta (1874–1941) wrote historical novels such as The Time of the Bulgar-Slayer (1911) and In the Secret Places of the Lagoon (1937). In these the erotic element is lurking powerfully in the background, but never finds clear expression or fulfilment. Desire and erotic promises keep the soldiers dedicated to the cause; sexual crimes excite their revenge instincts. Like most of the nineteenth-century Greek writings, in these novels the feminine embrace is the place where national heroes are born and raised; sexual memories only underline the yearning of soldiers, miles away from home, unable to materialize a simple life. Another major obstacle in the free expression of eroticism in Greek literature was the fact that authors often wrote under the spell of a European literary movement, which often meant that they were more preoccupied with ‘belonging’ to a specific school of writing rather than exploring love in an imaginative way. K. Christomanos (1867–1911) brought to Greece the climate of the European fin de siècle and the aestheticism of Oscar Wilde with The Wax Doll (1911); here again sexual consummation is related with an ill-fated wedding and a sense of guilt in seeking a new erotic partner. Kostas Chadzopoulos (1870–1920) wrote the novels The Tower of Akropotamos (1909) and Love in the Village (1910) on social issues. In Autumn (1917), under the influence of Scandinavian literature, he describes the emotions of his characters by suggestion, thus introducing symbolism into prose. His work was very influential in the decade 1920–1930 on young writers like Constantinos Theotokis (1872–1923) who also had social interests (The Convict [1919], Life and Death of Karavelas [1920]).

Giorgos Seferis (real name Seferiadis) was born in 1900 in Smyrna and died in Athens in 1971. In 1931, he published the Strophe wishing to break free from the overshadowing figures of Palamas and Karyotakis. The collection, influenced by the style of Valéry and Mallarmé, is dominated by a long poem, Erotikos Logos, written in the tradition of the seventeenth-century Erotokritos. His second work, the lyrical Cistern (1932) is influenced by T.S. Eliot. His Muthistorema (1935) with its fusion of Modern Greek history and classical mythology is considered the most representative text of Greek Modernism. Seferis, who had a recognized diplomatic career, expressed in his poems many of his political experiences such as the Metaxas dictatorship (1936), the German occupation, his flight, along with the Greek government to South Africa and Egypt, the civil war that followed (Book of Exercises and Logbook I [1940], Manuscript 41, Logbook II [1944]). In 1947, he published his most mature work, The Thrush, a three-part ‘musical’ composition, where personal and erotic memories are freely interwoven with the traumatic memories of WWII and the tragedy of the Civil War. In 1953, Seferis discovered Cyprus and published his Logbook III (1955) inspired by the long history of the island. In 1963, he became the first Greek author to be awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature. His funeral, during the military junta, turned into one of the largest mass demonstrations against the regime.

Odysseus Elytis (real name Alepoudelis, 1911–1996), who won the Nobel Prize in 1979, was one of the few Greek surrealists along with Andreas Embeiricos (1901–1975) and Nikos Engonopoulos (1910–1985). His major works include The Sovereign Sun (1943) and Axion Esti (1959). Although his war experiences dominate his work in many poems he captures young love in collections such as Ta Ro tou Eroti (1972) and Eros, Eros, Eros (1998). His erotic verse is characterized by the youthful and carefree energy that Love inspires to his victims; his poetry oozes a bursting joy in which nature participates. Again the eternal theme of beauty acquires a central role in Elytis' celebration of love. From this tradition sprang Nanos Valaoritis (1921–) who composed under Andre Breton.

Numerous novels were written about the Greek Resistance movement and the ensuing civil war while Thanasis Valtinos (1932–) in his Deep Blue Almost Black (1992) and the poet Manolis Anagnostatis (1925–) relate the Greek experiences from the dictatorship of 1967–1974. Yiannis Ritsos (1909–1990) was mainly inspired by communistic thought, but his 1982 Erotica celebrate love and life in lyric tones. Erotic longing as well as loss, which often intermingle in Greek poetry, are described with great warmth, almost as if the poet whispered the words to his beloved. Novelists such as Stratis Tsirkas (1911–1980), Costas Taktis (1927–1988), and Vassilis Vassilikos (1934–) focused on post-war Greek society. With regards to theatrical production, from the 1950s onwards plays of younger writers dealt with contemporary problems. In the late twentieth century, Modern Greek prose diversified to incorporate new perspectives. More women writers appeared, more writers challenged tradition in their works, and more authors focused on the present rather than the past. Margarita Karapanou's O ipnovatis (1986) challenged the status quo of the upper middle class in contemporary Greek society. Fiction writer and poet Rhea Galanaki wrote the historical novel Life of Ismail Ferik Pasha (1996), based on a nineteenth-century Cretan revolutionary. Meanwhile, a group of women lyric poets have gained distinction, including Victoria Theodorou (1928–), Angeliki Paulopoulou (1930–), Eleni Fourtouni (1933–), and Katerina Anghelaki-Rooke (1934–). These poets rendered erotic desire from a feminine point of view, touching upon sensitive issues of unfulfilled expectations, sexual and more. Several novelists began, in the 1950s, to turn away from fiction specifically about the war and its aftermath to novels dealing with other aspects of existence. Antonis Samarakis (1919–2003) wrote of individuals caught in the pressures of modern society, as in The Flaw (1965); Galatia Sarandi dealt with the contemporary psychological stress of women and her 1982 collection Elene, emphasized family and love relationships. Nikos Gatsos (1911–1992) and Nikos Kavadias (1910–1975) provided the lyrics for several popular songs in which erotic experiences shape people's lives and characters, haunting our memories and hopes for ever. Our deepest needs come to the front of our consciousness like sea waves that never cease coming in visions that often mingle sexual desires with the sailor's undying love for the sea, yet another common pattern of Greek poetry and thought, here rendered with novel freshness. Man is powerless in front of the sea, like he is in front of love; the ancient admiration for the power of love on men's minds and bodies is attributed here to a cosmopolitan overlay due to the foreign travels of the two poets. Nikos-Alexis Aslanoglou (1931–1996) wrote erotic poetry in melancholic tones while Andreas Anghelakis is distinguished for his prosaic and erotic style. Nikiforos Vrettakos (1912–1991) composes on love and peace while Olga Broumas (1949–) writes homoerotic poetry in the Sapphic tradition. Miltos Sahtouris (1919–) with his dark poetry, and Kiki Dimoula (1931–) are considered two of the greatest living poets of Greece.

EVANGELIA ANAGNOSTOU-LAOUTIDES

Bibliography

- L. Politis (1973). A History of Modern Greek Literature, C.A. Trypanis (1981) Greek Poetry from Homer to Seferis, R. Beaton (1999) An Introduction to Modern Greek Literature, D. Tziouvas (1997) Greek Modernism and Beyond, R. Dalven (1994) Daughters of Sappho.

Further Reading

- Barnstone, W. ed. (1972) Eighteen Texts: Writings by Contemporary Greek Authors.
 Keeley, E. and P. Bien ed. (1972) Modern Greek Writers.
 Anton, J.P. (1995) The Poetry and Poetics of Constantine P. Cavafy.
 Dyck, K. Van. (1998) The Rehearsal of Misunderstanding: Three Collections by Contemporary Greek Women Poets.
 Bien, P. (1972) Kazantzakis and the Linguistic Revolution in Greek Literature and (1983) Three Generations of Greek Writers.
 Kostis, Nicholas (1993) Modern Greek Short Stories.
 Leontis, A. (1997) Greece: A Traveler's Literary Companion, etc.

---

GREEK, ANCIENT: PROSE

---

Elephantis, Heracleides of Pontus, Longus, Lucian, Plutarch, Milesian Tales, Philaenis

The Greek-speaking authors of antiquity wrote a wide variety of literary prose that might be categorized as erotic. Forms ranged from full-length romance narratives with love as their central theme to bawdy novellas, from dramatic dialogues satirizing sexual mores to technical but still literary writing such as sexological works or astrology manuals. The earliest erotic prose works date to the Hellenistic period in the third century BCE, but their production peaked during a revival of Greek literary culture in the second and third centuries CE, the so-called 'Second Sophistic.' With their emphasis on romance, seduction, sexuality, and the erotic development of individuals, the writers of the Second Sophistic are among the first to make the sexual self a field of enquiry, and so their works now tend to be characterized prima facie as erotic literature. However, the extent to which all the types of writing outlined above would have been called erotic by their original authors and readers is debatable. Greek literary conventions allowed erotic and sexually explicit material to be present in many different kinds of writing, so a work's erotic content did not automatically assign it to a genre called 'erotica.' For example, a quasi-literary work like Artemidorus of Daldis' Oneirocritica (second century CE, On Dream Interpretation) refers constantly to every kind of sexual activity while not being a piece of erotic prose any more than its most famous derivative, Sigmund Freud's The Interpretation of Dreams (1900).

In fact, modern critics have had difficulty trying to define what ancient Greek readers regarded as erotic literature, becoming entangled in speculation about what kind of works might have aroused them sexually. It may be more helpful to think about Greek erotic writing in terms of ta erotika, the Greek root of the word 'erotic,' meaning all things related to love, desire, and the emotions in general. Accordingly, literary works such as Plutarch's Dialogue on Love (second century CE, Moralia), which sets out a romantic conception of male–female relationships, could be defined as erotic literature, even though it was written as a rhetorical tour-de-force rather than to titillate. Also in this category could come the treatises on women's virtue attributed to Pythagoras' female followers, such as Perictione's On the Balance which is Becoming in Women (third century BCE?). This discusses how women may attain sexual and emotional harmony through controlled personal behavior. It is also worth including Greek pseudo-scientific writing, such as physiognomic manuals and the astrological or magical texts. The last could certainly be seen as pieces of erotic literary prose in their own right. Some types of spells intersperse ritual instructions with literary passages, especially the so-called 'leading spells for attraction' (agogai) and 'genital unlocking spells' (physikleidia).

This capacious notion of erotic literature had another aspect: the ancient Greeks seem to have had little sense that reading it or listening to it might have bad moral or psychological effects. On the contrary, some erotic prose works were praised for their medical benefits, because they could stimulate impotent men and enable them to have sex normally. The idea of erotic prose as medicine is a reminder of how differently the ancient Greeks conceived literature. It is true that in ancient times certain books were censured for being excessively licentious, among them the short stories by Aristeides of Miletus known as the Milesiaka (second century BCE, The Milesian Tales), and the sexological work attributed to the mythical prostitute Philaenis. However, criticisms of these books are usually embedded in broader critiques of excessive or unbalanced behavior, and an interest in erotika is not singled out as being especially bad per se.

Such criticisms probably did not represent ancient opinion on a wider scale. Indeed, the numerous papyrus texts containing fragments of previously unknown Greek erotic works show just how many of them must have circulated at one time. Knowledge of erotic prose in Greek, especially romantic fiction, has been greatly augmented by these papyrus books, preserved in the dry climate of Egypt. Fragments of at least 24 prose romances or ‘novels’ are now known from papyrus, and almost certainly others wait to be identified. One of the most tantalizing narratives revealed in this way is Lollianus’ Phoinikika (second century CE, The Phoenician Story), which seems to be a picaresque tale with an ego-narrator. Among the surviving parts of the story are scenes of a woman sexually initiating the hero, a riotous festival, and a human sacrifice followed by a communal sex orgy. Another interesting papyrus contains scraps of the so-called Iolaos (author unknown). Here a young man tries to get access to the secluded women’s quarters by masquerading as a eunuch priest who poses no sexual threat, but is caught up in awkward situations of mistaken identity. Both of these works are too fragmentary to yield much more than vignettes of their plot and action. None the less, more is known of The Phoenician Story and Iolaos than of many once-famous Greek erotic works that are now lost entirely, such as Aristides of Miletus’ Milesian Tales. Others survive only when quoted or referred to by other ancient writers who still had access to the texts. At all events, knowledge of ancient Greek prose erotica is still extremely patchy, despite the papyrus finds.

One of the erotic prose works most frequently mentioned by ancient authors was attributed to Philaenis, a legendary courtesan from the island of Samos who is supposed to have lived in the third century BCE. Early Christian bishops singled out Philaenis’ book as an illustration of the worst extremes of pagan sexual folly, and it was thought to have been destroyed, but research into the papyrus finds has yielded its scrappy remains. These provide a glimpse into an almost vanished sub-genre of ancient Greek prose: pornographoi, literally ‘writings about prostitutes.’ Again these works elude any single modern literary category. They incorporate at once pseudo-scientific, biographical, antiquarian, and even quasi-medical elements, because prostitutes were thought to know as much as doctors about the inner workings of the female body. Various quasi-legendary women were supposed to have authored other such books, from famous prostitutes like Cyrene, Lais, and Elephantis to Astyanassa, Helen of Troy’s maid. Although supposed to be the last word in erotic sophistication, Philaenis’ book seems as matter-of-fact as an information manual. Philaenis outlines her intent in a brief introduction. She will give advice to men in need of instruction so that they will not have to waste time in sexual trial and error. She proceeds immediately to giving tips on how to make successful advances, one of which is that men hoping to seduce women should look untidy so that they will not be thought unduly keen. Philaenis also supplies examples of chat-up lines appropriate for various types of women: plain women should be flattered as the equal of the goddesses, old women as young girls, and ugly women as fascinating. The surviving text breaks off just after a section entitled ‘How To Kiss.’ From what the ancient sources tell of the rest of the book, it continued systematically with lists of different positions for heterosexual lovemaking, also arranged according to different female types. Some copies of these erotic manuals may have had illustrations. The Roman Emperor Tiberius (reigned 14–37 CE), a notorious erotomaniac, is supposed to have displayed a de luxe copy of Elephantis’ manual which could be referred to when some sexual inspiration was required.

Prostitutes like Philaenis and Elephantis, writing from the viewpoint of their own extensive sexual experience, were obvious figures to instruct inexperienced Greek men about making love. Sexual initiation of both women and men was clearly of great interest to Greek prose writers, to judge from the frequency with which it appears in the full-length prose romances where Greek erotic fiction found its most elaborate and sophisticated form. The romances developed from diverse branches of Greek literature, not only comic poetry and love lyrics, but also prose forms such as rhetorical composition, which was an important part of elite male education in Greek. Rhetoric suffuses the five prose romances that have survived more or less intact: those of Chariton (mid-first century CE, Chaereas and Callirhoe), Xenophon of Ephesus (mid-second century CE, A Tale of Ephesus), Achilles Tatius (late second century CE, Leucippe and Cleitophon), Longus (c. 200 CE, Daphnis and Chloe) and Heliodorus (third or fourth century CE, An Ethiopian Tale). Not much is known about any of these authors, and even the dates when they wrote are quite uncertain. Artful, rhetorical, and full of literary allusions, the romances were perhaps intended as lighter reading for the educated. Since reading in antiquity was usually done aloud, however, they must have reached a wider audience than the literate who could read them for themselves. Although these five romances have very different situations, characters and plots, they share a certain number of common elements that also appear in the fragmentary ‘novel’ texts. These common elements are integral to developing the narratives’ erotic component and to making love and sex their motivating themes. The centrality of love, desire, sex and, emotions to these romances is reflected in the ancient Greek term for them as a genre. They were apparently known as erotikas hypotheseis, perhaps translatable as ‘romantic stories’ or ‘narratives of love.’

While not in any sense formulaic, the prose romances observe certain conventions of plot and characterization. Their heroes and heroines are young, virginal, and aristocratic. They fall in love and prepare to marry, but are parted in some melodramatic way just before they can do so. The adventures that follow put their mutual sexual devotion to extreme tests. In Xenophon’s A Tale of Ephesus, for instance, the protagonists Anthia and Habrocomes take vows of chastity and fidelity when they are about to be separated. Anthia is eventually sold into slavery abroad. She is bought by a brothel keeper and forced into prostitution, but avoids sex with the clients by pretending to have epilepsy. This is not the first time that Anthia had struggled to save herself for Habrocomes. Earlier in the story, she drank poison rather than marry another man, but the poison only put her into a coma and she recovered - to have her virtue tested again. The apparent murder or suicide of the heroine, later revealed as a subterfuge, is another trope of the prose romances. It enables the writers to explore the poignancy and eroticism that Greek culture attached to the deaths of young women who die virgins. Instead of a living bridegroom, the only lover they will know is death. Alternatively, the heroine’s false death may be accompanied by ritualized sexual violence that now seems disturbingly misogynistic, and is perhaps still concerned with the young heroine’s defloration. For example, Achilles Tatius describes how his heroine Leucippe is kidnapped and bound to posts before being disembowelled and having her heart ripped out. The killers then eat her entrails in an orgiastic communion.

The hazardous separation of the hero and heroine also involves them traveling to one or more of the eroticized spaces of antiquity, especially Egypt, the ancient world’s site of sensual visioning par excellence. This journey is a suitable backdrop for meetings with various characters who discourse on sexual conduct and erotic life in general. Sometimes the relative merits of heterosexual versus male–male relationships are discussed, such as the set-piece debate Achilles Tatius puts into the mouths of his hero Cleitophon and the traveler Menelaus. Cleitophon says that women’s bodies are more appealing and that their beauty lasts longer than that of boys. Also, women can be used sexually like boys, allowing men two possible avenues for pleasure. Menelaus counters with the argument that women are sexually false and their beauty is all artifice: only boys are honest, both physically and emotionally. Love of boys therefore belongs to a higher emotional order. This comparison of sex with women and boys is a rhetorical trope that occurs in quite a number of ancient Greek works, and indicates how far the romance authors were influenced by training in the rhetorical schools. This form of Greek erotica, then, may be regarded as a kind of rhetoric. Despite Menelaus’ defence of male–male homosexuality, erotic relationships between men and women are the central focus in the prose romances. That of the hero and heroine is paradigmatically perfect, but there are also relationships with sexually experienced women who teach a male character about love. The romance authors are much more ambivalent about the quality of these relationships. In Longus’ Daphnis and Chloe, the eponymous hero is seduced by an older woman, Lycaenion. Daphnis’ encounter with her is good in that it gives him the sexual expertise to optimize the sexual relationship he and Chloe will eventually enjoy. Achilles Tatius suggests the same thing in an episode when Cleitophon has sex —one time only— with the rich widow Melite. However, the romances imply that too much sexual involvement with experienced women is dangerous because they are likely to turn out to be predators who consume men. Lycaenion, the name of Daphnis’ seducer, hints at this: it means ‘she-wolf.’ And in Heliodorus’ An Ethiopian Tale, the traveler Kalasiris describes how he became infatuated with the vampish courtesan Rhodopis and was subsequently ruined.

After all these sexual trials and discussions of erotic behavior, the hero and heroine will eventually be reunited. The novelists make it clear that their devotion to each other will be rewarded by the promise of a mutually affective and satisfying sexual relationship. The emphasis on romance and mutually enjoyable erotic relationships between men and women seems new to Greek prose writing and may reflect the changing sexual ideology of the time. How this ideology was different becomes clearer if Philaenis' assumptions about sex are compared with those of the novelists writing several centuries after her. Philaenis assumes that men only need to know about sex in order to please themselves; the novelists assume that men need to know in order to please both themselves and their wives.

An alternative view of sex and relationships from the refined and cultured discourse of the prose romances comes in the anonymous Greek novella known as Lucius or the Ass. This is sometimes attributed to the prolific writer and satirist Lucian of Samosata (c. 115–180 CE), but its authorship is uncertain. Much shorter than the romances, its tone, vocabulary, and content is more frankly sexual and its picaresque plot totally different. Generically, Lucius or the Ass probably has more in common with Aristeides of Miletus' lost Milesian Tales, and may even have been intended as a parody of the erotikas hypotheseis. Certainly it contains some of their conventions, such as the hero's journey into an eroticized foreign space. Lucius or the Ass takes place in Thessaly, a wild border area of Greece famed for the skill of its witches. The hero, Lucius, travels there on business, but is more interested in the region's magical and supernatural associations than work. In Thessaly he stays with Hipparchus, whose wife is an expert witch. In order to find out more about her magical powers, Lucius seduces her maid Palaestra ('gymnasium'), and their intercourse is described at length in a parody of technical terms from athletics. With Palaestra's help, Lucius watches Hipparchus' wife change into an owl after stripping and rubbing herself with magic ointment. Fascinated, he tries the same experiment on himself, but the wrong ointment is used and he changes into an ass. That same night, robbers steal him and a series of degrading adventures begins when various cruel and degenerate people purchase him. His owners include eunuch priests of the Syrian goddess Cybele, who prey on young village boys. Lucius' adventures culminate in a beautiful woman paying to have sex with him while he is still in his animal shape. She is compared to Pasiphae, the mythical Queen of Crete who gave birth to the Minotaur after having sex with a bull—an illustration of how myth was part of the cultural currency of sexual relationships in antiquity. The long description of Lucius' animal-human sexual encounter is uncomfortable for modern readers but may not have been so in ancient times, when the human and animal worlds were less demarcated than they are now, and animals were sometimes worshipped as the incarnations of gods. This scene may also be part of the satire on prose romances. Generally, Lucius or the Ass pokes fun at their polite sensibility and emphasis on sexual restraint by describing the excesses of human sexuality, which here exceed the boundaries of humanity. After this episode, Lucius regains human shape by magical means. The satirical point about sexual extremes is forced home when the woman who enjoyed sex with Lucius as an ass rejects him when she sees him in his human form.

Whether or not Lucian of Samosata was the author of Lucius or the Ass, his satirical dialogues give a similar worm's eye perspective on sexual relationships. Lucian was a great stylist who prided himself on writing correct and elegant Greek, but the satiric form enabled him to present sexual life in a way that is impossible in more self-consciously high-art genres like the prose romance. Both humans and the gods were Lucian's targets. In Dialogues of the Gods, Lucian satirizes the myth of Zeus' abduction of the boy Ganymede, who cannot understand why Zeus should want to have him as a bedfellow because he wriggles. In Dialogues of the Prostitutes, Lucian's lively satirical treatment of low-life female stereotypes like old madams, mannish lesbians, and naïve call-girls gives an insight into male fantasies about the sexual world of women. His presentation of women as sexually insatiable and deceitful is the conventional Greek literary one, but Dialogues of the Prostitutes still contains all sorts of interesting details not found elsewhere, such as the use of sex toys like leather dildos. Lucian's satires, along with the romances of Heliodorus, Longus, and Achilles Tatius, were much read and translated during the European Renaissance and early modern period, with a consequent influence on western authors.

GREEK, ANCIENT: VERSE

DOMINIC MONTSERRAT

Further Reading

- Anderson, Graham. Lucian's Comic Fiction. Leiden 1976.
- Betz, Hans Dieter, editor. The Greek Magical Papyri in Translation, including the Demotic Spells, Volume One: Texts, 2nd edition, Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1992.
- Goldhill, Simon. Foucault's Virginity: Ancient Erotic Fiction and the History of Sexuality. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995.
- King, Helen. "Sowing the Field: Greek and Roman Sexology." In Sexual Knowledge, Sexual Science: The History of Attitudes to Sexuality, edited by Roy Porter and Mikulas Teich. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994.
- Konstan, David. Sexual Symmetry: Love in the Ancient Greek Novel and Related Genres. Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1994.
- Lambropoulou, Voula. "Some Pythagorean Female Virtues." in Women in Antiquity: New Assessments, edited by Richard Hawley and Barbara Levick. London: Routledge, 1995.
- Montague, Holly. "Sweet and Pleasant Passion: Male and Female Fantasy in Ancient Romance Novels." In Pornography and Representation in Greece and Rome, edited by Amy Richlin. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Morgan, John R. and Stoneman, Richard, editors. Greek Fiction: The Greek Novel in Context, London and New York: Routledge, 1994.
- Parker, Holt. "Love's Body Anatomized: The Ancient Erotic Handbooks and the Rhetoric of Sexuality," in Pornography and Representation in Greece and Rome, edited by Amy Richlin. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Reardon, B.P. editor. Collected Ancient Greek Novels. Berkeley, Los Angeles and London: University of California Press, 1989.
- Richlin, Amy, editor. Pornography and Representation in Greece and Rome. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Stephens, Susan A. and Winkler, John J. editors. Ancient Greek Novels: The Fragments. Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1995.
- Tatum, James, editor. The Search for the Ancient Novel. Baltimore and London: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1994.
- Zeitlin, Froma. "The Poetics of Eros; Nature, Art, and Imitation in Longus' Daphnis and Chloe." In David Halperin et al. (editors). Before Sexuality: The Construction of Erotic Experience in the Ancient Greek World. Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1990.

---

GREEK, ANCIENT: VERSE

---

Aristophanes, Agathias, Alcman, Anacreon, Archilochus, Asclepiades, Meleager, Paul the Silentiaru, Philodemus, Sappho, Sophocles, Sotades, Strato

For the poets of ancient Greece, the erotic experience was thought to have two very distinct configurations. In one incarnation of eros, or erotic desire, two lovers share a reciprocal feeling of harmonious love. This type of love, with its mutual consummation of erotic longing, is described by the Greek poets as a singularly pleasurable experience and celebrated in lines of joyous verse. But it is the second type of eros that is much more frequently represented in the verses of the ancient Greeks, that is, the unrequited desire a lover feels for an absent or unresponsive beloved. This eros suggests an unfulfilled and perhaps even unfulfillable feeling of erotic desire, and is denoted by the absence of the beloved, the lack of satisfaction, and the impossibility of erotic realization. In this kind of eros, ubiquitous in the erotic verse of the ancient Greeks, the lover's desire is difficult, painful, and ultimately devastating.

Implied in the Greek poets' literary representations of love is the concept of absence, insufficiency, and deficit. The Greek terms eros "desire," himeros "longing," and pathos "yearning," all indicate this notion of want for something missing. The poets of ancient Greece characterize this feeling of lack attacking both gods and mortals equally, as no one is invulnerable to the troublesome and agonizing pangs of love. Eros is a dangerously compelling force that imposes itself on the lover from an external position of power, and from there controls the lover's miserable fate. The images the Greek poets employ in their verses to portray the disturbing and eventually overwhelming experience of erotic desire all emphasize these detrimental effects: love is like war, disease, madness, and even death.

The Greek poets figure the torment of unsatisfied erotic desire as a uniquely corporeal suffering, and they often depict eros assaulting the lover's body, inflicting severe physical pain and robbing the limbs of health and substance. With the body so weakened under the onslaught of erotic desire, the mind of the lover is also exposed to attack: the poets delineate in almost clinical detail the loss of normal mental capabilities as eros assails the lover's organs of thought and reason. Thus a metaphorical language emerges from this idea of destructive love: eros is a nosos ("sickness") and a mania ("madness") afflicting the unsuspecting lover. The ancient Greek poets tend to focus on the harmful qualities of erotic desire, and it is this negative experience that they most often illustrate in their verses with images of physical trauma, wounding, bodily dissolution, and mental incapacitation.

Greek poetic conceptions about eros began to take shape in the earliest literary documents that survive from their civilization. The idea that erotic desire is a kind of physical attack is first articulated in the Homeric epics, the Iliad and the Odyssey, orally composed epic poems attributed by tradition to Homer and probably written down sometime in the eighth century B.C. Although the Homeric poems do not focus on love in the explicit way that some later Greek poetry does, they offer several early accounts of how eros can have an effect on the bodies and minds of lovers, and how the feeling of erotic desire can influence the lover's course of action. In this respect, certain important erotic episodes deserve particular attention. Homer's Iliad narrates the events in the tenth and final year of the Trojan War, a conflict initiated by one of the most powerful erotic incidents of Greek legend, the seduction of the beautiful Helen of Sparta by the Trojan prince, Paris, with the help and persuasion of the Greek goddess of love, Aphrodite.

In Book 3 of the Iliad, Aphrodite recreates their initial love affair, as she coerces Helen and Paris to come together in their bedroom at Troy for an afternoon of passionate lovemaking. Paris graphically describes how he is "seized" by sexual longing for Helen, and how his senses are "completely veiled" by the sensation of eros (Iliad 3.441–446). The gods themselves are not immune to the uncontrollable feeling of erotic desire, as evinced by the episode in Book 14 of the Iliad, the Dios Apate, or "Seduction of Zeus," arguably the most erotic passage in the entire poem. When the goddess Hera decides to lure her husband Zeus away from the Trojan battlefield, she does so by planning and accomplishing a sexual conquest of the great god: she adorns herself in beautiful clothes and jewelry, and borrows a love-charm from Aphrodite (Iliad 14.160–223). Upon seeing her, Zeus is overwhelmed by eros: his wits are "veiled," his heart is "melted all around," and he is "seized" by sexual desire for his wife (Iliad 14.294–328). Both of these erotic scenes describe the effects of a forceful eros that is about to be satisfied and comprise interludes in the continual warfare that is the primary theme of the Iliad. The Odyssey also presents the theme of eros waiting to be fulfilled, in the depiction of the intense longing of Odysseus and Penelope for each other over a twenty-year separation. Odysseus is described as "wasting away" as he yearns for his wife (Odyssey 5.151–158), and Penelope is constantly portrayed as weeping and longing for her missing husband (e.g., Odyssey 11.181–183, 16.37–39, 19.204–209). Finally, the epic allows for the satisfaction of their deep erotic desire when the couple is blissfully reunited at the end of the poem (Odyssey 23.205–343). The way these episodes in the Homeric poems portray the feeling of eros in both language and imagery had a significant influence on later Greek poets' depiction of the erotic experience as a strong physical force that attacks, occupies, and overcomes the body and mind of the lover.

The two narrative poems of the archaic Greek poet Hesiod, the Theogony and the Works and Days, belong to the same Ionian tradition as the Homeric poems, and were probably composed late in the eighth century B.C. Like the Homeric epics, Hesiod's poems also describe the erotic experiences of both gods and mortals, illustrating human as well as divine reactions to the feelings of love and longing. While the poems of Hesiod embrace the Homeric conception of a violent and powerful eros that can conquer the lover, his verse offers a further exploration of how erotic desire can be experienced as it invades the lover's body. In the genealogical lists of the Theogony, a poem that explains the genesis of all the Greek gods, Hesiod depicts the heavenly couplings of various immortals with language reminiscent of the Homeric images for the might of eros, but with a bold and personal characterization of the forces at work in the feeling of erotic desire. The god Eros is one of the four original deities in Hesiod's account (Theogony, 116–122). As a primordial entity, Eros is introduced at an early point in the poem in order to unite the many generative pairs essential to Hesiod's genealogical model: without erotic desire, Hesiod says, the cosmogonic structure cannot emerge and take its divine shape. Eros is described as “the most beautiful among the deathless gods” (Theogony, 120), but he is also dangerous to the physical and mental well-being of lovers: “he loosens the limbs, and subdues the mind and sensible thought in the breasts of all gods and all humans” (Theogony, 121–122). This vigorous and masterful Eros, together with the personified Himeros, or ‘Longing,’ are later depicted as the companions of Aphrodite, as the goddess of erotic desire is born from the seafoam awash around the severed genitals of the Sky god, Ouranos (Theogony, 201–202). Aphrodite is also accompanied by the Charites, or Graces, daughters of Eurynome, whose erotic beauty is portrayed by Hesiod in a striking description: “From their glancing eyes dripped eros the limb-loosener, and beautiful was their glance from beneath their brows” (Theogony, 910–911). In this passage, erotic desire emanates in a liquid manifestation from the eyes, a place where the power of love in Greek poetry is traditionally thought to reside. Here the images of desire and desirability are confounded, as the alluring look of the Graces' eyes, melting with eros, arouses longing in the limbs, dissolving and destabilizing those who meet their gaze. The appearance of the first female, Pandora, narrated by Hesiod at length in his other poem, the Works and Days (42–105), also offers an erotic crisis of interpretation: she is “an evil men will enjoy embracing” (Works and Days, 57–58). Pandora is endowed with exquisite grace and beauty by the goddess Aphrodite, as well as “painful yearning (pothos) and cares that devour the limbs” (Works and Days, 65–66). As in the figure of the beautiful god Eros, Hesiod contrasts the outward loveliness of the woman Pandora with the underlying erotic perils that her beauty masks, an alluring exterior that arouses strong physical desire, both painful and pleasurable. Through the story of Pandora and the deadly dowry of evils stored in her jar (pithos), Hesiod proposes an erotic mythological explanation for the existence of suffering among humankind, where the woman herself is the embodiment of the experience of intense sexual longing.

The Homeric Hymn to Aphrodite was composed probably in the eight or seventh century CE by a poet using a poetic language similar to Homer's; and like the Hesiodic poems, the Hymn represents a shift towards verse about mythological subject matter. As a story of seduction, the Hymn to Aphrodite contains many elements of structure and language that are parallel to those shaping epic scenes of sexual encounters, yet the primary theme of the Hymn is specifically and explicitly erotic. The Hymn narrates the sensual love between the goddess and her mortal lover, the Trojan prince Anchises, using images of eros as a violent force that subdues almost all who experience its power. Aphrodite is described as the instigator of erotic desire in the world: she “stirs sweet longing (himeros) in the gods and subdues the races of mortal men” (Hymn 2–3). But her ability to cause eros does not protect her against its effects: when the goddess sees Anchises in the midday sunshine, “strikingly longing (himeros) seized her heart” (56–57). The Trojan youth experiences a similar violent onset of love upon seeing her, cleverly disguised as a young virgin, as the poet says “eros seized Anchises” (91), but Aphrodite feels compelled to make certain the job is done right: “the goddess hurled sweet longing (himeros) in his heart, and eros seized Anchises” (143–144). This erotic trajectory, with its emphatic repetition of phrases, culminates in their lovemaking, followed by an exhausted post-coital nap (153–170). When they awaken, Anchises is astonished to find he has just had sex with the divine Aphrodite (181–190), but she assures him he is in no danger, and in fact promises him a glorious line of descendants through their son, the brilliant hero, Aeneas (196–197). The Hymn to Aphrodite portrays the elemental essence of an erotic desire that leads ultimately to a particular kind of immortality for the lovers, human and goddess.

The lyric poets of the Greek archaic period (c. 700–500 BCE.) described the pangs and passions of erotic love using imagery familiar from earlier epic and mythological narrative poetry: love is depicted as a powerful force that seizes and possesses the lover, leaving him wounded, weakened, and gasping for breath. But in the genre of personal lyric poetry, where the main purpose is to grasp and articulate succinctly the immediacy of individual experiences and emotions, the nature of this violent and compelling eros enjoys a conspicuous position and figures prominently as the explicit focus in much of these poets' verses. The tendency of the lyric mode towards the expression of the lover's direct confrontation with erotic desire is exemplified in the poetry of Archilochus of the island of Paros (c. 680–640 BCE.). The extant fragments of his verses occupy a unique status in the Greek poetic tradition, as they represent the earliest surviving examples of the work of a monodic lyric poet. Although Archilochus was most famous in classical antiquity for his poems of invective, the target of which was apparently the family of a certain Neoboule, the woman who was said to have jilted him, a few fragments of his poetry reveal his deliberate interest in describing the effects of sexual longing. The poetry of Archilochus gives first-person voice to stricken lovers, who delineate the languid yet overwhelming physical control they experience under the onslaught of erotic love. In one fragment, Archilochus describes how "limb-loosening" desire (pothos) "conquers" the speaker (Fragment 196); in another fragment, again pothos attacks a paralyzed lover, who says he is "wretched, breathless" and "pierced right through the bones" because of longing (Fragment 193). The invasion of the lover's body is dramatically represented in another verse, where eros is "coiled up beneath the heart" of the lover, and steals out of his breast "the soft wits" (Fragment 191). The innovation of Archilochus in the language of erotic poetry is to concentrate and enumerate in his verse such vivid images of the destructive power of unsatisfied sexual desire.

Like Archilochus, the Spartan poet Alcman was active during the seventh century BCE. While Alcman was primarily a composer of choral lyric poetry, including hymns to gods and heroes as well as ritual songs designed for choirs of voices, a few fragments of his verses remain that belong to the category of personal love lyric. These fragments suggest Alcman's intention to explore the debilitating effects of erotic longing upon the mind and body of the lover. In one fragment, Alcman personifies the god Eros as a playful but "insane" child, trampling down the delicate meadow grass, where an anxious speaker seems to be fearful of the mad god's boisterous and potentially harmful arrival (Fragment 58). The physical damage done by eros is represented as being more subtle in another fragment of Alcman's love poetry: here the poem's speaker depicts erotic desire as being "sweet," while it "drips down" and heats his heart (Fragment 59a), in a complex synthesis of images for warmth and liquidity. In a choral fragment, the young female singers describe the beautiful gaze of one of their group: "with limb-loosening desire (pothos), she glances more meltingly than sleep or death" (Fragment 3.61–62). Alcman suggests that the contiguous ideas of sleep and death simultaneously express both the dangerous and enticing qualities of the erotic experience.

The Greek archaic poets of the sixth century BCE continued the portrayal of eros as an aggressive, unpredictable, and ultimately inescapable force. The representation of erotic desire in these poets' fragments assumes the character of an elemental power: love has the power of a storm, wind, or fire, first assaulting its victims with unexpected violence, and then proceeding to drown, parch, melt, or bum them in their vulnerable condition. Bruised and battered by contact with this extrinsic outburst of natural energy, the lover's weakened body is then effortlessly possessed by the irresistible feeling of erotic desire. The poet Alcaeus (c. 620–550 BCE) lived in the city of Mytilene on the island of Lesbos, near the coast of Asia Minor, an area famous for its poetic tradition as well as its luxurious Eastern lifestyle. Although the outstanding feature of Alcaeus' poetry is its political character, in verses intended for performance during the communal experience of the symposium, a few passages of his poetry also indicate a concern for the capricious and threatening nature of eros. In a fragment of a drinking song, Alcaeus describes the sizzling heat of the Dog Days of summer as the time when "women are most lustful, while men are fragile" (Fragment 347), and recommends the refreshment of wine as a cure for the harmful effects of parching sexual fever. Elsewhere, in a few lines on a scrap of papyrus, Alcaeus retells the erotic causation of the Trojan War, and depicts the mental state of a love-struck Helen as she sailed off from Sparta with her lover, Paris: “in her breast her heart was shaken, and she was driven mad by the Trojan man” (Fragment 283.3–6). While the references to erotic experience in extant Alcaean fragments are few, they are consonant with other early Greek literary and lyric descriptions of the damaging effects of the onset of eros.

Contemporary with Alcaeus was the poet Sappho (c. 620–550 BCE), whose poetry is unmistakably and graphically erotic. Sappho was also born on the island of Lesbos, although unlike Alcaeus, she shows scant interest in recording the tumultuous political events of the period in her verses. According to tradition, Sappho lived most of her life in relative peace and urbane comfort in the city of Mytilene, surrounded by an intimate circle of female mends for whom she composed her lyric poetry and with whom she celebrated its performance. Although she also wrote wedding songs, hymns, and other mythological verses, Sappho’s poetic specialty appears to have been the short monodiclyric poem, in which the first-person expression of intense personal emotions is most prominent: it is in these lyrics that the destructive passion of love finds an exalted and profound articulation. Throughout her poetry, with its explicit focus on the erotic experience, Sappho uses traditional poetic elements to describe the dangerous power of eros, yet she boldly applies original images and metaphors in her verse that reveal her brilliant conception of love’s immediacy and potentially toxic effect. Sappho was famous in antiquity as a prolific lyric innovator, and an analysis of her sharp poetic language and lucid imagery reveals a complex melodic design and an intricate rhetorical structure that tends to contradict any romantic idea of her work’s simplicity or naiveté. As a poet, Sappho controls every aspect of her art: it is only her poetic persona that exhibits itself as mad, unrestrained, and abandoned to the ravages of erotic desire. For Sappho, the fulfillment of love is blissfully sweet, while the longing of an unsatisfied desire or the pain of separation from an absent beloved destroys the mind and body of the lover. In one fragment, she describes desire (pothos) as having the power to subdue (Fragment 102); in another, eros “pours over” the face of a beautiful bride (Fragment 112.4); still another fragment depicts eros as the “limb-loosener,” and vividly, “a sweet-bitter irresistible creature” (Fragment 130). A number of Sapphic fragments portray the urgent assault of erotic desire upon the individual lover: a speaker complains that eros “shakes my wits like a wind” (Fragment 47), while another speaker describes the arrival of her beloved fanning the flames in her yearning heart “on fire with longing (pothos)” (Fragment 48). In a hymn to Aphrodite, almost certainly a complete poem, Sappho herself summons the goddess to be her ally in the warfare of love, and to protect her from the deleterious and overpowering effects of erotic desire (Fragment 1). But nowhere in Greek poetry is there a more striking and detailed description of the devastation of eros than in Sappho’s fragment 31: in this poem, all the possible physical disorders induced by sexual desire are exhaustively indexed in what has been called the definitive catalogue of the symptoms of lovesickness. One by one a distressed first-person speaker lists her reactions to the sight of her beloved in close conversation with someone else: her heart pounds, she can’t speak, her skin feels feverish, her vision blurs, her ears buzz, she is seized by cold sweat and trembling, and her skin pales, until she says, “I seem to be a little short of death” (Fragment 31.15–16). The experience of erotic desire is terrifying, crippling, even near fatal, yet the pain and wreckage can be overcome: the lover portrayed in Sappho’s lyric verses recuperates and lives on to pursue another love.

Such imagery to portray the harmful consequences of desire can also be found in the erotic verses of the western Greek poet, Ibycus. Born in the Greek city of Rhegium in southern Italy, Ibycus eventually went east to Samos, where he joined the artistic circle financed by the wealthy tyrant Polycrates; the ancient tradition about his life and work places his poetic activity securely in the second half of the sixth century CE. Ibycus wrote two types of poetry, arranged later in the Alexandrian period into seven books: long narrative choral poetry on mythological themes, and personal erotic lyric verses celebrating the beauty of boys. In the few fragments that remain of his love poetry, Ibycus combines striking expressions and lavish sound texture to describe the destructive elemental power of erotic desire. One fragment, which may be a complete poem, dynamically contrasts the calm regularity of the arrival of spring with the fitful disorder of elemental eros: while the flowering season brings with it predictable and welcome growth, for the agitated speaker of this poem, the feeling of erotic desire never changes its intense momentum and offers no quiet symmetry, “for me eros is at rest during no season” (Fragment 286.1–7). Ibycus then equates the attack of this restless eros with a blast of Boreas, the exceptionally turbulent North Wind, depicted as “shadowy and undaunted,” who “with parching fits of madness masterfully and thoroughly batters my senses” (Fragment 286.8–13). Like the violent gust of wind, love is a harsh natural force, swift, sudden, hostile, resulting in physical injury and mental confusion. In another piece of Ibycus’ erotic verse, again perhaps a complete poem, a first-person voice figures eros as a dangerously attractive youth with dark, seductive eyes, who “with spells of all sorts drives me into Aphrodite’s inextricable nets” (Fragment 287): the image of being entangled in an erotic ambush proves love’s overwhelming physical control over the enthralled lover. In these two poems, Ibycus confirms and expands the Greek lyric conception of the devastating primal force of erotic desire.

The erotic verses of Anacreon (c. 560–480 BCE), Ibycus’ contemporary in the late sixth century, also portray the pure violence delivered by sexual desire, and continue to delineate an ever more specific vocabulary of arresting images to describe love’s harmful effects. Anacreon was born in the Ionian town of Teos on the coast of Asia Minor, and is said to have been entertained at the courts of the Samian tyrant Polycrates and the Athenian tyrant Hipparchus. The main focus of Anacreon’s poetry is the conviviality of wine-drinking at the symposium, along with the love affairs and erotic intrigues that take place in such a setting. As is the (usually undeserved) fate of other poets whose work deals with such themes, Anacreon acquired a reputation in antiquity that capitalized on his poetic persona: he was thought to have been a self-indulgent drunk and sexual libertine. In the remaining fragments of his five books of poetry, Anacreon displays a meticulous lyric style colored by a subtle spirit of irony and a tone of intellectual refinement. Yet there is nothing inhibited about this poet’s voice: the fragments of Anacreon present an innovative and imaginative portrayal of the risks inherent in the game of love. Anacreon’s eros is often personified as a robust contender, throwing a ball at the lover (Fragment 358), engaging the lover in a boxing match (Fragment 396), or gambling at dice (Fragment 398). The natural aggression of this athletic eros accords well with other Greek literary representations of the erotic experience as one full of jeopardy: eros offers a taunting challenge, and the lover can expect either a physically exhausting escape or a painful defeat. In other fragments, Anacreon describes the feeling of sexual desire as one of inebriation, “drunk with love” (Fragment 376); he calls love “melting” (Fragment 459) and a “subduer” (Fragment 357); and he compares eros to a blacksmith who strikes him with a hammer blow (Fragment 413). More than any other lyric poet, Anacreon emphasizes the psychological effects of erotic mania, dramatizing in his verses the convulsive state of a mind confused by sexual longing (Fragments 359, 398, 429). All the erotic fragments of Anacreon explore the consequences of contact with the hostile power of eros: intoxication, madness, and competitive struggle.

Later Greek poetry continued to echo and develop the vocabulary of images describing the erotic experience in terms of its extreme dominance over lovers. During the late sixth and early fifth centuries in Attica, dramatic festivals were instituted at which tragedies and comedies were performed in celebration of the god Dionysus. In the fifth century, the Athenian playwrights composed dramas for performance in an outdoor communal setting for a sophisticated audience of citizens and political allies. Although the principal themes in the genres of Athenian drama were not exclusively or even explicitly erotic, a few of the extant plays presented on stage in a dramatic context the visible spectacle of individuals under the influence of uncontrollable erotic longing. The performance of tragedy in particular, with its primary focus on the individual in the grip of an overpowering destiny, offered a unique forum in which to explore the consequences of frustrated eros. The tragedian Sophocles (496–406 BCE) was famous both as a model citizen and soldier of the Athenian democracy, and also as one of the three canonical Attic playwrights. One of Sophocles’ earliest surviving dramas is the Trachinian Women (c. 450–440 BCE), a play that deals with the devastating effects of erotic desire in the axes of passion between the great hero Heracles, his wife Deianira, and his new captive, Iole. When Deianira discovers that her husband sacked the city of Iole's father only to possess the girl, for whom he has incurred a violent lust (Trachiniae 351–374), the hero's wife decides to win back his love by means of a secret remedy, drops of blood given to her long ago by the centaur Nessus (531–587). But the love charm turns out to be a fatal poison, a ruse by the dying beast to exact revenge on Heracles, who killed him as Nessus tried to rape Deianira (672–722). The centaur's thwarted eros for Deianira is made manifest in the toxic charm, which the queen administers out of a desperate passion for her husband, who has aroused her suicidal anguish because of his fierce sexual desire for the younger girl. Infected with a virulent sickness (nosos), Heracles is exposed onstage, ranting and raving (971–1043), and is delivered from his agony by being carried off in the final scene to be burned alive (1259–1278). Throughout the play, Sophocles draws a close network of images with eros, the poison, the wild nosos of Heracles, his cruel madness, and the brutality of beasts. The pernicious power of this agonistic eros is personified by the chorus of the Trachinian Women in the figure of Aphrodite, as both victor and umpire in the contest of love (497–498, 515–516), and the goddess is named “the clear instigator of all these things” (860–861).

The playwright Euripides (c. 480–406 BCE) treated the theme of love's contamination most memorably in his Hippolytus (428 BCE), in which two distinct levels of action, divine and human, are evident. Aphrodite, powerful and pitiless as the force she represents, reveals in the prologue that she will punish the young Hippolytus, son of the hero Theseus, for his rejection of sexual love, by making him the object of his stepmother's erotic passion (Hippolytus 1–57). Out of shame, Phaedra tries in vain to conceal her desire, but when her lovesickness (nosos) overwhelms and threatens to kill her (170–267), an anxious and well-intentioned Nurse tries to secure the sexual favors of Hippolytus as a remedy for Phaedra's wasting disease, but he violently refuses (601–615). Phaedra resolves to commit suicide to preserve her reputation as the king's wife (680–731), as she realizes, “I am beaten by bitter love” (727); but to avenge the extremism of her chaste stepson, she leaves a note for Theseus accusing Hippolytus of raping her (856–886). Mad with grief, Theseus curses his son and casts him into exile (1045–1101), where he is attacked by a monstrous bull sent by Poseidon and is carried back onstage to die in torment; but at the end of the play the goddess Artemis appears ex machina to explain the truth to Theseus, that the terrible events were directed solely by Aphrodite (1282–1341). The fatal network of tainted eros binding the human characters, Hippolytus, Phaedra, and Theseus, is dramatically framed by the divine conflict between the two opposed goddesses, yet the victory over those who would deny her essential power goes unequivocally to Aphrodite, who “drives the unbending heart of gods and mortals” (1268–1269). The notion of a destructive and irresistible eros is a dominant motif in the Hippolytus and the Trachinian Women, as it moves through both of these plays with relentless tragic force.

The power of eros to sway the course of human action is well represented in the Lysistrata (411 BCE), a play by the greatest of the Athenian comic poets, Aristophanes (c. 448–c. 380 BCE). In this famous comedy, the women of Athens and Sparta, dismayed that the men have failed to bring an end to the Peloponnesian War, band together under the leadership of Lysistrata (“Dissolver of Armies”) to impose peace with a two-pronged strategy: first, they seize and occupy the Acropolis, the civic heart of the city where the treasury is located, and second, they refuse to have sexual relations with their husbands until they reconcile with the Spartans (Lysistrata 1–253). The play offers a basically hedonistic calculus, starkly contrasting the deficiency of sexual relations caused by the war, with the restoration of erotic satisfaction in peacetime. As Lysistrata says, “We want to get laid, to put it briefly” (715). Aristophanes indulges in a great deal of visual comedy and humorous banter in this play, easily capitalizing on the many opportunities for sexual innuendo inherent in the plot. In one scene, a chorus of feeble and impotent old men try to take back the Acropolis by ramming the gates with logs they can barely lift, and by setting siege fires they can't keep lit (254–386); in another scene, Myrrhine teases her sex-starved and obviously ithyphallic husband, Kinesias, by promising to sleep with him, running off to obtain a series of erotic enhancements, then abandoning him still unsatisfied (837–958).

Finally as the men and women are reunited, the comedy suggests that peace is restored through an act of war—the sex-strike—and reinforces the concept that although erotic love can be a struggle, the mutual fulfillment of sexuality, of gratified eros, is a stabilizing force in society.

During the Hellenistic period (c. 323–331 BCE), the Greek poets carry on the notion of erotic damage as they concentrated on a new group of literary genres, in particular epyllion (short epic), mime, pastoral poems, and epigrams. The most detailed and compelling depiction of the power of eros comes in the third book of the Argonautica by Apollonius of Rhodes (c. 295–215 BCE). An epyllion in four books, the Argonautica narrates the tale of Jason and his journey to acquire the Golden Fleece; Book 3 recounts the explicitly erotic events in Colchis where Jason is loved by the princess, Medea, and is then aided in his quest by her gifts of sorcery. Hoping to secure help for her favorite, Jason, Hera asks Aphrodite to persuade her son Eros to make Medea fall in love with him (Argonautica 6–166); the winged god shoots her, “and the arrow burned inside the girl, deep down under her heart, like a flame” (286–287). Throughout this episode, the poet uses vocabulary and images that evoke the tangible immediacy of earlier Greek poetic descriptions of harmful eros, especially the erotic language of Sappho and the lyric poets, and adds to that the dramatist’s interest in exploring the ethical consequences of such a crushing sexual desire. The result is an intimate psychological portrait of a destabilized Medea that presents her fatal longing for Jason as an attack on her judgment, as she realizes, “My mind is entirely at a loss” (772): eros deprives Medea of the ability to make reasoned decisions, and envelops her in a ruinous lack of clarity about her own doomed circumstances.

The epigrammatists of the Hellenistic age return to an explicit focus on erotic themes in their short occasional poems, as the epigram is raised to perfection as an independent literary genre. These epigrams were assembled in ancient times in different anthologies, including the famous Palatine Anthology; all the extant poems are now collected in a modern edition called simply “The Greek Anthology,” representing over six thousand epigrams ranging in date from the seventh century BCE to the tenth century CE and covering a wide array of topics, in particular the joy and anguish of love. While the writers of epigram inherited and revived earlier poetic conceptions about eros as a destructive force, a tone of playfulness, irony, and even humorous detachment becomes more evident in erotic verses during this period. Asclepiades of Samos (floruit c. 290 BCE) was known for the elegant simplicity of his style, and his epigrams often describe the power of love with a distinctly light-hearted and mocking voice. In one epigram, he addresses the god Zeus who rains on him as he waits at his lover’s door, reminding Zeus of his own amours: “The god who compels me is your master, too” (Palatine Anthology 5.64). A love poet famous for exquisite style and grace, Meleager of the Syrian Greek town Gadara (floruit c. 60 BCE) was also known as the compiler of an early anthology of epigrams, entitled Stephanos, or “The Garland.” His own numerous epigrams describe love in dynamic images reminiscent of earlier lyric poets, as winged eros the wild-eyed conqueror is equated with the boy whom Meleager desires (Palatine Anthology 12.101). The erotic epigrams of Philodemus (born c. 110 BCE), also from Gadara, reveal his interest in Epicurean ideals, and are noted for their particular amusing frankness and dramatic approach. Philodemus celebrates a woman named Xanthippe in a series of amatory verses, saying it is for her that “a fire smolders in my insatiable heart” (Palatine Anthology 11.41). For the Hellenistic epigrammatists, eros was still full of implacable and antagonistic energy, a bittersweet event summed up in brief, incisive poems. The poets of ancient Greece explored the idea of eros as a dangerous force, and defined the experience of sexual desire as an essentially overwhelming and ultimately destructive physical feeling. To come into contact with erotic longing was to be seized, melted, frozen, beaten, invaded by sickness, and driven mad. While some verses do depict the return to health and sanity that accompanies the fulfillment of shared eros, the Greek poets essentially agreed that there is no real drama in blissful love, only in love’s torment.

MONICA SILVEIRA CYRINO

Further Reading

- Austin, Norman. Helen of Troy and Her Shameless Phantom: Myth and Poetics. Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1994.
- Bing, Peter and Rip Cohen. Games of Venus: An Anthology of Greek and Roman Erotic Verse from Sappho to Ovid. New York: Routledge, 1992.

GRISSETTE

- Burnett, Anne Pippin. Three Archaic Poets: Archilochus, Alcaeus, Sappho. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1983.
- Calame, Claude. The Poetics of Eros in Ancient Greece. Translated by Janet Lloyd. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1999.
- Cameron, Alan. The Greek Anthology from Meleager to Planudes. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Campbell, David. The Golden Lyre: The Themes of the Greek Lyric Poets. London: Duckworth, 1983.
- Carson, Anne. Eros the Bittersweet: An Essay. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1986.
- Cyrino, Monica S. In Pandora's Jar: Lovesickness in Early Greek Poetry. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1995.
- Davidson, James. Courtesans and Fishcakes: The Consuming Passions of Classical Athens. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1998.
- DuBois, Page. Sappho Is Burning. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press, 1995.
- Friedrich, Paul. The Meaning of Aphrodite. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press, 1978.
- Gentili, Bruno. Poetry and Its Public in Ancient Greece: From Homer to the Fifth Century. Translated by A. Thomas Cole. Baltimore and London: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1988.
- Goldhill, Simon. Foucault's Virginité: Ancient Erotic Fiction and the History of Sexuality. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995.
- Halperin, David M. One Hundred Years of Homosexuality and Other Essays on Greek Love. New York and London: Routledge, 1990.
- Halperin, David M., John J. Winkler and Froma I. Zeitlin editors. Before Sexuality: The Construction of Erotic Experience in the Ancient Greek World. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1990.
- Henderson, Jeffrey. The Maculate Muse: Obscene Language in Attic Comedy. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1975.
- Konstan, David. Sexual Symmetry: Love in the Ancient Novel and Related Genres. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1994.
- Licht, Hans. Sexual Life in Ancient Greece. New York: Dorset Press, 1994.
- Powell, Anton, editor. Euripides, Women, and Sexuality. London: Routledge, 1990.
- Rayor, Diane. Sappho's Lyre: Archaic Lyric and Women Poets of Ancient Greece. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1991.
- Rousselle, Aline. Pomeia: On Desire and the Body in Antiquity. Translated by Felicia Pheasant. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1980.
- Thornton, Bruce S. Eros: The Myth of Ancient Greek Sexuality. Boulder, CO and Oxford: Westview Press, 1997.
- Williamson, Margaret. Sappho's Immortal Daughters. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1995.
- Winkler, John. The Constraints of Desire: The Anthropology of Sex and Gender in Ancient Greece. New York and London: Routledge, 1990.
- Zeitlin, Froma I. Playing the Other: Gender and Society in Classical Greek Literature. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press, 1996.

---

GRISSETTE

---

The word grisette originally appeared in France in the seventeenth century and designated the grey dress worn by young French women of the lower class. By metonymy and disdain, the term came to mean the women of that class while the original reference to the grey garment disappeared. During the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the grisette is sometimes assimilated with a young woman of limited means and easy virtue.

Jean de La Fontaine, in 1665, is the first author to report the connection made between these poor girls and a particular practice of sexual hunting by the aristocratic males, in France: "se faire une grisette" [to have sex with a grisette]. In his short story, Joconde ou l'infidélité des femmes, La Fontaine tells the story of a king and a handsome nobleman seducing all the women in the kingdom and keeping track of them in a book. At the conclusion of the tale, they share a bed with the same grisette, unaware of the sudden irruption of a third aficionado who, alone, enjoys the grisette's ardor! The text supports the idea that all women are unfaithful.

La Fontaine's grisette is a promiscuous girl, astute and fun, faithful while a virgin, unfaithful after the loss of her virginity and her abandonment. The grisette is a sexual object that can easily be bought. The grisette is particularly associated with an undergarment, an object of fetishism, the cotillon (a poor woman's under-skirt), to which we need to add an important specific expression: la mine chiffonnée [the weathered face]. This idiom, as with the previous term, assumes a sexual function: the grisette and the cotillon can be crumpled [chiffonné] for sexual exploitation with no worry about a spoiled skirt. La Fontaine's story is labeled the Joconde's genre and often copied.

In the eighteenth-century texts, the grisette participates in a coming-of-age ritual for young nobles who try to take her virginity away. The grisette hopes, innocently and vainly, that all the wedding promises made by the seducer (with the aid of fashionable gifts, especially of clothing) will have a matrimonial conclusion!

In 1737, the term grisette becomes associated with craftswomen's assistants of the magasins de nouveauté [novelty shops], to the filles de boutique [shop assistants], and to the modistes [milliners]. It is here the finery can be observed through the shop windows where they work assiduously. From these openings, they playfully wink to tease the passers-by. They are then compared to a seraglio or a harem and become the first sexualized female advertisement for merchandise. Lawrence Sterne made a cliché of them in 1768, in England and America, in his Sentimental Journey to France, where the grisette is a disturbing promiscuous gloves' shopkeeper.

A second representation of the grisette is found in the work of Sébastien Mercier in 1781. Mercier gives a more positive image of the grisette and locates her amidst the courageous, independent seamstresses working in the privacy of their room. This room will become an indispensable accessory of her representation, a symbol of her poverty. It is always located at the uppermost floor of the house, under the roof, in a mansarde or a grenier [attic]. This location allows lovers to visit the grisette through the roof, to take their liberties with her and to escape the same way. Mercier excuses the light morality life of these girls by hard living conditions. Mercier's grisette (as opposed to the bourgeoise) is an independent woman who, because of her lack of a dowry, is the only woman in France who is able to choose whom she is going to love. At the time of the French Revolution, a third representation takes place. Launay, the prostitute's tax collector, completely aware of the double lives they must lead, is abusive to all the grisettes, and considered them as disguised prostitutes.

Under the Restoration (1815–1830), two representations dominate the discourse on grisettes. One is associated with a rather erotic literary work connected with the tableaux parisiens. The grisette is the subject of peeping. One can observe her through a small hole drilled in the partition wall of the Hôtels Garnis bedrooms (furnished lodgings). She is seen dressing, or painting the nipples of her breasts in Cuisin's descriptions of the vie galante in Paris. Charles Paul de Kock is considered the specialist of light grisette stories. The other is associated with the most popular French singer of the period, Pierre-Jean de Béranger. He popularized the unfaithful but excusable grisette through a sequel of songs on the Lisette character. She becomes a kept-woman with rich lovers (Mondor), old aristocrats or bourgeois, but will be abandoned and return to her first (poor) lover. This last representation has a political tone; the grisette becomes the prototype of the republican woman who is seduced by the old and depraved aristocrats.

Under the July Monarchy (1830–1848), the grisette primarily associates with the students of medicine and law of the Latin Quarter. She is transformed into a complete romantic and melancholic character. She passionately sacrifices herself for her lover, is abandoned, and often dies from tuberculosis.

With the Lorette's arrival (a kept-woman, solely money-oriented, like the Nana of Zola), in the 1840s, the grisette is progressively detached from the figure of the prostitute and becomes a pure angel with Mimi Pinson, Les Mystères de Paris [Sue's Rigolette] or Les Scènes de la Vie de Bohème (a Murger and Puccini adaptation) where she is a singer and is associated with penniless artists (Musette and Mimi). Jules Champfleury's realism violently reacts against this iconography, in his short story: L'homme aux figures de cire. A wax puppet exhibitor abandons his spouse to flee with a pretty wax grisette, with whom he sleeps; thus recycling the myth of Pygmalion. Some rare explicit erotic representations of the grisette can be found in the small booklet with lithographs of Henri Monnier, L'étudiant et la grisette, while the socialist Victor Hugo transforms Fantine into an accidental prostitute in Les Misérables.

GUAMAN POMA DE AYALA, FELIPE

In the nineteenth century, the word grisette rhymed with amourette (easy, free love without any long-term attachment) and herbette (love on the grass) in literature.

ALAIN LESCART

References and Further Reading

- Béranger, Pierre-Jean de. Les Infidélités de Lisette. Paris: 1813.
- Champfleury, Jules. L'Homme aux figures de cire. 2004 ed. Paris: Gallimard, 1849.
- Cuisin, J.P.R. La vie de garçon dans les hotels-garnis de la capitale, ou, De l'amour à la minute. Par un parasite

- logé à pouf au grenier*. 1880 ed. 4. Paris: Henri Kistemaekers, Palais-Royal, 1820.
- Kock, Charles Paul de. Mon Voisin Raymond. 4 vols. Paris: G.-C. Hubert, 1822.
- La Fontaine, Jean de. "Joconde ou l'infidélité des femmes." Nouvelles en vers tirées de Bocace et de l'Arioste. Paris: Claude Barbin, 1665.
- Launay, Florentine de, and Sylvain Bailly. Etrennes aux grisettes pour l'année 1790. Paris: s.n., 1790.
- Mercier, Louis-Sébastien. Tableau de Paris. Samuel Fauche, 1781.
- Monnier, Henry. L'enfer de Joseph Prudhomme: Deux gougnottes et La Grisette et l'étudiant. Paris: A l'enseigne du plaisir des filles, 1850.

---

GUAMAN POMA DE AYALA, FELIPE

---

d.c. 1615

Incan essayist

The sixteenth-century indigenous Andean chronicler and illustrator Felipe Guaman Poma de Ayala is not an author easily placed within the context of erotic literature, yet his work offers insights into the sexual mores prevalent in early colonial Latin America. His monumental El Primer Nueva Corónica y Buen Gobierno [The First New Chronicle and Good Government] (1615) also makes references to the conception and treatment of sexual offences during the Inca period, then still within living memory. Sexuality, rather than being celebrated, is a criterion used by the author to establish both his opposition to Spanish abuse and his ambiguous position towards pre-Columbian rule. It is an example of Bakhtin's notion of "hidden polemic," applied by Rolena Adorno (1986) to this extraordinary book, since Guaman Poma adopts anti-colonial positions through stealth and inference. It should be pointed out that this work, rather than strictly literary, relies heavily for effect on illustrations often more eloquent than the text, Spanish having been a patchily acquired second language for this Quechua-speaker.

Guaman Poma wrote to complain to King Philip III of the abuses suffered by his people as a direct result of the Spanish conquest and colonial administration. His 1,200-page manuscript unsurprisingly never reached the King, but miraculously survived and became a precious source of data for historians and ethnographers.

The work was conceived not only as a denunciation of Spanish rule but also an affirmation of autochthonous cultural values, as such, sex is viewed in terms of its demographic and historical consequences for the indigenous peoples of the Andes—of particular concern to the author, the growth of mestizo (mixed Indian and European) and mulatto populations. Guaman Poma deplored what he saw as a destructive encroachment upon indigenous ways of life, both culturally and genetically. He advocated segregation, a position he shared with many contemporary commentators who also feared and distrusted those of mixed descent. Mercedes López-Baralt (1993) perceptively examines the coded sexual imagery in two depictions of gatherings where men of varied social positions and, crucially, ethnic backgrounds, meet to broker power. She perceives a denunciation of illicit fornication, particularly as practiced by the clergy. One perhaps unintentionally humorous reference here (574) shows a priest's illegitimate children being carried on horseback, in saddlebags, as if they were vegetables going to market.

In order to enhance his own credibility with his reader, Guaman Poma denounces certain aspects of Inca rule. The Incas' very origins are tainted since the founding couple, Mama Huaco and Manco Capac, are also mother and son (in other versions they are siblings). As well as incestuous, Mama Huaco is a sorceress, idolater, and devil-worshipper; yet she is also described as beautiful, learned, and generous (1981, p. 99). The Inca genesis is based on the falsehood that she is daughter of the sun and moon: she wins and maintains her power by making stones move and speak. Part of the section on superstition and witchcraft (252) displays naked supine figures of Indians mounted by horned devils.

If this partial vilification of the pre-Columbian world serves to establish Guaman Poma's Catholic credentials, he also stresses various instances of Inca morality with a paradoxical affirmation of the rectitude lost since the conquest. A list of crimes punishable by death, includes adultery, abortion, prostitution, rape, and incestuous marriage, this latter being reserved for the rulers (1981, pp. 164–165). All this contrasts with the sexual abuse in which the Spanish indulge with impunity, simply helping themselves to any female they choose. A particularly graphic drawing depicts a young woman innocently sleeping, her breasts, anus, and vagina (the Spanish vergüenza, shame) exposed, as men in authority scout for women to sate their lust: "They fornicate with married women and deflower virgins," thus producing the bugbear of mestizos (467). The rape and abduction of girls continues. Guaman Poma insists, because of the web of intrigue and bribery among the establishment (489).

For Guaman Poma, the abuse of power by Spanish authorities is so severe, and so corrosive of public morality, that regional segregation is the only way to prevent the contamination of indigenous peoples. Unabated miscegenation is the cause of a general malaise in Peru that he sees metaphorically as the World Upside-Down. This inversion of the natural order is borrowed from European tradition and blended with an indigenous notion of cataclysm, the pachacuti or periodic world-inversion seen in many pre-Columbian cosmologies as bringing essential regeneration. However, this is an inversion that will not recover any sense of natural equilibrium. Hence it retains the carnival element of grotesque upheaval, the overturning of any normal sense of social order, but sheds any sense of ribald, Rabelaisian delight.

However, despite the sorrow and complaint that pervades Guaman Poma's opus, there are several moments in which the erotic is celebrated in the section dealing with pre-Columbian fiesta, song, and music. One instance of this is the reproduction of a Quechua language (290) harawi (a form of plaintive appeal) likening a noblewoman to a flower reflected in water, a transient image despite its permanence in the lover's mind. A more earthy, mundane song in Aymara humorously asks whether the beloved is as sweet when drunk as when sober. No lyricism is admitted here; the woman is doubtless accessible because of her more humble origins. Another Aymara song quoted by Guaman Poma boasts of the author's sister's 'fabulous' legs, which are beautiful enough to win bets. One drawing in this section shows two naked women in a river, pointing toward the cliff above where two men sit playing flutes and with whom they sing in dialogue. Thus an ingenuous, bucolic pre-Columbian sexuality is contrasted with its abusive, rapacious Spanish counterpart.

Biography

Guaman Poma de Ayala was born a few years after the Spanish conquest of the Andes. As an Inca noble he was allowed to be raised among the colonizers, baptized a Christian, and educated. In his early years he served as an interpreter and assisted church officials in eradicating Inca spiritual practice. After a crisis of conscience he began teaching Incas to read and write so they could submit legal complaints concerning their condition. From 1585 to 1615 he carefully composed his own claim, titled Nueva corónica y buen gobierno, to King Philip III of Spain. The manuscript went unread for centuries until it was discovered by a researcher at the Royal Library of Copenhagen in 1908.

Further Reading

- Adorno, Rolena. Guaman Poma: Writing and Resistance in Colonial Peru. Austin University of Texas, 1986.
- Guaman Poma de Ayala, Felipe. El primer nueva corónica y buen gobierno. Mexico Siglo Veintiuno, 1981 [1615].
- López-Baralt, Mercedes. Icono y conquista. Hiperión, Madrid 1988.
- . Guaman Poma, Autor y artista. Pontificia Universidad Católica del Perú, Lima 1993.

---

GUÉRIN, RAYMOND

---

1905–1955
French writer

L'Apprenti [The Apprentice]

The apprentice is 19-year-old 'Monsieur Hermès'—always called that way with no indication whether Hermès is his first name, family name, or a nickname. The book relates his tribulations whilst training in a prestigious Parisian luxury hotel in the late 1920s. That unwelcome apprenticeship was his father's ('Monsieur Papa') sole decision: Monsieur Hermès would much rather study literature or stay in his native Portville near the Spanish border, playing rugby with his friends and writing theater plays or a literary review. Right from the start he just cannot stand the hotel's posh and oppressive atmosphere, its underpinning of social injustice and the daily humiliation from other staff members and guests alike. He successfully works at the lowest rank in the kitchen (cleaning the greasiest plates), in the restaurant (carrying dishes), and as a night attendant in charge of a floor (answering guests' silliest requests in the middle of the night, such as opening a window for a cantankerous old lady or bringing bottles of champagne for smashed aristocrats who ignore his very presence in the room). Just before being sent to a partner hotel in London, he is eventually fired after overtly rebelling against one of his cruellest mentors, putting a salutary end to twelve months of daily unhappiness and persistent victimization. After a few days of leisure in Paris, he takes the train back home, just after meeting Delorme, a fashionable playwright to whom he gives a copy of 'La joie au coeur,' the theater play he has just written himself.

Amidst the systematic recording of his duties, problems, and feelings are reminiscences of more pleasant times and nostalgic memories, especially of his past erotic adventures: his first experience in a brothel, the various girls he fancied in Portville, his doomed yet lasting infatuation with the mysterious Nina Brett and a romantic holiday love story in San Sebastian with Alice Elvas, a married, older woman whose few presents he still cherishes. Monsieur Hermès' love-life in Paris is more frustrating: despite an almost constant obsession with women, during his whole year at the hotel he has only gone out with the nice and plain Angélique for a couple of months, and with his loose chambermaid colleague Totoche for a couple of weeks. Yet in spite of some appreciated times of sexual gratification, those two partners have left him unsatisfied and unfulfilled. His apprenticeship is not just professional but emotional as well: he discovers the complex relationship between love, sex, pleasure, and intimacy—and indeed the book was originally entitled L'Apprenti psychologue. As an easier, more reliable source of sexual satisfaction, Monsieur Hermès much prefers to masturbate. The book is rich in descriptions of his masturbatory techniques (preferably lying on his belly, rubbing on the sheets without touching himself) and accounts of his fantasies (usually picturing he is a woman taken by a man, either the imaginary Lily or a desirable woman he has seen in the hotel, in the street, or in a film). This largely explains why L'Apprenti created quite a scandal when it was published in 1946: it was heavily pilloried for its underlying thesis that masturbation is a normal stage of sexuality and not some form of sexual perversion. Most critics then focused on that aspect of the book on the triple ground that it openly described, condoned, and validated masturbation, long before discourses of sexual liberation and popular psychoanalysis started to legitimize masturbation.

In terms of eroticism, L'Apprenti is also interesting because it documents how a rather typical heterosexual young man explores his developing sexuality, from minor cross-dressing (when he cannot help surreptitiously stealing and trying on a female neighbor's underwear) to voyeurism (when he observes through the keyhole a couple having sex) to pornography (with his growing collection of pictures of nude women). That strong focus on the visual is a key element of his discovery of sexual desire, with his gaze eroticizing most women, all becoming potential sexual partners, whether they sit near him at the theater, pass by him in the street, or happen to stay in the hotel rooms he is responsible for. Numerous situations and characters are thus presented in a rather original language reaching its best expression in Les poulpes but already significant in L'Apprenti. Somehow reminiscent of Céline and maybe also Rabelais, Guérin's idiosyncratic style is one that mixes all levels of language, building upon vernacular phrasing and slang, adding occasional references to commercials and songs, as well as parodies of some of the texts that Monsieur Hermès himself reads in his few moments of leisure (Vicente Blasco Ibañez, Pierre Loti). The result is highly heterogeneous and polyphonic, ranging from the cynical to the burlesque via the humorous and the lyrical, cleverly combining accents of realism and existentialism, perhaps precisely corresponding to what Monsieur Hermès himself calls 'l'esthétique du caleçon et du bidet' ('the aesthetics of pants and bidets,' p. 249).

LOYKIE LOÏC LOMINÉ

Biography

Guérin planned and drafted most of his books in the four years he spent as a war prisoner in a nazi camp near Baden. He is mainly remembered for his Ébauche d'une mythologie de la réalité [Sketch of a Mythology of Reality], a Bildungsroman of over 2000 pages, composed of three books: L'Apprenti (1946) about early adulthood in the interwar, Parmi tant d'autres feux... (1949) about married life and most importantly Les Poulpes (1953) about life in captivity. He died of pleurisy at age 50 before completing two books, one about civil life back from the camp and one about recovering to mental and physical sanity. Other significant texts of his include Quand vient la fin (1941), La confession de Diogène (1947), and Le pus de la plaie, journal de maladie (posthumous, 1982). All have been published by Gallimard and most are being reprinted.

Further Reading

- Alluin, B. & Curatolo, B. (2000) La Revue Littéraire, Dijon: Le Texte et l'Édition.
 Curatolo, B. (1996a) Humeurs, Paris: Le Dilettante.
 ———. (1996b) Raymond Guérin: Une écriture de la Dérision, Paris: L'Harmattan.

---

GUIBERT, HERVÉ

---

1955–1991

French journalist, novelist, and screenwriter

Guibert's works all germinated in and were ultimately pruned from his journal, published posthumously as Le mausolée des amants and to which he referred as his "spinal cord." They can be divided between those written with a concern for style, tied also to the failure of fiction, and those where writing is made as communicative, as experientially transparent as possible. They raise difficult questions, demolish stereotypes of masculinity, subjectivity, and socialization, reveal secrets, blend fiction with non-fiction, and often problematize the relationship between the textual, the visual, and the pathological. In Compassion protocol, for example, the rhetorical narrator, virtually indistinguishable from Guibert himself, observes that his works are permeated with truth, falsehood, betrayal, and nastiness. Moreover, Guibert was obsessed with bodies—both living and dead—, with their dissolution and fragmentation, as he admits in his journal, and with sex. As a result, he brings his public into intimate contact with his own body and those of others, while blurring the division between fiction and autobiography, his own position as voyeuristic spectator and subject of disease. The year of his death, Guibert admitted that he had always had the impression of being his own character but also of being a body in narrations, situations, relationships, and that for him it was always a question in his works of a body, whether aging, sick, ruined, reborn, monstrous, or deformed. AIDS changed his status, from character to hero, by way of tragedy.

L'image fantôme

Written around the absence of a photograph, the despair of the image, L'image fantôme [Ghost Image] privileges the relationships between photography, truth, fetishism, desire, and the artefact. It also highlights the differences between the erotic, the pornographic, the erotically unreadable, and the sexually unmarked. As he unveils the bonds between visual representation, writing, reading, and readability, Guibert subverts the ideas about referential emanation first articulated by Roland Barthes in La chambre claire (Camera obscura). As Hughes notes, he literalizes and incorporates them into a narrative of homoerotic desire with the photographic gesture turning on an erotically penetrative act and the erotic impulses and instincts of the photographic subject "legibilized."

Les chiens

In Les chiens, the violent and explicit work referred to by the narrator of Fou de Vincent as a "pornographic little book," a woman's body is a foil for a hyperrealist story of male loves, sado-masochistic fantasies and practices, and heightens the erotic interest. Sexual and narrative pleasure are indistinguishable, and the boundaries between fantasy, reality, reader, author, and characters are ultimately broken down. As a result, the reader consumes the fantasies of the protagonists, entering into the text's "pornotopia," as Heathcote observes, with feet and wrists bound.

Vous m'avez fait former des fantômes

Divided into three parts, the postmodern novel, Vous m'avez fait former des fantômes, eroticizes cruelty and death. Loathsome men haunt crèches and orphanages to capture innocents and train them for combat in which children replace bulls to recount bullfights. The text parodies male-to-male violence with intertextual references at the same time as exposing the complicity between phantoms and fantasies, acting and obsession, the ritual and the natural.

To the friend who did not save my life

The first of the novels directly and primarily to focus on AIDS and the book, Boulé claims, is the climax and point of implosion of Guibert's oeuvre, A l'ami qui ne m'a pas sauvé la vie [To the Friend Who Did Not Save My Life] was hugely controversial when it first came out in 1990, the year before Guibert's death. It was read as a roman à clés: the philosopher named Muzil was recognized as Guibert's recently deceased friend, Michel Foucault; similarly, Marine was identified as Isabelle Adjani, Stéphane as Daniel Defert, Eugénie as Yvonne Baby, Hector as Hector Bianciotti, and Melvil Mockney as Jonas Salk. It recounts the struggles of Muzil and the narrator with AIDS and the medical establishment. In its intertwining of contagion and eroticism, voyeurism and hallucination, betrayals and commemoration, it reveals the creation and destruction inherent in writing. According to Guibert, it provides keys to understanding what is in all his other books. His seropositivity allowed him further to radicalize certain narrative systems, the relation to truth, and the staging of himself beyond what he ever thought possible.

Although Guibert had said that he would not write again, To the Friend Who Did Not Save My Life was followed by Compassion protocol, his second AIDS novel, in which he explores the erotic, sado-masochistic, and pathological possibilities of the relationship between a rhetorical narrator and his 28-year-old female doctor. The insidious progress of AIDS is also reflected in works by Guibert posthumously published or aired the year following his death. Whereas Cytomégalo-virus, a brief diary of Guibert's hospitalization for the opportunistic infection that gives the book its title and Le mausolée des amants, which systematically spans a quarter century, both respect chronology, Le paradis disrupts it, and disorientation forms a metaphor for illness. L'homme au chapeau rouge [The Man

In the Red Hat], marketed as the last of Guibert's AIDS novels, is more a meditation on delusion and the fake, a reflection on the relationship between reality and fiction, life and art. La pudeur et l'impudeur, shot between June 1990 and March 1991 and turned down by all the French television stations except TF1, was ultimately broadcast after Guibert's death. As Boulé underlines, it stands more as the third, final, and penultimate volume on AIDS than The Man In the Red Hat. Considered crude and exhibitionist by some and a logical continuation of Guibert's pursuit of truth by others, in his video-diary Guibert anachronistically rehearses his suicide attempt while playing Russian roulette with the poison Digitaline. In the video's final scene of the writer walking away from his desk, he ultimately becomes a specter of himself.

Biography

Born on December 14, 1955 in Saint-Cloud, just outside of Paris. Although he failed the Conservatoire and entrance examination for the Institut des Hautes Études Cinématographiques, he was multi-talented: he combined photographic sensibility with writing flair, brought a photographic writing to literature, and was the author of nearly thirty creative works, some of them published posthumously. Many of Guibert's texts are considered erotically explicit. Indeed, many stirred controversy. Examples include: L'homme blessé, co-scripted with Patrice Chéreau, which won a César but upset the homosexual community; Des aveugles [Blindsight], based on his volunteer work as a reader at the Institut National des Jeunes Aveugles in Paris, which gave rise to heated exchanges over how best to care for the blind; Les chiens which outraged many, most notably writer Marguerite Duras who, Guibert claimed, developed a negative fixation about him because of it; La pudeur ou l'impudeur, which provoked a great debate in the French media both before and after its broadcast. Guibert gained the widest recognition while suffering from AIDS and following the publication of A l'ami qui ne m'a pas sauvé la vie and Le protocole compassionnel. He appeared and seduced the French public on the television programs Apostrophes and Ex libris, admitting on the latter to living in a "very problematic" state of "total erotic desire." The night before his thirty-sixth birthday, he unsuccessfully attempted suicide. He died from complications two weeks later at the Beclère hospital in Clamart, near the French capital.

BRIAN GORDON KENNELLY

Selected Works

- L'image fantôme*. 1981; as Ghost image, translated by Robert Bononno. 1998.
Les aventures singulières. 1982.
Les chiens. 1982.
L'homme blessé (with Patrice Chéreau). 1983.
Vous m'avez fait former des fantômes. 1987.
Fou de Vincent. 1989.
A l'ami qui ne m'a pas sauvé la vie. 1990; as To the Friend Who Did Not Save My Life, translated by Linda Coverdale. 1991.
Mon valet et moi. 1991.
La mort propagande et autres textes de jeunesse. 1991.
Le protocole compassionnel. 1991; as Compassion protocol, translated by James Kirkup. 1994.
Vice. 1991.
Cytomégalo virus. 1992.
L'homme au chapeau rouge. 1992; as The man in the red hat, translated by James Kirkup. 1993.
Le paradis. 1992.
La pudeur ou l'impudeur. 1992.
Photographies. 1993.
La piqûre d'amour et autres textes, suivi de La chair fraîche. 1994.
La Photo, inéluctablement. 1999.
Le Mausolée des amants: Journal. 1976–1991, 2001.

Further Reading

- Antle, Martine. "The Frame of Desire in the Novel of the 1980's and the 1990's." In Articulations of Difference: Gender Studies and Writing in French, edited by Dominique D. Fisher and Lawrence R. Schehr. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1997.
- Apter, Emily. "Fantom Images: Hervé Guibert and the Writing of 'sida' in France." In Writing AIDS: Gay Literature, Language, and Analysis, edited by Timothy Murphy and Suzanne Poirier. New York: Columbia University Press, 1993.
- Boulé, Jean-Pierre. A l'ami qui ne m'a pas sauvé la vie And Other Writings. Glasgow: University of Glasgow Press, 1995.
- Boulé, Jean-Pierre. Hervé Guibert: L'entreprise de l'écriture du moi. Paris: L'harmattan, 2001.
- Caron, David. AIDS in French Culture: Social Ills, Literary Cures. Madison, WI: University of Wisconsin Press, 2001.
- Heathcote, Owen. "Les chiens d'Hervé Guibert: analyse d'une 'plaquette pornographique.'" Nottingham French Studies, 34.1 (1995): 61–69.
- Heathcote, Owen. "L'érotisme, la violence et le jeu dans Vous m'avez fait former des fantômes" in Au jour le siècle 2, le corps textuel d'Hervé Guibert.

GUIDO, BEATRIZ

Edited by Ralph Sarkonak. Paris: Lettres modernes, 1997.
Hughes, Alex. Heterographies: Sexual Difference in French Autobiography. New York and Oxford: Berg, 1999.
Sarkonak, Ralph. Angelic Echoes: Hervé Guibert and Company. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2000.

Schehr, Lawrence R. Alcibiades at the Door: Gay Discourses in French Literature. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1995.
Worton, Michael. "En (d)écrivain le corps en imaginant l'homme: le 'vrai corps' de Guibert." In Au jour le siècle 2, le corps textuel d'Hervé Guibert. edited by Ralph Sarkonak. Paris: Lettres modernes, 1997.

---

GUIDO, BEATRIZ

---

1924–1988
Argentine novelist

In her novels, Guido presents an evocative portrayal of upper-class Argentinean life, a milieu she knew well from her childhood and adolescence. Her characteristic heroine is a young upper-class woman whose innocence is shattered when confronted with unexpected, sometimes unwelcome, sexual experiences. Her heroines' innocence is exacerbated by upbringings in the hands of fanatically religious mothers or aunts who equate knowledge about matters of the flesh with sin, forcing them to depend on half-truths and innuendos in lieu of a proper sexual education. Through the sagas of her traumatized deflowered virgins, ambivalent about sexuality yet eager for experience, Guido creates profound tensions in her texts while offering the reader titillating instances of elegantly described seductions or subtly eroticized rapes.

In La casa del angel, the young protagonist, intrigued by the figure of a friend of her father's who is to fight a duel at dawn, walks into the room where he is holding his vigil and finds herself at once seduced and raped. Rushing to uncover the face of the slain man after the duel only to discover that her assailant has survived, she withdraws into a dreamlike state haunted by his guilt-ridden presence. The theme of ambivalent seduction and traumatic deflowering is also central to La mano en la trampa, where the protagonist discovers that an aunt has remained locked in the attic for years after being jilted on her wedding day by the boyfriend that had seduced her. Determined to find the man and persuade him to return to confront his jilted fiancée, she falls under his spell and ends up seduced in her turn. Similarly, in La Caída, Guido offers the claustrophobic tale of a young student, brought up in a strict Catholic home by her maiden aunt, who moves into a boarding house in which live four amoral children who become the witnesses and catalysts to her traumatic sexual awakening. Guido will bring the same erotic tension between innocence and sexual violence that characterizes her novels to her original screenplays. El secuestrador, for example, where the protagonists spend most of their screen time consummating their relationship, is most memorable for a scene of consensual rape staged in a mortuary. Like in La casa del angel and her other fiction, the blurred line between rape and consensual sex constitutes Guido's most salient repository of the erotic. This erotic quality was captured brilliantly in a film by Torre Nilsson and became one of the salient themes in their joint work.

In these texts and film scripts, Guido explores the ambivalent nature of sexual violence as a way of addressing the patriarchal and political violence that was a central element in her world. Having lived through traumatic dictatorships, coups, and labor crises, Guido was acutely attuned to the metaphoric value of images of rape, submission, and uncontrolled masculinity. As an avowed feminist and a member of a politically liberal family, she will carefully intertwine into her plots a critique of unbridled male power and violence. The subtle accumulation of sociological detail in her works creates a series of markers for a specific class milieu and historical period that allows the reader to see her protagonists' bodies as metaphors of a collective experience under a succession of repressive regimes, allowing the sexual violence in her novels to be interpreted as offering a critique of authoritarianism. The seducer in Guido's Fin de fiesta, for example, draws on the image of unbridled masculinity of Argentinean dictator Juan Domingo Perón, linking violence against women to political violence.

Biography

Beatriz Guido was born in Rosario, Argentina, in 1924, to a liberal upper-class family with advanced notions about educational opportunities for women. Consequently, she studied literature at the University of Buenos Aires and went to France and Italy for graduate studies. She started to write in her early twenties, and by the age of thirty was an accomplished and celebrated novelist and short story writer. In 1958, she embarked on a career as a film scriptwriter with El secuestrador (The Kidnapper, 1958), a film directed by Leopoldo Torre Nilsson (1924–1978), who had already established a reputation as Argentina's most promising young film director. They were married the following year. Their film collaboration—Guido penned most of the screenplays for her husband's films after their marriage—resulted in film versions of many of her novels and short stories. By the time of her marriage, Guido had already published three of her best novels, La casa del ángel (The House of the Angel, 1954), La caída (The Fall, 1956), and Fin de fiesta (The End of the Party, 1958). All three were filmed by the couple within a few years of their marriage, laying the foundation for the most successful film collaboration in the history of Latin-American cinema. Film versions of her subsequent novels, La mano en la trampa (1961), El incendio y las vísperas (1965), and Piedra libre (1976) cemented their reputation. They remained close collaborators until his premature death in 1978 at age 54. Together they worked on acclaimed films like La Guerra del cerdo (1975), based on the novel by Adolfo Bioy Casares, and Martín Fierro (1968), based on the classic 1872 poem by José Hernández. She also wrote scripts for films by other directors, among them Manuel Antin's La invitación (Argentina, 1982), Carlos Orgambide's Los Insomnes (Argentina, 1986), and Fernando Ayala's Paula Cautiva (Argentina, 1963). Guido, considered by many Latin-American critics as one of the most important feminist writers of the second half of the twentieth century, was one of the few women writers of the Latin-American Literary Boom of the 1960s and 70s. A prolific author, she received the Konex Award for her literary achievements in 1984, the same year she was named cultural attaché to the Argentinean Embassy in Spain. She died in Madrid in 1988.

LIZABETH PARAVISINI-GEBERT

Selected Works

- La caída*. Buenos Aires: Losada, 1981.
La casa del ángel. Buenos Aires, Emecé, 1954.
Fin de fiesta. Barcelona: Planeta, 1971.
La invitación. Buenos Aires, Losada, 1982.
La mano en la trampa. Buenos Aires: Losada, 1961.
Piedra libre. Buenos Aires, Galerna, 1976.

Further Reading

- Clifford, Joan. "The Female Bildungsromane of Beatriz Guido." Hispanófila 132 (2001): 125–139.
 Domínguez, Nora. "Familias literarias: visión adolescente y poder político en la narrativa de Beatriz Guido." Revista Iberoamericana 70:206 (2004): 225–235.
 Jozef, Bella. "In memoriam: Luisa Mercedes Levinson y Beatriz Guido." Revista Iberoamericana 54:144–145 (1988): 1021–1023.
 Lewald, H. Ernest. "Alienation and Eros in Three Stories by Beatriz Guido, Marta Lynch, and Amalia Jamilis." In Theory and Practice of Feminist Literary Criticism, 175–185. edited by Gabriela Mora and Karen S. Van Hooft. Ypsilanti, MI: Bilingual, 1982.
 Mahieu, José Agustín. "Beatriz Guido: las dos escrituras." Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 437 (1986): 153–168.

---

GUILLÉN, NICOLÁS

---

1902–1989

Cuban poet

During his lifetime Nicolás Guillén became practically synonymous both with Revolutionary Cuba and the island's Black population. As a Mulatto, however, he expressed a dual heritage, using the erotic as a vehicle for notions of ethnic and cultural miscegenation. The confluence of sexual and cultural elements is also visible in the evolution of his personal style: Gustavo Pérez Firmat (1989, pp. 67–79) sees the dichotomy in Guillén's work between classical and vernacular verse as parallel to this ethnic duality, part of the acquisition of a mature, independent voice. Guillén's early "White" verse, which uses the sonnet form and follows certain conventions of courtly love, is in marked contrast to 1930s work in which, through phonetic transcription of spoken African-Cuban Spanish, he voiced popular concerns whilst also validating this language through the very fact of its transcription. During the early 1930s, Guillén distorts written Spanish, forcing it to speak from a Black viewpoint. After the Revolution, Guillén's increasingly overt political poetry relegated the erotic to a remote corner of his concerns. However, the persistence of this declamatory public image since his death is somewhat misleading: as Keith Ellis (1994, pp. 45–87) has shown, he was capable of discreet and intimate love poems such as In Some Springtime Place: Elegy (1966).

A recurrent theme among critics is that of Guillén's sexual politics, which in the early twenty-first century certainly appear archaic. Pérez Firmat shows how El abuelo [The Grandfather], (1934) ironically adopts a subservient, courtly stance in reminding a blonde Cuban woman of a partial African ancestry which she had chosen to ignore. But the generic perspective is distorted: for Vera Kutzinski (1993) the poem "constructs an interracial male lineage for its near-White female figure," reducing the feminine to mere spectatorship. Similarly, in Ballad of the two Grandfathers (1934) the female reproductive role is excluded as African and Spanish forebears, united by the poet, unite to heal historical wounds. Where female strength is prominent, it generally takes the form of an atavistic, telluric vigor associated with fecundity and eroticism. An instance of this can be seen in Madrigal (1934):

Simple and erect,
like a cane in the cane field
Oh challenger of genital frenzy

Curiously Guillén's female forms often take on a phallic and even self-fertilizing nature; a potent image that may contradict some of the charges of aberrant sexual politics. Another example is Piedra de horno [Oven Stone] (1944), which describes a woman as sensually self-sufficient:

A river of promises runs down from your hair, pauses at your breasts, congeals at last in a pool of molasses at your belly, violates your firm flesh of nocturnal secret.

Guillén was central to the Afro-Cuban movement that began in the 1920s occasioned by, and crucial to, the process of ethnic and cultural integration between African and European heritages. For Kutzinski (1987): "Almost all aspects of Guillén's poetry are deeply rooted in the cross-cultural imagination of the Caribbean." Kutzinski (1993), sees the late 1920s "mulatto" poetry as essentially a celebration and mythification of the woman of mixed descent who is nonetheless disenfranchised. She is a paradoxical figure, the traditional object of male sexual preference but also marginalized and viewed with suspicion. "The mulata may be the signifier of Cuba's unity-in-racial-diversity, but she has no part in it." The poem Mulata (1930) explicitly rejects this object of lust and voices preference (recurrent in Guillén's earlier work) for a more reliable, less pretentious Black partner. The mulata, long seen as dangerous temptress in Cuban literature, exerts a threatening attraction likened to the frantic and relentless rhythm of a locomotive:

Tanto tren con tu cueppo,
tanto tren;
tanto tren con tu boca,
tanto tren;
(literally: "So much train with your body, so much train; so much train with your mouth, so much train)

Lorna Williams (1982) sees a similar objectification in another poem entitled Madrigal (1931). The lines "Your belly knows more than your head / and as much as your thighs" display values ill-fitting a figure of the left today. Alluding to a matriarchal sensuality ostensibly consonant with African ancestry, the poem goes on to evoke "that dark alligator / swimming in the Zambezi of your eyes." The content ironically belies madrigal's association with elite European sophistication.

The transformation during Guillén's lifetime in the configuration of Cuban nationality can be attributed not only to the Revolution but also to the gradual validation of African heritage through early twentieth-century movements such as the boom in the song form known as son, négritude in the French Caribbean and the Harlem Revival. Guillén's codified sexuality enunciates a popular consciousness celebrating the mulatto as an embodiment of the principle of blending, a basic ingredient of 'Cubanness.' For Ian Isidore Smart (1990), this is the "central creative conflict" in his poetry: engendered by interethnic sexuality, mulatez in turn enables an awareness of African roots which itself "engenders [...] the inevitable conflict between Eurocentered and Afrocentered realities." For Smart, the resolution of this dichotomy, which Guillén transformed from a destructive force into the very basis of his poetics, is at the core of his work. Guillén was heir to the sociologist Fernando Ortiz's pioneering re-evaluation of Cuba's African heritage for which he invented the term "transculturation," referring to the mutual influence between cultures irrespective of questions of dominance or subalternity. Metaphoric renditions of this principle of cultural and ethnic blending abound: Ortiz also spoke of the ajiaco (a Cuban stew) in this context. Guillén's own term "algarabía" (rejoicing) is similar, but shows a heightened optimism crucial to his poetry. The spirit of overcoming or dissolving cultural barriers, 'algarabía' is akin to the Cuban novelist Alejo Carpentier's conception of Magic Realism: the delirious and exuberant result of the encounter between diverse elements essential to Caribbean and Latin-American cultural formation (Kutzinski 1987).

Biography

Nicolás Guillén was born in Camagüey, Cuba on July 10, 1902. He studied law and journalism at the University La Habana. His first poems appeared in Camaguey Grafico in 1922. He joined the Cuban Communist Party in 1937 and in 1940, he ran for mayor of Camaguey and in 1948 for senatorial office; both campaigns were unsuccessful. From 1953 he lived in exile in France. He returned after the revolution and Fidel Castro appointed him president of Cuba's writers' union. Guillén died in Havana on July 16 1989.

Further Reading

- Ellis, Keith, ed. Nicolás Guillén: Nueva poesía de amor = New Love Poetry. University of Toronto Press, 1994.
- Kutzinski, Vera M. Against the American Grain: Myth and History in William Carlos Williams, Jay Wright, and Nicolás Guillén. Baltimore: John Hopkins University Press, 1987.
- . Sugar's Secrets: Race and the Erotics of Cuban Nationalism. University of Virginia Press, Charlottesville 1993.
- Pérez Firmat, Gustavo. The Cuban Condition: Translation and Identity in Modern Cuban Literature. Cambridge University Press, 1989.
- Smart, Ian Isidore. Nicolás Guillén, Popular Poet of the Caribbean. Columbia, MO: University of Missouri Press, 1990.
- Williams, Lorna V. Self and Society in the Poetry of Nicolás Guillén. Baltimore: John Hopkins University Press, 1982.

---

GULLIVER, LILI

---

The title of Lili Gulliver's four-book set The Gulliver Universe is a take on Jonathan Swift's eighteenth-century novel Gulliver's Travels. However, Swift's book is a series of fantasy adventures, and there is nothing erotic in them. Here, the name Gulliver is at the same time the title of the series, the author's nom de plume (her real name is Diane Boissonneault) and the main character's eponym, and lets the narrative be set in a travel and discovery mode.

The excuse of travel is used at the very beginning of Paris, the first volume, when Lili announces that she is leaving on an erotic world tour, but only in the second volume, Greece, is the journey's real purpose specified: "I, Lili Gulliver, am convinced that a guide to international fuck can be very useful and help track down the best lover in the world." The intention of writing such a guide, a new erotic excuse added on to the idea of a voyage of discovery, overdetermines the contents of the narratives. The Gulliver Guide, as parody of a travel book, is used as an alibi for having multiple sexual encounters: "As it should be, I will meet again with various types of men, of all colours and all social standings" and also for physical descriptions and sexual relationships.

The writing of the Gulliver Guide, Guide of International Fuck conceals a specific purpose: find the best lover in the world. And since this is an impossible goal, Lili will not stop traveling around the world and living ever renewed sexual adventures. The visited countries are described in commonplace and cliché terms which are themselves considered from a sexual viewpoint.

For instance, France is acknowledged the world over for its cuisine, therefore, in the first volume, Paris, Lili links cooking and sex: "I know, from a culinary standpoint, that he wants to slip me his asparagus so that I can wrap it between my hams, as the host would say. Which is a more romantic version than 'grab my sausage any way you can among the pasta.'" Lili will have four sexual partners in all in the City of Lights: Francis, a wine waiter;

Gérard, a psychoanalyst; Carl, a male escort; and Dominique, a friend's lady-friend. The relationships with Gérard and Francis are heterosexual and traditional: foreplay followed by penetration. Things are different with Carl. During a moonlight river cruise on the Seine, one of the greatest romantic clichés in feminine romantic imagination, Carl offers anal penetration to the narrator, but even though she praises the value of sodomy, she avoids the occurrence of such an act in a very prudish and conventional way. The same refusal occurs when Dominique offers Lili to sleep with her: "Lili a dyke? It depends on the attraction, but I really prefer men. Women are not very attractive to me. Surely that's just a small mental block." At the very end of the volume, the narrator affirms in regard to the basic principle of her erotic story that: "Actually, maybe I am not such a real user of dicks, no more than I am into marathon sex. Fucking with one man can suffice and satisfy me fully."

In Volume 2, Greece, Lili finds six lovers in all: Gino, a waiter; Vangelis, a restaurant owner; Jack, an American sailor; an anonymous lifeguard; Erick, a Norwegian; Yan, a Danish Greek; and Peter, a Briton. The contradictory dialectics of the whole of The Gulliver Universe are revealed here. Lili Gulliver uses the Guide as an excuse to have as varied sexual encounters as possible, with as many partners as possible, but her morality prevents her from enjoying without misgivings those purely physical relationships. The issue lies with the fact that her Guide fits a certain approach to life, and her personal values another. The book repeats erotic clichés about brute male force which is devoid of feelings with six of the men on that list, whereas Lili's ideal relationship remains monogamous and perpetual. To confirm this, in the chapter titled "Love at first sight" she meets Peter, the Briton, who will embody for a while the perfect lover; nevertheless, she will leave him a few weeks later to pursue her adventures in Asia.

In Bangkok, Hot and Wet, the third volume of The Gulliver Universe, Lili only has three sexual encounters. The first one is with a Japanese man in the plane, the second with a Thai boxer, and the third with Richard Harvey, an extremely wealthy American tourist staying at a luxurious suite in the Bangkok Hilton. As far as being a “sexplorer” is concerned, the framework of the whole adventure remains restricted and mostly predictable. The narration insists page after page on the man’s wealth, whom she describes thus: “He’s a natty dresser. Lacoste shirt, cream-coloured pants, crocodile belt, tennis shoes, well-kept body. He is a handsome fifty with the air of a man who has had it easy. This gentleman has class, and it shows.” Here we have a modern take on the Prince Charming, who is always handsome, rich, and cultivated. And actually, the semantic network used to describe sexual relations with Richard—tenderly, marvellous, fabulous, enchantment—belong also to the fairytale universe. On learning that her lover is already married, Lili leaves again, toward the end of the world, feeling disappointed and betrayed.

In the last of the four volumes, Australia, Down Under Without Undies, Lili has four lovers. Joe, an architect; Jerry, a surfer; an anonymous lover; and Tarzamo Rambo, a farmer. The relationships are all conventional except for a threesome at the beginning of the novel. Later on she meets Tello, nicknamed Tarzamo Rambo, for obvious reasons. Lili uses and abuses that lover who gets the highest award in The Gulliver Universe: “The gold dick is awarded here to a rigid, enduring, and valiant steel penis.” The couple goes camping and indulges in sexual activities divided into rather equal parts of cunnilingus, fellatio, and penetration.

This survey of the four volumes of The Gulliver Universe shows how eroticism is organized according to sequential logic: visits to several countries, encounters with several lovers, experimentation of various positions, and description of heterodox practices. All of that is presented humorously, using as many clichés as possible to describe all the situations. It is obvious that this story relies on convention. The same can be said of the male and female paradigms underlying the narrative: the man is always manly and the woman relies on him to achieve orgasm. Lili Gulliver—the ‘sexplorer’—will be satisfied only when she has traveled all the countries in the world!

Biography

Lili Gulliver—born Diane Boissonneault—studied literature and screenwriting and has been a journalist and cultural critic. She lives in Montreal, Canada where she runs a bed and breakfast with her husband.

ELISE SALAÜN

Selected Works

The Gulliver Universe. Volume 1: Paris (1990), Volume 2: Greece (1991), Volume 3: Bangkok, Hot and Wet (1993), Volume 4: Australia downunder without undies (1996), Montreal, VLB Publisher. Translation: Henry C. Mera. Ph.D.

---

GUYOTAT, PIERRE

---

1940–
French writer and artist

Tombeau pour cinq cent mille soldats

A violent, erotic epic of blood, sweat, and semen, with echoes of Genet, Guibert, Noël, Sade, and Wittig, and even Malraux’s La condition humaine. It combines an incantatory, almost biblical, tone with parody and hyperbole—and, for some, given Guyotat’s troubled period in Algeria, implicit comments on the Algerian War.

Chant I

This text recounts the taking and the liberation of Ecbatane, torn between an invading army, an aged chief, and his lieutenant, Iérissos, and rebels, whether soldiers or slaves. In the course of the conflict, there is much bloodshed, copulation, and torture between the main, human characters—Iérissos, the Queen of the Night, and three slaves, Mantinée, Bactriane, and Aravik—and also animals: a horse, rats, and birds.

Chant II

This section is, at first, a more episodic account of the occupied island, moving between various individuals and groups, from the violent Kment family to the picaresque adventures of the sexually liberated Crazy Horse and of the Governor, his wife Émilienne and their two children Serge and Fabienne. Licentiousness alternates with incest, infanticide, bestiality, cannibalism, and torture. The frequent spilling of blood, semen, and excrement seems, however, neither subversive or salacious but the simply savoured self-expression of a population at war. The pace then slows to register the erotic coupling of Kment and Giauhare, a cardinal's desire for adolescent boys, and the trials of Illiten, chief of the rebels.

Chant III

Here, a series of surreal tableaux moves from brothel activities and the further visitations of the cardinal to scenes of war, torture and, since blood is the sperm of battle, sex: a soldier masturbates; the narrator (intermittently in the first-person) has congress with a seagull; Serge and Émilienne make feverish love; the young General enjoys an uninhibited session with one of his kitchen-boys, Pino, before fantasizing running an S/M male brothel and an orgy of violent, incestuous pleasures. Meanwhile, it seems that the captured Illiten has escaped and the rebels are winning.

Chant IV

Apart from occasional violent episodes—as when Giauhare is almost raped by a soldier and when a rat devours a dead boy's penis—this section evokes more gentle, even tender male-to-female and male-to-male bondings, whether on the beach where the wounded Serge is tended by a devoted Émilienne or in a cave where a soldier fellates a group of men. The section ends in one of the disputatious local brothels, where the young, drug-injected Pétrilion sodomizes, and is sodomized by, an eager and athletic dog, after which Pétrilion is borne off, wounded and Christ-like, by a solicitous admirer, Draga.

Chant V

Conflict between revolutionaries and invaders wears on, with slave-prisoners (Véronique, Xaintrailles, Thivai, and the narrator) conducting a kind of sexual ballet, adolescents fornicating in the Royal Inaménas hotel, and the General licking the wounds of dead and dying soldiers. Fabienne mourns a happier past with Serge, Kment and Giauhare are reunited, and Illiten is murdered and replaced by Béja who brings the rebels closer to victory. After the General is murdered and the Governor imprisoned, the characters of Ecbatane are even freer to change and combine sexual partners and positions as dawn breaks over the coast.

Chant VI

Preparations for the final engagement are accompanied by the soldiers' struggle over and with the seductive Niké who wants to see the battle which will involve hideous slaughter, not least in the city of Titov Veles, hitherto characterized by its failure to support the rebels and by an absence of brothels since its inhabitants prefer its own slaves, children, and animals. Faced by the marauding rebels who rape, massacre, and plunder—killing Serge and Émilienne, decapitating Pino in his kitchen, and incinerating Titov Veles—the Governor surrenders. Giauhare tells Kment she is having a child—by a rat.

Chant VII

Kment and Giauhare are now alone with nature and with animals. Kment ejaculates into the earth while Giauhare lies under a wolf. The lovers embrace.

Éden, éden, éden

In tune with Guyotat's contention that his work is not merely erotic but pornographic, this controversial, single-sentence text describes the serial and multiple copulations of a group of men, women, children, and animals in and around an Arab brothel (male and female) in an otherwise unspecified time and place. Although war is not the issue, it was in Tombeau, soldiers and their fatigues—usually unbuttoned or discarded—figure strongly, alongside “lubricators,” herdsman, and nomads, who gather, with their livestock (sheep and geese), to enjoy the whores and boy-whores such as Wazzag and Khamssieh who participate readily in the alternating exchanges of seminal fluids and orgasmic couplings. When a butcher and his family become involved, the sex-making becomes predictably bloodier, with the butcher fisting Khamssieh, who is also bitten by a tarantula, and with Wazzag busy with a whoremaster, a date-picker, a panel-beater, and twin apprentices until the whole group is a virtually indistinguishable mêlée of limbs, lurchings, orgasms, and excrement. The twins then separate as other previously mentioned ‘characters’—nomad, herdsman, soldiers, and Blacks—return to the fray, which, now in a farm-camp, includes a cow and a baby. The adolescent herdsman is penetrated on all sides and by all comers, including the twins, Hamza and Khemissa; the latter is then sprayed with the urine and semen of the whoremaster. However insistent and even relentless these sexual encounters and however regular the orgasms, pornography’s “money shot” is itself never a sexual or even verbal climax but, rather, one aspect of the eroticism of the whole body—with its other liquids such as sweat, saliva, and blood—and of the language used to describe it. Hence the body is a permanent repository of earlier, sedimented or congealed orgasms which gleam on its surfaces and form a basis for a continuum of pleasure. This ubiquitous corporeal viscosity can also be seen as redolent of the existentialist pour soi, of Bataille’s expenditure, and also, perhaps, of the eventual threat (or promise) of erotic death. For although the text in a sense never finishes (it “closes” mid-sentence with a comma) the exchanges do become more violent—chest-hair is burnt, a vein is bitten open, an anus is lanced—and more chaotic: dogs, monkeys, goats, women, and children are drawn in to a dervish dance of sweating, groaning, and increasingly unidentifiable bodies. Despite this uninterrupted sexual activity, what seems to be missing here is desire itself, either because it is just assumed or because it is thought to be in the reader (hence possibly the association with pornography) rather than in the text itself. Guyotat’s desert “Garden of Delights” thus offers a highly original and potentially disturbing oneiric, erotic epic.

Explications

Among the topics discussed here with Marianne Alphant are the relation between sex(uality) and writing and the status and significance of the prostitute (male and female). The relation between sex and writing is complex: on the one hand writing is, despite Guyotat’s notorious association between writing and masturbation and general eroticization of the word, not only borne of personal chastity but constitutes a kind of anti- or counter-sex—a revolt against sex and sexuality. On the subject of prostitution and the male or female whore, Guyotat is similarly ambivalent: although he describes the whore as a “non-person,” between human and animal, who is, like everything else, a saleable commodity, the brothel and its environs are clearly his preferred “real” and symbolic territory, as is shown by its recurrence in other texts such as Prostitution (1975 and 1987) and Progénitures (2000). Without necessarily allying him to the “poète maudit” tradition, Guyotat’s foregrounding of the prostitute enables him to question what it is to be human, what it is to be sexual, and what are the links between carnal and familial-social relations. On the subject of sexuality and gender, Guyotat is equally ambivalent: although he has been described as a eulogist of homosexuality, some of his texts end with an epiphany of male-female bonding, and, as the title of Progénitures confirms, breeding, whether actual or symbolic, is a key theme in his works. Indeed, both male and female prostitutes are put forward as breeders, whether male-on-male, male-on-female, female-on-male or (more rarely), female-on-female. The urge to breed, whether in sex or in art, transcends biological sex and sexual “orientation”: semen flows between sexes as it flows between orifices in a never-ending series of human/non-human erotic exchanges.

Biography

Although Guyotat’s early writing includes two novels, Sur un cheval and Ashby, it was his later

GUYOTAT, PIERRE

Tombeau pour cinq cent mille soldats and Éden, Éden, Éden which brought him fame, indeed notoriety, with the latter being banned from 1970 until 1981. After publishing a number of books in the interstice, including Prostitution and Le Livre, he came to public attention again in 2000 with two further volumes: Progénitures and Explications. The year 2005 saw the republication of Ashby and Sur un cheval together with the first volume of his Carnets de bord (1962–1969) and Catherine Brun's Pierre Guyotat. Essai biographique. It is worth noting that Guyotat himself rejects the title 'writer' in favor of creator, artist, or even architect.

OWEN HEATHCOTE

Selected Works

Tombeau pour cinq cent mille soldats. 1967.
Éden, éden, éden. 1970 (Translated into English under the same title by Graham Fox, with an introduction by Stephen Barber. London: Creation Books, 1995).
Prostitution. 1975 and, for a new edition with appendix, 1987.

Le Livre. 1984.
Progénitures. 2000 (includes a CD of the author reading the text's opening pages).
Explications. 2000.
Ashby suivi de sur un cheval. [1961, 1964] 2005.
Carnets de bord. Vol. 1 1962–1969, 2005.

Further Reading

Brun, Catherine. "Monstruosités de Pierre Guyotat," Critique. No. 653 (October, 2001), pp. 785–797.
Brun, Catherine. Pierre Guyotat. Essai biographique. Paris: Léo Scheer, 2005.
"Pierre Guyotat: Seminal Texts." Participants Pierre Guyotat and Stephen Barber. Audio cassette no. 1403 produced by Institute of Contemporary Arts, London, 1995.
Guichard, Thierry. 'À corps perdus' and '“Je ne suis pas un écrivain.”' Le matricule des anges. No. 64 (juin 2005), pp.14–17, 18–24.
Surya, Michel. "Mots et monde de Pierre Guyotat." Lignes. 03 (October, 2000), pp. 28–52.
Surya, Michel. Mots et monde de Pierre Guyotat. Tours: Farrago, 2000.
White, Edmund and Sorin, Hubert. Sketches from Memory: People and Places at the Heart of Our Paris. London: Chatto & Windus and Picador, 1994.

H

---

HAINTENY (MADAGASCAR)

---

The hainteny is a poetic genre composed in both Malagasy and French and most often found in written form. It originated, however, as a form of poetic oral dialogue in Madagascar, common in everyday speech. It expresses two principal themes: love and justice, and was originally used to settle disputes, as well as, more popularly, to express metaphorically sexual desire or pursuit. The hainteny frequently takes the form of a dialogue, which was originally improvised on the spot as a kind of verbal duel. To engage in an oral hainteny competition it was first necessary to know a number of commonly cited hainteny or ohabolana (the closest translation is “proverbs”), with which they have often been confused. The dialogic structure has parallels in other African forms of poetic expression, as well as in the Malaysian pantun. In the written form this frequently gives rise to ambiguity however, where it is frequently not clear where divisions between interlocutors lie, or even whether more than one voice is present. The Malagasy language also does not mark the gender difference in speech and so further ambiguity is often present, especially where the hainteny express courtship or sexual advances.

The derivation of the word “hainteny” itself has attracted considerable controversy. Their erotic content is often stressed, as in the description of them given by the Reverend James Sibree, a British Missionary who edited the Antananarivo Annual from 1875–1900, as “erotic proverbs” and Domenichini-Ramiaramanana’s use of “mots brûlants,” or “burning words.” Jean Paulhan, who spent two years in Madagascar from 1908–1910 and produced a highly influential body of work on the hainteny, stressed rather their wisdom and artistry, calling them “mots savants” and “science du langage.” Paulhan was the first outside commentator to see the hainteny as poetry rather than prose, as the missionaries generally had, and sought to uncover its perceived obscurity. It was through Paulhan’s work and his correspondence with, among others, Guillaume Appollinaire and Lucien Lévy-Bruhl, that the hainteny came most prominently into view in European cultural circles, where they found an echo in the avant-garde search for a new form of poetry. They also had a resonance within the francophone African community, as part of the anti-colonial négritude movement, and examples can be found in

HAINTENY (MADAGASCAR)

Leopold Senghor's Anthologie de la nouvelle poésie nègre et malgache de la langue française. Within Madagascar the rediscovery of the hainteny by twentieth-century poets writing in French, notably Jean-Joseph Rabearivelo and Flavien Ranaivo, should be seen as part of a literary return to Malagasy tradition though not excluding the incorporation of European language and poetic devices.

Major collections were made in the nineteenth-century by missionaries, but these were heavily censored and so tend to exclude the more overtly sexual hainteny. The Reverend Lars Dahle, a Norwegian Missionary, went as far as to include in the preface to his Specimens of Malagasy Folklore (1877) the warning "In spite of all care I am still not sure that in some places an unnoticed impure thought may not lurk underneath, as it is sometimes so extremely difficult to find out what notions and associations may, in course of time, have gathered round a seemingly quite innocent word or phrase." Even in collections that were not overtly censored by Western collectors it would appear that the range of hainteny communicated was censored in some way by the practitioners themselves. The difference in style and content can be seen when compared with the wide-ranging collection made under the reign of Queen Ranavalona I, between 1828 and 1861, and published by Bakoly Domenichini-Ramiaramana (Hainteny D'Autrefois, 1968) which contain more explicit sexual references. It may also be that an effect of the spreading of Christianity in Madagascar was to dilute the erotic content of commonly known and recited hainteny. Even so, as Dahle feared, careful analysis of seemingly innocent hainteny may reveal highly erotic connotations, and Flavien Ranaivo, one of the leading Malagasy poets of the mid-/late-twentieth century, has claimed that in all hainteny an erotic meaning can be found on some level.

The hainteny is associated primarily with the Merina people, although other related genres exist in Madagascar which are more overtly sexual and direct, such as the Sakalava saimbola. In these the part played by the woman is simply an acceptance or refusal of the man's advances, however, which may indicate a difference in the relative status of men and women in different regions of Madagascar. Hainteny tend to be more indirect, where the woman is fully capable of poetic expression and negotiation. Many, such as Ranaivo's "la cousine de Magali" take the form of a dialectic of capture and escape, where the woman is able to evade the man's advances through constant deferral and transposition of the approach or question. Here the woman responds to the man's assertions of sexual possession (gathering a silver fruit) by transforming herself from an object (the fruit on the tree) to an animal (a bird which may fly away).

This indirect communication functions primarily through the use of metaphor and symbol, which frequently operate on multiple levels. These resonate strongly in Malagasy culture and language, but have frequently led during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries to the dismissal of hainteny as obscure and incomprehensible. The landscape of the hainteny is rich and populated by birds and animals which may indicate, for example, desire or availability, and by mountains, rivers and forests, all of which bear symbolic meaning. Sexual and emotive associations may also be linked to everyday objects such as the lamba [shawl], which often functions as a locus of desire.

The hainteny presents significant problems of interpretation for a non-Malagasy audience. It repays careful study however, and its subtle treatment of themes such as love, jealousy, and desire reveal layers of meaning and association, and a rare and enduring beauty.

IMOGEN PARSONS

Further Reading

- Domenichini-Ramiaramana, Bakoly. Hainteny D'Autrefois. Tananarive: Librairie mixte, 1968.
- . Du Ohabolana au Hainteny: Langue, Littérature et Politique à Madagascar. Paris: Karthala, 1983.
- Dahle, Lars. Specimens of Malagasy Folklore. Antananarivo: Kingdon, 1877.
- Fox, Leonard. Hainteny: The Traditional Poetry of Madagascar. Salem, MA: Associated University Presses, 1990.
- Haring, Lee. Verbal Arts in Madagascar: Performance in Historical Perspective. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1992.
- Paulhan, Jean. Jean Paulhan et Madagascar, 1908–1910. Paris: Gallimard, 1982.
- Les Hain-teny Merinas*. Paris: Geuthner, 1913.
- Les Hain-tenys*. Paris: Gallimard, 1939.
- Les Hain-teny poésie obscure*. Principauté de Monaco: Société des Conférences, 1930.
- Rabearivelo, Jean-Joseph. Poèmes: Presque-Songes; Traduits de le Nuit. Tananarive: Imprimerie officielle de Madagascar, 1960.

Raberivelo, Jean-Joseph. Vieilles Chansons des pays d'Imerina. Antananarivo: Editions Madprint, 1967.
 Ranaivo, Flavien. Hain-teny. Paris: Publications orientalistes de France, 1975.
 Ranaivo, Flavien. Textes Commentés (par J. Valette), Paris: Fernand Nathan, 1968.

Ranaivo, Flavien. "Les Hain-teny," in Jean Paulhan et Madagascar. Paris: Gallimard, 1982.
 Senghor, Leopold. Anthologie de la nouvelle poésie nègre et malgache de la langue française.
 "Madagascar 2: La littérature d'expression française," Notre Librairie. Issue No. 110, July–September 1992.

---

HAITIAN LITERARY EROTICISM

---

Since independence and up to the middle of the twentieth century Haitian society remained remarkably structured, stable, and self-contained: The citizenry was divided into a small self-perpetuating urban minority which monopolized political power and its perquisites, and a large powerless rural majority who produced the nation's wealth while receiving none of its benefits. The constant struggle for ascendancy that characterizes Haitian history concerned the contending factions of the ruling classes, was irrelevant to the illiterate peasantry, and had little influence on the elite's cultural Weltanschauung and its expression.

The catastrophic dictatorship of François Duvalier on the one hand, and the progress of modernization and globalization on the other, have plunged Haitian society into a continuing ever-deepening crisis. The last half-century has witnessed ecological devastation, the pauperization of a peasantry forced to abandon the land and crowd into urban slums and shanty towns, the breakdown of law and order, the disregard for human rights, and the massive emigration of Haitians of all social strata (especially intellectuals) primarily to the other West Indies, Quebec, and the United States. Traditional ways of life, social customs, intellectual values, intergenerational relationships, and modes of interaction between the sexes have been further profoundly unsettled and deeply affected by foreign ways learned in exile or through the media. These changes are necessarily reflected in literary eroticism. One should therefore distinguish between literary eroticism during the century and a half of stability, and literary eroticism as it has been developing since the crisis. While the first is relatively easy to describe, such is not the case for the second.

Generally speaking, Haitian society is not particularly prudish. Haitians are just as fond as other West Indians of double-entendres and ribald stories. Popular songs, enjoyed by men and women of all social classes, make a specialty of this kind of racy humor, and are quite openly suggestive. But they are in Créole, the national language, in which all citizens are fluent, and not in French, the only official language up to 1987, the medium of a literature that remains accessible to only a minute percentage of the ruling classes.

Literate Haitians have traditionally regarded French with a respect verging on idolatry. They tend to consider that their country's contributions to its literature should deal primarily with serious, lofty, socially committed themes. One theme has in fact dominated the concerns of Haitian writers (and readers) ever since independence: the viability of Haiti as a nation, and the failings of its citizenry. This obsession with the tragic destiny of the country makes the sexual life of its citizens a secondary concern. Erotic experiences are practically never included for their own sake but used to illustrate, complement, or symbolize other themes, or to flesh out the psychological makeup of a character. Thus, in Fernand Hibbert's 1905 novel Séna, the eponymous hero's lusting for his light-colored mistress is an expression of color prejudice rather than of conquering masculinity. In Frédéric Marcelin's 1902 La Vengeance De Mama (Mama's Revenge) a young woman assassinates the corrupt politician who thinks he is finally about to enjoy her favors not during a lover's quarrel but to avenge the death of her fiancée.

HAITIAN LITERARY EROTICISM

If we define erotica as writings primarily designed to titillate or arouse through the description of sexual acts, there is for all intents and purposes no Haitian erotica. Haitian literature in French is meant to educate and inspire, not to entertain, and thus has produced no erotica, and no (or very few) mystery or detective novels either, nor science fiction, children's books, bedroom farces, or Harlequin romances. In addition, the writer and his public belong to the same extremely narrow social group. All writers know each other personally, and it would be only a slight exaggeration to suggest that most readers also are acquainted with one another. A writer tempted to explore erotic themes, or even to compose erotic passages, would therefore hesitate for fear of scandalizing readers who, in the way of readers everywhere, readily identify authors with their fictional characters and ascribe descriptions of "unseemly" behavior to their creator's libido.

The literary genre in which Haitian authors writing in French are less reticent to evoke sexual desire and satisfaction are tales and short stories depicting, always in the facetious mode, rural or proletarian life. For example André Chevallier in Mon petit Kodak [My Little Camera] (1916), Jacques-Stéphen Alexis in Roman-cero aux étoiles [Songbook for the Stars] (1960), René Depestre in Alléluia pour une femme-jardin [Hallelujah for a Garden-woman] (1973), and Gary Victor in most of his collections of ribald tales: Albert Buron (1988), Nouvelles interdites [Forbidden Tales] (1989) etc. These texts are reminiscent of medieval and Renaissance anecdotes about cuckolded jealous husbands, ridiculous old men lusting after young women, frustrated old maids, city Casanovas bested by wily country wenches, and the like. They could be traced back to the fabliaux tradition that occasionally inspired La Fontaine, Voltaire, and Balzac, but they could also be considered as the adaptation into the cultured language of the Créole songs and stories that treat the same subject matter. In these tales, as in traditional French anti-clerical anecdotes, it is not uncommon to see Breton missionary priests sacrifice their vow of chastity on the altar of their lusty Black housekeepers. However, in contradistinction to the French, Haitian authors have not depicted nuns succumbing to or even having to resist temptation.

Descriptions or mere allusions to a series of sexual behaviors are practically absent from Haitian writings before the last few decades. Sexual dysfunction, be it impotence or frigidity, is not even hinted at. Male homosexuality seems not to exist. No incidence of lesbianism before a fleeting episode between two prostitutes in Jacques-Stéphen Alexis' L'Espace d'un cillement [In the Flicker of an Eyelid] (1960). No male masturbation. The first mention of female self-gratification is in Marie Chauvet's Amour [Love] (1968) (Chauvet, and to a lesser degree Alexis, are the first Haitian novelists to have scrutinized feminine eroticism). No occurrences of incest or pedophilia. No description of orgies or evocations of masculine or feminine private parts. None of the "unnatural" heterosexual activities considered sinful by the Church. No sadists or masochists (except, once again, in Marie Chauvet's novels). Not even salacious depictions of the kind inspired by the Kama Sutra or The Joy of Sex illustrations. And sexual matters are never couched in vulgar or coarse language which, be it said in passing, is particularly rich and pungent in Créole.

This is, of course, not to say that Haitian sexual mores are any less complex than any other people's—but the theme is tacitly ignored in polite society, both in its oral and written manifestations. According to the accepted piety, Haitian sexuality takes place within the bonds of "normalcy" and "morality." Deviations and transgressions are alluded to in the normal exchange of gossip, but not in open discourse. From this point of view, it would not be unfair to speak of Puritanism.

One characteristic that distinguishes French language poetry in Haiti from that of the Europeans is the obsessive identification of women with edibles. Especially, as could be expected, with fruits. A woman's breasts can be compared to "twin sapodillas" or "twin marmalade plums," her lips are "as purple as our lovely caymitos" and taste like "mammy apples"; her kisses are "honeyed pineapple," her mouth "melts like a mango"; she is "a sugar-sweet orange," "a well-ripened fruit, defenseless and full of sap"; her body is "hot citrus," her eyes can be "tamarind, but shaped like almonds" her breath "wafts the perfume of our guavas," her cheeks are "rose apples"; and when she is cruel, her heart is as hard as "Guinea coconuts." To be sure, French poets also have celebrated women's peachy complexions or their cherry red lips, but their Haitian colleagues' imagination runs riot in the pursuit of scrumptious metaphors. And other flavorful comestibles are also evoked: the kisses of the poet's beloved can be "more gooey than turtle soup,” they can taste of “sour ball candy,” have “a salty, tangy taste,” and the nape of her neck can “taste of sea-food.” All Haitians know a humorous poem by Émile Roumer in which the marabout (a dark-skinned, silky-haired woman with European features) of the poem is compared to the most appetizing specialties of Haitian cuisine:

Marabout de mon cœur [Marabout of my Heart]:

Marabout of my heart, with breasts like tangerines,
 You taste better to me than eggplant stuffed with crab.
 You are the slice of tripe within my gumbo soup,
 The dumpling in my beans, my tea of herbs and cloves,
 You are the bully beef whose rind my heart provides,
 The syrup and cornmeal that trickles down my throat,
 You are a steaming dish; you are mushrooms and rice;
 Cod fritters very crisp; fish fried to golden brown.
 I hunger for your love. Where you roam I will trail
 Your buttocks, bouncing boats with bounteous victuals laden.

While French poets tend to depict beautiful women in repose, and compare them to paintings or statues, movement is an essential component of Haitian feminine attractiveness. As René Depestre puts it in Hallelujah for a Garden-woman:

Garden women have electric buttocks
 Garden women have cyclones in their love play [...]
 And in their movements the geometry of she-lions

The women of Haiti reveal the true essence of their beauty by moving, walking or, better yet, by dancing—and especially in dancing for the Gods, or while possessed by them during voodoo ceremonies. Since the nineteenth century, novelists and poets have often described such ceremonies, sometimes realistically, sometimes imaginatively. And the focus is generally on the dancing woman, and on “her nimble loins” and “the savage play of her undulating hips.” A particularly suggestive description is found in Milo Rigaud’s 1933 novel Jésus et Legba:

In the glow of the fire a woman started to dance. Half naked, dressed only in a skirt tied on her hips by a red sash, she stormed into the circle like a dusky Fury. She went through terrible contortions. A man with the limbs of a panther came after her, and while she sang:

Zaguidi, zaguidi
 I am more of a man than a woman,
 Zaguidi, zaguidi,
 I’m more of a woman than a man
 her black partner pressed upon her with domineering gestures. While the woman kept sticking out her bouncing haunches, they mimed a mad pursuit, which the man won. (p. 109).

It should be noted that in most cases only dark-skinned peasant or working class women are compared to edibles or displayed in the performance of wild or suggestive dances. Their aristocratic light-skinned counterparts, on the other hand, are generally compared, like European women, to objets d’art and admired while dancing dignified waltzes and two-steps in well-appointed ballrooms.

Similarly, writers draw a modest veil when society ladies are about to enjoy sex. They are somewhat more daring when dealing with peasant or proletarian girls. Such scenes are not necessarily meant to be demeaning or prurient. On the contrary, they are generally described in poetic language; they take place in the open air, and the girl is identified with the motherly and bountiful earth. Jacques Roumain’s evocation in Gouverneurs de la rosée [Masters of the Dew] (1944) of Manuel and Annaïse’s first coupling by the side of the spring is particularly skillful, even in translation, and has inspired many imitators:

Their lips touched.
 “My sweet,” she sighed.
 She closed her eyes and he laid her down. She was stretched out on the ground and the low rumble of the water echoed within her in a sound that was the tumult of her own blood. She didn’t defend herself. His hand, so heavy, transmitted an intolerable sweetness.
 “I’m going to die!”
 Beneath his touch, her body burned. He unlocked her knees, and she opened herself to him. He entered, a lacerating presence, and she gave an injured groan.
 “No! Don’t leave me—or I’ll die!”
 Her body went to meet his in a feverish surge. In her an unspeakable anguish was born, a terrible delight, which absorbed the movements of her body. A panting which rose to her lips.
 Then she felt herself melt in the deliverance of that long sob that left her prostrate in man’s embrace.

As previously mentioned, all of the above hardly applies to most Haitian writings of the last few decades. The economic, political, and social deterioration of the country is reflected in its literature and its depiction of eroticism. Contemporary writings are the texts of despair, be they composed and published in Haiti or, increasingly, in French or Quebecois exile. Haitian authors, as their colleagues in the Western world, are now free of the censorship that used to inhibit the representation of eroticism. To be sure, some authors nevertheless hold to the old-fashioned standards of allusiveness and delicacy when depicting physical love. But the sensuous, happy descriptions of “fruit women” and of cheerful lusty encounters now seem old-fashioned. Henceforth, the erotic is at best wistfully associated with more humane bygone days or, more usually, with present deprivation and torture. Given the trials of the country and the suffering of its citizens, to evoke the Joys of Sex seems irrelevant if not downright offensive. As Louis Neptune put it:

HAITIAN LITERARY EROTICISM

For us the stink of prison has replaced the fragrance of bosoms
The cold wind of stone walls my Caribbean girl's soft breath.

Also, the last decades have seen Haitians broadening their literary horizon until then limited to the latest French productions. More and more Haitian readers and authors have now become familiar with and influenced by English, Spanish, and “Francophone” writings. Many have been exposed to avant-garde schools of literary criticism which regard all means of expression, even pornography, as equally respectable. Under these various influences, the modesty and seamliness of old has all but disappeared.

A particularly representative and impressive example of the new literary vision is Gérard Étienne's 1974 first person narrative Le nègre crucifié [The Crucified Negro]. In a semiconscious hallucinatory state, a prisoner who has suffered the most abject forms of torture at the hands of François Duvalier's henchmen imagines himself crucified at a street crossing in Port-au-Prince. He screams invectives at those who have debased him and the country he loved. His ranting denunciation of life under the terrorist regime makes for painful reading. Blood, excrement, garbage, vermin, scabs, the screams of prisoners, the stink of unwashed bodies, of rotting food, and of clogged latrines are the stuff of his vociferations. Humiliating sexual submission, for pubescent boys and girls as well as for men and women, is at best a survival tactic.

Eroticism has been replaced by obscenity. Even presumably tender moments are reminiscent of the nightmares painted by Hieronimus Bosch:

Nounou is beautiful. He wants to take her. Lie down, he says. More than twenty mice run into her mouth, inspect her guts, and tumble out through a hole in her pelvis. Do the mice hurt you? No, replies the girl, they feed on my tuberculosis. [...]

He throws himself on Nounoune, licks her skin, bites her eyes. She sighs. He lifts her dress, touches her vagina and makes a face. What a strange animal, he says. Look at its cockscomb. It looks like a grass snake's tongue. Nounoune, does it have teeth? Why don't we make love in your mouth? (pp. 56–57)

Voodoo used to be, if not respected, at least admired for its artistic components. In Étienne's phantasmagoria, this is what happens to practitioners:

They have cavorted so long that they end up fucking their own daughters on straw mats where dogs and fleas cavort. [...] Their slobber and their food foam up. Their sweat foams with their spittle and the pus of their wounds.

It's like a clump of meat rotting in sorcery, hunger and orgies. (p. 29)

The Crucified Negro is an extreme example, and few texts equal its apocalyptic vituperations. But it seems that, while Haitian authors used to seek inspiration in the sentimentalism of Lamartine or the committed idealism of Victor Hugo, they now turn to the Marquis de Sade and the pessimism of Céline. Be that as it may, erotic passages are now certainly more explicit, but it would take a peculiar sensibility to be aroused by novels such as Daniel Supplice's novel Karioka (1999), where a young girl passes out under tonton-makout torture. When she returns to consciousness:

She brought her hand to her vagina, and the abundance of sperm that oozed out of it revealed that she had been raped repeatedly. (p. 89)

Such a passage would have been all but inconceivable before the Duvalier era. Rape, which used to be taboo, is now a common literary occurrence. In Marie Chauvet's Colère [Anger] (1968) the young mulatto Rose submits to the makout chief to protect her family.

In Jean-Claude Fignolé's La dernière goutte d'homme [The Last Human Drop] (1999) among other horrors perpetrated by Duvalier's goon is described:

a woman, her tongue cut out, her breasts ripped and mangled, after having been raped by two unidentified individuals. (p. 23)

This is the first Haitian novel in which sexual love between two men is evoked, and with respect. It is also the first one in which an episode of fellatio is described, as well as incest between a mother and her son and the homosexual rape of a child by his brother. For such daring, even though it avoids any prurience, Fignolé would probably have been run out of town in the more decorous past.

In Anthony Phelps' Mémoire en colin-mailard [Memory Plays Hide-and-Seek] (1976), a sexual encounter between Claude, a well-to-do young mulatto, and his Black servant Mésina is described in poetic and very precise details. It seems at first that we are witnessing the joyful coupling of consenting adults, but we soon realize that we are dealing with an oneiric sequence, that Claude has been crippled (and possibly unmanned) by Duvalier's thugs and that the whole daydream is nothing but wishful compensation. The climax comes when Claude imagines himself as a sadistic voodoo spirit mounting the young woman (in voodoo parlance, a person possessed is a "horse" "mounted" by the spirit) and bringing her to painful climax with his whip and spurs:

-Buck, now, Mésina. Buck!

-I'm bucking, M'sieu Claude. And your whip is flaying me. I'm bucking again and your spurs bite into me. Aïe!... I'm going to die, m'sieu Claude. Aïe!... you are a god, m'sieu Claude. You are the devil himself.

In French as in Elizabethan English, "to die" is a euphemism for "to climax." And so it is here. But at the same time the primary meaning of the verb is emblematic: for most writers, sex in today's Haiti is perversely linked with death, and release can only be attained through inflicting pain. Sex in Haitian literature will become erotic again only when peace and justice return to this much abused country.

LÉON-FRANÇOIS HOFFMAN

Selected Works

- Alexis Jacques-Stéphen. Romancero aux étoiles. Paris, Gallimard, 1960.
 Alexis, Jacques-Stéphen. L'Espace d'un cillement. Paris, Gallimard, 1960. [In the Flicker of an Eyelid, tr. by Carroll F. Coates and Edwidge Danticat., Charlottesville, VA, University of Virginia Press, 2002].

- Chauvet, Marie. Amour, Colère et folie. Paris, Gallimard, 1968. [Amour, colère et folie tr. by Joyce Marie Cogdell-Travis, Ann Arbor, Mich., University Microfilms International, 1983].
 Chevallier, André. Mon petit Kodak. Port-au-Prince, Impr. Chenet, 1916.
 Depestre, René. Alléluia pour une femme-jardin. Ottawa, Leméac, 1973.
 Étienne, Gérard. Le nègre crucifié. Montreal, Éditions francophones, 1974.
 Fignolé, Daniel. La dernière goutte d'homme. Montreal & Port-au-Prince, Regain & CIDIHCA, 1999.
 Hibbert, Fernand. Séna. Port-au-Prince, Impr. de l'Abeille, 1905.
 Hoffman, Léon-François. Haitian Fiction Revisited. Washington, DC: Passeggiata Press, 1999.
 Marcelin, Frédéric. La vengeance de Mama. Paris, Ollendorf, 1902.
 Phelps, Anthony. Mémoire en colin-mailard. Montreal, Nouvelle Optique, 1976.
 Rigaud, Milo. Jésus et Legba. Poitiers, Amis de la poésie, 1933.
 Roumain, Jacques. Gouverneurs de la rosée. Port-au-Prince, Impr. de l'État, 1944 Masters of the Dew, tr. By Langston Hughes and Mercer Cook, Heinemann, London, Kingston, Port of Spain, 1978 [1947].
 Supplice, Daniel. Karioka. Port-au-Prince, Éd. H. Deschamps, 1998.
 Victor, Gary. Albert Buron (1988). Nouvelles interdites (1989).

Further Reading

- Auguste, Yves L. "L'amour dans la littérature haïtienne." Présence africaine. 60 (4), 1966, pp. 159-171.
 Carré Crosley, Bernadette. "Haïtianité et mythe de la femme dans Hadriana dans tous mes rêves. de René Depestre, Montreal, CIDIHCA, 1993.
 Chancy, Myriam J.A. "L'épouse Fè Viv: Female Identity and the Politics of Textual Sexuality in Nadine Magloire's Le Mal de vivre." Critical Studies (Amsterdam), 7, 1996.
 Dorsinville, Max. "Violence et répression féminine dans le roman haïtien." In Fratta, Carla (ed.), La deriva delle francofonie. Bologna, Cooperative Lib. Univ., 1992.
 Étienne, Gérard. "La Femme noire dans le discours littéraire haïtien." Présence francophone (Sherbrooke, P.Q.), 18, 1979.
 Fonseca, Maria Nazareth Soares. "Misticismo e erotismo em dicções pós-coloniais." Revista de letras. (Lisbon), 39, 1999.
 Lapaire, Pierre Guy. "L'érotisme baroque, le télédiol et les femmes-jardins de René Depestre." Essays in French Literature (University of Western Australia), 27, Nov. 1990.
 Laroche, Maximilien. "Images de la femme dans la lyrique populaire haïtienne." Études littéraires. Québec, 25 (3), 1992-1993.
 Latortue, Régine. "The Black Woman in Haitian Society and Literature." In Filomena Steady, ed. The Black

HALL, RADCLYFFE

- Woman Cross-culturally*. Cambridge, MA: Schenkman Publishing Company Co., 1981.
- Mahéo, Marie-France. "Le Climat érotique: Obsession et ambiguïté dans Chronique d'un faux-amour de Jacques-Stéphen Alexis." Francofonia (Bologna), 14 (27) 1994.
- Marty, Anne. "Climat socio-psychologique et images de la femme dans la poésie haïtienne: la génération de La Ronde." Collectif paroles (Montreal), 28, mars/avril 1984.
- Spear, Thomas C. "Carnavalesque Jouissance: Representations of Sexuality in the Francophone West Indian Novel." Jouvert (Electronic publication), 2 (1), 1998.

---

HALL, RADCLYFFE

---

1880–1943
English novelist and poet

The Well of Loneliness

Radclyffe Hall's The Well of Loneliness (1928) is arguably the most notorious lesbian novel in English, whereby its fame stems partly from its early ban in Britain. Subdivided into five books, the work portrays the life and loves of the female invert Stephen Gordon, who has often been wrongly assumed to be based on Hall herself. The masculine English upper-class girl, Stephen, discovers at the age of seven that she is attracted to women when she develops a crush on the housemaid. Aged twenty-one, she then has her first sexual encounter with another woman, the married Angela Crosby. The passionate affair ends when Angela confesses it to her husband, who in turn informs Stephens's mother about her sexual inclination. This results in Stephen leaving the family's country estate. She settles in London together with her teacher-companion Puddington, or Puddle, who is herself a closeted invert. Hall modelled Puddle in part upon her earlier fictional creation, Elizabeth Rodney from The Unlit Lamp (1924), which was one of Hall's more overtly feminist works. Here she had condemned expectations that women had to fulfil the traditional role of womanhood, which allowed them no personal choices or development. Like Rodney, but quite unlike Stephen, Puddle suppresses her sexuality. In London, Stephen establishes herself as a successful writer.

With the outbreak of World War I, she joins a women's ambulance unit in France, where she meets the young Welsh woman Mary Llewellyn. After the war, the two become lovers. Their first sexual union is alluded to in the now famous line "...and that night they were not divided" (316). They set up house together in Paris and become part of a colorful set of male and female homosexual intellectuals and artists, which Hall loosely based on her own Parisian circle of friends, especially on Natalie Barney. The narrative spirals towards its dramatic ending when Stephen's old friend Martin Hallam reappears and falls in love with Mary. Stephen decides that she should give up Mary to Martin. She devises a ploy whereby the unwitting Mary is directed into leaving Stephen, to be taken away by Martin. The Well of Loneliness ends with a quasi-religious scene in which Stephen, now alone, has taken on the grand role as representative for the millions of inverts on earth, in whose name she demands recognition and the right to existence.

The Well of Loneliness is a candid document of Hall's (at the time) radical understanding of lesbianism—or sexual inversion, as it was also known—which she perceived to be a naturally occurring sexual variation. This idea was based on the newly developed theories of sexology, for which Hall had an avid interest. Two of the leading nineteenth-century sexologists, the German lawyer and homosexual activist Karl Heinrich Ulrichs, and the German psychiatrist Richard von Krafft-Ebing, are actually mentioned in the novel. Their theories had in common that they distinguished between congenital and acquired homosexuality, and that they linked sexual inversion to gender inversion. These ideas feature prominently in The Well of Loneliness, especially through the portrayal of the protagonist. Stephen Gordon is characterized by her overt masculinity, which marks the fact that she is born an invert, in contrast, for example, to her first lover, Angela Crosby, for whom inversion was an acquired habit. Hall inscribes erotic tension into the narrative by repeatedly and in detail describing Stephen's masculine body, and then contrasting it with the feminine features of Stephen's lovers. The most erotic moments in the narrative are thus constructed by conjuring up certain bodily imagery, rather than through the use of explicit sexual language.

Hall had wanted The Well of Loneliness to be bolder than any other lesbian novel in English before. The book, written in the style of the bildungsroman, followed in the footsteps of recent developments in English literature, whereby lesbian themes had gained increasing, albeit tentative, attention at the turn of the last nineteenth century (see entry on lesbian literature). However, Hall was the first to sympathetically portray a sexually active invert. This bestowed almost instant notoriety upon both the work and its author. First published in May 1928 by the London-based Jonathan Cape publishing house, The Well of Loneliness was tried under the Obscene Publications Act of 1857 in November of the same year. It was found guilty of obscenity and banned in England. The novel was subsequently published in America where it was also tried, but cleared of obscenity charges. The British ban on The Well of Loneliness was only lifted in 1959 with the passing of a new Obscene Publications Act.

The ban of The Well of Loneliness did not end Hall's literary production. She published two more novels, The Master of the House (1932) and The Sixth Beatitude (1936), as well as a collection of short stories entitled Miss Ogilvy Finds Herself (1934). None of the works engaged with the subject of female sexual inversion. Hall's lover Una Troubridge claims to have given The Well of Loneliness its famous title. It appears rather tongue-in-cheek, as the protagonist of the novel leads anything but a lonely life.

In the 1980s, The Well of Loneliness suffered much critical condemnation for allegedly reinforcing narrow stereotypes about the masculine lesbian. A decade later, there has been a marked change in critical opinion and the novel has been reassessed as a subversive and empowering piece of writing. The erotic allure of Hall's narrative continues to appeal to generations of readers.

Biography

Born August 12, 1880 in Bournemouth, Hampshire as Marguerite Radclyffe-Hall, she renamed herself John in adult life and adopted Radclyffe Hall as her literary name. Privately educated, she spent 1898–1899 in Dresden, Germany, and on return attended lectures at King's College, University of London. Her life was dominated by three major relationships (the last two chronologically overlapping) with Mabel 'Ladye Batten,' Una Troubridge, and Evguenia Souline. Her friends and acquaintances included May Sinclair, Rebecca West, Natalie Barney, Colette, Havelock Ellis, and W. B. Yeats. She was a keen traveller, but rooted in England, where she died in London on 7 October 1943.

Hall published five volumes of poetry and seven novels. Her literary acclaim was established with the novel Adam's Breed (1926), which won the Prix Femina Vie Heureuse, and the James Tait Black Memorial Prize. Her first publication, a book of poetry entitled A Sheaf of Verses, came out in 1908. Her first two novels The Forge and The Unlit Lamp were both published in 1924.

HEIKE BAUER

Editions

The Well of Loneliness. London: Jonathan Cape, 1928; London: Virago Press, 1992.

Selected Works

'Twixt Earth and Stars. 1906.
A Sheaf of Verses. 1908.
The Forge. 1924.
The Unlit Lamp. 1924.
A Saturday Life. 1925.
Adam's Breed. 1926.
The Master of the House. 1932.
Miss Ogilvy Finds Herself. 1934.
The Sixth Beatitude. 1936.

Further Reading

Baker, Michael. Our Three Selves: A Life of Radclyffe Hall. London: Hamish Hamilton, 1985.

HARRIS, FRANK

- Bauer, Heike. "Krafft-Ebing's Psychopathia Sexualis as the sexual sourcebook for The Well of Loneliness. Critical Survey, vol. 15, no.3, 2003, 23–28.
- Brittain, Vera. Radclyffe Hall: A Case of Obscenity? London: Femina, 1968.
- Cline, Sally. Radclyffe Hall: A Woman Named John. London: John Murray, 1997.
- Glasgow, Joanne, ed. Your John: The Love Letters of Radclyffe Hall. New York: New York University Press, 1997.
- Souhami, Diana. The Trials of Radclyffe Hall. London: Virago, 1999.
- Troubridge, Una. The Life and Death of Radclyffe Hall. London: Hammond and Hammond, 1961.
- Taylor, Leslie A. "'I Made Up My Mind to Get It': The American Trial of The Well of Loneliness." Journal of the History of Sexuality. 10 (2), 2001.

---

HARRIS, FRANK

---

1856–1931

Irish memoirist, short story writer, and journalist

My Life and Loves

Frank Harris' five-volume work My Life and Loves is a biography with sexual elements present throughout and not (like the anonymous My Secret Life, for example) a sexual autobiography with no other matter covered.

This autobiography is his only enduring work, one that deliberately steps outside the contemporary restraints of the genre, provocatively setting a standard against British and American sexual prudery. Harris determines to tell the truth about his sex life, declaring "If all the ways of love are beautiful to me, why should I not say so? All the girls and women I have met and loved have taught me something."

In the forward he sets down the ultimately mournful theme of the book, of how the power to enjoy and give sexual pleasure is keenest in early life, while the understanding of how to do it well develops later, "when the faculties are already on the decline."

He creates a revealing analogy to illustrate this: when he was a child his father gave him a single-barrelled gun; when he had learned to use it he was given a double-barrelled shotgun; and in later life he took to using a magazine gun. "My Creator, or Heavenly Father, on the other hand, gave me, so to speak, a magazine gun of sex, and hardly had I learned its use and enjoyment when he took it away from me forever, and gave me in its place a double-barrelled gun: after a few years, he took that away and gave me a single-barrelled gun with which I was forced to content myself for the best part of my life. Towards the end the old single-barrel began to show signs of wear and age; sometimes it would go off too soon, sometimes it missed fire and shamed me, do what I would." The story gives much of the book: the self-important while at the same time self-pitying tone but with more than a hint of mockery; the neatness of expression over a limited field; the mechanical view of sex and the analogy with hunting game.

Harris tells of sexual experience from the earliest years: in the classroom when he was under five and would drop his pencil to be able to bend down and see the legs of the big girls; and his sisters showed him their developing breasts.

Born in Ireland, Harris was sent to school in England; he describes the sexual bullying of the public school system where 'fags' were forced to masturbate older boys. Harris believes unreservedly in the 'vital force' theory of masturbation as an enervating activity and as evidence cites the case of one boy who masturbated frequently, "All of us knew he had torn a hole in his pocket so he could play with his cock...the little fellow grew gradually paler and paler until he took to crying in a corner, and unaccountably nervous trembling shook him for a quarter of an hour at a time. At length, he was taken away by his parents."

He tells how at thirteen as a boy in the choir who sang solos, the organist would summon him to practice with local girls, one of whom also sang alto so she was placed next to him. He cautiously slips his hand up her skirt, at which "she did not move or show any sign of distaste." He examines her vagina with his fingers, "Gently I rubbed the front part of her sex with my finger. I could have kissed her a thousand times out of gratitude... as I went on, I felt her move, and then again; plainly she was showing me where my touch gave her most pleasure."

The lesson finished and they had to leave. The following week Harris tries to repeat the experiment but the girl refuses and Harris in his distress sings so badly he loses his position as soloist. Like most of Harris' sexual tales, the story has a ring of truth—a tale with pornographic intent would have had the episode leading to copulation or at least orgasm, not humiliated disappointment. Though there was no success, Harris remarks in a characteristically blunt metaphor, "I had tasted blood and could never afterwards forget the scent of it." He determined "No more self-abuse for me; I knew something infinitely better."

With the inquiring intellect that was to make him a successful newspaperman, Harris learns from older boys such lessons as "girls love kissing" and, from his sister, "you must say that the girl you are with is the prettiest girl in the room." He begs sexual advice from a man known locally as a Lothario who tells him, "When you can put a stiff penis in her hand and weep profusely the while, you're getting near any woman's heart. But don't forget the tears."

He describes in detail how he gets to fondle three other girls, one of them, Jesse, on the boat crossing from Liverpool to New York after he has run away from school at the age of fifteen. He exclaims, "She yielded again to my hand with a little sigh and I found her sex all wet, wet!" When, in New York, they are together and naked, he notices, with a disappointment very characteristic of his sexual quest, "she was too broad for her height; her legs were too short, her hips too stout. It all chilled me a little. Should I ever find perfection?"

Physically, Harris was short of stature, very short-sighted and considered himself ugly but says he discovered that qualities such as "strength and dominant self-confidence" are those most attractive to a woman. His gifts were his conversation, his brilliant memory (he could recite a book of Swinburne's verse by heart after reading it once) and a driving will which enabled him to achieve such feats as shutting himself up for three months to become fluent in a new language when he needed to do so.

In the United States, Harris' first extensive sexual experiences are at the age of eighteen with an older woman, the passionate wife of an acquaintance who, after his advances, takes the lead in the relationship, "My second orgasm took some time and all the while Lorna became more and more responsive, till suddenly she put her hands on my bottom and drew me to her forcibly while she moved her sex up and down awkwardly to meet my thrusts with a passion I had hardly imagined." She introduces him to sexual variety, riding him and also giving him his first experience of fellatio with the words, "Your seed, darling, is dear to me: I don't want it in my sex; I want to feel you thrill and so I want your sex in my mouth, I want to drink you essence."

New loves come to excite him, which he explains with the proverb "Fresh cunt, fresh courage," and he seduces the daughter of his landlord. Aware that the narrative structure implies a series of conquests, he insists "my half dozen victories were spread out over nearly as many years and time and again I met rebuffs and refusals." Still, he wishes to emphasize that "success in love, like success in every department of life, falls usually to the tough man unwearied in pursuit." In sex as in business and education, he is the ultimate self-made man.

His high intellect and thirst for knowledge lead him to be taken up as a student by Byron Caldwell Smith, a professor at Kansas University. In return, Harris says he tried to cure Smith of nocturnal emissions, which were enervating the classics scholar, by a regime of tying up his penis at night which Harris himself had found helpful.

With a scholar's dedication, Harris plunges into the mechanics of sex which he finds endlessly fascinating. He has himself circumcised because he believes that a toughened skin of the cuticle makes it more difficult to catch syphilis, and that toughening the head of the penis would allow him to prolong copulation.

Harris does not wear his knowledge lightly and feels moved to explain female anatomy and the process of conception to women with whom he has sex. He uses immediate post-coital douching as a method of contraception, helping his lovers to insert the device.

He is full of sexual lore and is ever interested in adding to it. He feels the heat of a woman's lips are an indication of the lubricity of her vagina; he remarks that the French think "small bones indicate a small sex; but I have found the exceptions are very numerous." His kindness to a black woman leads her daughter to offer herself to him, at which he remarks, "To my astonishment her sex was well formed and very small: I had always heard that Negroes had far larger genitals than white people; but the lips of Sophy's sex were thick and firm...My admiration of Sophy cleansed me of any possible disdain I might otherwise have had of the Negro people."

Some techniques are too advanced for the young man, however: when a French woman asks him to faire minette (give her cunnilingus) saying "I prefer in a meal the hors-d'oeuvres to the pièce de resistance like a good many other women." Harris refuses with "the ordinary English or American youth's repugnance to what seemed like degradation."

Some years later, however, in Athens, he is in bed with a woman who so fears conception that she begs him to give her cunnilingus, and out of his passion for her he consents "I opened the lips of her sex and put my lips on it and my tongue against her clitoris. There was nothing repulsive in it; it was another and more sensitive mouth." He is delighted at the experience and builds its possibilities into his sexual world, "I could give pleasure to any extent without exhausting or even tiring myself. It thus enabled me to atone completely and make up for my steadily decreasing virility. Secondly, I discovered that by teaching me the most sensitive parts of the woman, I was able even in the ordinary way to give my mistresses more and keener pleasure than ever before." Harris seems unable to have a sexual experience without drawing a moral from it, from this one he learns, "how superior art is to nature."

He travels to Europe, chiefly in Paris and Germany where he studies in Heidelberg where he discovers that "absolutely complete chastity enabled me to work longer hours than I had ever worked" and resolves to have sex only when he is truly in love. The problem with this resolution is that Harris falls in love very easily. He has sex with women in Austria and Ireland and learns through his experiences that he most enjoys sex the more he gives pleasure to women

He falls in love with Laura Clapton, a beautiful and intelligent Anglo-American with scheming, impoverished parents. He hopes to marry her but waits until he has made his fortune, but she has had liaisons with other men and he sets her up in an apartment as his mistress. Though she protests love for him, he has great difficulty in bringing her to orgasm, "I would pose her sideways so as to bring out the greater swell of the hip and the poses would usually end with my burying my head between her legs, trying with lips and tongue and finger and often again with my sex to bring her sensations to ecstasy and if possible to love-speech and love thanks!"

By hard work and by importuning editors he becomes a successful journalist in London, and rises rapidly to become one of the greatest popular newspaper editors of his generation. He described his success to his ability to see the world through the eyes of a teenager, "kissing and fighting were the only things I cared for at thirteen or fourteen, and those are the themes the English public desires and enjoys today."

In Paris, he picks up a coquette, Jeanne, by leaping into her carriage. She is no longer young nor a beauty but is a refined, well-read woman who offered the speciality of 'casse noisettes': a vagina "with the contractile strength of a hand." She has saved a good deal from her life as a mistress and offers to take Harris away to Algeria and keep him while he pursues his writing. Jeanne uses her adopted daughter of around twelve, Lisette, as bait, encouraging Harris to see her in the bath and to be alone with her. Later Harris takes the opportunity, while Jeanne is dressing, of kissing and fondling Lisette but does not have full sex with her.

He never ceases to ponder the mysteries of sexual attraction, remarking on his "adoration of virginity" which is as inexplicable to him as an old man as it was fifty years previously. "Even now a well-made girl's legs of fourteen make the pulses beat in my forehead and bring water into my mouth."

He marries in 1887 in the hope that this will advance his intended political career. His autobiography omits details of sexual relations of this and a later marriage to Nellie O'Hara, his true soul-mate, whose name does not even occur in the book.

While on honeymoon in the first marriage he chances to see his old love Laura on a station and feels a choking pain, "in one moment I realised I had bartered happiness for comfort and a pleasant life, that I had blundered badly and would have to pay for the blunder and pay heavily." He resumes the relationship with Laura while attempting, unsuccessfully, a parliamentary career.

Harris seems to tire of the chronological story by the time he has described his life to his mid-forties, and the book becomes increasingly more fragmented with chapters given over to accounts of famous people he has known or to sexual adventures.

One story is of what he calls "The greatest amatory experience of my life" after he has bought a villa in San Reno and falls in with his gardener's suggestion of a beauty contest where five local girls are invited to the villa, encouraged to strip, and rewarded with prizes by Harris who is posing as an English lord. Word gets around of these frolics and another week the gardener procures twenty girls willing to take off their clothes for the chance of winning a hundred francs.

Having made their choices, Harris and a friend work on a refinement of the game to determine the winner of winners. They then make close examinations to see who has "the smallest and best made sex" and stimulate the girls to test their reaction to sensation, though Harris' favorite, Flora, "disdained the test and said she felt more at something said, at a beautiful thought or fine deed than she ever felt by mere sexual excitement."

The contests inevitably turn into orgies, and the girls become close enough friends for some to express their disgust, "'I hate these comparisons,' cried Adriana, 'They degrade one to the level of the mere animal; surely there's more to me than round limbs and a small sex?'"

A Frenchman joins the group and introduces them to the use of dildos and to whipping, saying that by whipping a girl's bottom "he could bring her to a passion of desire." Harris remarks that, "nothing prettier could be imagined than three or four girls being excited in this way."

Harris encourages the girls to tell the stories of their sex lives. Flora talks of having what she calls "naked thoughts" from the age of seven, and of sex games she played with other girls as a young teenager. Adriana is much more passionate and says she was given to masturbation from ten or eleven years old until at the age of thirteen when she was told it was bad for the health and then restricted herself to masturbate only on Saturday nights. She was raped at the age of sixteen by the manager of a hotel where she worked, and then had no sex for two years in disgust at the experience.

One of the most attractive features of Harris is his genuine interest in the stories of women, even when their experience undermines his world view of the joy of seduction for both male and female. Thus he prints a long letter from a woman who wrote in response to the publication of his first volume. She had met men like him and her experience of seduction was humiliation and abandonment, of venereal disease, and of becoming an unmarried mother.

Harris tries drugs and sex, sampling opium, ether, and cocaine, but finds no advantage; and also tries 'cock rings' aimed at a higher stimulation of the woman. He meets a procuress on a voyage to India who caters for his desire for young girls by supplying him with child widows (the result of Indian marriage customs). "The second evening she brought me a girl of twelve—a widow—rather pretty but childish. Her sex was naturally very small but she had little response to passion in her; she seemed afraid to complain and didn't enjoy it greatly. She was happy for the first time when I paid her." After several such encounters he remarks, "The experience cured me of my liking for the immature. For even the best of them never gave me the thrill I experienced with older girls. The sex was often very small, but it had not the gripping, pumping power of the mature older woman."

By the end of the biography his memory and stamina are failing him and he balks at relating the decline of his sexual performance. Desire was as keen at sixty as at forty, he says, but by then he had become "a mediocre performer in the lists of love, but had never been shamed by failure." It is a shock when for the first time even desire fails him, when a servant comes who is looking for work and though she is pretty, he is not aroused by her.

For all its structural failings, the obvious exaggerations and some pure invention, My Life and Loves remains one of the most vivid memoirs of the nineteenth century, reading it gives the impression of a long conversation with a well-read Victorian libertine.

HAWKES, JOHN

Putting aside Harris' extravagant claim that this is "the first book ever written to glorify the body and its passionate desires and the soul as well as its sacred, climbing sympathies," the development of biography as a form in the twentieth century vindicated his conviction that no biography can claim to be honest unless it deals with a character's sex life.

Biography

Frank Harris was born James Thomas Harris in Galway, Ireland, February 14, 1856. He immigrated to the United States in 1869 and studied at the University of Kansas. In 1878, he was married to a woman who would die the following year. She was the first of three wives he would have.

In 1882, Harris returned to England where he worked as editor at a number of publications and edited the work of H. G. Wells and George Bernard Shaw. From 1916 to 1922, he edited the U.S. edition of Britain's Pearson's Magazine in New York. He died in France on August 27, 1931, of a heart attack.

JAD ADAMS

Editions

Harris, Frank. My Life and Loves. Vol.1, privately printed, Paris 1922; Paris, Obelisk Press, 1930. First four volumes privately printed, Paris, 1930; Paris, Obelisk Press 1945. A partly spurious 'fifth volume' was issued by the Olympia Press, Paris, 1958, containing some material from Harris with additions by Alexander Trocchi. John F. Gallagher (editor) volumes 1-5, New York, Grove Press, 1963; London, W.H. Allen, 1964. The fifth volume, not published in Harris' life, was based on Harris' final typescript which is in the University of Texas.

Further Reading

- Bain, Linda M. Evergreen Adventurer. London: Research Publishing, 1975.
- Bertolini, John. "Frank Harris" in Cevasco, G.A. (editor) The 1890s: An Encyclopaedia of British Literature, Art and Culture. New York: Garland Publishing, 1993.
- Brome, Vincent. Frank Harris. London: Cassell, 1959.
- Caldwell Smith, Gerrit and Mary. Lies and Libels of Frank Harris. New York: Antigone Press, 1929.
- Kingsmill, Hugh. Frank Harris. London: Biografia, 1932.
- Pearsall, Robert B. Frank Harris. New York: Twayne, 1970.
- Pullar, Philippa. Frank Harris: A Biography. New York: Simon & Shuster, 1976.
- Root, Edward Merrill. Frank Harris. New York: Odyssey, 1947.
- Roth, Samuel. The Private Life of Frank Harris. New York: William Faro, 1931.
- Tobin, A.I. and Gertz, Eleanor. Frank Harris: A Study in Black and White. Chicago, IL: Madelaine Mendelsohn, 1931.

---

HAWKES, JOHN

---

1925-1998

American novelist

Lauded by critics and scholars alike, and sometimes called "Gothic" or "experimental," Hawkes' darkly comic fiction, characterized by disjunctions in the traditional novel components of character, plot, setting, and theme, was never popularly received in the United States. Hawkes placed an emphasis on structure, what he called "verbal and psychological" coherence. This attention manifests itself in poetically imagistic and dreamlike sections, often narrated in the first person. The texts frequently confront human nature in all its ugliness and human failings in all their magnitude, but do so with a self-reflexive comedy and a beauty of language meant to recuperate those shortcomings. Hawkes' attempt to elucidate the unconscious desires of his characters entails frequent interrogation of the erotic components of the unconscious and thus aligns him with other writers of darkly erotic literature, including the Marquis de Sade, Georges Bataille, Angela Carter, and Flannery O'Connor.

Though he published his first novel, Charivari, in 1949, Hawkes did not begin to fully engage in theories of the erotic through his fiction until 1970 with the publication of The Blood Oranges. The Blood Oranges is the first novel in what Hawkes would come to call “the triad,” centering upon explorations of male sexuality; the others are Death, Sleep and the Traveler (1974) and Travesty (1976). Following upon publication of these works, Hawkes began to explore female sexual subjectivity in two novels: The Passion Artist (1979) and Virginie: Her Two Lives (1981).

Set in the fictional Illyria and modeled upon Ford Madox Ford’s The Good Soldier and Shakespeare’s Twelfth Night, The Blood Oranges relates the story of Cyril and Fiona’s encounter with Hugh and Catherine, and their daughter, Meredith. Cyril claims that the “only enemy of the mature marriage is monogamy.” In order to introduce this ideal, Cyril impresses partner swapping upon his guests. Characterized by a truncated arm, symbolically suggestive of his failure to fully engage in his desires, Hugh serves as the “castrated” and therefore incomplete male. Hugh manifests his sexuality in two distinct ways. First, he partakes in photographing “peasant nudes” in order to build his private collection of pornography. Second, he confines Catherine in a rusty chastity belt the quartet finds in a deserted cave to prevent her union with Cyril. What Cyril takes to be Hugh’s sexual impotence eventually ends in Hugh’s accidental suicide from auto-erotic asphyxiation, an event that precipitates Catherine’s catatonia and Fiona’s departure to care for Meredith. While he prides himself on his role as a “sex singer,” this dissolution of the quartet reveals Cyril’s ironic inability to account for sexuality in all guises.

Like Hugh, Allert Vanderveenan in Death, Sleep and the Traveler experiences much of his erotic stimulation through pornographic imagery. The novel manifests Hawkes’ typical technique of narrative fragmentation with the use of numerous short segments chronologically disjointed to narrate events occurring in two locales: his land home and a cruise on which Allert embarks. In each locale Allert participates in a menage à trois, reluctantly on land with Ursula and his best friend and therapist, Peter, and exuberantly at sea with the diminutive Ariane and the ship’s wireless operator, Olaf. Through the presentation of these locales, Hawkes sets up the dichotomy between motion and stasis, between life and death, and reveals male psychological fears concerning impotence, performance, and endowment. Over the course of the novel, Allert attempts to emotionally exonerate himself from the death of Ariane, of whose murder he has been acquitted, and through Allert’s narration, Hawkes explores societal experience of repression and guilt in the arenas of sexuality and the consequent human need to control desire.

Travesty (1979) narrates a short murder-suicide ride in narrator Papa’s car. Accompanying Papa are his daughter, Chantal, and her boyfriend, the poet Henri, who has been having an affair with Papa’s wife, Honorine. The themes of marital infidelity and male control over sexual expression emerge in Papa’s first person narration. This novel, however, takes the male desire for control to its extreme of insecurity through the murder-suicide plot, which suggests the toll inherent upon the suppression of erotic desire in marriage. While the erotic lives of all the characters prior to marriage find locution, the act of marital infidelity finally cannot be countenanced within the narrative.

Hawkes turns to an attempt to liberate female sexuality in his next two novels. While The Passion Artist (1979) tells the story of Konrad Vost’s sexual awakening, Hawkes moves to third person narration to explore Vost’s encounter with feminine sexuality. Vost, along with other men in the community La Violaine, attempt to quell a riot at the women’s prison for which the community is named. During the altercation, Vost participates in brutal, disfiguring violence against some of the women, giving narrative voice to subconscious erotic desires that transgress into violence. Despite the men’s efforts, the women prevail and Vost becomes himself prisoner in La Violaine. In his prison cell, he encounters writing on the walls indicating that women, too, sustain violent erotic fantasies. The prison experience constitutes Vost’s awakening to the vagaries of sexuality, and suggests for many critics the liberation of female sexuality and desire because the women claim power and Vost experiences subjugation.

The same power over sexuality is granted to Virginie, the narrator of the Virginie: Her Two Lives (1981), because as voyeuristic witness and narrator of scenes of sexuality, she controls the reader’s perception of sexuality. Eleven-year-old

HAWKES, JOHN

Virginie recounts her two lives, one in 1740 when in the home of Seigneur she witnesses the training of women to be mistresses to members of the aristocracy and the other in 1945 where she recounts “charades of love” in the Parisian home of her brother Bocage. While the novel presents sexuality from the female perspective utilizing a diminutive, girlish figure resonant within the Hawkesian oeuvre, the reader experiences female sexuality only voyeuristically as Virginie never engages in sex. Despite the successful depiction of female subjectivity, this voyeuristic approach to narration ultimately signals the male authorial inability to enter feminine sexuality and therefore functions adroitly as Hawkes’ final foray into explorations of the erotic.

Biography

John Clendennin Burne Hawkes, Jr. was born on August 17, 1925 in Stamford, Connecticut, and spent his youth in Connecticut and Alaska. Hawkes entered Harvard University in 1943, but soon failed out and served as an ambulance driver in Italy and Germany during World War II, 1943–1945. After the war, Hawkes returned to Harvard where he earned his B.A. in 1949. Hawkes worked for Harvard, first for the University Press (1949–1955) and then as an instructor for three years. In 1958, Hawkes became a professor in the English Department at Brown University in Providence, Rhode Island, where he worked until his retirement in 1988. Hawkes married Sophie Tazewell in 1947 and the couple had four children. Over the course of his career, Hawkes was awarded a Guggenheim and a Ford Foundation Fellowship, grants from the National Institute of Arts and Letters and from the Rockefeller Foundation, and a Lannan Foundation Award. He utilized his prize monies to support travel to the various locales comprising the settings for his novels, including the West Indies, France, and Italy. His novel Second Skin (1964) was runner-up for a National Book Award and The Blood Oranges (1971) received the Paris Prix du Meilleur Livre Etranger. Hawkes was a member of the American Academy of Arts and Letters. Hawkes died during heart bypass surgery in a Providence hospital on May 15, 1998, four days after having suffered a stroke.

JON ROBERT ADAMS

Selected Works

The Blood Oranges. New York: New Directions, 1970.
Death, Sleep and the Traveler. New York: New Directions, 1973.
Travesty. New York: New Directions, 1976.
The Passion Artist. New York: Harper and Row, 1978.
Virginie: Her Two Lives. New York: Harper and Row, 1981.

Further Reading

Allen, C.J. “Desire, Design and Debris: The Submerged Narrative of John Hawkes’ Recent Trilogy.” In Modern Fiction Studies, (Winter 1979–1980): 579–592.
Busch, Frederick. John Hawkes: A Guide to His Fictions. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1973.
Ferrari, Rita. Innocence, Power, and the Novels of John Hawkes. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1996.
Greiner, Donald J. Comic Terror: The Novels of John Hawkes. Memphis, TN: Memphis State University Press, 1973.
Greiner, Donald J. Understanding John Hawkes. Columbia, SC: University of South Carolina Press, 1985.
Kuehl, John. John Hawkes and the Craft of Conflict. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1975.
Murphy, Peter F. “Male Heterosexuality in John Hawkes’ The Passion Artist.” In Fictions of Masculinity: Crossing Cultures, Crossing Sexualities, ed. Peter F. Murphy. New York: New York University Press, 1974.
O’Donnell, Patrick. John Hawkes. Boston: Twayne, 1982.

---

HAWKESWORTH, JOHN

---

1720–1773

British writer, moralist, editor and translator

Almorán and Hamet

Hawkesworth originally wrote the oriental tale Almorán and Hamet (1761) as a play, but its exotic trappings proved too costly to stage. The dedication to King George III places the tale in the tradition of fictional works of advice to princes like Fénelon's Aventures de Télémaque, which Hawkesworth later translated. The self-control of Hamet, who faces off against his evil twin Almorán, provides a model of princely behavior. Yet the eroticism of magically trading bodies with another (and thus of experiencing sexual pleasures reserved for one's twin) undermines the tale's explicit moral lesson about "the suppression of desire" through rational self-mastery.

Mixing "oriental" ornament with a calculated elevation of tone, the story begins with the death of the old king who has decreed that his twin sons share rulership of Persia. Raised to value the "prerogative of his birth," the older of the twins, the "volatile, impetuous and irascible" Almorán, initially dissimulates his hatred of Hamet, immersing himself in sensual pleasures while surrounding himself with flatterers. Accustomed to deferring to his twin, the "gentle, courteous and temperate" Hamet lives a regulated life while serving the people. Both subscribe to a system of laws proposed by the wise Omar, who seeks to quash Almorán's tyranny and stimulate Hamet's submerged capacities for leadership.

This equilibrium reaches a crisis when Hamet rescues Almeida, the incomparably beautiful daughter of the Circassian ambassador, from a palace fire. Resisting an initial temptation to ravish her while she is unconscious, Hamet proclaims, "I do not want a slave, but a friend; not merely a woman, but a wife . . . if her mind corresponds with her form, and if . . . she can give her heart to Hamet, and not merely her hand to the king; I shall be happy." Giving one's heart to Hamet proves difficult indeed in a tale in which mind and body constantly shift out of proper correspondence.

Predictably, Almorán wants Almeida because she belongs to his brother: "with dominion undivided and Almeida, I should be Almorán; but without them, I am less than nothing." A "Genie" appears to Almorán and promises to help him achieve his desires. At the marriage of Hamet and Almeida, an ominous voice declares from the thick of a cloud that "Fate has decreed to Almorán, Almeida." Nonetheless, Omar persuades the people that the tyrannical Almorán has deployed occult forces and Hamet receives popular acclaim. The Genie then counsels Almorán to go before the people where a mysterious voice proclaims him king. The credulous masses reverse their position, Hamet flees, and Almorán claims his prize. Almeida resists, arguing that God has not made her love Almorán and so cannot have willed her to be his; God cannot have condemned her to "a joyless prostitution."

The Genie presents the frustrated Almorán with a magic talisman enabling him to exchange forms with another person. Assuming the appearance of Hamet, Almorán enjoys Almeida's passionate caresses, but she refuses to have sex outside of marriage despite all his persuasion. Reacting to his dishonorable arguments, she reflects that the ominous voice assigning her to Almorán must have been divine rather than occult. Since he still bears the form of Hamet, however, Almorán cannot take advantage of her change of heart.

When the exiled Hamet realizes that he looks like Almorán, he returns to court. Almeida greets him as Almorán, declaring that she is ready to marry him. Hamet registers her apparent betrayal and, consumed by desire for her and hatred of his brother, considers marrying and taking her while still in the form of Almorán. Conquering his passions, however, he reveals who he actually is. At that very moment, Almorán reassumes his own form in order to marry Almeida, so Hamet is transformed before Almeida's eyes. Almorán then finds the two lovers reconciled, imprisons Hamet, and despairs of ever possessing Almeida.

The Genie invites Almorán to present Hamet with a means of committing suicide. Almorán, who has taken on the form of one of two subaltern rivals in order to deliver a dagger, is poisoned by the other, while Hamet resists the temptation to kill himself. At last suspicious of the Genie, whose every gift has stymied him, the dying Almorán hides in Hamet's prison and overhears the Genie presenting Hamet with a magic scroll that will allow him to invoke a secret life-giving lamp. As Hamet wavers over the morality of employing occult forces, Almorán assumes the form of Omar and steals the scroll in order to save his own life. Just as Almorán is transfixed into stone, the Genie reappears, revealing that he is in fact a divine emissary commissioned to "perfect virtue" and "entangle vice."

Almorán and Hamet has sometimes been framed as a lesser work in imitation of Samuel Johnson's Rasselas (1759). The genre of oriental tale to which both tales belong has often been dismissed in traditional criticism as a curious but passing fashion or, following the work of Edward Said, assimilated to the larger category of western Orientalist cultural discourse.

Current reevaluations view the oriental tale, for all its orientalism, as a popular early transnational genre contrasting with the self-conscious formation of national identity in the novel (Aravamudan), forming "a counterpart of sorts to the great male tradition" represented by the Aeneid and its rewritings (Mack), and acting a privileged site for materialist thought about bodily drives. Within this context, Almorán and Hamet may be seen as a text which, through its thematics of twinning, impersonation, and brotherly voyeurism, unwittingly undoes mind-body dualism in favor of a new psychology of self conceived as the performance of the other and as contingent on the incorporation of the other's desires. By presenting lawful and unlawful possession of a woman as an allegory for just rule or tyranny and as a talisman for differentiating the divinely chosen ruler from the pretender, the tale also hopelessly eroticizes the body politic in a move typical of the eighteenth-century oriental tale. Against the tale's own grain, the populace that gives its hand freely and that which is condemned to a "joyless prostitution" ultimately amount to identical twins. Only mildly sexualized by the standards set by the eighteenth-century pornographic novel, and not nearly as explicit in its depictions of sexuality as the notorious Tahitian passages in Hawkesworth's Account of voyages to the South Seas, the tale nonetheless erotically trades on the conventions of the exotic harem, the dynamics of sexual dominance and subordination, and the provocative theme of inhabiting another's body to perform one's own desire.

Biography

A respected man of letters, Hawkesworth spent most of his life in London and Bromley, Kent. His earliest literary activity in 1741 was as compiler of parliamentary debates and contributor of poetry to the Gentleman's Magazine, for which he later became the literary and dramatic editor. With Samuel Johnson, he wrote and edited the periodical Adventurer beginning in 1752. His works include plays and adaptations for the stage, moral essays, criticism, and oriental tales that appeared in periodicals, the Life of Swift (1755), and the controversial Account of eighteenth-century British voyages to the South Pacific (1773). Contemporaries imputed his death in 1773 to disappointment over the damaging reception of the Account, which was viewed as improper in its treatments of divine providence and Tahitian sexuality.

PAMELA CHEEK

Editions

Almorán and Hamet; An Oriental Tale. London, H. Payne and W. Cropley, 1761; London, Harrison and Co, 1786, 1790, 1803; Burlington, N.J., David Allinson, 1808; Reprint of 1761 edition, New York and London: Garland Publishing, 1974.

Selected Works

Hawkesworth, Samuel Johnson, et al. The Adventurer. 1752–1754.
Amphitryon (alteration of Dryden's work). 1756.
Oroonoko (rewriting of Southerne's stage adaptation of Behn's novel). 1759.
Edgar and Emmeline. 1761.
Life of Swift. 1766.
Adventures of Telemachus (translation of Fénelon's Les aventures de Télémaque). 1768.

An Account of the Voyages . . . by Commodore Byron, Captain Wallis, Captain Carteret, And Captain Cook. 3 vols., 1773.

Further Reading

Abbott, John Lawrence. John Hawkesworth: Eighteenth-Century Man of Letters. Madison, WI: University of Wisconsin Press, 1982.

Aravamudan, Srinivas. "In the Wake of the Novel: the Oriental Tale as National Allegory." Novel 33 no. 1 (Fall 1999), 5–31.

Caracciolo, Peter L., ed. The Arabian Nights in English Literature: Studies in the Reception of the Thousand and One Nights into British Culture. London: Macmillan, 1988.

Cheek, Pamela. Sexual Antipodes: Enlightenment Globalization and the Placing of Sex. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 2003.

Conant, Martha Pike. The Oriental Tale in England in the Eighteenth Century. 1908; New York: Octagon Books, Inc., 1966.

Kolb, Gwin. Rasselas and Other Tales. New Haven, CT, 1990.

Mack, Robert L. "Introduction." Oriental Tales. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Mayo, Robert D. The English Novel in the Magazines, 1740–1815. Evanston, IL; Northwestern University Press, 1962.

---

HAWTHORNE, NATHANIEL

---

1804–1864
American novelist

The Scarlet Letter

Originally hailed as "the most moral book of the age" after its 1850 publication by literary critics, The Scarlet Letter appeared at a time when readers were looking for an example of moral and community values. Viewed as a book that encouraged self-restraint and adherence to conventional community values in a non-intrusive manner, The Scarlet Letter tackles the need for self-denial and social responsibility in the pitfalls and shortcomings of its main characters, Reverend Arthur Dimmesdale; Hester Prynne; Pearl; and Roger Chillingworth. Seen through the prism of Pearl, the daughter of Dimmesdale and Hester, the novel also incorporates the perspectives of Hester, her lover, Dimmesdale, and her husband, Chillingworth, providing a discourse on social, moral, spiritual, and legal legitimacy. From the beginning, the novel follows a clear plan, beginning with the illusion of illicit sex to the accompanying psychological implications of this act, with Reverend Dimmesdale as the exemplar of all socially unacceptable qualities and Hester as the embodiment of public property. Hester, however, did not completely fit the personification of the "fallen woman," since her strength, selflessness, and positivity allows her to overcome her previous actions. Consequently, Hawthorne seems to implicitly encourage readers to condemn Dimmesdale rather than identify with his suffering, which essentially reinforces the nineteenth-century moral conservatism.

Hawthorne struggled to justify romance in a culture of pragmatism; Hester's entrance into the marketplace after her implied illicit act marks her conflicting role. While wearing the scarlet letter "A," signifying the opposing concepts of pride and shame, as well as both achievement and alienation, Hester must play two roles, that of mother and partner in the wake of adultery, in a society that viewed illegitimacy as a moral sin. Puritanical society required public confession of sin before forgiveness, yet, despite the pain of seeing Hester on the scaffold and suffering public humiliation, Dimmesdale could not bring himself to confess his adultery. Tortured by his conscience, Dimmesdale lamented, "...were I an atheist,—a man devoid of conscience,—a wretch with coarse and brutal instincts,—I might have found peace, long ere now." The request for him to speak "drove the blood from his cheek, and made his lips tremulous," which related to Hawthorne's depiction of Dimmesdale in feminine terms, and the psychological distress led to weight loss and a distrust in his spirituality, reducing him to a “poor, forlorn creature.” In contrast, despite the public humiliation in the marketplace, Hester exists in isolation, yet she somehow sustains her strength “without a friend on earth who dared to show himself.” She never experienced public conflict, and earned the townspeople’s respect with the “blameless purity” of her life. She maintained a subsistence living with her daughter, Pearl, and occasionally took on sewing jobs for the townspeople. Due to her position as an outcast, she somehow regains the townspeople’s sense of respect.

Hester’s struggle between desire and her culturally conditioned sense of social responsibility is very much a physical expression, and she uses her body as a stage for her sexuality. For example, Hawthorne describes her “art” of sewing for the townspeople, in which Hester’s hands are described as repeatedly moving to her lap. Hawthorne, in his discussion of this scene, tactfully diverts the reader’s attention from Hester’s “sinful hands” used to touch “the spot [which] never grew callous; it seemed, on the contrary, to grow more sensitive with daily torture.” This description, while not explicitly sexual, does suggest that Hester is still a sexualized being. Her clothing, normally a coarse gray cloth, was interrupted by the scarlet “A,” which revealed a sense of autoeroticism. When she emerged from prison, for example, this reflected her own emergence from a physical confinement, as well as an emotional, spiritual, and sexual confinement.

While The Scarlet Letter may be interpreted as the rise of Hester from ruin and the demise of Dimmesdale from moral superiority, the novel can also be described as the tale of Chillingworth’s fall and redemption, as well as his efforts to claim Pearl as his child. The reader’s first view of Chillingworth, seen through the filter of Hester’s disgust, is his appearance in the marketplace after a two-year absence. Hawthorne describes his reaction as one of repulsion, manifested as a “writhing horror.” Incorporating this connection, literary critic T. Walter Herbert defines Chillingworth’s reaction as practically masturbatory, with the “snake-like writhing” personifying the “erotic energy invested both in the hidden feelings and in the compulsion to keep them concealed.” Herbert contends that Chillingworth’s reaction imitates Hester’s sexual transgression. In many ways, Hawthorne deals with Chillingworth ambivalently, although he does give Chillingworth a name, “Roger,” that was a colonial epithet for adulterous intercourse or rape, and provide Chillingworth with a new name, the pseudonym Chillingworth, in substitution for his given name, Prynne.

Self-recognition plays an important role in The Scarlet Letter, including Chillingworth’s attempts to gain recognition from the daughter he tries to claim as his own. In his first attempt, when Pearl is three years old and refuses to be catechized by the Puritan elders, and Hester could potentially lose her daughter, she refuses the assistance of Chillingworth. In the second attempt, four years later, while Pearl and Hester stand at midnight with Dimmesdale, Pearl twice withdraws her hand from Dimmesdale’s hand to point at Chillingworth, and it is in this scene that Dimmesdale first conceives of Chillingworth as an “arch-fiend.” After this scene, when Hester confronts Chillingworth on the shore, he undergoes a sort of spiritual awakening. Both Chillingworth and Dimmesdale look at Pearl, perhaps dreading what image they would see reflected in Pearl’s eyes. Hester does the same, expecting to see Dimmesdale’s reflection, but instead seeing Chillingworth, suggesting that perhaps a solid family unit would be important. Yet, by leaving Pearl without a father, Hawthorne confronts illegitimacy and self-doubt. In the scene in which Dimmesdale acknowledges his daughter, Pearl kissed her father’s lips, and “a spell was broken.” His confession, however, is only part of the attempt to establish legitimacy for Pearl. The kiss may have enabled her to become a woman, but it is not until she inherits Chillingworth’s legacy of his estate in England that she comes into her own as a woman. This, in many ways, further destroys Dimmesdale’s reputation, and provides legitimacy to Chillingworth.

Similarly, the conclusion of The Scarlet Letter is fraught with meaning; Hester seems to have perfected an image of self-denial and has become the woman to whom many of the townspeople brought their complaints. Where she was once the pariah for her lack of self-constraint, Hester is now the model of restraint, counseling others on the importance of social conformity.

Biography

Nathaniel Hawthorne was born on July 4, 1804, in Salem, Massachusetts. After graduating from Bowdoin College he tried unsuccessfully to make a living as a writer. In 1942, Hawthorne married Sophia Peabody and moved to Concord, where he was introduced to the Transcendentalist circle that included Ralph Waldo Emerson and Henry David Thoreau. More lean times followed, forcing a return to Salem. Success finally came with the publication of the hugely popular The Scarlet Letter (1850) and The House of the Seven Gables (1851). Hawthorne died on May 19, 1864, in Plymouth, New Hampshire on a trip to the mountains with his friend, former President Franklin Pierce.

JENNIFER HARRISON

Further Reading

- Coleman, Robert Lloyd. "The Rhetoric of American Fiction: Figures of Romance." New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University, May 1998. Ph.D. dissertation.
- Egan, Ken. "The adulteress in the market-place: Hawthorne and The Scarlet Letter." Studies in the Novel 27.1 (Spring 1995): 26–42.
- Herbert, T. Walter. Dearest Beloved: The Hawthornes and the Making of a Middle-Class Family. Berkeley: The University of California Press, 1993.
- Johnson, Merri Lisa. "Fallen Women, Joyful Girls: The Liberatory Female Body in Nineteenth- and Twentieth-Century American Literature." Ph.D. dissertation. Binghamton: State University of New York, 2000.

---

HAYWOOD, ELIZA

---

c.1693–1756
English novelist

Eliza Haywood, dubbed the "Great arbitress of passion" by contemporary James Sterling, was perhaps the most successful writer of sensational amatory fiction in Britain in the 1720s. Her work has enjoyed considerable critical attention since the 1980s, though for generations she was chiefly familiar as an object of Alexander Pope's satire in The Dunciad (1728), in which she is offered—"Two babes of love close clinging to her waist" (II. 158)—to the winner of a pissing contest: "His be yon Juno of majestic size,/With cow-like udders, and with ox-like eyes" (II. 163–164). In a note, Pope justifies this attack by identifying her as the "authoress of ... most scandalous books."

Haywood was one of the most popular authors of her time. Her career spanned four decades and she produced more than 80 texts—although she at times published anonymously and no full list exists—in an astonishing array of genres, novels, shorter prose, essays, plays, and conduct literature among them. The Female

Spectator (1744–1746), which she published anonymously, was one of the first English periodicals by women, for women. Of particular interest is her amatory fiction, a genre distinguished from erotic narrative by its emphasis on subjectivity, and from romance by its emphasis on sexuality. Her first novel, Love in Excess (1719–1720) was, with Defoe's Robinson Crusoe, arguably one of the two most popular novels of the early eighteenth century. She followed with 38 original works in the following decade, most of them short novels—"secret histories"—following the French model. Her novella "Fantomina" (1725), the story of a young woman who successfully disguises herself in various ways in order to maintain a connection with an inconstant man, is frequently anthologized. She is credited, with Delarivier Manley, of developing the novel of seduction in English (Spencer). Often framed as "scandalous memoirs," these episodic narratives of innocence defrauded frequently criticize courtly culture, with their middle-class heroines and upper-class heroes, and contemporary politics, with sexual libertines standing in for corrupt politicians.

Through most of the 1730s, Haywood concentrated on the theater, then she returned to prose fiction in the 1740s. It has been suggested that attacks such as Pope's temporarily drove her from publishing, but it would seem that she instead was drawn to the stage, at least until the political situation under Walpole made a theatrical career difficult. In the 1740s and 50s, Haywood turned to writing didactic novels such as The History of Miss Betsy Thoughtless (1751), but with its plain language and frank depictions of pregnancy and prostitution, even this unexceptionable narrative is considerably racier than the novels of female education of subsequent decades. Later generations, while rejecting her more unregenerate contemporaries, lauded Haywood for having "repented of her faults" (Reeve, 285), though it is generally agreed now that rather than "reforming," Haywood was particularly attuned to the nuances of the literary marketplace. This interpretation is supported by recent scholarship which identifies Haywood as a translator of Crébillon fils's erotic novel, Le Sopha, conte moral, as late as 1742 (Spedding).

During her lifetime and following, Haywood was seen as a successor to Aphra Behn and Delarivier Manley in "the fair triumvirate of wit," all of whom were women writers considered expert in love. Her critical reputation waned over the nineteenth century until her reclamation by feminists, in the twentieth century, as a "mother of the novel" (Spender). More recently she has been studied for her contributions to popular literature, her attacks on the sexual double standard, her interweaving of political satire with amatory fiction, her representations of female desire and subjectivity, and her "creation of environments radiant with the possibility of transgression and provocatively in counterpoint to [her] explicit moral arguments" (Pettit, 244).

Biography

Haywood is reported to have instructed her friends not to reveal details about her life, "from a supposition of some improper liberties being taken with her character after death, by the intermixture of truth and falsehood with her history" (Blouch, 545). As a consequence there is little reliable information about her, though recent research has uncovered new material and exposed the falsity of some long-standing stories, such as the rumor that Haywood was the runaway wife of a minister (Blouch, Beasley). Her life after she became published is better documented, though many questions remain. She would seem to have had an unusually good education for a woman, as she published various translations; she made her acting debut 1715; she was arrested in 1749 for publishing political works; she had liaisons with Richard Savage and William Hachett, the former who referred to her in print as "a cast-off dame" and the latter with whom she lived for twenty years. She was an active member of a busy literary circle and had connections to Henry Fielding and other notable writers of the day. At the end of her life, although a successful writer herself and rumored to be wealthy, her death duties remained unpaid.

MIRIAM JONES

References

- Beasley, Jerry C. "Introduction." In The Injur'd Husband; or, the Mistaken Resentment and Lasselia; or, The Self-Abandon'd. Lexington, KY: University Press of Kentucky, 1999.
- Blouch, Christine. "Eliza Haywood and the Romance of Obscurity." In Studies in English Literature 31 (1991): 535–551.
- Pettit, Alexander. "Adventures in Pornographic Places: Eliza Heywood's Tea-Table and the Decentering of Moral Argument." In Papers on Language and Literature: A Journal for Scholars and Critics of Language and Literature, 38.3 (Summer 2002): 244–69.
- Reeve, Clara. From The Progress of Romance, through Times, Countries, Manners, 1785, Love in Excess; or, the Fatal Enquiry. Eliza Haywood. Edited by David Oakleaf, 2nd ed., Peterborough, Ont: Broadview, 2000.
- Spedding, Patrick. "Shameless Scribbler or Votary of Virtue? Eliza Haywood, Writing (and) Pornography in 1742." In Women Writing, 1550–1750, edited by Jo Wallwork and Paul Salzman, Bundoora, Australia: Meridian, 2001.
- Spencer, Jane. The Rise of the Woman Novelist: From Aphra Behn to Jane Austen. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1986.
- Spender, Dale. Mothers of the Novel. New York: Pandora, 1986.

Reprints of Haywood's Works

- The Adventures of Eovaai: Princess of Ijaveo*. Edited by Earla Wilputte, Peterborough, Ont: Broadview, 1999.
- Anti-Pamela*. In Anti-Pamela and Shamela. Edited by Catherine Ingrassia. Peterborough, Ont: Broadview, 2004.
- The British Recluse in Popular Fiction by Women 1660–1730*. Edited by Paula R. Backscheider and John J. Richette. New York: Oxford UP, 1996.
- The Distress'd Orphan; or, Love in a Mad-House*. New York: AMS/Augustan Reprint Society, 1995.

- Fantomina and Other Works. Edited by Alexander Pettit, Margaret Case Croskery, and Anna C. Patchias. Peterborough, Ont: Broadview, 2004.
- The History of Miss Betsy Thoughtless*. Edited by Christine Bloch. Peterborough, Ont: Broadview, 1998.
- The Injur'd Husband; or, the Mistaken Resentment and Lasselia; or, The Self-Abandon'd*. Edited by Jerry C. Beasley. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1999.
- Love in Excess; or, the Fatal Enquiry*. Edited by David Oakleaf. 2nd ed. Peterborough, Ont: Broadview, 2000.
- The Masquerade Novels of Eliza Haywood*. Edited by Mary Anne Schofield. Delmar, NY: Scholars' Facsimiles and Reprints, 1986.
- Miscellaneous Writings, 1725–1743*. Edited by Alexander Pettit. London: Pickering and Chatto, 2000.
- Selected Fiction and Drama of Eliza Haywood*. Edited by Paula R. Backscheider. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Selected Works of Eliza Haywood*. Edited by Alexander Pettit. 6 vols. London: Pickering and Chatto, 2000–2001.
- Selections from The Female Spectator by Eliza Haywood*. Edited by Patricia Meyer Spacks. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Three Novellas*. Edited by Earla A. Wilputte. East Lansing, MI: Colleagues Press, 1995.
- Black, Scott. "Trading Sex for Secrets in Haywood's Love in Excess." In Eighteenth-Century Fiction 15.2 (Jan. 2003): 207–226.
- Bowers, Toni O'-Shaughnessy. "Sex, Lies, and Invisibility: Amatory Fiction from the Restoration to Mid-Century." In The Columbia History of the British Novel. Edited by John Richetti, New York: Columbia UP, 1994.
- Collins, Margo. "Eliza Haywood's Cross-Gendered Amatory Audience." In Eighteenth-Century Women: Studies in Their Lives, Work, and Culture. 2 (2002): 43–60.
- Hollis, Karen. "Eliza Haywood and the Gender of Print." The Eighteenth Century, 38.1 (1997): 43–62.
- Ingrassia, Catherine. "Fashioning Female Authorship in Eliza Haywood's The Tea-Table." In The Journal of Narrative Technique. 28.3 (Fall 1998): 287–304.
- King, Kathryn R. "Spying upon the Conjuror: Haywood, Curiosity, and 'the Novel' in the 1720s." In Studies in the Novel, 30.2 (Summer 1998): 178–93.
- Nestor, Deborah J. "Virtue Rarely Rewarded: Ideological Subversion and Narrative Form in Haywood's Later Fiction." In Studies in English Literature, 34 (1994): 579–598.
- Potter, Tiffany. "'A God-Like Sublimity of Passion': Eliza Haywood's Libertine Consistency." In Eighteenth-Century Novel, 1 (2001): 95–126.
- Saxton, Kirsten T. and Rebecca P. Bocchicchio, editor. The Passionate Fictions of Eliza Haywood: Essays on Her Life and Work. Lexington, KY: UP of Kentucky, 2000.
- Schofield, Mary Anne. Eliza Haywood. Boston: Twayne, 1985.
- . Quiet Rebellion: The Fictional Heroines of Eliza Fowler Haywood. Washington, DC: UP of America, 1982.
- Spedding, Patrick. A Bibliography of Eliza Haywood. London: Pickering and Chatto, 2004.

Further Reading

- Backscheider, Paula. "The Shadow of an Author: Eliza Haywood." Eighteenth-Century Fiction 11.1 (Oct. 1998): 79–102.
- Ballaster, Ros. Seductive Forms: Women's Amatory Fiction from 1684–1740. Oxford: Clarendon, 1992.
- Benedict, Barbara M. "The Curious Genre: Female Inquiry in Amatory Fiction." in Studies in the Novel, 30.2 (Summer 1998): 194–210.

---

HECHT, BEN AND BODENHEIM, MAXWELL

---

Hecht, Ben

1893–1964

Bodenheim, Maxwell

1892–1954

American novelists, poets, and playwrights

Cutie: A Warm Momma

Maxwell Bodenheim describes this brief narrative as a "satire on ultra-prudish hypocritical censors and assailers [sic] of sexual candor and incisiveness in literary and pictorial work. . . ." It was published in 1924; its story spans the years 1922–1930.

In 1922, Covici-McGee published Hecht's Fantazius Mallare: A Mysterious Oath. Pascal Covici had just started as a Chicago publisher, and asked Hecht for a book which could be sold by subscription. It was to be attractively printed and illustrated, with the black boards and red end papers which were code for an upscale sex book. Covici wanted the kind of sexual content that would be desirable to people with money and fantasies of being considered avant garde, sexually sophisticated, and aware of the most daring fiction and poetry available. Covici's audience, therefore, was no different from those Sylvia Beach had in Paris for Joyce, or Pino Orioli in Florence for Lawrence and Norman Douglas: collectors, literati, booksellers with trusted customers. All had an interlocking interest for modernism, explicit language, and erotica. Mallare was in the decadent style of Huysmans' A Rebours. The protagonist is a cynical dandy with no interest in sex. He trains a gypsy girl to adulate him. Frustrated, she gives herself to his servant; only then does he realize he has lost what he most desired, and can never retrieve. Recognizing the result of his alienation from his sexual nature, his grip on sanity weakens.

Impotence and self-lacerating voyeurism are deliciously fascinating vices for prurient imaginations to contemplate—at least, Hecht must have thought so. He was disappointed that no moral guardian arose to censor his novel, the illustrations and decorations for which might easily have offended one. Wallace Smith's work included penises surrounded by thorny branches, and writhing naked figures, apparently modeled after those of Egon Schiele, one of which was obviously having intercourse with a tree. Not even when Covici had copies placed in his bookshop's windows, opened to pages with the most shock value, did the outrage develop.

Finally, postal authorities intercepted copies sent to subscribers and prosecuted. It was a federal case, and if Hecht and Bodenheim had been convicted they might have gone to jail. Hecht had trumpeted his intention to gain an acquittal and then break "the censorship" by suing and therefore bankrupting his accuser, whom he hoped would be John Sumner of the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice, but was more likely to be Philip Yarrow of the Illinois Vigilance Association (Hecht knew considerably less about how obscenity law worked than one would expect for a practicing journalist). He tells us that a dozen fellow writers reneged on promises to testify that he was a serious artist who should be allowed to express himself in language he felt necessary.

Consequently, one look at the solid citizens awaiting jury duty was all it took for him to insist that his lawyer plead nolle contendere. He and his illustrator were fined 1,000 dollars each. The guardians of decency could be excused for thinking that the blasphemers had been sent packing with their tails between their legs. And so could the literati who read D.H. Lawrence's contemptuous review: Lawrence opined that the book's text and illustrations, by encouraging titillation, solidified the impression that sex was dirty. Mallare might "hang his [penis] on his nose-end and a [testicle] under each ear, and definitely testify that way that he'd got such appendages, [and] it wouldn't affect me."

Hecht did not give up on Mallare, writing a "continuation" (The Kingdom of Evil) in 1924. Cutie, published the same year, was Hecht and Bodenheim's revenge on the censors. Bodenheim had not yet produced Replenishing Jessica or Georgie May, for which he was to encounter obscenity charges, but he was well known as a bohemian firebrand poet and reviewer. Hecht was a friend and admirer; the two co-edited The Chicago Literary Times and were part of the impressive group of writers and artists who congregated around Covici and McGee's bookshop. The 8,000 word satire, privately printed ("Heckshaw Press"), had appeared in installments in The Literary Times. In his Introduction, Bodenheim expresses his hatred for privately-organized decency societies which cannot distinguish between gratuitous vulgarity and art which must, to be honest, include frank depiction of sex and sexual experience in all its varieties and motives. Hecht and Bodenheim personify these censors in Herman Pupick, "a prude with one glass eye and splintered pieces of glass in what passed for his heart." Herman is a federal employee who sniffs out immorality everywhere and anywhere he sees it. As such, he is an amalgam of the postal inspector and the police-deputized agent of an anti-vice group, as were Sumner and Yarrow. In Yiddish, "pupik" means bellybutton. Leo Rosten defines a pupik as an inconsequential person, or "nudnick" (a bore or pest) who worries about what is not worth worrying about. Since "preprice" is the fold of foreskin over the head of an (uncircumcised) penis, Herman is also just a prick.

Herman knew nothing of life when he became besotted with Cutie. He was married, but to a woman who “couldn’t pass a bathroom without blushing.” Herman first noticed Cutie when she was being helped by a policeman after skinning her knee. He was outraged that the officer was exposing Cutie’s leg in public. He’s another Willy Wet Leg, ironically similar to Fantazius. Pupick’s crusades close down The Chicago Literary Times, all the libraries, and the “abdominal belt displays” in the drugstore windows. He also gets rid of many of Chicago’s authors, and the bookleggers (actually, he did not get the ones who later pirated Cutie). The story ends with Mrs. Pupick, seeing Herman with Cutie and two other flappers, stabs Cutie and Herman with a hat pin. The story is told as if the writers were entertaining fellow customers at Schlogl’s, a favorite literary hangout. There are lots of topical references as well as period argot: “lost manhood advertisements,” the famous cross-dressing entertainer Julian Eltinge, Gilda Grey, Ruth St. Denis, and Freudian psychoanalysis.

In 1930, the pirate publisher Samuel Roth issued his roman à clef about an oppressive censor from New York, Hugh Wakem: The Diary of a Smuthound. The smuthound is probably modeled on Sumner. Many titles of banned books are mentioned, as are six booksellers, all of whom are most likely real people with slightly disguised names.

Biographies

Hecht: Important figure in the Chicago Literary Renaissance; writer for the stage and films whose screenplays included The Front Page and A Farewell to Arms; journalist, activist for Israeli causes; satirist.

Bodenheim: Poet who won early acclaim for his work; novelist, vagabond, literary critic, and brilliant conversationalist who suffered an emotional decline near the end of his life which reduced him to selling verses in Greenwich Village bars. Some important themes in his novels were prostitution, urban life, derelicts. Well respected by Ezra Pound, Conrad Aiken, William Carlos Williams.

JAY A. GERTZMAN

Editions

Cutie: A Warm Momma. Chicago: Heckshaw Press, 1924; New York: Boar’s Head Books [Samuel Roth], 1952.

Selected Works

Hecht

Eric Dorn. 1921.
A Thousand and One Nights in Chicago. 1922.
Count Bruga. 1926.
The Front Page. 1928.
A Jew in Love. 1931.
Twentieth Century. 1932.
A Guide for the Bedeviled. 1944.
Collected Stories. 1945.
Hazel Flagg. 1953.
A Child of the Century (autobiography). 1954.
The Sensualists. 1959.

Bodenheim

Against This Age. 1923.
Replenishing Jessica. 1925.
Georgie May. 1928.
A Virtuous Girl. 1930.
Bringing Jazz! 1930.
Naked on Roller Skates. 1930.
Selected Poems. 1946.

Further Reading

“Ben Hecht, 1893–1964.” <<http://www.kirjasto.sci.fi/bhecht.htm>>
 Bisbort, Alan. “Mad Max: Death of a Bohemian King.” <<http://www.gadfly.org/lastweek/bodenheimfeature.html>>
 Boyer, Paul. Purity in Print: The Vice-Society Movement and Book Censorship in America. New York: Scribner, 1968.
 “Fantazius Mallare Walloped for One Row of Ash Cans.” Chicago Literary Review (15 February 1924): 1–2.
 Gertzman, Jay A. Bookleggers and Smuthounds: The Trade in Erotica, 1920–1940. New York: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.
 Moore, Jack B. Maxwell Bodenheim. New York: Twayne, 1971.
 McAdams, Will. Ben Hecht: The Man Behind the Legend. New York: Scribner, 1990.

---

HERMAPHRODITISM

---

Hermaphroditism is a word used to denote a condition in which both male and female sexual characteristics are combined in one body. So-called 'perfect hermaphroditism,' in which male and female characteristics co-exist in equal proportions, very rarely exists. Throughout history hermaphroditism has been both real (based on some form of genital irregularity) and imagined (drawing from a range of sexual and social ambiguities). The blurring of male and female has, in many cultures, been celebrated as a spiritual ideal but embodied sexual ambiguity has also provoked fear and many supposedly hermaphroditic individuals have been reviled as monsters.

From eastern celebrations of the mystical eroticism of hermaphroditic sexuality to Antonio Beccadelli's fourteenth century Latin poem, Hermaphrodite, hermaphroditism has been the subject of erotica. The erotic allure of sexual ambiguity is encapsulated in a famous series of Hellenistic sculptures that depict 'The Sleeping Hermaphrodite.' Within these images a beautifully ambiguous reclining nude is represented. When viewed from behind, the soft, languid lines of the body appear to be female but when seen from the front a penis comes into view.

The hermaphrodite has often been represented as a primary symbol of sexual union. In Plato's Symposium Aristophanes relates how humans were originally created as 'Androgyni,' doubled beings which circled like wheels in a condition of wholeness and perfection until the god, Zeus, grew jealous and spilt them down their centers. Henceforth, the desolate remaining parts of the original whole search the earth for their lost other halves. Plato's text privileged the reunion of male/male parts of the complete original beings but the fable became disseminated in later times as a parable that demonstrated the power of heterosexual love and erotic desire. A similar story emerged within medieval Jewish literature as some mystics believed that Adam was originally hermaphroditic. Heterosexual sex thereby symbolized a return to the primal Edenic moment of unity.

Ovid's story of 'Salmacis and Hermaphroditus' in Metamorphoses influenced many subsequent representations of sexual ambiguity, from the Renaissance and beyond. The story relates how Hermaphroditus, the child of Hermes and Aphrodite (or Mercury and Venus), a youth of exceptional beauty, met the nymph Salmacis. Salmacis becomes overwhelmed by her passion for the indifferent Hermaphroditus and forces him to unite in a violent embrace. As Ovid describes it:

When their limbs met in that single clinging embrace the nymph and the boy were no longer two, but a single form, possessed of a dual nature, which could not be called male or female, but seemed to be at once both and neither. (Ovid, 1955, p.104)

On seeing his transformation into 'half a man,' Hermaphroditus prays to his parents to curse the pool. The prayer is granted and the curse is passed on to all men who enter the pool of Salmacis forever more.

Ovid's representation of the sexually ambiguous, solipsistic youth has resonated throughout artistic and literary history. Hermaphroditus was one of a series of mythical youths who were the consummate objects of erotic appeal (Narcissus, Adonis, Ganymede, and Leander). Such figures were the focus of a particularly homo-erotically charged gaze as they were represented in the visual images of Renaissance artists (such as Correggio's The Rape of Ganymede) and the poems of William Shakespeare, Christopher Marlowe, and others. For these artists and poets the aestheticization of young male sexual ambiguity was to be delighted in. The beautiful youth was, as Shakespeare put it in sonnet 20, 'the master-mistress' of their creator's passions.

Hermaphroditism was associated with a number of social transgressions ranging from same-sex erotic desire to effeminacy, transvestism, and sodomy. According to George Sandys, writing in 1632, for example, the fountain of Salmacis was reported to have both effeminized the ancient Carians and led them into various forms of sexual debauchery. Hermaphrodites were accused of deviancy, not because they were of both sexes, but because they “defiled themselves with either” (Sandys, 1632). A later text, The Wandering Whore, is even more explicit, describing hermaphrodites as, “effeminate men, men given to much luxury idleness, and wanton pleasures, and to that abominable sin of sodomy, wherein they are both active and passive in it” (anon, 1660).

Throughout the seventeenth century there are a number of case-histories that are reported in medical, paramedical, and legal treatises, as well as in erotica, that connect hermaphroditism in women to the existence of an enlarged clitoris. Many stories of prodigious female members were drawn from stories about exotic and eroticized non-European lands. Writers of medical and paramedical texts exploited the titillating effects of describing how women ‘abused’ these enlarged members by engaging in tribadic activities with other women. Giles Jacob, for example, (whose Treatise on Hermaphrodites was printed in 1718 with Edmund Curll’s explicitly erotic A Treatise of the Use of Flogging at Venereal Affairs) was typical in his exploration of erotic lesbian escapades.

By the eighteenth century, so-called hermaphrodites were increasingly viewed as objects of scientific scrutiny. But medical enquiry could not always be separated from popular entertainment and during this period many sexually ambiguous individuals were displayed as curiosities. The focus on genital anomalies in hermaphroditic cases inevitably led to ostensibly ‘scientific’ studies being charged with erotic excitement. During the nineteenth and early-twentieth centuries such displays reached a peak as male–female hybrids such as ‘Josephine–Joseph’ and ‘Robert–Roberta’ were regularly shown in ‘freak shows’ and fairground entertainments.

The late-nineteenth-century sexologists developed a discourse whereby a range of ambiguities in sex and gender were defined as ‘pseudo-hermaphroditism’ and pathologized. In 1978, Michel Foucault published Herculine Barbin, the memoirs of a nineteenth-century hermaphrodite. Foucault presented a dossier of medical and legal documents alongside Herculine’s tortured first person account that conveyed the agonies of living with a confused sexual identity. The story of Herculine marked the inception of critical and theoretical interest in exploring histories of marginal lives and erotic identities.

In the early-twentieth century there is still a popular and academic fascination with issues of transsexualism and gender dysphoria. However, sexually ambiguous individuals themselves are now beginning to claim identities as intersexuals rather than accepting the surgical mutilation, pathologization, and erotic objectification that has characterized their representation throughout history.

RUTH GILBERT

Further Reading

- Daston, Lorraine and Katharine Park. “The Hermaphrodite and the Orders of Nature: Sexual Ambiguity in Early Modern France.” Gay and Lesbian Quarterly. 1 (1995): 419–438.
- Delcourt, Marie. Hermaphrodite: Myths and Rites of the Bisexual Figure in Classical Antiquity. Translated by Jennifer Nicholson. London: Studio Books, 1961.
- Epstein, Julia. “Ambiguous Sexes.” In Altered Conditions: Disease, Medicine and Storytelling. London: Routledge, 1995.
- Fiedler, Leslie. “Hermaphrodites.” In Freaks: Myths and Images of the Secret Self. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1979.
- Foucault, Michel, editor. Herculine Barbin, Being the Recently Discovered Memoirs of a Nineteenth Century French Hermaphrodite. Translated by Richard McDougall. Harmondsworth, Penguin, 1980.
- Gilbert, Ruth. Early Modern Hermaphrodites: Sex and Other Stories. Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2002.
- Kesler, Suzanne, J. Lessons from the Intersexed. New Jersey: Rutgers University Press, 1998.
- Laqueur, Thomas. Making Sex: Body and Gender from the Greeks to Freud. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1990.
- Ian McCormick. Secret Sexualities: A Sourcebook of 17th and 18th Century Writing. London: Routledge, 1997.
- Ovid. Metamorphoses. Translated by Mary M. Innes. Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1955.
- Sharrock, Cath. “Hermaphroditism; or, ‘the Erection of a New Doctrine’: Theories of Female Sexuality in Eighteenth-Century England.” Paraglyph. 17 (1994): 34–48.

HERRGOTT, ELISABETH

---

1947–
French writer

Transports amoureux

The title is a play on words, referring to the metaphoric use of the word ‘transport’ in the classical French phrase ‘transports amoureux,’ as clarified by the epigraph, an entry from the Lexique de la langue du XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle: ‘transport amoureux’ are ‘violent and pleasant agitations of the heart; rushes of love, lust and passion; mislayings of the body and the soul.’ The tone is set: the whole book is about ‘amorous transports’ in both meanings of the word, as erotic scenes are usually set in particular transport contexts, from local buses to inter-continental aeroplanes. Sex with strangers during weekly commuting high-speed train journeys, sex with an air hostess on the way to Rio, sex with a gondolier in Venice: the bisexual female narrator never seems able to travel without initiating or encountering sexual adventures, even in elevators or in the underground.

Transports amoureux is not a long book: it is composed of twenty-one short sections of four pages on average. The sections can be presented as short stories; their titles are usually explicit about the location: ‘Parking’ for the section about sex in a car park, ‘Transports en commun’ for the section about being fingered by unknown hands at rush hour in the underground. One can distinguish between two types of short stories: fifteen are directly about sex and transport together (sex in particular means of transport), six others are about sex without reference to transport. Falling into that latter category is the most intriguing short story, which is also the longest one (nine pages): entitled ‘La grande abbesse de l’abbaye de P.,’ it presents a filthy nun called Bénédicte de G., her private emasculated priest Ignacio, and their friend Hildegarde. It is not easy to interpret how this short story fits within the overall economy of the book, located as it is between ‘Le 83’ (two pages about masturbating a man in the bus 83) and ‘Anales Ferroviaires’ (seven pages about having sex on the train to Paris).

Elisabeth Herrgott trained as a Lacanian psychoanalyst—and it shows, through some transparent references to youth episodes accounting for bouts of fetishism, such as the young man obsessed by buttons on women’s dresses (because his mother was a school teacher who asked him to button up her blouse), or the narrator’s discovery of fellatio when, aged nine, she sucked a man (an Indian Catholic priest) in an elevator (Catholicism is a recurrent sub-theme of the book). In terms of sexual activities, other interesting components of Transports amoureux are the instances of auditory voyeurism, masturbation with a silver dildo, and lesbian group sex. The overall atmosphere of the book is one of mild decadence, but its voluptuous universe is far from cheap: women always wear Dior perfume and expensive fur-coats (whilst being usually naked under the fur); men are lawyers or scientists who drive a Mercedes or a BMW and eat in the most expensive restaurants; holidays are spent in Brazil or Venice, and one travels first-class in aircrafts or in private yachts.

In terms of erotic literature, one can appreciate the creativity of the author with her witty focus on transportation means, as well as the way some short stories lend themselves well to queer readings, for instance the very last one: entitled ‘Dédicace’ (‘Dedication’), starts with the epigraph ‘A Vladimir mon amant lesbienne,’ [To Vladimir my male lesbian lover] (Vladimir was also mentioned in the ‘Postface,’ witch came just before the ‘Dédicace’; like all other characters in the book, he only has a first name, like Daniele, Germain, Guy, Julien, Juliette...). This fair attempt to start blurring boundaries between sex, gender, and sexuality is another interesting feature of Transports amoureux, and Elisabeth Herrgott further develops this in her other books.

Biography

Elisabeth Herrgott, who mainly works as a journalist, has published several books of erotic literature as well as the semi-autobiographic Mes hiérodoules (2000). That latter book caused an unexpected, dubious, and widely publicized scandal that started in the provincial town of Dole (in the Jura region of France) when local doctors identified a local colleague of theirs as the inspiration for one of the key female characters of the book (a bisexual woman keenly into sado-masochism). They successfully had that highly respected pediatrician suspended for three months, arguing in court that she had failed to follow principles of morality and ethics in her private life. Elisabeth Herrgott narrated that scandal in Les Sorcières du Val d'Amour (2003), which made erotic literature enter the public debate in France.

LOYKIE LOÏC LOMINÉ

Selected Works

Le gynécée. 1989.
Lettres d'amour. 1991.
Le dieu et l'amant déchu. 1992.
Transports amoureux. 1994.
L'Amant de la vierge Marie. 1996.
Mes hiérodoules. 2000.

---

HERVÉ, GÉRALD

---

1928–1998

French novelist and philosopher

Questioning

The question of the masculine Eros runs through Gérard Hervé's novels and philosophical works. In 1956, he described it as "the great and naturally free male principle. Sex. Erect sex. And sperm spurting out in the sun because it is necessary to man." But unlike those in the 1950's who fictionalized homosexuality, Gérard Hervé's Dionysian imagery is the result of constant philosophical questioning. Therefore, this underrated work may be considered as the first where homosexuality "and as an indirect consequence homophobia" are not "doubly secondary problems" (P. Zaoui, "Philosophie" in Dictionnaire de l'homophobie, Paris: PUF, 2003). The 1956 quote comes from a text written one year after his expulsion from the Navy for homosexuality. At its source is homophobic violence against what we cannot deny, our being. This leads to the necessity of exceeding the ontological rupture by returning to the source of the repression and to confront one's homosexuality in its singularity. The author completed Orphée interdit in 1960. This essay on homosexual phenomenology is not a treaty for eroticism or a hedonistic plea. Some of the theses which are defended in it do lead to homoeroticism which, at the opposite extreme from the theory of androgyny turn the union of the similar into the only way out for the incompleteness of the otherness of the sexes approached from the angle of dominant relationships. The homosexual relationship tends towards psychophysical fusion. Moreover, this essay denounces the neurosis of civilization by installing a complete break between antiquity and Christianity responsible for mad Eros (in the Nietzsche sense). It is not the intention of the author to promote any kind of Greek golden age but is thinking of a way of being a full being before the alienating dualism. He therefore reveals homo-sensual forms of collective sublimation such as the Church or the Army. These erotico-ethical totalities produce some of the most significant characters in novels. The concept of heresy as a necessary product of repressive orthodoxy occupies a central role in it. By indicating and exceeding the world of fault, the homosexual writer is a heretic who proffers truths which are impossible to say or intolerable. The free creation evokes this absolutely free Eros.

Fictionalizing

The drama of 1955 produced the autobiographical statement, which was published in 1971. The transposition of the real begins lately, via several novels that highlight complex characters and situations. In an episode of Hérésies imaginaires, the author uses a double metaphor, that of a mutilated soldier of the first world war who yells for having been deprived of his “torch.” But Gérard Hervé accords a significant role to the joyful body. We may be tempted to oppose the world of infantile sexuality with that of adults. Faced with their eroticism often covered by pretexts that may not even be able to be decided, adolescent sexuality is lived through figures in games and rituals, in the happy transgression of that which is forbidden, this obstacle that provides an image to desire, which suggests a happy Eros as opposed to the incomplete, frustrated adult Eros. The friendship between Bernard and Philippe in Le soldat nu is accomplished through physical love but ends in a sudden break-up; the carefree and happy pederasty of J. Lambègue in Les feux d’Orion is threatened; the coitus of Romain Saint-Sulpice and the young Gildas is the peak of eroticism but as the subject of blackmail in an ecclesiastical pedophile scandal in which he becomes indirectly involved, the adult commits suicide. The tragic or disappointing outcomes suggest the curse hanging over male homosexuality. However, we should not look on this as a simple transposition of the drama of 1955. Eros is polymorphic. More than a dichotomy between happy fictional love and unhappy real love, the erotic experiences are indicated by intensity and abnormality. They cannot be the subject of any normative discourse: “In terms of sex, the mere Montmartre fraud knows more than esteemed university professors,” he wrote in 1999. The author defines perversity as the meaning of hidden correspondences. On several occasions he recounts the relationship of two men with one woman. This is a figure of a significant relationship of this perversity, which reveals the transversality of homosexual desire. The most heretical of all the figures illustrates the crucial aspect of the theory of homosexuality that was formulated in 1960 as ontological incest: the actions of the father Cham on his son Bohor in Les hérésies imaginaires.

Moreover, this novel shows itself to be extraordinarily rich and original in the way it tells of love between children, which takes place away from the eyes of adults. The eroticism which is revealed in the first part culminates in episodes which highlight figures of uninhibited and non-narcissistic adolescent sexuality: homosexual cruising, mutual masturbation, discovery of the erect phallus, heterosexual deflowering, erotic purifications, anal eroticism, substitution of sexual possession by body to body contact or rectal injection. Real and realized fantasy fill up this universe where fear and attraction, pleasure and pain indicate paradoxical forms of erotic intensity: terror caused by ithyphallic beings, fear of castration, ejaculation following flagellation. This freedom culminates in nudity in front of a group of children or adults. The male nudes in the work translate the necessary link, which is also nostalgic love for a lost unity, of beauty and truth. Its end is therefore less sexual pleasure as the search for joy by reconciliation in the eyes of others.

Genital coitus constitutes above all a polymorphic, even queer figure of sexuality or an initiatory cerebra-sensorial experience mode, thus, the magnificent deflowering scene between Cyril and Barbara in les Hérésies imaginaires. But anal coitus is the subject of the strongest narrations. The last novel, Les aventures de Romain Saint-Sulpice, dedicated to the under-20s, combines the excremental vision, in the Norman Brown sense, with didactic proselytizing in favor of sodomy. Only this coitus, which is slow and tender, leads to the full accomplishment of male desire. Romain leads about sexual completeness through heterosexual sodomy, then with a boy. This love is perfect but tragic and ephemeral. The comment that Gérard Hervé made to Alberto Moravia, that sex is the key to his work, also applies to his own.

Biography

Gérald Hervé was born in Marseilles, France, December 13, 1928. He studied law and political science in Paris, was awarded a post as Navy officer and initially drafted near to Saigon in September 1954. In May 1955, the victim of an anti-homosexual purge, he spent two months in jail and was dismissed from the Army. He worked in Paris in insurance until he moved to Perros-Guirec (Brittany) in 1971 to teach economic sciences. In 1993, he retired to Nice. He died in Miami, USA, June 06, 1998, from injuries caused in a motorboat accident in Paradise Island (Nassau, Bahamas).

HERVÉ BAUDRY

See also Gay (Male) Writing; Pedophilia/Pederasty; Philosophy and Eroticism in Literature; Psychoanalysis; Queer Theory; Religion and Sex; Sodomy

Selected Works

- Kerruel, Yves. des Pavois et des fers. Paris: Julliard, 1971.
 ———, Le soldat nu. Paris: Julliard, 1974.
Les Hérésies imaginaires. Lausanne: L'Âge d'Homme, 1989.
La nuit des Olympica. Essai sur le national-cartésianisme, Paris: L'Harmattan, vol. 3 et 4, 1999.

- Les feux d'Orion*. Soignies: Talus d'approche, 2003.
Les aventures de Romain Saint-Sulpice. Soignies: Talus d'approche, 2003.
Orphée interdit. Preceded by Le Paradis perdu by Pierre Loti (essay) and Le Jeune Homme et le soleil ou les hérésies imaginaires (short story). Soignies: Talus d'approche, 2004.

Further Reading

- Hervé Baudry. "Fin d'empire et mac-carthysme sexuel : Des Pavois et des fers (1971) by Yves Kerruel or la chronique d'un drame en Indochine après les accords de Genève" (ASCALF Annual Conference, London, 2001), Amsterdam : Homodok, 2002 (dactylogr.).
 "Hervé, Gérard" in Companion to Modern French Thought, (ed. Chris Murray), New York: Fitzroy Dearborn, 2004.
 "Hétérosexualités queer dans l'œuvre romanesque de Gérard Hervé," in Masculinités queer, ed. Lawrence Schehr, Amsterdam: Rodopi, 2005.
 "Les Aventures de Romain Saint-Sulpice de Gérard Hervé: ballets bleus et tragédie amoureuse" in Amour, passion, volupté, tragédie : le sentiment amoureux dans la littérature française du Moyen Age au XXI<sup>e</sup> siècle, ed. Annye Castonguay and Jean-François Kosta-Thiefaine éd., Anglet: Atlantica-Séguier, 2005.

---

HISTOIRE D'I

---

This novella was published in 1974, in the climate of intellectual freedom that followed the "events" of 1968, a time of onslaught against literary conventions and sexual stereotypes. It employs a gender twist to parody formulaic models.

Published the same year as Belen (alias Nelly Kaplan)'s Mémoires d'une liseuse de draps [Memoirs of a Sheet Reader], Histoire d'I is equally literate and shares its basic strategies of reversal, but limits itself to a straightforward caricature. Beyond the title's obvious reference, the story line takes up specific episodes of Histoire d'O (1954) and constructs I as O's male counterpart, while relentlessly deflating the programmatic verticality of his name through a systematic inversion of male and female stereotypical positionings. Everything is described from the point of view of I's consciousness, but the author's signature, with its telluric connotations, is that of Gaëtane, the protagonist's tormentor, a fact that underscores her absolute agency, thus diverting the erotic significance of the female signature in pornography.

I, an innocuous, conceited playboy, is picked up by a stunning beauty in a café and becomes her passive prey. Gaëtane takes him to her own car where she initiates some foreplay, and then to her house, a setting where all the slaves are male and whose baroque trompe l'œil will be the stage of I's voyage into loving self-immolation, and physical and mental torture. At once comical, violent, and nauseating, Gaëtane's parody does not spare any aspect of high and low erotic literature. Gaëtane, the dominatrix, is both ultra-feminine and virilized, curvaceous but bristling with a panoply of sharp appendages, starting with her clitoris and her breasts “beautiful like iron and ice.” Her monstrous cohort of women, who enthusiastically assist her in I’s tormenting, embody menacing fantasies of the feminine: dentate or gaping vaginas, mountains of flesh and spiked heels that crush or pierce I’s flesh, in short, engulfing and castrating sexuality.

Betrayed by the intensity of his desire, I fails to satisfy Gaëtane during their first sexual encounter. This introduces the motif of punishment. I understands that he deserves the whipping that Gaëtane instantly administers—not, as in the case of O, for some obscure flaw inscribed in nature—but because, as a man, he has “lost face and made a fool of himself.” Nevertheless, the effect is the same: “The punishment did him good, absolved and purified him.” I soon realizes that his total submission will take him “beyond the limit” (Bataille) and, like O with Sir Stephen, he accepts the prospect of dying for Gaëtane’s sake. Like O, he is put on a leash and, unlike her, made to sleep on a litter; he has to wear high cothurni and must leave his “genital clutter” uncovered and available at all times; and he gratefully suffers Gaëtane’s voyeurism of his worst tortures. In a twofold replica of O’s labia pierced and chained and her buttocks branded with Sir Stephen’s initials, he undergoes circumcision and Gaëtane embroiders her name on his breast, making sure not to forget the two dots on the ‘e’. The accumulation of concrete minutiae in this episode points to a mise en abyme, from Pauline Réage to Barthes and then to Sade. In Sade, Fourier, Loyola, published in 1971, Barthes commented on the detail of he “red thread” with which the daughter sews the mother’s vagina in Philosophy in the Bedroom. The parody devises all sorts of niceties in Gaëtane’s needlework, thus embroidering on Barthes’s clever association of écriture with sewing (“the sure way to horror is metonymy: the tool is more terrible than the torture”).

Direct references to Sade are the roasting of a young boy (an allusion to the roasting of Juliette’s daughter in The Story of Juliette), followed by the consumption of his penis by the “ogresses”; and the banquet scene, during which some of the slaves are temporarily transfixed into contorted poses thanks to an injection and have their organs turned into candlesticks and inserted with candles (a function provided by women’s vaginas in Sade’s novel).

Constantly raped and sodomized by hideous women, when not forced to participate in sodomic “trains” with other slaves, I can achieve an erection only through repeated whippings and finally becomes unusable. After failing to attract any buyer during the slave market which provides an outlet for Gaëtane’s discarded slaves, he is free to return to the outside world, but feels incapable of renouncing his voluntary servitude. He awaits death, but his punishment will be worse than death: Gaëtane forces him to witness her sexual embrace with another woman: “A woman’s pleasure (jouissance) with another woman cannot, must not be told. It would burst the world open and would reduce it to powder. The two women did not even bother to cut I’s tail. But ... he knew full well that his organ was useless. They did not even look at him. I left with his tail between his legs, as ashamed as a fox ensnared by a hen.” (the latter simile a direct quote from La Fontaine’s fable “The Fox and the Stork”). With this final burst of laughter, little is left of O’s pathetic consent to her own death.

No doubt, beyond the male slant of the porno-/erotic genre, Gaëtane’s target is the complacent earnestness that characterized its higher forms even when they were not devoid of humor, as in Klossowski, Bataille, Barthes, and their followers, all harking back to Sade. But Histoire d’I at times could pass for “the real thing,” in its few lyrical passages and with its medley of ludicrous postures and curvilinear settings—an excellent pastiche of the burlesque vein that runs from the Ancients through Sade to the present. There remains the question of the effectiveness of such a parody, whether in terms of its erotic value or as a feminist satire, or merely as a joke. To this reader at least, the latter are far more potent than the first, an opinion that still leaves open the question of Histoire d’I’s readership (and authorship).

LUCIENNE FRAPPIER-MAZUR

Editions

Histoire d’I. Paris: Filipachi, 1974, 89 p.; 2nd edition Paris: Éd. Blanche, 2001.

---

HOUELLEBECQ, MICHEL

---

1958–

French novelist and poet

Les particules élémentaires

Michel Houellebecq's Les particules élémentaires proved to be one of the most controversial French novels of the 1990s. The storm this book provoked was rapidly christened the "Houellebecq Affair," and was largely the result of three elements: the novel's highly charged sexuality coupled with its deep-seated pessimism concerning contemporary Western society, and the author's penchant for the outrageous interview statement. In a conversation with a reporter from the distinguished French newspaper, Le Monde, Houellebecq once expressed his admiration for Stalin because "he killed lots of anarchists" (Van Reuterghen). With comments such as this, along with his apparent distrust of France's immigrant population, Houellebecq fueled the arguments surrounding his novel, and in doing so, positioned himself as a latter-day Céline.

Les particules élémentaires is the story of two half-brothers who try to come to terms with their lives in contemporary, post-May '68 France. They were both in their early teens in 1968, and thus were not active in the strikes and demonstrations during the spring of that year. Yet each in his own way must experience what the novel portrays as the dire consequences of the break with tradition and a new, uncontrolled liberalism.

As the novel begins the brothers are facing their early forties. Michel is a biologist utterly lacking in affect, yet a brilliant researcher. Part of the disturbing effect Michel's theories have on readers comes from the apparent verisimilitude of the description of his scientific activities. This is largely due to Houellebecq's own scientific background and knowledge. Before becoming a writer, he trained as an agronomist and received a diploma in that discipline in 1980. Michel's half-brother, Bruno, is a hedonistic high school literature teacher who tries to find solace, if not meaning, in unbridled sexuality. Their mother, Janine, who later Americanizes her name to Jane after a period in a California hippy community, is a trained physician who becomes a counter-culture fanatic; over the course of the novel she experiments with an impressive number of alternative religions, life styles, and men. Just before her death she converts to Islam, much to Bruno's chagrin.

Bruno is the sexual center of the novel. Obsessed with women, particularly young ones, and by the smallness of his phallus, he turns out to be, in an age of putative sexual liberation, a spectacularly unsuccessful seducer. He winds up mostly paying for the sexual release he so desperately seeks. However, his erotic misadventures take place against the background of the new sexual permissiveness in post-May '68 France. He visits Paris's sex clubs, participates with indifferent results in the sex parties, les partouzes, springing up all over France, and fails as a husband and father. Bruno's fixation with all things sexual eventually costs him his job, when he is removed from the school where he works for making advances to a teenage Arab girl. Another nasty offshoot of Bruno's frenzied pursuit of sexual release is his burgeoning racism. His contempt for young African males stems from his conviction that their penises are larger than his own.

Bruno's luck changes briefly when he spends time at the Espace du possible [the Space of the Possible]. This is a New Age vacation spot run by former and would-be hippies who shrewdly exploit the younger generation's (forty and below) desire for casual sex coupled with self-help seminars; this is a place where a "sensitive gestaltmassage" can be followed by fellatio. At the Espace du Possible a chance encounter changes Bruno's life. He meets Christiane, a woman in her early forties, with whom he has sex and discovers love. Together they plunge into a world of sexual licence, the clubs, les partouzes, etc., but this time Bruno mostly enjoys himself. For the first time he is relatively at ease with his life and his world. Unfortunately, his happiness is short-lived. Christiane falls victim of a non-sexually transmitted disease and dies painfully. Bruno's only recourse is to check himself into a mental institution.

Unlike his brother, Michel has practically no libido. He is all intellect; his sexual experiences are scant, and occur with little pleasure and less emotion. Yet Michel is a very successful biologist who has done distinguished research on cloning. As a youth he was a very close friend to a beautiful girl named Annabelle, but this adolescent romance went nowhere. At forty Michel takes a sabbatical leave from his research institution, and during this period he meets Annabelle again. They try being together, but the effort is a failure. Annabelle's effort to have a child with Michel results only in the discovery that she has ovarian cancer. When the cancer metastasizes, she commits suicide. Michel then takes leave from his research facility, and accepts a position in Ireland where he continues his work on cloning. It is in this setting that he will also take his life, but not before developing theories that will lead to the creation of a new race that will be asexual and immortal. When the novel ends in 2029 this new breed has largely replaced the older, human model.

Houellebecq uses sex in Les Particules élémentaires as a metaphor for all that is wrong in post-May '68 France and, by extension, the Western world. Unbridled sexual licence signals the collapse of traditional moral values, while it remains at the same time the only source of pleasure, and the sole means of briefly escaping life's total meaninglessness. Bruno's activities represent the pathetic attempt to be part of this new age, while Michel's scientific activities constitute an effort to curtail the era's horrors. One brother struggles to accept the contemporary world, while the other labors to reject it. Yet in the end they both fall victim to a world wherein they can find no place for themselves.

Biography

Born in 1958 on the island of the Reunion. He published his first book, a biography of H.P. Lovecraft in 1991. He has written essays, poetry, and novels. He received the Tristan Tzara Prize for his first collection of poetry, La poursuite du bonheur (1992), the Flore Prize for his second collection, Le sens du combat (1996), and the November Prize for his second novel, Les Particules élémentaires (1998). Houellebecq has his own website,

WILLIAM CLOONAN

Editions

Les Particules élémentaires. Paris: Flammarion, 1998; as The Elementary Particles, translated by Frank Wynne. New York: Knopf, 2000.

Selected Works

Extension du domaine de la lutte. 1991.
Rester vivant. 1997.
Interventions. 1998.
Renaissance. 1999.
Lanzarote. 1999.
Plateforme. 2001.

Further Reading

Badré, Frédéric. "La nouvelle tendance en littérature," Le Monde (3 October 1998): 14.
Noguez, Dominique. "La Rage de ne pas lire." Le Monde (29 October 1998): 1.
Tillinac, Denis, editor. Atelier du Roman (June 1999): 17–82 (Pages devoted to Les Particules élémentaires).

---

HUANG

---

1316–1368
Chinese writer

The Records of Green Bowers.

In Chinese Qinglouji, variously translated Green Lofts Collection (W. Idema), Green Mansions (Chung-wen Shi) or Green Bower Collection, “bower” in the singular being a literary reference to the entertainments bureau at the time of the Mongol empire. Besides, the “seventy” is in fact the round number of entries telling the biographies of many more people, a hundred and twenty female entertainers, and some thirty males introduced as their relatives. What are recounted are their activities as dancers, singers, poetesses, or comedians rather than as courtesans of unforgettable beauty. The avowed ugliness of some of them is redeemed by their gifts. Concise and matter-of-fact, the biographies range from thirty to three hundred words. According to the author’s statement in his preface, the stories originate from both second-hand sources of questionable reliability and from first-hand, personal experiences.

A source-book for the early history of Chinese theater

The major value of the work is as a source-book for the early history of Chinese operatic drama. Fortunately, it has been preserved in more than half a dozen collections, in various, incomplete states, the best available text being the one included by Yze Dejun (1864–1927) in his Shuangmei jing’an congshu, first published in 1903. Newer modern editions are based on it, completing and annotating it critically, mainly through the discovery of a unique manuscript, from a probable second edition prepared by the author himself after 1366.

A public service

“The brief biographies of the Qing-lou-chi show how varied the careers of those girls were, they mirror the confused and uncertain times. Some singing-girls were bought as concubines by wealthy men, then left them to join a private theatrical troupe owned by another man, and finally married their master or drifted back to their original profession. Others became Taoist nuns and roamed all over the larger cities of the Empire, earning their living now as actresses, then as prostitutes, to end in misery or in a harem of a Chinese or Mongol official. We also read about male actors, a lowly profession that was badly paid; their wives and daughters often had to earn extra-money as prostitutes.” These limited images translated by Robert van Gulik may represent the whole picture.

In Mongol times (1276–1368), entertainments were a public service provided by the state not only to the court but also to officials and occasionally to affluent merchants. There was no clear dividing line between sexual or artistic services. Brothels of lower status were private enterprises not taken into account in the celebrity ranks. Indeed, though admired, entertainers belonged to a despised social stratum, maintained in a servile status through heredity or penalty. Nevertheless, their attractiveness tended to deplete their numbers, as the powerful tried to take hold of their persons. Repeated biographies insisted on the prohibition of inter-marriage with “good people,” albeit unsuccessfully. Take as example the case of Gu Shanshan:

“As she was the fourth child, she was called ‘Miss Ku Number Four.’ Though from a good family, she lost her status because of her father. Gifted and witty, she was an unrivalled artist. First married to the musician Li Little Big Man, she became, when her first husband died, a concubine of the district magistrate of Huating, Kharabukha (a probable Mongol name) for thirteen years, before returning to her former status of entertainer. She is now in her sixties, aging in Sung-chiang (Songjiang, a city not very far from present-day Shanghai), but has kept the charm of her youth when performing in dramas the role of flowery female lead. The new generation profits from her guidance and still many are her admirers.”

A Multifaceted Gallery of Portraits Drawn in Sober Style

On the other hand, nothing is said about the charm of “La Petite” Shi, so “good in reciting chantefable (what we call these days ‘small talks, prose interspersed with verses). Her delivery is like a ball running down hills, like water gushing out of a bottle. Her daughter, ‘La Toute Petite,’ was too skilled in tongue twisting. She married the male lead Qing the Bountiful but did not outstrip her mother’s art.”

Yang Mai-nu, “the daughter of Yang the Colt had a beautiful and charming face. Good at singing, an addicted drinker, she was the idol of high officials, dukes and princes. She married later a musician; Kicking devils Chang the Fourth, and died of gloominess. Guan Yunshi (1286–1324) wrote the lines ‘Her hair twisted like a black conch, her skirts trailing like a white belt’ deriding her, probably because she suffered from the ‘white-belt disease’ (leucorrhoea, a form of vaginitis).”

In an unaffected style the author managed to avoid repetitiveness even when dealing with loyal courtesans’ cases, for example that of Truthful Fan: “A famous beauty from the capital. She became the favourite of the Councillor Zhou Zhonghong. When he returned home in the South, she saw him off at the gate of Universal Transformation. ‘After our separation, keep yourself in check and behave so that people won’t scoff at us,’ said Chou. Throwing wine on the ground, she swore: ‘If I am unfaithful to you, I’ll gouge out one eye in repentance!’ Some time later a powerful potentate appeared. Her mother was afraid and tempted by his wealth. The daughter resisted at the beginning but finally gave up. When Chou returned to the capital, she told him: ‘It is not that I did not wish to behave after you left, it’s the pressure of his wealth and power. The oath of former days, how could I have taken it in vain?’ She drew a metal comb and pierced her left eye. Blood gushed out, drenching the ground all around. It was such a shock for Chou that he loved her as much as he used to before. Some amateur made a play out of it, quite successful, under the title An eye pierced with a metal comb.”

Biography

The name Huang comes from a misreading in a preface dated 1364. His identity has been clearly established as Xia Tingshi, born about 1316, a renowned composer of arias. A member of a wealthy and powerful clan famous for its huge collection of books, he was patron to a number of well-known amateurs of stage entertainments. Of his writings, only one thin collection of short biographies is known. He died around 1368.

ANDRÉ LÉVY

Editions

Qinglouji, in Chung-kuo ku-tien his-ch’ü lun-chu ch’eng (Compendium of treatises on classical Chinese theatre). Vol 2, Peking: Chung-kuo his-chü 1959, p. 1–84.

Translations

Waley, Arthur. “The Green Bower Collection” in The Secret History of the Mongols, and other pieces, London 1968, p. 89–107.

References and Further Reading

- Gulik, Robert van. Sexual Life in Ancient China: A Preliminary Survey of Chinese Sex and Society from c. 1500 B.C. till 1644 A.D. Leiden. E.J. Brill 1961, p.252–253.
- Idema, Wilt and Stephen West. The Chinese Theatre 1100–1450, A Source Book, Wiesbaden: Frank Steiner 1982, p.89–107.

---

HUNEKER, JAMES GIBBONS

---

1857–1921

American journalist and novelist

Painted Veils

At the time Painted Veils was published, a draconian censorship regime prevailed in the United States. Works by such established authors as Arthur Schnitzler and D.H. Lawrence were routinely condemned to the incinerator by the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice. The New York publishing firm of Boni and Liveright decided to proceed with prudence, and issued Huneker's novel in a subscription edition of some 1,300 copies for which the author received $1,800. Although the book escaped prosecution, within a short while it had become an underground classic and second-hand copies were trading for as much as eighty dollars. Scholars should be aware that some later editions, including those issued by the book's original publisher, are expurgated versions.

The action is located during an eighteen-month period some time in the late 1890s. The story itself centers on Ester Brandès, a talented but impecunious young woman from Virginia, and the various cultural intermediaries whom she meets when she comes to New York to study music. These include Alfred Stone, a slightly world-weary theater and music critic, who helps her enroll in the Conservatoire Cosmopolitain as a student of Frida Ash; Ulick Ulvern, a restless, Paris-born American writer with considerable prospects; Paul Godard, a millionaire dilettante who tries to seduce her shortly after her arrival in New York; and the various women friends of these men. At the end of the novel, Ester, who has moved on to Berlin to complete her musical training, returns to New York following her triumphant operatic debut.

Although Painted Veils contains little which might be described as erotic, there are a number of intentionally sensational episodes. One of these is the flashback "Holy Yowler" incident that occurs early in the novel during which Ester and Ulick (then unknown to each other) become involved in a drunken orgy organized by a Pentecostal sect. Although at the time Ulick believes he has sexual congress with Esther, it is later revealed that his partner was, in fact, an alcoholic black woman and that Ester had had congress with the itinerant leader of the group. Given the laws of racial segregation in force at the time, this revelation makes the episode even more scandalous than the Black Mass episode in J.-K. Huysmans's Là-bas (1891) which, presumably, provided the original model for the scene. Another celebrated incident also concerns a drunken orgy, this time organized for the benefit of young men-about-town in the studio of a New York painter. Once again, the selection of this episode is prompted by a close reading of Huysmans (the Black Banquet in A Rebours, 1884) though the scene itself is closely modelled on the notorious Pie Girl Dinner (so-called because a sixteen-year-old model emerged from a giant pie) given by millionaire Henry W. Poor in 1895. Huneker had probably been present. But even without these two set pieces, there are many other scandalous admissions in the novel, notably the lesbianism of the heroine. Indeed, it is implied that one consequence of Ester's increasing artistic prowess is a shift in her sexual orientation such that she shows rather more sexual interest in Ulick's various female partners than in Ulick himself.

As a novel, more than eighty years after its initial publication, Painted Veils makes little intellectual sense without an appreciation of the author's long fascination with European culture, his particular interest in music, and the problematic nature of the cultural relationship he had spent a lifetime trying to forge between the New World and the Old World. One theme that is very pronounced in the novel, for example, is that of deracination, a subject much discussed by the French writer Maurice Barrès. Similarly, Huneker would seem to have looked to Nietzsche for a justification of the philandering of his central male character, Ulick Ulvern. Likewise, although one reading of the novel would suggest that Ester Brandès is simply ambitious, opportunistic, and immoral, a more sophisticated view would be that it is only by freeing herself from the normal conventions of her time that she is permitted to attain the highest artistic development. The extent that Huneker was exploring the contradictions of his own life by reference to the individualistic philosophy of Nietzsche is further indicated by the author's identification which Ulick Ulvern whose death, like that of the German philosopher, is ascribed to a sudden syphilis-induced paralytic stroke.

HUNGARIAN

At the very least, Painted Veils is an interesting though flawed attempt by an American writer to create a work of fiction using themes and techniques developed by European modernists and to explore their relevance within this new cultural setting. Paradoxically, given the operatic background of the novel, it is sometimes considered to be the first novel of the Jazz Age.

Biography

Though intended for the law, Huneker devoted much of his adolescence to the study of music and literature. After marrying in 1878, he and his wife spent nine months in Paris before returning to their native Philadelphia. In 1886, this time alone, he decamped to New York, where he worked as a journalist and music teacher. From 1900 to 1917, he wrote for the

New York Sun on art, literature, drama, and music. The various collections of essays and articles he published in book form exhibit his overriding fascination with European culture. These include: Iconoclasts. A Book of Dramatists (1905), which is largely devoted to Scandinavian, French, and German theater; Egoists. A Book of Supermen (1909), which focuses on the writings on Stendhal, Baudelaire, Flaubert, Anatole France, Huysmans, and Nietzsche; and Unicorns (1917), in which Chopin, Wagner, Brahms, George Sand, Cézanne, and others pass under review. In contrast to his critical works, Huneker's prose fiction is often considered labored as well as unduly Continental. The latter include collections of short stories such as Melomaniacs (1902) and Visionaries (1905), both of which deal largely with the musical world, and the 'erotic' novel Painted Veils (1920), which though considered controversial at the time of publication managed to avoid prosecution. Steeplejack (1920) is an autobiographical work.

TERRY HALE

Editions

Painted Veils. New York: Boni and Liveright, 1920.

Further Reading

Arnold T. Schwab. James Gibbons Huneker. Critic of the Seven Arts. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1963.

---

HUNGARIAN

---

Erotic literature is defined here as a genre with three progressively explicit types of text: the erotic, the sexual, and the pornographic imaginary in its linguistic expressions and versions; progressively explicit is understood as the representations of the erotic imaginary from the implicit (i.e., erotic) to the more explicit (i.e., sexual) to the most explicit (i.e., pornographic) in content and form. Erotic literature is thus employed as an umbrella term and is understood by the levels of linguistic explicitness of the imaginary from the erotic to the sexual to the pornographic.

Similar to other Central and East European literatures (e.g., Czech, Slovak, Slovene, Romanian, Croatian, etc.), erotic literature in Hungarian is scarce in all periods of literary history. As a result of the scarcity of the genre, there is limited scholarship available on the topic beyond a few articles and László Kemenes Géfin and Jolanta Jastrzobka's Erotika a huszadik századi magyar regényben, 1911–1947 (Erotica in the Hungarian Novel of the Twentieth Century, 1911–1947) (1998).

Explicit erotic, sexual, and pornographic imagery and language exist aplenty in Hungarian oral literature, common in the countryside where wedding songs in particular have been and still are today heavily erotic to pornographic. Here is an example from a suitor's song: "Kérem, alázatosan,/ Eresszen be, kisasszony,/ Ha igazán nem baszom,/ Törjék bele faszom"/ "I beg you most humbly,/ give me leave to enter, young miss,/ if I don't fuck you real well,/ my cock should break off in the effort" or in a song of unmarried men to the bride: "Kelj fel menyasszony/ Itt a volegény,/ Tapogasd meg a faszát,/ Hogy milyen kemény!" / "Get up bride,/ here comes the groom,/ feel his cock,/ how hard it is") (qtd. in Vasvári at <<http://clwebjournal.lib.purdue.edu/clweb99-4/vasvari99.html>>). Also, pornographic language and imagery occurs in many folk tales passed down orally.

The situation is markedly different in written literature, canonical or popular. From the seventeenth to the mid-nineteenth centuries there are only few texts with any erotic content: examples include Mihály Csokonai Vitéz (1773–1805), whose Lilla songs and the comic epic Dorottya contain erotic symbolism; or Pál Németi (eighteenth century) whose poetry is infused with erotic tones. After the birth of the novel in Hungarian literature with the mid-nineteenth century, eroticism appears in prose but only implicitly as authorial instigation for the reader to imagine the sexual situation and in almost all cases a consummation of sexual desire is described as exemplification of the consequences of sexual repression, as a punishment for transgressions of social codes, usually by the woman. Examples of this genre of erotic literature include texts—poetry and prose—in the work of canonical authors such as Zsigmond Justh (1863–1894), Zsigmond Móricz (1879–1942), Margit Kaffka (1880–1918), Gyula Krúdy (1878–1933), Józsi Jenő Tersánszky (1888–1969); Mihály Babits (1883–1941), Dezső Kosztolányi (1885–1936), Géza Csáth (1887–1919), Zsolt Harsányi (1887–1943), Mihály Földi (1894–1943), Béla Révész (1876–1944), Erno Szép (1884–1953), and Sándor Márai (1900–1989).

An exception to the status quo is the prose of Renée Erdős (1879–1956) who published a number of novels with explicit descriptions of sexuality such as in A nagy sikoly (The Great Moan) (1923), a novel about sexual repression similar to the novels of canonical authors mentioned previously but here it is the female voice that is given prevalence, often women of the gentry in widowhood after World War I. Another exception is the verse of Árpád Löwy (pseudonym of László Réthy, 1851–1914) whose sexual and pornographic poetry remained unpublished during his life, though it was distributed in hand-written copies or orally. A few years after his death, in 1919, a private edition of his texts appeared in print while the next publication of his texts occurred, again in a private edition, in Germany in 1983, edited anonymously by "J.H.J." His verse is arguably of interest because it is with humor and irony about social matters including the pillorying of pretension and repressive social codes and mores of the time and expressed in pornographic language and imagery (including scatology and blasphemy, the latter a characteristic of Hungarian colloquial language). Rumor has it that János Arany (1817–1882), one of Hungary's most revered national writers, compiled a secret collection of pornographic verse. It is said that a relative of the author guarded the text that was then destroyed during the bombing of Budapest in World War II. Also, Arany's epic Toldi, a verse trilogy published 1847–1854, has an anonymously published short version of pornographic and scatological verse narration, at times attributed to Arany himself. Here is an example from this pornographic version from the epic: "Egy csak egy legény van, aki nem hág: Toldi, / Pedig rofös faszát talicskán kell tolni. / Legénytoll sem fedi bár hatalmas pöcsét, / Egyensúlyoz rajta három tonna rozsét. / Vele o az ipart csak en-gross-ban <zi, / Farkára a noket hármassával f<zi; / Egy krónikás mondta, aki mindent látott, / Jókedvében egyszer hét megyét meghágot" / [There's only one guy who doesn't fuck now: Toldi, / Though it takes a wheel-barrow for his dick to carry. / His huge prick youthful without pubic hair yet, / He balances on his dick three loads of wood on a bet. / With this prick he does business en-gross exclusively, / And so Toldi fucks women by the three exemplarily; / A chronicler who saw it all reported, / In a good mood Toldi once summarily in all seven provinces fucked] (my translation). What has made the text offensive in Hungarian culture in the opinion of the general reading public as well as with scholars and intellectuals is not only the pornographic language and imagery of the text but the fact that the pornographic version ridicules a national and canonical epic much revered then and now.

Further examples of erotic-pornographic poetry include verse by Ádám Valagh (alias of the literary historian and translator Tibor Szilágyi, “valag” is arse in Hungarian) published during World War II or Zoltán Somlyó (1882–1937) with his “Milléva” series published in Transylvanian Romania in 1926. In prose, of some interest are the texts published by the critic, writer, and poet Pál Ignóty (pseudonym of Hugó Veigelsberg, 1869–1949) who under the pseudonym “Emma”—it is of much discussion why he chose a female persona—published between 1893 and 1906 fictitious letters about the situation and daily life of women, embracing a feminist point of view including the right of women to eroticism and the enjoyment of sexuality. Other rare texts of sexual and pornographic contents include Tivadar Zichy’s (1908–1945) novel Orgia Rt. [Orgy Inc.] and of particular note is Attila József’s (1905–1937) recently published Szabad ötletek jegyzéke [Notebook of Unbound Ideas] (1991), a text categorized today as auto-psychoanalysis about the dreams and imaginings of one of Hungary’s most prominent poets of modernity. In his text, József describes, among others, in sexual and pornographic language his imaginary relationship with his mother. The canonized writer Józsi Jenő Tersánszky (1888–1969), listed above, wrote a pornographic short novel that remains unpublished in a literary museum, the Petőfi Irodalmi Múzeum, in Budapest.

While translations of French or other Western erotic literature are extremely rare to nonexistent until recently, of interest is the free translation of François Villon’s ballads by György Faludy (1913–), Villon balladái (1937), a masterful rendition of the original with explicit sexual language and imagery. Faludy also translated erotic poetry of canonical authors such as Verlaine, Baudelaire, and Rimbaud.

In contemporary Hungarian literature, it is in exile literature where the first text of prose with pornographic content and language was written and published: László Kemenes Géfin’s

Fehérlófia nyolcása. Hardcore szerelem cirkusz [The Eight Circles of the White Stag: Hardcore Circus of Love] (1978–1981; 1995). Although not paid virtually any attention to in Hungarian scholarship, the novels of Kemenes Géfin represent the first postmodern text of Hungarian literature, not the least because of the novels’ daring irony about Hungarian patriotism and history, presented in a sexual and pornographic context and language. While Kemenes Géfin’s novels are still today, in the context of post-1989 Hungarian culture and literature, innovative and worthy of serious study, his sexual and pornographic writing is from a strongly patriarchal point of view; and so is his and Jolanta Jastrzębska’s study, Erotika a huszadik századi magyar regényben, 1911–1947 (Erotica in the Hungarian Novel of the Twentieth Century, 1911–1947) (1998). Here is an example of Kemenes Géfin’s sexual and pornographic writing:

“He finally took his clothes off, kicked his shoes off, and told me to stand up and that I must take that goddam pantyhose off. I too took my shoes off now and quickly rolled down the offensive stockings although I put them on especially for him, they were of a nice smoky color, and now I should be glad that he did not rip them off. I wanted to crouch down in front of him, I had only the blouse left on me, it had a décolletage that my tits spilled almost out of them. But he was uninterested in this daring pose and I suddenly felt lost. He then said that he wants me to stand in front of him, so I did, my Venus just in front of his face, weak in my knees. He embraced my hips, took my ass into his hands and burrowed into my groin. I felt his tongue inside me, he was slurping, his tongue was in my cunt and for minutes I lost time, I don’t know what he was doing, and felt his finger, too, in my cunt, with another one caressing my anus, and I returned to time and place when I heard his voice telling me that one does not have the chance to lick such a nice and clean cunt everyday. Then he took my clitoris into his mouth and all presence left me, if he hadn’t been holding me I would have crumpled to the floor. The next I remembered I was on the bed, he was bending my legs backward, licking me, digging his tongue into my cunt, sucking my juices out, then sucking on my anus, licking it and I realized that I was making noises, babbling and sighing with short shrieks. I never experienced such pleasure. Then something burning hot and enormous began and swept through me” (1995, 62–63).

After the dissolution of the Soviet empire in 1989–1990, in Hungary, similar to all other countries of communist regime, erotic literature began to be published en masse. In canonical prose, the two most prominent examples are the novels of Péter Nádas (1942–), especially his novel Emlékiratok könyve (abridged and censored 1986, unabridged 1998) [A Book of Memories, trans. Ivan Sanders and Imre Goldstein, 1997] and Égi és földi szerelemről [Of Heavenly and Earthly Love] (1991), a collection of essays about sexuality and language and Péter Esterházy (1950–), whose novel Egy nő (1995) [She Loves Me, trans. Judith Sollosy, 1997] is unremarkable although his daring of pornographic descriptions of the loves and affairs of a fictitious alter ego—similar to the work of Kemeses Géfin in a strongly patriarchal and male chauvinistic voice—nevertheless represent innovation in Hungarian literature. Here is an excerpt from Esterházy's novel:

“A Woman (64). I saw her breasts from the side, they bounced and moved about, jumped elasticized; happy breasts, this is how they can be summarized. ... I saw her ass, too, when she walked, consequently from afar, moving away, bum, ass, I don't know what to call it. Apart from all these I would like yet to see her hair in my life, her ears (cleanliness and control), her neck (from the front, I saw it fleetingly when she, excited, swallowed something, and something moved there as if she had an Adam's apple), I would like to see her collar bone, her ribs, her shoulder blades (like stumps of wings), altogether her bones, from her skull to her toes' middle bones, I would like to see her stomach, the youthful rolls of fat, altogether all her fat, her belly button, and all her holes, the hair under her belly, and altogether all her hair. I don't want to see anything else, that's what I keep my eyes for. She squeezes the champagne bottle between her legs, that's how she opens it. It's as if it were her penis. I will have to pay for this, says one of us as the champagne overflows. It's more from the champagne than from the joke that I suddenly remember: and I would like to see her cunt, face to eye” (124, my translation).

In the visual arts of Hungary, similar to literature, there is very little erotic material and virtually none exists when it comes to sexual and pornographic art (there was no impact in Hungary of the highly erotic and sexual visual arts of the Viennese art nouveau of such as Klimt or Schiele). However, of international renown are the erotic and in some instances pornographic drawings of Mihály Zichy (1827–1906), a prominent representative of romantic painting, illustrator, and portraitist. In accordance with the general sensitivity about the sexual and the pornographic with regard to national symbols and texts altogether and with regard to literature, in contemporary Hungary sexual and pornographic depictions are rare as in previous periods. An example of the contemporary situation is the following: a serious offence with legal implications was the depiction of the post-1989 reinstalled official coat-of-arms of Hungary, with two angels on each side of the escutcheon where an artist in opposition to the decision to reinstate pre-war religious symbolism, depicted the two angels masturbating. The intention of the artist was, indeed, to ridicule religious and historical symbolism albeit the humor of the alternate depiction was in whole not accepted by the general public and the picture was understood as desecration and only after a lengthy trial was the artist acquitted.

As introduced above, it is in the years after the end of the communist regime and Soviet colonialism in 1989 when an increase of productivity in Hungarian erotic literature occurred. In addition to the examples presented above, the publishing enterprise Nappali Ház invited in 1998 prominent authors such as Péter Esterházy, Lajos Parti-Nagy, Zsuzsa Forgács, and Ildikó Szabó (the film director of renown), to write short stories where a sexual act is described. Parallel to such publications, it has become accepted that young poets in particular publish verse in eroticized to pornographic language (e.g., János Dénes Orbán, Attila Sántha, Endre Wellmann). Akin to the practice of authors in contemporary literature elsewhere, there are examples of canonical writers who write unpublished texts such as diaries with much pornographic material as is the case with one of contemporary Hungary's prominent poets, Endre Kukorelly (1951–), who lists and describes his amorous adventures and escapades in his diaries in much detail. Further examples of contemporary texts with erotic-pornographic content include the poetry of László Lator (1927–) or Tibor Papp's “Kurvák Ilosfalván” (“Whores in Ilosfalva”), a short story in the style of stream of consciousness about amorous adventures with pornographic detail, published in the literary journal Az Irodalom Visszavág (1999).

Overall, the significance of the increased production of erotic culture rests on the fact that the genre of the erotic text thus attains legitimacy in Hungarian culture and literature. Of note is that homoerotic writing, gay or lesbian, is virtually nonexistent in Hungarian. Since the mid-1990s, in Hungary as elsewhere, there has been productivity of erotica in both text and visuals in new media on the World Wide Web and there are signs that in Hungary, too, it may be in new media where writers experiment with erotic and pornographic writing.

HUYSMANS, JORIS-KARL

STEVEN TOTOSY DE ZEPETNEK

Further Reading

Kemenes Géfin, László, and Jolanta Jastrzobska. Erotika a huszadik századi magyar regényben, 1911–1947

[Erotica in the Hungarian Novel of the Twentieth Century, 1911–1947]. Budapest: Kortárs, 1998.

Lukacs, John. Budapest 1900: A Historical Portrait of a City and Its Culture. New York: Grove Weidenfeld, 1988.

Totosy de Zepetnek, Steven. Comparative Literature: Theory, Method, Application. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1998.

Vasvári, Louise O. “A Comparative Approach to European Folk Poetry and the Erotic Wedding Motif.” CLCWeb: Comparative Literature and Culture 1.4 (1999): <<http://clcwebjournal.lib.purdue.edu/clcweb99-4/vasvari99.html>>.

---

HUYSMANS, JORIS-KARL

---

1848–1907

French novelist

Marthe: histoire d'une fille

Huysmans completed the draft of Marthe, drawing on his experiences in 1867–1870 with a minor actress at the Bobino theater, in 1876; out of fear of censorship but also to anticipate Edmond de Goncourt's novel about a prostitute, La fille Elisa (1877), he traveled to Brussels to have it published there in 1876; almost all the copies were seized at the French border. After establishing himself in the group of Naturalist writers with Les Sœurs Vatarde and some polemical art criticism, Huysmans was able to have a second edition of Marthe published in Paris in 1879, the same year as Zola's Nana. It met with little immediate critical and generally hostile response (one critic viewed it as an “obscene publication”) and little success.

The prostitute was to preoccupy Naturalist writers with her complex linkage of sexuality with power, class, and money. Huysmans's provocative choice of subject for a first novel—the subtitle refers to the heroine bluntly as “a whore”—on a blatant contemporary social phenomenon represents the first attempt in French to break both with the Romantic stereotype of the prostitute redeemed through love (La dame aux camélias of Alexandre Dumas fils) and with heroic and self-sacrificing figures like Fantine in Les Misérables, and to give an unsentimental portrayal of the life of a prostitute in contemporary Paris. The narrator stresses its demythificatory side when observing that Marthe's initial loss of her virginity to an older and richer man is due, not ‘as novelists say,’ to her senses, but to pride and curiosity.

The novel opens in the wings of the Bobino theater where Marthe is being prepared by the actor Ginginet for the opening night of a second-rate review; her performance attracts a young journalist, Léo. A flashback then traces Marthe's past: orphaned at 15, she had followed her mother's trade as a worker in false pearls which both undermined her health and exposed her to the corrupting conversation of her fellow workers. She yielded to an older man, but left him, disgusted. With no trade she slid into occasional prostitution, then formed a liaison with a young man. Both he and their premature child died; she sought refuge in a brothel. Slipping out one day she was noticed by Ginginet in a bar.

Marthe now begins an affair with the would-be writer who had picked her out at the theater.

After an initial idyllic period, life together and poverty erode the relationship. He grows frustrated in his literary ambitions; she suffers from his lack of interest in her as an individual. She begins to sell herself again, but stops, afraid of being caught by the police as a fugitive from a licensed brothel, and turns to drink. Léo, called to the sickbed of his mother, leaves Marthe with relief. In despair she contemplates suicide and returns to the brothel. Back in Paris, Léo seeks her out again, and finds her as the mistress of Ginginet in the sordid bar he now owns: the actor's intervention has had her struck off the police register, and he is using her to attract customers. She escapes from the mutually brutalising relationship with Ginginet, and a former woman friend helps her to acquire a lover, young, rich, and idle, who sets her up in her own apartment. Her contempt for him and sexual dissatisfaction soon drive her back to Léo. Léo, though still drawn to her sensually, is reminded by her bruises of her other life and they part definitively after a single night. She returns to a series of lovers. A coda which opens in the morgue of the Lariboisière hospital rounds off the brief novel with the triumph of bourgeois order: a smug letter from Léo to a student friend reveals him about to enter a conventional marriage, and cynically predicting for Marthe, now back in the brothel, a death from drink or in the Seine; a surgeon performs an autopsy on Ginginet to demonstrate the effects of alcoholism.

The slice of life offered by Huysmans switches between the three central figures, but Marthe remains the most ambiguous, set between the jocular cynicism of the self-destructive and exploitative Ginginet and the egoistic Léo, who is drawn to Marthe as a stimulus to his imagination, but becomes rapidly bored by the real woman beneath the actress and frustrated by the petty frictions of cohabitation.

Marthe's career allows Huysmans to portray dispassionately the varied forms that prostitution had taken in nineteenth-century Paris: the controlled world of the maison close, with its protection, routine, and comforts, which however imposes an "odious job" that allows neither revulsion nor fatigue; the unofficial prostitution that seeks clients in dance-halls or bars; the woman kept by a rich lover as an object of display and a sexual convenience, and her life of races, parties, and boredom. Huysmans is no social reformer; if he is an invaluable source of information, he also betrays pervasive social attitudes (Alain Corbin), and his presentation of the prostitute's life remains intriguingly ambivalent. It offers initially the Naturalist scenario of a vulnerable individual from a sickly family corrupted by the physical squalor and moral laxity of a destructive environment, and inevitably drawn back into the world of the brothel: "Every woman who has lived this life plunges back into it one day or another." But Marthe, though attractive and physically responsive to Léo, is not driven by sexual desire: she is full of self-loathing, and, unlike Zola's Nana, unable to use her sexuality as a weapon against others. Her point of view offers a protest against the brutality, vulgarity, and arrogance of men and against male contempt for the prostitute. On the other hand the sympathy Huysmans shows for one individual does not really call into question the exploitation of women in this society: the availability of venal sex, the dual standard, and the evocations of women in the brothel reveal on occasion a voyeuristic fascination.

Huysmans also wrote two aggressively obscene sonnets for the Nouveau Parnasse satyrique du XIXe siècle.

Biography

Charles-Marie-Georges Huysmans was born in Paris, 5 February 1848. Educated at Lycée Saint-Louis, Paris, 1862–1865; studied law at Faculté de Droit et de Lettres, Paris, 1866–1867. He earned his living as a minor civil servant at the Ministry of the Interior from 1866, then, after serving in the Garde Nationale Mobile in the Franco-Prussian War in 1870, in the Ministries of War (1870–1876) and the Interior (1876–1898). In 1892, undertook a retreat to a Trappist monastery and returned to the Roman Catholic church, spending nearly two years as a Benedictine oblate in a monastery in Ligugé (Poitou); returned to Paris in 1901 when the monks left France. His first book, the collection of prose poems Le drageoir à épices [The Spice Bowl], was published in 1874, signed Jorris-Karl Huysmans; he used J.-K. Huysmans for subsequent works. As well as a series of novels that chart a progression from Naturalism through an interest in Decadence and Symbolism (A rebours [Against Nature]) and in Satanism (Là-bas [Down There]) to conversion to

HYVRARD, JEANNE

Roman Catholicism, he wrote art criticism. Died of cancer of the jaw and mouth in Paris, May 12, 1907.

PETER COGMAN

Editions

Marthe: histoire d'une fille. Brussels: Gay, 1876; Paris: Derveaux, 1879; as Marthe, translated by Robert Baldick, Fortune Press, n.d. [1958].

Selected Works

A rebours. 1880; as Against Nature, translated by Robert Baldick, 1959; as Against Nature, translated by Margaret Mauldon, 1998.

Certains. 1889.

Là-bas. 1891; as Down There, translated by Robert Irwin, 1986; as The Damned, translated by Terry Hale, 2001.

Further Reading

Antosh, Ruth B. Reality and Illusion in the novels of J.K. Huysmans. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1986.

Baldick, Robert. The Life of J-K. Huysmans. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1955.

Bernheimer, Charles. Figures of Ill-repute: Representing Prostitution in Nineteenth-Century France. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1989.

Brandreth, Henry R.T. Huysmans. Lodon: Bowes and Bowes, 1963.

Corbin, Alain. Les Filles de noce: misère sexuelle et prostitution au XIXe siècle. Paris: Aubier Montaigne, 1978; as Women for Hire: Prostitution and Sexuality in France after 1859, translated by Alan Sheridan. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1990.

Lloyd, Christopher. J.K. Huysmans and the Fin-de-siècle Novel. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1990.

Olrik, Hilde. 'Marthe: une prostituée du XIXe siècle.' Revue des Sciences Humaines. Nos. 171–172 (1978), 273–283.

Zayed, Fernande. Huysmans peintre de son époque. Paris: Nizet, 1973.

Robert Ziegler. 'Feminized Reality/Male Realism: The Case of Huysmans' Marthe.' Australian Journal of French Studies, 31 (1994), 188–199.

---

HYVRARD, JEANNE

---

1945–

French novelist, poet, short story writer, and essayist

A crucial figure in contemporary French literature, Jeanne Hyvrard nonetheless remains largely unexplored outside the critical truisms that categorize her œuvre as 'écriture féminine' (women's writing) and/or autobiography. However, the complexities of her writing in fact place her œuvre beyond restrictive generic parameters. Although her later, more structured work displays a measure and control absent from the fragmented narrative of her early texts, the initial novels are those which display a fascinating engagement with intertextual, maternal, and morbid eroticism.

The first evidence of erotic writing in Hyvrard comes in her novel, Les prunes de Cythère [The

Plums of Cythera, Paris, Minuit, 1975, hereafter cited as Prunes]. While the novel's preoccupations with maternity, social injustice, and madness have been treated by various critics, Hyvrard also draws heavily on Charles Baudelaire's poem 'Un Voyage à Cythère' ('A Voyage to Cythera'), published in the collection Les fleurs du Mal [The Flowers of Evil]. Jeanne, the narrator, can be seen as a reincarnation of Jeanne Duval, Baudelaire's 'Muse Malade' ('Sick Muse'), his mulatto mistress and the inspiration for a number of poems in which the sensual and the necrophilial are disturbingly intertwined in the poet's erotic portrayal of his muse. The silent scapegoat of Baudelaire's passion, Duval is liberated from the mute role in which the poet imprisoned her via Hyvrard's impassioned and liberating narrative, which witnesses a woman's refusal to remain bound within stereotyped notions of femininity. Indeed Jeanne, Hyvrard's narrator, claims that 'Je crie par mille bouches' ('I cry out from a thousand mouths,' Prunes), thus emphasizing the universal and intertextual relevance of the narrator. However, it is not a male lover who is subjectivising and eroticizing Jeanne, but a phallic mother figure. Like Baudelaire's polarized visions of Duval, Hyvrard offers a dual representation of the mother. The first is that of a suffocating monster whose invasion of her daughter's body is likened to a rape: 'elle s'est étendue sur moi et m'a enfoncé son phallus dans la bouche' ('she spread herself over me and forced her phallus into my mouth,' Prunes). These violently sexual images demonstrate a morbid eroticism that is all the more sinister given the maternal provenance of the physical abuse, and the unsettlingly vivid imagery of the phallic female. The maternal rape is seen to be cannibalistic: 'elle m'étouffe et me digère' ('she suffocates me and digests me,' Prunes), and the repressive maternal relationship is also depicted metaphorically as quasi-sexual: in Prunes, as well as the 1976 novel Mère la mort [Mother Death], the mother is likened to an octopus, stifling her child in a pseudo-amorous embrace, and in the 1990 novel La jeune morte en robe de dentelle [The Dead Girl In a Lace Dress] she is likened to mistletoe, the plant which symbolizes romantic love but which suffocates and poisons the plant it wraps around.

By taking such negative qualities away from the narrator or muse, and instead incarnating them in the oppressive othered figure, Hyvrard shows Baudelaire's description of Duval to be a projection of the self onto the other. However, the representation of the positive mother figure is no less eroticized. For example, the narrator addresses her 'real' mother (an eco-feminist Mother Earth), saying that 'quand je rentre en toi, j'y disparaiss [...] [ ;] tu m'embrasses jusqu'à ce que mes plaies touchent les tiennes et qu'elles en guérissent' ('when I go back inside you, I disappear there [...]; you kiss me until my wounds touch yours and are healed by the touch,' Prunes). The blurring of mother and earth echoes the narrator's desire to 'rentrer dans la terre jusqu'à devenir le sexe du monde' ('return inside the earth until I become the world's entrails' Prunes, p. 208). The overt erotic implications suggest a communion with the earth that is powerful and life-enhancing, and the eco-feminist nature of this eroticism is picked up and developed in Hyvrard's 1998 text Ton nom de végétal [Your Plant Name]. The return to the earth's core also symbolizes a return to the womb, thus pulling out the pro-maternal eco-feminist strand in Hyvrard's writing. The eroticized vision of childbirth is represented here from the perspective of the child, whose fulfillment is achieved by a symbolic return to the womb. However, while the backward-looking process of returning to the 'ventre' ('womb/core') is evident, we can also identify a forward-visioned re-working of Hyvrard's sexualized view of childbirth. It is in becoming a mother herself that she feels physical fulfillment reaches its zenith: projecting forwards towards a positive and life-affirming view of motherhood, and rejecting the sadistic and morbid eroticism that defines her textual relationship with her (negative) mother, Hyvrard's narrator describes the birth of her own daughter in physical, visceral terms: '[I]nfant qui me faisait l'amour, avec tout son corps. Venu de l'intérieur de moi-même. Glissant entre mes cuisses. L'enfant nu traversant mon sexe . [...] Toi, ma petite fille, tu m'as fait l'amour mieux que tout autre.' ('[t]he child who made love to me, with its whole body. Come from my own core. Slipping between my thighs. The naked child passing across my vagina. [...] You, my little girl, you made love to me better than any other,' Prunes). Hyvrard's eroticized view of motherhood corresponds to the positive feminist position of viewing childbirth as the height of sexual pleasure, and thus she liberates herself from the physical and maternal restrictions of a negative female genealogy, through this orgasmic experience of childbirth.

It is thus not through a heterosexual love or relationship that Hyvrard re-works traditional or Baudelairean representations of the fetishized or eroticized female figure, but rather through a pro-life affirmation of the mother-daughter relationship. The female-centered nature of Hyvrard's texts is particularly evident in the raw and urgent emotion of her cry 'Je te crie ma haine et mes amours castrées' ('I cry out to you my hate and my castrated loves,' Prunes), the feminine plural 'castrées' feminizing and sexualizing the loves of which the narrator speaks. Therefore, despite her own strongly heterosexual beliefs, which she describes as a political position as well as a personal choice, the polarized representation of the female in Hyvrard is redeemed through woman-to-woman love, and via a subjectivized re-working of traditional, male-authored representations of the woman as sexual or sexualized object.

HYVRARD, JEANNE

Biography

Born in Paris in 1945, Jeanne Hyvrard trained as an economist and lawyer, and claims to have come to writing ‘by chance’: having entered the teaching profession in the early 1970s, she was posted to Martinique for two years, and was outraged by the injustice and inequality she witnessed there, particularly in the treatment of women. She decided to write a social report about this in order to raise awareness—although she points out now that this was a naïve hope—of the injustices in francophone post-colonial society. However, the text that she wrote was disturbingly poetic, and blended literary narrative with social comment. Les Prunes de Cythère [The Plums of Cythera] was thus published as a novel with the Éditions de Minuit in 1975.

Since 1975, Hyvrard has produced a substantial corpus of novels, poetry, social commentary, and philosophical short stories. She maintained her teaching job in a technical college in Paris until the age of 60, retiring in summer 2005. She still lives in Paris with her husband, and has one daughter and two grandchildren, with whom she maintains a strong family link.

HELEN VASSALLO

Selected Works

- Le fichu écarlate*. Paris: des femmes, 2004
Ordre relativement chronologique suivi de La Grande Fermaille. Paris: L'Harmattan, 2003.
La formosité. Inventaire de la beauté et de toutes les formes de forme. Liège: Atelier de l'Agneau, 2000.

- Ton nom de végétal*. Quebec: Trois Guinées, 1998.
Au présage de la mienne. Quebec: Le Loup de Gouttière, 1997.
La jeune morte en robe de dentelle. Paris: des femmes, 1990.
La pensée corps. Paris: des femmes, 1989.
Le cercan. Paris: des femmes, 1987.
Canal de la Toussaint. Paris: des femmes, 1985.
La baisure suivi de que se partagent encore les eaux. Paris: des femmes, 1984.
Le corps défunt de la comédie: Traité d'économie politique. Paris: Seuil, 1982.
Le silence et l'obscurité: Requiem littoral pour corps polonais 13-28 décembre 1981. Paris: Éditions Montalba, 1982.
Les doigts du figuier. Paris: Minuit, 1977.
La meurtriture. Paris: Minuit, 1977.
Mère la mort. Paris: Minuit, 1976.
Les prunes de Cythère. Paris: Minuit, 1975.

Further Reading

- Cauville, Joëlle. Mythologie hyvrardienne: analyse des mythes et symboles dans l'œuvre de Jeanne Hyvrard. Québec: Presses de l'Université de Laval, 1996.
Kosta-Théfaine, Jean, ed. Ut Philosophia Poesis: Études sur l'œuvre de Jeanne Hyvrard. Amsterdam-New York: Rodopi, 2001.
Saïgal, Monique. L'écriture: lien de mère à fille chez Jeanne Hyvrard, Chantal Chawaf et Annie Ernaux. Amsterdam-Atlanta: Rodopi, 2000.
Vassallo, Helen. “Passion et pulsions: la volupté baudelairienne chez Jeanne Hyvrard.” in Amour, passion, volupté: le sentiment amoureux dans la littérature française du Moyen Age jusqu'au XXIème siècle. edited by Anyne Castonguay and Jean-François Kosta-Théfaine, Paris: Atlantica, 2005.
———. “Retour à Cythère: Baudelairean intertext in Jeanne Hyvrard.” The French Studies Bulletin 93 (Winter 2004): 10–12.
Verthuy-Williams, Maïr and Jennifer Waelti-Walters. Jeanne Hyvrard. Amsterdam-Atlanta: Rodopi, 1988.
Waelti-Walters, Jennifer. Jeanne Hyvrard: Theorist of the Modern World. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1996.

---

IBN AL-HAJJĀJ

---

c. 932–1001

Pre-modern Arab poet

Relatively unknown nowadays except in literary circles and among specialists, Ibn al-Hajjāj was of great fame in his time, in later epochs, and up until the modern period. He is considered one of the major poets of the Būyid period (932–1062), known for its political tumult but vibrant cultural production. He secured the patronage of the most powerful men of the age, as the panegyrics he composed for them attest, and was also active in many elite circles. Ibn al-Hajjāj was praised by literary critics and admired by contemporaries, and secured many a mention in anthologies for his unique style and for pioneering a new mode of scatological parody and obscene frivolity termed sukhf, which became synonymous with his name and person(a).

While certainly talented and unique, Ibn al-Hajjāj and his poetry did not appear ex nihilo. The time was ripe for such a trajectory, and Ibn al-Hajjāj's sukhf can be seen as a natural culmination of an established and hallowed tradition which produced the potential for parody. There had already been parodic trends of the conventions of Arabic poetry before Ibn al-Hajjāj's time. In addition, the shift to urban centers and a courtly culture with a new set of sociopolitical functions and surroundings had already produced a variety of specialized genres and subgenres of poetry (ascetic, bacchic, nature, and hunting poetry, to name a few). The status and function of the poet, too, had changed from that of hero and spokesperson of his tribe in pre-Islamic times to court entertainer and, at times, even ritual clown. This urban and urbane poetry had already reveled in parodying the classical literary (and social) conventions, motifs, and values attached to and celebrated in older bedouin poetry. Mujūn (licentious and hedonistic poetry), with which sukhf at times overlaps or is coupled, saw its apex in the poetry of the libertine master Abū Nuwās (755–813). Ibn al-Hajjāj incorporated all these trends, as well as the obscene and scatological motifs and diction of invective poetry, known as hijā, and redeployed them with added force in a full-fledged parody of all that was conventional in literary and sociocultural spheres, to become, as many have noted, the most obscene and irreverent poet in pre-modern Arabic poetry.

Not surprisingly, the body (and its functions) is the main vehicle through which Ibn al-Hajjāj carries out his scatological parody. One of the essential motifs of Arabic poetry was the elegiac pause of the poet in remembrance of his beloved's abandoned encampments. Ibn al-Hajjāj's poetic persona reenacts this ritual, but it is his cock, rather than his eye, which cries over the abandoned encampments. Moreover, instead of a real or imagined space, the object of his tears is usually the abandoned vagina or anus of a grotesquely old woman. Not unlike parody in general, all motifs are inverted in the world of sukhf. If the beloved is not a hyperbolically old hag, she is at times a pre-pubescent girl, and the poetic persona is an impotent old man lamenting his lost virility. Ibn al-Hajjāj's descriptive prowess is focused on the lower parts of the body so that in lieu of the conventional imagery highlighting the upper part and face of the beloved, we find hilarious microscopic descriptions of orifices, bodily fluids, odors, and functions. The latter usually interfere with and disrupt attempts at intercourse. Even in panegyrics, it is not the patron's generosity that is (traditionally) hailed, but his virility and the length and width of his cock. The patron's enemies are not threatened with military defeat, but with Ibn al-Hajjāj's own excrement, which he threatens to hurl at them. Much in the tradition of mujūn, but going much further than any of his predecessors, Ibn al-Hajjāj was extremely irreverent in parodying religious themes as well. In describing a beloved's clitoris, for example, he likens it to a bent-over imam. To portray a lengthy intercourse, he writes "my cock calls for the morning prayer inside her anus and stays until the forenoon."

Ibn al-Hajjāj was well aware of the niche he had found for himself and the poetic mode he had established. There are numerous examples in his poems where he boasts of this, calling himself "the prophet of frivolity: a man claiming prophecy in frivolity/and who dare doubt prophets?/He brings forth his own miracles and calls upon people to follow/So answer all ye frivolous ones." He even likened his oeuvre to a privy, without which life is impossible.

What further distinguishes Ibn al-Hajjāj is his fame and popularity outside of literary and literate circles. He fused poetic modes but also linguistic registers. His extensive and deliberate use of vulgar street language (he started to collect and write down Baghdadi colloquial obscenities and curses while still a boy) ensured that his audience would not be restricted to the elite. A manual for teachers from the 14th century, three centuries after Ibn al-Hajjāj's death, instructs its readers to punish boys if they are found reciting his poetry. Ibn al-Hajjāj was emulated by many poets in later centuries. By the 15th century, he himself had become a topos, and anecdotes about him and his poetry appear in other works of erotica, such as Nuzhat al-albāb [The Sojourn of the Hearts] by al-Tifāshī.

Biography

Abū Abdullāh al-Husayn Ibn al-Hajjāj was born in Baghdad in 932 CE to a Shī family of government officials. He was trained by the famous Abū Ishāq al-Sābī to be one himself and worked as a secretary for a short period. However, realizing that his poetic talent promised a more lucrative career and future, he quit his post and pursued a highly successful career as a poet. He was briefly appointed the market inspector of Baghdad (973–977). He died in Baghdad and was buried near the shrine of the imam Mūsā al-Kazim.

SINAN ANTOON

Selected Works

- Abdelghafur, A.A., ed. Der Dīwān des Ibn al-Haggāg, Teilausgabe: Der Reimbuchstabe nūn. Giessen, Germany: Universitat, 1977.
- Al-Tāhir, 'Alī J. Durrat al-tāj min shi'r Ibn al-Hajjāj [The Crown's Pearl of Ibn al-Hajjāj's Poetry]. Complementary thesis, Sorbonne, 1953.
- Mustafā, Najm 'Abdallah, ed. Taltīf al-mizāj min shi'r Ibn al-Hajjāj [Lightening the Mood with Ibn al-Hajjāj's Poetry]. Sūsa, Tunisia: Dār al-Ma'ārif, 2001.

References and Further Reading

- Antoon, Sinan. "The Poetics of the Obscene: Ibn al-Hajjāj and Sukhf." Ph.D. dissertation, Harvard University, 2006.
- Gelder, Geert J.V. The Bad and the Ugly: Attitudes Towards Invective Poetry in Classical Arabic Literature. Leiden: E.J. Brill, 1988.
- "Sukhf" and "Ibn al-Hajjāj." In Encyclopaedia of Islam (new edition). Leiden: Brill, 1954–.
- Manna, Hashim. "Al-Husayn Ibn Al-Hajjāj: His Life and Verse." Ph.D. dissertation, University of London, 1986.
- Meisami, J.S. "Arabic mujūn Poetry: The Literary Dimension." In Verse and the Fair Sex: Studies in Arabic Poetry and in the Representation of Women in Arabic Literature, edited by Fredrick De Jong. Utrecht: M. Th. Houtsma Sticchting, 1993.
- Mez, Adam. The Renaissance of Islam. Translated by D.S. Margoliouth and S. Khuda Bakhsh. Patna, 1937.

---

IBN HAZM

---

994–1064

Muslim jurist, theologian, and man of letters

Ibn Hazm is in the West the epitome of the Muslim theorist of profane love—as distinct from divine or even mystic love—who tried to describe natural or passionate love. Ibn Hazm’s only attempt in the field of literature was the book Tawq al-hamâma fî-l-ulfa wa-l-ullâf [The Dove’s Neck-Ring, or on Love and Lovers].

One should distinguish between the essays, epistles, or treatises dealing with natural love and the essays that integrate natural love—tabî’î—into a larger approach to love, including spiritual and divine love. It was not rare for authors to blur the line between natural and divine love, so that the lover loved an anonymous Beloved, who was in fact God.

Although it may sound strange that a Muslim theologian dealt with sex and love, neither of these can be separated from God’s creation, and are allowed in married life. Outside of marriage, passion is not forbidden, but sex is. A famous hadith—an authorized report on the Prophet’s words and attitudes—holds that “the one who loves remains chaste, keeps his secret, and dies,” that one is a love’s martyr, ‘achîq chahîd. Erotology is a matter for a theologian to expand upon, teach, and imagine in the name of God. Besides, one and the same word, nikâh, means coitus and marriage.

The Dove’s Neck-Ring is a prosimeter of 30 chapters which theoretically relate the successive moments of a love’s story, from the beginning to the fateful and necessary end. The book is introduced by a narrator in Játiva who meets the desire of a dearest friend in Almeria by writing an epistle on truthful love, its various meanings, causes, and accidents, “neither adding anything nor embroidering anything.”

Ibn Hazm anonymously records his life in Córdoba, describes each loving phase, illustrates it by supposedly edifying stories, drawn from personal experiences, hearing, and reading. Theory and example are always intertwined with poems reiterating the chapter’s thesis. Ibn

Hazm also quotes other Muslim writers’ poems but distinguishes himself from mystics by inserting his own verses and expressing his own subjectivity. Ibn Hazm, a theorist of profane love, soberly and perceptively analyzes the outer manifestations of natural love. However, his vision of love is not devoid of any spirituality, as it partly derives from Plato’s Symposium and Phaedrus’s idealized view of love.

Sex does not automatically translate to passion, but is alluded to in various stories. The narrator can’t always avoid details that awaken, entertain, titillate, or even ignite his reader’s desire or erotic imagination. He concludes his epistle with two chapters that sum up Islam’s prohibition of sex and illustrate the author’s moralism. Still, he reports an old lady’s narrative which is indirectly far from being exemplary:

[N]ever have too good an opinion of any woman. . . . I took ship many years ago now, returning from the pilgrimage, for I had already renounced the world; with me on the same vessel were fourteen other women, all of whom had likewise been to Mecca. . . . Now one of the crew was a fine upstanding fellow. . . . On the first night out I saw him come up to one of my companions and show off his virility to her. She surrendered to his embraces on the spot. On the following nights each of the rest accepted his advances in turn, until only I was left. I said to myself, “I will punish you for this, you scoundrel.” With that I took a razor and grasped it firmly in my hand. He came along as usual that evening and behaved precisely as he had done on the preceding nights. When he approached me I brandished my razor, and he was so scared that he would have run off. I felt very sorry for him then, and grasping him with my hands I said, “You shall not go until I have had my share of you.” So, the old lady concluded, he got what he wanted, God forgive me! (Chap. 29)

The narrator aims at stigmatizing sin, but each sequence of the story might develop into an erotic sketch. He refrains from going further but can’t help taking delight in relating such stories, which take place mostly in the Umayyads’ time, for which Ibn Hazm is nostalgic.

Ibn Hazm's The Dove's Neck-Ring was by no means the first book on profane love in the history of Arabic or even Muslim literature. It was preceded by Kitâb az-zahra [The Book of the Flower] of Ibn Dâwûd al Isfâhâni (d. 909), the forerunner of profane love theory and possibly of Western courtly love, who tackles all the items of love to be found in later epistles, including the ideal passion that leads to death, as well as boy-love poetry by other poets.

Ibn Hazm's work belongs among a number of writings that constitute a genre characterized by the structural fact they don't infringe upon the sphere of divine love or, if so, only by metaphor. Conversely, mystic works certainly tend to use metaphors of profane love to evoke divine love, and erotic effects may arise, but these don't forge a theory of profane love in its own right (although the mixed character of all of these texts makes any strict generic classification difficult).

In natural love, through loving the beloved [mahbub], the lover [muhibb] loves nobody but himself and the act of love, hubb al-hubb. In spiritual love, the lover loves both himself and the beloved, who can also be and mostly is the Beloved, that is God—hence, the difference between Ibn Hazm's mundane epistle and, for example, Ibn Arabi's (d. 1240) essay on sacred love in chapter 178 of Kitâb al-Futûhât al-Makkiyya [Meccan illuminations].

Biography

Ibn Hazm al-Andalusi was born in 994 in Al-Andalus (Spain), a Muslim territory dominated from 756 until 1031 by the Umayyad Caliphs in Córdoba. He witnessed the decline of the Umayyads, vainly devoting his short political career to their dynasty, his lifelong love's object. Then he retired from political life in 1024. A large part of his work, probably written between 1025 and 1030, was concerned with law and theology. He died in 1064.

GÉRARD SIARY

Editions

Tawq Al Hamâma. Beirut: Dar Al Marefah, 2003 (in Amharic). Le Collier du pigeon. Translated into

French and edited by Léon Bercher. Paris and Beirut: Les Éditions de la Méditerranée et les Éditions Kitaba, 1981.

The Ring of the Dove: A Treatise on the Art and Practice of Arab Love. Translated by A.J. Arberry. London: Luzac Oriental, 1996.

De l'amour et des amants. Translated by G. Martinez-Gros. Paris: Sindbad, 1992.

References and Further Reading

Arazi, Albert. Amour divin et amour profane dans l'Islam médiéval à travers le dîwân de Khalid Al-Katib. Paris: G. P. Maisonneuve et Larose, 1990.

Arnaldez, Roger. Grammaire et théologie chez Ibn Hazm de Cordoue: Essai sur la structure et les conditions de la pensée musulmane. Paris: Vrin, 1981 (1956).

Ben Slama, Raja. "Les 'Sphères divisées' d'Aristophane à Ibn Hazm." Anales del Seminario de Historia de la Filosofía 19 (2002): 39–51.

Charles-Dominique, Paule. "Tawq al-Hamâma." In Dictionnaire universel des littératures, edited by Béatrice Didier, vol. 3, 3726. Paris: PUF, 1994.

Chebel, Malek. Encyclopédie de l'amour en Islam. Érotisme, beauté et sexualité dans le monde arabe, en Perse et en Turquie, 605–9. Paris: Payot, 1995.

Corbin, Henry. Histoire de la philosophie islamique. Paris: Gallimard, 1986 (1964). Section VIII.2 on Ibn Hazm, p. 313–19.

Giffen, Lois Anita. Theory of Profane Love Among the Arabs: The Development of the Genre. New York: NYU Press, 1971.

Goodman, Lenn E. Islamic Humanism, 61–5. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2003.

Ibn Dawud. The Book of the Flower. Translated by A.R. Nikl. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1932 (bilingual edition).

Jahiz, al-. "Boasting Match over Maids and Youths." In Nine Essays of al-Jahiz, translated by William M. Hutchins, 139–66. New York: Lang, 1989.

Martinez-Gros, Gabriel. "L'amour-trace. Réflexions sur le Collier de la Colombe." Arabica 34 (1987): 147.

———. "Les Femmes dans le Collier de la Colombe." In Atalaya I, 5–14. Paris: Presses de la Sorbonne nouvelle, 1991.

———. "L'Amour en miroir dans le Tawq al-hamâma." In Al-Qantara. Paris: Institut du Monde Arabe, 1996.

Michot, Yahia. "Un célibataire endurci et sa maman: Ibn Taymiyya (m. 728/1328) et les femmes." Acta Orientalia Belgica 15 (2001): 165–90.

Mújica Pinilla, Ramón. Collar de la paloma del alma. Amor sagrado y amor profano en la enseñanza de Ibn Hazm y de Ibn 'Arabi. Madrid: Hiperión, 1990.

Toelle, Heidi, and Katia Zakharia. A la découverte de la littérature arabe du VI<sup>e</sup> siècle à nos jours. Paris: Flammarion, 2003.

---

IHARA SAIKAKU

---

1642–1693

Japanese short story writer and poet

The authorship of several of the works of prose fiction attributed to Ihara Saikaku has been questioned by some modern critics, one theory alleging that all but the first, Kōshoku ichidai otoko [The Life of an Amorous Man] (1682), are by his followers and disciples. Be that as it may, we can discern two main divisions of subject matter in his writings: erotic works [kōshokubon] in the period 1682–1687, and fiction centering on the lives of ordinary city dwellers and their financial and economic worries [chōninmono] from 1688 to 1693. There are also other groupings of a variety of stories, such as Shokoku banashi [Tales from the Provinces] (1685).

The Life of an Amorous Man gained Saikaku a great reputation. It describes the sexual adventures of its hero, Yonosuke, and the women (and on a few occasions the youths) with whom he has passionate but fleeting affairs. The son of a rake and a courtesan, Yonosuke finds his sensual vocation early when, at the age of seven, he becomes fixated on love to the great amusement of the maids in his household. While still a youth he and a companion escape from a wily courtesan who has tried to entrap them with too well-worn a story, comparing him to a handsome prince who once threw snow into her bosom to match its whiteness. At age fifteen, in the first year of his manhood, he has some sexual encounters with a group of kabuki actors who are going around the villages looking for clients. When in bed, his lover tells how these activities will help to purchase his freedom but that he is meanwhile obliged to accept any male who comes along, just as he has already made love to a woodcutter in the forest and a naked sailor on the beach, and even an old man covered in sores could not be refused. Yonosuke cannily suspects that this tale, like the courtesan's, is largely invented, but this does not spoil his pleasure. The narrative is picaresque, following Yonosuke through his many and varied encounters:

there are well-observed details of courtesans, prostitutes, and ordinary women both young and old, married and free, together with depictions of their behavior, conditions of life, dress, and demeanor in many expected and unexpected places of assignation. Teahouses feature prominently, but so also do bathhouses, tumble-down shacks, and dilapidated cottages in the countryside. The series of events moves swiftly from the story of a widow who develops too great a familiarity with her servants, to how Yonosuke becomes the business manager for groups of effeminate wandering youths—an ignoble trade, he feels, though despite his poverty, the hiring of amorous women never fails to attract him. A pretty, young girl, who disguises herself as an ugly old woman at a village religious orgy to escape the attentions of the local youths is seduced by Yonosuke. They live together in penury for a while, and then go their separate ways.

Yonosuke is now twenty-eight. Even when thrown into prison, he fraternizes with the roughs and glimpses a woman there through the bars of his cell. The story develops a strange, macabre, and almost whimsical quality at moments: he writes to the woman with ink made of the prison cobwebs, then she is violently reclaimed by her husband when Yonosuke and she are unexpectedly released. Yonosuke later comes across some grave robbers hard at work, who explain that they need only the corpse's nails and hair, since the courtesans in the nearby town pay good prices for the supply of allegedly personal love tokens they can give to their clients. The corpse, is, of course, that of the woman from the prison, thus eliciting Yonosuke's comment, which seems appropriate to many of the incidents narrated in the book, "How frail indeed is life."

Ghosts of Yonosuke's past loves to whom he falsely vowed fidelity come one night to attack him in frightening shapes—half woman, half monster: "There is no fury like a woman deceived, especially after she has been driven to suicide.” But the narrative is not overtly ironic. Yonosuke refuses to be manacled by amorous ties to any woman. He is always on the move, and is by now widely admired for the enviable notoriety of his erotic adventures. An encounter with another band of kabuki actors results in the unexpected and amusing sight of an amorous priest hidden in the branches of a tree waiting for his lover to acknowledge him. Yonosuke puts the pair together: “Dallying with these youths is like seeing wolves beneath scattering cherry blossoms, whereas going to bed with prostitutes gives one the feeling of groping in the dark beneath the new moon without a lantern.” The narrative ends with a short chapter that foreshadows, it seems, a sort of erotic utopia for worn-out reprobates. Yonosuke has become gray haired and ugly—but so too, he reflects, have all the women he has known. Together with some companions in a like state of decrepitude, he builds a tiny ship to sail to the island of Nyogo, where all the women will aggressively seize hold of them. The sail is made from the silken inner garments of his former courtesan wife, and the ropes are fashioned from prostitutes’ hair. There is to be no return. This is a witty summation of Yonosuke’s amorous life and his convivial wantonness, for which he is not condemned. It seems strangely like an apotheosis. The book is “meant obviously to be understood as a plebeian version of the courtly lover Prince Genji in The Tale of Genji” (Schalow), though it may be doubted that its overall tone is parodic.

The second book, Shoen Ōkagami [The Great Mirror of Loves] (1685), chronicles the amorous adventures of Yonosuke’s son. The third book, Kōshoku gonin onna [Five Women Who Loved Love] (1686), narrates in separate stories based on actual events the fates of five heroines enmeshed in romantic love. Respectability is sacrificed to the pursuit of passion, and four of the affairs terminate in death. Even the fifth affair/story, “The Tale of Gengobei,” was probably based on a real-life event which ended in suicide. But here it is given an upbeat ending, and also provides a wry twist on the theme of the woman who captures her beloved by adapting her strategy to his tastes. The hero, twenty-six-year-old Gengobei, worships in succession two incomparably beautiful youths who both unfortunately soon die. Unlike women, Gengobei swears that he will not take a new lover (but, of course, we see the irony that he has already been unfaithful to the memory of his first love). However, a young girl named Oman is consumed with love for him and, having noticed a book on male love in his collection, dresses as a boy and seduces him. The vicissitudes of life are again deftly caught in this narrative, and Gengobei concludes that there is little difference between being in love with men or women. He is thereafter happy and sorrowful in turn.

The fourth book, Kōshoku ichidai onna [The Life of an Amorous Woman] (1686), is another picaresque novel, plausibly interpreted as a parody of Buddhist confessional literature. At the start, the narrator comes to the “Hermitage of Voluptuousness,” according to the sign that an old crone has put up on her dilapidated retreat in the wilderness. He overhears the story of her life, which she tells to two unexpected (but evidently very welcome) male visitors. This female “Rake’s Progress” charts her fall from prosperity to destitution and from youth to old age through a series of erotic adventures and sexual employments. She is first dismissed for making love to her handsome prospective father-in-law while his ugly wife lies asleep in bed with them. She takes this with a light laugh. Then she is wrongly blamed by fellow concubines, who are erotically overheated, for causing her new lord’s impotence. At sixteen she is sold to a teahouse because her father is heavily in debt. Here she learns how to conduct herself as a courtesan, describing both her pleasant and her disagreeable duties and experiences. Her clients are varied and demanding—many are inexperienced and need to be aroused; one snores heavily; what is going on in adjacent rooms seems far more sexy.

Next on the downward path she becomes a courtesan of the middle rank, reduced to social humiliation, fewer clients, and only two layers of mattress. She learns the rule that men will often ruin themselves with courtesans, but in her case three of her clients are business failures and she is left alone when she starts to lose her hair. On the next level in her descent, she is down to one layer of mattress and has blunt, vulgar clients. She now learns more tricks to inveigle men. In a hurry she services shop assistants and, following the rules of the house, bundles her clothing quickly out of sight. At one point she is so glad to have a customer that she does not even ask what he looks like.

She is sold again into even cheaper prostitution. Later she establishes a writing school for girls, though this is a front for composing love letters to order for young men, since she knows how a girl's passion works. She becomes a maid-servant and seduces her employer when he is dressed up for a Buddhist ceremony. She joins a group of singing "priestesses," who are in reality prostitutes. She mistakenly tries to seduce an old man, who turns out to be a woman in disguise.

In many of these episodes a delicate form of ribaldry is fused with cutting observations on the vulnerable state of women who fall too low and have to survive. Toward the end of her story—and now, of course, of her life—she reflects on the quantity and quality of her lovers and seems, perhaps, poised for repentance. It was, she candidly but no doubt shrewdly admits, a shameful and demanding career. Since she could not possibly save enough from her small earnings, she simply made a companion of her sake bottle. And now that her beauty has faded, she still has hopes that there are "worms who prefer nettles." But as the story ends, it is far from obvious that the old woman regrets her past, except in the sense that she cannot experience it all over again. In what has every appearance of mock innocence, she asks her male visitors: "You may call it a trick of my old trade, but how could my heart be so impure?"

The fifth book, for which Saikaku is perhaps now chiefly remembered, particularly in the West, is Nanshoku Ōkagami [The Great Mirror of Male Love] (1687), which, by its title, could be thought to form a pendant to Shoen Ōkagami. The author states that he has tried to reflect in this "Great Mirror" the various examples of the love of men which his readers may all too soon perhaps forget. This large collection of short stories is divided into two main parts, the whole comprising eight sections of five stories each. In a mythological preface, Saikaku wittily outlines the origin of the love of youths, which is held to have precedence chronologically and aesthetically over the love of women. This idea is developed in Story 1.1 which poses the question why, in Saikaku's time, people remained unaware of the subtle and elegant pleasures afforded by such love. After narrating several examples of lovers of boys, including the priest Yoshida Kenkō, who tarnishes his reputation by writing one love letter to a lady when his friend has asked him to do so, an amusing and sophisticated list is made of the comparative charms of girls and boys. Which should be preferred: the young girl preening herself before a mirror? or a lad of the same age cleaning his teeth? No comment is offered, though in this example, artifice is set against natural cleanliness. Judgment is left to the connoisseurship of the (male) reader. The parallels conclude with the observation that a woman's heart is twisted like the wistaria with all its lovely blooms, whereas a youth may have a thorn or two, but he possesses the fragrance and beauty of the plum tree's early blossom.

The first 20 stories focus on the Samurai ethic of nobility, loyalty, and honor. They describe other examples of selfless devotion, too, as in Story 1.2, which narrates an idyll of boy love shared by two students at school. Their mutual devotion inspires watchful anxiety in their misogynistic teacher and admiring passion in the heart of an eighty-year-old Buddhist priest. An episode in Story 2.1 captures with some irony the moment of freedom when a youth has just passed the peak of his good looks, which are now beginning to fade. His lord, who would not previously have allowed him to commit sepputu (ritual suicide), has now transferred his affections to another boy, thus making suicide allowable but no longer honorably motivated. Another story (2.2) well illustrates the code of love, honor, and revenge. Here, a boy's unadorned beauty strongly attracts his lord, who declares himself willing to die for him. But the boy proudly responds that forcing him to yield is not true love: his heart remains his own; and should he ever find a true lover, he will lay down his life for him. A lover materializes and the lord cuts off the youth's arms and head. Later the lover himself cuts off the lord's arms and kills him before committing sepputu in a temple at the age of twenty-one. Those who hear the story of such deep love approve strongly of the conduct of the two lovers.

The tales in this section come from traditional literary sources. The love which men and youths swear to uphold, though erotically charged, was intended to last in this world and the next—hence the nobility attached to sepputu, which provides an honorable conclusion to several of the tales and the justification for exacting revenge which springs from outraged honor. The relationships are usually between an attractive youth (wakashu, up to the age of nineteen) and an older man. One lord can have several youths who all owe him social and sexual allegiance, but as a consequence they dare not respond to another's love without risking severe punishment. In this world, emotional and sexual bonds create obligations of trust which cannot be violated without danger, though transgressions are sometimes pardoned, as in Story 3.5, which tells how an impoverished Samurai falls in love with the handsome favorite of a powerful lord. After many years he declares his passion by means of an account of the long history of his feelings. The youth is therefore in a quandry and tells his master that if he refuses the man's affection, he will betray his honor as a follower of boy love. On the other hand, if he responds, he betrays his lord. He therefore asks to be allowed to commit seppuku. The lord is, however, magnanimous: he forgives the youth and gives money and robes to the Samurai, who then says farewell to his lover and becomes a monk. The second part of the collection focuses on the love of youths among kabuki actors and male prostitutes in the "floating world" of the pleasure districts of Saikaku's own time, which he knew firsthand. By 1651 boys and women had both been banished from the stage, so adult male actors alone remained. Saikaku's stories wittily paint this milieu, with its love intrigues between actors and youths, its thirty-year-olds archly pretending to be young, its sexual exploitation, its sufferings, and its shabbiness.

The stories in this section are peopled by city dwellers, unsophisticated provincials, greedy tradesmen, and hypocritical priests. With dry humor and irony they show both the good and the bad sides of the picture as complementary elements of human life. In Story 6.1 a lover of the handsome Itō puns on the youth's name, calling him a "burial ground" because his fee for a single night is three pieces of silver. Another tale (6.3) relates how a man has such lifelike pictures of the actors that he can enjoy himself all day long in solitude at home. But soon he falls in love with a kabuki prostitute and the intrigue develops from there. A more facetious story is told in 6.4: the beautiful female impersonator Kichiya sells his own attractive brand of face powder to many eager women, one of whom very discreetly invites him to her house. He is disguised in his woman's clothes, but the lady's husband returns unexpectedly and takes him for what he is not. In bed with him, however, the husband is more than delighted at his mistake and the two men spend the night together to their mutual satisfaction.

In Story 7.1, the problems encountered by a boy prostitute are narrated with sophistication and: on one occasion he is with a group of pilgrims, who draw lots, as a result of which he is assigned to a repulsive old man. He resorts to using his "secret thigh technique" but fears his ruse will be discovered. The narrator adds that none of his efforts ever brought him in much money, since his manager took it all. In the same tale a cloud of fireflies, which are emblematic of sodomy, are let loose by a priest at a party, reminding the revelers of an incident in bygone days when the insects were placed in the palanquin of a certain lady. The narrator comments that it seemed suspiciously like an unusually refined confession of love. In Story 7.4 a group of high-spirited actors, who, being well over twenty-two dare not reveal their true ages, are with their lovers when an uncouth Samurai arrives on the scene and demands to pair off with Tamamura Kichiya, the most beautiful among them. Kichiya temporizes before craftily shaving off half of the Samurai's beard. Saikaku's urbane narratives describe a connoisseurship of the love of youths which signals a high measure of sophistication and culture in his society. Although some of the male admirers of male beauty are portrayed as misogynists, perhaps for ironic or humorous effect, this is not a widespread attitude, and the stories demonstrate that a variety of sexual tastes was accommodated in 17th-century Japan.

In modern times Saikaku has found new fame. Rediscovered toward the end of the 19th century, along with the introduction of realism into Japanese literature by writers such as Ozaki Kōyō (1869–1903) and Kōda Rohan (1867–1947), he has benefited from the lifting of censorship and from more open attitudes since 1946. The appreciations of Takeda Rintarō (1904–1946) and Oda Sakunosuke (1913–1947) mark a significant moment in the renewal of public interest in Saikaku, and in the West a selection of stories from The Great Mirror of Male Love, translated with an appreciative and explanatory preface by Ken Satō, appeared in French in 1927 (this shortened version was translated into English in 1931). In recent years a number of his works have become available in English. His attraction for us is not so much as an historical witness to a certain moment in the development of social attitudes in Japanese culture toward hedonism and erotic experience, but as a refined and witty teller of tales who leaves salacious details understated and sensual enjoyment understood.

Biography

Ihara Saikaku was born in Osaka when it was a recently developed busy trading town, and belonged to the mercantile middle class. His real name was probably Hirayama Tōgo. He used several aliases in the course of his career as a famous composer of haikai, for which he was especially renowned, and, from the 1680s to the end of his life, as a successful writer of fiction. He adopted the style “Saikaku” [West Crane] in 1673. His wife died in 1675. In 1677 he is reported to have taken the tonsure, without it necessarily implying the profession of Buddhist vows, and to have journeyed throughout central Japan as a mendicant for several months at a time. This is allegedly the period when he gathered the stories which were to supply the material for his collections of tales. The Genroku period under the Tokugawa regime when he was writing was a time of growing prosperity and relaxed hedonism after the rigors and uncertainties of four centuries of civil war. Saikaku was a contemporary of several great artistic men: Hishikawa Moronobu (1618–1694), the artist who perfected the technique of woodblock illustration and incidentally provided the erotic pictures for a number of Saikaku’s novels, adapting Saikaku’s original witty designs and also pirating an edition of the Life of an Amorous Man in Edo in 1684; Matsuo Bashō (1644–1694), the poet in whose hands the haiku reached its zenith; Chikamatsu Monzaemon (1653–1725), the great dramatist; and Ejima Kiseki (1667–1736), following in Saikaku’s footsteps, a writer of stories and anecdotes describing fugitive pleasures (e.g., Yakusha Kuchi-Jamisen

[The Actor’s Vocal Samisen] 1699, which deals with the lives of kabuki actors, and Fūryū Kyoku-Jamisen [The Elegant Samisen Virtuosités], which is in the form of a confessional by a decrepit ex-courtesan and an old man who was formerly an effeminate kabuki youth). It was also the time when pleasure districts (yūri) were set up in the larger cities of Kyōto, Osaka, and Edo. In these yūri, which were separated from the main urban area and provided with independent access, teahouses afforded sexual relaxation in the context of formal etiquette, together with a strict and complex hierarchy of courtesans (tayū, the predecessors of the modern geisha) and prostitutes ranging from the very exclusive to the cheap and unsophisticated girls and women of the back streets. Those who could be found there have been brought back to life by Saikaku’s piquant anecdotes.

PATRICK POLLARD

Selected Works

- Five Women Who Loved Love*. Translated by W.T. de Bary. Rutland, VT: Charles E. Tuttle, 1956.
- The Great Mirror of Male Love*. Translated with an introduction by P.G. Schalow. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1990. Complete translation, with bibliography.
- The Life of an Amorous Man*. Translated by Kengi Hamada. Rutland, VT: Charles E. Tuttle, 1964.
- The Life of an Amorous Woman and Other Writings*. Edited and translated by Ivan Morris. London: Chapman and Hall, 1963. Abridgment, with extracts from several works.

Further Reading

- Danly, R.L. In the Shade of Spring Leaves. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1981.
- Hibbett, H. The Floating World in Japanese Fiction. London: Oxford University Press, 1959.
- Leupp, G.P. Male Colors: The Construction of Homosexuality in Tokugawa Japan. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1995.
- Struve, D. Ihara Saikaku. Un Romancier japonais du XVIIe siècle. Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 2001.

---

İLHAN, ATTILA

---

1925–

Turkish poet, novelist, and essayist

Attila İlhan, a very prominent Turkish intellectual and author, has published novels, film scripts, and collections of poetry and of critical essays on politics and literature. His politically engaged work focuses on the establishment and progress of the nation-state in Turkey and unconventional sexual attitudes. His works blend popular genres and politically and sexually charged themes, making him the most controversial Turkish author of the last six decades. The role of sexuality in his works distinguishes Attila İlhan from other Turkish socialist realist intellectuals. İlhan's several visits to Paris beginning in the 1940s determined his approach to literature and politics, as well as sexuality.

In his poetry, Attila İlhan employs an original stock of images involving female same-sex desire. In his poem "Triangle," a lesbian relationship was depicted for the first time in Turkish poetry, and lesbian sexuality is also featured in "The Kingdom of Cem the Second." In "A Country named Claude," a poem of nine stanzas, the title character, a woman, faces her desire for other women:

A country named Claude where black palm trees change and kiss young girls every night that Raphael draws in the form of young boys with doubtful lips lined with down

.....
a country named Claude, nobody has visited its silence that is deeper than oceans;
it is cut out of the map of the world
a howling dog is put in its place

Beginning with Kurtlar Sofrası [The Feast of Wolves] (1963), which contains a severe criticism of the relations between the Turkish state and newly forming corporations, he started a five-volume series of novels with the general title Aynanın İçindekiler [Those Inside the Mirror] (1973–1987), in which he developed characters that not only are politically involved, but also have unconventional sexual identities. These novels, though still widely read and discussed, had a mixed reception by critics due in large part to their unfamiliar and blunt sexual content.

In a period when sexuality was perceived as secondary in status to the problem of social inequality by rightist and leftist intellectuals, Attila İlhan depicted women characters who explored their sexuality without any limitations. Indeed, they appear as dominant partners in sexual relations. In his novels, sexual identity itself doesn't determine the political convictions of a character; however, it may have consequences on personal development. This discrepancy between the political and the sexual morality of the protagonists creates a tension that is never resolved by the author. Marxist critics harshly criticize his distinguishing sexual and political personae, since this is against a holistic perception of the individual.

The novel in which Attila İlhan develops his conviction of the necessary destruction of the dualism between femininity and masculinity is the highly controversial Fena Halde Leman [Leman Badly] (1980). Due to its unfamiliar sexual content, Leman met with hostile reviews, as many critics condemned İlhan for exploiting sexual themes to make profit.

This subversive novel starts as the protagonist, a famous businesswoman, Leman Korkut, strikes a deal with a French company just after the military intervention of 1971 in Turkey. A left-wing journalist witnesses the making of this deal and decides to investigate further. He later meets with Leman, who is disturbed by his investigations; but far from being dissuaded from pursuing them, he is intrigued by the juxtaposition of Leman's coarse, manly voice and her beauty. The journalist realizes that Leman Korkut is the wife of a deceased politician, Ekrem Korkut, who had committed suicide in Paris, where he exiled himself after the 1960 military coup. He also finds out that she was originally named Jeanne and is a half-Jewish French woman who later married Ekrem during the 1950s, changed her name, and settled in Turkey.

After Leman Korkut's sudden death in a car accident, the journalist receives her memoirs, which tell the story of a few months during an unspecified period between 1964 and 1970 when Leman went to Paris, lured by a mysterious letter concerning her husband's suicide.

With the memoirs the dry and measured narration of the journalist is replaced by a confusingly ornate narrative in which we learn the story of Leman Korkut's whole life through flashbacks. During her stay in Paris, she also meets some of her late husband's friends: the narcissistic Cécile, daughter of a rich family, who never lets anyone touch her but enjoys having someone else watching her masturbate; Lili, alias George, a blond, femme-fatale transvestite with a taste for physical pain, who is trying to raise money for a sex-change operation; Bobby, alias Victoire Kaunda, an African woman of male gender who is a sadist and impersonates women in night clubs; Pasha Nuri, an ex-communist Turk who is a masochist and surrenders to the tortures of an old woman for money; and finally Madame Pellegrini who pursues very young boys and pimps Lili.

As the narrative unfolds, even Leman appears as a sexually complex character, and we learn how she fell for her mother-in-law Haco Hanım during the early years of her marriage to Ekrem Korkut. Haco Hanım, who dies while making love to Leman, was the third wife of an Ottoman officer, whose earlier life and initiation into lesbian sex by one of her co-wives in her husband's harem are recounted by Attila İlhan in another historical novel, Haco Hanım Vay (1984).

In Paris, while simultaneously attracted to the two transvestites—Lili, the femme-fatale man-to-woman, and Bobby, the muscular woman-to-man—Leman starts to lose her sense of self, and she finds out that her husband has always wanted to have her as a boy, while she had strived to be a “real” woman for him, and that, never becoming conscious of each other's desire, they ruined a possibly harmonious relationship. She escapes back to Turkey to a dream world, in which the journalist would meet her as a businesswoman.

Curiously, although Fena Halde Leman is crowded with polysexual characters, the phallus is conspicuously missing in the novel. Apart from Lili's penis, which is mentioned once in a passive mood, and Bobby's rubber penis, the presence of the phallus is always made known by its conspicuous absence. Even though Ekrem's homosexual tendencies are implied, his sexual relationships with Cécile and Lili, are never fully depicted in the novel; nor are Leman and Ekrem's lovemaking scenes. In fact, Attila İlhan clearly focuses on the feminine sexual potential of women in his novels, while men, with suppressed feminine tendencies, are sexually silent.

In Leman, İlhan's belief that femininity and masculinity one day will merge into each other, erasing gender difference, is unabashedly put forth. While expressing this conviction, he creates one of the most intriguing explorations of gender confusion. Attila İlhan expressed his ideas on gender in two volumes of essays: Hangi Cinsellik [Which Sexuality?] (1976) and Yanlış Kadınlar Yanlış Erkekler [Wrong Women, Wrong Men] (1985). In these essays İlhan, exploring the progression of the merging of genders in world history, produced the first balanced work about diversity of gender roles in Turkey.

Unfortunately İlhan's work has yet to be translated into any of the European languages. This is possibly due to Attila İlhan's creative use of Turkish. Ornate with unconventional metaphors and archaisms and incorporating local usages and social codifications in order to reflect class and generational differences, Attila İlhan's language, as well as his innovative approach to sexuality, continues to have a profound impact on modern Turkish literature.

Biography

Attila İlhan was born in Menemen, Turkey. His first book of poetry, Duvar [The Wall], appeared in 1948.

SELIM S. KURU

---

IRELAND

---

Ireland is not a country readily associated with the erotic. Censoriousness and repression in the modern period, both pre- and post-independence, have colored perceptions of the island as a place deeply inimical to writings on the pleasures of the flesh. Yet, from the earliest mythological tales to the writings of James Joyce and Edna O'Brien, the erotic has been an area of continuous preoccupation and interest for the Irish writer. The centerpiece of the eighth-century Ulster cycle of mythological tales is the epic account of a giant cattle raid, Táin Bó Cuailgne. The Táin is held to be a masterpiece of early Irish literature and is important in giving us insights into the mores of pre-Christian Ireland. A central character in the tale is the Queen of Connacht Medb, who is explicit in asserting her right to her own sexual pleasure and makes love to one of her captains, Fergus, with the approval of her husband, Ailill, and indeed the tale ends with Medb urinating and menstruating three lakes. As Medb tries to recruit warriors to fight against her deadly foe, Cú Chulainn, she frequently offers the "companionship of [her] thighs" to her allies; and her daughter, Finnabair, is similarly free with her sexual favors. Such was the discomfort caused by the sexual frankness of the Táin that it would be 1976 before the first full, uncensored edition of the greatest epic in Old Irish would appear in English translation.

In another set of stories from the Ulster cycle on the birth of Cú Chulainn we are introduced to Fergus, whose name has been translated as "Male Ejaculation Son of Super Stallion." His virility was quantified by the claim that seven fists fit into his penis and that his scrotum was the size of a bushel bag. Such was the voraciousness of his sexual appetite that it took "seven women to curb him" unless he slept with Medb or with Flidais (the Deer Goddess), who used to "change thirty men every day or go with Fergus once."

One of the obstacles facing the transmission of erotic writing from earlier periods is that a considerable amount of secular literature was in fact written down by monks in the highly active centers of learning that were Irish monasteries in the early medieval period. The new patriarchal culture of Christianity viewed with deep suspicion the matricentered elements of pre-Christian Irish culture, and many early Irish lyrics depict monks heroically resisting the sexual allure of women. The shadowing of pleasure by the strictures of the evangelists can be seen in the ninth-century poem "A Bé Find" [Lovely Lady], where the poet situates his utopia in the sexual license of pagan Ireland but is aware of the finger-wagging of the Christian present, "Srotha téithmilsí tar tír / rogu de mid ocus fin / doíni delgnaidi cen on / combart cen peccad, cen chol [All around gentle streams entwine / Mead is drunk, the best of wine / The people have not learned to hate / It's not a sin to copulate]. The erotic in the early and late medieval period often finds its outlet in the displacement from the secular to the religious domain, with poems to Mary and the goddess-turned-saint Bridget particularly common in the Irish literary canon. Another motif is the monk who finds himself transformed into a woman, with the erotic confusion and excitement that ensues from this morphological twist. The influence of the amour courtois tradition from continental Europe makes itself keenly felt in late medieval Ireland, and many of the recensions of tales from the period, particularly the Fiannaíocht cycle, bear the traces of the oblique ecstasies of courtly love. In the most famous love story from the period, Tóraigheacht Dhiarmada agus Ghráinne [The Pursuit of Diarmaid and Gráinne], Diarmaid, a bosom companion of the warrior chief Fionn, elopes with Fionn's young fiancée, the love-struck Gráinne, who has placed Diarmaid under a spell. Initially, Diarmaid puts a fishbone between himself and Gráinne to prove to the pursuing Fionn that they have not been unfaithful to him. However, one day as they are crossing a stream, a spurt of water strikes Gráinne's leg and she notes that it is bolder than Diarmaid, and it is not long before they become lovers.

Their story became inscribed in the Irish landscape as the dolmens (ancient burial portals), which consist of one flat stone raised on top of two others, often referred to as the “beds of Diarmaid and Gráinne.”

As a result of the Anglo-Norman invasion, English and French were spoken as minority languages in late medieval Ireland, and it is from the latter half of the thirteenth century that we get an English-language text written down in Kildare, The Land of Cockayne, which is an anticlerical satire in verse, with copious couplings between various members of the clergy. Prominent in this text, as in Irish-language texts of the period, is an exuberant celebration of orality, with eating, drinking, and fornication linked in a charmed circle of excess. The Tudor and Cromwellian conquest of Ireland, which would begin in earnest in the late sixteenth century and see the final military pacification of the native population by end of the seventeenth century, causes the collapse of the Gaelic and Anglo-Norman aristocracy who were patrons of the Gaelic-language poetic elite. Irish still remained the majority language of the population, and the eighteenth century would witness the production of the great erotic masterpiece in Irish of the period, the 1,026-line Cúirt an Mheán Oíche [The Midnight Court], by the schoolteacher and poet Brian Merriman. However, as English became the sole language of public life, an English-language literature began to emerge which would eventually bring Irish eros to the forefront of world literature.

A spate of English-language translations of French drama for the Dublin theatre in the late seventeenth century provided the impetus for the work of Irish dramatists who began to form and exploit the genre of Restoration drama. Foremost among these dramatists were George Farquhar and Richard Brinsley Sheridan. In George Farquhar’s “Love and a Bottle” (1698), his first play staged in London at the Drury Lane Theatre, we meet Wildair and Roebuck, “Irish Gentlemen of wild, roving temper,” who ally libertinage and economic self-advancement. In Sheridan’s most successful plays, The Rivals (1775) and The School for Scandal (1777), the plots are rich in sexual suggestiveness, and much use is made of metaphor and figurative language to signal erotic subtexts and subplots to the audience. Indeed, part of the popular success of these dramatists related to their manipulation of theatrical conventions as a way of testing the sexual proprieties of the period. The Irish tradition of gothic fiction in the nineteenth century, from Charles Mathurin’s Melmoth the Wanderer (1820) to Sheridan Le Fanu’s In a Glass Darkly (1872) and Bram Stoker’s Dracula (1897) would explore transgression and extreme mental states in their various forms. Sexual tension and the erotic would be central to much of the speculation of Irish gothic novelists on the relationship between the sexes; and a constant preoccupation, articulated most fluently by Stoker, is the undermining of conventional reason by powerful, transgressive sexual urges.

Oscar Wilde, who was related to Mathurin, professed his strong admiration for Melmoth the Wanderer (1820), and gothic elements are strongly to the fore in The Picture of Dorian Gray (1889). Wilde, who was much influenced by writers of the French Decadent era, used the theme of the double in The Picture of Dorian Gray to explore the highly ambiguous nature of Gray’s sexuality, and in Wilde’s essay on Shakespeare, “The Portrait of Mr. W.H.,” he explicitly addresses the question of Shakespeare’s alleged homosexuality. His earlier Poems (1881) had already hinted at the erotic possibilities of forbidden love. Wilde’s biblical drama Salomé was refused a license in London in 1892, partly on the grounds of the undisguised eroticism of the relationship between Salomé and St. John the Baptist, and would not be staged until 1896 in Paris. Wilde would endure, of course, imprisonment and public opprobrium for his homosexuality, but his defense of homoeroticism both at his trial and in his posthumously published letter to Lord Alfred Douglas, De Profundis (1905), made him an emblematic figure for gay-rights activists in the twentieth century.

Wilde was not the only Irish literary figure who would attract the attention of the courts for what was deemed an unseemly interest in the erotic. In Ulysses (1922) Joyce explored the manifold varieties of the erotic and situated sexuality at the heart of the quotidian preoccupations of his Dublin men and women going about their daily lives. Molly Bloom’s soliloquy which ends the book was found to be particularly shocking because a female character was frankly assuming her sexuality and describing its pleasures. The Society for the Prevention of Vice had the serial publication of Ulysses in the Little Review stopped in 1920 on the grounds that it was pornographic. As a result, Joyce was forced to publish Ulysses in Paris in 1922.

IRELAND

That same year, the Irish Free State came into being, strongly influenced by the moral teachings of the Catholic hierarchy. The Censorship of Publications Act of 1929 initiated a period of sustained censorship of any material that was deemed to be “indecent” or even remotely touching on the erotic. A trenchant critic of the new legislation was William Butler Yeats, who in The Winding Stair and Other Poems (1933) gave voice (particularly in the “Crazy Jane” poems) to the full power of the erotic and deplored the baleful influence of life-denying prudery. Kate O’Brien, who broached lesbian sexuality in her writing, had two of her novels, Mary Lavelle (1936) and The Land of Spices (1941), banned in Ireland. Another pioneer in the literary exploration of the sexuality of women, from a heterosexual perspective, was Edna O’Brien, whose novel The Country Girls (1960) also fell foul of the Irish censor. The passing of a new Censorship of Publications Act in 1967 coincided with the beginnings of the liberalization of Irish society, which would gain momentum throughout the 1970s, 1980s, and 1990s. Writers now dealt much more freely with erotic experiences in different-sex and same-sex relationships in both English and Irish-language writing. Nuala Ní Dhomhnaill, Caitlín Maude, and Biddu Jenkinson have all explored variations of the erotic in their Irish-language poetry. Colm Tóibín in The South (1990), Desmond Hogan in Leaves on Grey (1980), Keith Ridgway in Standard Time (2001), and Jamie O’Neill in At Swim Two Boys (2001) have given expression to the subtle permutations of pleasure in the lives of their gay characters. Emma Donoghue in Stir Fry (1994) and Hood (1995), Mary Dorcey in The Noise in the Woodshed (1989), and Cherry Smyth in When the Lights Go Up (2001) have detailed the coming-of-age of the sexual awareness of their lesbian heroines and narrative personae.

Two distinctive notes on contemporary Irish writing on the erotic are, firstly, the foregrounding of a darker side to human sexual encounters and, secondly, the continuing presence of the satirical or the parodic. The first feature is exemplified by the writing of Dermot Bolger, in which the sexual is often a potent metaphor of frustration and failure; in novels such as A Woman’s Daughter (1987), the malignant consequences of a deeply repressive religious culture express themselves in exploitative and demeaning sexual relationships. The second feature is to be found in the work of writers such as Anne Enright, John Banville, and Aidan Mathews, in which the erotic is often the occasion for high comedy and, as in late medieval satire, the ridiculous and the sublime are to be found in close proximity. Constipated solemnity in the presence of eros is not often to be found, and there is frequently a kind of Beckettian wryness in the observation of human ecstasies. The Irish erotic tradition in literature has withstood the repeated assaults of church and state over the centuries to produce more than one thousand years of written celebration of the endless transfigurations of bodily pleasure.

MICHAEL CRONIN

Further Reading

- Carlson, Julia, ed. Banned in Ireland: Censorship and the Irish Writer. London: Routledge, 1990.
- Condren, Mary. The Serpent and the Goddess: Women, Religion and Power in Celtic Ireland. New York and London: Harper and Row, 1989.
- Ellmann, Richard. Oscar Wilde. London: Hamilton, 1987.
- Kilfeather, Siobhán. “Origins of the Irish Female Gothic.” Bullán: An Irish Studies Journal 1 (1994): 35–47.
- Marcus, David, ed. “The Irish Eros”: Irish Short Stories and Poems on Sexual Themes. Dublin: Gill & Macmillan, 1996.
- McKone, Kim. Pagan Past and Christian Present in Early Irish Literature. Maynooth: An Sagart, 1990.
- Nic Eoin, Máirín. B’ait leo bean: Gnéithe den idéolaíocht inscne i dtraidisiúin literartha na Gaeilge. Dublin: An Clóchomhar, 1998.
- O’Toole, Fintan. A Traitor’s Kiss: The Life of Richard Brinsley Sheridan. London: Granta, 1997.
- Rosenstock, Gabriel, ed. Irish Love Poems / Dánta Grá. New York: Hippocrene Books; Dublin: Roberts Books, 1996.
- Seymour, St. John D. Anglo-Irish Literature, 1200–1582. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1929.

---

IRIARTE, TOMÁS DE

---

1750–1791

Spanish dramatist, poet, and translator

The Erotic Poems

Cerezo and Millares Carlo-Hernández Suárez have attempted to clarify the textual status of poems scattered in manuscript and miscellaneous printed editions, but Iriarte's erotic poems have yet to be properly edited or seriously studied. The main sources are (1) Biblioteca Nacional (Madrid) Ms. 3744, entitled Poesías líbricas [Lubricious Poems] (probably added by a cataloguer), which brings together 19 texts, sometimes repeated and in different hands, and (2) the poems contained in Cuentos y poesías más que picantes (1899). The latter includes the outstanding "Perico y Juana," copied in various contemporary manuscripts and reproduced in printed collections from 1872 onward and recently the object of serious textual and critical attention. Though attributed to José Iglesias de la Casa in some early collections and appearing under alternative titles ("El siglo de oro" [The Golden Age], Iriarte's authorship now seems secure.

Written in the Italianate meter of the octava, used for pastoral or lyric poetry, "Perico y Juana" exhibits features of a popular style in its fluent narrative manner and simple, though refined, poetic language. The 24 stanzas move from a quarrel between Perico and Juana to their eventual reconciliation through making love. The context is pastoral, since the encounter takes place in the countryside, and the moral of the couple's behavior is drawn by the shepherd, who praises the value of reconciliation to girls from the nearby village. The original break in the relationship is provoked by Juana, but she equally initiates the action which leads to their making up. Her elegance and attractiveness is highlighted by the narrator as she makes her way to the shady valley where she asks to meet Perico. While waiting, she ties a garter to her leg, erotically lifting the lace-edged petticoats. A voyeuristic pleasure is transmitted through the narrator's voice, in exclamatory and even broken phrases, but without lowering the linguistic tone; thus when her underwear is raised, she reveals the "maravilla octava" [eighth wonder of the world]. The wonderment transfers to Perico, as he arrives, unseen by Juana, and admires the beauty of her body, which under thin clothing appears almost naked. Again her beauty, which the restrained, unexplicit description extends to hips, waist, thighs, and breasts, indirectly communicates her capacity to arouse. Perico's arousal affects both his imagination and his senses, and he embraces Juana with a "dulce fuego" [sweet fire] burning in his veins. His words focus on her breasts and mouth as he expresses the pleasure he receives from her embrace. But his boldness angers her, and ashamed at having caused offense, he retreats.

Once alone, Juana meditates on the capacity of love to blind; women who play hard to get and ignore their natural impulses fail to enjoy the pleasures which love offers. She attempts to rejoin Perico but catches up to him when he is "meando" [pissing], against a tree. This unexpected, and sole, use of a vulgar word is prepared for by the narrator's doubts as to whether to use it. The earlier voyeurism of Perico now transfers to Juana, who hides in order to see the previously covered parts of her lover's anatomy, the poem reverting to euphemism ("crecidas insignias de varón" [swollen male attributes])—and not without erotic literature's customary exaggerations about size. Rushing to clasp Perico, Juana makes the pair fall to the ground with their now bare lower parts coming into contact. Commenting that the couple enjoyed a golden age that morning, the narrator turns away from physical details to evoke the simplicity of lovemaking in the open and then, surprisingly, to note that the so-called frail sex readily sustains a male body in such circumstances. The physical responses become more passionate, and their coupling, in which Juana leads, is conveyed in terms of boats entering narrow straits. The intensity of movements and caresses leads to a climax which reduces Juana to silence. Perico, taken aback, speaks to restore her to normality, whereupon Juana slaps him, inducing a temporary faint. After further movements, they both fall asleep with Juana on top. A shepherd appears and marvels at the harmonious outcome of what earlier was disagreement and discord. The moral lesson addressed to the village girls seems male-centered, suggesting that Juana used her beauty to bring the reconciliation. The previous narration, however, revealed her as protagonist and equal participant in the lovemaking, while the mutuality of their feelings and pleasure are stressed.

Iriarte's other erotic poems are slighter pieces, many in shorter forms such as sonnets or the popular, 10-line décimas. Several are improvisations or responses to challenges from other poems, mostly belonging to what Spanish literature terms "festive poetry." The "Casóse el mayordomo" seguidillas (popular songs) exploit, in their light, rapid meter, the legendary insatiability of women, provoking a smile in the hearer. The sonnet "Con licencia, señora," a response to the question as to the finest feature of a woman's body, plays on the reader's expectations during the quatrains to end up answering in the tercets that it is her fine bottom. The sonnet "Cuando estoy del Amor, Filis, picado" is a spirited celebration of male pleasure in penetration. The redondilla, or round, "Dos finos amantes," concerning a pair of lovers who make love in a toilet, is not erotic, but merely stresses the power of passion to achieve satisfaction. The popular "En viendo la recatada" explains why different types of women yield to and enjoy sex. The sonnet "A una dama que fingió desdenes" rejects women's false show of disdain at being the object of sexual attention and at their capacity to arouse men. The sonnet "La resistencia" is a witty monologue by a woman during clandestine lovemaking, apparently not keen on it, but equally not resisting; it moves to a climax in appropriately halting phrases, ending with her desire for a repeat performance the following day. The sonnet, "La semana adelantada" wittily points up sexual inequality between an elderly husband and young, nubile wife—he claims he can be of service only once a week, which she accepts, thinking the situation could be worse, but ends up asking for a week on account. The thoughts contained in these poems belong to a venerable tradition, which Iriarte expresses with wit and in polished verse. An acceptance of sexual appetite is evident, as is the mutual enjoyment of both sexes, and hypocrisy is rejected.

Biography

Tomás de Iriarte belonged to a family of intellectuals hailing from the Canary Islands; his uncle Juan was Royal Librarian in Madrid, and his cultured brothers Bernardo and Domingo were prominent in cultural, political, and diplomatic life. Tomás was famed as a dramatist, poet, and translator, achieving celebrity outside Spain in translations of his literary fables and didactic poem on music. His linguistic skills gave him access to philosophical writings in English, French, and Italian, and an Inquisitorial investigation of him in 1779 confiscated works by Voltaire (L'Évangile de la raison, Dictionnaire philosophique portatif) and d'Holbach (Le Bon-Sens, Système de la nature), as well as a representative selection of erotic narratives in French (L'Académie des dames, Thérèse philosophe, Les délices du cloître, among others). His interest in materialist philosophy extended to sexuality, finding literary expression in a series of poems which were unpublished—and unpublishable, given government and Inquisitorial censorship—in his lifetime.

PHILIP DEACON

Editions

- Poesías más que picantes*. Las Palmas: Ultramarino, 1992. Anthologies including texts by Iriarte.
- Cancionero de amor y de risa*. Madrid: Joaquín López Barbadillo, 1917; facsimile edition, Madrid: Akal, 1977.
- Cancionero moderno de obras alegres*. London: H. W. Spurrual, 1872; facsimile edition, Madrid: Visor, 1980.
- Cuentos y poesías más que picantes (Samaniego, Yriarte, anónimos)*. Edited by "un rebuscador de papeles viejos" [an antiquarian researcher]. Barcelona: L'Avenc, 1899.

Further Reading

- Cerezo, José Antonio. "José Iglesias de la Casa" and "Tomás de Iriarte." In Literatura erótica en España: Repertorio de obras 1519–1936. Madrid: Ollero y Ramos, 2001.
- Gies, David T. "El XVIII porno." In Signoria di parole. Studi offerti a Mario Di Pinto, edited by Giovanna Calabrò. Naples: Liguori, 1999.

Millares Carlo, Agustín, and Manuel Hernández Suárez. "Tomás de Iriarte." In Biobibliografía de escritores canarios (Siglos XVI, XVII y XVIII). Vol. 4. Las Palmas, Grand Canary Island, Spain: El Museo Canario, 1981.

Palacios Fernández, Emilio. "'Los amores de Perico y Juana': Notas a un poema erótico del siglo XVIII." In Eros literario. Actas del Coloquio celebrado en la Facultad de Filología de la Universidad Complutense en diciembre de 1988. Madrid: Universidad Complutense, 1989.

Pinta Llorente, Miguel de la. "Problemas de cultura española. Decadencia y enciclopedismo." In Aspectos históricos del sentimiento religioso en España. Ortodoxia y heterodoxia. Madrid: CSIC [Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas], 1961.

---

ISTARÚ, ANA

---

1960–

Costa Rican poet and dramatist

Istarú's work—both her poetry and her plays—is characterized by her fiercely political commitment to the political and sexual liberation of women in Central America. It is marked by its erotic content, its subtle humor, and its giving of voice to women who have been victimized by political intolerance, economic injustice, and gender-based oppression. Istarú is an outspoken critic of social conventions that limit women's potential and of the political neglect that has imposed on women a greater burden of poverty and lack of opportunity.

Istarú's poetry is best known for its erotic content. Her goal, as she has argued frequently, has been to produce an erotic poetry that breaks away from the objectification of the female body that has characterized male erotic poetry in Latin America. This male-centered poetry has led to the creation of stereotypical images of the sexual woman, the most positive of which depict women's bodies as passive recipients of men's desire. Her objective as a poet has been to eschew these male patterns of female erotic representation by linking women's sexuality to both their inner lives (love, emotions, conflicts) and external concerns (politics/nation, economics). Her poetry, as a result, has been described by critics as work that seeks to sever connections to established molds, by extending women's erotic life to encompass most aspects of their being in society. Sexual delight, explicitly described, is never separated from the oppressive sexual mores of Latin American machismo, never far from a critique of the double standards applied to women as sexual beings, and never forgetful of Istarú's responsibility to strive for political and sexual freedom for women. In its celebration of women's sexuality and openly expressed desire, Istarú never forgets that the expression of women's erotic freedom is linked to political freedom and economic power.

Istarú's most mature plays are satiric comedies that sparkle with mordant wit, intelligent dialogue, and plenty of double entendres. Madre nuestra que estás en la tierra [Our Mother Who Art on Earth] (1996), with its irreverent feminist take on the Lord's Prayer, had its first performance at the Compañía Nacional de Teatro in Costa Rica in 1988. Baby Boom en el paraíso [Baby Boom in Paradise] (1996) is a one-woman show which Istarú has performed herself on many occasions, narrating the adventures of the female egg from ovulation to conception and then through pregnancy, detailing a woman's changing emotions and their impact on others. Its impudent comedic approach to pregnancy and labor has earned it admirers throughout Latin American and Europe.

In 2000, Istarú wrote and performed in her most critically lauded play to date, Hombre en escabeche [Men in Prickling Brine], a biting portrayal of Latin American sexual morality. The satire, whose main character is a young woman looking for love in all the wrong places, follows her relationships with the many men in her life (all played by the same actor) as they disappoint her, abandon her, or crush her heart. The gallery of men—which include her father, brother, first boyfriend, and most recent lover—constitutes an assembly of social types in familiar situations which Istarú dissects with sharp irony and satiric wit. The play, whose point of departure is a father's inability to love, allows Istarú to argue that men's disassociation of sexuality and love ultimately condemns them to incomplete lives and contributes to women's feelings of lovelessness and sexual frustration. These themes are linked in the text to Costa Rica's search for political stability in the tricky terrain where Marxism, neoliberalism, and a benevolent despotism lurk.

Biography

Ana Istarú was born in San José, Costa Rica, in 1960. She received a degree from the School of Dramatic Arts of the University of Costa Rica and is well known as a poet, actress, and dramatist. Istarú gained recognition as a poet at the age of fifteen, in 1975, when she won a national competition for young poets with Palabra nueva [New Word]. Her second book, Poemas para un día cualquiera [Poems for Just Any Old Day], was published in 1977, when she was just sixteen, followed by her third, Poemas abiertos y otros amaneceres [Open Poems and Other Dawns], in 1980. La estación de fiebre [Season of Lust], a collection of highly erotic verse, won the EDUCA (Editorial Universitaria Centroamericana) prize in 1983 and became a best seller in Costa Rica and throughout Latin America. It has been translated into several languages. Her other collections include La muerte y otros efímeros agravios [Death and Other Ephemeral Grievances] (1989), Verbo Madre [Mother Verb] (1995), and Raíces del aire [Roots of the Air] (1996). Her poetry has appeared in translation in highly regarded journals and anthologies in the United States and Europe. A selection of her poems, Poesía escogida, appeared in 2002.

Istarú is equally known for her work as an actress and dramatist. She claims to have learned to love poetry through her father and to have drawn her passion for the theater from her mother. As an actress, she has performed in her own plays as well as in Latin American and European classics and is the recipient of several awards, chief among them the Costa Rican National Award for a Beginning Actress in 1990, the National Award for a Lead Actress in 1997, and the Áncora Theater Award for the 1999–2000 season.

Besides the dramas mentioned earlier, Istarú also wrote El vuelo de la grulla [The Flight of the Crane] (1984). She has earned accolades internationally as the recipient of the María Teresa León Prize for Dramatists (1995), given by the Spanish Association of Stage Directors, for Baby Boom en el paraíso, and the Machado Theater Prize (1999), given by the municipal government in Seville, Spain, for Hombre en escabeche. Her work has been performed in Spanish and in translation in Costa Rica, Spain, Mexico, France, and the United States. She penned the script for Caribe, an award-winning 2004 Costa Rican film directed by Esteban Ramírez.

LIZABETH PARAVISINI-GEBERT

Selected Works

- Baby boom en el paraíso*. Madrid: Publicaciones de la Asociación de Directores de Escena de España, 1996.
La estación de fiebre y otros amaneceres. Madrid: Visor, 1991.
La muerte y otros efímeros agravios. San José: Editorial Costa Rica, 1988.
Poemas abiertos y otros amaneceres. San José: Editorial Costa Rica, 1980.
Verbo madre. San José: Editorial Mujeres, 1995.

Further Reading

- Chen Sham, Jorge. "La insurrección de la mujer y su estrategia liberadora en Ana Istarú: El poema III de La estación de fiebre." South Eastern Latin Americanist 44 (2000): 19–27.
 Hernández, Consuelo. "Feminidad y feminismo en la poesía de Ana Istarú." Alba de América 20 (2001): 209–20.
 ———. "Poetas centroamericanos de fin de siglo: Ana Istarú y Otoniel Guevara: Cuerpo y autoridad." Ístmica: Revista de la Facultad de Filosofía y Letras 5–6 (2000): 26–42.
 Krugh, Janis L. "La erótica fiebre feminista de Ana Istarú en La estación de fiebre." In Afrodita en el trópico: Erotismo y construcción del sujeto femenino en obras de autoras centroamericanas, edited by Oralia Preble-Niemi, 198–208. Potomac, MD: Scripta Humanistica, 1999.
 Moyano, Pilar. "Reclamo y recreación del cuerpo y del erotismo femeninos en la poesía de Gioconda Belli y Ana Istarú." In Afrodita en el trópico: Erotismo y construcción del sujeto femenino en obras de autoras centroamericanas, edited by Oralia Preble-Niemi, 135–52. Potomac, MD: Scripta Humanistica, 1999.
 Zavala, Magda. "Poetas centroamericanas de la rebelión erótica." In Afrodita en el trópico: Erotismo y construcción del sujeto femenino en obras de autoras centroamericanas, edited by Oralia Preble-Niemi, 245–59. Potomac, MD: Scripta Humanistica, 1999.

J

---

JAHIZ, AL-

---

c. 776–c. 868
Arab essayist

Abu ‘Uthman ‘Amr, known as al-Jahiz, wrote prose works on a variety of subjects, including a number of erotic-polemical works that provide a striking contrast to the “libertine” literature of his time. Al-Jahiz’s erotic writings must be understood in the context of the extraordinary flowering of Arabic literature in the early Abbasid period (749–945), in which authors devoted serious attention to the conflicts between their desire to follow the dictates of the Qur’an and their love of pleasure. While writers like the poet Abu Nuwas extolled the joys of drunkenness and the pleasures of sexual relations with young men, al-Jahiz’s work shows his unease with this love of pleasure. One finds him praising women and love, but condemning adultery and homosexual activity. He did not hesitate to write frankly of sexual matters, and even provided justifications for doing so when it suited his purposes. Elegant and ironic, the writings of al-Jahiz ultimately defended a conventional Islamic morality and a relatively strict interpretation of Qur’anic law, in contrast (and in reaction) to the libertine writings of many of his contemporaries.

Much of al-Jahiz’s work on sexual themes (including his “Difference Between Men and Women” and his “Diatribes Against Fornication”) is lost. Surviving compositions are often known only from fragments; thus his “Diatribes Against Sodomy” appears to have been part of a larger lost diatribe on schoolteachers and follows the general trend of al-Jahiz’s writings against homosexual relations. The most important of al-Jahiz’s surviving works on sexual themes are four compositions that secure his position as an important figure in the history of erotic literature. They are significant in part because they are so frequently cited and quoted in later Arabic works. The writings of al-Jahiz had a profound impact on the shaping of erotic discourse in the medieval Islamic world.

Love and Women

In Love and Women, al-Jahiz articulated his theory of the nature of love between men and women. He distinguished between affection and passionate love, seeming to praise the latter, although his analogies make it clear that there is a certain irony at work and that he is, in fact, satirizing the excesses to which many of his contemporaries went in pursuit of their passion. Al-Jahiz devotes much of this work to a discussion of women as love objects—their natures, the differences between free women and slaves, and the ideal appearance of a woman—but displays a viewpoint that is more sympathetic to women than was customary in his time.

Epistle on the Singing Slave Girls

This work is in the form of an open letter, ostensibly a defense of the institution of the qiyān: female slaves trained as singers and hired out as companions. The letter begins with a detailed justification of relations between men and women, appealing to pre-Islamic and early Islamic social practices as a seeming justification for the companionship of the singing female slaves. Al-Jahiz then gives a detailed description of these women, their talents, and their training. The real intention of al-Jahiz's epistle becomes clear toward the end: it is, in fact, a criticism of the merchants who own, train, and sell the services of these women. Pretending admiration for their sharp practices, al-Jahiz satirizes the owners of these slaves and, by extension, the men who deal with these slave traders. The work concludes with an ironic postscript disclaiming responsibility for the reader's possible offense.

Boasting Match between Girls and Boys

This composition, along with Superiority of the Belly to the Backside described below, is part of a tradition of literature debating the respective merits of young men and women as objects of sexual desire. It begins with al-Jahiz's famous defense of the use of "obscene" words by citing the use of such terminology by famous religious figures. He then places his work into the context of other such debate literature, abruptly leading into the actual debate between the lovers of young women and the lovers of young men ("fornicators" and "sodomites," respectively). The lovers of young men alternate between praising their beauties and making misogynistic observations, while the lovers of young women frequently invoke Islamic law and custom. Both debaters make frequent quotation of favorite authors, in some cases turning the same author to different purposes (as when the poet Abu Nuwas is first cited in favor of young men, then of young women). Al-Jahiz's sympathies were clearly with the lovers of young women, whom he permitted to have the final say. Al-Jahiz concluded this work with a series of anecdotes about sex to illustrate various aspects of the foregoing debate; these stories include jokes about sexual positions, penis size, gendered differences in the enjoyment of sex, and homosexual activity.

Superiority of the Belly to the Backside

This brief work purports to be a response by an uncle to his nephew's treatise in praise of the backside (and, by extension, the love of young men) and is written in a high-blown, elaborate style. It begins innocuously enough with a general comparison of the relative importance and beauty of the belly over the back in nature, and the narrator elaborates on his theme of the general superiority of bellies to backsides (for example, one cuts with the "belly" of a knife, not with its back, whereas the backside is what is always beaten or chastened). All this is, of course, a prelude to the main thrust of the argument: the superiority of sexual intercourse with women (via the ventral position) over sex with men (focusing on the dorsal) and, by extension, love of women over the love of men. The overall tone of the work is highly moralistic, with frequent appeal to the Qur'an and Islamic law presented as familial advice, and, in contrast to the Boasting Match described above, the language of the text is restrained and nonspecific. Al-Jahiz takes advantage of his avuncular narrator to present the argument in a condescending way, as the affectionate but firm scolding of a wayward young nephew, attempting to talk him out of his love of men.

Biography

Al-Jahiz was born Bahr al-Kinani al Fuqaimi al-Basri, in Basra (in modern Iraq) around 776. Educated in Basra; despite lack of literary background, decided to become an author. Early writings attracted the attention of the Abassid caliph al-Ma'mun in 817–8; moved to Baghdad shortly thereafter. Worked briefly as a scribe and teacher, but apparently held no official posts and relied on income from the dedications of his writings and (possibly) a governmental allowance. Retired to Basra in 861 in ill health, and died there in 868/9.

T.G. WILFONG

Selected Works

- Pellat, Charles. The Life and Works of Jahiz. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1969.
- Beeston, A.F.L., ed. The Epistle on Singing-Girls of Jahiz. Warminster: Aris and Philipps, 1980.
- Hutchins, William M., trans. Nine Essays of al-Jahiz. New York: Peter Lang, 1989.

Further Reading

- Pellat, Charles. "Al-Jahiz." In Encyclopedia of Islam, edited by C.E. Bosworth, E. van Donzel, B. Lewis, and C. Pellat. 2nd ed. 11 vols. Leiden: Brill, 1954–2001.
- . "Al-Jahiz." In Abbasid Belles-Lettres, edited by Julia Ashtiany et al. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990.
- Rosenthal, Franz. "Male and Female, Described and Compared." In Homoeroticism in Classical Arabic Literature. Edited by J.W. Wright, Jr., and Everett K. Rowson. New York: Columbia University Press, 1997.
- Rowson, Everett K. "The Categorization of Gender and Sexual Irregularity in Medieval Arabic Vice Lists." In Body Guards: The Cultural Politics of Gender Ambiguity. Edited by Julia Epstein and Kristina Straub. London: Routledge, 1991.

---

JAPANESE: MEDIEVAL TO NINETEENTH CENTURY

---

The Archaic Period to the Nara Period (710–794)

At the time when the Shintô, the way of the Gods, the ethereal cult of nature, was the unique identity of the Japanese, we note the parallel existence of Norito, a body of earthy rituals and magical formulas for down-to-earth problems, such as those collected during the Engi era in 927, dating back sometimes to the 7th century. For example, the "ritual of great purification" lists such offensive acts as cutting the skin, incest, or being subjected to the calamity of crawling worms. From the beginning, ugly reality is opposed to a quest for purity.

The Kojiki [The Book of Things That Are Now of the Past], published at the beginning of the 8th century, relates, among other facts, the birth of the Japanese islands in a cosmic sexual act, followed by the union of Izanagi and Izanami, each child being a new island in the archipelago.

More than in the Nihongi, the mythical image of a supernatural feminine figure can be found in the Kojiki with Amaterasu, an "angry mother," in a Jungian sense, angry because she was the victim of sexual violence, but at the same time showing her genitals, dancing in a naturist ecstasy. Unveiling her genitals, or her breast, can paralyze the enemy or stimulate the warrior's courage. Amenouzume's dance can awaken the whole of nature. These primitive representations of feminine sexual power will be later found in modern literature.

The Manyôshû was collected around 760 and contains sômonka [love poems] and banka [elegies]. Passion is expressed in a very subtle manner, but directly. Most of Manyôshû focuses on the private relations between men and women. The Azuma no uta (poems from the oriental provinces) show how lovers met various obstacles. Above all, love was supposed to increase the harmony of the group.

The Heian Period (794–1186)

The Heian was the period when the ideal of Japanese civilization was seen. During the 10th century, life reached a high degree of refinement, especially in literature. Poets and aesthetes were numerous, as were amorous affairs. These behaviors were very open, though a mere sensual passion was never the ideal. The lover is aware of the seasonal changes, and feels a deep melancholy.

Poetry is present with the Kokinshū (collected in 905); popular poetry, such as the Iroha-uta, along with prose about both genders, such as the first tales (the Taketori, Ise, and Yamato Monogatari). In the Kokinshū, one of the main lyrical themes is love, but it is quite different from the transitive, physical love of foreplay and sexual intercourse, as appears in the Man'yōshū. Rather, the Heian period presents an intransitive, contemplative love [mono omou] which is the subject of abstract reflection. This tradition presents the image of the lover in a dreamworld, with the best-loved poems being descriptions of misty landscapes. But there were some exceptions, such as poems written by court ladies like Ono no Komachi and Izumi Shikibu in the Shinkokinshū and in the Goshūishū (11th century), which treat more practically of a psychology of sexual relations.

Fujiwara no Akihira compiled the Honchō monzui in the middle of the 11th century. It contains several pornographic pieces, such as the “Danjo kon’in fu,” which begins by describing the sentimental attractions, then proceeds to a detailed description of sexual acts. Another example from this collection is the “Tettsuiden,” which is a parodic discussion of the penis in the formal manner of a biography from Confucian wise men whose names are all suggestive of the male organ. These themes come from Chinese literature, in which pornography appeared in both prose and poetry.

In numerous tales in the Ise Monogatari (905–951), sometimes funny, mostly sentimental, are related the amorous exploits of a mukashi no otoko, an ex-lover, an “old boyfriend,” supposedly Ariwara no Narihira (825–880), a nobleman and great seducer of women. He is known for his libertinage and for his poetic talent. He is never ashamed of his passion and always takes great pleasure in sex with many partners. This stance is historically significant, because the Ise Monogatari expresses for the first time an individual ideal of hedonism between the sexes. The Ise Monogatari gave birth to an aesthetic form and a Don Juan-like figure essential to understanding the Heian culture. Love is possible on both single and multiple levels, is never to be refused, doesn't decrease with age, and is not divided into carnal and sentimental love. This foundation will be reaffirmed and integrated into the modern age.

Upper-class women in the Heian period had two options to escape from boredom: love and literature. Hence, the masterpieces of the Heian were written by women, in pure Japanese syllabary, both as novels and diaries. The Makura no sōshi of Sei Shōnagon (first years of 11th century), for example, is not chronological in the sense of being a nikki (diary), but is a sōshi, more like a journal capturing the feelings and fantasies of the writer. Both the Makura and the Genji Monogatari [Tale of Genji] (c. 1000) depict Japanese eros at length. The famous Tale of Genji, by court lady Murasaki Shikibu, tells of the love affairs of the radiant and handsome Prince Genji, focusing on his amorous adventures and on the court intrigues surrounding him and his son after him. The Tale is supposed to be illustrative of the vanity of all things human, especially human love. The sexual act is always suggested in an indirect way, and love is manifested in terms of psychology and emotion. In the poems, instead of using explicit terms for coitus, the verb “to chat” is often used.

The Genji Monogatari is an invaluable source for analyzing Japanese eros. For example, the best-loved part of feminine beauty is long hair, and the naked body is appreciated even less than a “nice hand,” that is, beautiful calligraphy. The ideal of femininity is then crystallized, and the Tale is precisely a quest for the essence of women. We see this quest echoed in Ihara Saikaku's character Yonosuke, who seeks an encounter with femininity through cultural criteria. Prince Genji is not a Don Juan, despite his numerous relations with at least ten featured female characters and plenty of anonymous ones. The Heian organization of relations was based on polygamy. Concubines didn't arouse jealousy, and the women benefited from a relative sexual freedom. Love experience was merely part of the transient nature of human life. It was also an aesthetic one and a cultural emotion, as much as a pure physical pleasure. Pleasure was connected to clothing and to a stagecraft of love. Infidelity was neither definitive nor absolute. Feelings were enriched by a subtle balance between faithful and unfaithful love.

These works were written by and for literary and highbrow courtiers. By contrast, the Konjaku Monogatari (c. 1120) is based on anecdotes belonging to popular literature. The Konjaku gives us a very raw image of everyday life during the Heian, with no subject forbidden. It is written in a cinematic way, showing the reality of death and physical love, which would have been in extreme bad taste according to the criteria of the lady Murasaki Shikibu, for example. And yet, though explicit, the Konjaku is not perverse—in contrast to the swing toward treatments of sexual perversion in court literature after Lady Murasaki's Genji Monogatari. The world of the Konjaku is one of quick action—one story inspired Akutagawa Ryūnosuke to write Yabu no naka, which became the basis for Kurosawa's film Rashōmon. The sexual organs are a matter of general interest. The most vile love is described, such as sexual intercourse between the empress and a demon in front of the court, including the emperor. Heichū, the famous libertine and poet, is driven by his interest in scatology, and all sorts of excess are described in the 30th book, devoted to love stories. Especially of note are those tales devoted to the couplings of monks and beautiful ladies of the capital, which inspired popular songs.

The violence and crudity of these pictures of a society at this point in time can be linked to the fact that this society was at the end of its existence. The noble and idealized world of the court is reverted to real life, full of lust and violence. The Heian period ends with the reign of uncultured warriors from the provinces, such as the first shōgun, who ruled Japan from Kamakura. From Heian to Edo culture, the warriors seemed more inclined to homosexuality or wild sex and didn't pay much attention to faithful women—except to sentence adulterous women to death, an idea that will not be shared by the middle class.

The Kamakura Period and Beyond (1186–1603)

During the Kamakura (1186–1332), poetic creation continues with the Shinkokinshū (1205), among many other poetry books, and the most famous collection of all, the Hyakuninissshū [One Hundred Poems by One Hundred Poets] (c. 1235). The semiotics of love are common to both this and the Heian period. The frozen or wet sleeve in the winter night, the grass, the wind, and the cold dawn express indecision—a sleeve wet with tears is also the image suggested by archbishop Jien (Kamakura period) to indicate separation and longing. Sorrow at parting with one's lover is expressed through images such as damp or fallen flowers. And although life is short, Ki no Tomonori writes: "to meet you / I would give it without regret" (Kokinshū 12, 615). In short, what is exalted above all is a romantic image of love suffering through separation and wait. The pleasure of love and the sensual aspects of it are rarely expressed in these poems.

The Nambokuchō period (1332–1392) and the Muromachi period (1392–1603), like the Kamakura before it, are not rich in literature, though the monk Kenkō's Tsurezurekusa (c. 1335) is an original essay about many feelings and ideas, especially women and the sensual desire of men. Even those most attuned to spiritual life can't escape the lusts of the flesh: incense, white legs, and beautiful hair arouse sexual desire. But the monk is mainly misogynistic.

Beginning with the Heian period, neither homosexual nor heterosexual relations were mentioned, except rarely. But in the haikai renga, the Muromachi period, and there alone, allusions to male and female sexual organs are numerous, in total contrast with Heian court poetry. The effect is humorous and iconoclastic, and these poems were very popular. The ballads called ko uta are love songs, some of which treat of sexual passion.

The Tokugawa Period (1603–1868)

The moralist Kaibara Ekiken (1630–1714) represents the vulgar pleasures as quickly changed into sufferings, and is well known for his educative role. He published the Onna Daigaku, which was an aristocratic manual for girls education. This kind of book was quickly adopted as sexual education books later on. According to the Confucian idea, women should be submissive to their husbands and should not have any kind of intimacy with any other men. If they deviated from these rules, they were ostracized and subject to great community shame. This strict code is apparent in the coming novels, especially those of Ihara Saikaku.

The Edo (1603–1686) and Genroku (1688–1704) Periods

The chōnin [merchants] were the premier literati of 17th-century Japan, their novels describing the real social life of that time. In an urban culture, the new meeting points for artists and writers were usually in the “pleasure world,” which included prostitution districts like Shimabara in Kyôto and the Yoshiwara in Edo. Ihara Saikakuto (1641–1691) dedicated himself above all to erotic stories, and described thoroughly the life of debauchery in these places.

Kôshoku ichidai otoko (1682), one of the first ukiyo-sôshi [“social novels,” romans de mœurs], is a portrait of Yonosuke, a middle-class erotomaniac of the Edo period, obsessed with sex, women, and beautiful young boys. He paid for sex thousands of times with women in kuruwa [brothels]. The novel has no direction except for what is provided by the multiple sexual episodes, but it does describe the somnambulism and brutality of clients. This is also a feature of Kôshoku ichidai onna (1686), which is the story of a voluptuous woman—a courtesan and a whore—detailing the events of her generally picaresque life.

Kôshoku ichidai otoko ends with a trip on a boat called “Yoshi-no-maru” [The Voluptuous Boat], sailing to the “women’s island” [Nyogo no shima], a no-return trip into sensual exhaustion. This finale is linked to the Buddhist philosopher’s island—a device also found in Nosaka Akiyuki’s Pornographers (1966) and in some masterpieces of the filmmaker Imamura Shohei. The seducer in the “Maboroshi” [ghost, illusion] chapter of the Genji Monogatari comes to a similar end.

Yonosuke is looking to seduce as many women as possible; he is a maniacal collector of spoils (as was usual for clients of courtesans), but he has no emotions. He is incapable of affection—compared with Prince Genji, who aimed at knowledge about women more than at sensuality. Prince Genji experiences variety to find the ideal, which would not be far away from the coming ideal of the geisha. He savors the passing of time in a positive way to remember his many loves fondly, while Yonosuke is never satisfied with time. His accounts as a “collector” and fetishist is done in a negative way. Among the perversions presented is sacrilege, in the depiction of the profanation of priestesses in a Shintô temple, but this is considered a game and a social gaffe rather than a sin. There are few perversions expressed in the Genji Monogatari; one of these is Genji incestuous desire for his absent mother. Although he never actually passes to the act of incest. The myth of the androgynous is not present, but there is a narcissism rooted in the original incest of Izanami and Izanagi (myth of the origins of the country). Yonosuke has only one major perversion, and that is fetishism (hair, nails, underwear, images). In the Genji Monogatari, signs such as calligraphy, poetry, music prepare the erotic encounters. The most intimate encounter is with the face of a woman, not with her naked body. Clothes are particularly erotic, and the feminine body is a fictive one, of phantom-like beauty, as will be suggested later on by Tanizaki Jun’ichirô in In’ei raisan [Praise of Shadow] (1933). Eroticism is cultural, and linked to dream and illusion. The naked body is not attractive, but clothes enable it to be explored in an extension of foreplay in the darkness, sometimes leading to mistakes, but pleasure nevertheless.

Clothes and perfumes are means for the conquest of the other. Modesty is another essential part of the erotic code—for example, the woman hiding the lower part of her face, or her mouth. Shame (haji) excites male desire. The term hazukashii [“I feel ashamed”] is often used by women to entice desire, and is a medium for sexual pleasure. The physical act is never described precisely by Saikaku, the reader is able to perceive it indirectly. Often, there is no communication, and coitus takes place in silence, with a sleeping beauty (anticipating the necrophilia of Kawabata or Tanizaki). It is a fundamental aspect of Japanese eros. Through drunkenness, too, a distance is created, and there is no significant contact with the other’s soul.

The story of Yonosuke can be seen as a parody of the Genji Monogatari, in so far as the hero similarly fades into legend. The way the hero argues about the qualities and defects of women is related to a systematic erotic quest; Yonosuke, like Genji, can be subject to melancholy. The difference lies in a new challenge: create an authentic love with courtesans trained to pretend to be in love. In the literary point of view, the celebration of natural beauties (flowers or moonlight) has to be replaced successfully by the description of the kuruwa. An idealization of courtly behavior—the sui, or iki—emerges. It is an art of life with pleasure, elegance, and ostentation. One sex is striving toward the other, in a pre-orgasmic eroticism. This code of gallantry, iki, evolved into ikiji, courage, which was borrowed by the bushido [the way of warriors], and into akirame [resignation to a situation].

Sexual desire was to be cultivated without any genuine affection, which was a departure from the Heian ideal of love. The Edo ideal was a gallantry based on a fantasy. The perversion lay in the consciousness that the venal love was only an elegant comedy. The sui spirit was a perverted heroism and mysticism, because the middle class had no political power. To spend one's money and energy with courtesans was the only challenge available.

However, the novels of Saikaku contain a bitter charge against prostitution: he denounces the violence under its erotic refinement. The relation between sex and money came to obsess the author. After his death, five posthumous books were published, among which was The Moon of That Floating World (1693). It deals with the destiny of brothel clients, and is a testimony to the "floating world" (ukiyo) he described so well. One theme of these short stories is the client ruined because of courtesans. The book strongly condemns the hypocrisy of the kuruwa: theatricality based on money. The complete destruction of the client is the only way to put an end to the farce. The prestige of the pleasure districts is replaced by disillusionment and misery. This universe is one of ruin and solitude, but it also leads to detachment and freedom. In The Life of Wankyu, the title character is inspired by the kabuki theater and by a real Osaka merchant. The debauchery leads to ruin and insanity. He becomes a champion of eros. Symetrically, the merchant's ethic is no longer unidimensional (accumulate a fortune or be ruined). In the pleasure world, the merchants have acquired a sense of elegance, or sacrifice. The ruined client, banned from the courtesans' districts, has a free mind like the warrior ready to die.

Yonosuke was also a ruined daijin. The kabuki theater created a type of the ruined young man rejected by his family, which is not the daijin type. Yonosuke, thanks to a large fortune, becomes a super-daijin (dai-dai-daijin) and is desperate because he cannot put an end to his money with courtesans. Yoden, in The Great Mirror of All Pleasures, can be considered the prototype of the daijin. In the end, he immolates himself over a fire made with all the letters he received from courtesans. We can deduce that at the end of the 17th century, money took over male seduction in the pleasure districts. Sui could not be attained since financial ruination would come long before.

The middle class tends to appropriate the trappings of aristocratic culture. It takes its inspiration from Urabe Kenkō, a retired aristocrat, and to his Hours of Idleness, where it is considered that love is an essential experience for sensitivity.

The warrior ethic has as its finale death or entry into Valhalla, but homosexual love introduces an internal contradiction. As for nanshoku [homoeroticism, or male-to-male love], we can note the success of Nanshoku ōkagami [The Great Mirror of Male Love] (1687) published simultaneously in Osaka, Kyōto, and Edo. The men in power, the samurai, could only approve the entry of nanshoku into the Japanese literature tradition. It is not synonymous with homosexuality in a Western sense, because neither homosexuality, heterosexuality, nor sodomy were operant concepts in the Japanese 17th century.

Nanshoku is opposed to joshoku [woman-to-woman love]. Nanshoku is the sexual pleasure experienced between men. It is neither a court model, like that of the Chinese, nor a popularized version of the kabuki nanshoku pattern. In the Heian period, nanshoku was considered as immature and was marginalized.

The Great Mirror of Male Love is divided into two parts. The first is dedicated to monks and samurai; the second to the prostitute-actors of kabuki theater (where the female roles were played by onnagata, men). The social intermixing through sex, above all hierarchy, was intensive, but the perfect nanshoku way is expressed by warriors and monks.

The Japanese tradition goes back to the Chinese model (nanfeng, or "passion of the cut sleeve"), and extended through the urbanization of Japan. The feudal model was based on seniority, and the cadet was subordinate to the elder. Young men, sometimes vassals, were used as domestics. Around 1600, the young partners were educated to be passive and to look like women, without behaving like them. A common pattern was for a samurai to become a pariah (hinin) or a wanderer (rōnin) but still be in love with his master (daimyō).

Middle-class men in this context are presented as having no other interest than money and sexual adventures. They experience ukiyo or hakanai, the ennui of world. The warriors have to wear a mask or hide their nature, but nanshoku is for them an ideal: the perfect warrior is young and part of the nanshoku. Many realities are to be understood under that term: bisexuality; onnagirai [pure homoeroticism]; the taste for young men [shôjinzukû]; homophilia; or love of beautiful or girlish young boys. The physical appearance of the warrior is strictly defined. The hair is cut on the sides of the head [maegami], and a codified language is used (e.g., kiku [chrysanthemum] = anus).

As for monks, nanshoku became a main pattern of monastic life—the Buddhist Kûkai (Kobo Daishi) is said to have introduced the first coitus between men, in the monastery town of Mount Koya. For the monks, it was a compromise between abstinence and heterosexual love, the worst investment for Buddhism, and of less energetic cost in yang (i.e., maleness, creation, solar power). The chigo (novice) who enters a temple as a trainee becomes a partner in a fraternal and at the same time homosexual link [kyôdaichigiri].

No moral objections are made to male–male love, apart from those of Confucianism (one does not marry, one squanders the family fortune, one contributes to public disorder). On the contrary, the warriors deprived of glory in war could spend their fighting energy in that way. The Great Mirror of Male Love thus becomes Saikaku's roman de moeur [ukiyo-sôshi] serving as the mirror of what was expected by a society that mainly approved of nanshoku.

After the ukiyo-sôshi, came the kusa-sôshi [graphic novel] and the sharebon [the “smart,” or witty novelette or pun book], such as those of Santô Kyôden in 1787–1791, whose licentious tales were forbidden.

Two publishers in Kyôto, Ando Jishô and Ejima Kiseki, from Hatchimonjiya, published many licentious novels at the beginning of the 18th century, and then the movement spread to Edo with the sharebon, which would be forbidden by the government in 1711. Then the ninjôbon [books about human feelings] appeared, above all in the first half of the 19th century with Tamenaga Shunsui (1789–1842), but they were also quickly prohibited, as their basis was pornography.

At the same time Jippensha Ikku (1765–1831), introduced the comic novel [kokkei-bon] who would publish no less than 331 books. The Hizakurige (1802) is a well-known travel narrative on the Tokaido road. His gallic spirit and strong, realistic genius can be compared to that of Rabelais. Shikitei Samba (1775–1822) wrote early in his life naturalistic and then comic novels. Among many works, the Ukiyo-buro (1809–1811), about the world of the public baths, and the Ukiyo-doko (1811–1812), about the world of the barber's, are composed of encounters and chats in the promiscuity of naked bodies of many kinds of people. In the Ukiyo-buro, Samba uses kyôbun [crazy prose].

Drama

The kabuki theater is the popular and vulgar version of the Nô theater. It made its appearance in the Muromachi period. It can be linked to the kyôgen component of Nô. The origin of it is Okuni, a former Ise priest who fled to Kyôto, then went to Edo with a troupe of actors, and was considered to be of low morality. The women were no longer allowed to play in the kabuki theater from 1629. The courtesans' theater was then replaced by a young boy's theater, which was forbidden again. Chikamatsu Monzaemon (1653–1724) wrote more than a hundred plays and is considered to be the creator of the Japanese popular drama. Historical dramas were full of suicides, murders, and violent events; the comedy of manners related sensual passions. Takeda Izumo (1688–1756) was the direct descendant of Chikamatsu.

The love quest can become a death quest, if affected by dark impulses from the unconscious. Lovers sometimes have to escape, and this is a common theme of novels, such as those of Saikaku, like Kôshoku gonin-onna, and many dramas. Lovers are often sentenced to death, according to the bushido ethic, but readers and the public didn't approve of it. They often commit shinjû [double love suicide]. The government censored dramatists like Chikamatsu who made of shinjû the turning point in their dramas. Saikaku never showed shinjû because he denounced its idealization through the influence of the theater. The heterosexual love described by Saikaku is subversive according to the Tokugawa criteria: it is a total love, independent in death, like that of O-Sen and Maemon. The subversive heterosexual love of Oshichi, for example, may be traced back to the heretical celebration of love by the monk Ikkyû (1394–1481), author of erotic poems written under Zen influence. The experience of love in Saikaku's works is at the margins of official Buddhist thought.

Manuals and Poetry

Two essential fields are to be mentioned, because they were long-term cultural facts, and because they were so popular that they concerned the major part of the society: the makura-e [pillow book], shunga [spring illustrations], and higa [secret drawings]. They are mentioned as early as the 10th century, and are not made for laughter, as may be suggested by one meaning of the term warai-e or warai-bon. They were intended to give a sexual education. In the classical sense, warau means sexual pleasure. The aim of these books was to show how the couple's affection can be expressed bodily, according to the Kojiki (the 8th-century tale of Creation), and to the first coitus of Izanagi and Izanami. Coitus expresses the natural pleasure within the lover's happiness. During the Edo period, these books were published especially for young people in order to give them precise help and advice for sexual life. This was particularly relevant for girls, who were supposed to be virgins and thus completely ignorant of the physical nature of men. The young men have to decipher the words uttered by girls during coitus. These books were anatomically precise, describing organs, as well as showing them in action. The qualities of the vagina are connected to the appearance of the face [rokkaisen]. Technical pages are devoted to dildos (or olisbos) and various accessories, while proper nutrition and medicines for the sex act are explained. In the spirit of the kyōka, or burlesque poem, noble classical language is subverted into an erotic one. It is not a sense of modesty that determines why figures are drawn not entirely unclothed, but rather a sense of aesthetics, for complete nudity was not considered to be sexually attractive.

For example, the Manual to Have a Hard-On Like Shimekawa in Order to Possess Women is a parody of a famous book for female instruction, The Teaching Letter of Imakawa for Women, written in 1394 by Imakawa Ryōshin. The former book is attributed to Takeda Kichi, and was republished more than 20 times between 1687 and 1865; dozens of other books were published under a similar title during the same period. So, the meaning of the parodic title was common knowledge.

The second fact is that haiku was associated with comical poetry: parody, pun, and comical situations were their basis. After Saikaku's novels, around 1700, everything seems to be a subject for poems. The topic (maeku) given by a master receives an answer (tsukeku) written by the client. It is a new exercise called maekuzuke, which becomes a craze all over the country. Senryū, born in Edo in 1718, becomes the master of it, in 1757, under that pen name. From 1844, after the death of that master, maekuzuke was designated as senryū. Any kind of subject could become a senryū, such as the neighbor's life, conjugal life, and the Yoshiwara courtesans. The themes—"husbands-lovers, domestics, courtesans"—were placed inside the books in parallel series. The erotic senryū deal with the monastic world, the inaccessible court ladies (known through the olisbos they ordered, for example), the widows, couples, courtesans, and domestics. To give an idea of the importance of senryū, the Yoshiwara was the theme of at least 110,000 of them, among those selected by masters. The authors could know by experience the life of a monk or warriors but the life of court ladies had to be imagined, as a fantasy world. The main books published in Japan during this period were Yanagidaru [The Willow's Barrel] (1765–1838) and Suetsumuhana [The Flower of the End] (erotic senryū written from 1776 to 1801). The erotic poems were related to real places of Edo and the surroundings of Yoshiwara. At a time when Christianity was being implanted in Japan, and with it the idea of "sin" and "purity of the body," the writing and reading of these poems was a kind of antidote.

MARC KOBER

Further Reading

On Japanese literature in general

- Katō, Shūichi. Histoire de la littérature japonaise. "Inter-textes" series vols. 1 and 2. Paris: Fayard, 1986.
 Lévêque, Pierre. Le Japon des mythes anciens. Colère, sexe, rire. Paris: Les Belles Lettres, 1982.
 Revon, Michel. Anthologie de la littérature japonaise des origines au Xème siècle. Paris: Vertiges, 1986.

On Japanese erotic literature

- Faure, Bernard. Sexualités bouddhiques. Entre désirs et réalités, l'homosexualité féodale. Editions le Mail, 1994.
 Leupp, Gary P. Male Colors: The Construction of Homosexuality in Tokugawa Japan. Berkeley, Los Angeles, and London: University of California Press, 1995.

Plugelder, Gregory M. Cartographies of Desire: Male-male Sexuality in Japanese Discourse, 1600–1950. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1999.

Pons, Philippe. D'Edo à Tôkyô. Mémoires et modernités. Paris: Gallimard, 1988.

Struve, Daniel. Saikaku, un romancier japonais du XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle. “Les Orientales” collection. Paris: PUF, 2001.

Walter, Alain. Erotique du Japon classique. Paris, NRF Gallimard, 1994.

---

JAPANESE: TWENTIETH AND TWENTY-FIRST CENTURIES

---

It is difficult to separate the 19th and 20th centuries in any study of Japanese literature, as the turning point in modern Japanese history is marked by the beginning of the Meiji period, which spanned from 1868 to 1912. This was the real starting point of modern Japanese literature, and of Western influence. On the other hand, Japanese literature is very coherent, and traditions are passed on from one period to another and developed with continuity. Ueda Akinari is a good example of this process, in his Ugetsu Monogatari [Rain and Vague Moon Stories], published in 1776, and his Harusame [Spring Rain Tales], which was published prior to the 20th century. Both deal with abnormal or supernatural events. Ueda was very talented in describing ghosts and beautiful women of fantasy. Mori Ogai is another case of an author of the Meiji and the succeeding Taishô period (1912–1926). In 1890, his short story Mahimé [The Dancer], a love story of a Japanese student and a young girl from Berlin, marked a sudden change in Japanese literary tradition and caused a significant aesthetic quarrel.

Young writers were attracted by Zolaesque Naturalism, which was taken to be a holistic system of understanding life, especially the sensual awakening of the individual through sexual feelings. The first work in the Zola manner was Jigoku no hana [Hell's Flower] (1902) by Nagai Kafû. Writers began to use their own experiences in first-person novels [watakushi shôsetsu]—e.g., Shimazaki Tôzon, whose actual relationship with his niece was revealed in his novel Shinsai [New Life] (1918) and caused a scandal. Also scandalous were the life and works of Tayama Katai (1872–1930), whose taste extended to detailed observations and raw descriptions of life. Though he didn't seek immoralism, his Futon (1907) was a form of defiance against traditional morals. Considered obscene at the time of its publication, it describes the repressed love between young Yoshiko from the country and Tokio, a writer who is supposed to teach her the art of writing. Tokio has a moral choice between satisfying his desire for Yoshiko and fulfilling his social role as a protector. Tokio is jealous of Yoshiko's lover, Tanaka, and the crux of the novel is whether Yoshiko and Tanaka have slept together. As a modern “Meiji girl,” Yoshiko probably has. Mori Ogai deals with various themes, from love to the description of sexual experiences, in Vita Sexualis (1910). He reacted to Naturalism in a negative way, calling it “impudent.” Vita Sexualis was for him an anti-Naturalist manifesto, with his medical knowledge employed to create a parody of realism, but the book was temporarily forbidden as immoral.

In the margins of Naturalism, around 1910, writers like Kafû Nagai (1879–1959) began to appear. He published short stories with a poetical aesthetic linked to cynicism, a perspective to be further developed by Tanizaki Jun'ichirô (1885–1965). Kafû was unable to reconcile the social pressures he observed at the end of the Meiji period, and a sort of renunciation led him to cynicism. Proclaiming himself the heir of Edo Ukiyo-sôshi and the “Gesaku” (entertainment) authors of the Meiji, Kafû dedicated his works to the description of the new pleasure districts, trying to capture some of Edo's old prestige. He embodied the "man of taste" [fûryûjin] and the bunjin tradition of refined cultivation. At 37, he dedicated himself completely to literature, as a sort of refuge, and to elegant works for the theater, like Sumida River (1909) and The Nights of Shimbashi. Kafû wasn't driven to suicide out of a sense of regret, like Arishima Takeo, who wrote about his deep love affair and struggle against hypocrisy in Aru Onna [A Woman] (1919)—rather, Kafû fell in love with a married woman and committed suicide with her. This act was reminiscent of the dramas of Chikamatsu, at a time when shinjû, or suicide pacts between lovers, was still popular. Yet, in Waidan [A Squalid Affair], Kafû examines the circumstances of and condemns adultery. A libertine, he was proud to have had sexual relations only with geishas, or professionals, of whom he wrote accurate observations. He could not understand the experience of Arishima. His play Sumida River represented an escape to the Yoshiwara "village" of pleasure houses. In the face of the Occidentalization of Japan at the end of the Meiji, his final answer was to become a gesakusha, or entertainment writer, so as to lose himself in dealing with only the world of pleasure.

Tanizaki Jun'ichirô was strongly encouraged by Kafû, and professed an amorality he called "diabolism," which was rather provocative. Tanizaki was a prolific twentieth-century writer and compared himself to Kafû, whose conception of "art above all" won his admiration. However, he disapproved of Kafû's erratic sexual life and charged that Kafû despised women as inferior and doll-like—an observation also made by Nosaka Akiyuki. Tanizaki himself, on the contrary, considered women to be superior to men. He spent most of his life as a married man, and his writings explored love in middle-class society. Although both he and Kafû took male-female relations as their primary source of inspiration, the two writers belonged to different cultural traditions—Kafû to the bunjin and Tanizaki to the yoruri [chanted recitative]. The bunjin were delighted with iki, or being "chic," and hated falling in love; love and suicide was exalted by their dramatists, like Tsuruya Namboku (1758–1829), who celebrated the impulses of cruelty and submission. These elements were to be the basis of Tanizaki's literary world. He was drawn to his beautiful mother with an almost oedipal force. The beauty of her skin in particular and her way of walking attracted him. As a little boy, he had been a victim of sadism, which may have forced a predilection for masochism into him. His first sex-maniacal works may be traced back to Western models, such as those of Poe, Baudelaire, and Wilde.

Shisei [The Tattoo] (1910) is characteristic both of Tanizaki's Decadent inspiration and of diabolism. The work is about a woman with a spider tattoo on her back who is a kind of femme fatale. The tattoo master Seikichi takes pleasure in having his clients suffer through needles. Then, he introduces the soul of a dead cruel Chinese princess into the tattooed girl, and becomes the first victim of that beautiful monster.

In In'ei Raisan [In Praise of Shadow] (1933), Tanizaki describes woman's beauty as being like a ghost, with her fragile body wrapped in the kimono. He develops also the idea that Japanese skin is slightly colored from the inside, and his explanations refer to a very peculiar erotic taste. He establishes a contrast between Western and Japanese cultures in terms of the explicit and the implicit, the liberated and the repressed. From 1935 to 1938, he was engaged to translate the Genji Monogatari [The Tale of Genji] into modern Japanese, but he had to expurgate the amorous passages, and he had to interrupt the serialized publication of his own Sasameyuki [The Makioka Sisters] (1943–48), because military censorship during this time was all-powerful.

In representative Tanizaki works such as Shunkin shô [Story of Shunkin] (1933) and Kagi [The Key] (1956), affective and sexual relations are examined out of any social or economic context. Two kinds of relations can be observed. In the first one, a man is devoted to a woman, or becomes attached to her, and takes pleasure in the sufferings she gives him (e.g., Chijin no ai [An Idiot's Love], 1924). In this scenario, a woman may have several lovers. The second kind is a detached observation through fictional narrative of the sexual relations of a couple, from Tadekumushi [Some Prefer Nettles] (1928–29) to Kagi. In this scenario, a third person, usually a man, is introduced into the triangle. In Kagi, jealousy arouses sexual desire. The husband wants to give and receive suffering at the same time. For instance, as an aphrodisiac, he puts his drunken wife into a scalding hot bath before taking pictures of her. He asks a young man to develop the photos in a shared voyeurism; he also encourages adultery, with the help of his own daughter. He is driven to his death through oversexed sexual activity, using drug injections to be able to have intercourse until the last moment. The point is that he and his wife share hidden diaries, and the key to their diaries is also the key to their sexual and unconscious worlds. This bold treatment of the amorous was a first step toward freedom in the Japanese literary expression of sex. The elements of perversion must be distinguished from mere pornography because they are treated with artistic detachment.

With Fûten Rôjin Nikki [Diary of an Old Man] (1961–62), Tanizaki takes up the subject of sex in old age, a variation on his earlier themes. The diary is that of a decrepit old man, suffering from high blood pressure. Though impotent, he is attracted to his daughter-in-law, and takes pleasure in kissing her feet and biting her toes. The story reaches a climax when he identifies her with a Kan'on figure and takes a print of her foot dabbed in red ink to be carved on his tombstone. The nearly dead man indulges in a masochistic fantasy of being walked on by a holy femme fatale. This dream of the old man is a summary of Tanizaki's lifelong concern with the quest for eternal womanhood. We see this fixation also suggested in Haha o kouru ki [Yearning for Woman] (1919), in the form of an idealized figure who arouses foot fetishism. Tanizaki managed to describe various types of sexual love which he then applied, macrocosmically, to Japan. For example, he dealt with peculiar subjects, such as the daydreams of a blind man about feminine beauty, or sex between a young blind woman and a man who becomes blind in his turn. The novels where sadomasochistic relations are described are numerous, and the male characters often behave in fetishistic ways.

Women are able to attract and master men, whereas men seem to identify and fulfil their lives through a woman's body. These carnal relations are not presented in terms of the Christian dichotomy of body and soul. The flesh is not sinful, and sex has no diabolical origin. The Buddhist disgust for life's pleasures is not present either. Man has to grasp the physical nature of his life. The Confucian ideological system began to collapse during the Meiji period, worn out by individualists such as Kafû. It then became possible to represent characters living an absolute love. Other heroes, by being very close to death, are likewise delivered from social constraints and can let a hedonistic sexuality come out.

Inspired by the Konjaku Monogatari [The Tale of Konjaku] and other stories, Akutagawa Ryonosuke (1892–1927) was obsessed with madness, before he committed suicide, and his “vague uneasiness” became everybody's concern. The insanity of his mother produced in him the fear of becoming himself insane. Mixing the images of his mother and his sister as a composite, he idealized an eternal female figure. While still a student, he published Rashômon (1915). The director Kurosawa combined it with another tale, Yabu no naka [In the Grove] (1922) for his renowned film. In these novels begins Akutagawa's obsession with the infernal, a central theme in Jigoku [The Hell Screen] (1918). Set in pre-feudal imperial Japan, the story focuses on the painter Yoshihide, nicknamed Saru-hide, “monkey-like face,” who finds difficulty in finishing a work in which the central scene is of a woman enveloped by flames in a carriage. The model of the woman is his own daughter. His demonic passion predominates; he has no attachment to the lives of others and sacrifices his daughter to the desires of Lord Horikawa. This same infernal vision of life is seen in the classic Rashomon story Yabu no naka, in which although the fact is clear that the bandit Tajomaru raped the wife of a warrior, who is found dead, so many variations of interpretation are woven in the narrative. Akutagawa didn't expose his real life in the sadomasochistic manner of the Naturalists. He was talented in creating historical fiction drained of the context of his own life. To him has been attributed an erotic tale called Akaibôshi no onna [The Red Hat Girl], and to Kafû Yojôhan fusuma no shitabari [The Secret of the Small Room]. The first was published by Seisaburô Oguro in his review Sôtai, which between 1913 and 1930 published the works of the Sôtaiikai group of about 300 writers doing research in sexology. The second was first published in 1940, and then in 1947. The story of their publications is enmeshed with that of censorship and interdiction.

In the life and works of Kawabata Yasunari (1899–1972), a tension exists between life and death, between abstraction and sensuality; the author's consciousness of beauty is melancholy. His Yukiguni [Snow Country] (1934–1947) follows a very coherent plot. Shimamura, a married man, is attracted to two different types of women in a mountain resort. Yôko is inaccessible, in the manner of the childlike entertainer in the author's earlier Izu no odoriko [Izu Dancer] (1926), toward whom the protagonist is compelled to feel only brotherly affection. In contrast, the geisha Komako gives herself to him. Thus, Shimamura lives a tension between his entirely physical love for Komako and his ethereal love for Yôko. But ironically, it is Komako who belongs to the world of transience, while Yôko is made of flesh and blood. Kawabata's sensual approach to beauty not only is related to the feminine body, but spreads to objects like a piece of Chijimi linen and to the snowy landscape. His sensibilities, like those of haiku poets, are sharp and precise. And the precision becomes suggestive. In a Nô perspective, Komako appears like the shite, or main character, and Shimamura as the waki, or foil. The last scene, in which Komako rushes to embrace the body of Yôko, who has burned in a fire, has the powerful effect of a Nô drama's ending. Even the stars in the night sky and the play of lights can have an erotic effect on the narrator. Kawabata was especially interested in the connection between the beauty of young girls and traditional arts, as in the novel Sembazuru [A Cloud of White Birds]. He describes the beauty of a cup as if the light would give it a sensual aspect, like a woman's skin. The same type of images can be found in Yukiguni. The woman can be fondled like porcelain, and the objects become sensual. This aesthetic attitude toward women is continuous. Women are always beautiful objects. The extreme of this attitude is reached in Nemureru bijo [The Sleeping Beauties] (1960–61), in which, in a strange house, an old man contemplates and caresses a drugged young woman.

Other stories by Kawabata, like Tampopo or Kataude, express the idea that women have to be seen (and cannot see their lovers during orgasm), or are reduced to the most erotic part of their bodies. He used the short story to express his peculiar sensuality and his sense of beauty. Women and men are only one aspect of various sensual impressions.

The Sleeping Beauties is a farewell to what Kawabata loved: the female body. The girl is completely anonymous and is offered for caresses and longing. After a few hours, the client will enjoy the pleasure of dreams, remembering forgotten loves and faces, thanks to drugs. This is a deep meditation on women's mystery. Eguchi concludes by thinking that they are infinite. Another aspect is that the old man feels that his virility is going away. He can scarcely bear his impotency, in a country where the phallic symbol is so very important. His loss of potency is mirrored by the girls limp body. Beauty and sadness are closely linked. Kawabata may belong to the genre of tender and feminine literature [taoyameburi], but as the woman is at the center of Japanese literature, even the self-styled masuraoburi—virile literature—is rather feminine.

This is exemplified in the works of Mishima Yukio (born Kimitaka Hiraoka, 1925–1970), a psychological and aesthetic writer. Kamen no Kokuhaku [Confession of a Mask] (1952) is the autobiography of a homosexual. It has been said that Mishima glorified erotic death. In fact, he associated eroticism and death in the precious style of the Japanese romantic school. He represents the emotional and Eros-related part of Japanese culture, as in Yukoku [Patriotism] (1961), one of his many works made into films. The integrity of the lieutenant and of his wife through death is identified with their passionate lovemaking. Mishima was influenced by Georges Bataille's theory of Eros. In The Sailor Who Fell from Grace with the Sea, a young widow, a sailor, and a teenager meet. Voyeuristic activity is featured on the part of the teenager, who observes the sailor nude, in a scene in which male nudity is exalted over that of the female. Discovered, the young peeping tom is disgusted by the sailor's lack of a virile reaction, and he decides to kill him. Mishima became immersed in bodybuilding and built himself a more manly body by lifting weights. He strove for a moral strength in Japanese society which he saw as having been eroded by Dazai Osamu, who succeeded at last in committing suicide with his last girlfriend. Mishima too killed himself with his male lover. He created his own right-wing army, the Tate no Kai, a sort of harem of young men drawn from among the Jietai (the Japanese Self-Defense Forces). He considered that Japan without an army was like a woman that could be raped by anybody, whereas an army would be a phallus for a reconstituted man. He dreamt about the young samurai of the Tokugawa period, who hoped to restore imperial power in an erotic love for their master. Through his seppuku, or ritual suicide, he found union with one of his obsessions, the martyrdom of Saint Sebastian, for which he posed in a carefully staged scene. The beautiful body suddenly driven to death is a very sensitive theme, linked to the love for cherry blossoms, the symbol of the samurai.

It is easy to detect literary elements in Mishima's works: he was fascinated by Mauriac, Radiguet, and the sadism and satanism of Baudelaire. The morbidity and frailty of Mishima were disguised, contrary to Dazai Osamu, Mishima's contemporary and rival. Mishima wore a mask. Yet, Confession of a Mask treats clearly of sexual perversion. Mishima was drawn to Joan of Arc, whom he misconceived as a man. His perversion was connected to death through a fascination with soldiers. The picture of Saint Sebastian by Guido Reni led him to his first experience of ejaculation. Death, love, and eternity stand out from the beginning in his works. His sensual perversion and inability to love women emerge from other characteristics. The mask may be the hero himself who pretends to love women and yet is unable to do so. Kinkakuji [The Golden Pavilion] (1956) is the story of a satanic criminal. He adheres to beauty as an ideal aesthetic value, and therefore, he cannot attain the fullness of life, and is again unable to make love to a woman. Shiosai [The Sound of the Waves] (1954) finds a positive value in the perfection of physical beauty. In that short story, the main character embodies the fullness of life through an ideal of physical strength.

Among postwar writers, Kobo Abe and Oe Kenzaburô produced important works. Both of them deviate from Japanese tradition. The novels of Kobo (born in 1928) present the alienation of the individual trapped by society like an insect, beginning with Suna no onna [The Woman in the Dunes, 1962]. The Kafkaesque allegory depicts how a man, in a state of deprivation, takes on beast-like instincts as he metamorphosizes. The woman is associated with an animal and with sand, or nature. Teshigahara's film shows well the mineral appearance of her skin and focuses on the grain of her naked body. The insect catcher falls into the sand-hole where she lives, and the two become sexually intimate, out of any sentimental love. The sand-hole can be associated with a vagina. Kobo Abe likes to describe how a man can be driven to a complete loss of identity. For example, the insect catcher doesn't want to go back home anymore after he knows that the woman is pregnant. In the story, Japan and Japanese society play no role, except in terms of a peculiar sensuality. The woman is for him at the same time a liberation and a destruction through sexuality. He is swallowed, and the images become repetitive, in an archaic way of life, similar to the return to the origins, the forest in the island in Oe Kenzaburô's works, like M.T. and Other Stories of the Forest. Born in 1935, Oe Kenzaburô received the Akutagawa prize for Game Raising (1966). He is representative of the youthful spirit after the war.

MARC KOBER

Further Reading

- Bonneau, Georges. Histoire de la littérature japonaise contemporaine (1868-1938). Paris: Payot, 1940.
- De Vos, Patrick, ed. Littérature japonaise contemporaine. Brussels and Paris: Editions Labor/Editions Philippe Picquier, 1989.
- Forest, Philippe. Oé Kenzaburô - légendes d'un romancier japonais. Paris: Editions Pleins Feux, 2001.
- Griollet, Pascal, and Michael Lucken, eds. Japon pluriel: Actes du cinquième colloque de la Société française des études japonaises. Paris: Picquier, 1995.
- Littérature d'extrême-orient au Xème siècle*. Paris: Picquier, 1993.
- Magazine littéraire*, nos. 216-217, March 1985. Special issue on Japanese literature.
- Nishikawa, Nagao. Le Roman japonais depuis 1945. Paris: PUF/Ecritures, 1988.
- Pérol, Jean. Regards d'encre - Ecrivains japonais 1966-1986. Paris: La Différence, 1995.
- Rimer, J. Tomas. Modern Japanese Fiction and Its Traditions. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1978.
- Shuichi, Katô. Histoire de la littérature japonaise. "Inter-textes" collection, vol. 3. Paris: Fayard, 1985.
- Sieffert, René. La Littérature japonaise. Paris: POF, 1986.
- Snyder, Stephen, and Philip Gabriel, eds. Oe and Beyond: Fiction in Contemporary Japan. Honolulu, HI: University of Hawai'i Press, 1999.
- Walker, Janet A. The Japanese Novel of the Meiji and the Ideal of Individualism. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1979.
- Yamanuchi, Hisashi. The Search for Authenticity in Modern Japanese Literature. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1978.

---

JAYA DEVA

---

Twelfth-century
Indian poet

Gita Govindam

The Gita Govindam is a highly acclaimed poem which opens with the description of the ten avatars (reincarnations) of Vishnu, the god in Hindu mythology who nurtures and sustains all living beings in the world. Its author, Jaya Deva, was a dedicated devotee of Lord Jagannath, the deity of Puri in Orissa, and was also a disciple of Nimbarka, founder of the Radhavallabha sect, whose members gave hitherto unknown prominence to Radha as the loving consort of Lord Krishna. Legends claim that Padmavathi would sing with him the verses of the Gita Govindam at the newly built temple in Puri, and it was the only song to be sung in front of the Elder Lord (Balarama) and the younger lord (Jagannath) during their ritual bedtime worship, a practice continued to this day. The Gita Govindam's fame has spread to every corner of India, inspiring great mystic saints like Chaitanya Prabhu and Bhakta Meera Bhai and a host of others all over India, and is part of the daily chant at the Rameswaram temple in the southernmost tip of India.

The Gita Govindam enjoys a unique position in Sanskrit literature due to the fluid cadences of its lyric sequences and a perfectly knit poetic structure, which together create a peerless combination of poetry and music. The song's cadences are based on alliteration, rhymes, and captivating words that enthrall the reader. The book features the springtime love play of Radha and Krishna, featured in various ragas (fully developed melodies) and strung together as richly orchestrated symphonies. The poem is divided into twelve sargas, or chapters, of 24 songs, including the first 2 invocatory songs in praise of Lord Vishnu's 10 avatars, titled Dasavatara stuti, enumerating the 10 avatars: Matsya (fish), Kurma (tortoise), Varaha (boar), Narasimha (man-lion), vamana (dwarf), parasurama (divine), Rama (virtuous one), Balarama (Lord Krishna's brother), Buddha (Gautama Buddha), and finally, Kalki (mighty warrior). Each incarnation addressed a particular human need and the divine, benevolent response to it, which always showed unlimited compassion and infinite variations of mood, temperament, and ability, and emphasized the ultimate truth—the goal of a final communion with the divine being.

Blending devotion and mystical experience, the songs feature only three characters, Radha, Krishna, and the girlfriend-cum-messenger. An enchanting lyrical drama, the Gita Govindam depicts the divine lovers' inevitable estrangement and final reconciliation. The songs essentially are distributed between the three of them as their speeches, and the links of the story are provided by verses introducing each sarga. Using familiar rhythm and rhyming verses, Jaya Deva evokes a picturesque narration depicting the three stages of love between the divine couple: incidences of Lord Krishna's flirtation with the Gopi (cowherd) women of Brindavan, which is reported to his consort Radha by the girlfriend, followed by Krishna's penitence and Radha's rejection of him despite her inner longing. Finally, due to Krishna's entreaty and her friend's advice, Radha forgives Krishna, and thus brings about their reunion and the final consummation of their love. All human emotions associated with love—jealousy, desire, hurt, anger, separation, persuasion, and reunion—are expressed in full lyrical ebullience, and inimitably connote humans' quest for a spiritual union with God.

The open eroticism, lucid descriptions of the attractions of the female body, and graphic recital of the various aspects and details of the love play between Radha and Krishna are unique features of this poem, which evidently symbolize the final union of the individual soul [atman] with that of the universal [paramatma], achieved through total abandonment and complete surrender. The language and imagery are truly indicative of the intensity of the devotee's love in all its multifarious moods. The true value of the poem rests in its rich devotional content and the spiritual expression it gives to the devotee's yearning for the blessings of Lord Krishna and Radha. A highly original composition, the Gita Govindam is a trendsetter in its use of simple Sanskrit (devoid of the classical rigor that characterizes the language of earlier poetry), new idioms, and extensive melodious rhyme, and its break from the classical mould in form and metrical formation. It also served as a precursor to later Bhakti (devotional) poetry that came to be written in Indian vernacular languages and which was characterized by the effusion of love for the godhead. The Gita Govindam perfected and popularized the idea of Radha as the eternal consort of Krishna. Through the depiction of their amorous love play, the Gita Govindam established the pivotal role of Radha, and thereafter the idols of the celestial couple were installed and worshipped at several temples in eastern India.

The verses of the Gita Govindam have inspired dance forms, specifically Odissi, in which the lyrics are set to different ragas and have evolved into great musical compositions, which to this day delight enthralled audiences. Jaya Deva's poetry also animates Rajput and Pahari miniature paintings, the temple architecture of Orissa, and a host of other art forms all over India.

Biography

A native of Orissa-Bengal in the northeastern regions of India, Jaya Deva lived during the latter half of the twelfth century CE and served as the court pundit of Sri Lakshmana Sena, the king of Bengal. Born to Bhojadeva and Bama-devi, Jaya Deva was raised in the Birbhum district of West Bengal in a village called Kendubiva Gram, and was married to a temple dancer, Padmavathi. An annual festival called Jaya Deva Mela marks the anniversary of his death, which falls on Pausha Sankranti Day and is still celebrated today at the Puri Jagannath temple.

RAVI KOKILA

Editions

Love Song of the Dark Lord: Jaya Deva's Gita Govindam. Edited and translated by Barbara Stoler Miller. New York: Columbia University Press, 1977.

Further Reading

Ayengar, N.S.R. Gita Govindam: Sacred Profanities: A Study of Jayadeva's Gita Govinda. Original Sanskrit text with English translation. New Delhi: Penman Publishers, 2000.

Chandra, Moti. Gita Govindam: Paintings. New Delhi: Lalit Kala Akademi, 1965.

Siegel, Lee. Sacred and Profane Dimensions of Love in Indian Traditions as Exemplified in the Gita Govindam by Jaya Deva. New Delhi: Oxford University Press, 1978.

---

JAYE LEWIS, MARILYN

---

1960–
American writer and anthologist

Marilyn Jaye Lewis (1960– ) is a prolific writer and editor of erotica, working in several genres from queer erotica and bondage-discipline/sadomasochism (BDSM) to heterosexual erotic romance novels. She worked as a singer-songwriter in New York City folk clubs over a thirteen-year period in the 1980s and early '90s, meeting with minimal success. During the queer zine explosion of the early 1990s, she began writing erotic short stories with same-sex and BDSM themes. Her first published story, “Draggin’ the Line,” a lesbian BDSM story, was published in Bad Attitude in 1990, and “The Urge Toward Jo,” in which two girls experiment with spanking and masturbation, was published in Frighten the Horses the same year. She published several stories in queer zines during the following years and later was frequently published in anthologies.

Continuing to write mostly queer-oriented fiction, she worked in 1996–97 as head writer for Dada House, a bisexual CD-ROM game that won Best Adult Game of 1997. Becoming interested in electronic media, she began a website, Other Rooms, in 1997, featuring the work of several well-known erotica writers. Following this, she produced Marilyn’s Room, a multimedia website, in 1998–2000. The site featured erotic stories, art, films, photography, and nonfiction, and at its peak was attracting 3–4,000 visits daily. She founded the Erotica Author’s Association, with an accompanying website, in 2002, though the group became moribund by the end of the following year. She currently has a personal website at <http://www.marilynjayelewis.com>

Lewis worked as a Web producer for the New York erotica publisher Masquerade Books, which published her first book, Neptune and Surf, in 1999. The book contained three erotic novellas, including the title piece, set in Coney Island, about a romantic entanglement between a prostitute and a client.

Her writing won her the Erotic Writer of the Year award in the UK in 2001; the Mammoth Book of Erotic Photography, which she coedited with Maxim Jakubowski, was nominated as Erotic Book of the Year in the same competition in 2002. She was also a finalist in the William Faulkner Writing Competition in 2001 and won the New Century Writer’s Award that year.

Working from time to time as an editor of anthologies, like her collaboration on The Mammoth Book of Erotic Photography, she also presented The Big Book of Hot Women’s Erotica and That’s Amore!, a collection of four erotic novellas to which she contributed as a writer as well. In 2003 Lewis began working in the erotic romance market, with her first three books in that genre—When Hearts Collide, In the Secret Hours, and When the Night Stood Still—published by Magic Carpet Books. In 2004, Alyson Publications published Lust: Bisexual Erotica, collecting the best of Lewis’s short stories, many of them previously published in anthologies during the preceding ten years.

Lewis’s work always features a superb use of pacing. Writing at lengths of from 1,500 words to novels, she shows a marked ability to bring a scene up to speed with economy and focus, but also to weave a multitude of character threads into a scene to give it context and weight. Unhesitant to use the most bawdy or direct language when necessary, she gives a scene erotic tension by making it clear why an encounter matters to the characters, what they’re risking, and what they stand to gain. Lewis’s writing is also marked by a willingness to push her characters’ comfort levels. Many of her stories feature a heroine whose sex life is varied and experienced but who in the course of the story discovers an unexplored area (often anal sex, sex with another woman, or both) and embraces it. Other stories feature interplay between an innocent and more experienced, older lovers; but contrary to the reader’s expectations, the ingenue’s combination of simplicity and purity winds up confounding the more experienced characters even as they seduce her. Another striking feature of Lewis’s work is that no matter how outré the sexual acts, they are rarely depicted as horrid or filthy. Alienation and depravity are rare. Even when one of the characters is taken aback by another’s desires, the desired act invariably is an expression of love.

Biography

Born July 22, 1960 in Columbus, Ohio; educated in Ohio public schools, graduating high school in Columbus in 1978; studied recording and audio engineering 1981–83; moved to New York City and worked as a professional singer-songwriter in folk clubs 1982–94 under her maiden name, Marilyn Jaye, and later as Marilyn Jaye Lewis.

MARK PRITCHARD

Editions

The Mammoth Book of Erotic Photography, with Maxim Jakubowski. New York: Carroll & Graf, 2001; London: Constable Robinson, 2002.

The Big Book of Hot Women’s Erotica. New York: Venus/Book of the Month Club, 2003.

That’s Amore! New Milford, CT: Magic Carpet Books, 2004.

Lust: Bisexual Erotica. Los Angeles: Alyson Books, 2004.

---

JELINEK, ELFRIEDE

---

1946–
Austrian author

Elfriede Jelinek's third novel, Die Ausgesperrten [The Excluded] was originally published in 1980 and started life as an audio play produced by and for German radio in 1978. In 1979 the text was also worked into a film script by the author and the director Franz Novotny, although the cinematic production was not released until 1982, with Jelinek herself in a cameo as a stern schoolteacher.

In some ways, Jelinek's novel is reminiscent, both in conception and style, of Bataille's Story of the Eye—and the French philosopher is intermittently (mis)quoted by the book's protagonist—yet it draws much more extensively on the meanderings of internal monologues (direct speech is the exception, which greatly reduces the relational dimension of the book's language) and is more broadly concerned with formulating a critique of sociopolitical constellations and a certain type of mass-market ideology. Die Ausgesperrten is also less overtly pornographic than Bataille's work (although descriptions of sexual acts are by no means absent), and its eroticism is predominantly situated in its pangaic of the intellectual and sensual pleasures of senseless violence. In its depiction of eroticism as a self-serving expression of interpersonal cruelty, emanating from deep-seated emotional and ideological discontents, the book induces a more complex and less negotiable set of effects than the erotic literature of transgression, and is more profoundly disturbing than explicit novels in the pornographic genre.

In Die Ausgesperrten, Jelinek draws upon an actual 1960s case of a Viennese high school student who brutally assassinated his entire family after reading the work of Albert Camus, in order to portray the hopelessness, despair, and estrangement of four youths who embark upon a project of senseless violence as a means of escaping the suffocating hypocrisy and absurdity of their social living conditions. Set in Vienna in the late 1950s, when the promising future of the Wirtschaftswunder (the postwar economic “miracle”) left many people hopeful yet also alienated and in search of new securities, the novel offers an extraordinarily bleak picture of the degradation of a traditional class society. In addition, it makes the reader privy to the difficult gestation of a new Americanized culture and the self-delusional aspirations of adults and youngsters, parents and children, regardless of class and background. In this fragile network of relationships, violence is shamelessly eroticized, eroticism is selfishly instrumentalized, and cruelty is either trivialized as a pleasant pastime or glorified as a sublime aesthetic value, all in the service of pseudo-philosophical ideals of annihilation. Tragically and mercilessly, love is reciprocal only in the narcissistic fantasies of the protagonists. Outside these fantasies it is merely a deceitful commodity, which is used either as a ransom or as a pretext for the pursuit of self-aggrandizing goals.

The group of “misfits” around which Jelinek's narrative revolves is made up of the unbearably pretentious Rainer Maria Witkowski; his talented but not very attractive twin sister, Anna; the ethereal rich kid, Sophie (von) Pachofen; and the working-class hero Hans Sepp: four disenchanting adolescents representing three social classes and one personal ideal, that of transcending the meaninglessness of their existence through the paradoxical affirmation of the virtues of non-meaning. Under the supposed leadership of Rainer, the group's individuals detach themselves, each in their own way, from what they experience as the ideologically tainted norms and values of their social world. Like most adolescents, they hate their parents, despise rules and regulations, and believe themselves to be intellectually superior, above the law, and endowed with a unique critical sense. What makes them different, however, is that they express their sense of entitlement (and the emotional unease associated with it) through random acts of violence and, especially in the case of the Witkowski twins, a progressive mental detachment from communal, “massified” life. Yet Jelinek also shows how the most self-absorbed withdrawal and the most deeply felt hatred for social conventions is hidden behind a deceitful, mendacious mask of compliance. This is especially conspicuous in the case of Rainer Witkowski, although it is difficult to gauge which of Rainer’s two faces (his private persona of solipsistic nihilism or his public appearance of materialistic indulgence) is the most truthful one.

Perhaps inevitably, the group’s antisocial pact and the specific internal dramas of each of its members are also an obstacle to the development of solid relationships within the group and to the maintenance of the group as such. Rainer is in love with Sophie, and so is Hans, yet Sophie is not interested in either of them, despite the fact that both Rainer and Hans are convinced that she is. Hans has sex with Anna, who is in love with him and who believes that the feelings are mutual, yet Hans is interested only in sex, and really only in sex with Sophie. Shockingly, Rainer has to admit that he cannot plant a bomb in the school because he cannot jeopardize his final exam, and so Sophie and Hans do what the “weak leader” is incapable of doing because of his conventional concern for his own academic future. Equally shockingly, Rainer does not take revenge on Sophie and Hans, but brutally assassinates his twin sister, his father, and his mother in a cold-blooded orgy of death and destruction, before turning himself in.

In 1990, Jelinek’s book was translated into English with the ironic title of Wonderful, Wonderful Times. Despite the international acclaim her work has received (culminating in the 2004 Nobel Prize in Literature), Jelinek’s literary oeuvre, and especially Die Ausgesperrten, remains rather understudied in the Anglo-American world. Most of the secondary literature (criticism, textual analysis, and biographical research) is in German and awaiting translation.

Biography

Elfriede Jelinek was born on October 20 in the town of Mürzzuschlag in the Austrian province of Styria. Her father was of Czech-Jewish origin and her mother came from a prosperous Viennese family. She studied music at the Vienna Conservatory and theatre and art history at the University of Vienna. She was, controversially, awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature in 2004.

DANY NOBUS

Selected Works

- Die Ausgesperrten*. Reinbek bei Hamburg: Rowohlt, 1980; as Wonderful, Wonderful Times, translated by Michael Hulse, London: Serpent’s Tail, 1990.
 “Die Ausgesperrten.” Radio play. In Das Wunder von Wien. 16. österreichische Hörspiele, edited by Bernd Schirmer, 225–61. Leipzig: Reclam, 1987.

Further Reading

- Claes, Oliver. Fremde. Vampire. Sexualität, Tod und Kunst bei Elfriede Jelinek und Adolf Muschg. Bielefeld: Aisthesis Verlag, 1994.
 Enslinn, Astrid C. “‘Artistic Performance Is Not for Women’—Contemplation on the Work of Elfriede Jelinek.” Journal of Literature and Aesthetics 4 (2004): 74–84.
 Fiddler, Allyson. Rewriting Reality: An Introduction to Elfriede Jelinek. Oxford: Berg, 1994.
 Hoffmann, Yasmin. Elfriede Jelinek: Sprach- und Kulturkritik im Erzählwerk. Opladen: Westdeutscher Verlag, 1999.
 Janke, Pia, ed. Die Nestbeschmutzerin: Jelinek & Österreich. Salzburg-Vienna: Jung und Jung, 2002.
 Janz, Marlies. Elfriede Jelinek. Stuttgart: Metzler, 1995.
 Johns, Jorun B., and Katherine Arens, eds. Elfriede Jelinek: Framed by Language. Riverside, CA: Ariadne Press, 1994.
 Konzett, Matthias. The Rhetoric of National Dissent in Thomas Bernhard, Peter Handke, and Elfriede Jelinek. Rochester, NY: Camden House, 2000.
 Mayer, Verena, and Roland Koberg. Elfriede Jelinek: Ein Porträt. Reinbek bei Hamburg: Rowohlt, 2006.
 Strobel, Heidi. Gewalt von Jugendlichen als Symptom gesellschaftlicher Krisen: Literarische Gewaltdarstellungen in Elfriede Jelinek’s “Die Ausgesperrten” und in ausgewählten Jugendromanen der neunziger Jahre. Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang, 1998.
 Vis, Veronika. Darstellung und Manifestation von Weiblichkeit in der Prosa Elfriede Jelineks. Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang, 1998.

---

JEWISH EROTIC LITERATURE

---

Judaism is a tradition built on archaeological strata of textual sources, and each of these layers reflects the interaction of Jewish culture with the cultures that surrounded it. For the Bible, the foundational text of Judaism, which was composed when ancient Israel was a small, beleaguered nation, the predominant issue connected to sexuality was fertility. The repeated stories of infertility, especially in Genesis, may well reflect the need of this small nation to ensure its survival. Thus, the priestly author of the first creation story has God utter a blessing of fertility on the first man and woman: “Be fruitful and multiply” (Genesis 1:26).

In the second creation story, human beings are created immortal, and when they acquire knowledge of sexuality, they become mortal. While later traditions, both Jewish and Christian, understood the expulsion from the Garden of Eden as a “fall from grace,” for the Bible itself it seems that the story came to explain the difference between humans and God: while human beings procreate and die, God does neither, a fundamental difference between the biblical deity and the gods of other ancient Near Eastern religions.

Erotic attraction was not considered problematic in biblical culture; the Song of Songs, in which two unwed lovers pursue each other with something close to gender equality, represents one of the greatest works of erotic literature. The sexual prohibitions in the Bible are generally to be found in the priestly laws of purity, where they may be understood as part of the priests’ preoccupation with guaranteeing fertility through proper unions. At the same time, some key narrative texts subvert these strict laws. This is particularly true of the various stories of King David’s ancestors in which strong women (Tamar and Ruth) violate the laws in order to become pregnant and ensure David’s line.

In the first centuries of the Common Era, a body of literature parallel to the Bible, the Talmud (called the Oral Law or “rabbinic law”), was formulated and set in writing by scholars called rabbis. The attitude toward sexuality and the body in rabbinic literature can best be understood in the context of late antiquity. For Greco-Roman thinkers, such as the Stoic philosophers, the body itself posed less of a problem than did the passions, which could overpower one’s reason. The rabbis were also preoccupied with the passions, especially the sexual drive, which they called the yetzer ha-ra [evil impulse]. They held that the law is designed to restrain and challenge erotic passions—which might otherwise lead to evil—into constructive activities. But, like the Stoics, they generally viewed the body itself as a neutral vessel.

The rabbis held that all men must marry and father children (the law in this case is directed only toward men). Men also have an additional obligation to give sexual pleasure to their wives. At the same time, the rabbis had ambivalent feelings about male sexuality. Their position seemed to be that the sexual desires of the body are legitimate and even holy, but only if the sexual act is performed with the proper restraint. Sex must be potentially procreative, hence masturbation, for example, is labeled a capital crime, something unknown to the Bible. Nevertheless, all sexual positions are “legal,” if perhaps not desirable from a medical point of view: in discussing this issue, the Babylonian Talmud unabashedly describes different sexual practices. While the rabbis never endorsed celibacy, as did the Christian Church fathers, there is evidence that they were also attracted by scholarly abstinence. In some texts, the study of Torah (i.e., biblical and rabbinic law) is invested with eroticism, suggesting that intellectual activity might compete with the desires of the body.

In the Middle Ages, under the influence of Greek philosophy, Jewish thinkers often denigrated the body as representing the purely material. Moses Maimonides (twelfth century) denounced sexuality, condemning the sense of touch as the lowest of all human faculties. Yet, as a physician and expounder of Jewish law, Maimonides recognized the importance of the body’s desires and tried to strike a middle ground, emphasizing moderation and self-control.

A different school of medieval thought was the mystic (often called "Kabbalah"). A thirteenth-century erotic text called the Iggeret ha-Kodesh [Letter of Holiness] criticizes Maimonides by asking how the sense of touch could be evil, since God had created the body and called it "good"? The text insists that Adam and Eve had had sexual relations in the Garden of Eden and had done so without any sinful pleasure.

However, the Letter of Holiness also places severe limitations on sexuality and the body. According to the mystic tradition, God consists of male and female elements which are engaged in a kind of spiritual intercourse: the thirteenth-century Sefer ha-Zohar [Book of Splendor] contains elaborate descriptions of divine eroticism. Proper human sexuality can be directed toward God by the correct thoughts, causing the male and female elements in God to unite sexually. But improper sexuality or improper thoughts cause these elements to break apart. Sex without the proper intention is "idolatry," since it causes a rupture within the divine.

This doctrine from the thirteenth century was to have tremendous implications for Jewish thought in the subsequent centuries. In the eighteenth century, a pietistic Jewish movement in Poland, called Hasidism, created a popular theology based on the earlier Kabbalah. Some Hasidic doctrines celebrated the material world and spoke of worshipping God through the material. Others, on the other hand, saw the purpose of the worship of God as emptying the material of its divinity. These latter led to a much more ascetic approach to the body, particularly in the realm of sexuality: any sexual act that involved pleasure was sinful.

The Zionist movement, starting in the late nineteenth century, attacked these attitudes. Traditional Judaism, the Zionists argued, had denigrated the body in favor of pure spirituality, and as a result, Jews had become physically weak and politically impotent. They wished to return bodily vigor to the Jews by creating what the Zionist ideologue Max Nordau called "muscular Judaism." They also favored an erotic revolution that would liberate the Jews from the sexual constraints of both traditional Judaism and bourgeois conventions. Some of the radical communes that the Zionists established in Palestine in the early twentieth century opposed the institution of marriage. But while many suspected these communes of fostering free love, the reality was often highly ascetic, as the members were exhorted to put collective values above the satisfaction of individual desires.

Far from negating Jewish tradition, this secular nationalism reproduced the historical tensions over sexuality and the body. At times affirmed and denied, the many genres of Jewish literature never ignored the erotic: the "people of book" can never be divorced from the "people of the body."

DAVID BIALE

Selected Works

Bible. Book of Genesis: chs. 1 and 2.
 ———. Book of Leviticus: chs. 15, 18, and 20
 ———. Song of Songs
 Babylonian Talmud. Yevamot 63b
 Letter of Holiness
 Book of Splendor

Further Reading

Biale, David. Eros and the Jews: From Biblical Israel to Contemporary America. New York: Basic Books, 1992.
 Biale, Rachel. Women and Jewish Law: An Exploration of Women's Issues in Halakhic Sources. New York: Schocken Books, 1984.
 Boyarin, Daniel. Carnal Israel: Reading Sex in Talmudic Culture. Berkeley and Los Angeles, CA: University of California Press, 1993.
 Cohen, Jeremy. Be Fertile and Increase, Fill the Earth and Master It: The Ancient and Medieval Career of a Biblical Text. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1989.
 Eilberg-Schwartz, Howard. People of the Body: Jews and Judaism from an Embodied Perspective. Albany, NY: State University of New York Press, 1992.
 Fraade, Steven. "Ascetical Aspects of Ancient Judaism." In Jewish Spirituality, edited by Arthur Green. Vol. 1, 253–88. New York: Crossroad, 1986–7.

JIN PING MEI [PLUM IN THE GOLDEN VASE] AND GELIAN HUAYING [FLOWER SHADOWS BEHIND THE CURTAIN]

---

Seventeenth-century Chinese erotic novel and sequel

Jin Ping Mei

Jin Ping Mei, first published in 1618 or shortly thereafter, is the first major Chinese novel to have a cohesive narrative, to be written by a single author, and to be an original creation. It is unlike almost all earlier Chinese novels—which developed from the repertoire of professional storytellers—engaging in new modes of literary representation. Jin Ping Mei is acutely aware of its divergence from the established form of the vernacular novel in China, which allowed it to incorporate an almost encyclopedic range of texts and genres, such as jokes, popular songs, comic skits, and short stories, which were all made available to a wider audience than ever before because of the boom in commercial publishing. The novel is a rich historical source for those interested in daily life in Ming China, and is an entertaining story of deceit, revenge, jealousy, and retribution.

Jin Ping Mei [Plum in the Golden Vase] (also known as The Golden Lotus), is a milestone in the development of narrative fiction in world literature. With the possible exceptions of The Tale of Genji (1010) and Don Quixote (1615), there is no earlier work of prose fiction of comparable sophistication and depth. It is notorious in China and abroad as a work of pornography, recounting the many sexual exploits and perversions of Ximen Qing and his wives. While “Plum in the Golden Vase” is a provocative image, the sound of the title in Chinese also puns, through near homophones, with “The Glory of Entering the Vagina.” Both titles are recalled in an episode when the male protagonist ties one of his wives to the bedposts using the wrappings of her bound feet, and then throws frozen plums into her vagina from across the room. Despite its notoriety as a work of pornography, Jin Ping Mei is also counted among the six great novels of the pre-modern period due to its quality, complexity, length (about 2,000 pages), and sophistication.

The novel was circulating in manuscript among a small group by 1595, and good arguments have been made for an original publication date of 1610. The characters are taken from another novel, Shui Hu Zhuan [Outlaws of the Marsh], which itself is an aggregate of many well-known tales. The action of Jin Ping Mei takes place between chapters 23 and 27 of Shui Hu Zhuan, but, as many critics have pointed out, Jin Ping Mei is much more sophisticated in structure, creativity, and literary innovation than its predecessor, on which it is only very superficially dependent. The narrative is tightly structured (though occasionally containing contradictions that could be textual corruptions as easily as authorial error). It certainly is the first major work of long fiction in the Chinese vernacular tradition that has the sort of unified cohesion that allows it to bear criticism under the rubric of a novel.

The plot of Jin Ping Mei essentially chronicles the rise and fall of Ximen Qing, a wealthy urban merchant, his household, and all but one or two of its residents. Most spectacularly, it focuses on the moral decline of Ximen Qing and the three female protagonists who lend their names to the title (Pan Jinlian, Li Pinger and Pang Chunmei). The most notorious of these, Pan Jinlian (whose name in translation serves as the title of the Clement Egerton translation, Golden Lotus), kills her first husband so that she may marry into the Ximen Qing household. Ximen, along with most of his wives, has many affairs with those in and outside of his house. Additionally, Ximen Qing has accrued great wealth—not through the traditional means of gaining official employment by taking rigorous exams, but through currying favors, double-dealing, and bullying those in office. He is attended by various sycophantic friends, who advise him and try to benefit from his patronage.

The story takes a turn when Ximen meets a strange foreign monk, who is described as looking quite like a bloated male member. The Buddhist monk uncharacteristically eats meat at a banquet that Ximen has prepared for him and then offers Ximen a powerful aphrodisiac, which he keeps in a penis-shaped pill box. With each pill, Ximen is given sexual potency, but is warned never to take more than one at a time. Over the course of the novel and his many sexual exploits, it seems that the pills in the box represent Ximen's vital essence and its corresponding diminution over time. Ximen ignores traditional medical wisdom that the vital yang essence will safeguard his health and spends it frivolously, leaving him susceptible to harmful influences of ghosts, spirits, and the elements.

One night, coming home drunk from an evening of lovemaking with a friend's wife, Ximen thinks he sees the ghost of a man he killed. He is exhausted and is taken to bed with the help of assistants. His lascivious wife, Pan Jinlian, finding him too inebriated to maintain an erection, gives him an overdose of the monk's medicine and takes the last remaining pill for herself. After some coaxing, she straddles him, and eventually he ejaculates all of his semen, followed by blood. Ximen Qing then slips in and out of consciousness. The following day he is dizzy and his scrotum swells. His member still firm, Pan Jinlian continues to pleasure herself on it. Various physicians are unable to effect a cure, and finally his scrotum bursts, and he dies shortly after.

In Jin Ping Mei, most of the characters meet deaths that are also clearly retribution for their misdeeds. The house falls into disarray, the remaining members are scattered, and some of Ximen's wives remarry. Pan Jinlian is killed by the brother of her first husband, and Li Pinger bleeds to death from vaginal hemorrhaging. In the last chapter of the novel, the reader finds out that most of the characters have been redeemed from their suffering and reincarnated. Although there is a crisis in the text that suggests two alternatives for Ximen Qing, none of the situations seem particularly odious and it does indeed seem that the characters have been redeemed through their deaths.

Jin Ping Mei employs themes of jealousy, mismanagement, and retribution strategically, conflating health and coin in terms of a sexual economy. Its themes and conceits are drawn largely from the corpus of fictional, medical, and sexual texts of its day. It incorporates and develops rhetoric from previous works of fiction, particularly those passages that describe the body in detail. It also appropriates older notions from medical texts warning of dangerous female sexuality. Jin Ping Mei is indebted to sexual manuals, and in particular what seems to be the earliest (early 16th century) and most well known piece of narrative erotica with graphic sexual depictions, Ruyijun Zhuan [The Lord of Perfect Satisfaction].

The general use of refined, lyrical language to describe sexual acts (with notable exceptions) has helped apologists defend the Jin Ping Mei against accusations of pornography. The most common defense is that the lascivious and selfish characters die prematurely, violating in most instances the Confucian dictum to procreate. The revelation in the last chapter of the novel, that Ximen Qing has been reincarnated as his own son, born shortly after his death, suggests that he has not yet redeemed himself but that he has a second chance to be a filial son and a good father.

Few novels that give an account of quotidian experience have been subject to such extremes of contrasting interpretation as Jin Ping Mei. One of the most interesting of these interpretations is that Jin Ping Mei was written as an act of filial piety. The 1695 text of Jin Ping Mei includes a preface that suggests that its author was one of the leading poets and essayists of his time, Wang Shizhen (1526–90). The story goes that Wang wrote the novel in order to avenge the death of his father, for which the evil minister Yan Song was mainly responsible. Yan Song died in 1568, but Wang set his sights on Yan's son, Yan Shifan (?–1565), who had risen in rank and was a model of corruption. While Yan was cunning and managed to escape many of the assassination plots against him directed by Wang, his fatal flaw was his penchant for licentious literature. So, Wang Shizhen set himself to writing a novel that would be of interest to Yan. Some accounts say that he finished the 100-chapter novel in a matter of days, others say it took him three years, but when he finished, he soaked the pages in poison and hired a merchant to sell the book to Yan. Yan, falling prey to his desires, bought the book, and as he licked his finger to turn the page, over the course of the long novel, he eventually ingested enough of the poison from the pages to fall ill and die. The legend endured at least up to the time of Lu Xun, who taught it as legend in his lectures at Beijing University between 1920 and 1924. Wang's authorship of the Jin Ping Mei is almost certainly as fictional as the story of how he avenged his father's death, but the Confucian moral of filial revenge and retribution is embedded in the novel's prefaces and commentary and has formed an important school of criticism.

Related to the story of Wang and Yan is the interpretation that the novel is a work of social and political satire, meant to expose and dispose of corrupt officials and mock the current members of the Ming court by comparing them to their counterparts of an unsuccessful late Northern Song dynasty. Another extreme considers the work a result of Buddhist devotion and an effort to demonstrate the workings of karmic retribution and reincarnation. Defending the novel against accusations that it is solely a work of pornography has also become a well-established endeavor of Jin Ping Mei scholars and apologists, though it to some extent undermines the Wang Shizhen story, which relies on the novel's erotic aspects to exact revenge. A common way to defend literature against accusations of pornography is to liken the work to history, a strategy that works well with Jin Ping Mei because of its encyclopedic nature and its focus on the particular fortunes of characters.

Novels in premodern China were usually read in variorum-type editions, with the text of the novel surrounded by printed commentary in the margins, in between lines and at the end of chapters. They would often contain lengthy prefatory essays and appendices. Zhang Zhupo (1670–98) added an important commentary and many prefatory materials to Jin Ping Mei in 1695 that guided interpretation for centuries. Notably, his edition contains a preface entitled “Why Jin Ping Mei is Not a Work of Pornography.”

Lately, Jin Ping Mei criticism has considered the novel as having a complex relationship with a society in which men interacted with women on the basis of domination, disdain, cruelty, and power. Traditional criticism is being reconsidered from standpoints of misogyny and sexual politics. Its representations of the “body” are also being reevaluated through material and medical considerations of physicality.

Gelian Huaying [Flower Shadows Behind the Curtain]

One of the prefaces to Jin Ping Mei, written by “Dongwu Nongzhuke” [Pearl-Juggler of Eastern Wu], possibly a pseudonym of Feng Menglong, the famous connoisseur and purveyor of vernacular stories, argues that it is the reader's responsibility to interpret the novel correctly, “He who reads Jin Ping Mei and feels pity and compassion is a bodhisattva; he who feels apprehension is a noble-minded man; he who feels enjoyment is a petty man; and he who feels the desire to emulate the vices portrayed is a beast.”

Ding Yaokang wrote Gelian Huaying as a sequel to Jin Ping Mei, with seemingly the notion in mind that its readers hitherto had not clearly understood its moral of worldly retribution for indulgence, depravity, and treachery. This notion is made explicit in a preface to Gelian Huaying by “Xihu Diaoshi” [Angling Historian of West Lake], who argues that since Jin Ping Mei depicted much sumptuousness and depravity, its readers often “witnessed its descriptions without knowing its hidden meanings, saw its recklessness without knowing its restraint, and enjoyed its showing off without knowing its satire.” Gelian Huaying is consequently more obviously didactic than its predecessor, Jin Ping Mei.

Ding Yaokang (c. 1599–c. 1669) probably wrote the 64 chapter version of Xu Jin Ping Mei [Sequel to Jin Ping Mei] late in life, putting its creation sometime in the 1660s. Gelian Huaying is a shortened version (48 chapters) that seems to have appeared for the first time in 1880 and was attributed to the same author. The primary differences from Xu Jin Ping Mei are that the names of characters are changed. While in the Xu Jin Ping Mei, the original names of the characters are retained, the recension Gelian Huaying changes these names to those which thinly mask the originals. Certain place names are changed as well. There is little agreement as to why these changes were made. Lengthy passages of historical and philosophical reflections were excised and the discussion of retribution is curtailed from the original, though it is obvious that the workings of karma to punish the wicked is the governing theme of the work.

The premise of the novel is to follow most of the main characters of Jin Ping Mei through their subsequent incarnations to witness all of the troubles that befall them as karmic punishment for their actions in Jin Ping Mei. The travails of Ximen Qing's primary wife, Wu Yueniang, who survives Jin Ping Mei, make up a large part of the story, followed and interspersed with reports of Ximen Qing, Pan Jinlian, and others. Gelian Huaying ignores the details of the characters' new names and families presented in the last chapter of Jin Ping Mei in favor of more explicitly undesirable circumstances. Ximen Qing is reborn as a blind boy who becomes a beggar, Li Pinger's new family is tricked into selling her into a brothel, and Pan Jinlian is reborn into a military family, loses her father when he dies in battle, and marries the man to whom she was betrothed at age six, who is now poor and paralyzed from a blow to the head.

Gelian Huaying states explicitly in the first few pages that the characters' early deaths have not fully atoned for their sins. An important distinction is made between retribution that happens during a lifetime and the workings of karma that follow particularly evil persons into the next. This is a fundamental difference between Jin Ping Mei and its sequel. While in the original, characters simply die early for their misdeeds, in Gelian Huaying, they must go on paying for them in a second, more miserable incarnation. There is a fairly simple reversal of fortune employed to depict the workings of karmic retribution. What was done by a character in Jin Ping Mei is done to him or her in Gelian Huaying. Those characters that were rich or lustful in a previous lifetime are denied wealth and intimacy in this one.

In addition to more explicit moral didacticism, Gelian Huaying presents fewer instances of sexual intercourse than does Jin Ping Mei, and those that it does represent are depicted using flowery, indirect language. While Jin Ping Mei seems to revel in some of the scenes of sexual debauchery, including lyrical descriptions of anatomy and occasional vulgar terms; the sequel seems to present sex primarily either as something for which the character will later have to atone or as karmic punishment in the form of violence, as is the case with one of the more explicit sex scenes when Li Pinger sleeps with the coarse but wealthy man to whom she has been married. The narrative does not employ sexual metaphors of combat or economy as Jin Ping Mei does. The general lack of sexual interaction in Gelian Huaying seems misleading given the title, which implies catching fleeting glimpses of beautiful maidens hidden behind a screen, and the subsequent lust that such an image would normally produce.

Ding Yaokang relies heavily on Daoist and Buddhist texts to advise and warn his readers, while the author of Jin Ping Mei incorporates a wider variety of materials into the body of the novel. Ding plays the role of a preacher, claiming on the title page that his name is the "Recluse of the Purple Brilliance," and refers to himself in the novel and to his previous incarnations. Ding shows that he is a living example of the ongoing cosmic process of reincarnation, thereby lending further authority to the Daoist and Buddhist messages he is promulgating. He also seems to grant the characters ultimate escape from the wheel of karmic retribution, as most pay penance for their misdeeds and attain enlightenment.

Biography

The author of Jin Ping Mei calls himself "Lanling Xiaoxiao Sheng" [The Scoffing Scholar of Lanling], which would make him probably the Confucian philosopher Xun Zi of the third century BCE. Xun Zi was appointed magistrate in Lanling and is now buried there, according to the Shi Ji [Records of the Grand Historian]. Although he did not refer to himself as the "scoffing scholar," an image of him as scoffing at corrupt officials is presented in Liu Xiang's (79–8 BCE) preface to Xun Zi's works, the only early biography of him other than that in the Shi Ji. Xun Zi's (greatly simplified) philosophy centers on the belief that human nature is evil and is redeemable only through arduous attention to reform.

See also Hong Lou Meng; Xiuta Yeshe; Zhulin Yeshe

Editions

The Plum in the Golden Vase or Chin P'ing Mei. Vol. 1: The Gathering, 1993; Vol. 2: The Rivals. Edited and translated by David Tod Roy. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2001.

JINGU QIGUAN

The Golden Lotus. Translated by Clement Egerton. London: Routledge, 1939.
Flower Shadows Behind the Curtain. New York: Pantheon, 1959.
Jin Ping Mei Cihua [1618], reprint Tokyo: Daian, 1963; Hong Kong: Yiyuan Chubanshe, 1993.

Hsia, C.T. The Classic Chinese Novel. New York: Columbia University Press, 1968.
Plaks, Andrew. The Four Masterworks of the Ming Novel. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1987.
Rolston, David L. How to Read the Chinese Novel. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1990.
Stone, Charles. The Fountainhead of Chinese Erotica: The Lord of Perfect Satisfaction. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2003.

References and Further Reading

Ding, Naifei. Sexual Politics in Jin Ping Mei. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2002.

---

JINGU QIGUAN [THE OIL VENDOR WHO CONQUERS THE QUEEN OF BEAUTY]

---

Nineteenth-century Chinese short story

This Chinese short story in colloquial language came early to the notice of a readership curious about Chinese mores when it was translated into French and published in 1877 by the Dutch interpreter and Sinologist Gustav Schlegel (1840–1903). He appended to his translation, together with the Chinese text, an account of his visit to a Cantonese “flower boat” in 1861. It was more recently praised as being informative about brothel life by van Gulik (Sex Life). The Chinese text, in more than 20,000 characters, is the seventh of 40 chapters of the so-called anthology Wonders of the Present and the Past, completed around 1640 by an unknown compiler out of 200 short stories from a series of five 40-chapter volumes, published between 1620 and 1633, the first three by Feng Menglong (1574–1646) and the last two by Ling Mengchu (1580–1644). The Oil Vendor Who Conquers the Queen of Beauty is to be found in the third chapter of the third volume of Feng Menglong, but was probably penned by one of his contemporaries and friends, the unidentified “Langxian” [Libertine Immortal], perhaps enlarging an earlier tale in classical Chinese. Another story, possibly by Feng Menglong, included in chapter 5 of Jingu qiguan, “The Courtesan’s Jewel Box,” offers a number of comparable features with The Oil Vendor, paradoxically opposing true love to venal love. “The Pearl-sewn Shirt,” likely penned by Feng Menglong, who published it as the first chapter of his first volume, had more explicit sex descriptions. It was retained in the Jingu qiguan as chapter 23. The most famous tale of a big-hearted courtesan in classical Chinese is attributed to Bai Xingjian (776–826), of which Dudbridge (The Tale of Li Wa) gives the best study, translation, and critical edition.

The Story

The story is set some five hundred years before its publication, when the Northern Song capital, Kaifeng, fell unto the hands of barbarians (1126), sending a flow of refugees south to Hangzhou, the city which became the provisional capital of the Southern Song dynasty. The two main characters of the tale, a girl and a boy, are among them, soon to be lost and forsaken children. The girl is sold to a brothel and becomes at twelve a “Queen of Beauty.” The boy is bought by a childless old oil merchant but is slandered by a jealous shop assistant and is forced to become an oil peddler. Now a young man, but still poor, he falls madly in love with the courtesan at first sight. Though nubile at thirteen, she had been deflowered when fifteen, and ever since has been in so great demand that a night spent with her would cost ten ounces of silver. The youth saves patiently for a year to accumulate the necessary amount, plus another six ounces of silver with which to buy the proper attire in which to be presented to her. Still the brothel “mother” has to introduce him stealthily, as the pampered girl would not have received a client of such low status. But on the appointed evening, the courtesan is so sick from overdrinking that the peddler, instead of demanding what he has paid for, soothes her with great care, wiping her vomit with his new clean clothes. She is deeply moved by the gallantry of the poor, but handsome lad. Later he saves her from a rich bully who abandons her helpless and barefoot on a river bank. Grateful, and in love, she brings to him her savings, enough to buy her out of prostitution, marry her, and turn the peddler into a wealthy merchant and landlord. The term “oil peddler” actually became then in the area a popular nickname for any considerate lover.

The Dedicated Lovers

The plot of the story is cleverly unfolded, without any unaccountable coincidences, rather sparing in erotic explicit descriptions, as requested by the mood of sentimental pathos, for, though not promoting love without sex, the tale denounces sex without love. Never coarse or crude, it may have contributed to the birth of the sentimental short novel Caizi jiaren xiaoshuo, about a “talented young scholar and the beautiful learned girl,” in vogue between the mid-17th and mid-18th centuries in China. The oil peddler did not conquer the Beauty through poetry, as is usual in those codified novels, and find happiness in turning into a respected married merchant. Besides reproving social snobbery, the story gave a new currency to the theme of the big-hearted courtesan (the “whore with the heart of gold,” in Western terms), so much so that Li Yu (1611–1680) disclosed its romantic fallacy in one of his ironic short stories (translated by Kaser as “Reine de cupidité”).

Numerous singers, storytellers, and dramatists over the centuries have reworked the story of the Jingu qiguan and brought it to the attention of ever-larger audiences. It has been translated or retranslated many times in Japanese, Russian, German, and other languages. The original edition of the Jingu qiguan is lost, but hundreds of early and later ones testify to its steady popularity.

ANDRÉ LÉVY

Editions

- Feng Menglong. Le Vendeur d'huile qui seul possède la reine de beauté. Translated under the direction of and edited by Jacques Reclus [1976]. Préface by Pierre Kaser. Arles: Philippe Picquier, 1990.
- Ma Y.W. and Joseph S.M. Lau. “The Oil Peddler Courts the Courtesan.” In Traditional Chinese Stories, Themes and Variations, Traditional Chinese Tales, 177–208. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Schlegel, Gustav. Le Vendeur d'huile qui seul possède la Reine-de-Beauté, ou splendeurs et misères des courtisanes chinoises. Leyden and Paris 1877.
- Wang Chi-chen. “The Oil Peddler and the Queen of Flowers.” In Traditional Chinese Tales. New York: Columbia University Press, 1944.
- Yang Hsien-yi and Gladys Yang. “The Oil Vendor and the Courtesan.” In The Courtesan's Jewel Box, 272–332. Peking: Foreign Language Press, 1967.
- “Le Marchand d'huile conquiert seul la reine des fleurs.” In Spectacles curieux d'aujourd'hui et d'autrefois (Jingu qiguan). Translated, edited, and annotated by Rainier Lanselle, 201–79. Paris: Gallimard, 1996.

Further Reading

- Dudbridge, Glen. The Tale of Li Wa: Study and Critical Edition of a Chinese Story from the Ninth Century. London: Faculty of Oriental Studies, Oxford University/Ithaca Press, 1983.
- Hanan, Patrick. The Chinese Vernacular Story. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press 1981.
- Lévy, André. Inventaire analytique et critique du conte chinois en langue vulgaire. Vol. 8-2, 582–86. Mémoire de l'Institut des Hautes Etudes Chinoises. Paris: Collège de France, 1979.
- Li Yu. “Reine de cupidité.” In A mari jaloux femme fidèle, translated by Pierre Kaser, 135–61. Arles: Philippe Picquier, Arles 1990.
- Van Gulik, Robert. Sex Life in Ancient China. Leiden: Brill, 1961.

JOANOU, ALICE

---

1966–
American novelist

Alice Joanou's career in erotic writing began with her interest in extreme expression. As an artist, she wants to go where people generally do not: deep into the roiling id. Her first forays into the genre were assignments to rewrite formulaic erotica for Richard Kasak at Masquerade Books in New York. She convinced him that she could write a better novel, and the result was her debut collection of stories, Cannibal Flower (1991), available, as are all of Joanou's books, through Rhinoceros Publications. In those 13 stories, she adapts myth and fairy tale—Salome, Penelope, Delilah, Rapunzel—to modern themes. Like Borges, she is interested in a psychosexual rearrangement of reality.

Tourniquet (1992), a collection of 24 stories, opens with "A," a wicked comedy of adultery. In it, transgression is the stimulus for passion. Through a web of dream and memory, the narrator describes a single act of adulterous sex that she commits with the husband of a woman who has passed out drunk, in her wedding dress, on the kitchen floor. Next to her prostrate body the narrator makes love to the bride's husband, moving between rhapsody and exact physical description, between observation and participation in the tragicomic farce she has created. "L'Enfer" means "hell" in French, and it is also the name of a chillingly unusual nightclub in France as imagined by a female Rimbaud. In this story, the narrator is a gigolo whose mistress is married to a rich old man. Fancying that his mistress is a beautiful woman in front but a boy from behind, he proposes a gender-switching game.

Black Tongue (1995) is Joanou's third book of short stories, a dozen fractured narratives à la J.G. Ballard and Kathy Acker which take us to horrifying places in the imagination of lust. The first story, "Spain 28," is forensic poetry married to science fiction in which the narrator describes her adolescent malaise, controlled by the mass media.

Joanou's first novel, Maya 29, was published in England in the Eros Plus series in 1995. In it she examines the erotological relationship between doctor and patient, and the transformative nature of each sexual emotion. Dr. Lazar is a psychiatrist who is visited by a schizophrenic Sheherazade named Maya. As she confesses to him, he is drawn into her nightmare, and when he meets a literary agent named William St. John, he is drawn deeper into a murderous reality. Maya is forced to work her way through 29 personas in an attempt to heal herself. Maya 29's exploration of feminine madness is reminiscent of Paul Ableman's I Hear Voices.

The Best of Alice Joanou (1998) contains 17 stories taken from her three story collections. Joanou writes disturbing prose poems and longer, complex, experimental narratives in which unbridled sexuality can lead to disaster—or into an alternate universe of lust in which anything can happen and usually does. People make love in a crowded subway car ("Scylla and Charybdis") and no one notices; a famous Andy Warhol-style photographer has a most Dorian Gray-like finish after he has sucked up the souls of 20 young models.

As much a romantic as Anne Rice or Anaïs Nin, Joanou is a delicate, deadly poet of eros. Each inlaid paragraph of her exotic stories provides the reader with that combination of mystery, experiment, explicit sexuality, erotic intelligence, and lyrical emotionalism that are the ingredients of a distinctive literary voice.

Biography

Born in Los Angeles. She attended the Los Angeles Art Center College of Design, and took an MA in sculpture at Yale in 1990. She teaches in San Francisco.

MICHAEL PERKINS

---

JONG, ERICA

---

1942–

American novelist, poet, short story writer, essayist

Although not all of Erica Jong's works are erotic, the concern of all of them has been sexuality: Many of her works focus on female sexuality as a means for gauging, exploring, and developing identity as well as the interrelationship between writing and sexuality. The intermingling of sexuality and identity is a constant theme, and writing is a way of discovering it. As she herself said in 1999 of Anthony Burgess's erotic Shakespearean fantasy, "without language, Eros is dumb."

Even in her first book, Fruits and Vegetables, there is a celebration of the body that is both physical and intellectual. The central poem of this volume, "Arse Poetica," intertwines inspiration and intercourse, depicting the poet as female sitting upon the passive male muse, so that "penetration" can be "at its deepest." The other poems in this volume are less blatantly sexual, but are imbued with the spirit of this seduced muse. Thus a Chaucer class in "The Teacher" becomes the arena for erotic attention concentrated on the instructor, who is "naked before them" and is eventually devoured by the students. The final line instructs the reader to relate to literature in the same way: "Eat this poem." Fruits and Vegetables was followed by Half-Lives in 1973. The poems in this book already betray Jong's sensitivity to the virulent criticism of her erotic/literary propensities. "Beware of the man who denounces women writers," she writes as warning 3 in "Seventeen Warnings in Search of a Feminist Poem," "his penis is tiny & cannot spell." But despite the public reactions that might have made another writer fall silent or hide, many of these poems develop the open erotic vulnerability of her previous work. "Touch," for example, exposes the secrets of "the house of the body," and "Gardener" focuses entirely on the womb, its processes and demands. Jong combines the characteristically American "confessional" mode of Theodore Roethke, Anne Sexton, Robert Lowell, and Sylvia Plath with the openly erotic search for self. Like her friend Sexton, she writes about sex, but unlike Sexton, she uses sex metaphorically as well as graphically and as a means to communication. More significantly, she is different from the "confessional" poets in her embrace of life. As John Ditsky notes, Jong is "a Sexton determined to survive." Sexuality for Jong is not an escape from confrontation but the confrontation itself, and the graphic descriptions in her verse are means to this confrontation. Her poems have garnered awards from Poetry magazine (Chicago), the Poetry Society of America, and the Borestone Mountain Poetry Anthology, and were praised by Louis Untermeyer as "sly but penetrating, witty but passionate, bawdy and beautiful."

But it was her groundbreaking first novel, Fear of Flying, which pushed her name, as well as the entire concept of open and active female sexuality, into the limelight. In Fear of Flying, Jong quotes a prominent work of 1967, The Normal Woman, as summing up sex in "three P's: procreation, pleasure, and pride." Pleasure, however, is considered superfluous, "the prize in the cereal box." It is this assumption, so basic to American society of the time, that Jong's entire novel is aimed at disproving, and it for this reason that Henry Miller hailed Fear of Flying as "a female Tropic of Cancer." "This book will make literary history," said Miller in the New York Times, "because of it women are going to find their own voice and give us great sagas of sex, life, joy, and adventure." His words proved right.

Isadora Wing—young, bookish, beautiful, Jewish, and frustrated—goes to a convention in Vienna with her conventional psychiatrist husband and meets a Laingian psychiatrist, Adrian Goodlove. Seeking in Adrian and in the Laing alternative alleviation for the frustration of women's role, she embarks on a passionate but unsatisfying relationship. Her fantasies may be of sex for its own sake, but her experiences are different. Despite the fact that Isadora's term, “zipless fuck,” is associated with this book, her desires are far more extensive and all-encompassing than the term has come to mean. Isadora’s husband, Bennett, though silent and boring and antithetical to the colorful Adrian, is the better lover. Although Fear of Flying traces Isadora’s every sexual encounter from the age of fourteen, the conclusion of the book has her disappointed with Adrian and trying to transcend the need for relationships as the means to self-fulfillment. “People don’t complete us. We complete ourselves.” This is an answer to Freudian theories of psychiatry which stress the adjustment of women to their supplementary roles and incomplete anatomy, as well as a response to the marginalization of female sexuality and fulfillment in the popular contemporary depiction of the “normal woman.”

Although the positive reception was not unmitigated, and critics like Alfred Kazin and Paul Theroux found the book “vulgar,” Fear of Flying was greatly praised by numerous writers, such as John Updike, who compared the novel to Chaucer and Catcher in the Rye. Fear of Flying catapulted Jong to international fame and became one of the top ten best-selling novels of the 1970s, selling more than 12.5 million copies worldwide, 6.5 million in the United States. It has been translated into 15 languages and was reissued in 1997.

The affirmative Whitmanesque poem which begins Loveroot (1975) and inspired the title of the book opens with “I, Erica Jong,” having endured “three decades of pain ... declare myself now for joy.” The poems of this collection explore this search for joy, its pitfalls, and the possibilities of success. Identifying the coldness of men as danger and torture in the section entitled, “In the Penile Colony,” “Sexual Soup” presents a man whose illness is defined by his lusts “for nothing,” and is therefore destructive to the giving woman. She will be destroyed by masochistic relationships as many female icons have been destroyed. In the next poem, “Sylvia Plath Is Alive in Argentina,” Sylvia Plath, Norma Jean, and Zelda Sayre are “done in” by men. Yet the final poem, dedicated to Anne Sexton, “Eating Death,” reaffirms the salvation of erotic love.

Selected by Anthony Burgess as one of the 100 best novels since 1939, How to Save Your Own Life (1975) develops the idea of the author as character, as self, as object and subject. Isadora Wing, heroine of Jong’s previous novel, is now herself the author of an semi-autobiographical erotic best seller, Candida Confesses, and bears the freedom fame has bestowed upon her as well as the self-consciousness and responsibility inherent in the role of representative woman she has acquired. Isadora, Jong’s own creation, examines the ways in which Candida Wong (Isadora’s creation) is similar to and different from Isadora herself, just as Jong in her life examined in interviews her own biographical comparisons to Isadora. The point of this post-modern analysis is the ancient one of developing self knowledge, just as the books to come featuring Isadora will present the protagonist as a representative woman in a stage of contemporary development. As “representative” heroine, Isadora must of necessity experiment with as many options as possible, even if they appear strained and artificial to her as she experiences them. Jong repeatedly notes in interviews that her novel is satirical and is not therefore limited by facts. Yet many critics judge her works in general by “realistic,” pop-culture novelistic standards, not satirical and picaresque ones.

The structure of this novel is clearly picaresque and leads to an affirmative conclusion. Isadora leaves her husband, goes to Hollywood, widens her sexual repertoire, and experiences some of the devastations undergone by her friend Jeannie Morton (Anne Sexton). But while Morton commits suicide, Isadora chooses love as a positive alternative, and the novel ends in violent passion.

The poetry books that alternate with her novels are often conclusions drawn from the previous novel and direct expressions of stages the next novel will illustrate. In At the Edge of the Body (1979), Jong describes poetry as a Zen experiment beginning with “Letting the mind go, / letting the pen, the breath” (“Zen & the Art of Poetry”). This book deals with matured sexuality. “Flesh is merely a lesson. / We learn it / & pass it on,” she notes in “The Buddha in the Womb.” As Benjamin Franklin V notes, “She has repeatedly stated her openness to all experience, and once she accepts life’s totality, as she does explicitly in Loveroot, then death becomes a topic she has to address.” Experience, release, sense of self, and the future: these are the topics of her next “confessional” work. In “Without Parachutes,” she even invokes this next direction: “Send parachutes & kisses! /Send them quick! / I am descending into the cave / of my own fear.”

Transcending the cave of her fear in her next work, however, Jong works with a very different direction and perspective. Fanny, Being the True History of the Adventures of Fanny Hackabout-Jones (1980) is a, feminist, mock-eighteenth-century novel of a woman seeking independence and erotic fulfillment, and a revisionist view of John Cleland's Fanny Hill. As a thinking, feral, female Tom Jones, Fanny does not stumble once and fall forever like traditional women in the English novel, but develops from virgin to whore to mother to writer. By reconceptualizing women characters of the past, Jong creates new potential for women characters in the present. By rewriting the stereotype of the pornographic heroine as masochistic victim, Jong has opened the way for the vast potential for female erotica.

In her preface to her next book of poems, Ordinary Miracles (1983), Jong notes the interrelationship between her poetry and prose, that the poetry foreshadows the novels and that “my poems and my novels have always been very much of a piece.” This is a significant indication of how to read her work as a chronological whole. In “Poem for Molly's Fortieth Birthday,” Jong reveals her role as provider of previously hidden information for the next generation to learn from: the author not as role model but as source material. Her next novel, Parachutes and Kisses (1984), embodies this concept of source material about being forty rather than the woman as role model. It returns to Isadora Wing, now a maturing libidinous heroine, re-experiencing and reevaluating erotica and placing its function differently in existence. Her numerous erotic encounters (with, among others, a real estate developer, a rabbi, an antiques dealer, a plastic surgeon, and a medical student) are attempts to seek love within the context of her identity, and not confirmation of her identity.

Although it might appear that Shylock's Daughter (1987) is the antithesis of Ordinary Miracles, with its escape into the past and the romanticism of Venice, this novel actually humanizes and domesticates the Jewish ghetto of the Renaissance as well as Shakespeare's own gigantic character. Jessica Pruitt, a middle-aged actress, returns to the past in Venice to become the dark lady of Shakespeare's sonnets and come to terms with her mother's death, her own middle age, and her need for direction. In Any Woman's

Blues (1990), however, maturity is far more complex and less easily achieved. The middle-aged Leila Sand, an artist, is an obsessed self-termed sexaholic. Her downward spiral into alcoholism, sexual dissoluteness, and drugs recalls the blues songs of Billie Holiday, but her analytic maturing vision enables her to eventually take back control of her life. Sexual obsession in older women is common, unique in its manifestations, and very rarely discussed. Any Woman's Blues opens the discussion.

The poems in Becoming Light (1991) concern the development of sexuality in the light of maturing wisdom. It is this that makes the combination of selected and new poems unique—they integrate the erotic vision of the earlier work into the present mellow vision. The opening poem, “Lullaby for a Dybbuk,” has the dybbuk “tweak my clit, / hoping that my sexaholic self / will surface / and take, me back, back, back / to the land of fuck,” and her response is to love the dybbuk into submission, including the past turbulence in her present, rather than rejecting or forgetting it.

In recent years Jong's range and control of the subject of sexuality has increased, and her analytic skills have become focused upon explaining erotica in literature and society as well as telling good stories about herself. In Fear of Fifty (1994) she talks candidly about her own passionate experiences, successes, and failures, revealing her weaknesses as well as her strengths. She continues dialogues with writers who were influenced by her, such as Susie Bright, in subjects that have become popular as a result of Fear of Flying, such as female fantasies. She also continues dialogues with those who influenced her, even her mother. If Fear of Flying was intended to help herself and others overcome their flying fears, Fear of Fifty intends to prove that there is life in middle age—a growing, sexual, and exciting life—and the individual does not cease to grow and desire. This is also a major function of her long look at Henry Miller in The Devil at Large (1994). A friend, teacher, and inspiration, Miller's influence on Jong continues here in essays, stories, and an imaginary dialogue.

The novel Inventing Memory (1997) continues the broader reach and the attempt at a greater scope of the same subject. Three generations of women are depicted—in their continuity, rebellion against continuity, and interrelationship. At least two of the essays in What Do Women Want? Power, Sex, Bread & Roses (1999) deal with the subjects introduced in previous work. Questions of the mother–daughter dialectic and its influence on feminism, sexuality, and backlash relate back to Inventing Memory, and an essay on Henry Miller develops the subject of pornography and creativity. But her scope continues to expand. It is the nation’s sexuality that interests her here: the significance of the Clinton marriage in “The President’s Penis,” the puritanical reception of the film of Nabokov’s Lolita, the reception of Viagra. Jong’s future work includes a book about the quintessential erotic poet, Sappho. Clearly she has more to say on this subject.

Biography

Born March 26 in New York City to Seymour and Eda (Mirsky) Mann, Erica graduated from Barnard College in 1963, completed an MA at Columbia University in 1965, and, turning her back on doctoral studies, continued postgraduate study at the Columbia School of Fine Arts, 1969–70. Married Michael Werthman, 1963 (divorced, 1965); married Allan Jong, 1966 (divorced, 1975); married Jonathan Fast, 1977 (divorced, 1983); married Ken Burrows, 1989; children: Molly Miranda Jong-Fast. English faculty, City College of the City University of New York, 1964–65 and 1969–70; faculty, University of Maryland, Overseas Division, Heidelberg, Germany, 1966–69; instructor in English, Manhattan Community College, 1969–70; instructor in poetry, YM/YWCA Poetry Center, New York City, 1971–73; instructor, Bread Loaf Writers Conference, 1981, and Salzburg Seminar, 1993. Judge in fiction, National Book Award, 1995. Member, New York State Council on the Arts, 1972–74. Awards include: American Academy of Poets Award, 1963; New York State Council on the Arts grant, 1971; Borestone Mountain Award in poetry, 1971; Bess Hokin prize, Poetry magazine, 1971; Madeline Sadin Award, New York Quarterly, 1972; Alice Faye di Castagnolia Award, Poetry Society of America, 1972; Creative Artists Public Service (CAPS) award, 1973, for Half-Lives; National Endowment for the Arts fellowship, 1973–74; Premio International Sigmund Freud, 1979; and United Nations Award of Excellence.

KAREN ALKALAY-GUT

Selected Works

- Fruits and Vegetables*. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1971; London: Secker and Warburg, 1973.
- Half-Lives*. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1973; London: Secker and Warburg, 1974.
- Fear of Flying*. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1973; London: Secker and Warburg, 1974.
- Here Comes and Other Poems*. New York: New American Library, 1975.
- Loveroot*. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1975; London: Secker and Warburg, 1977.
- The Poetry of Erica Jong*. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1976.
- How to Save Your Own Life*. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, and London: Secker and Warburg, 1977.
- Four Visions of America, with Others*. Santa Barbara, CA: Capra Press, 1977.
- Selected Poems*. 2 vols. London: Panther, 1977–80.
- At the Edge of the Body*. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1979; London: Granada, 1981.
- Fanny, Being the True History of the Adventures of Fanny Hackabout-Jones*. New York: New American Library, and London: Granada, 1980.
- Ordinary Miracles: New Poems*. New York: New American Library, 1983; London, Granada, 1984.
- Parachutes and Kisses*. New York: New American Library, and London: Granada, 1984.
- Shylock’s Daughter*. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, and London: Bantam, 1987; New York: HarperCollins, 1995.
- Any Woman’s Blues*. New York: Harper, and London: Chatto and Windus, 1990.
- Becoming Light: Poems, New and Selected*. New York: HarperCollins, 1991.
- Fear of Fifty: A Midlife Memoir*. London: Chatto & Windus, 1994.
- Erica Jong on Henry Miller: The Devil at Large*. London: Vintage, 1994.
- Inventing Memory: A Novel of Mothers and Daughters*. New York: HarperCollins, 1997.
- What Do Women Want? Power, Sex, Bread & Roses*. London: Bloomsbury, 1999.

Further Reading

- Butler, Robert J. “The Woman Writer as American Picaro: Open Journeying in Erica Jong’s Fear of Flying.” Centennial Review 31 (Summer 1987).
- Ferguson, Mary Anne. “The Female Novel of Development and the Myth of Psyche.” In The Voyage In: Fictions of Female Development, edited by Elizabeth Abel, Marianne Hirsch, and Elizabeth Langland, 232–46. Hanover, NH: University Press of New-England, 1983.
- Hite, Molly. “Writing and Reading—The Body: Female Sexuality and Recent Feminist Fiction.” Feminist Studies 14 (Spring 1988): 121–42.
- Kazin, Alfred. “The Writer as Sexual Show-off; or, Making Press Agents Unnecessary.” New York Magazine, June 9, 1975, 36–40.

- Mandrell, James. "Questions of Genre and Gender: Contemporary American Versions of the Feminine Picaresque." Novel 20 (Winter 1987).
- Nitzsche, Jane Chance. "'Isadora Icarus': The Mythic Unity of Erica Jong's Fear of Flying." Rice University Studies 64 (1978): 89–100.
- Ostriker, Alicia Susan. Stealing the Language: The Emergence of Women's Poetry in America. Boston, MA: Beacon Press, 1986.
- Shepherd, Kenneth R. "Erica Jong." In Contemporary Authors New Revisions Series. Vol. 26. Detroit, MI: Gale Research Inc., 1988.
- Schmidt, Daniel Wayne. Rewriting the American Picaresque: Patterns of Movement in the Novels of Erica Jong, Toni Morrison, and Marilynne Robinson. Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University, 1993.
- Showalter, Elaine, ed. The New Feminist Criticism: Essays on Women, Literature, and Theory. New York: Pantheon Books, 1985.
- Suleiman, Susan Rubin. "(Re)Writing the Body: The Politics and Poetics of Female Eroticism." In The Female Body in Western Culture: Contemporary Perspectives, edited by Susan Rubin Suleiman, 7–29. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1985.
- Templin, Charlotte. Feminism and the Politics of Literary Reputation: The Example of Erica Jong. Lawrence, KS: University of Kansas Press, 1995.
- Theroux, Paul. "Hapless Organ." New Statesman, April 19, 1974, 554.
- Updike, John. "Jong Love." New Yorker, December 17, 1973, 149–53.

---

JOUHANDEAU, MARCEL

---

1888–1979
French writer

Écrits secrets

The first volume of this trilogy, Le voyage secret, chronicles a journey the author made away from his wife, Élise, in the company of a group of men, designated by capital letters only, including particularly H and X. In a series of dense, poetic meditations the author reflects on the emotional and moral implications of living his obsessive passion for X: how can or should such a fascination be realized and how could X—and others in their entourage—be expected, if they knew, to react to it? Given that the very intensity of his passion depends on a taboo which prevents its resolution or reciprocation, he returns home both relieved and reenergized.

The second volume, Carnets de Don Juan, contains analytical or anecdotal reflections on the body—its pleasures, its affects, and its expressiveness—and a lyrical hymn to an irresistible love of men which combines mysticism and eroticism, the abject and the sublime. Then follow the author's fraught, impassioned encounters with a series of youths: Raoul, a gauche literary admirer; the elusive, imperious Jean-Pierre; the potentially dangerous Albert; the well-proportioned, golden-haired, and uninhibited Louis, who, according to the ever-watchful Élise, plays that season's Giton to Marcel's Socrates. However brief or seemingly reprehensible Marcel's relationships, he remains, however, an unregretful and unapologetic Don Juan. In final sections, he claims to endow himself, his partners, and their pleasures with the respect and the nobility their beauty deserves. As before, the abject plays host to the sublime.

The third volume, Tirésias, is a paean to the bathhouse boys who, in their twenties, gave Marcel, around sixty, his greatest joys, initiating him magisterially into the pleasures of sodomy (hence the sexual ambivalence of the Tirésias of the title) and developing a sense of mutual respect and friendship. Although Richard, Philippe, "The Dwarf," and Pierre are in a sense interchangeable, this very interchangeability strengthens their semi-mystical animal appeal: cumulatively they represent not just men but "Man." Each boy is an unself-conscious sexual athlete, with his own physique and personality, and together they transform the author's sexual, moral, and emotional life. He remains unrepentant—and free from disease. If the reappearances of one of the boys disconcertingly near his home means that the boy is the Devil, then he is a Devil whose fascination warrants the threat of exposure, in the same way that the pleasure of sodomy repays the initial pain of penetration.

Chronique d'une passion

Very different in tone and focus, this work charts Marcel's passion for J.St. (Jacques), a man some twenty years his junior whom he sees regularly over a period of time and who, as it happens, has painted a portrait of him before they met: the Prélat. Although clearly physical, this relationship is more important for the all-consuming and thus, in a sense, purifying effect it has on Marcel and for its devastating impact on his wife, Élise, who destroys the painting and vows to murder the lover. She eventually changes her mind when she realizes this may play into the couple's hands, but, in return for her restraint, Marcel promises never to see J.St. again. The passion that hitherto had superseded the divine finally seems to present an image of Hell.

De l'abjection

Like Chronique, De l'abjection is a heady mixture of the ecstatic and the detached, the sacred and the profane, the visionary and the documentary, the pure and the erotic. The author alternates between aphoristic explorations of his inner world and emotive accounts of his early sexual experiences which eventually reveal his "different" sexuality whose association with evil gives it—and him—both excitement and insight: his vice and his virtue is Man. After further lyrical evocations of a naked male lover, the book closes with an apologia of the poignancy and the nobility of abjection.

Bréviaire; Portrait de Don Juan; Amours

In the first of these short texts, Bréviaire, Jouhandeau's "Je ne regrette rien," the elderly author recalls the joys of his meetings with the anonymous but appreciative men of Mme Made's maison close: if homosexuality is an ethic and an art, desire for men and virtuoso sex are the mainsprings of his life. The second, Portrait de Don Juan et son esprit retrouvé chez un homosexuel, chronicles the variety of homoerotic pleasures available to the author who, as flâneur-voyeur, savors chance sightings of men in the streets or who, as solitary dream-lover, recaptures the beauty of partners such as "The Swimmer" and Jean-Pierre. A third text, Amours, contains letter-poems for men, whose charisma not only defies both reality and imagination but exceeds any distinction between reality and imagination, presence and absence. Marcel's erotic experiences have an almost mystical, magical force, taking his life to its uttermost limits and placing him on a par with the angels.

Biography

Jouhandeau was a prolific novelist, essayist, and diarist. The writings he acknowledged include novels set in the fictional town of "Chaminadour," portraying Monsieur Godeau and the Pincengrain family (1936–1941), and an account of his turbulent marriage to Élise in Chroniques maritales (1935 and 1938). Unsigned writings include De l'abjection and the three texts of Écrits secrets.

OWEN HEATHCOTE

Selected Works

- Écrits secrets I: Le Voyage secret*. 1954 (repr. 1988).
Écrits secrets II: Carnets de Don Juan. 1954 (repr. 1988).
Écrits secrets III: Tirésias. 1954 (repr. 1988).
Chronique d'une passion. 1949 (repr. 1964).
De l'abjection. 1939 (repr. 1999).
Bréviaire; Portrait de Don Juan; Amours (1981).

Further Reading

- Bowman, Frank Paul. "The Religious Metaphors of a Married Homosexual: Marcel Jouhandeau's Chronique d'une passion." In Homosexualities and French Literature, edited by George Stambolian and Elaine Marks, 295–311. Ithaca and London: Cornell University Press, 1979.
- Larivière, Michel. Pour tout l'amour des hommes. Anthologie de l'homosexualité dans la littérature. Paris: Delétraz, 1998.
- Meyer, Bernard. Éros Jouhandelien. L'Attrait de l'homme dans les premières œuvres de Marcel Jouhandeau. Paris: L'Harmattan, 1994.
- Missotten, Geert. "L'Écriture spéculaire dans les romans donjuanesques de Marcel Jouhandeau, homme sans nom." Nottingham French Studies 38.1 (1999): 24–34.
- Robinson, Christopher. Scandal in the Ink. Male and Female Homosexuality in Twentieth-century French Literature. London: Cassell, 1995.

---

JOUISSANCE

---

The idea of orgasm as heightened pleasure during sexual intercourse was prevalent even in classical cultures. For example, in his account of human reproduction, the second-century anatomist and medical scholar Galen described how the act of conception was accompanied by “a great pleasure.” Aristotle too noted that the processes of procreation were “usually accompanied by pleasure in man and woman alike.” Although these descriptions might be recognizable to us as depicting orgasms, the medical theory behind these sensations differed strongly from our understanding of orgasm today. The nature and function of orgasm produced divergent and sometimes opposing views in the classical period; but broadly speaking, orgasm was considered to be the culmination of bodily (specifically genital) heating, during which substances were emitted by both partners. These substances (and thus orgasm itself) were deemed necessary for procreation, a view which endured until the end of the eighteenth century. Thomas Laqueur has attributed the popularity of this understanding of orgasm to the predominance of the “one-sex body”: the view that the female body was an inverted (and imperfect) “copy” of its male counterpart.

Even though the physical manifestations of orgasm were widely documented even by classical authors, it would be centuries before this phenomenon became as well defined linguistically in the English language. Indeed, it was not until the early nineteenth century that the term orgasm shifted its sense from its seventeenth-century meaning of “violent excitement” and became widely used to describe sexual pleasure. Although the exact cause of this change is not known, the French language is the most likely influence: the word orgasme had been used in French to describe sexual pleasure since 1777. The necessity to express the concept of orgasm at all may have been provoked by the political, social, and intellectual revolutions which took place in France during the eighteenth century. In addition to the growing strength of feminist calls for sexual equality which sought to overturn ideas of a hierarchy of the sexes, an increasing amount of medical evidence demonstrated that female orgasm was not necessary for procreation, as had been believed since antiquity. This separation of sexual pleasure and procreation opened up a range of possibilities of sexual behavior which required definition in language. It is important to note that irrespective of this discovery, conception and female orgasm continued to be linked until the beginning of the twentieth century. Indeed, the nineteenth century did not see great advances in the understanding of female orgasm partly because researchers tended to overlook the idea of female sexual pleasure.

Studies on sexual behavior published in the twentieth century have ensured that orgasm has been transformed into one of the most discussed aspects of human sexuality. At the dawn of the twentieth century, Freud threw out the conventional wisdom of female sexuality by privileging the vaginal orgasm as the norm amongst adult women, an aspect of female sexuality which had hitherto been ignored in favor of the clitoral orgasm. Freud’s work would have a lasting influence on attitudes to sex and would serve to obscure the predominance of the clitoral orgasm until its “rediscovery” by feminists in the latter half of the century. Kinsey’s studies on male sexuality (1948) and female sexuality (1953) shocked America by laying bare previously hidden aspects of sexual experience, including graphic descriptions of the physiology of male and female orgasms. Some conservative social commentators hold Kinsey responsible for initiating the so-called sexual revolution. This period of comparative sexual liberation which began in the 1960s and 1970s was facilitated by changes in the laws concerning homosexuality and abortion, as well as the advent of more reliable forms of birth control. These events widened still further the contexts in which orgasms were described and discussed and it is in this period that the first use of the verb to orgasm was recorded. It is important to recognize, however, that not all studies of sexuality have placed orgasm at the center of their focus. Shere Hite adopted a different methodology in her study of the family (1994), described by the author as “a combination of sociology, psychology, and cultural history, together with innovations relating to feminist methodology.” The breadth of experiences represented in the report implicitly challenged the presumed centrality of orgasm in human sexual behavior.

The French language adopted a term denoting pleasure in general and sexual pleasure in particular, much earlier than did English. The term jouissance and its associated verb jouir derive from the classical Latin gaudere (to please), which became gaudire in the Vulgar Latin used in Gaul. Initially spelled goïr, then joïr, the word jouyr was recorded from the thirteenth century. Its initial primary sense was “to take pleasure in,” with its secondary (legal) meaning being “to enjoy” (as in possess). Its connotation as a noun describing sexual pleasure was present from its earliest uses. Evidence of its sexual connotation from these times can be found in the sixteenth-century works of François Rabelais, who uses the phrase “jouir de leurs amours” to connote lovemaking. However, it is unlikely that all such occurrences of jouissance connoted sexual orgasm in the sense that it is understood today. It is not until the modern period that this became its predominant sense, to the point where the erotic values of jouissance have almost excluded its use in nonsexual contexts. The word jouissance is rarely encountered in current usage, as the French language adopted orgasme as a synonym in the late eighteenth century, as has already been mentioned. Today jouissance is also a term used in psychoanalysis to connote an extreme pleasure indistinguishable from pain, gained from obtaining an object or condition which has been strongly desired. First used by Jacques Lacan, it has become a key concept in contemporary French feminist thought, where it has been particularly important in the work of Julia Kristeva and Hélène Cixous. Here it represents a feminine pleasure distinct from pleasure in general.

POLLIE BROMILOW

References and Further Reading

- Aristotle. Generation of Animals. Translated by A.L. Peck. London and Cambridge, MA: Heinemann, 1953.
- Galen. On the Usefulness of the Parts of the Body. Translated by Margaret Tallmadge May. 2 vols. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1968.
- Gallop, Jane. “Beyond the Jouissance Principle.” Representations 7 (1984): 110–15.
- Hite, Shere. The Hite Report on the Family: Growing Up Under Patriarchy. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1995.
- Jeffreys, Sheila. Anticlimax: A Feminist Perspective on the Sexual Revolution. London: The Women’s Press, 1990.
- Kinsey, Alfred, C. Sexual Behavior in the Human Male. Philadelphia and London: W.B. Saunders Company, 1948.
- . Sexual Behavior in the Human Female. Philadelphia and London: W.B. Saunders, 1953.
- Laqueur, Thomas. Making Sex: Body and Gender from the Greeks to Freud. Cambridge and London: Harvard University Press, 1990.
- Oxford English Dictionary*. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1989.
- Rey, Alain, et al. Dictionnaire historique de la langue française. 2 vols. Paris: Dictionnaires Le Robert, 1992.

---

JOYCE, JAMES

---

1882–1941

Irish fiction writer, dramatist, and poet

Ulysses

Along with D.H. Lawrence's Lady Chatterley's Lover and the works of Henry Miller, Joyce's Ulysses is probably the most famous example of a 20th-century work that vividly illuminated the conflict between the wish to honor literary value on the one hand and the wish to censor erotic or obscene writing on the other. The entire novel of 600-odd pages takes place on a single day, June 16, 1904, in Dublin. It follows the lives of Stephen Dedalus, the protagonist of A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man, a while after the close of that book, and of Leopold Bloom, a Jewish advertising canvasser, and his wife Molly. Where Stephen is a brilliant intellectual obsessed by guilt for having left the religion of his dead mother, Bloom is a middle-aged father of a son who died shortly after his birth; he and his wife have not had "normal sexual relations in over ten years." On this day, Molly has an assignation with "Blazes" Boylan, and Bloom is staying away from home so as not to interfere.

Although the US Attorney's Office marked as obscene some 250 passages from the novel in preparation for the 1933 trial before Judge John M. Woolsey, the government's main objections were to two scenes: one where Bloom, watching one Gerty MacDowell leaning back at the seashore and exposing her "drawers," masturbates, and a group of passages from Molly Bloom's final soliloquy as she lies in bed thinking about her experience with Boylan and reviewing her life as a girl and as Bloom's wife. But neither of these passages in fact is very satisfactory as pornography. The first has a very strong comic element—Bloom's climax is only implied by a description of the fireworks bursting over the nearby fair—while in Molly's reminiscences there is no real continuous narrative, so that at times it is difficult even to tell which man she is thinking about.

On the other hand, she is, even by contemporary standards, strikingly frank in her thoughts about sexuality and very direct in her language. Indeed, passages from the soliloquy, such as the closing "yes I said yes I will Yes" have entered popular consciousness as an emblem of erotic affirmation. Nevertheless, Judge Woolsey's decision, recognizing the literary value of the book, pronounced that while in many places the effect of Ulysses on the reader "is somewhat emetic, nowhere does it tend to be an aphrodisiac."

Biography

Born in 1882 in Dublin, Joyce was raised a Roman Catholic; his adolescent rebellion against that faith is a major theme of his first novel, A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man (1916). An important factor in his apostasy was his early sexual experience with prostitutes. After graduating from University College Dublin with a BA degree, he met Nora Barnacle, a hotel chambermaid from Galway with whom he was to spend the rest of his life. In 1904 the two left Ireland for Trieste without benefit of marriage, because of Joyce's refusal to acknowledge the church or state's involvement in the most intimate of relationships. Although they returned for brief visits, neither would live in Ireland again, instead making their home in Trieste, Rome, Zurich (during both world wars), and Paris. But despite his self-imposed exile, all of Joyce's fiction remained set in his native Dublin. Since 1904 Joyce had been working on a series of stories which he collected in 1909 under the title Dubliners, but the publisher who had originally accepted them changed his mind and Joyce was unable to publish the collection until 1914. This first, frustrating experience of censorship had less to do with any explicit erotic content of the stories than with Joyce's naturalistic use of existing Dublin locations and businesses. His subject matter is also at times debased, including the portrayal of a man whose pederastic tastes are clearly implied and a woman who tacitly encourages her daughter to become sexually involved with a man so that she can blackmail him into marrying the girl.

JOYCE, JAMES

Meanwhile, Joyce had been working on a semi-autobiographical novel that Ezra Pound arranged to appear serially in The Egoist magazine. It was published in New York in 1916 as A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man. Although he had no censorship problems with this book, some critics found aspects of it shocking—one complained that on the very first page Joyce outraged decency with a reference to a child wetting the bed. Although it is clear that the protagonist Stephen Dedalus patronizes prostitutes, only one encounter is narrated within the book, and with such lyrical and metaphorical density that it is difficult to tell what is happening. Still, the boy's intense emotional experience of the erotic impulse is rendered with unprecedented vividness.

Although Portrait is now acknowledged as one of the most important novels of the century, Joyce's reputation was really made by his masterpiece, Ulysses, written roughly between 1914 and 1922 in Trieste, Zurich, and Paris and supported by grants from Harriet Shaw Weaver. Starting in 1918, the book was serialized in The Egoist and The Little Review, and in 1920 the latter magazine was enjoined from publishing further installments of the work on a complaint by the Society for the Prevention of Vice that it was pornographic. The book was published in Paris by the bookstore Shakespeare and Company in 1922 but could not be sold in the United States until Joyce's representatives won the landmark court case in 1934.

Immediately following the furor that greeted the publication of Ulysses, Joyce began work on his last book, which was identified only as "work in progress" up until its publication as Finnegans Wake. Written in a dense, experimental, and obscure prose that combined elements of many languages besides English, it features characters whose names and identities might change from one sentence to the next and whose "stories" shifted equally often. In the near-total absence of what Joyce called "go-ahead plot," the Wake presents a dreamlike world in which everything is subject to change, and a majority of the words are puns of some sort. Thus, although it is likely that passages of the book might well have offended the sensibilities of the same authorities who wished to deny publication to Ulysses—passages hinting at an incestuous passion of the protagonist for his daughter, for instance, or those discussing the "depravity" of the artist figure Shem—the Wake was immune to prosecution because of its very obscurity. When he died suddenly in 1941, Joyce left a legacy of work whose difficulty, as he himself noted, would keep generations of scholars busy.

R. BRANDON KERSHNER

Selected Works

Dubliners. Edited by Robert Scholes and Richard Ellmann. New York: Viking, 1967.

A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man. Edited by Chester G. Anderson. New York: Viking, 1968.

Ulysses. Edited by Hans Walter Gabler et al. New York: Garland, 1984.

Finnegans Wake. London: Faber and Faber Ltd., 1939.

Further Reading

Brown, Richard. James Joyce and Sexuality. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985.

Budgen, Frank. James Joyce and the Making of "Ulysses." Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1960.

Ellmann, Richard. James Joyce. New York: Oxford University Press, 1982.

Vanderham, Paul. James Joyce and Censorship: The Trials of "Ulysses." New York: New York University Press, 1998.

---

JUNNOSUKE YOSHIYUKI

---

1924–1994

Japanese writer

Like Henry Miller, some of whose texts he translated, Junnosuke Yoshiyuki is attracted by the red-light districts, the world of prostitution, and the nightclubs where women can easily be met. He describes erotic relations very precisely, between a feeling of loneliness and the urge of desire. His writing traces its influence back to the Shi-shosetsu tradition. The cycle of stories Fui no Dekigoto [Are the Trees Green?]<sup>1</sup>—written in a style known as rensaku, which links themes and characters of stories but allows the book to be more flexible than a novel—reflects well the art of this writer. In Yûgure made [Toward Dusk] (1978), a middle-aged man yearns obsessively for emotional rather than physical virginity in his mistress. Anshitsu [The Dark Room], Shûu [Sudden Shower], and Genshoku no machi [The Main Colors Town], develop the theme of physical relationships as a quest for emotional purity. A peculiar bond appears when the narrator associates with prostitutes, because this kind of relationship remains uncluttered by egotism or heavy demands. The ideal relationship for this writer is one in which tenderness develops within an exclusive and sensual link, far away from any kind of social censorship. As a matter of fact, the male characters are either unmarried or separated from their wives, and they do not expect any kind of recognition through a professional career. The writer Nakata in Anshitsu has no professional obligations and is able to focus entirely on different kinds of sensual and erotic relationships. According to this writer, and maybe as a personal experience and idiosyncrasy, the essence of love is mainly sensual. As a consequence, far away from sentimental and social lies, it is the body that remains at the center of the human experiences described in the narratives.

However, he is not interested at all in describing sexual intercourse or fantasies (apart from lesbian relations). The casual relation with a prostitute is intended as an experimental method to improve his understanding of what love really is, and a way to get more knowledge about the women he meets. Through sexual relations an emotional sensitivity increases, and the narrator comes to feel very deeply a few sensations related to sexual intercourse, or to the vision of a naked woman's body. These sensations may mean nothing more than the perfect achievement of the sensual relation: a blend of physical sensations where mere sexual pleasure is overwhelmed by the symptoms of it. The consequences of pleasure, or the side effects, become more important and tend to be analyzed like an enigma, the full distinctiveness of the individual experience inside the very universal frame of sexual intercourse. Then, sensual desire and pleasure are only the first steps in a wider quest for pure physical love, and a basic experiment in order to find the very truth of bodies and hearts. It is a quest for wisdom and knowledge, though not at all written in an abstract or intellectual way. On the contrary, the knowledge comes from the physical experience.

For example, in Are the Trees Green?, the main character, Iki Ichirou, realizes that he is in love with his student, Asako. A common theme is the double identity of the woman, as Asako is a barmaid and behaves like a prostitute toward clients. Her makeup is just like a painted mask to hide her true self. Iki wants to decipher her face's enigma and true identity. Sometimes, Yoshiyuki Junnosuke tries to understand the truth about the role of a client and lover in relation to a prostitute, and his importance for her. This is the case in Fui no Dekigoto, where a triangular relationship between Yukiko; Masuda, a weak Yakuza; and the narrator is described. One day, he smells on Yukiko's body a mix of emotion, makeup, and sweat. The smell expresses the inside being of Yukiko, though he seeks and finds an external cause. He can also read a vertical wrinkle between her eyes as a sign of climax, as if she were suffering. These side effects arouse his desire and remind him of other signs seen on women's bodies, such as a green and vivid line on a prostitute showing the lips of her sex. The narrator splits his life between an underpaid career in journalism and the solace he seeks in the evenings spent in contemplation of women. Yukiko's body fragrance disappears as well as the pleasure wrinkle when she moves in with Masuda. The narrator understands through physical experience the strength of his pleasure and its limitations.

Anshitsu is a good example of how Yoshiyuki tends toward an absolute of sexual relation in the unique space of a bedroom. A famous writer, Nakata, meets Natsue, who has dark sides and other lovers. He himself has several relations at the same time, and yet ends up having relations with Natsue alone, in search of absolute sexuality in the dark room. As a result of that quest, a rose blossom replaces the female sexual organ, and the two lovers are linked by an invisible golden thread.

The style of Yoshiyuki is nearly clinical, and in all his works, he alternates realistic description of Japanese characters and places with very unusual and magical details, such as the meaningful blossom of flowers, or external phenomena. It is altogether the expression of a singular experience, a quest for pure pleasure and a profound analysis of prostitution, homosexuality, and marriage.

Biography

Born in Okayama, but raised in Tokyo, Yoshiyuki was exempted from military service because of ill health and was plagued most of his life by respiratory problems. He studied English literature at Tokyo University for a time but, unable to finance his studies, opted for a career in journalism. His father, Yoshiyuki Eisuke, was one of the main writers of the modernist school influenced by Dadaism at the beginning of the Showa era. Yoshiyuki Junnosuke received the Akutagawa award in 1954 for Shûu. The author has won awards and recognition for such works as Hoshi to tsuki wa ten no ana [The Moon and Stars Are Holes in the Sky], (1966), Anshitsu (Tanizaki Prize, 1969), and Yûgure made (Noma Award, 1978). He belongs to a line of sensual writers, from Ihara Saikaku to Nagai Kafû and Tanizaki, and was often compared to the French writer André Pieyre de Mandiargues.

MARC KOBER

Selected Works

- Bara no hambainin* [The Rose Seller]. 1950.
Shûu [Sudden Shower]. 1954.
Genshoku no machi [The Town with Fundamental Colors]. 1956.
Kigi wa midori ka? [Are the Trees Green?]. 1958.
 "Ajisai" [Hortensias]. 1964.
Fui no dekgoto [An Unpredictable Event]. 1965.
Hoshi to tsuki wa ten no ana [The Moon and Stars Are Holes in the Sky]. 1966.
Onna no dobutsuen [The Women Zoo]. 1968.
Anshitsu [The Dark Room]. 1969.
Hadaka no nyoi [Smell of a Naked Body]. 1971.
Kaban no nakami [The Bag Content]. 1974.
Onna no katachi [The Woman Shape]. 1975.
Yûgure made [Toward Dusk]. 1978.

Essays

- Sei to sei* [Living and Sexuality]. 1971.
Machikado no tabako-ya e no tabi [The Journey to the Corner of the Street]. 1979.

Recent Translations

- "Kinjû chûgyo" [Birds, Beasts, Insects and Fish]. Japan Quarterly 28 (Jan–March 1981).
 "Shokutaku no kôkei" [Good Table Manners]. Japan Echo 12 (1985).

Further Reading

- Pons, Philippe. "Yoshiyuki à l'assaut du ciel." Le Monde, January 4, 1991.

K

---

KALYANA MALLA

---

Indian author of Ananga Ranga, medieval marital sex manual

The Ananga Ranga by Kalyana Malla is one of the three major Indian erotic texts, the other two being Kamasutra by Vatsyayana and Ratirahasya by Kokkaka. Liberally translated, Ananga Ranga means the art of love. In fact, the first English translation of the work by Sir Richard F. Burton and F.F. Arbuthnot published in 1885 was appropriately titled The Hindu Art of Love. It is written in Sanskrit, the classical language of India. The work is available in translation in many Indian languages. It was also translated into Arabic, Persian, and Turkish under the title ‘Lizzat-al-Nissa’ [The Pleasure of Women] before it was translated into English, which points to its popularity not only in the Indian subcontinent but also in other Eastern countries. It has also been translated into Japanese and French.

The period of the author and the date of the text are not known. The author Kalyana Malla describes himself in the text as a poet of repute. By reference to Kavi-charika, a biography of famous Indian poets, Kalyana Malla is identified by some as the Brahmin poets from Kalinga (present Indian state of Orissa on the east coast of India) and a contemporary of the Oriya king Anangabhima. Going by the date of one of Anangabhima’s inscriptions, the date of Kalyana Malla and Ananga Ranga would be around 1172 CE. However, all manuscripts of Ananga Ranga examined by Burton and Arbuthnot contained a verse indicating that it was written for the amusement of Lad Khan, son of Ahmed Khan, who was a viceroy of the Lodhi dynasty (1450–1526) in Gujarat, a state in western India. By this reckoning, the date of Kalyana Malla and Ananga Ranga has to be placed somewhere between the late 15th and early 16th centuries. Kalyana Malla refers to Kamasutra and Ratirahasya in Ananga Ranga, which indicates that it was certainly the latest among these three well-known erotic texts.

In concluding the book, Kalyana Malla states that he wrote the Ananga Ranga because no one till then had written a book to prevent separation of married couples or to show them how they could live through their lives happily together. He notes that if husband and wife can live together as one soul, they will be happy in this world and in that to come. He further notes that the main reason for separation of husband and wife and their each seeking other partners and committing adultery is monotony and lack of variation in married life. He claims that after fully understanding the way quarrels take place, he has shown in the book that by varying the enjoyment of the wife, the husband may live with her as if living with 32 different women and how the wife may also become pleasing to the husband by learning what is taught in the book. Ananga Ranga is a unique erotic text that aims at enhancing pleasure within marriage, ensuring lifelong married bliss and preventing promiscuity and conjugal infidelity. Kalyana Malla's work is no doubt based on the pre-existing literature on the subject, but he has introduced many innovations in his prescription for erotic enjoyment which are not found in the earlier texts. He emphasizes ethics and spirituality, and envisages a happy couple with their passion cooling with advancing age devoting themselves to the study of divine knowledge.

Ananga Ranga is well structured, comprising an introductory chapter, ten textual chapters dealing with separate topics, and two appendices. The topics include characteristics, qualities, and temperaments of women of different kinds as well as of different regions. Kalyana Malla notes that desires of women are slower to rouse and that unlike men, they are not easily satisfied by a single act of congress. They require prolonged embraces, and if denied, women feel aggrieved. There are chapters dealing with various centers of passion in women, the days and periods of their excitement, classification of men and women into four classes, and the matings from among these classes in marriages that are ideal. Part of the text and the appendices deal with the use of recipes for potions for erotic purposes and with astrology in securing greater pleasure between husband and wife. The text contains elaborate prescriptions of herbal and other medicines for conditions like premature ejaculation and menstrual disorder, as well as preparations for uses as perfumes, bathing preparations, mouth fresheners, and beauty aids. One chapter deals with charms and mantras, through the use of which a man can win over the love and affection of his wife. The last two chapters deal with external and internal enjoyments, with advice of a practical nature. The first of these emphasizes the role of foreplay and deals with it in some detail. The last chapter deals with various ways of sexual congress, including Purushayita, where the woman plays an active role in pleasing the man. The following provides a flavor of Kalyana Malla's writing:

At all times of enjoying Purushayita, the wife shall remember that without a special effort of will on her part, the husband's pleasure will not be perfect. To this end, she must ever strive to close and constrict her yonis until it holds her husband's linga, as with a finger, opening and shutting at her will and finally acting as the hand of the cowherd girl who milks the cow. This can be learned only by long practice, and especially by throwing the will into the part to be affected, even as men endeavor to sharpen their hearing and their sense of touch. While so doing, she will mentally repeat the name of the Lord of Love in order that a blessing may rest upon the undertaking. And she will be pleased to hear that the art, once learned, is never lost. Her husband will then value her above all women, nor would he exchange her for the most beautiful queen in the three worlds. So lovely and pleasant to man is she who constricts. (The translation follows Burton and Arbuthnot.)

CHITTARANJAN SATAPATHY

Further Reading

- Bhandari, V., ed. Ananga Ranga. Benares: Haridas Sanskrit Series No. 9, 1923.
- Burton, R., and F.F. Arbuthnot, trans. Ananga Ranga: The Hindu Art of Love. New Delhi: Orient Paperbacks, 1998.
- . Kamasutra. New Delhi: Orient Paperbacks, 2001.
- Comfort, A. Koka Shastra. London: Mitchell Bleazley, 1997.
- De, S.K. Ancient Indian Erotics and Erotic Literature. Calcutta: Mukhopadhyay, 1959.
- Dutta, A., ed. Encyclopaedia of Indian Literature. Vol. 3. New Delhi: Sahitya Academy, 1996.
- Ray, T.L. Kalyana Malla's Ananga Ranga. Calcutta: Medical Books, 1960.

KĀMASŪTRA

Classical Indian erotic text

The Kāmasūtra of Vātsyāyana was composed sometime around the third to fourth centuries CE and is the earliest extant work of erotic science from South Asia. Written in Sanskrit prose and verse, the text is attributed to a scholar named Vātsyāyana, whose name is connected to no other texts and about whom we know nothing other than what we can extrapolate from the Kāmasūtra. Vātsyāyana relies upon the now lost work of earlier specialists in the field of erotic science, whom he cites by name, sometimes agreeing and sometimes disagreeing with their theories. In turn, later works of erotic science, such as the Ratirahasya/Kokaśāstra, the Nāgarasarvasva, the Pañcasāyaka, the Anaṅgarāṅga, and the Kandarpacūḍāmaṇi, defer to the authority of the Kāmasūtra, explicitly modeling themselves upon it or citing it often in their treatments of the subject.

Accordingly, the Kāmasūtra is the most well known and authoritative text in a genre known as kāmasāstra, the “discipline” (śāstra) of pleasure (kāma). Śāstric texts are academic and theoretical, rather than artistic and literary. They tend to be extremely dense and allusive in nature, apparently written for a scholarly audience able to comprehend their jargon-laden statements and their style of argumentation. While there are śāstric texts devoted to a whole range of techno-practical sciences (e.g., medicine, architecture, animal husbandry, astrology, physiognomy), a distinct body of śāstric inquiry developed around a conceptual trio known as the trivarga, a “group of three” with apparent claims to humanistic comprehensiveness. This group is comprised of kāma, dharma (duty, moral order) and artha (acquisition, profit); study of these three subjects taken together comprises a sort of “life science,” enabling the educated person to cultivate a fruitful existence.

Each member of the trivarga has theoretical texts devoted to it, as well as an extensive commentarial tradition. Only one Sanskrit commentary on the Kāmasūtra has been edited and published to date, the Jayamaṅgalā of Yaśodhara, most likely composed in the thirteenth century CE, almost a thousand years after the probable composition of the Kāmasūtra. Yaśodhara’s commentary is extremely erudite, standing as both an invaluable verse-by-verse interpretation of the frequently obscure Kāmasūtra and an original reflection on the subject of erotic pleasure. Yaśodhara, as a commentator, always defers to the authority of the Kāmasūtra, but his lengthy exposition necessarily exceeds the spartan language of the original. In the face of compact statements like “From [their] connection with that,” Yaśodhara elaborates philosophical concepts deployed by the Kāmasūtra, provides details of stories alluded to by it, refers to medical evidence, and expands upon the text’s many typologies. His explanations may range far from the meaning of the original text, but they are always worth taking seriously.

A second Sanskrit commentary, the Praudhāpriyā of Bhāskara Narasiṃha, was composed in eighteenth-century Benares, India; it has been neither edited nor published, let alone translated. Written at even greater historical remove from the Kāmasūtra, the Praudhāpriyā is highly philosophical in its orientation, and cites numerous works of scholarship and literature in its explanation of the text. Interestingly, the Praudhāpriyā seems ignorant of Yaśodhara’s Jayamaṅgalā or any other Kāmasūtra commentary, and so represents a distinctly eighteenth-century perspective on the field of erotic science. A number of commentaries in Indian vernacular languages were written and published in the twentieth century, including an unnamed commentary by Devadatta Śāstrī, Paṇḍit Mādhavācāryya’s Puruṣārthaprabhā, Rāmānand Sharmā’s Jayā, and Pārasanāth Dvivedī’s Manoramā, all in Hindi, as well as commentaries in Bengali, Kannada, Marathi, Oriya, Tamil, and Telugu.

The text was first published in a European language in 1883, as an English translation by Sir Richard F. Burton and F.F. Arbuthnot (with the unacknowledged assistance of Indian scholars Bhagavanlal Indrajit and Shivaram Parashuram Bhide). In the preface to this translation, Burton presents the Kāmasūtra as providing valuable scientific knowledge capable of remedying woeful and injurious British ignorance of sexual matters, thus initiating the tendency to consider the Kāmasūtra as representative of putative Indian sexual license, in opposition to European sexual repression. Burton's translation is frequently inaccurate, and often incorporates without acknowledgement segments of the Jayamaṅgalā into the text of the Kāmasūtra, an unfortunate trend followed by many subsequent translators of the text. Nevertheless, Burton's translation was the most widely available for over one hundred years, until the publication in 2002 of an excellent translation by Wendy Doniger and Sudhir Kakar, who carefully separate the Kāmasūtra from the Jayamaṅgalā, passages of which they include as footnotes, in addition to selections from Devadatta Śāstrī's Hindi commentary. To date, the only complete translation of both the Kāmasūtra and the Jayamaṅgalā is the German translation by Richard Schmidt, first published in 1897 (subsequently revised on several occasions). The Burton translation has been retranslated into numerous European languages. An original but highly inaccurate French translation by Alain Daniélou appeared in 1992; this translation was translated into English in 1994.

KĀMASŪTRA

The Kāmasūtra

The Kāmasūtra is cosmopolitan in outlook; it takes for granted its applicability to any civilized social context. Because the pursuit of social and sexual pleasure necessarily involves other people, the text advises its audience in the means of negotiating a highly sophisticated social world. In this world, male–female social interaction is normative, with courtesans playing an important role in the pursuit of pleasure. At the same time, the text assumes the sequestered status of married women, though it provides justifications and means for overcoming this obstacle. While the text attends to a whole host of constraints that might prevent the accomplishment of one's erotic goals (those of class, caste, and family, for example), it takes as its ideal social actor one who is educated, wealthy, and good-looking, with plenty of leisure time in which to pursue a rich and rewarding life. It is also highly significant that the text makes no mention of the relationship between sex and reproduction, as if pregnancy were not a possible outcome of the sex acts described.

The Kāmasūtra is probably most famous for its systematization of the varieties of sex acts. While the Kāmasūtra takes sex between a man and a woman to be normative, it should be noted that the text does recognize the existence of a “third sex,” a man who takes on the appearance and behavior of a woman and who performs fellatio on other men. It also describes sex acts between women, a behavior said to take place when male sexual partners are unavailable. The text mentions group sex (with multiple men and with multiple women), as well as anal intercourse, though this last is said to be a regional variant. Scratching, biting, and striking are considered to be key elements in sexual play, because they incite passion both during lovemaking and afterward, when the marks they leave prompt memories of sexual encounters. As Doniger and Kakar translate:

There are no keener means of increasing passion than acts inflicted with tooth and nail. (Kāmasūtra 2.4.31)

Vātsyāyana is careful to caution his audience against excessive use of these acts, noting instances when they resulted in mutilation or even death. Nevertheless, hitting, biting, and otherwise marking the body of one's lover are taken to be key elements in sexual union.

But the Kāmasūtra's descriptions of sex acts are merely one small portion of its investigation of the subject of pleasure. The Kāmasūtra organizes its subjects into seven chapters, each further subdivided by topic. The first chapter of the Kāmasūtra opens with a theoretical discussion of pleasure in relation to the other primary objectives of human existence: duty and acquisition. The text defends the importance of pleasure, as well as the need for scholarly texts devoted to the subject. It then enumerates 64 fine arts that mark the cultivated man or woman, ranging from singing, dancing, and poetry to metallurgy, woodworking, and architecture. It also describes the lifestyle of the cosmopolitan man and his friends, including details of his toilette, the furnishing of his house, garden, and bedroom; his daily schedule, with particular attention to his leisure activities; and his conduct at public festivals. These descriptions have been highly influential in the history of Indian literature, encapsulating the ideal behavior of heroes, heroines, and their sidekicks for the duration of Sanskrit literary history.

The second chapter contains, among other things, the detailed lists and descriptions of sexual positions for which the Kāmasūtra is most famous. It classifies men and women according to the dimensions of their genitalia, the degree of their passion, and the time taken to reach sexual climax. This last division contains a notable debate regarding the existence and nature of female orgasm. This chapter also enumerates, labels, and describes sexual postures (17 varieties), sexual strokes (ten for the man and three for the woman when she is on top), and ways of kissing (16 varieties), embracing (12 varieties), scratching (eight varieties), biting (eight varieties), slapping (eight varieties), and screaming and moaning (eight varieties), as well as regional variations and sexual preferences, unusual sex acts (including group sex and anal sex), sex with the woman playing the part of the man, oral sex (with a detailed description of same-sex fellatio), protocols for before and after sex, and typical behaviors during lovers' quarrels.

The third chapter gives recommendations for courtship and seduction of potential marriage partners; it is addressed primarily to men seeking brides but also advises women in the seduction of potential husbands. It outlines the signs and signals by which one comes to know the mindset of one's intended, and by which a man or woman makes his or her intentions clear to a desired partner. It describes in great detail the ways in which one can captivate the potential partner. It also suggests means of tricking, and indeed, forcing young women into the marriage bed.

The fourth chapter is devoted to the behavior of wives, especially those in a polygamous household. Here the emphasis is upon specialization, with co-wives advised to assume distinct roles, each designed to maintain the attention of the husband, while the husband is advised to treat each individually. The "senior wife," the "junior wife," the kept woman, and the "wife unlucky in love" are all advised how best to behave with respect to one another and to their husband.

This is the chapter that will seem most conservative to the modern reader, as the freedom of women is tightly circumscribed. Nevertheless, the behavior of wives in Sanskrit literature strongly conforms to the descriptions found in this brief chapter.

The fifth chapter is concerned with the seduction of married women. It includes criteria for determining the likelihood of success, and a sympathetic inventory of the many reasons a woman might reject a would-be lover. It describes the types of men likely to succeed with women and provides a psychologically rich catalogue of women who are easily seduced. It provides strategies for producing intimacy with the woman, the various signals employed to convey intent, and the means of testing her feelings. It also describes in great detail the all-important role of the messenger in bringing about a love affair; this role is of central importance in South Asian erotic literature. The fifth chapter also contains several sections devoted to the sex life of men in power, such as kings and ministers of state, and of the women living in the harems of such powerful men.

The sixth chapter of the Kāmasūtra is addressed to courtesans, and details the criteria for selecting or rejecting a lover, as well as how to acquire, keep, extract money from, cast off, and reunite with him. It also offers the means to calculate advantage and disadvantage in any union. Within the Kāmasūtra's social world, courtesans are expert both in generating pleasure and in using it for profit.

The final chapter is devoted to various pharmacological, mechanical, and magical aids to sex and love, including aphrodisiacs, philters for making oneself sexually desirable or for bringing another under one's sexual sway, and aids to virility (including means of increasing the size and endurance of the penis, as well as dildos and piercing). There are also recipes to eliminate passion for a particular person, to make the vagina expand or contract, and to alter one's appearance.

The Kāmasūtra and Erotic Literature

Since its first European translation in 1883, the Kāmasūtra has occupied an important place in the erotic imaginary of the modern West, representing sexual license and titillation, a means of arousal disguised as sexuality or Indology. However, it is doubtful that the Kāmasūtra was composed as erotic literature, if by that term we mean literature designed to arouse erotic feelings. The text does advise a man to talk about the Kāmasūtra in the presence of a woman he would like to seduce, but, contrary to its depiction (and use?) in the modern West, there is no historical evidence that the text itself was used to stimulate an erotic response.

Nevertheless, its descriptions and prescriptions are designed to facilitate an eroticized lifestyle, in which one's private and public activities can be oriented toward the maximization of pleasure. Such pleasure is created not through indulging some otherwise-thwarted sexual instinct, after the model of liberation from sexual repression. Rather, the Kāmasūtra suggests that with proper application, the reader of the text can achieve an existence in which pleasure has a prominent place. It also implies that real pleasure is achieved with full knowledge of the range of erotic possibilities, so that the actor can identify the situation at hand and determine the appropriate course of action. For the Kāmasūtra, as for other Sanskrit textbooks, textualized knowledge has absolute authority; real-life success is that which approximates what is contained in the text. The Kāmasūtra does not deny the possibility that people can find erotic pleasure without knowledge of the text, but understands such achievement to be purely fortuitous, based upon knowledge that has "trickled down" from those educated in erotic science.

While the Kāmasūtra itself may not be erotic literature, it has exercised a profound influence upon the literatures of the Indian subcontinent, particularly upon Sanskrit literature, in which the erotic is arguably the dominant aesthetic mode. The typologies of sexual actors, situations, and modes of intercourse systematized in the Kāmasūtra have been deployed in a vast array of dramatic, poetic, sculptural, and two-dimensional artworks. According to Sanskrit poetic theory, true aesthetic enjoyment can be produced only by representation of situations that conform to established norms; for erotic poetry, to a great extent, this means conforming to the norms depicted in the Kāmasūtra.

While the rule-bound nature of the śāstric universe should not be underemphasized, the Kāmasūtra nevertheless envisions circumstances in which an erotic situation might exceed the strictures of the text:

To the extent that men are of weak passion, there is scope for textbooks.

But when the wheel of erotic delight is in motion, there is no textbook and no logical order. (Kāmasūtra 2.2.31)

Laura S. Desmond

See also Kalyana Mala; Koka Pandit; Sex Manuals

Editions

- Kāmasūtra*, with Jayamaṅgalā. Edited and with Hindi commentary by Devadatta Sāstrī, 1964, Varanasi: Caukhambhā Sanskrit Sansthan, fifth edition, 1996.
- The Kama Sutra of Vatsyayana*, Translated [by Sir Richard Burton and F.F. Arbuthnot] from the Sanscrit. In Seven Parts, with Preface, Introduction and Concluding Remarks. Cosmopoli: 1883.
- Das Kāmasūtram des Vātsyāyana, Die Indische Ars Amatoria nebst dem Vollständigen Kommentare (Jayamaṅgalā)*. Translated by Richard Schmidt. Leipzig, 1897 (subsequently revised on numerous occasions).
- Kama Sutra of Vatsyayana*. Translated by S.C. Upadhyaya. Bombay: Taraporevala, 1961.
- The Complete Kāma Sūtra*. Translated by Alain Daniélou. Rochester, VT: Park Street Press, 1994.
- Vatsyayana Mallanaga Kamasutra*. Translated by Wendy Doniger and Sudhir Kakar. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002.

References and Further Reading

- Chakladar, Haran Chandra. Social Life in Ancient India, Studies in Vātsyāyana's Kāmasūtra. Second revised edition. Calcutta: Susil Gupta, 1954.
- De, Sushil Kumar. Ancient Indian Erotics and Erotic Literature. Calcutta: Firma K.L. Mukhopadhyay, 1969.
- Doniger, Wendy. "The Kamasutra: It Isn't All About Sex." Kenyon Review 25 (2003): 18–37.
- Hampiholi, Vishwanath K. Kāmashāstra in Classical Sanskrit Literature. Delhi: Ajanta Publications, 1988.

---

KAMENSKII, ANATOLII

---

1876–1941

Russian novelist and playwright

Zhenshchina* [The Woman]

Anatolii Kamenskii's short story The Woman is indicative of the writer's interest in the inevitability of human enslavement to the call of the flesh, although it is much lighter in tone than some of his other writings.

This story, written in the 1910s and published in a collection of stories about love entitled Moi garem (Berlin, 1923), tells of a young man, Nezhdanov, who comes to St. Petersburg from a provincial town on a business trip, lodges at his sister's apartment, and gets swept up by the excitement of a big city. One day, as he sits in the empty apartment, he looks at himself in the mirror and thinks that he is a handsome, albeit slightly feminine-looking, man. For fun, he puts on some makeup he finds in his sister's bedroom and tries out some of her clothes on top of his suit. He enjoys seeing himself in feminine attire and decides to get dressed completely as a woman and go out into the city. He buys himself a wig of beautiful blonde hair and puts on his sister's underwear, stockings, and dress. He finds his new clothes to be very comfortable. Nezhdanov is both captivated by his prank and fascinated by his own body in its feminine guise, and gets an erotic thrill from seeing himself in the mirror. He is in love with his body. As he leaves the building, he finds himself enjoying the comedy of deception and self-deception that he is now playing.

As he walks down the street, he notices the attention he is getting from several men, some of whom follow him and make remarks to him, thinking that he is a beautiful woman. One man continues following him after Nezhdanov catches a carriage for the train station. As he rides in the carriage, pursued by the stranger, Nezhdanov conjures for himself different life stories, alternatively those of a cocotte, or sporting lady; an adventuress; a mistress on her way to a rendezvous; an innocent girl; and an abandoned wife. He is astonished to what extent he is mentally taken over by each of these imagined personae.

In the train compartment, riding toward a popular concert park, Nezhdanov attracts the attention of all the men, and particularly of his pursuer. The young man follows him to the concert hall and strikes up a conversation. After a while, Nezhdanov responds, first in a coquettish way, and then more seriously. They converse for a long time, and Nezhdanov surprises his interlocutor, a young lawyer, with his literary tastes and knowledge. The lawyer assumes that Nezhdanov is a progressive woman and invites him to his place, saying that the inevitable would happen sooner or later and that the two of them are too modern to play silly games of pursuit. While Nezhdanov tries to decline the invitation, which would reveal him as a man, he instinctively realizes that the lawyer seriously takes him for an extraordinary and modern woman, just the kind of a woman who would attract Nezhdanov himself. Inwardly Nezhdanov sympathizes with the lawyer, seeing in him a kindred spirit to his own male self. He declines the lawyer's offer of a rendezvous, telling him that they would never meet again. The lawyer struggles to comprehend this "woman's" secret before letting "her" disappear forever. Amazed at the depth of feelings that he has evoked in the young lawyer and in himself, Nezhdanov rhapsodically imagines that he is a manifestation of spiritual and sexual longing, of a missed chance, and in this state mounts the train platform to go back to the city, leaving the lawyer behind.

The question of homosexuality is alluded to rather elusively in The Woman. Underpinning this story is Otto Weininger's theory of sexuality as described in his Eros und Psyche, a widely read text at that time. According to Weininger, normal men's character is composed of 75 percent virility. Fifty percent virility in a man points toward homosexual tendencies. While Nezhdanov doesn't surpass this percentage, and remains a man, he enjoys his role as a woman. Nezhdanov's sympathy for the young lawyer is ambiguous—is it because he understands him, or is it because the lawyer appeals to him sexually? Kamenskii left this question unresolved, and at least one late-20th-century critic found this story to be a light and absurdist comedy on gender roles.

Kamenskii was a popular writer in the early part of the 20th century, although he was seen by critics as not quite on the literary level of Leonid Andreev, Valerii Bryusov, Mikhail Kuzmin, and other writers of the Silver Age who wrote about sexuality. Some critics recognized the strength of his evocation of city life: The Woman provides an exuberant description of the excitement of St. Petersburg, with its smells, crowds, fast-paced transportation, and chance encounters, and of the deterioration of bourgeois gender norms. Nevertheless, Kamenskii often got satirized and demonized in the high-brow literary press. This is particularly true of his novel Leda and of his story Chetyre [The Four], which alternatively dealt with transcending and succumbing to sexual needs. Maksim Gor'kii wrote that Kamenskii's plots were inappropriate in a period following the failed 1905 Revolution. Kamenskii, however, felt that an artist needed to be above the madness of politics. Many critics dismissed Kamenskii as pathologically weak and perverse in character, who basely took advantage of controversial topics in his writings. To this day Kamenskii is considered to have stopped developing in a literary sense around 1908, despite the fact that he wrote and published quite a bit after this date. Novopolin, in his 1909 book on the pornographic elements in Russian literature, dismissed Kamenskii for cynically and self-servingly propagating the idea of the supremacy of the sexual instinct over other human endeavors. Kamenskii was all but forgotten after his death, and very little has been written about him afterward.

Biography

Anatolii Pavlovich Kamenskii was born in Novocherkassk. He came from minor nobility and worked as a civil servant. Kamenskii started publishing in Russian literary periodicals in 1896 and wrote scripts for Russian silent films in the early 1910s. After staging the play Reigen [The Round Dance] by Arthur Schnitzler, which was considered pornographic, Kamenskii faced censure and lived in Berlin from 1920 to 1924. He returned to Soviet Russia in 1924, was arrested in 1937, and died in a prison camp in Komi.

RUTH WALLACH

Editions

“Zhenshchina.” In Moi garem; rasskazy o liubvi. Berlin: I. Blagov, 1923.

“Ideal'naia zhenshchina.” In Erotizmy. Moscow: EKSMO-Press, 2000.

Selected Works

Rasskazy [Discussions]. 1908–1910.

Liudi [The People]. 1910.

Leda. 1918.

Nichego ne bylo [Nothing to It]. 1918.

Belaia noch [White Night]. 1928.

Peterburgskii chelovek [Petersburg Man]. 1936.

Further Reading

Novopolin, G. Pornograficheskii element v russkoi literature. St. Petersburg: M.M. Stasiulevich, 1909.

Persi, Ugo. “Les Recits erotiques d'Anatolij Kamenskij: Leda, Cetyre, Zenscina.” In Amour et erotisme dans la littérature russe du XXe siècle / Liubov' i erotika v russkoi literature XX-go veka, edited by Leonid Heller, 64–72. Bern: Peter Lang, 1992.

Russkie pisateli 1800–1917. Biograficheskii slovar'. Moscow: Sovetskaia entsiklopediia, 1989–1994.

---

KESSEL, JOSEPH

---

1898–1979

French novelist and journalist

Belle de jour

Kessel intended this psychological novel (1928) as a representation of “the terrible divorce between the heart and the flesh, between a true, immense, and tender love and the implacable demands of the senses” (translations throughout are by the author of this article from the French original of Belle de jour). In a preface, he expresses his belief that this antagonism belongs to all people in varying degrees and that—echoing a premise of nascent psychoanalysis—“an exceptional situation” is required in order to uncover it fully: “just as one studies the sick in order to know the healthy, the mentally ill in order to penetrate the workings of intelligence.” The situation he has found is that of Séverine, a young society woman who deeply loves her husband but is inexorably drawn to a secret life of prostitution. In order to conceal her activities, she works in a discreet brothel and limits her presence there from two to five o’clock in the afternoon, hence the sobriquet “Belle de jour” (daytime girl).

Both by direct appeal in the preface and by the third-person, internally focused narration, Belle de jour continually calls upon the reader to feel compassion for a protagonist who falls victim to her own deep and uncontrollable desires. A prologue dramatizes an incident from Séverine’s childhood that is clearly intended to account for the conflict between love and desire that will devastate her as an adult: As an eight-year-old, she is molested in her home by a plumber. When her governess finds her on the floor, it is thought that she slipped—and she too believes this explanation. This incident is central to the novel’s principal innovation. Venturing well beyond conventional story lines that relate the hidden lives of upright women, Belle de jour depicts its heroine as suffering from a psychosexual pathology with origins in repressed childhood trauma.

When the main action begins, Séverine has been married to Pierre, a young surgeon, for two years, but her physical attitude toward him seems maternal, and she feels only rebellion and lassitude when she detects his desire. He has concluded that carnal passions are inaccessible to her, and she no doubt shares this view until an acquaintance, Husson, kisses her insolently—filling her with disgust, but also with brief, intense pleasure. This kiss is the first sign that Séverine, who still thinks she exerts perfect control over herself, is instead subject to “essential, dormant forces” from within. The subsequent revelation that a woman from her own circle secretly works as a prostitute fires her imagination. Soon thereafter, as she repeatedly fantasizes about a strange man who pursues her lustfully along dark alleys, she is terrified and overcome with desire.

Until only recently, Séverine was repulsed by anything that strayed from social norms. Now, as she moves from one erotically charged fantasy or encounter to another, eventually making her way to the brothel operated by Madame Anaïs, she feels “prohibited desires” which affirm her resemblance to all other human beings according to the narrator. From Pierre she receives tenderness and trust; what he cannot give her, and what she finds in coarse, even vulgar, men, is “that exquisite animal pleasure.” As Belle de jour, she takes pleasure in forced obedience and verbal and physical domination. Initially, the need to play her new role consumes her, but soon a kind of intoxication sets in and habit displaces desire. When she realizes that her behavior has become servile—not only as Belle de jour but in general—she uses her afternoons to forget her troubles. In a dramatic denouement, her two lives intersect when Husson makes an unexpected appearance in Madame Anaïs’s establishment. Lest her hidden identity be revealed to her husband and others, she turns to an underworld client for help, and the narrative accelerates toward its tragic end.

Belle de jour attempts to represent both an extraordinary experience—childhood molestation, prostitution for pleasure—and a universal tension between “true love” and the “demands of the senses.” It describes Séverine’s desires as common to all human beings while also offering her up as a pathological case that can shed light on normal function. Just how all of this works is not immediately apparent. Occasional clues, however, suggest that the novel conforms to a single, overall conception of love and desire. It may be inferred that as a result of Séverine’s traumatic experience, her “two essential poles” of the heart and flesh have become strictly non-overlapping realms; whereas for people who have not endured a similar trauma, they may be united within a single love relation. It is true that Séverine resumes a sexual relationship with her husband after becoming a prostitute, but it never becomes satisfying in the manner of her other encounters. The long-term effect of her repressed memory is to dissociate feelings of love from those of desire and to make desire possible only as a reenactment of the traumatic event.

Luis Buñuel’s brilliant film adaptation (Belle de jour, 1967) is greatly indebted to Kessel’s novel and also makes several notable departures. The basic story line remains (with a modified ending), along with virtually all the characters and the childhood incident. The filmmaker eschews direct access to Séverine’s feelings, however, in favor of a rigorously external perspective. He also creates a complex fantasy life for her which he dramatizes in alternation with real-life scenes. The effect is to open a window to Séverine’s psyche at once more tenuous and more profound than the perspective provided by the novel. In the film, moreover, her life as a prostitute ultimately serves a therapeutic function, allowing her to work through her condition and to remove the impediments to a fulfilling relation with Pierre. As a result, her uncontrollable fantasies, which serve as indicators of her pathology, have all but ceased as the ending draws near. This evolution—which is more coherent and more convincing than the treatment by Kessel—is particularly compelling in the light of certain tendencies in psychoanalysis, in particular Sigmund Freud’s repetition compulsion (Beyond the Pleasure Principle, 1920), Melanie Klein’s psychoanalytic theory (Love, Hate and Reparation, 1937), and Jessica Benjamin’s notion of identificatory love (The Bonds of Love, 1988).

Biography

Born in Clara, Argentina, to Russian–Jewish emigrés, and died in Avernès, France. Childhood spent in France and Russia. Studied literature in Russia, at the lycée of Nice and at Paris’s Lycée Louis-le-Grand, 1914. Served as editor of the Journal des débats and reporter for Le Matin, later for France-Soir. Earned a degree in literature from the Sorbonne, 1915. Studied acting and became an actor at the Odéon.

Like Ernest Hemingway and André Malraux, Kessel was a writer and man of action. His 80 novels and numerous reportages are inspired by personal experiences in World War I aviation, the Spanish Civil War, the French Resistance during World War II, the birth of the state of Israel, and by extensive travels throughout five continents. In 1925 he was awarded the Grand prix du roman de l’Académie française for Les rois aveugles [Blinded Kings]. Following the immense success of Le Lion [The Lion] (1958), he received the Prince Rainier of Monaco Prize. He was elected to the French Academy in 1962.

L. SCOTT LERNER

Editions

Belle de jour. Paris: Gallimard, 1928. Reprint, 1972, Folio Collection 125. Belle de jour. Translated by Geoffrey Wagner. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1962.

Selected Works

La Steppe rouge. 1922.
L’Equipage. 1923.
Les rois aveugles. 1925.
Le journal d’une petite fille sous le bolchévisme. 1926.
Nuits de princes. 1927.
Le coup de grâce. 1931.
Nuits de Montmartre. 1932.
Bas-fonds. 1932.
Fortune carrée. 1932.
Vent de sable. 1934.
L’Armée des ombres. 1946.
Le tour du malheur. 1950.
Le lion. 1958.
Discours de réception, at l’Académie française. 1962.
Tous n’étaient pas des anges. 1963.
Terres d’amour et du feu. 1966.
Les cavaliers. 1967.

Further Reading

- Buñuel, Luis, dir. Belle de jour. Paris: Paris Film Productions, 1967.
- Courrière, Yves. Joseph Kessel, ou, sur la piste du lion. Paris: Plon, 1985.
- Reiner, Silvain. Mes saisons avec Joseph Kessel. Levallois-Perret: Manya, c. 1993.

- Tassel, Alain. Création romanesque dans l'oeuvre de Joseph Kessel. Paris: Harmattan, 1997.
- , ed. Présence de Kessel: Colloque de Nice, 2–3 avril 1998. Nice: Université de Nice-Sophia Antipolis; Paris: C.I.D. Diffusion, 1998.
- Wood, Michael. Belle de Jour. London: BFI Film Classics, 2001, U of Calif P. 2001. Includes bibliography relating to the film by Luis Buñuel.

---

KHARJAS

---

This poetic composition is known as jarcha in Spanish, and refers to the last lines that close an Arabic muwashshaha, a strophic poem flourishing—broadly speaking—from the 10th to the 12th century, elaborated in Al-Andalus (Muslim territory of medieval Spain, present-day Andalucía). While the main body of the poem had classical and refined attributes, the jarcha would be composed in a more popular register either in colloquial Arabic, in Romance, or in a mixture of the two languages. In 1948, the scholar Samuel Stern came upon 20 jarchas written in Romance, figuring as the last strophes of classical Arabic or Hebrew poems. Subsequent discoveries confirmed the jarcha as an expression of a hybrid and more personal lyric poetry in early Spanish literature. These hybrid Romance jarchas are the focus of the following entry. It must, however, be noted that to look at jarchas as Romance lyric is to offer a limited perspective. For a thorough discussion of the Arabic kharjas and the history of criticism on these, especially in relation to their Romance counterparts, the reader should start by consulting Rosen (“The muwashshah”). The debate on the relationship between the two is complex and rather technical but of great interest to anyone with some training either in medieval Spanish or in classical Arabic.

The Spanish jarchas are composed in Mozarabic, the dialect spoken by Christians living in Muslim Spain as well as the Jewish population and any bilingual residents of Al-Andalus. Brief and highly evocative, these compositions often center upon a girl’s fleeting musings on requited or unrequited love, longing, and absence; this feminine voice is quite characteristic of the Romance jarcha. The addressee is often the mother, who, biological or not, represents a number of differing postures: confidante, guard, silent listener, accomplice. The compositions also address the lover at times as well.

In the Romance jarchas, the tone of the female speaker is frank, filled with sensuality, and clearly centered upon physical feeling. The strength of musical and folkloric tradition is apparent in the rhythm, imagery, and focus of the brief songs. As love songs identified with the feminine voice, these Spanish jarchas recall the other medieval lyric traditions of women’s love songs found in German and English, for example. In the Spanish jarchas, the mother–daughter relationship is also touched upon, either as a vehicle for the expression of the daughter’s longing or rebellion or as the mother’s advice on amorous matters. As a genre embracing folklore, Romance languages, Arabic, and classical elements, the sensuality of these brief compositions is direct and often very evocative.

LEYLA ROUHI

Edition (the Romance jarchas)

- Lírica española de tipo popular*. Edited by Margit Frenk. Madrid: Cátedra, 1986.

Further Reading

- Armistead, Samuel G. “A Brief History of Kharja Studies.” Hispania 70 (1987): 8–15.
- Compton, Linda Fish. Andalusian Lyrical Poetry and Old Spanish Love Songs: The Muwashshah and

KIRKUP, JAMES

- Its Kharja*. New York: New York University Press: 1976.
- Frenk, Margit. Las jarchas mozárbes y los comienzos de la lírica románica. Mexico City: El Colegio de México 1975. Repr. 1975.
- Liu, Benjamin, and James T. Monroe. Ten Hispano-Arabic Strophic Songs in the Modern Oral Tradition: Music and Texts. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1989.
- Rosen, Tova. "The muwashshah." In The Literature of Al-Andalus, edited by Maria Rosa Menocal, Raymond P. Scheindlin, and Michael Sells, 165–89. Cambridge History of Arabic Literature. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.

---

KIRKUP, JAMES

---

1918–
British poet, translator, autobiographer, short story and travel writer, dramatist, novelist, and essayist

James Kirkup's autobiography, I of All People: An Autobiography of Youth (1988) pictures the extremely conservative academic and literary world in the United Kingdom of the 1940s and 1950s. The themes that Kirkup chose for his poems as well as the many sexual and scatological allusions they contain guaranteed that they would be received with some hostility. Nevertheless, his friendship with J.R. Ackerly, the editor of The Listener, enabled Kirkup to print some of his more daring poems in that magazine. These included "The Drain," which contains both voyeuristic and homoerotic images as the narrator watches young workmen wield their "well-oiled tools" while repairing the drain in the road outside his room, and "The Convenience," about a urinal, describing how men seek "passionate relief" with "voluptuous ferocity," which was, however, considered too much by The Listener's typists, who refused to prepare the copy for print. Kirkup's poems treat a wide range of erotic scenarios, including the heterosexual ("An Indoor Pastoral"), the homosexual ("Gay Boys"), and the autoerotic ("Ode to Masturbation"). Kirkup was later to argue in his autobiographies that his treatment of such topics showed the Continental influence on his poetry (he translated a number of French and German poets), and he fiercely condemned the stuffiness of both English poetry and the English literary scene. He claimed that his outsider status made him persona non grata with the British Council, which did all it could to block his employment opportunities both at home and abroad.

By today's standards, the sexual references in Kirkup's poetry seem unremarkable. However, the poem that has continued to create controversy is "The Love That Dares to Speak Its Name," the publication of which in issue 96 of Gay News resulted in the newspaper's editor, Denis Lemon, being successfully prosecuted for blasphemy. It remains illegal to either publish or circulate the poem in the UK, and as late as 1997, a lesbian and gay Christian group was investigated by the police for providing a hypertext link to the poem on their website. The title refers to the poem "Two Loves" by Lord Alfred Douglas, onetime companion of Oscar Wilde, in which homosexuality is referred to as "the love that dare not speak its name." In Kirkup's poem, the love that dares to speak its name is Christ's love "for all men," which is described in explicitly sexual terms. Kirkup was later to disown the poem (on artistic, not moral grounds) and it has never been serialized in any of his collections.

Kirkup's prose works, too, feature scenes of erotic intensity. His description of his attraction to, and eventual seduction by, an American student in Spain in A Poet Could Not But Be Gay (1991) is particularly effective. His short story "The Teacher of American Business English" provides a witty description of a sexual encounter between a foreign teacher and one of his Japanese students. However, the novel Gaijin on the Ginza, which is full of graphically described and somewhat perverse sexual acts, seems written to offend several barely disguised members of the British Council in Japan whom Kirkup believed had sullied his name with the Japanese administration.

Kirkup will be remembered as much for the flamboyant life described in his autobiographies as for the daring nature of his poetry, which will no doubt live on in volumes of lesbian and gay verse.

Biography

James Kirkup was born in South Shields, England, on April 23, 1918. He graduated with a degree in modern languages from Durham University in 1941, after which, as a conscientious objector during the Second World War, he worked as an agricultural laborer. It was at this time that he published his first poems. He published many poems in the BBC's arts magazine The Listener from 1949 to 1965 and became a good friend of its editor, J.R. Ackerly. Kirkup's early poetry collections included The Drowned Sailor and Other Poems (1947), The Submerged Village and Other Poems (1951), A Correct Compassion and Other Poems (1952), A Spring Poem and Other Poems (1954), and The Descent into the Cave and Other Poems (1957). During this time he held several positions as writer in residence, including Leeds University (1950–52). However, the sexual, homoerotic, and scatological overtones in many of his poems made him a controversial and unpopular figure in the conservative literary and academic world of the 1950s. In the late 1950s he left England to teach abroad, including a spell in Sweden and Spain before settling in Japan, where he taught at universities in Sendai, Tokyo, Nagoya, and Kyoto. His exposure to Japanese literature had a profound effect on his own poetic output, and his collections from this time show the influence of Japanese poetic forms, including haiku. In the 1970s, he was on the move again, this time teaching in the United States, Morocco, and Ireland. In 1977 his poem "The Love That Dares to Speak Its Name," which imagines a Roman guard in a sex act with the dead Christ, resulted in the first blasphemy trial in the UK since 1922. In the late 1970s, he settled in the Principality of Andorra in the Pyrenees, where he has continued to produce poetry, travel diaries, essays, and, in the 1990s, a series of autobiographies.

Selected Works

- The Descent into the Cave and Other Poems*. London: Oxford University Press, 1957.
- Gaijin on the Ginza*. London: Peter Owen, 1991.
- I, of All People: An Autobiography of Youth*. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1988.
- A Poet Could Not But Be Gay*. London: Peter Owen, 1991.
- Me All Over: Memoirs of a Misfit*. London: Peter Owen, 1993.
- "Gay Boys" and "The Love of Older Men." In The Penguin Book of Homosexual Verse, edited by Stephen Coote. Harmondsworth, UK: Penguin, 1983.
- "The Love That Dares to Speak Its Name." Poem banned in the UK but available on the Internet at <http://petertatchell.net/religion/blasphemy.htm> among other websites.
- "The Teacher of American Business English." In The Penguin Book of Gay Short Stories, edited by David Leavitt and Mark Mitchell. London: Viking, 1994.

---

KLOSSOWSKI, PIERRE

---

1905–2002

French novelist, literary critic, and philosopher

In Roberte ce soir [Roberta Tonight] and La révocation de l'édit de Nantes [The Revocation of the Edict of Nantes], the author's interpretation of the rules of hospitality may at first seem confusing. Octave, an elderly professor of scholastics, presses the sexual favors of his wife, Roberte, onto their guests, in order that he may see into her mystery. She is an inspector of censorship, whose own fantasies include seducing her young nephew, Antoine.

Clearly we are not in Kansas. We are about to enter a labyrinth of mirrors, led by a lean, priestly figure in black. We scramble to keep up. He turns occasionally to give us a thin smile of amused encouragement. He winks.

This saturnine guide is Pierre Klossowski, the older brother of the painter Balthus, son of a minor Polish nobleman and an artist whose friendship with Rilke was such that she asked the poet to introduce young Pierre, just come to Paris, to André Gide. Gide generously took the twenty-year-old under his wing, finding him an apartment and paying his college tuition. Klossowski studied scholastic philosophy with the Dominicans, and attended the Collège de Sociologie, which was directed by his friend Georges Bataille. His novels, translations of the classics, and literary essays—particularly his study of de Sade—influenced the French postmodernists. Klossowski's own literary antecedents include the classic Greek, Roman, and French authors; he has affinities with Lautremont, Gide, Andre Breton, Celine, Queneau, and of course Bataille. The dark figure of de Sade looms over all.

Klossowski published Roberte ce soir and La révocation de l'édit de Nantes—two strange and singularly fascinating novels—in the 1950s. Existentialism reigned on the Left Bank, and his formal inventiveness and unsettling metaphysical comedy must have made him seem an odd duck indeed: an avant-gardist from the seventeenth century.

The time to enter Klossowski's mirrored labyrinth is now; he was wise to exploit the popular genre of erotic writing to make the approach to it as broadly appealing as possible. (Similarly, according to Robert Darnton, erotic novels were also employed as vehicles for political expression in eighteenth-century Paris.)

But pity the poor masturbator who comes to these pages for a peep and a wink—and finds Klossowski winking back at him! It is no use asserting that these novels are fully accessible to all. They are destined to delight most those readers who think it possible that perversity may be one of the paths to transcendence. Klossowski is an erotic writer in the sense that Italo Calvino talks about in The Uses Of Literature: “In the explicitly erotic writer we may . . . recognize one who uses the symbols of sex to give voice to something else, and this something else, of a series of definitions that tend to take shape in philosophical and religious terms, may in the last instance be redefined as another and ultimate Eros, fundamental, mythical, and unattainable.”

The ideal reader of Klossowski's subversive masterpiece will possess a capacious literary intelligence that includes a more than passing acquaintance with French history, philosophy, and art; medieval theology; familiarity with erotic literature, along with an ungrudging interest in the ideas of the Marquis de Sade; a sense of humor equal to Klossowski's sly, ironic wit; and—this is essential—an awareness of “the connection between metaphysics and the flesh,” in Yukio Mishima's phrase.

Fortunately for the less-than-ideal reader, Klossowski is a master of literary seduction. He is hospitable. He employs—and explodes—the conventions of the erotic and suspense genres as he draws us deeper into his labyrinth, utilizing a variety of narrative techniques, from eighteenth-century philosophical dialogues to Surrealist dream strategies. (Mishima has written perceptively about our seducer's methods: “The writers I pay most attention to in modern Western literature are Georges Bataille, Pierre Klossowski, and Witold Gombrowicz. . . [Their] works reveal an anti-psychological delineation, anti-realism, erotic intellectualism, straightforward symbolism, and a perception of the universe hidden behind all these.”)

In precise and elegant language, Klossowski leads us, through theological and philosophical arguments, political debates and aesthetic ruminations, elaborate jokes, nightmares, tableaux vivants, and diary entries, into sacrilege, war crimes, and murder. His tone is always mocking, often mysterious, and sometimes, especially in his seriocomic erotic scenes, grimly hilarious. He is the writer playing God whose characters seek God; his subject, in the largest sense, is creation.

He offers pleasures for his readers in surprising contexts. One of the greatest surprises he provides is typical of his jokes: the book we are reading has been officially banned by Roberte, the inspector of censorship; her hospitable husband, Octave, is none other than the book's author, Pierre Klossowski.

Roberte ce soir opens with Antoine's view of his uncle and aunt in “the house where I spent such a trying adolescence.” Small wonder: his uncle Octave “suffered from his conjugal happiness as though from an illness, firm in the belief he would be cured of it once he made it contagious,” and his aunt Roberte’s “beauty was of that somber sort which so often conceals pronounced tendencies to frivolity.” Frivolity?

Winning Antoine—adopted by them at age thirteen—is the first objective in the couple’s struggle for dominance. “My aunt treated me like a brother, and the professor had turned me into his favorite disciple; I served as the pretext for the practice of that hospitality which was practiced at my aunt’s expense.”

Octave has hung in his guest room, framed under glass, “The Rule of Hospitality,” a parody of medieval theology which is both funny (well, it’s a churchy wit) and an introduction to some of Klossowski’s ideas. In making love to Roberte, a proper guest grants actuality to her—brings her from potentiality to essence—and illuminates her mystery for Octave. Eros becomes a direct route to hypostasis; the metasexual leads to the metaphysical.

While their main contention is religious, Roberte and Octave also debate philosophical, political, and artistic issues. Each has an agenda. Roberte is a left-wing humanist, and Octave is a Catholic, an aesthete, a sensualist. The couple argues a lot about ideas which are of the utmost importance to their creator. In fact, Roberte and Octave come to life in our minds to the extent that we are willing to engage with the ideas that drive them. Then they step off the page. They act for themselves.

Klossowski, in the character of Octave, believes that he is creating Roberte, a creature made of her own elements, “which first took draft form in my mind.” But Roberte, in a diary entry, denies that “he is at the origin of my temperament.” She is capable of devilishness unaided by her husband’s machinations. And he can never know her, for one of Klossowski’s themes is the unknowability of others.

But it is possible, sometimes, to glimpse the spirit through the flesh. The temptations of Eros are the temptations of love that reveal the soul. Thought wears the garments of skin and bone.

In one dialogue (“The Denunciation,” Klossowski’s homage to Corneille), uncle and nephew debate Thomist ideas about the soul while illustrating them with humor and sex. One minute we are following an intricate argument made by Octave about the mystery of hypostatic union, and the next he is showing Antoine a film in which Roberte’s skirt catches fire and her rescuer molests her. (Antoine exclaims, “My stars, there in her panties is the outline of her bottom.”) Klossowski’s use of erotic elements is the more powerful for being deft, spare, and ironic—a glimpse of a bare thigh, a momentary encounter—often with dream figures made manifest by Roberte’s rambunctious libido.

Roberte the censor is ravished by spirits she refuses to give voice to. Either speak the unspeakable, as de Sade warned, or suffer the demons. In his essay on de Sade, Klossowski writes of the natural order of things, “Only motion is real; creatures are nothing but nature’s changing phases.” The temptations of Eros allow the transcendence of this natural order. And for the novelist, as Milan Kundera says, “I have the feeling that a scene of physical love generates an extremely sharp light that suddenly reveals the essence of characters. . . . [C]ertain erotic passages of Georges Bataille have made a lasting impression on me. Perhaps it is because they are not lyrical but philosophical.”

It has been suggested by symbolists that some labyrinths should be interpreted as diagrams of heaven. Perhaps that is how Klossowski would like us to see this splendidly intricate maze. When we come to the end of it, and bid him farewell, we emerge blinking into unfamiliar light, looking up at the heavens.

Biography

Born in Paris, August 9. Attended the Collège de Genève, the Lycée Janson de Sailly (Paris), then the École des sciences politiques, the Facultés catholiques (Lyon), and the Institut catholique (Paris). Wrote novels, philosophy, and literary criticism. His novel Le Baphomet won the Prix des Critiques.

MICHAEL PERKINS

Editions

La Révocation de l'Edit de Nantes [1959]. Les Editions de Minuit. Translated by Austryn Wainhouse. New York: Grove Press, 1969; Dalkey Archive Press, 2002. Roberte ce soir. Paris: Les Editions de Minuit, 1953.

Selected Works

La vocation suspendue.
La bain de Diane.
Un si funeste désir.
Le Baphomet.
Sade mon prochain.

---

KOKA PANDIT

---

Ninth-century Indian poet

Koka Shastra

The Koka Shastra, the “Scripture of the Koka,” also widely known as Rati Rahasya, “The Secrets of Rati” (spouse of the love god, Manmadha, in Hindu mythology), was composed in the 9th century by the poet Kokkoka to whet King Vainyadatta’s curiosity concerning the art of love. Kama Sutra, compiled by Vatsyayana, reigned as the classic treatise on love and sex for several years in India, but Koka Pandit saw the need to address the theme again, as India’s moral values had changed significantly since the composition of Kama Sutra. The Ananga Ranga of Kalyana Malla, composed in the 15th century, is another subtle and detailed treatise that followed the tradition set by Vatsyayana and Koka Pandit, and served as a guide on love and sexual behavior for men and women of subsequent generations. While acknowledging that ultimate wisdom on this topic has been achieved by Vatsyayana in Kama Sutra, Koka Pandit justifies the significance of his work by addressing the systems of Nandikesvara and Gonikaputra, who had made significant contributions to identifying the basic categories of women and their anatomical features, sexual preferences, and personality traits, determined by four individual physical types (Padmini, a “lotus woman”; Sankhini, a “conch shell woman”; hasthini, an “elephant woman”; and citrini, a “varied and fancy woman”).

Koka Shastra is a manual that equips a man with the knowledge and skill to master the arts and technique of love and empowers him with the essential knowledge about the various habits, preferences, customs, and manners of women hailing from various regions within India, the different bodily types, gestures, positions, and techniques appropriate to specific occasions and types of women, and the suitable times for coition. Besides invoking the work of Nandikesvara and Gonikaputra, Koka Pandit’s treatise widens the scope of the subject to include later traditions, the astrological systems of physical types and lunar calendars for courtships and the influence of Tantrism reflected in spells, japas (chants), and far-fetched recipes like those which require both wings of a bee which has rested on a petal blown from a funeral wreath. While Kama Sutra established the code of conduct for lovers of both sexes, Koka Shastra is written more for the husband, thus establishing the transition from a permissive, “free” approach to sex in ancient India to a rigid code of conduct and sex being circumscribed within marriage. The book begins with an invocation to the muse, establishes the treatise in the context of existing works of erotic literature, and defines the significance of the work in light of the changing moral customs and beliefs. Chapter 2, “Chandrakala” (about the lunar calendar), identifies the specific body parts of the woman that are touched by the arrows of the love god (Manmadha) during the light and dark halves of the month and how the suitor must gradually proceed with the woman in the art of lovemaking. In chapter 3, Koka Pandit delineates the physical types of men and women determined by their anatomical characteristics, which in turn determine ways by which the women can be satisfied. A woman may be characterized as a gazelle (mrgi), a mare (vadava), or an elephant (hasthini) and a man as a hare (sasa), a bullock (vrsa), or a stallion (asva). Chapter 4 discusses women by their ages, temperaments, and dispositions. Chapter 5 deals with specific social customs and practices of women relating to love and sex based on their locales, and the appropriate ways to solicit their attention. Chapter 6 describes the various methods of foreplay, or the “outer” modes of lovemaking (beginning with embraces), and chapter 7 discusses the preparation, positions, conduct, and methods of sexual intercourse. Chapter 9 deals with coition and various coital postures, chapter 10 with love cries and blows, and chapter 11 with the wooing of a bride, delineating the principles of choosing a bride and the successful ways to court her and win her love and affection completely. While chapter 12 outlines the duties of a wife, chapter 13 deals with relations concerning women other than one's wife.

Biography

It is believed that Koka Pandit hailed from a Kashmiri Brahmin family and was the protégé of King Vainyadatta, who lived from 830 to 960 CE.

KOKILA RAVI

Edition

Kokkoka. The Koka Shastra; being the Ratirahasya of Kokkoka and other Medieval Indian Writings on Love. Translated and with an introduction by Alex Comfort. Preface by W.G. Archer. New York: Stein and Day, 1965.

Further Reading

The four known untranslated commentaries on Rati Rahasya are by Kancinatha, Avantya Ramacandra, Kavi Prabhu, and Srngarasabandha Pradhipika.

---

KUPRIN, ALEXANDER

---

1870–1938

Russian novelist and short story writer

Alexander Ivanovich Kuprin's Iama [The Pit] is the longest and most notorious of prerevolutionary Russia's literary works devoted to the problem of prostitution. It is a virtual catalogue of all the motifs and clichés associated with the topic in the previous half-century, but it also goes many steps further than its predecessors. If prostitutes had previously been either supporting characters in a larger story devoted to other issues and themes (Fyodor Dostoevsky's Notes from Underground [1864], Nikolai Chernyshevsky's What Is to Be Done? [1863]), the subjects of shorter works (Vsevolod Garshin's "An Occurrence" [1875], "Nadezhda Nikolaevna" [1885]), or the embodiment of the male protagonist's own moral dilemma (Lev Tolstoy's Resurrection [1899]), The Pit allows the prostitutes themselves to share center stage with the men: in at least a few of the large, extended chunks that compose the novel, these women are the heroines of their own stories.

Part of the novel's immense popular appeal was that it purported to give an unvarnished account of daily life in a brothel. Most of Part 1 of the novel verges more on documentary than on fiction, with the male and female characters serving largely as vehicles for the author's almost journalistic descriptions of the prostitute's world. As in Chekhov's 1888 short story, "A Nervous Breakdown," the reader follows a group of young men on an expedition to the brothels in a notorious red-light district. Like Chekhov's young men, the protagonists of The Pit represent a carefully selected cross section of Russian professional and intellectual life: Yarchenko the classicist, Ramzes the lawyer, Sobashnikov and Likhonin the students, and Platonov the reporter. As they talk each other into visiting the brothel, they, with no small amount of irony, discuss their project as if it were a scientific expedition: prostitution is a crucial social problem that must be investigated by members of the intelligentsia. And indeed, their discussions of prostitution go into a greater detail and greater depth than any previous representations of sex-for-hire trades in Russian fiction: from the relationship between the prostitutes and the madam to the relationships among the prostitutes themselves, even making a reference to the frequency with which these women's disgust for their male clients pushes them toward lesbianism. Yet this scientific veneer can easily be seen as an exercise in self-justification, not only for the characters, but by extension for the author and even the readers: the journey to the brothel is not the result of anything so vulgar as mere sexual desire, while the literary depiction of the topic is therefore scientific rather than pornographic.

These men are clearly far more informed than any of their literary predecessors. But it is precisely their level of knowledge that only increases the irony of their encounter with the prostitutes and calls into question the value of their discussions. Not only does Kuprin have the benefit of his familiarity with the earlier Russian literature on the question, but so do his male characters: their visit to the brothel is inevitably colored by the fact that they have read the same books on the subject as Kuprin's readers. Thus they tend to approach the subject as an abstract, philosophic, and even aesthetic phenomenon. One of the men even points out that to date, Russian literature's engagement with the problem has been woefully inadequate, since the best it could produce was Sonya Marmeladova, the saintly prostitute who saves the hero's soul in Dostoevsky's Crime and Punishment (1866). As the same man argues, the prostitute has heretofore remained unknown and unknowable to the Russian intellectual, along with that other eternally mysterious figure, the Russian peasant (also the frequent subject of semidocumentary exposés throughout the nineteenth century). And even as they go to the brothel, they lament the impossibility of ever actually discovering the "truth" about the prostitutes: the women are used to being asked how they got to their sorry state and are used to providing standard-issue lies as a response. Moreover, there is even an acknowledgment on one of the men's parts that they have no right to expect any more: why should the women be expected to tell the men anything?

Once the men become involved with the prostitutes, their self-consciousness does them little good, and despite themselves they begin to behave according to the standard literary script. Inevitably, one of the men tries to "rescue" a young woman from the brothel, and soon the rest join in what becomes a veritable orgy of liberal interventionism. No cliché is left untouched: there is even talk of buying poor Lyubka a sewing machine, which was the standard instrument for the prostitute's by-her-bootstraps redemption since Chernyshevsky's What Is to Be Done?

Instead, the uniqueness of The Pit lies in the careful attention paid to the women themselves, to the world of the brothel. In scenes reminiscent of Defoe's Moll Flanders, Kuprin almost overwhelms the reader with a wealth of detail about the women's expenses, income, and rules of conduct. More gripping are his plots that center on the women themselves. Kuprin tells the story of Zhenka, a prostitute who, when she realizes she has syphilis, decides to take revenge on the entire male sex by infecting as many clients as she can before dying. Here as elsewhere, Kuprin walks a fine line between the standard sentimentalization of the prostitute as victim and the male fantasy of the vengeful, demonic female. Ultimately, Zhenka resolves her situation in a way far more typical of Russian heroines: she kills herself, and her death is mourned publicly by all the prostitutes, as, in a rare demonstration of solidarity, her body is accompanied to the cemetery by women from all the brothels in the district. But nothing changes for the better in the women's lives: the entire district is closed as a result of a virtual pogrom against prostitutes on the part of a group of angry sailors who complain that they were overcharged, forcing the prostitutes to live and work on the streets.

The novel's rather abrupt ending can be attributed to the vagaries of serial publication: six years passed between the publication of the first and last parts, and Kuprin may well have finished the book hastily after another author published his own conclusion to the story. Yet despite the novel's unevenness, it has had a lasting appeal among Russian readers. Still in print during Soviet times because of Kuprin's status as a canonical author, it was one of the few "erotic" texts readily available in the USSR.

Biography

Born August 26 in Narovchat, Penza oblast. Studied at the Second Moscow Military High School (Cadet Corps) from 1880 to 1888, followed by the Alexander Military Academy from 1888 to 1890. Served in the army from 1890 through 1894, whereupon he began to write for various newspapers in Kiev. In the 1890s he made a name for himself as an author who focused on Russia's social problems, most notably in Poedinok [The Duel] (1905) and Iama (1908–1915). After the 1917 Revolution, he emigrated to France, where he continued to write, although with far less critical and commercial success. He returned to the Soviet Union in 1937 and died of cancer the following year.

ELIOT BORENSTEIN

Selected Works

Sobranie sochinenii. 9 vols. Moscow, 1970–1973.
The Pit: A Novel in Three Parts. Translated by Bernard Guilbert Guerny. Westport, CT: Hyperion Press, 1977.

Further Reading

Borenstein, Eliot. Men Without Women: Masculinity and Revolution in Russian Fiction, 1917–1929. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2000.

Luker, Nicholas J.L. Alexander Kuprin. Boston: Twayne
 Publishers, 1978.

Matich, Olga. “A Typology of Fallen Women in Nineteenth Century Russian Literature.” American Contributions to the Ninth International Congress of Slavists. Vol. 2, 325–43. Columbus, OH: Slavic Press, 1983.

Siegel, George. “The Fallen Woman in Nineteenth Century Literature.” Harvard Slavic Studies 5 (1970):
 81–108.

---

KUZMIN, MIKHAIL

---

1872–1936

Russian poet, prose writer, playwright, and critic

Primary Work: *Wings

A musician turned poet and prose writer, Mikhail Alekseevich Kuzmin created a sensation with the publication of Kryl'ia [Wings], a novella that dealt openly with the subject of same-sex desire and that helped earn Kuzmin the epithet “the Russian Oscar Wilde.” Wings first appeared in the journal Vesy [Scales] in 1906 and was published in book form in 1907. It went through several editions, including a post-revolutionary one published in Berlin in 1923. Its frank treatment of homosexuality made a Soviet edition unthinkable, and it was not republished in Russia in book form until 1994. Initial reception of Wings was varied. It was criticized by a number of critics and writers as pornographic but was praised by others, although positive reviews tended to ignore or play down the central theme of homosexuality.

The novella is divided into three parts, and its structure combines elements of the Bildungsroman, or novel of self-education, and the philosophical novel in the tradition of Voltaire’s Candide (Bogomolov, 21). Against the backdrop of Vania Smurov’s coming of age, Kuzmin offers philosophical discussions on the nature of love and the relationship of the body and the spirit. The novella opens with Vania, a recently orphaned adolescent, being sent to live with the Kazanskii family in St. Petersburg. There he meets the elegant and charismatic Larion Dmitrievich Stroop, who is part Russian and part English, suggesting a vague association with Oscar Wilde and aestheticism. It soon becomes clear that Stroop is homosexual. Wings traces Vania’s gradual acceptance of Stroop as his male “guide”—a recurring theme in Kuzmin’s work—and of his own homosexual desires.

Vania’s journey of self-discovery is predicted early in the novella by Stroop when he tells the adolescent that he has it in him “to become a completely transformed being” (Granoien and Green, 14). His personal transformation mirrors that of Russian society in the tumultuous first years of the twentieth century, when, in the words of Mr. Kazanskii, “everything is awakening” (6). The loosening of censorship restrictions made possible relatively frank representations of sexuality and eroticism, creating the impression that Russia—like Vania—was experiencing a sexual awakening.

While Vania is initially fascinated by Stroop, he is horrified—and perhaps jealous—when he discovers that Stroop is having an affair with Fedor, a bathhouse attendant who has been hired by Stroop as his servant. This relationship, founded on Stroop’s physical lust and Fedor’s desire for money, is associated with death and decay. In fact, Vania first encounters Fedor after reading a saint's life about a hermit who was shown a vision of rotting corpses to cure him of his lustful thoughts. Later, Ida Holberg, a young woman infatuated with Stroop, discovers the relationship between Stroop and his manservant and kills herself in Stroop's home.

Punctuating this rather sordid melodrama are discussions of same-sex desire among the ancient Greeks and Romans. A key figure in Vania's development is his instructor of Greek, Daniil Ivanovich, who is homosexual and serves as a confidante and adviser to Vania. Both Stroop and Daniil Ivanovich are lovers of Greek culture, and for them homosexuality in the ancient world—symbolized by the love between Antinous and the Roman emperor Hadrian—represents an ideal. For Stroop, ancient Greece was a time “when men saw that beauty and love in all their forms are of the gods, and they became free and brave, and they grew wings” (22). Later, in the company of his closest friends, Stroop explains to Vania: “We are Hellenes” (32).

In part 2, Kuzmin introduces another philosophical perspective on sexual desire when Vania goes on vacation with his friend Sasha. Sasha's family are Old Believers, members of a religious sect that broke from the Russian Orthodox Church in the seventeenth century over proposed revisions to Church books and practices. Like the ancient Greeks—and the authors of the gnostic gospels, who so influenced Kuzmin—the Old Believers in Wings refuse a simplistic morality based on the dichotomy of natural/unnatural. “Sin,” one Old Believer explains, “doesn't lie in the act itself, but in its relation to other things,” a paraphrase of a verse from St. Paul's Letter to the Romans (14:14). Sasha will later tell Vania that “a man ought to be like a river or a mirror—whatever is reflected in him he should make part of himself.”

While, in part 1, Kuzmin associates death with lust (“possessing without loving”), in part 2 he associates death with asceticism (“loving without possessing”). On vacation, Vania witnesses the recovery of the body of a boy his own age—sixteen—who lost his life while crossing the Volga River. He had run away from home to join a monastery (an idea that had attracted Kuzmin himself for many years). Vania reacts with horror to the slimy corpse.

Acknowledging both his own physical beauty and its perishability, he asks, “Who will save me?”. He then makes clear that the person to save him is not a woman, when he cruelly rejects the advances of Sasha's widowed aunt.

In part 3, Vania finds himself in Italy with Daniil Ivanovich. There, he is introduced to a third important philosophical influence: Italian Catholic culture, which, for Kuzmin, also represents the integration of the sensual and the spiritual. “Asceticism is,” according to Ugo, an Italian acquaintance, “a highly unnatural phenomenon.” Crossing paths with Stroop in Italy, Vania believes that he offers him the possibility of a fuller life and decides to accompany him on his travels, continuing the theme of life as a journey. When Vania accepts Stroop's invitation, he throws open his apartment window onto a street that is bathed in sunlight.

In contrast to typical descriptions of homosexuals as decadent and unnatural—characterized by Vasilii Rozanov as “People of the Moonlight” (1911)—Kuzmin repeatedly associates his homosexual characters with sunlight and the natural world. “Somewhere,” Stroop declares to his homosexual friends, “lies our ancient kingdom, full of sunlight and freedom, of beautiful and courageous people.” Wings is the story of one orphan's journey to that symbolic home.

Biography

Born in Saratov, Russia, Kuzmin spent most of his life in St. Petersburg, where he studied music composition with Nikolai Rimsky-Korsakov. His first publications appeared in 1905 in Zelenyi sbornik [Green Miscellany], but Kuzmin established his literary reputation in 1906 with the publication of a cycle of poems, Aleksandriiskie pesni [Alexandrian Songs], and a novella, Kryl'ia [Wings], in the journal Vesy [Scales]. Both works invoke the theme of homosexual love.

Kuzmin published poems, prose works, plays, and criticism. He also worked as a translator and a musician, setting many of his own lyric poems to music. Kuzmin remained in the Soviet Union after the Bolshevik Revolution but found it increasingly difficult to publish his works. He died of a chronic illness.

BRIAN JAMES BAER

Editions

- Kryl'ia*. Moscow: Skorpion, 1907; Berlin: Petropolis, 1923.
 Granoien, Neil, and Michael Green, ed., trans. "Wings." In Wings: Prose and Poetry. Ann Arbor, MI: Ardis, 1972; in Selected Prose and Poetry, edited and translated by Michael Green, Ann Arbor, MI: Ardis, 1980.

Selected Works*Fiction

- Prikliucheniia Eme Lebefa*. 1907.
Pervaia kniga rasskazov. 1910; selected stories as "Aunt Sonya's Sofa," "From the Letters of the Maiden Clara Valmont to Rosalie Tutelmaier," "The Shade of Phyllis," and "Florus the Bandit" in Green, 1980.
Vtoraia kniga rasskazov. 1910.
Tret'ia kniga rasskazov. 1910, selected story as "The Story of Xanthos" in Green, 1980.
Pokoinitsta v dome. Skazki. 1914.
Zelenyi solovei. 1915.
Voennye rasskazy. 1915.
Plavaiushchie-puteshestvuiushchie. 1915.
Antrakt v ovrage. 1916.
Babushkina shkatulka. Rasskazy. 1918.
Devstvennyi Viktor i drugie rasskazy. 1918; selected stories as "Virginal Viktor" and "The Education of Nisa" in Green, 1980.
Chudesnaia zhizn' Iosifa Bal'zamo, grafa Kaliostro. 1919.

Poetry

- Seti: Pervaia kniga stikhov*. 1908; selections as "Alexandrian Songs" in Green, 1980.
Kuranty liubvi. Slova i muzyka. 1910.
Osennie ozera. Vtoraia kniga stikhov. 1912.

- Glinianye golubki. Tret'ia kniga stikhov*. 1914.
Vozhatyi. Stikhi. 1918.
Dvum. 1918.
Zanaveshennye kartinki. 1920.
Ekho: Stikhi. 1921.
Nezdeshnie vechera. Stikhi. 1914–1920. 1921.
Paraboly. Stikhotvoreniia 1921–22. 1923.
Novyi Gul'. 1924.
Forel' razbivaet led. 1929, as "The Trout Breaks the Ice" in Green, 1980.

Drama

- Venetsianskie bezumtsy. Komediia*. 1915; as "The Venetian Madcaps. A Comedy" in Green, 1980.

Further Reading

- Bogomolov, Nikolay. Mikhail Kuzmin: Stat'i i materialy. Moscow: 1995; "Mikhail Kuzmin i ego ranniia proza," in Mikhail Kuzmin. Plavaiushchie Puteshestvuiushchie. Romany, povesti, rasskaz, edited by N.A. Bogomolov, 7–40. Moscow: Sovpadenie, 2000.
 Engelstein, Laura. The Keys to Happiness: Sex and the Search for Modernity in Fin-de-Siecle Russia. Ithaca and London: Cornell University Press, 1992.
 Gillis, Donald S. "The Platonic Theme in Kuzmin's Wings." Slavic and East European Journal 22 (1978): 336–47.
 Granoien, Neil. "'Wings' and the 'World of Art.'" Russian Literature Triquarterly 11 (1975): 393–405.
 Malmsted, John, and Nikolay Bogomolov. Mikhail Kuzmin: A Life in Art. Cambridge and London: Harvard University Press, 1999.
 Pevak, E.A. "Proza i esseistika M.A. Kuzmina." In Mikhail Kuzmin. Proza i esseistika: V 3-kh t. T. 1. Proza 1906–1912gg., edited by E.G. Domogatskoi and E.A. Pevak, 5–68. Moscow: Agraf, 1999.

---

L. ERECTUS MENTULUS (LUPTON ALLEMONG WILKINSON)

---

c. 1900–1993
British-American poet, journalist, and publicist

The Identity of L. Erectus Mentulus

In 1935, Lupton Allemong Wilkinson began writing erotica on commission for Roy Mellisandre Johnson, a jaded Ardmore, Oklahoma oil millionaire, by creating “L[ongus]. Erectus Mentulus, Ph.D.” (Long Erect Member), the narrator and protagonist of the stories collectively known as the “Oxford Professor” series, in which a lascivious academic dispenses outrageous sexual advice. Gershon Legman says that Wilkinson also wrote poems and parodies using the pseudonyms J. Sumner Radclyffe and Seeley Wilcox (“Erotic Songs,” pp. 500–501), but no one has corroborated those claims. In 1938, Wilkinson gathered his Mentulus stories, ran off mimeographed copies, solicited erotic photographs from friends, bound photos and pages into a volume he called An Oxford Thesis on Love, and persuaded a match factory to manufacture slip cases for an edition of about a hundred (Scheiner, II, 140–141). These copies circulated until Grove Press published the manuscript in 1971.

An Oxford Thesis on Love

Wilkinson’s An Oxford Thesis on Love, set in a booth in Dave’s Soft-Drink Emporium in an unidentified small American town, opens abruptly. Mentulus (here informally called “Lee”) holds forth to a barber, a salesman, and a druggist, a naive trio who have gathered to hear ribald adventures that celebrate but also mock sexual diversity. On the one hand, Mentulus insists that every woman reacts differently to sexual stimulation; that is the book’s “thesis,” illustrated by eight yarns named after the professor’s conquests around the world. Even so, he says, universal “scientific” principles govern all forms of intercourse, and in revealing these An Oxford Thesis on Love panders to male fantasy that seduction is a rational enterprise. On the other hand, the book’s appeal is clearly anti-intellectual. The professor decries outlandish sexual myths only to replace them with academic pretense; the humor derives from the credulity with which his absurd “research” is accepted. In this regard the stories parody the ponderous quasi-anthropological studies that constituted a species of erotica in the early twentieth century. Sometimes known as “the National Geographic syndrome” after the double standard manifest in that staid’s magazine’s fondness for photographing bare-breasted tribeswomen, the approach justified prurience in the guise of ethnographic scholarship on the sexual habits of “primitive” peoples.

L. ERECTUS MENTULUS (LUPTON ALLEMONG WILKINSON)

Mentulus cites silly theories such as “Professor Vollmer’s,” for example, to the effect that “the diameter of the distended vagina is a quadratic function of the length of the mouth and the cube root of the volume of one buttock” (1971, p. 42). Mentulus claims to have invented a “tumescencegraph” to calibrate an erection (a send up of the real penile plethysmograph invented by Karl Freund); classifies women according to four breast types; and pontificates on the alleged causes of fetishes. The stories unfold as responses to questions from the three listeners, each of whom has met resistance from a woman. To the druggist, thwarted by a shopgirl who permits only fondling, Mentulus observes that the shape of her breasts indicates a tendency toward the nymphomania that she fears. He advises tearing a hole in her clothing rather than trying to remove it, which allows her too much time to think. For the professor, guile is key: since all women secretly desire intercourse, the seducer must analyze his prey, find her secret stimulus, and encourage the illusion that she is in control. When deception fails, however, force may be necessary, though here the professor’s listeners balk (as may modern readers), when he suggests that violence can unleash a lesbian’s latent heterosexuality. “‘You advise me to beat and rape the girl?’ asked the salesman dubiously. ‘If she is the type you have described,’ said the professor” (1971, p. 96), observing preposterously in “Liza the Lesbian” that some kinds of lesbianism result from a schoolteacher’s compelling a left-handed girl to use her right hand.

Most of the episodes graphically describe intercourse once inhibitions have disappeared, when the “natural” inclinations of the female make her more aggressive than the male.

“Mobile Miriam” smoothly adjusts her motion to her lover’s, so that they reach orgasms symphonically, while the screaming gyrations of “Jane of the Bouncing Bottom” trigger geysers of sperm. Hints of a serious gender divide linger, however. The virtuoso muscular control of “Bella of the Clutching Clitoris” reinforces male fears of dominant women, and “Rachel of the Spiralling Venus” sports a sinister vagina dentata borrowed from classic folklore. The gymnastics of “The Tumbling Twins,” a pair of acrobats performing in Vienna, are less interesting than the telepathic bond between them, which enables Lorine to feel the professor’s penis as it penetrates Lorette. The sisters also figure in “The Better Hole,” in which the professor finds that he enjoys anal intercourse with Lorette but not with Lorine, an anomaly he claims has been documented by the fictitious Professor Carr-Saunders. But eventually the professor’s assurance gives way to a bewilderment that humor can not mask. Having roughly bedded a reluctant woman, an event he has depicted in Hemingwayesque terms (“Flora the Fridge”), he is astonished when she complains. “The world had been cleft in two and put together again, and this unbelievable wench, lying there with my juice still wet on her cunt hair, looked at me and said, ‘It hurt’” (1971, p. 120).

A Further Oxford Thesis on Love and A Later Oxford Thesis on Love

According to Legman, Wilkinson quickly tired of the Oxford stories and asked Legman and others in the “Organization,” the network of writers furnishing erotica for Johnson, to take over (“Introduction,” Private Case, pp. 52ff). The “Organization” included Robert Sewall, Caresse Crosby, Robert Bragg, Anaïs Nin, Clement Wood, Robert De Niro, Sr., Gene Fowler, Virginia Admiral, Robert Duncan, and Jack Hanley, among others. By now, the authors-for-hire had learned to keep copies of the stories they sold to Johnson. Individual stories (e.g., “Pussy Bumping”), bound as pamphlets under variant titles, could be sold or rented from drugstores and bookstores to Depression audiences eager for them (Gertzman, pp. 93–101). Legman apparently assembled the mimeographed volumes called A Further Oxford Thesis on Love (1938) and A Later Oxford Thesis on Love (1939) from stories anonymously written by himself and members of the Organization. (Copies of each of these volumes are now in the Kinsey Institute.) The individual stories follow Wilkinson's format and "thesis"; in each the professor recalls an interlude in which a woman of singular prowess demonstrates a new position or practice.

The Passionate Pedant

Legman himself wrote the four tales of The Passionate Pedant (1939). A genuine scholar of sexual customs, Legman here somewhat wearily parodies his own knowledge of cultural variations. The stories also occasionally serve as platforms for Legman to criticize Western imperialism, which leads "Dave," the owner of the Soft-Drink Emporium, who by now resembles a bootlegger, to caution the Professor against "communist talk." Legman's flagging interest is evident in the carelessness with which he renames the protagonist "Professor Martin," and the impatience with which he concludes the tales. Asked if Japanese vaginas are slanted, Martin corrects the falsehood by citing a fabricated The Alleged Obliquity of the Sino-Japanese Cunt, then by recounting in "Ochre Osukina" his affair with a geisha whose labia are quite conventional. Borrowing from Madame Butterfly, the professor seems perversely proud that Osukina becomes so dependent on his erotic skill that she commits suicide when he leaves Japan. The narrator also kills off the heroine of "Coffee-Colored Cobouti." Cobouti is a Malaysian princess reserved for a high priest, whose annual sacred intercourse with her ensures the land's fertility. Visiting Sumatra to study Australasian languages, Martin clandestinely meets her in the ruins of a temple deep in the jungle, where Cobouti introduces him to toe-sucking as foreplay to their intercourse. The Dutch later execute her for leading a revolution. In "Murky Mwamba," set in Mozambique, Martin decries racism even as he endorses the myth of large black penises. He also argues for the superiority of oral sex, which does not preclude his engaging in rough anal sex with his "dusky" lover. In the final story, "Multimethodical Marise," the Professor enjoys a Hungarian on the Vienna-Bucharest Express. Marise encourages him to ejaculate between her breasts, in the crook of her elbow, and in her armpits, and finally treats him to anilingus. His imagination seemingly depleted, the professor then pleads an engagement with a young lady to avoid telling more tales.

The Oxford Professor

Legman attributed the fourth volume in the series, called The Oxford Professor, entirely to Robert Sewall (Horn Book, p. 36), but may have written part of it himself (see Scheiner, Compendium, item 1322). The mimeographed volume appeared around 1948, but the stories were probably written earlier. Stylistically superior to earlier installments, the six stories here are "The Choir Loft," "Alpine Annie," "Tenacious Theresa," "Dipsomaniacal Daisy," "Jacinthe," and "Leslie." Dave now serves wine in the soft-drink parlor, while the druggist, salesman, and barber have been given individual names. The jumble of comic folklore and spurious "authorities," however, remains central. Typical is "Jacinthe," told to rebut the druggist's observation that intercourse underwater is impossible. The story takes place in Paris, where Mentulus has been studying the theories of "Yatumani Norashashu Hirosata," whose lecture before the "Catalonian Society for the Classification, Glorification and Continuation of Cunt" asserted that masculine ears, properly trained, can detect from the timbre of a woman's voice the exact degree of her readiness for sex. By the time Mentulus meets Jacinthe, a Javanese living near the Sorbonne, he can decipher her signals of passion, although her eagerness, as he describes it, would be hard to miss. Jacinthe's expertise includes special ointments that seal orifices tightly enough for sex in a pool, an experience the professor calls unique. Thus edified, the listeners trot out another canard, so that the professor can begin another story: "'You know, Joe [the barber],' the salesman said seriously, 'the Eskimo women have their cunts under their left armpits'" (1968, p. 199).

Torrid Tales

The series guttered out with Torrid Tales (c. 1950), two inferior tales written by an unknown writer aiming at a literary style. In the first, "South of the Border," "Professor Martin" relays a memoir by Jan Sumner, a correspondent for The New York Evening Times expelled from Mexico for articles critical of President Cardenas.

L. ERECTUS MENTULUS (LUPTON ALLEMONG WILKINSON)

Speaking in first person, Jan recalls a Mexico City menage a trois involving herself, a prostitute called Juana, and an American prize-fighter named Johnny Blair. When their sexual excess threatens to ruin Johnny Blair as a boxer, Jan resolves to send Juana and Johnny away, but finds to her chagrin, that they have decamped before she can make her grand gesture. The second story, "The Court of Kings," is curiously romantic, and, measured against the graphic standards of the series, sexually reticent. Here the barber dreams of traveling with the professor to exotic places as he listens to the tale of yet another princess, an Indian named Ahdali, who couples with Martin in yet another ruined temple. The tale ends on a note that makes explicit the appeal of the Oxford Professor series: "'Gosh,' said the barber, 'I can't get over it. A real princess!'" (Oxford Professor Returns, p. 182).

Biography

Lupton Wilkinson was probably born in England about 1902. In the United States, after publishing two volumes of poetry (Interludes, 1925, and Blood and Silver, 1928), he wrote articles, poems, and short stories for the North American Review and the Saturday Evening Post, and sensational fiction (e.g., "Blonde Alibi," 1931) for pulp magazines such as Thrilling Detective and Detective Story Magazine. During the early 1930s, he worked as a publicist for the Motion Picture Producers and Distributors Association, often acting as an emissary of Will Hays; Wilkinson's association with the Hays Office lent substance to the legend that censors themselves secretly produce erotica. During the 1940s Wilkinson promoted the careers of Clark Gable, Katherine Hepburn, and Alfred Hitchcock for Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios. He died in St. Louis on June 4, 1993.

JOSEPH SLADE III

Selected Works

A Further Oxford Thesis on Love. Wherein Longus Erectus Mentulus, Ph.D., late fellow of Oxford College, proposes numerous incidents in his experience tending to demonstrate the proposition that in time of stress the unregenerate soul seeks not its own salvation but rather its propagation, the whole cast in the form of amusing but instructive reminiscences and appended by factual sidelights and critical observations on various *subjects but more especially on the dominant factor of their [sic] eternal cunt. Done by the hand of the author into a manuscript at Onancock, Virginia [sic] [New York] 1939; rpt. The Further Adventures of the Oxford Professor: A Continuation of the Famed Professor's Exploits on Beds Around the World, by L. Erectus Mentulus. Atlanta: Pendulum Books, 1968. [By Gershon Legman? et al.].*

A Later Oxford Thesis on Love. Wherein the author, L. Erectus Mentulus, proves that the waging of the pubic war is a distinct and separate art form in which the participants, through the manner whereby they conduct themselves on its battlefields, may express themselves with more exactness than in any other; this theorem established, examined and restated in the form of narrative and the whole being an inspirational document on the sexual forms as well as a study. Done by the hand of the author into a manuscript at Sotchoppy, Florida, [New York] 1938. [By Gershon Legman et al.].

*The Oxford Professor. In which L. Erectus Mentulus, Ph.D., late of Oxford College, is taken further in the narration of his adventures and misadventures, erotic, alcoholic, and otherwise; not to mention a choice accompaniment of drolleries, notes and excursions of one sort or another, metaphysical & also miscellaneously edifying and entertaining. Done by the Hand of the Author Into a Manuscript at Natchitoches, Louisiana [New York, Shomer, c1948]; The Oxford Professor, by L. Erectus Mentulus, Ph.D., Atlanta: Pendulum Books, 1968; The Professor's Tale, Industry, CA: Collectors Publications, 1968. [By Robert Sewall and (possibly) Gershon Legman.].*

*An Oxford Thesis on Love. In which L. Erectus Mentulus, Ph.D., late fellow of Oxford College, draws from his various experiences for the instruction, entertainment and greater zest of his colleagues, friends and admirers. One Hundred [mimeographed] Copies Done Into A Book By The Hand Of The Author, Taos New Mexico [New York], May 1938; An Oxford Thesis on Love, In which L. Erectus Mentulus, Ph. D., late fellow of Oxford College, draws from his various experiences for the instruction, entertainment and greater zest of his colleagues, friends and admirers. New York: Grove Press, 1971. [By Lupton A. Wilkinson.].*

*The Passionate Pedant: Being A New Oxford Thesis on Love, wherein L. Erectus Mentulus, late of Oxford, establishes incontrovertibly that the sexual enjoyment of women of divers races is evocative of distinctly different types and degrees of pleasure, through narratives of his own experience, with particular emphasis upon psychophysiological adumbrations et cetera, for the entertainment as well as the enlightenment of his friends. In Cumms diversis-voluptates diversae. Done By The Hand of The Author Into A Manuscript At Oshkosh, Wisconsin [New York] September 1939. [By Gershon Legman.] Rpt. with Torrid Tales as The Oxford Professor Returns, New York: Grove Press/Venus Library, 1971.*

Pussy Bumping, by L. Erectus Mentulus, n. p.: Privately printed, c. 1940. [Attributed to Robert Sewall (Kinsey Institute).].

Torrid Tales, or, South of the Border, [New York]: Varoni Publications [Miller Brothers?], 1950? (two mimeographed versions). [Author unknown.] Rpt. with The Passionate Pedant in The Oxford Professor Returns. New York: Grove Press/Venus Library, 1971.

Attributed to Wilkinson

“Radclyffe, Sumner J.” trans. The Imitation of Sappho, by “Ibykos de Rhodi.” “Bruxelles: Privately Printed” [New York: Gotham Book Mart], c. 1930.

“Wilcox, Seeley.” Les Oraisons et Chansons de Marianne de Bon Coeur (and) La Vierge Montagne, manuscript with erotic illustrations signed “José del Castillo.” New York, c. 1935.

Unpublished erotic parodies and verse in English with French titles, mimeograph. New York: P. Shostac, 1935.

Further Reading

Cook, Michael L., and Stephen T. Miller, comps. Mystery, Detective, and Espionage Fiction: A Checklist of

Fiction in U.S. Pulp Magazines, 1915–1974. 2 vols. New York: Garland Publishing, 1988.

Gertzman, Jay A. Bookleggers and Smuthounds: The Trade in Erotica 1920–1940. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.

Legman, Gershon. “Erotic Folksongs and Ballads: An International Bibliography,” Journal of American Folklore, 103 (October/December 1990): 417–501.

———. The Horn Book: Studies in Erotic Folklore and Bibliography. New York: University Books, 1964.

———. “Introduction,” The Private Case: An Annotated Bibliography of the Erotica Collection in the British (Museum) Library, by Patrick J. Kearney. London: Landesman, 1981.

Scheiner, Clifford J. Compendium: Being a List of All the Books (Erotica, Curiosa, & Sexology) Listed in Our Catalogs 1–6 (1978–1988). Brooklyn, NY: C.J. Scheiner, Books, 1989.

———. Encyclopedia of Erotic Literature. 2 vols. New York: Barricade Publishing, 1996.

Walsh, Frank. Sin and Censorship: The Catholic Church and the Motion Picture Industry. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1996.

---

LA FONTAINE, JEAN DE

---

1621–1695
French poet

Contes et nouvelles

As something like the Woody Allen of the seventeenth century, La Fontaine rarely wrote anything that was not clearly and visibly an adaptation of an earlier source. His ribald Contes are based mainly on such Renaissance writers as Ariosto, the Cent nouvelles, the Heptaméron, and, most especially, Boccaccio.

Adapting such conventional rowdy stories posed special problems in the classicist 1660s–1670s, when bienséance was an essential rule of the classicist aesthetic. In a preface La Fontaine reacts defensively to possible suggestions that his stories were licentious or that they were hard on women. He denies any intention of attacking good morals, and he argues that true bienséance just means saying things in a way that fits the subject. Anyone who might want to make Boccaccio as modest as Virgil would surely do nothing worthwhile. It is neither the true nor the vraisemblable that make the beauty of such stories, he says. It is simply “la manière de les conter.”

Perhaps the most striking example of such tightrope walking is La Fontaine’s very first tale, Joconde, adapted from Ariosto.

At the court of Lombardy, its especially handsome prince is fatigued by all the attention he receives from court women (La Fontaine never says just what is so fatiguing). He decides he needs an assistant, as handsome or handsomer than is he. One of the courtiers sends for his brother, Joconde. Joconde’s wife pleads with him not to go. She will die if he goes to court. But he rides off anyway. Having forgotten something, however, he retraces his steps—and finds his wife asleep in the arms of a gross valet. Joconde doesn’t wake them, since in such a case he would be obliged to kill them both:

LA FONTAINE, JEAN DE

. . . il n'en fit rien;
Et mon avis est qu'il fit bien.
Le moins de bruit que l'on peut faire
En telle affaire
.Est le plus sûr de la moitié
[ . . . he did nothing.
And my opinion is that he did well.
The less noise you make
In such a business
Is the safest by at least half.]

Joconde's good looks fade. He is somewhat consoled, however, when he discovers the prince's wife has taken a dwarf as her lover. After many preambles ("Il ne faut à la cour ni trop voir ni trop dire") he tells the prince. The prince is devastated:

Mais bientôt il le prit en homme de courage,
En galant homme, et, pour le faire court,
En véritable homme de cour.
[But soon he took it as a man of courage,
As a worldly man, and, to be brief,
As a true courtier.]

The two of them, thoroughly disillusioned, decide to travel all over Italy seducing other people's wives. After a while, though, they think about settling down. They find a servant girl. To ensure her fidelity she will sleep between them. One night, however, the girl's boyfriend won't take no for an answer. He climbs on top of her, between the two princes, has his way with her, and as each prince wakes up he finds she is busy with someone else (presumably the other prince). The next morning each prince accuses the other of monopolizing her favors. When the girl confesses, they are disillusioned once again. They decide to go home and forget the whole thing. As is typical in classicist narrative, after some aberration, everything becomes normal again. Everything is just as it was before:

Ainsi que bons bourgeois achevons notre vie,
Chacun pres de sa femme, et demeurons-en là
[Just like good bourgeois let's finish our lives
Each one close to his wife, and let's leave it at that.]

The prince and Joconde start out as handsome, superior beings. They end up being just like everybody else. The eroticism of this story consists in the racy situations—but also in La Fontaine's sly, ironic, cynical, elbow-in-the-ribs commentary:

Vous autres, bonnes gens, eussiez cru que la dame
Une heure après eût rendu l'âme.

Moi qui sais ce que c'est que l'esprit d'une femme
Je m'en serais à bon droit douté.
[You other naïve people would have thought that the lady
Would have given up the ghost within an hour.
I, who know the heart of a woman, with good reason
Would have doubted.]

Other La Fontaine tales treat L'Oraison de Saint Julien, in which a traveler is attacked by robbers and more or less left to die. He finds his way, however, to the house of a merry widow, who rescues and entertains him. In the Fiancée du roi de Garbe a princess sets out to become the bride of the king of a far off country. On the way, though, she is kidnapped, seduced, and has eight different adventures (or misadventures), before being delivered as a virgin to the king. La Fontaine writes, "Je me suis écarté de mon original . . ."

Possibly the most striking piece, typically printed with the Contes, is La Fontaine's Clymène. In this closet comedy the god Apollo complains to the nine muses that there are no more good poems about love:

Le siècle, disait-il, a gâté cette affaire:
Lui nous parler d'amour! Il ne le sait pas faire.
Ce qu'on n'a pas au coeur l'a-t-on dans ses écrits?
[Worldly things have spoiled all that:
Talk to us about love! They don't know how to do it.
What they don't have in their hearts, how can they write about it?]

Apollo expresses sympathy for a certain Acante, very much in love with Clymène. The various muses try out different well known poetic styles—the eclogue, the pathetic, the comical. They pastiche the style of Clement Marot, they do the ode, they do dizains, all without melting the heart of Clymène.

Finally the god of love, grateful for so much poetry in his honor, decides to intervene. He whispers to Acante: "Baisez-la hardiment;/ Je lui tiendrai les mains, vous n'aurez point d'obstacle" ["Take her; don't hesitate; I'll hold her hands; you won't have any obstacle"] The rest, says Acante, is a miracle.

Biography

La Fontaine was born in 1621 in the east-of-Paris provincial town of Château-Thierry. He is best known as the author of Fables (1668 and after), said to be the bestselling book of the seventeenth century, and four books of Contes (1664 and after), which readers clamored for, but for which he occasionally had to apologize, and which held up his entrance into the French Academy.

HERBERT DE LEY

Editions

La Fontaine, Jean de. Oeuvres, Grands écrivains, 10 vols., 1883–1892.

———. Oeuvres complètes I, ed. J.-P. Collinet, Pléiade, 1991.

Further Reading

De Ley, Herbert. Fixing up Reality. La Fontaine and Lévi-Strauss. Paris, Seattle, Tübingen: Biblio 17, 1996.

Fumaroli, Marc. Le poète et le roi. Jean de La Fontaine et son siècle. Paris: Fallois, 1997.

Giraudoux, Jean. Les cinq tentations de La Fontaine. Paris: Grasset, 1938.

Lapp, John C. The Aesthetics of Negligence: La Fontaine's Contes. Cambridge: The University Press, 1971.

Lesage, Clare, ed. Jean de La Fontaine. Paris: B.N.F. and Seuil, 1995.

---

LA METTRIE, JULIEN OFFRAY DE

---

1709–1751

French doctor, essayist, and philosopher

As an author of erotic texts, Julien Offray de la Mettrie is perhaps best known for his influence on the Marquis de Sade, who famously misquotes his Discourse on Happiness. “La Mettrie was right,” Sade writes, “when he said that it was necessary to wallow in filth like pigs; and that we should find pleasure, as the latter do, in the highest degree of corruption.” La Mettrie’s writing on erotic love was indeed scandalous, in the eyes of his eighteenth-century readers, for its participation in a form of libertine materialism influenced by a heterodox (and often hedonist) Epicurean tradition of atheist critique. With his commitment to a scepticism inherited in part from Montaigne and the seventeenth-century French libertines, La Mettrie aimed to strip both religious and philosophical orthodoxies of their pretensions to an absolute and incontrovertible truth. In their place, he set a voluptuous image of philosophical inquiry as sensual pleasure. For La Mettrie, “learning has its ecstasies, just as love does.”

In his most famous essay, Machine Man, La Mettrie argues in favor of an understanding of bodily processes (rather than spiritual or intellectual ones) as determining factors in human behavior. In La Mettrie’s words, “The human body is a machine which winds itself up, a living picture of perpetual motion,” and sexual desire is a crucial part of this naturally occurring mechanism. Yet La Mettrie does not share Sade’s attachment to violence as a mode of sensual and philosophical purification. Nor does his thorough-going materialism depend on a conception of human existence as that of a coldly mechanical community of cyborgs lacking in imaginative ability. Instead, La Mettrie’s emphasis, in both his scientific works and his excursions on the joys of erotic experience, remains firmly on the extraordinary delight to be taken in the development of an innately human capacity for sensuousness (or “volupté”).

In fact, La Mettrie sees this capacity for erotic experience both as a kind of sensation—the ability to feel erotic pleasure—and as a mode of imaginative perception that he ultimately defines as the mainspring of thought itself. Not only does La Mettrie portray the quest of the philosopher for knowledge as fundamentally sensuous—a kind of intercourse with the natural world—but, in his writings on erotic pleasure (Sensuousness and The Art of Pleasure), he sees the potential for sensuousness as making access to genuine philosophical knowledge possible: “all nature is in the heart of he who feels sensuousness.” Intellectual and sexual delight are intimately conjoined in La Mettrie’s work, since erotic feeling can function as a means of linking poetry to science, literary writing to medical discourse. All are expressions of a creative, sensual impulse which produces a commingling of human subjects and the world that surrounds them.

La Mettrie’s most widely read work is unquestionably his treatise Machine Man, published while he was in exile in Holland. To a certain extent, the implicit mechanical determinism of the title of this essay has overshadowed its author’s consistent interest in the connections between erotic delight and imaginative philosophical reflection. His first writing focused on this topic, the short essay initially published under the title Sensuousness (and later under The School of Sensuousness), predates Machine Man by about two years.

Sensuousness begins with a series of literary portraits in which La Mettrie distinguishes carefully between writers who are “obscene and dissolute” and those who are the “masters of the purest sensuousness.” While this categorization resembles the modern distinction between pornography and erotica, La Mettrie makes use of his taxonomy, not to extol the virtues of a more muted erotic sensibility, but to demonstrate the multifarious perceptiveness characteristic of the sensuous nature. For La Mettrie, “obscene” writers, who subscribe to a kind of fantasy of objectivity in their almost scientific portrayals of bodies, evince a limited view of human experience. “They wish to see everything and to imagine nothing,” he writes. La Mettrie’s Epicurean voluptuary, on the contrary, cultivates a state of permanently heightened sensation that renders the very act of reflection a highly pleasurable one; as a result, “to be happy, he has only to wish to be so.” The faculty most privileged by this voluptuary is thus not reason, which strips objects of the pleasure to be taken in them, but imagination, which multiplies the possibilities for delight.

These themes—as well as an emphasis on the crucial role played by the imagination—reappear in Machine Man, in the dedication to which La Mettrie claims that “nature is the nourishment of sensuousness, and the imagination its triumph.” However, in the Discourse on Happiness, published a year later, he seems to retreat somewhat from the avid sensualism of his earlier works. “I do not pretend to make happiness consist only in sensuousness,” he writes. Nonetheless, he affirms, towards the end of the essay, “It is in any case still plaisir, sensuousness, or any other agreeable sensation which is the necessary cause of our actions.”

Despite the hesitations visible in Discourse on Happiness, La Mettrie reaffirmed his youthful attachment to an erotic, libidinous philosophy of pleasure before his premature death. Towards the end of his life, he reworked his School of Sensuousness as The Art of Pleasure and embraced anew (in both The Art of Pleasure and The Systeme of Epicurus) a vision of materialist philosophy as an ars erotica—in which, in the words of Michel Foucault, “sex serves as the basis for an initiation into knowledge”—rather than as a scientia sexualis aiming to dissect and discipline human sexual desire under the light of reason.

While La Mettrie’s erotic philosophy has been seen as a stepping stone on the way to the more intensely transgressive Sadean oeuvre, La Mettrie’s work represents in its own right an important contribution to theories of pleasure as a motive force in human existence. His understanding of sensuousness as ideally a kind of “sixth sense” at work in intellection—from memory to scientific reasoning—as well as in bodily experience stands as a significant contribution to materialist philosophy as a source, not of a gloomy determinism, but of hope and transformative possibility for humankind.

Biography

Born in Saint-Malo, 23 November 1709. Attended colleges of Coutance and Caen before enrolling at the Collège du Plessis, Paris; began studies in natural science and philosophy at the Collège d’Harcourt, 1725. Student of medicine at the Faculty of Paris, 1727–1731; received medical degree from University of Reims, 1733. Continued medical studies in Leiden, 1733–1734. Returned to Saint-Malo to begin medical practice, 1734. Married in 1739; one daughter and one son, who dies in 1748. Left Brittany to return to Paris, falling in with libertine and free-thinking circles, 1742. Served as physician to the Duke de Grammont and to a regiment of the French Guards during a series of military campaigns, 1742–1745; placed in charge of military hospitals in Flanders, 1745. Fled to Holland after his Natural History of the Soul was condemned and burned by the Parliament of Paris, 1746. Obligated to leave Holland for Potsdam after 1747 publication of Machine Man, 1748. Served as “lecteur” and doctor, as well as a member of the Berlin Academy of Sciences, in the court of Frederick II, 1748–1751. Died, of “indigestion,” at Frederick’s court, 11 November 1751.

NATANIA MEEKER

Selected Works

La Volupté. 1745(?).

L'École de la volupté. 1746.

L'Homme machine. Leiden, 1747; as Man a machine, translated by Richrad A. Watson and Maya Rybalka in Man a machine and, Man a plant, edited by Justin Leiber, 1994; as Machine Man, translated and edited by Ann Thomson in Machine Man and Other Writings, 1996.

Traité de la vie heureuse, par Sénèque, avec un Discours du traducteur sur le même sujet. Potsdam: Voss, 1748; first part as Anti-Seneca or the Sovereign Good, translated and edited by Ann Thomson in Machine Man and Other Writings, 1996.

L'Art de jouir. Berlin, 1751.

Système d'Épicure in Oeuvres philosophiques. Berlin, 1751; as The System of Epicurus, translated and edited by Ann Thomson in Machine Man and Other Writings, 1996.

Further Readings

Falvey, John. “Women and Sexuality in the Thought of La Mettrie” in Women and Society in 18th-Century France: Essays in Honour of J.S. Spink, edited by Eva Jacobs et al, London: The Athlone Press, 1979.

Jauch, Ursula Pia. Jenseits der Maschine: Philosophie, Ironie und Ästhetik bei Julien Offray de La Mettrie (1709–1751). Munich and Vienna: Carl Hanser Verlag, 1998.

Liu, Catherine. Copying Machines: Taking Notes for the Automaton, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2000.

Rosenfield, Leonore Cohen. From Beast Machine to Man-Machine: Animal Soul in French Letters from Descartes to La Mettrie, New Haven: Yale University Press, 1968.

Thomson, Ann. Materialism and Society in the Mid-Eighteenth Century: La Mettrie's “Discours préliminaire,” Geneva: Librairie Droz, 1981.

Tiffany, Daniel. “The Lyric Automaton” in Toy Medium: Materialism and Modern Lyric, Berkeley: University of California Press, 2000.

Vartanian, Aram. “La Mettrie, Diderot, and Sexology in the Enlightenment” in Essays on the Age of Enlightenment in Honor of Ira O. Wade, edited by Jean Macary, Geneva: Librairie Droz, 1977.

Ibid. La Mettrie's “L'Homme machine”: A Study in the Origins of an Idea, Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1960.

Wellman, Kathleen. La Mettrie: Medicine, Philosophy, and Enlightenment, Durham, North Carolina: Duke University Press, 1992.

---

LA MORLIÈRE, JACQUES ROCHETTE DE

---

1719–1785

French Novelist

La Morlière’s libertine novel Angola, histoire indienne (1746) uses the device of the oriental fairytale to provide both a portrait of French court society at the middle of the eighteenth century and a fascinating glimpse at how people actually read and responded to erotic novels. The novel opens with the story of how, at Angola’s birth, all the fairies of the earth were invited by his father, King Erzeb-can, to give him gifts. As it happened, the supremely ugly Mutine, offended by the father’s indelicate gift to her of a mirror, bestows on the baby the dubious gift of patience, a patience to be exercised when he comes to see his eventual beloved pass first through the arms of a rival. Appalled at what Mutine has done, the queen of the fairies, Lumineuse, a female version of Louis XV, proposes to unravel the curse by having Angola come to her court at puberty. There, the reigning spirit of libertinage and its serial conquests forestalling any enslavement to love will surely provide an effective remedy to the fate that threatens.

When the young Angola arrives at this thinly disguised version of Versailles, the fairytale motif is dropped and the novel becomes a witty satire of Queen Lumineuse's utopia of libertinage. She makes clear to the young man that his goal is not to avoid passion, but to remain its master. More than any other, it is the passion of love that must be carefully modulated. Guided by his friend Almaïr and his thoroughly non-possessive relation with his mistress, Aménis, Angola must learn never to confuse the joy of seduction with any one of the changing configurations of partners that occur as its results. To confuse coupling with one particular couple is to set oneself against the forces of change and movement that preside over the human condition. When the timid Angola finds himself infatuated with Zobéide, a close friend of Aménis and someone Almaïr also desires, the perfect occasion has arisen for Angola to learn the libertine's version of patience, a patience that will undo Mutine's curse by insulating him from jealousy and suffering. Recognizing that moving apart is just as integral a stage within the process of coupling as coming together, Almaïr explains that he feels no jealousy toward Zobéide's obvious preference for the recently arrived Angola.

The fact that tomorrow will be unlike today, that he and Zobéide may one day be just as probable a couple as Angola and Aménis, endows all involved in such displacements, the women no less than the men, with a lucidity beyond possessiveness and suffering. Serial seductions are the best prophylaxis to the self-inflicted suffering of passionate love. Angola does not, however, become either a guidebook for masculine seduction (Crébillon's abiding temptation) or an illustration of feminine resistance and control (Marivaux's abiding temptation).

La Morlière subsumes both these options within a larger and more fundamental dynamic proper to the couple as a mutually defining duality. Angola is a story of coupling itself, of coupling as a form of conviviality redefining those who enact its rituals and run its risks. La Morlière lays bare a protocol of social and sexual exchange that lies outside the traditional options represented by the libertine's celebration of deception and the idealist's solipsism of passion.

Angola's story also tells us something otherwise unnoticed about Enlightenment reading practices, about how and why people so voraciously consumed the scenarios of desire making up the libertine novel. The chapters describing Angola's sexual initiation by none other than Lumineuse foreground the reading together of an erotic novel as a practice that allows Angola finally to overcome the timidity that has so far been his lot. Swept up by this reading as a couple, Angola is able to raise his eyes from the page and complete with Lumineuse the transition from the novel's third person to the first and second person of their own coming together. Emphasizing the contagious desire flowing between the novel his characters read and the scene they enact, La Morlière's staccato alternation between excerpts from their reading and descriptions of their actions breaks down the separation between reading and acting in such a way that life becomes the perfect imitation of art. With this open passage between reading as a couple and coupling while reading as the structural and semantic center of his novel, La Morlière raises to the power of two the "mirror effect" so frequent in libertine novels of a character who enacts a scene that has been read.

The last stage of Angola's story begins when, having given in to the dangerous powers of the imagination, he falls in love with a woman he knows only through the portrait of her he has happened to come upon in a jewel box belonging to Lumineuse. When he actually meets and falls in love with Luzéide, whom Lumineuse has thoughtfully summoned to her court, he becomes a man enslaved to full-blown passion. Discovering that passion and patience are both rooted in the Latin patior, to suffer, Angola's proposal of marriage may be accepted by Luzéide, but, returning to the fairytale motif, she is first stolen away from Lumineuse's court by Angola's rival, the evil genie Makis. Angola may, with the help of a magic coach, find her and bring her back to court, but not before he has fallen under the spell of Makis's talisman which has the power to make him fall soundly asleep at the very moment he is about to make love. The novel's darkest scene comes when, as Angola nods off, Makis takes his place in the newlyweds' bed. The next morning, when Angola awakens, Luzéide is more than a bit perplexed by his lament that he is now certain his only hope of overcoming his syncopated ardor lies in the reputed powers of a magic brew available only from King Moka.

Angola may end with a marriage; but it is a marriage parodied even before it is consummated. Substituting Makis for the dozing groom reasserts the trope of coupling as a challenge to the exclusivity of passion. Rather than ending his novel with a pious allegiance to marital monogamy, La Morlière keeps it centered on the polymorphous mobility of couples animated by a contagious mimesis of the erotic inspired by its novelistic representation.

Biography

Born in Grenoble, France, on 22 April 1719. Studies in Grenoble after which he is placed by his father in apprenticeship for a crown office. A propensity for brawls and indelicate seductions forced his father to send him to Paris in the Musketeer corps from which he was soon discharged for dishonorable conduct. Began writing novels for money, but his only real success in that genre was Angola, histoire indienne published in 1746. Briefly expelled from Paris and later imprisoned for various seductions and swindles of young married women. Became a figure of intimidation and braggadocio in the venal underworld of pamphleteers while pimping actresses and working as a police spy. From 1750 to 1761 he headed up the most powerful theatrical claque in Paris, making and breaking playwrights' reputations at the Comédie Française and Théâtre des Italiens with the hired applause and boos he could provide. From 1761 on, his swindles, forgeries, and pandering were punctuated by expulsions from Paris and stays in jail. Lived in progressively more dire circumstances under a series of assumed names that kept him one step ahead of the police until his death in a rented room in Paris on 9 February 1785.

THOMAS M. KAVANAGH

Selected Works

- Angola, histoire indienne*. Paris, 1746; Paris: Éditions Desjonquères, 1991; as Angola: an Eastern Tale, translated by Vyvyan Beresford Holland, London: Chapman & Hill, 1926.
- Les Lauriers ecclésiastiques ou les Campagnes de l'abbé de T.* Paris, 1747.
- Mylord Stanley, ou le Criminel vertueux*. Paris, 1747.
- Mirza-Nadir, ou Mémoires et aventures du marquis de Saint-T.* The Hague, 1749.

Further Reading

- Démoris, René. "Esthétique et libertinage: amour de l'art et art d'aimer." In Eros Philosophique, edited by François Moureau and Alain-Marc Rieu, Paris: Champion, 1984, pp. 149–161.
- Goulemot, Jean-Marie. Forbidden Texts: Erotic Literature and Its Readers in Eighteenth-Century France. Translated by James Simpson. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995.
- Huet, Marie-Hélène. "Roman libertin et réaction aristocratique." In Dix-Huitième Siècle, 6 (1974), pp. 129–141.
- Kavanagh, Thomas M. "Coupling the Novel: Reading Bodies in La Morlière's Angola." In Eighteenth-Century Fiction, 13 (2–3), 2001, pp. 389–413.
- Laroch, Philippe. Petits-Maitres et roués: évolution de la notion de libertinage dans le roman français du XVIIIe siècle. Quebec: Presses de l'Université Laval, 1979.
- Mauzi, Robert. L'Idée du bonheur dans la littérature et la pensée française au XVIIIe siècle. Paris: Armand Colin, 1965.
- Trousson, Raymond. "Le Chevalier de La Morlière: Un aventurier des lettres au XVIIIe siècle." In Bulletin de l'Académie royale de langue et de littérature française, 68, 1990, pp. 218–299.
- Versini, Laurent. "Néologie et tours à la mode dans Angola." In Travaux de linguistique et de littérature, 13, 1975, pp. 505–525.

LA PUTTANA ERRANTE

---

La Puttana Errante, the title of two sixteenth-century Venetian works, one in verse, one in prose, both probably products of sometime secretaries and imitators of Pietro Aretino. The title, attributed to the pen of Aretino without specifying which of the works was meant, became proverbial in Renaissance England as an exemplum of erotic/obscene writing characteristic of libertine Italy (Donne, Guilpin, Harvey, and Marston, among others, make this point).

The verse version of La Puttana Errante was written by Lorenzo Veniero (1510–1556), a Venetian aristocrat and follower of Aretino. In a poem written after the appearance of his Puttana entitled La Zaffetta, (a poem which details a trent-uno, or gang-bang of Angela Zaffetta, a noted Venetian courtesan), Veniero claims that he wrote La Zaffetta in order to demonstrate that he, and not Aretino, was the author of the verse Puttana. Scholars have accepted this claim. The poem is a mock epic in four long cantos of ottava rima, delivering an account of a true wandering and transgressive whore. The whore of the poem is an unnamed figure who is an embodiment of extraordinary female lust. Scholars have claimed that the whore is based on one Elena Ballarina, a Venetian courtesan against whom Veniero is reported to have developed a strong antipathy. Some scholars have seen the poem as a commentary on Italy's political, social, and literary scene as well as noting what seems to be an exceptionally misogynistic tone in the poem. The whore is certainly a parody of the conquering female warrior of Italian epic, in this instance we have a heroine who battles with her cunt and ass, fucking all comers, whether Christian or infidel, king or commoner, pope or animal. All are serviced in this poem.

The poem imitates one characteristic of erotic writing established by Aretino by insisting upon using vulgar language. Indeed, the poem begins by invoking Aretino as the inspiration for the verse. The poem differs from Aretino's dialogues by its very form (cantos, ottava rima) that clearly conjures up the epics of Boiardo, Ariosto, and Pulci; sometimes the connection is direct (e.g., here is a filthy whore "who did more with her cunt than Orlando/Did with his sword and lance"). The whore makes progress through Italy, conquering with her cunt and ass everyone (and everything) along the way, including the armies of France and Germany (thus providing ammunition for Erasmi's view of the poem as an allegory "amara e irose delle sventure d'Italia"). At one point the whore is awarded a degree in whoredom from the University of Siena and holds forth in a disputation about cocks. The poem concludes with her triumph in Rome (seen as a parody of Petrarch's Trionfi), a procession of all of the men she has fucked, among others, and a huge representation of a cock. The procession ends at the Ponte Sisto, the traditional workplace for whores in Rome. The power of the wandering whore is, on the whole, depicted in a negative fashion; the aim of the poem is certainly not the arousal of the reader.

Exactly the opposite claim might be made of the prose version of La Puttana Errante. This work cannot be conclusively attributed. Some scholars have argued for Aretino himself as the author; others favor Nicolo Franco (1515–1570). Franco, it should be noted, began as one of Aretino's secretaries but became a notorious enemy, with his most virulent attacks against Aretino appearing in his Priapea, an updating of the classical anthology of the same name. Franco was executed by the Inquisition in Rome in 1570. The prose Puttana Errante is regarded as one of the most influential models for pornographic works of succeeding centuries. The work comes closest to providing what Steven Marcus has called a pornotopia, especially in two characteristics: the single intention of the author (arousal of the reader) and the extensive use of taboo words. It is also characteristic of much Renaissance pornographic writing in its obsession with sexual positions, a strong anti-clerical bent, and a "how to" section on pleasing men. The work begins in an Aretine mode as a dialogue between Maddalena and Giulia in which Maddalena recounts her life's story to the younger woman. There is some attempt at a plot line, but it is the barest kind of business, concocted merely to allow one copulation scene after another. What is remarkable about the work is the author's attempt at what might be seen as psychological realism as he describes events from Maddalena's point of view at the time she experiences each event, especially in her early years as she gets initiated successively into progressive modes of sexuality: masturbation, same-sex sex, and heterosexual sex.

There is increasingly less dialogue, much extended first-person narration, extensive use of voyeurism, many details of living arrangements—all in the service of providing one scene of sexual activity after another. And so we get scenes of Maddalena copulating with her first boyfriend, Roberto, in a number of positions, most of them of the standing or sitting variety, because of the living arrangements. Such details might cause us to think “realism,” but in fact these details are all in the service of the Renaissance obsession with positions; what the author would convince us of is that at any place, at any time, under any conditions, people will engage in sex. Metaphors for sexual organs and acts are used occasionally, but this is a work primarily about cocks, cunts, and fucking. Maddalena's progress moves to her profession as a courtesan, with negative views of her interactions with the clergy, and it concludes with a recapping and naming by Giulia of the thirty-five positions for sexual intercourse that Maddalena has described (up to fifty-two in the Galderisi version).

DAVID O. FRANTZ

Selected Works

All editions of these two works are problematic in terms of attribution and availability. Most easily accessible for the general reader are, for the verse version:

Veniero, Lorenzo. La Puttana Errante, Paris: Liseux, 1883 (but note this work is sometimes catalogued under Aretino).

———. La Zaffetta. Paris, 1861. for the prose version, found catalogued under Aretino in a modern edition: Il Piacevol Ragionamento del' Aretino, ed. Claudio Galderisi, Rome: Salerno, 1987 (in this version the roles of Maddalena and Giulia are reversed).

Further Reading

Erasmi, Gabriele. “La Puttana Errante: Parodia epica ispirata all' Aretino,” in Pietro Aretino nel cinquecentenario della nascita, 2 vols. Rome: Salerno, 1995, 2:875–895.

Foxon, David. Libertine Literature in England, 1660–1745. New Hyde Park, NY: University Books, 1965.

Frantz, David. Festum Voluptatis: A Study of Renaissance Erotica, Columbus, OH: Ohio State UP, 1989.

Grendler, Paul. Critics of the Italian World, 1530–1560: Anton Francesco Doni, Nicolo Franco and Ortensio Lando. Madison, WI: University of Wisconsin Press, 1969.

Moulton, Ian. Before Pornography. Erotic Writing in Early Modern England. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.

---

LA SOURICIÈRE; OR THE MOUSE-TRAP

---

La Souricière; or The Mouse-Trap was first published in London under the pseudonym of ‘Timothy Touchit, Esq.’ The subtitle declares it, ‘A facetious and sentimental excursion through part of Austrian Flanders and France being a divertissement [sic] for both sexes,’ an oblique reference to Laurence Sterne's A Sentimental Journey though France and Italy. The story is about a gentleman and his observations of his fellow passengers while traveling from Dover to Bruges. The book is in two volumes, and is in keeping with a genre of erotic skits on popular travel writing of the day.

The preface lays out the tone of the book offering hints as to the nature of its sexual and jocular content; ‘The following extraordinary Performance, was written by a gentleman well known in the Republic of Letters: and it displays much wit, good-sense, and fertility of invention, particularly in ludicrous parts, where his allusions and illustrations are peculiar to himself, and have a singular title to originality.' These comments pertain to the type of analogies he employs when making reference to sex.

LA SOURICIÈRE; OR THE MOUSE-TRAP

The main principal of the narrator's work is to provide the reader with a survey of his fellow travelers. The author's intentions are explained in the Advertisement: 'the governing principle throughout this performance is, to exhibit the imperfections and indiscretions of mankind, not for imitation but admonition: to display the perverseness and frailty of human nature, in the commission of errors repugnant to repeated conviction; and to enforce this great moral principle, that repenting for past offences, and a change of life, are indispensable duties to secure terrestrial happiness.'

The traits and sexual activities of the principal characters are described through double-entendres, all italicised to ensure readers do not miss the joke or are left unaware of its true meaning. The first section opens with the narrator's declaration of his plan to travel the Continent in search of novelty. He plans, with his 'Mouse-Trap' to 'catch the manners as they rise.' The dialogue is steeped in metaphors about the penis as a tree of life, a mouse-trap, and a barometer. The term 'mouse' was traditionally used as a term of endearment for the vagina, the mouse-trap evolving from this usage.

The narrator attacks the state of the prostitutes, "—*****, a plague take all stars;—aye, and garters too. They are become cheap trash of late days. The venerable Oak is slow of growth; but Mushrooms are of quicker vegetation. Pluck them from the bed of Honour. Return them to their native soil. To the dunghill, away,—away—Foh! how they stink.' He blames the condition of the prostitutes for his sluggish sexual response and attributes to them the causes of fungal growth. The implication is that whores are responsible for the spread of venereal disease. He recalls an earlier experience when 'passing along the Strand one evening, I was accosted by a fair lady, who, though I was a perfect stranger, professed great affection, in the most endearing manner, invited me to her place of abode. I was shocked at her familiarity, and wishing to get rid of her, declared myself a married man. It did not abate her importunities;—she continued to solicit my intimacy.

I have no money, child, said I.—'Go to the devil,' said she, and departed—How dreadful! that inclination, or necessity, should blur the grace and blush of modesty," The author uses displays of disingenuous shock to satirize the moral standards of the day.

The narrator takes off in his post-chaise but chastises the post-boy who is driving it for his cruelty in flogging the horse too vehemently. A keen eye for detail allows for colorful vignettes of the characters he meets. On board ship from Dover to Ostend, he meets a fat woman with her young daughter and young gentleman, Mr. Lustring, en route to Bruges. Although the gentleman is elegant, he is foppishly dressed, yet has a 'certain Je-ne-sçai-quoi. Because of his effeminate dress, he supposes him to be a dancing master but, during a tête-à-tête between the young lady and the fop, he discovers that 'the distinguishing characteristics was not in his heels__," an allusion to his sexual prowess.

The narrator derides his own 'mouse-trap' (a euphemism for the penis) since it does not respond to the charms of the older woman, "I wish'd the Mouse-Trap at the devil, not having all the good gifts of nature then at my command.' He describes the state, not only of his own sexual ardour, but that of the younger woman, whose 'empyrosis was ardent in the extreme.' Within the work, the author manages to satirize the experiments of the Royal Society, in keeping with some of the other erotic writings of the eighteenth century: 'Had that learned body of philosophers, the Royal Society, been present, it might have given rise to a tedious debate, to have investigated, whether something more simple in its construction than a fire-engine, would not have distinguished the young lady's conflagration.'

The older woman's search for pleasure is mocked by her daughter who declares, 'How can you talk as you do? It is time for one of your years to give pleasures up and to think of more serious matters.' Her mother retorts that old folks have a right to some enjoyment. Her daughter, Miss Polly, is escorted by a waiter of nineteen or twenty years old called Jemmy, the 'abundance of his endowments' being his 'particular qualifications.' The narrator recognizes that both the older and younger woman are sexually adventurous and there is an implication that lasciviousness is an inherited quality: 'What is bred in the bone will never be out of the flesh.'

The daughter displays her mother's carnal appetites and is caught in bed with Jemmy who agrees to marry her but only on condition that her mother settles £10,000 on him as a dowry. He declares he must provide for the Fille de Chambre since he has already seduced her. Polly and Jemmy marry. The women meet up with their female cousin. At this stage our narrator leaves the boat and goes on to Bruges.

Continuing his journey, he boards another ship en route to Bruges. He continues with his descriptions of the passengers, this time making use of pelagic analogies. Again, this was a common eighteenth-century technique to describe sex in couched terminology: "On a cursory view round the Cabbin, I was convinced many of the passengers could display Latitude as well as Longitude; and that the various methods of sailing, and arts of navigation, were perfectly known to them; for some were come booming, having crowded all the sail they could, by making the most of their canvas. Some had a reef or two in their fore-sail, and some were furl'd. Some were ready to traverse, and others prepared to go right before the wind. Some were booms; some cross-jacks; some were defective in their bolt-spirits and some disabled in their rudders."

On a passenger boat to Ghent, he meets a mendicant friar who advises him to take up with a pretty Fille de Chambre at a certain hotel, at which he later shares dinner with four gentleman. After becoming inebriated, the young men attack one of the waiters for which the narrator berates them for displaying behavior unbecoming of a gentleman. He ensures they make amends to the waiter and pay damages to the host. Meanwhile, the protagonist enjoys himself with the Fille de Chambre who creeps into his room. He describes his erection as a barometer at full level: "On this she prepared what I wanted, and by collision effected a deliquation which produced a happy crisis; and after repeating the application three or four times, pro re mata, as physicians say, the elevation of the Barometer fell down to changeable, and I became relieved and composed."

In the following section, 'The Jaunt to Brussels,' he engages a male guide, Francis, who is unemployed. The guide is a modest fellow who plays sweet music on his mandolin. Leaving Brussels they come across two female fellow passengers of eighteen and twenty-five years old. Once more, his barometer grows, upon which he compares his mouse-trap to Francis's Mandelin [sic]. Although one of the young ladies is attracted to Francis, she ends up in bed with our narrator, such is the 'magnitude of the Maypole of love.' The story ends in Paris, where the narrator finds a willing female companion who understands 'the necessary arts of bringing the point-principal to its proper bearing.'

JULIE PEAKMAN

Edition

Anon. La Souricière; or The Mouse-trap. (Printed in London for J. Parsons of Pasternoster-Row, 1794).

---

LABÉ, LOUISE

---

1520/24–1564
French poet

How did Louise Labé, the daughter of a rope maker, become so famous, or perhaps more accurately, infamous by the 1550s? So famous, indeed, that John Calvin would refer to her as a "common whore" while the poet Jean Antoine de Baïf nicknamed her "belle rebelle" [beautiful rebel]. The answer to these questions relies on understanding of both the poetic traditions of the era and of Labé's environment. In sixteenth century France, the silk industry made Lyons a wealthy city. Trade, proximity to Italy, and major publishing houses, established Lyons as a clear rival to Paris as a site of literature and culture. Poets flourished and literary salons began to form. It is in this atmosphere that

LABÉ, LOUISE

Louise Labé, a bourgeois, was exposed to the world of letters. Yet the role of women in that society curtailed: they were the subject of poetry, not its creator. The beloved stood on a pedestal, an object of longing, yet unattainable. The poetic dialectics were built on the repeated rejection of an erotic relationship and unsatisfied desire.

It might be more accurate to say that there are three Louise Labés: the woman who lived in Lyon and about whom we have only sketchy verifiable biographical information; the myth of Louise Labé, a literary creation, existing in the poetry and the reflections of her contemporaries and of countless later writers; and finally the ground-breaking poet. The real Labé appears to have led a life that pushed the limits of the norm for a sixteenth-century woman of the middle-class. Speculations and rumors about her private life—Did she have lovers? How many? Who?—fed the legends that followed Labé through the centuries. The fictionalized Labé tells us much about how women, and more particularly, a woman who broke with traditions, was viewed by her contemporaries and has continued to occupy the literary imagination of both men and women. Both of these figures depend for their fame on the writer. Labé's consciousness of her role as a writer and her creation of a female poetic voice that rejected the Petrarchan/Neo-platonic ideal of love in favor a reciprocal emotional and physical relationship make her one of the most original writers of the French Renaissance.

Œuvres [Works], 1555

Labé's complete works, Œuvres, first published in 1555, consisted of a dedicatory epistle, a debate between Love and Folly, three elegies, twenty-four sonnets, and twenty-four poems written about her, presented anonymously. The collection itself was innovative, combining genres and positioning Labé both as subject and as object. Labé dedicated her edition to Clémence de Bourges, a young noblewoman. The letter reads as a proto-feminist manifesto and also reveals Labé's sense of irony. Labé calls for women to become writers and views writing as an access to pleasure and a way of displaying their talents. Nonetheless, she knows that women should not "show themselves alone in public" so Labé invokes Clémence as her guide.

That love dominates the collection is evident in Le débat d'amour et de folie [The Debate of Love and Folly]. This prose text, written in a style that blends the medieval debate genre, with a theatrical presentation, explores the conceit "Love is blind." When the debate begins, Love (Cupid) has been blinded by Folly, as a result of arguments between them over which one is greater. Although Venus calls for Folly's summary punishment, Jupiter orders a trial. Apollo serves as the advocate for Cupid, while Mercury is spokesman for Folly. Apollo argues that Cupid must have his sight returned and stresses that disasters in Love have always been the fault of Folly, not Cupid. Mercury takes the more cynical position, saying that Folly's blinding of Cupid was justified and, in fact, will do him little harm. Folly has always been the source of Love's greatness. While both speakers present long defenses, Mercury's description of a woman in love, rejected by her lover, announces the main theme of the Elegies and the Sonnets. In the end, the decision on the dispute is postponed, and Folly is ordered to serve as Cupid's guide until the question is resolved.

The Débat is followed by three Elégies that introduce the poet and her coming to writing. The tripartite structure of the elegies forms its own narrative. Central to "Elegy I," addressed to women readers, is the notion of the poet as "everywoman" who has been betrayed by her love. Love plays a dual role: it/he functions as both the source of her earlier happiness and now, of her lament. Apollo has filled her heart with "poetic fury," allowing her to write of her joys and miseries. "Elegy II," which speaks to her absent lover, foregrounds the themes of separation and abandonment, exploring the poet's refusal to believe that she has been deserted. She affirms that none could love as she does but beyond that, she emphasizes her worth and how many others desire her. Thus, although speaking from an apparent position of weakness, the poet never truly betrays herself. The elegy ends ironically with an epitaph for the poet, her body consumed by the fires of her love, yet the spark of love lives on in her ashes, and can only be quenched by the tears of her beloved. "Elegy III," turns to the women of Lyons, asking that they not condemn her "foolishness." The poet describes her character, showing that despite her efforts she was conquered by love and that love has endured.

She ends with a request that Love inspire a passion as strong, or even stronger, in her beloved so that together they could better bear its burdens. Thus, the cycle both reprises some of the themes of the Debate and leads to the Sonnets.

The Sonnets, by far Labé's most famous works, develop the love scenario sketched in the Elegies. Although the poems do not follow a strict chronological order, the main elements of the poet's love affair all appear. What makes this series stand out from the typical Renaissance love sonnets is the overt sensuality and emphasis on physical love. As a signal of her rejection of the Petrarchan tradition, "Non hauria Ulysse ne qualqun'altro mai [Never would Ulysses nor anyone else]," the first sonnet in the cycle, is written in Italian, a language she abandons for the following twenty-three. Fire and water appears again and provide the central metaphors of the sonnets. Love is associated with burning, with flames, with the sun, while the poet's tears provide the counterpoint. In an echo of Elegy II, her love does not grow cold despite her tears, nor are they sufficient to remedy the pain. The poet's corporality, "I am the body," plays with the convention of woman as body and man as soul/spirit. Sonnet 18 makes clear the poet rejects the model of the cold woman, epitomized by the goddess Diana, rather she is like a nymph who has succumbed a man she meets along the road. Sonnet 13, "Oh si j'estois en ce beau sein ravie" ["Oh if I were held to that handsome breast and ravished"] and Sonnet 17, "Baise m'encor, rebaise et baise" ["Kiss me again, kiss again, kiss"] suggest that the end to the poet's suffering is to be found through a sexual relationship. The erotic desire expressed is predicated reciprocity: "Give me one of your most loving [kisses]/I'll give back four more, hotter than coals." Nonetheless, these episodes are the fantasies of the poet who rebukes her short-lived love and hope that he now suffers as much as she. The closing sonnet, "Ne reprenez Dames si j'ay ayez" ["Ladies, do not blame me if I have loved"] ends the cycle with the theme of everywoman, and a cautionary note against suffering much for love as Labé has.

When read together, Labé's Oeuvres (Works) form a coherent whole, expressing views on theories of love, on women's role in society, and revealing one woman's transformation of the poetic conventions of her era.

Biography

Born in Lyon, probably between 1520 and 1524, daughter of Pierre Charly, a rope maker, and Etiennette Roybet. Received a private education including reading and writing Latin, Italian, possibly Spanish, horsebackriding, possibly fencing, and later music. Meets poet Clément Marot, 1536. In 1542 (according to a contemporary source), may have fallen in love with a soldier. In 1542 or 1543, married to Ennemond Perrin, also a rope maker, some twenty-five years her elder. In 1545, holds her own literary salon frequented by Lyons' leading poets, humanists, wealthy French and Italians, and others. 1548, first public criticism of Labé, followed by other attacks over a ten-year period. Possible liaison with the poet Olivier de Magny, 1553. Publication of Works in 1555, followed by three more editions in 1556. Husband dies sometime between 1555 and 1557. Died in Parcieux, at her country home outside Lyon, in 1564.

EDITH J. BENKOV

Selected Works

Oeuvres. Lyon: 1555.

Louise Labé. Oeuvres complètes de Louise Labé. François Rigolot, ed. Paris: Garnier-Flammrion: 1986.

Louise Labe's Complete Works. Translated and edited by Edith R. Farrell; with an introduction by C. Frederick Farrell, Jr. and Edith R. Farrell. Troy, NY: Whitston Publishing Company, 1986.

Further Reading

Baker, Deborah Lesko. The Subject of Desire: Petrarchan Poetics and the Female Voice in Louise Labe; With a Foreword by Tom Conley (Purdue studies in Romance Literatures; v. 11). West Lafayette, IN: Purdue University Press, 1996.

Cameron, Keith. Louise Labé: Renaissance Poet and Feminist. New York: Berg, 1990.

Rigolot, François. Louise Labé Lyonnaise, ou la Renaissance au féminin. Paris: Honoré Champion, 1997.

LACLOS, PIERRE CHODERLOS DE

---

1741–1803

French novelist

Les liaisons dangereuses

One of the most famous and superbly crafted of all eighteenth-century novels, Les liaisons dangereuses, is constructed with all the rigor of a piece of military engineering. The two principal characters, the Vicomte de Valmont and the Marquise de Merteuil, vaunt to each other, in a long series of letters that furnish the novel its backbone, complex amorous exploits they could not confide to anyone else.

Basically, there are two interlocking plots. The first, initiated by Merteuil, is the corruption of innocent Cécile de Volanges by way of a personal vengeance against Gercourt, whom Cécile is to marry, in which she enlists Valmont's help. The second is the seduction of the virtuous and angelic Mme de Tourvel by Valmont. Valmont and Merteuil make a sort of contract by which, after each succeeds separately, they will renew their own earlier liaison. In the unfolding of these separate and combined processes they demonstrate their ability to manipulate numerous simultaneous affairs without the marquise compromising her reputation for wisdom and virtue, and without Valmont losing his for glamour and desirability. A number of different axes of correspondence offer multiple perspectives on the unfolding events, but always, until near the end, their own dominates and steers the reader, who thus shares in their kind of godlike knowledge of everything that is going on. The virtuosity of the two protagonists as shrewd and witty letter-writers has always been recognized; another notable aspect of Laclos's originality is the differentiated styles lent to the numerous correspondents of the 175 letters that make up the novel.

Valmont and Merteuil have a system which they share, and which must remain their own secret: "I am tempted to believe that you and I are the only people in society who are really worth something" [je suis tenté croire qu'il n'y que vous et moi dans le monde qui valions quelque chose'] (letter 100). It is crucial to their game that one never fall in love, and thereby perhaps (it is a matter of interpretation) comes their downfall.

All the dangerous liaisons in this book are sexual ones, even though they have broader implications for a society where predators find easy victims, and all the more so that its rules harbor and protect them. Valmont's reputation is known to all, yet civility requires he be treated with the same politeness as anyone else of his rank; and even Madame de Tourvel, alerted early to her peril, is unable to undo the effects of his consummate acting when he claims to have reformed.

Critics have virtually all agreed that Merteuil is the stronger, and more intriguing, character of the two: not necessarily better drawn from a novelistic perspective, but endowed with the greater force. This fact she herself asserts and explains in terms of the social structure in her long, autobiographical letter 81: "born to avenge my sex and to master yours, I was able to create means previously unknown." This imbalance is the necessary result of their unequal social positions; the conventions of womanhood are in themselves formidable obstacles for her to overcome. Precisely because a man can be a rake openly whereas a woman's reputation would be undone by the same conduct, she has had to erect a superior level of understanding and dissimulation into a system in order to indulge herself the way Valmont can with much less effort. Their methodical strategic and psychological machine grinds inexorably forward, the conclusions being pretty much the logical working out of the original ingredients, which is indeed how these two characters imagine things—except that at some point their own complicity degenerates suddenly into war.

The ultimate breakdown of their relations admits of more than one explanation. One is that Valmont—despite himself—falls in love with Tourvel; this unavowed and, on his part, perhaps unrecognized passion undermines all his former principles, and because of this he cannot prevent his own destruction at the hands of Merteuil, before whom he cannot bear to lose face. Another is that he is fundamentally in love with Merteuil and always has been, and when finally spurned by her cannot resist, out of ire and frustration, defying her to the perilous limit. A third is that from the outset their own emulation coupled with rivalry, and finally antagonism, ultimately makes any truce between them, let alone a loving and constant relationship, totally impossible. Or one can hypothesize some combination of these factors, which are not mutually exclusive.

It is another aspect of the elegance and brilliant language of Merteuil and Valmont that for all their erotic preoccupations, nothing vulgar ever escapes their pens. Except for one letter of Valmont's written in the presence of a prostitute (letter 48), which is an explicit parody based on the conflation of sexual and amorous terminology, the designation of sexual acts is always more allusive than direct. Despite Valmont's allusion to the "technical terms" he teaches Cécile, no instruction in the mechanics of sex can be obtained from reading Les liaisons dangereuses, outside of the fact that it is often performed in bed and often at night; one cannot read this text to learn how to do it, as one can with many novels of sexual initiation such as L'École des filles or Histoire de Dom Bougre. Cécile and her beau Danceny are in a sense initiated along the way, but this is not a novel of sexual initiation: the main protagonists are not neophytes but veterans. The work has been subjected to a number of quite different interpretations, but Laclos's intentions, which are sufficiently indicated by both its title and epigraph (taken from Rousseau's Julie: "I have seen the morals of my time, and I have published these letters") are not in doubt. Perhaps not a moral novel, and certainly not a moralistic one, Les liaisons dangereuses depicts a society in serious crisis, morally rudderless and endlessly repeating its own errors, unable to regenerate itself. The fact that the reader shares the privileged perspective of the most morally deplorable characters, however, imposes a certain sympathetic empathy with them and thereby a degree of investment in their successes. Its posture thus has appeared to many ultimately ambiguous, as has its overall meaning.

Biography

Born in Amiens into a recently ennobled family of moderate means, Pierre François Ambroise Choderlos de Laclos was a career military officer, stationed notably in Grenoble, where he spent six years, and later in La Rochelle. Amidst several other writings and theatrical attempts, only his novel, which created a great and lasting sensation, has been broadly remembered, and he never had a full-fledged literary career. He entered the service of the Duke d'Orléans in 1788 and, though he became an active Jacobin and returned to the army as brigadier artillery general in 1791, narrowly escaped being guillotined with the duke (now Philippe Égalité) in 1793. He ended his career a general, commander of artillery in Naples under Napoleon, and died during military operations in that region.

PHILIP STEWART

Editions

The perduring Liaisons dangereuses has rarely been out of print, and since there are few textual problems almost any of the many available editions in French can be considered reliable. The reference standard is Laurent Versini's edition of Laclos's Œuvres complètes (Paris: Pléiade, 1979), which superseded that of Maurice Allem (1932) in the same series.

It has been translated many times, the first in 1784, anonymously, under the title Dangerous Connections. Ernest Dowson's translation of 1898 was entitled Les Liaisons dangereuses but became Dangerous Acquaintances in a 1940 reprint (London: Nonesuch). The title Dangerous Acquaintances was the one used by Richard Aldington in 1924, a version re-issued by numerous publishers over time under both that title and those of Dangerous Liaisons (Signet) and Les Liaisons dangereuses (Pocket Books, Bantam, Knopf, and others). P.W.K. Stone's version was published as Les Liaisons dangereuses by Penguin in 1961 and reproduced in 1997 in The Libertine Reader (New York: Zone). Other translations are by Lowell Bair (1962), Christopher Hampton (1985), Howard Davies (1986) and Douglas Parmée (1995).

Further Reading

- Alexandrian, Sarane. Les libérateurs de l'amour. Paris: Seuil, 1977.
- Bayard, Pierre. Le paradoxe du menteur: sur Laclos. Paris: Minuit, 1993.
- Belaval, Yvon. Choderlos de Laclos, Paris: Seghers, 1972.
- Brinsmead, Ann-Marie. Strategies of Resistance in "Les liaisons dangereuses": Heroines in Search of "Authority." Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen Press, 1989.
- Conroy, Peter V. Intimate, Intrusive, and Triumphant: readers in the "Liaisons dangereuses." Amsterdam: J. Benjamins, 1987.

LAFERRIÈRE, DANY

- Delon, Michel, P.A. Choderlos Laclos, "Les Liaisons dangereuses," Paris: PUF, 1986.
- Cazenobe, Colette. Le Système du libertinage de Crébillon à Laclos. SVEC 282 (1991).
- DeJean, Joan. Literary Fortifications: Rousseau, Laclos, Sade. Princeton University Press, 1984, pp. 208–252.
- Diaconoff, Suellen. Eros and Power in "Les Liaisons dangereuses," Geneva: Droz, 1979.
- Free, Lloyd R. ed. Critical Approaches to "Les 'Liaisons dangereuses,'" The Hague: Nijhoff, 1974.
- Goldzink, Jean. Le vice en bas de soie, ou le roman du libertinage. Paris: José Corti, 2001.
- Grapa, Caroline Jacot. Les "Liaisons dangereuses" de Choderlos de Laclos. Paris: Gallimard "Folio," 1997.
- Kamuf, Peggy. Fictions of Feminine Desire : disclosures of Heloise. University of Nebraska Press, 1982.
- Laufer, Roger. Style rococo, style des Lumières. José Corti, 1963, pp. 134–154.
- Poisson, Georges. Choderlos de Laclos ou l'obstination. Paris: Grasset, 1985.
- Pomeau, René. Laclos. Paris: Hatier, 1975.
- Pomeau, René. Laclos ou le paradoxe. Paris: Hachette, 1993.
- Rosbottom, Ronald. Choderlos de Laclos. Boston: Twayne, 1978.
- Stewart, Philip. Le Masque et la parole: le langage de l'amour au XVIIIe siècle. Paris: José Corti, 1973.
- Stewart, Philip. Rereadings. Birmingham, AL: Summa, 1984.
- Therrien, Madeleine. "Les Liaisons dangereuses": une interprétation psychologique. Paris: SEDES, 1973.
- Versini, Laurent. Laclos et la tradition: essai sur les sources et la technique des "Liaisons dangereuses." Paris: Klincksieck, 1968.

---

LAFERRIÈRE, DANY

---

1953–

Haitian and Canadian journalist and novelist

With the release in 1985 of Comment faire l'amour avec un nègre sans se fatiguer, translated and published in English two years later with an abridged and slightly modified title, How to Make Love to a Negro—which suggests a passivity of the black man absent of the original title—Dany Laferrière makes his entrance in literature. At the same time, he gets literary recognition and the reputation of an erotic provocative writer enhanced by his second book Eroshima (1987), which, beyond the echo to Duras' title, refers more to the bomb as metaphor of party or explosive woman than death. Moreover, this collection of short narratives is a version of "Paradis du dragueur noir" [Black Cruiser's Paradise] by the anonymous narrator-novelist of How to Make Love, nicknamed Vieux [Man] by his roommate, Boubou. Indeed, cut off from the original manuscript on request of the publisher, this fictional novel of How to Make Love, never quoted or summarized, becomes a real book, in which the main character-narrator is once again anonymous, but this time nicknamed Tosei by his mistress of Japanese descent, Hoki and becomes initiated to the erotic and literary Japanese world. Hence, unlike How to Make Love, in which Man mostly went around with young white Anglophone girls, in Eroshima, the narrator was more often with Asian women. He also shifted from a student world to the North American professional artistic milieu—photographs, mannequins, musicians, and so on—from Montreal to some of the world's capitals. Even though Eroshima seems more erotic than How to Make Love—the main character having first an erotico-exotic function, the lover or ex-lover of Hoki—each book describes less than ten short erotic scenes, of which some are rather fantasized as those of Man's neighbor Belzebuth, or the lesbians at Puerto Rico's International Airport in Eroshima. Like in life, one is talking more about sex than enjoying it.

These two books of the same mood and period—which belong to the so called North American part of Laferrière's works that critics like Dennis F. Essar or Jacques Pelletier contrast to the Haitian universe of novels as L'Odeur du café or Le goût des jeunes filles, even though this last narrative takes place in both spaces, and in Eroshima, some stories are framed in European or Caribbean capitals (Berlin, Port-au-Prince, San Juan, and so on)—are not truly erotic novels at first glance. Sex is rather a pretext, the “open sesame” to the gates of creativity, even fame. The first one, novel of a novel, concerns more the literary discourse or universe than eroticism. The second one, novel of celebration or vanity (as in vanity book), presents a series of real or virtual celebrity: Jean-Michel Basquiat, Denise Bombardier, Norman Mailer, V.S. Naipul, and so on. Moreover, in How to Make Love as in Eroshima, the status of the women depends on their links to the literary or artistic milieu, for the key women figures are mainly Miz Literature, the Quebec star, Carole Laure of which Man is always carrying a picture, the writer and journalist, Denise Bombardier, or Hoki, the photograph, friend of Leonard Cohen and John Lennon. Hence, to parody Sherry Simon’s title article on How to Make Love, in those stories the geopolitics of sex is sign of the narrator’s culture, at least sign of a quest of culture as jouissance.

Not until Laferrière’s fourth novel, Le goût des jeunes filles (1992)—of which the English title, Dining with the Dictator, erases its erotic feature and its Proustian reference—, and especially La chair du maître (1997), his eighth book, does one read his true erotic stories, those where sexual initiation, pleasure, and perversion are the main purpose. To some extent, politics is omnipresent in Dining, but it is rather the framework of the erotic performance. Indeed, the assumed fear, which push the young male protagonist to stay weekend long in the house of his neighbor, Miki, a den of “sharks,” which apparently are looking for him, is pretext to satisfy a very old curiosity—the desire to get into this (erotic) world of girls which fascinates him. Indeed, since the opening of fictional film framed in the novel, the voice over, which is that of the boy named Dany, stated clearly: “Miki’s house is on the other side of the street [...] I dream the day when, I, too, will go to heaven, across the street” (Dining 36).

The politics is also present in La Chair, even in the more erotic stories as “Nice girls do it also,” in which a white American girl forces her black lover to have sex with her, while her surprised mother is watching the couple without their knowing. In fact, the politics appears under the mask of sexual confrontation as one can see in the short story entitled, “l’Ange exterminateur,” when Tina (a poor misfit girl) assaults Anabelle (a very rich beauty), rapes her with rage, forces her to yap like a dog, and takes her pleasure from the suffering and degradation of her victim. Hence in La chair, the bed becomes a field for race or class struggle. This collection is no doubt Laferrière’s book which expresses more intensely what could be considered as his erotic poetics, which is quite different from the happy eroticism of his senior compatriot René Depestre, or Alix Renaud, probably the first Haitian to publish an erotic novel, À corps joie (1985). Inspired in part by Chester Himes—of which the Remington should be used to write Paradis du dragueur noir in Comment—Laferrière’s eroticism makes each partner a well defined socio-historical type, representative of a group fighting another one, using another for his own aims—which are never simply erotic. Indeed, it is less a matter of orgasm than control to enslave the other, to use him for showing or confirming power (of pleasure or over the pleasure), to gain access to a social status.

Laferrière said it so many times, his books form a whole, an “American autobiography.” However his collections of erotic stories (Comment, Eroshima, Le goût, La chair), even though they are part of this whole, get off to constitute an even more coherent set. A surprising erotic quartet, in which each piece borrows some features, characters, or even pages from the previous one, we move from literature as obsession (Comment) to the frontier of pornography (La chair).

Biography

Dany Laferrière, baptized Windsor Kléber Laferrière fils, was born in Port-au-Prince, on April 13, 1953. He attended the Christian Brother Elementary School of Petit-Goâve (1958–1964), a small town in the southeast of Haiti, where he was living after 1957 with his maternal grandmother, Da (Amélie Jean-Marie), which is a key figure in his life and in his novels, L’Odeur du café (1991, Prix Carbet de la Caraïbe), and Le charme des après-midi sans fin (1997). He went to secondary school until his graduation at the Canado-Haitian Academy (Collège Canado-Haïtien) of Port-au-Prince (1964–1972), a private Catholic School, but did not attend university. Instead, he jumped in to journalism mainly in two important media, which are central in the struggle for democracy in Haiti in the seventies: the cultural and political weekly magazine, Le Petit Samedi Soir (PSS), founded and directed by the well known Haitian writer and publisher Dieudonné Fardin, and Radio Haïti-Inter directed by the late famous Haitian journalist, Jean Dominique. As a reporter, he worked for the PSS in 1972–1976, then, from Montreal, as a foreign correspondent from 1976 until November 1980, when the Duvalier regime expelled almost all the independent journalists of Haiti; and he commented on cultural events on Radio Haïti until 1976, when he was forced to leave for Montreal after the assassination of his friend and colleague, Gasner Raymond, which is evoked in his novel, Le cri des oiseaux fous (2000). After returning to Haiti for six months in 1978, he decided to stay definitively in Montreal, even though he must often stay in New York where his wife, Margaret Andrée Berrouët (Maggie), was leaving until 1982, and where he wrote in part his first published novel, Comment faire l'amour avec un nègre sans se fatiguer (1985). The unprecedented success of this book in part allowed him to be hired as a presenter at the new Quebec TV station, Four Seasons (Les Quatre Saisons) in 1986, then in 1989 as a member of the Band of Six (la Bande des Six), a weekly challenging cultural TV show at Radio Canada. The same year, a film version of How to Make Love to a Negro, directed by Jacques W. Benoit on a script co-written by Laferrière and Richard Sadler, was released. It is probably his long involvement, even his mastering of the media world, one of the keys of his popular success, which push him to announce the end of his “American autobiography” with Je suis fatigué (2000), which is a farewell and a gift to his readers. Indeed, following a tradition of Haitian writers to freely give their books, this work was not sold. Since, after twelve years in Miami where he moved in 1990 with his family to have time and space to complete his “American autobiography,” Laferrière is back to Montreal (September 2002), as a columnist for the Montreal base newspaper La Presse, and had published a revised and enlarged edition of Cette grenade dans la main du jeune nègre est-elle une arme ou un fruit?, in Paris (Serpent à plume) and in Montreal (Vlb éditeur). In 2003, he shot his first film as director and screenwriter, Comment conquérir l'Amérique en une nuit, released in fall 2004.

JEAN JONASSAINT

Selected Works

- Comment faire l'amour avec un Nègre sans se fatiguer*. Montréal: Vlb Éditeur, 1985 (How to Make Love to a Negro, translated by David Homel, Toronto: Coach House Press, 1987; London: Bloomsbury, 1991).
- Éroshima*. Montréal, Vlb Éditeur, 1987 (Eroshima: A Novel. Translated by David Homel, Toronto: Coach House Press, 1991).
- L'Odeur du café*. Montréal: Vlb Éditeur, 1991 (An Aroma of Coffee, translated by David Homel, Toronto: Coach House Press, 1993).
- Le goût des jeunes filles*. Montréal: Vlb Éditeur, 1993 (Dining with the Dictator. Translated by David Homel, Toronto: Coach House Press, 1994).
- Cette grenade dans la main du jeune Nègre est-elle une arme ou un fruit?* Montréal: Vlb Éditeur, 1993 (Why Must a Black Writer Write About Sex? Translated by David Homel, Toronto: Coach House Press, 1994).
- La chair du maître*. Montréal: Lanctôt Éditeur, 1997.
- Le charme des après-midi sans fin*. Montréal: Lanctôt Éditeur, 1997.
- Le cri des oiseaux fous*. Montréal: Lanctôt Éditeur, 2000.
- J'écris comme je vis: entretien avec Bernard Magnier*. Genouilleux: La Passe du vent, 2000; Montréal: Lanctôt Éditeur, 2000.
- Je suis fatigué*. Vincennes: Initiales, 2000; Montréal: Lanctôt Éditeur, 2001.
- Cette grenade dans la main du jeune Nègre est-elle une arme ou un fruit?* Montréal: Vlb Éditeur, 2002; Paris: Serpent à plumes, 2002.

Further Reading

- Bordeleau, Francine. “Dany Laferrière sans arme et dangereux.” Lettres Québécoises 73 (1994): 9–10.
- Coates, Carrol F. “An Interview with Dany Laferrière.” Callaloo. 22, 4 (1999): 910–921.
- Coleman, Daniel. “How to Make Love to a Discursive Genealogy: Dany Laferrière’s Metaparody of Racialized Sexuality.” in Masculine Migrations: Reading the Postcolonial Male in 'New Canadian' Narratives. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1998.
- Desbiens-Magalios, Caroline. “Bed Companions.” Canadian Literature 150 (1996): 136–38.
- Essar, Dennis F. “Time and Space in Dany Laferrière’s Autobiographical Haitian Novels.” Callaloo. 22, 4 (1999): 930–946.
- Jonassaint, Jean and Anne Racette. “L’avenir du roman québécois serait-il métis?” Lettres Québécoises 41 (1986): 79–80.
- Laroche, Maximilien. “Manières de lit: érotique et politique.” In Bizango: Essai de mythologie haïtienne. Sainte-Foy (Québec): GRELCA (Groupe de Recherche sur les Littératures de la Caraïbe)/ Université Laval, 1997.

- Lenoski, Daniel S. "Versions of Vulgar." Canadian Literature 120 (1989): 236–38.
- Mathis-Moser, Ursula. Dany Laferrière: la dérive américaine. Montréal: Vlb éditeur, 2003.
- Miraglia, Anne Marie. "Dany Laferrière, l'identité culturelle et l'intertexte afro-américain." Présence francophone 54 (2000): 121–139.
- Nicolas, Lucienne. "Dany Laferrière." in Espaces urbains dans le roman de la diaspora haïtienne. Paris: L'Harmattan, 2002.
- Pelletier, Jacques. "Toutes couleurs réunies." Lettres Québécoises 73 (1994): 11–12.
- Ruprecht, Alvina. "'L'Amérique c'est moi': Dany Laferrière and the Borderless Text." in Alvina Ruprecht and Cecilia Taiana, eds. The Reordering of Culture: Latin America, the Caribbean and Canada in the Hood. Carleton (Ontario): Carleton University Press, 1995.
- Simon, Sherry. "The Geopolitics of Sex, or Signs of Culture in the Quebec Novel." Essays on Canadian Writing 40 (1990): 44–49.
- Vassal, Anne. "Lecture savante ou populaire: Comment faire l'amour avec un nègre sans se fatiguer de Dany Laferrière." Discours Social/Social Discourse 2,4 (1989): 185–202.

---

LATIN: PROSE FICTION

---

The Romans used several terms to describe works of prose fiction since there was no generic term for such writing in Classical Antiquity: fabula indicated quite generally a fictitious report or entertaining story (the term is recorded in the writings of the orator Cicero, 106–43 BCE); fictio, pretence or supposition, is first mentioned as a legal term (Quintilian, The Institutes of Oratory, 1st century CE); historia, originally from the Greek word meaning a question or enquiry, developed over time to include historical composition, a story or anecdote (factual, legendary, astonishing, or exemplary) and, in a general sense, information (there are examples in Cicero and in the works of the ancient rhetoricians); the designation historiae eroticae (from Erōs, the Greek god of love) was applied to love stories, but without the modern connotations of obscenity and lewdness; narratio was a story and the setting out of facts in a law speech (Terence, in his play Andria, 2nd century BCE); satura (or satira) meant a miscellany of prose and verse, a type of composition known from the Menippean Satires of Varro (116–27 BCE), a vehicle to correct the vices of his age. We meet the word specifically in the title of Petronius's Satyrice (less correctly Satyricon), a punning play on the use of this medley of styles, combined with an allusion to satyrs, the mythical creatures with unrestrained desires for sex and drink. It seems that our examples of extended Roman prose fiction most probably derive from the Greek romances which became increasingly popular in Latin translation from the 1st century BCE, though there could also have been a tradition of scurrilous native literature from which they may have derived several elements. It should be remembered that their educated readership would have been equally at home in either language. Two major examples survive from Roman times: Petronius's Satyrice (1st century CE), of which we possess some substantial fragments being only part of an extensive whole; and Apuleius's Metamorphoses (The Metamorphoses, or The Golden Ass, mid-2nd century CE), which has come down to us complete. Both seem to depend to a great extent on the traditional model of the Greek novel, only at several points to adapt and subvert it. Both are characterized in their different ways by literary sophistication (allusion, burlesque and parody, irony and rhetorical tropes). Both include material from low life, licentious humor (with an emphasis on voyeuristic scenes), and reference to death, the supernatural, and witchcraft. Both are first person narratives with inserted stories: in the surviving parts of Petronius we can read the tales of 'The Boy from Pergamum' (a homoerotic tale of a boy who increases the stakes when being seduced) and 'The Widow of Ephesus' (on the sexual weakness of women). In Apuleius there are a number of tales which are told by various characters, mainly about witches, murder, jealous husbands, and lustful wives, but the longest and most significant is an allegorical one about the love of Cupid and Psyche: Psyche, despite being forbidden to look on her anonymous lover, yields to feminine curiosity and the advice of ill-disposed women. Her trials and final apotheosis are paralleled in the main narrative by the tribulations and ultimate salvation of Lucius the Ass. But there are significant differences. Petronius, in addition to probably drawing inspiration from popular obscene Roman Mimes, which commonly featured whores, catamites, adulterers, and other lowlife subjects, may have had in mind something like the pederastic Greek Iolaus novel, of which a few scraps have survived. His work seems to have been built on the mock-heroic depiction of unworthy subjects and it satirises, most probably, the excesses of rhetoric and poetry in the age of the emperor Nero. There are examples of literary parody where scabrous elements are used to subvert the models of Homeric epic: the hero has incurred the wrath of Priapus, rather than of Poseidon; Circe, who is an enchantress in Homer's Odyssey, is here overfond of slaves and gladiators. Its characters are unashamedly disreputable: Encolpius and his boyfriend Giton are traveling around southern Italy (Campania) in the company of Ascyltus, a well-hung ex-slave, and Eumolpus, a lecherous poet. There are various erotic imbroglios among the four. Encolpius, Ascyltus, and Giton become involved with the brothel keeper Quartilla; they attend a pretentious banquet given by the vulgar nouveau-riche ex-catamite Trimalchio; Lichas and Tryphaena, who both seem to have enjoyed Giton's and Encolpius's favors in an earlier, now lost, episode discover our heroes as they seek refuge in Lichas's ship and become bent on revenge and sex; Encolpius seeks a cure for impotence from the worn-out priestess Oenothea. The fragments come to an end when the protagonists are in Crotona where legacy hunting is rife and a story is told of the women during the siege of Capua who became cannibals and ate their own children. The plot of Apuleius's Metamorphoses centers on the story of Lucius, a young man who meddles with witchcraft and is turned into an ass. The nucleus of the narrative can be found in the Greek Lucius attributed to the rhetor and satirical writer Lucian (2nd century CE), which, together with Apuleius's own tale, probably depends on an earlier Greek version. Furthermore, it is thought that some connection may exist with Lollianus's Phoinikika (extant in brief fragments), where an episode of fornication and human sacrifice is reminiscent of the description of the robbers' lair in the Metamorphoses. After many adventures, in the course of which he is the object of brutality, lust, wonderment, and contempt, Lucius regains his human form and dignity by celebrating the mystic rites of Isis and Osiris. Some of the female characters in the Metamorphoses are as full of lust and deceit as those in Petronius, but Apuleius also creates types of virtue and faithfulness, nearer to the ideal featured in the Greek Novel: Psyche, though inquisitive, is not vicious; Charite is an idealistic counterpart to the Widow of Ephesus.

Historians and compilers of historical anecdotes sometimes fleshed out their narrative with sensational details. Such is the case, for example, in the legendary part of the Roman History of Livy (59 BCE–17 CE) where the rape of Lucretia is described by telling how Tarquin, the last king of Rome, forced her with his drawn sword to yield as he threatened to slit her slave's throat and place him beside her as a decoy for suspicious relatives. In the first century CE, Valerius Maximus put together his Memorable Doings and Sayings [Facta ac dicta memorabilia]. Among a mass of material on virtues and vices, often with moralistic comment, there are stories on conjugal love (IV.6: husbands commit suicide on the death of their wives), on incest (V.7: King Seleucus with his stepmother Stratonice), on luxury and lust (IX.1: a certain Ptolemy marries his elder sister and rapes her daughter whom he then marries instead), on continence (IV.3: Drusus keeps his sexual activity confined to his wife—this is obviously seen as exceptional), on chastity (VI.1: the rape of Lucretia—again; a Tribune is accused of having tried to seduce his own son; a Triumvir is sentenced to death for having had sexual intercourse with a freeborn youth, who, he alleges, was in fact a prostitute), and on the fidelity of wives (VI.7). Another case in point is the Historia Augusta, a collection of biographies of Roman emperors from 117 to 284 CE (Hadrian to Numerian) probably composed at the end of the 4th century CE but whose authorship and purpose are much disputed. It is a work of fictionalized history which draws on some facts and a great array of false documentation and invented stories. Scholars do not agree as to the extent to which its narrative merits the modern label 'History,' but among several descriptions of excessive behavior it notably includes details of the sexual debauchery of Commodus (Emperor 180–192 CE), 'who defiled every part of his body in his dealings with persons of either sex,' and an exuberant account of the orgiastic feasts and sexual extravagances of the youthful emperor Elagabalus (Heliogabalus, who lived from circa 203 to 222 CE). Marius Maximus (3rd century CE) is referred to as an authority in the Historia Augusta and elsewhere, but his reputedly inventive and scurrilous series of imperial biographies is unfortunately now reduced to only a few fragments. Parthenius of Nicaea (1st century BCE), who lived in Rome and frequented literary circles there among whom his writings circulated, composed in Greek a collection of prose summaries of thirty-six rather startling love stories (Erōtika Pathēmata): there is incest and adultery, girls are forsaken by their young men, and lovers commit suicide or fall victim to murder or accidental death. Another perspective is offered by the Latin mythographers whose collections feature a large number of stories drawn from traditional sources. Among them the name of Hyginus (1st century CE), the supposed author of Fabulae and De Astronomia, is noteworthy. The first of these is a compilation which survives as an epitome of a larger handbook, designed, in all probability, to elucidate references to mythological subjects in the works of poets and playwrights. The stories recount a number of tales of the Olympian gods and goddesses together with their often strange lusts when they decided to pursue attractive nymphs or couple with human beings. Hyginus provides, for example, a list of the most beautiful men and youths, and gives the names of fathers and daughters who slept with each other unlawfully. He narrates the legend of Europa, who was changed into a cow when she was lustfully pursued by Jupiter, and tells the story of Semele who was consumed by fire when she asked Jupiter to reveal himself to her in all his glory as he came to her to make love. He recounts the rape of Philomela by Tereus who was already married to her sister Procne on account of which sexual violation the latter killed their son Itys and fed the corpse to his father. An incestuous version of this theme is narrated in the story of Harpalyce, daughter of Clymenus, who served up her offspring at a feast. The De Astronomia is keyed to the constellations and presents the myths which are connected with them. The section on Cygnus tells how Jupiter tricked Nemesis by changing himself into a swan and then nestled in her bosom, coupling with her while she slept. The chapter on Auriga describes how Vulcan fell in love with the chaste goddess Minerva, but when he tried to rape her she resisted and his sperm fell on the ground instead, engendering a son, Erichthonius. Many ancient scholars included such exemplary tales in the margins of the texts on which they were commenting: these exist as scholia and a number can also be found in later general compilations such as those ascribed to the three so-called Latin Vatican Mythographers (probably 9th century CE and later). Rather like the prose Narrationes which accompany the text of the Latin poet Ovid's (43 BCE–17 CE) Metamorphoses, these post-classical collections are not independent compositions. They do, however, provide us with incidental details of several erotic myths from earlier sources as, for example, the story of the virgin Caenis to whom Neptune, after they had made love, gave the ability to change her sex at will. In these chapters we can also read a retelling of the love story of Leander who swam the Hellespont each night to be with his beloved Hero, only finally to drown and cause her death by grief; a version of the bestial love of Pasiphae for the Cretan bull who mounted her; the legend of the Lemnian women who, all but one, murdered their husbands after being rejected by them because of the repulsive smell inflicted on all the wives by Venus; the story of Nyctimene, who had sexual intercourse with her father as a consequence of which she was transformed into a screech owl.

Of the antecedents to the Latin 'Novel,' however, perhaps the most significant are the so-called Milesian Tales [Milesiaca] which Apuleius in fact openly refers to and inserts in his work. These were short stories of an obscene nature and constituted a genre which probably originated with the collection of lubricious love stories (no longer extant) written in Greek by Aristides, probably in the late 2nd century BCE and apparently translated into Latin by the historian Lucius Cornelius Sisenna (1st century BCE). The Greek biographer and essayist Plutarch (2nd century CE) reports in his Life of the Roman general Crassus (died 53 BCE) that the Parthians attributed the effeminacy of the Romans whom they defeated at Carrhae to these Tales when they found copies of them in the looted baggage. But Latin fiction also owes a great deal to the tradition of rhetoric which was widely practiced in the ancient world. In Rome itself the Debates (Controversiae) of the Elder Seneca (philosopher and rhetorician, 1st century BCE) and the Set Speeches (Declamationes) of the rhetorician Quintilian both contain examples of shorter prose narratives which reflect the way in which such pieces could be worked up into longer stories. The Elder Seneca, for example, proposes as one of these rhetorical exercises the case of a woman who, though chaste, has accepted an inheritance from an admirer in her husband's absence: should the husband's plea for adultery succeed? Quintilian's collection presents a variety of situations which correspond well to the stories we find developed in fiction: there are examples of divorce, adultery, dishonor, and so on. They afford a good opportunity for the rhetorician to develop a psychological character study and emotional appeal. They also reflect, no doubt, the nature of contemporary society and the more exotic events familiar to the consumer of romantic tales: in one case a kidnapped virgin is placed in a brothel and is respected by all her clients except for one brutal soldier whom she kills. Is she guilty of murder? Somewhat similar events fill the anonymous Latin prose narrative of the History of King Apollonius of Tyre (Historia Apollonii Regis Tyri) (5th–6th century CE) which probably derives ultimately from a Greek model. Later it was to provide material for John Gower's Confessio Amantis, Shakespeare's Pericles and T.S. Eliot's Marina. The story is full of events: Antiochus, King of Antioch, lives incestuously with his daughter and beheads her suitors who fail to solve the riddle he sets. Apollonius, who has worked out the answer, is also vulnerable so he escapes and marries the daughter of the King of Cyrene instead. After several adventures he is separated from his wife, who, though apparently dead and therefore disposed of at sea, in fact survives anonymously in the Temple of Diana. A daughter, Tharsia, has been born to Apollonius, but she is captured by pirates and sold to a brothel keeper. She nevertheless preserves her virginity (the section which describes these events is relatively extensive, § 37–44). The

Historia has many twists and climaxes which are familiar from ancient romance: shipwrecks, pirates, virginity in danger, recognition scenes, and so forth. Finally, all the good characters are reunited, the prostitutes are set free, and Apollonius becomes king of Antioch, Tyre, and Cyrene. Another story, the Acta Pauli et Theclae, which constitutes part of the apocryphal acts of the Apostles, represents the Christian tradition at work on these basic plot elements. It is extant in Latin, though possibly written originally in Greek, and dates from the 2nd–3rd centuries CE. It has been described as recounting, 'quite in the manner of a novel and probably without any historical foundation' (Altaner), how Thecla was inspired through her love of Saint Paul to devote herself to Christ until she died at the age of 90. The sexual-romantic element here is covert rather than being explicitly revealed. The virgin Thecla has many adventures as she is dedicated to preserving her chastity: she escapes several potential martyrdoms (her pyre is quenched by a thunderstorm, the wild beasts in the arena fawn on her or devour each other, carnivorous seals float up dead to the surface of the water in which she was meant to drown, and so on). The Res gestae Alexandri Macedonis (commonly known as the Alexander Romance) represents a similar type of popular fictionalized history, full of extraordinary events and fabulous creatures, which circulated widely in antiquity and the middle ages. Julius Valerius (4th century CE) is the author of the extant Latin version of this story which derives from an earlier anonymous Greek version of uncertain date by 'Pseudo-Callisthenes.' There is a complex variety of sources for the narrative, most of which derive in all probability from the Hellenistic period (323–146 BCE). The 'Life' of Alexander the Great is here transformed into a wondrous tale which has only a slim connection with historical reality. Among the many marvels which Alexander witnesses on his travels, for example, is a hairy giant who consumes a naked woman who has been offered to him to test whether he has human feelings or not.

It is probable that the different forms of ancient fiction appealed to different audiences: both the idealized and the lower-life Greek romances were often more accessible than Homer's epics to a mass audience, many of whom could not in fact read; works like those of Petronius and Apuleius appealed to a sophisticated and probably cynical elite with a literary taste for parody and what we would term pornography, but which they would have regarded with quite legitimate amusement; stories like those of Paul and Thecla suited Christians who adapted existing narrative conventions to their religious needs.

PATRICK POLLARD

Selected Works

- Acta Pauli et Theclae*. English translation in New Testament Apocrypha. Edited by W. Schneemelcher and E. Hennecke, vol.2. London: Lutterworth Press, 1965.
- The Greek Alexander Romance*. Translated with an introduction and notes by Richard Stoneman. London: Penguin, 1991.
- Apollonius of Tyre*. Translated... by Paul Turner. London: The Golden Cockerel Press, 1956.
- Apuleius. The Golden Ass, or, Metamorphoses. Translated with an introduction and notes by E.J. Kenney. London: Penguin, 1998.
- Hyginus. The Myths [Fabulae and Poetica astronomia book I]. Translated and edited by Mary Grant. Lawrence, KS: University of Kansas Press, 1960.
- Parthenius. The Love Romances... with an English translation by Stephen Gaselee. Cambridge (Mass.) and London: Loeb, 1916 (often reprinted. In the same volume as Longus, translated by George Thornley, revised by J.M. Edmonds).

- Petronius. The Satyricon. Translated with introduction and explanatory notes by P.G. Walsh. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1996.
- Quintilian. The Major Declamations... A translation [by] Lewis A. Sussmann. Frankfurt am Main: Lang, [1987].
- The Scriptores Historiae Augustae*. With an English translation by David Magie. Cambridge and London: Loeb, 1922–1932.
- Valerius Maximus. Memorable Doings and Sayings. Edited and translated by D.R. Shackleton Bailey. Cambridge (Mass.) and London: Loeb, 2000.

Further Reading

- Bowersock, G.W. Fiction as History. Nero to Julian. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1994.
- Fantham, E. Roman Literary Culture. From Cicero to Apuleius. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1996.
- Hägg, T. The Novel in Antiquity. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1983.
- Harrison, S.J., ed. Oxford Readings in the Roman Novel. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Hofmann, H., ed. Latin Fiction. London: Routledge, 1999.
- Perry, B.E. The Ancient Romances. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1967.
- Santoro L'hoir, F. The Rhetoric of Gender Terms. Leiden: E.J. Brill, 1992.
- Walsh, P.G. The Roman Novel. 2nd edition. London: Bristol Classical Paperbacks, 1995.

---

LATIN: VERSE

---

Poetry came to Rome through Livius Andronicus, a schoolteacher who was taken captive when the Romans conquered Tarentum but was set free in 275 BCE to instruct the children of M. Livius Salinator. He translated Homer's Odyssey into Latin verse and is known to have composed dramas as well as a hymn to Juno. Although Cicero thought little of his work (Brut.71), Livius impressed the Romans to the extent that they granted permission to poets and stage artists to gather for religious purposes at the Aventine temple of Minerva. Still, the Romans of the third century BCE were too preoccupied with their national security to appreciate poetry, let alone erotic verse. Only after the destruction of Carthage in 146 BCE and the conquest of their Macedonian allies in 168 BCE could the Romans engage in their literary interests. The winner of the crucial battle of Pydna, P. Cornelius Scipio Aemilianus, seized with enthusiasm the break from military expeditions 'to satisfy his delight in all things Greek' (Mendell, Latin Poetry: The New Poets and the Augustans, 1965: 4). He gathered around him the so-called Scipionic Circle of aristocratic friends who shared his interest in literature and their artistic protégés including Terence and Lucilius. When the historian Polybius and later the Stoic philosopher Panaetius came from Greece, they joined their company and advanced intellectual activity in Rome. In the following pages an overview of the main Roman poets will focus on their treatment of erotic themes.

Early Roman Comedy

Popular Roman literary production in the third and second centuries BCE was dominated by the writings of Quintus Ennius (239–169 BCE), an epic poet who also translated Greek dramas and by the work of Titus Maccius Plautus (250–184) who composed comic plays in the manner of Menander (New Comedy). Although Plautus was often inspired by love affairs and in many of his plays the plot evolves around an erotic relationship, the focus of the dramatization is directed on the numerous misunderstandings that surround the relationship and cause the comic effects. The lives and loves of ordinary Romans shine through his work with all the social oppression that forces the females to conspire in order to achieve their goals. Common misogynistic prejudice, financial worries, class compatibility, and romantic youths that persist in their loves are typical themes repeated in Plautus' plays. The sexual jokes, numerous and often rather coarse, are habitually exchanged between the slaves of the households discussed. Plautian comedies often include a 'rape,' which typically takes place during a night festival under the influence of wine; yet the guilty youth appears always to be sincerely in love with his victim and overcomes all obstacles in order to correct his misbehavior by marrying the girl. Terence (Publius Terence Afer) also wrote comic plays in the tradition of Menander and Plautus most of which were produced in the 160s. Terence, who renders the Greek setting and ambiance of his literary models more convincingly than Plautus, used ingeniously his prologues to reply to the accusations of his critics. His work is also distinguished for the sensitivity with which he depicted the female psyche and their social disparity in Roman society (see his Hecyra). Both Plautus and Terence exercised great influence on the depiction of women and love affairs in later Latin elegy, particularly in Ovid's work. The misogynistic stereotypes they ridicule in their poetry seem to undermine the contemporary prejudice of traditionalist Romans.

The Neoterics

The opening of Rome to the material and intellectual wealth of the eastern Mediterranean soon became synonymous with an egotistic infatuation of the Roman elite with Greek literature at the expense of an impoverished proletariat. This soon led to inevitable social unrest which was to overtake the Roman public scene for almost an entire century until Augustus' decisive victory over Antony and Cleopatra at Actium in 31 BC which re-established peace and order amid general exhilaration. During his reign the so-called 'Neoteric poets,' inspired by Callimachus' literary revolution that urged for small, elegant poetic forms and departure from heroic epics, celebrated erotic sentiment most enthusiastically.

The new poets favored from the political pre-occupations that kept the Roman elite away from their literary pastimes, set about to render a more personal and authentic expression to Roman eroticism. Valerius Cato, Calvus, Cassius, Cinna, Tigidas, Caecilius, and Catullus for whom we are better informed, were among the pioneers of this new trend that encouraged the composition of erotic poetry in Latin. Lucretius, a contemporary of Catullus, was also a neoteric poet in his own right, although he was mainly inspired by Epicurean philosophy. The immense impact of the neoterics is obvious even on their critics like Horace, while in their steps Propertius, Tibullus, and Ovidius, developed Latin erotic elegy to its most fortunate moments. Vergil, who did not shy from writing his Aeneid in epic hexameters, welcomed their innovations which he evidently applied in his work.

Lucretius (97/94 –55/51 BCE) composed his hexametric poem De Rerum Natura under the influence of the Epicurean thought around the middle of the first century BCE. His work, probably published by Cicero posthumously (Eusth.Chrn. apud St. Jerome; Cic.QFr.2.10.9), proclaims that sensation is the basis of all knowledge. At the end of the fourth book of the De Rerum Natura. Lucretius sets on a vehement attack on romantic love (DRN4.1037–1287). In these lines, Lucretius, who develops a metaphor between sexual desire and injury, stresses the addictive character of sexual intercourse which can be compared with that of thirst or hunger. Sex, food, and drink are seen as major temptations to the self-control of the individual;

however, the fact that hunger can be satiated unlike sexual desire stresses the less urgent nature of this need. Although Lucretius acknowledges the natural and agreeable side of sexual consummation, he is strongly opposed to falling in love. In a misogynistic mood he argues that all women are similar and dismisses melodramatic claims of lovers that they cannot live without the object of their desire. In Epicurean thought sex is a natural function of the body described in very mechanical terms and stripped from any nuances of emotion. In fact, the Epicurean doctrine teaches that love, sex, and friendship should be kept separate and marriage should be avoided at all costs. The danger of becoming emotionally involved and therefore, irrational threatens the core Epicurean vision of tranquility. The decision about whether one should indulge in one's sexual appetite should be determined by an evaluation of the danger involved. For example, daughters of prominent people, women likely to spread rumors, or unwilling women should be avoided. Although early Christianity did not approve of his rejection of gods and St. Jerome perpetuated a tradition according to which Lucretius wrote his verses in breaks of sanity, maddened by a love-potion his wife had given him, his prestige among the writers of the early empire is beyond doubt (e.g., Verg.G.2.490–2). Although Lucretius composed in the tradition of the philosophical poetry of Empedocles (Peri Physeōs) and the Hellenistic didactic poetry of Aratus and Nicander, he employed in his work a wide range of Greek and Latin erotic poetry including among others Sappho fr.31 (DRN3.152–8), Callimachus fr.260.41 (DRN6. 753), and Antipater of Sidon Anth.Pal.7.713 (DRN4.181–2).

Catullus (84–54 BCE) came to Rome in 62 BCE, probably under the pretext of undertaking a career in politics, but he soon met Valerius Cato and possibly studied under him. He fell deeply in love, probably with Clodia, sister of Publius Clodius, a sworn opponent of Cicero (Pro Caelio), and she became the Muse of his poetry. Clodia appears to have been an extremely cultured and charming, yet dangerous woman, who had been suspected of murdering her husband. In a series of elegant short poems, Catullus addressed her with the pseudonym Lesbia to recall Sappho of Lesbos whose influence on Catullus is ubiquitous; his verses express all the nuances of his obsession with her from early passion and tenderness to the hatred and disillusionment that overwhelmed him when he realized she had been unfaithful. Catullus' erotic visions are tormented by his devastating passion, his mistress' infidelities that fill him with anxiety and despair, and his drunken downfalls in local taverns where he meets underground characters like prostitutes and pimps. He does not hesitate to degrade his enemies with bold sexual insults spiced with all his vehement hatred. He lived the life of a real bohemian lover and was unsurprisingly the real life model of all later elegists. Of the 116 poems attributed to him, three (18–20) are almost certainly spurious. Catullus' work which survived thanks to the fortunate discovery of a manuscript in the early 14th century includes, besides the Lesbia poems, poems addressed to his young friend Juventius and epigrams whose tone ranges from pleasant to irreverent to obscene. He also wrote elegies and a few long poems, notably Attis and a nuptial poem honoring Thetis and Peleus in resonance of Sapphic bridal songs. Catullus was distinguished for his vigorous satire as well as his ability to render his personal emotions in Latin with such perceptiveness and intensity. He was influenced by the Alexandrian poets and drew much on previous Greek poetry regarding forms and meters, but his genius surpassed all models. His lyricism remains beyond compare (Havelock, The Lyric Genius of Catullus, 1967), while the influence of epigram in his poems is also sound (Aul. Gell.Noc.Att.19.9.10–14; Cic.De. nat.deor.1.79, 3.194).

Vergil (70–19 BCE) had become acquainted with the Epicurean philosophy early in his career. Most of his poetry is directed towards a philosophical solution to the trauma of the civil war which had left its ugly mark on the Roman psyche. His first collection of poems, the Eclogues (39–38 BCE) and even more so, his Georgics (30 BCE) employ erotic themes only to suggest a different way of channelling passion in the service of the community which will prosper again under the benevolent reign of Augustus. In the Eclogues, composed in the spirit of Theocritus' bucolic poetry, the unfortunate lover Daphnis, celebrated along Orpheus and other pastoral figures that naively sing about their erotic pangs and the powerful spells of love, is posthumously transformed into a divine agent of cosmic energy that benefits the whole countryside (Ec.3 and 5.42f.). The futility of wasted erotic energy directed towards solitary objects of desire in comparison with cosmic eros that rules all creation is underlined. Daphnis' transformation into a positive and restorative power is similar to that of the recently assassinated Caesar who was believed to have joined the ranks of the Olympians. In his Georgics Vergil promoted the image of the farmer as the symbol of a peaceful yet determined agent of the Augustan era in keeping with the agricultural character of traditional Roman societies (Cato Agr.2; Gale, Virgil on the Nature of Things: the Georgics, Lucretius and the Didactic Tradition, 2000: 252–9). In the third book of the Georgics, Vergil appears occupied with two kinds of love: the fecundity of the carefully disciplined animals and the blind, passionate love which released violent and uncontrolled energies. The tale of Hero and Leander, placed at the end of the third book exemplifies the tragic results of maddening love in humans in truly elegiac mood; in fact, Vergil repeatedly treated in his work elegiac themes with which he was obviously very familiar (cf. Ec.10). The influence of Lucretius on the Georgics is pervasive and both poets had strong feelings against civil strife. The fourth book of the Georgics features the tragic tale of Orpheus and Eurydice, in a version which is often accepted as Vergil's own invention (cf. Ov.Met.10.1–10, Anagnostou-Laoutides, Eros and Ritual: Singing of Atalanta, Daphnis and Orpheus, 2005: 321ff.). The tale has been arguably interpreted as a chiasmic comparison between pathetic, overemotional poets/lovers represented by Orpheus and Vergil and decisive, resolute leaders like Aristaeus and Augustus in an attempt to illustrate the right course of action for achieving the Roman paligenesis.

For the rest of his life Vergil worked on the Aeneid, a national epic in hexameters honoring Rome and foretelling prosperity to come. Vergil made Aeneas the paragon of the most revered Roman virtues such as devotion to family, loyalty to the state, and piety, qualities that Aeneas shares with his distant successor, the emperor Augustus. In twelve books, Vergil tells how Aeneas escaped from Troy and managed after several adventures to establish the beginnings of the Roman state. In book four a storm carries him to the shores of Carthage, where he meets and falls in love with queen Dido. The passion with which the Carthaginian Queen surrenders to Aeneas is narrated in truly elegiac spirit: trapped in the antagonism of Hera and Venus, Dido has no chance of surviving her maddening love and she commits suicide having betrayed her kingdom and the memory of her dead husband (cf. Ov.Her.7). With his swan-song Vergil became the most important and most influential Roman poet and his aura continued to charm audiences through the Middle Ages.

Horace (65–8 BCE) was also affected by the violent era that followed the assassination of Julius Caesar and in fact, served at Philippi on the side of Brutus. His political preferences changed progressively when he launched a most successful poetic career under the benefaction of Maecenas, Augustus' 'Minister of Arts.' Yet his poetry remained particularly preoccupied with the political reality of his days and historical references became gradually more abundant in his poems. His first attempts at writing, named Iambi/Epodes witness the sound influence of the lyric poet Archilochus. Several of these poems are written in a strong satirical mood (Ep.4, 6, 10, 12) while others treat elegiac motifs such as the unbearable torture of love (Ep.11) or even elegiac characters such as the ruthless, unfaithful mistress (Neaira, Ep.15) or the dangerous witch who would go at any length in order to prepare a strong love potion (Canidia, Ep.12). In 35 BCE, Horace published his first book of Sermones (also known as Satirae), which is also distinguished for its satirical approach in the tradition of Lucilius and of Greek comedy, including references to sexual issues (Serm.1). Although Horace was evidently familiar with the elegiac motifs which he occasionally transmuted into Latin lyric verse, he treated love in a rather superficial and playful tone. His second book of the Sermones (32 BCE) containing numerous references to the Stoic dogma which Horace had by then embraced, also marked a departure from erotic themes (Serm.2.3, 7). Horace's next project that attracted his fancy for seven whole years was the composition of his lyric poems, published in four volumes under the title Carmina. Here and despite his preoccupation with national issues, Horace did not refrain from the occasional erotic composition such as the sensual ode to Pyrrha or the playful ode to Lydia (Carm.1.5, 8). The other three books of his Carmina range from discreet to patent support of the Augustan program (cf. Carm.3.1–6, the so-called Roman Odes). Among his other major compositions Horace also produced in the last years of his life the famous Ars Poetica, offering advice to young, ambitious poets of his age on how to achieve the desired dramatic effect. This work enhances the perception that Horace filtered erotic passion through the rules of poetry and viewed love as an amusing and rather complimentary theme to the major historical issues of his time that dominated his poetry. His poems, distinguished for having uniquely reconciled the Epicurean and Stoic philosophical theories, largely refer to passion (including sexual promiscuity) as a sign of emotional imbalance and wickedness, such as his famous ode to Cleopatra (Carm.1.37).

Latin Elegiac Poets

Gallus (69–29 BCE) is a very enigmatic figure for whom scanty information survives, although all elegiac poets acknowledge him as their model and a most influential poet in the transmission of Hellenistic poetry from Alexandria to Rome (Ov.Tr.4.10.53). Gallus is known to have composed four books of elegies, probably under the title Amores, addressed to Volumnia Cytheris, a mistress of Mark Antony, under the pseudonym Lycoris. Very few verses of his poems have been recovered from a papyrus found in 1978 in Egyptian Nubia, although Vergil's tenth Eclogue, in which Vergil tries to console Gallus for his desertion by Lycoris, offers an insight to the content of Gallus' poetry. He also wrote a poem about the Grynean grove of Apollo in the fashion of Eurphorion (Serv.ap.Ecl. 6.72) and was a friend of Parthenius who had composed in hexameters a short collection of erotic tales with the title Erotica Pathemata for the use of his friend. His influence on the character of Latin elegiac poetry as developed in the works of Propertius and Tibullus has been vital; based on Catullus' groundwork, Gallus appears to have created the basic script for the unfortunate relation between a cruel mistress and her enslaved victim.

Tibullus (55/48–19 BCE), a rather good-looking young poet of the provincial nobility and relatively wealthy despite his claims of the opposite (Hor.Epist.1.4), wrote three books of elegies, known as Corpus Tibullianum. He had won military awards as a soldier and addressed his poetry to M. Valerius Messalla Corvinus, an eminent Roman statesman. Only the first two books belong to Tibullus himself, while the third was divided into two by Italian scholars of the fifteenth century. Although the dates of publication are uncertain, the poems contain some possible clues. His first book contains ten lengthy elegies dealing with his love for Delia whose name seems to indicate her association with the Apolline light. The structure of the collection has been often debated, yet it is accepted that Horace's Sermones, also consisting of ten poems, must have been his model (Littlewood, The symbolic structure of Tibullus' Book I, 1970, Latomus 29.2: 661–669). Apuleius (Apol.10) verified that Delia actually existed and her real name was Plania, although her erotic persona in Tibullus' poetry appears quite conventional. In fact, it could be argued that despite his technical versatility, Tibullus' representation of love is rather artificial and unconvincing with regards to the depth of his passion. His erotic claims are always permeated by a dose of irony and a playful mood, displayed in his effort to elicit erotic advice from the highly sexed god Priapus (Tib.1.4), and even when the poet imagines himself on the brink of death for the love of his mistress (Tib.1.3). Tibullus remained in reality a lover of the peaceful countryside and he viewed love as the perfect complement to his vision of domestic bliss. His first book began with an abnegation of military career, in favor of an abstemious life in rural felicity (cf. 1.10). This agricultural sense of fulfilment protected by traditional Roman gods, such as the Lares and Pales, is completed when Delia's presence is added (Tib.1.57–8). A gentle dandy dedicated to the tender moments he shared with his mistress, Tibullus justifies the opinion of Quintilian that he was the most refined and elegant of the Roman elegists (Inst.10.1.93). His anger at his mistress' infidelities is but a bitter complaint for his betrayed emotions (Tib.1.5 and 6) and his vengeance takes the form of having an affair with a beautiful boy (Tib.1.8 and 9) or of daydreaming that he dies in a distant land far from her treacherous embrace (Tib.1.3; Campbell, Tibullus Elegy 1.3, 1973, YCS 23). Tibullus' revels are literary exercises in adapting Alexandrian material (Tib.1.2; cf. Anth. Pal.5.137) and certainly in comparison with Propertius' his verses lack the emotional intensity or the illusion of maddening passion that the latter achieves. His long elegies allowed him to treat numerous themes in each elegy. He combined various patterns with transitions which often were considered too smooth to convince critics of his poems' unity (Lee, Tibullus Elegies, 1990).

Many of the motifs he treats are also found in Propertius' poetry such as the witch (Prop.1.19 / Tib.2.41), the vanity of the women's adornment (Prop.2.1 / Tib.8.9), the friend who is envious of the lover's happiness (Prop.5.1 / Tib.2.87), the rich rival (Prop.8a2/Tib.5.47), the komoi outside the beloved's door (Prop.16.17 / Tib.1.56), the love of young boys (Prop.20.6/Tib.4.3), the worthlessness of riches in love (Prop.14.15/ Tib.2.75), the comparison between the lover and the soldier (Prop.4.19/Tib.1.53), the value of poetry in love (Prop.7.5/Tib.4.15), or the role of the magister amoris (Prop.10.19/Tib.4. 9f.). Tibullus prefers metaphors of every day life rather than resorting to Greek mythology for his erotic imagery and seems to be closer to a Hesiodic approach of poetry with regards to the fulfilment he finds in simple country life. In addition, his poems are distinguished for their sense of religiosity which rules nature and everyday activities (Tib.1.11–14). His second book celebrates a different mistress, Nemesis (Tib.2.3, 4, 6) whose name as well as her character alludes to the darkness of night. Nemesis is a courtesan of the higher classes and enjoys the attention of many admirers. She is an urban creature fanatically devoted to the pursuit of wealthy lovers and a far outcry from the simple beauty of Delia or the idyllic country-house of Tibullus' erotic happiness. The third book of Tibullus' poems begins with six elegies by Lygdamus; it contains the Panegyricus Messallae, five poems on the love of Sulpicia for Cerinthus (known as the Garland of Sulpicia) and six short poems by Sulpicia herself. The poems on Sulpicia could be possibly written by Tibullus. The book concludes with an elegy allegedly written by Tibullus, and an anonymous epigram.

Sulpicia who composed poetry under Domitian was mentioned by Martial (10.38.12–14). Apparently she wrote erotic poems for Calenus, her husband of 15 years. Her poetry was distinguished for its sensual tone (Mart.10.35.38) and although we only have one short fragment of hers, Sulpicia is frequently mentioned in later poetry (Auson.218.10; Sidon.Carm.9.261; Fulgent.Myth.1.4). A poem of the late fourth or early fifth century AD, written in her name, is traditionally included in the later collection Epigrammata Bobiensia. Here Sulpicia appears as castigating the suppression of philosophers, including Calenus, during the reign of Domitian.

Propertius (54 /47–2 BC) came from a noble family of Perugia and settled in Rome around 34 BC. There he met Hostia, a native of Tibur (Apul.Apol.10) who was to monopolize his poetry under the pseudonym Cynthia. Ovid maintains that Propertius was his senior and that he was third in the sequence of elegiac poets, following Gallus and Tibullus. He wrote four books of elegies and he probably published his first book before October 28 BC. Its publication placed him in the first rank of contemporary poets, and procured his admission to the literary circle of Maecenas (cf. Prop.2.1; 3.9). His poems have been often characterized as difficult, obscure, and full of syntactic inconsistency. Occasionally commentators have doubted even his Latinity and it was only the intensity of his passion that deemed his poetry worth reading (Inst.10.1.93; cf. Plin.Ep.9.22). The structure of his first poetic collection, also known as the Monobiblos, was the subject of numerous scholarly exercises (Skutch, The Structure of the Propertian Monobiblos, 1963, CPh 58; Williams, Tradition and Originality in Roman Poetry, 1968; Otis, Propertius' Single Book, 1965, HSCPh 70; Camps, Propertius Book 1, 1961). Characteristic of Propertius' love poetry is the claim that he is enslaved to the charms of his mistress as well as that he is a soldier in the name of love (1.6.29f.). Typical too of his love poetry is his abundant and romantic use of mythological figures who serve as reminiscences of a glorious past to which the poet and Cynthia should aspire to. Book two (which some think is an amalgamation of two books by a later hand), is still largely devoted to love poems. Book three has a greater diversity of subject matter than the first two books and in book four Propertius attempted to write aetiological poetry under the influence of Callimachus' Aetia (Prop.3.1; 3.3; 4.1.64). Although some of his poems are fragmentary and several corrupted or disarranged, Propertius' genius shines through his elaborate verses. Propertius is thought to have achieved the most systematic use of erotic motifs from the Garland of Meleager, a collection of epigrams that had created a literary fashion in Rome and had also influenced Catullus. Since

Meleager came to be admired for his 'double talent of versatility in treatment and felicity in expression,' we might assume that Propertius' style owes much to the Hellenistic epigrams of his master (Gow-Page, The Greek Anthology, 1965: vol.2.592). Meleager, also admired for his skilful turn of expression and his passionate descriptions, had first cultivated the image of the elegiac komastis, who unable to resist his amorous addiction spends his nights on the threshold of his relentless mistress (Prop.1.16.13-4 and 31-2 /Mel.Anth.Pal.5.191.5-8; 12.23.3-4), often urged by wine (Prop.1.3.13-6; Mel.Anth.Pal.12.119; 12.85.3-6; 12.117.1-5). The impact of Meleager on Propertius' erotic vision can be distinguished in direct linguistic echoes, in overlapping conceptual complexes in the two authors and in their use of the same topoi. Hence, Meleager's description of the violent attack of Eros who implants his feet on the head of his innocent and inexperienced victims appears in the first verses of Propertius' programmatic elegy of the Monobiblos (Mel.Anth.Pal.12.101.3-4; 12.48.1 / Prop.1.1.1-4). Other Meleagrian verses that found their way to Propertius' poetry include the claim that Cynthia was the first woman who touched the poet with her love (Anth.Pal.12.101; 12.23.1-2; cf. Prop.1.12.20; 1.15.32); in fact, she 'captured' Propertius with her erotic eyes (Anth.Pal.12.101.2; 12.109.1-2; cf. Anth.Pal.12.144; 12.110.1-4; 12.83.3-4; 12.113). Propertius employs exquisite epithets to describe Love in correspondence to Eros' characterization in Meleager; therefore amor improbus (e.g. Prop.1.1.6) matches the shameless nature of Love in Meleager (Anth.Pal.5.57). Love is presented as a feathered archer (Prop.1.6.23; 1.7.15; 1.9.20-4/ Mel.Anth.Pal.5.177.1-4; 5.178.2-7; 5.179.1-6; Anth.Pal.12.144; 12.76.1-2; 12.48.3; 5.198.6; 12.109.3), who inflicts an erotic wound to his victims like the elegiac mistress (Prop.1.1.9-16/ Mel.Anth.Pal.12.72; 12.80.1-2; 5.163.3-4). Love is like fire burning the poet's soul (Prop.1.5.5; 1.9.17; 1.13.23 /Mel.Anth.Pal.12.80.4; 12.48.3; 12.76.2; 12.82; 12.83.1-2; 5.176.6), an obsession (Prop.1.1.7; 1.5.3; 1.13.20/ Mel.Anth.Pal.12.48.3-4; 5.139.6) that moves him to tears (Prop.1.5.15; 1.6.23-4 /Mel.Anth.Pal.12.80.1) and renders him helpless (Prop.1.15.1-8; 1.8a.13-4/ Mel.Anth.Pal.5.24; 5.178.9-10; 5.179.9-10) to its endless torture (Prop.1.1.33-4; Mel.Anth.Pal.12.158.5-8; AP5.112). Propertius also cultivates the idea that love abolishes logic, often found in Meleager's epigrams (Anth.Pal.12.117.3-5; cf. Anth.Pal.5.24). Motifs such as the praise of a mistress' beauty (Pr.1.2.1-8 and 27-9/ Mel.Anth.Pal.5.140; 5.139, 195, 195bis, and 196), especially when asleep and surrendered in unfaithful dreams, as often the poet fears (Prop.1.3.27-36 /Mel.Anth.Pal.5.191; cf. Anth.Pal.12.125; 5.151.7-8, 152.5-6, 166, 174), the pattern of warning a friend for love's hardship (Prop.1.5.27-30 /Mel.Anth.Pal.12.72.5-6), of being jealous of rivals (Prop.1.11.5-8; 1.16; 1.9.5-8/Mel.Anth.Pal.5.166.1-7; 5.160.1-2; 5.191.5), of a mistress' ability to lie (Prop.1.15.1-8 and 33-42/Mel.Anth.Pal.5.24; 5.175, 184) and her ultimate infidelity (Prop.1.15.1-8/Mel.Anth.Pal.5.175) are also traced in both poets. Love is difficult to bear (Prop.1.6.23/Mel.Anth.Pal.12.132b.1); it reduces the lover to its prisoner (Prop.1.9.20; 1.5.12; Mel.Anth.Pal.12.158.3-4; 12.119; 12.158) crashing his steadfast spirit (Prop.1.9.1-4; 1.1.28; Mel.Anth.Pal.12.141.5-6; 12.119.3-4; AP12.132.1-5; AP12.132 and 132a). Propertius' ingenious adaptation of his models could only add to the superlative quality of his descriptions. His powerful erotic imagery captures the essence of Latin elegiac poetry.

Ovid (43 BC-17 CE) had studied rhetoric at Rome before choosing poetry over a career in politics (Sen.Controv.2.2.8-12; Tr.1.2.77-8; Pont.2.10.21ff.). His early erotic poems, the Amores, published for the first time between 25 and 15 BCE, impressed his contemporaries and he eventually attracted the attention of the emperor Augustus. His love poems, composed in elegiac couplets, include the Amores, the Ars Amatoria, the Remedia Amoris, and the Medicamina Faciei. Ovid was a keen adherent of the Alexandrian poets and Callimachus' Aetia is accepted as a strong influence on his poetry. Ovid is also distinguished for his constant inversion of conventional elegiac motifs and for his sense of irony, which is reminiscent of Catullus' sarcasm. He made extensive use of comic themes in his elegies and his work has been criticized for reducing Roman elegy to unsophisticated ridicule (Quint. Inst.10.1.88, 98). It has also been argued that his excessive dependence on his literary models is indicative of his lack of original inspiration. His Amores, initially published in five books, reappeared in three BCE in just three. The poems mainly praise the charms of Corinna, the poet's mistress, who appears to have been a fictional character. The poems rework several motifs introduced in the poetry of Propertius and the comic plays of Plautus. Ovid who is very confident about the fame his work will enjoy in posterity (see Met. 15.870–9) is using among other techniques hyperbole and theatrical asides addressed to himself or to his audience in order to convince the reader of the sincerity of his experiences. However, by overstating his elegiac persona Ovid is stressing the incredibility of the elegiac lover as treated in the works of Propertius and Tibullus, where he is given a pretentious, melodramatic, and impossibly romantic character. Unlike previous poetry, in Ovid's verses the lover is often successful and willing to devote himself to love in the comforting notion that it is all a game. In the Ars Amatoria (Sen. Controv. 3.7.2), a didactic poem on how to be successful in love, Ovid employs explicit erotic imagery. His vivid descriptions allow us an almost realistic glimpse of the social life in Augustan Rome where the newly found peace had led to a relaxation of morality. The Ars Amatoria was designed as a sequence to the Amores, with which it shares several thematic links. However, here Ovid achieves a more complete comparison of art with love. The Remedia Amoris (Rem. 155–8), written between the first BCE and the second century CE was conceived as a kind of recantation of the Ars Amatoria, which concludes Ovid's early work on elegiac motifs. Still in didactic mood, having taught the readers how to secure the affection of their beloved, Ovid now offers advice on how to escape complicated erotic situations. The Heroides is an imaginary series of letters written by ancient mythological heroines to their absent lovers. The authorship of Her. 15, written allegedly by the poetess Sappho, is often contested. The letters are distinguished for their use of rhetoric device and of the erotic monologue which had briefly appeared in Propertius (Prop. 1.18; 4.3), as well as for their adaptation of the Euripidean analysis of female psychology. Sometime before the composition of the third book of the Ars Amatoria, Ovid wrote the Medicamina Faciei, yet another didactic poem about the cosmetics for the female (Ars Am. 3.205–6). Only a hundred verses survive from this work which follows in the tradition of Nicander's Theriaca and Alexipharmaca.

Ovid also composed the Metamorphoses in fifteen books of hexameters. This most influential poem is a collection of myths that relate miraculous transformations. The narration begins with the creation of the world from chaos and finishes with the posthumous catasterism of Caesar. The rest of the books engage mainly with erotic misconducts of gods and men who are often punished by being transformed into animals or plants. The tales are linked together with a number of thematic associations that render to the work an illusion of cohesion. The idea of collecting metamorphic myths was very popular in the Hellenistic period: Nicander of Colophon, Parthenius and the obscure Boios whose Ornithogonia was apparently adapted by Aemilius Macer, a friend and contemporary of Ovid (Tr. 4.10.43), had all produced such collections, although none of them survived to this day. His other poems focus on the adversities of living in exile to which Ovid was sent in 8 BC. Through his reworking of elegiac themes from a comical point of view and his bold experimentation with the forms and meters of ancient literary genres, Ovid advanced our appreciation of Latin elegy and its boundaries and firmly set his seal on Latin poetry. His work exercised an overt influence on European literature, more than any other classical author.

Martial (38/41–102/103 CE) settled in Rome around 64 CE, where he allegedly lived a life of poverty and dependence (Ep. 10.24; cf. Ep. 10.104). He was born a Roman citizen, but he refers to himself as sprung from Celts and Iberians (Ep. 10.65.7). Despite the impression that he used to compose poetry at the local tavern, Martial made many influential friends and patrons, and secured the favor both of Titus and Domitian. His poetry, often obscene, reflects the moral decadence of contemporary Rome. Of his works 33 poems survive from his Liber Spectaculorum, published around 80 CE to commemorate the opening of the Colosseum. He also published two collections of short mottoes entitled Xenia and Apophoreta between 84 and 85 CE and 12 books of Epigrams, published between 86–102 CE. His final book of epigrams was written three years after his return to Spain and shortly before his death. In his later years Martial appears tired of the intensity of Roman social life and he even sought refuge temporarily in the countryside (Ep. 2.38; 12.57; 4.25; 10.96). However, the attraction of Rome was indeed tantalizing and in his prose epistle at the beginning of his last book of epigrams he already confesses he misses the buzz of the cosmopolis.

He was always preoccupied with maintaining his high friends and thus refrained from the aggressive tone of Juvenal's satire. In fact, his verbal dexterity suffers from servile flattery towards the emperor (Ep.12.6).

Juvenal wrote Roman satires between 100 and 128 CE reprimanding the decadence of morality during his time (Sat.2.6). He lived during the reign of Domitian and appears to have been alive when the empire was ruled by Hadrian. He must have come from a wealthy family as he appeared not to be in need of a patron. He wrote 16 Satires varying from 60 to 660 lines in length. His themes included homosexuality (Sat.1.2), and male prostitution (Sat.3.9). His verse established a model for the satire of indignation, and the biting tone of his poetry remains unequalled. In his poetry he powerfully denounces a permissive Roman society that indulges in luxury and sensual pleasures, in brutal exercise of power and the antagonisms of the imperial court. His expression is often enriched with popular mottoes and his style owes much to the rhetorical form. His contribution to poetry was not recognized during his life time and he was not included in Quintilian's history of satire. Servius in the late fourth century drew attention to his talent.

Ausonius' writings (310–394 CE) form a miscellaneous collection divided into Occasional Works and School Exercises and Fragments. In the Parentalia, eulogies to deceased relatives, written in 379 CE, he occasionally expresses personal sentiment. His Cupido Crucifixibus is the description of a painting in a dining room at Trier, representing Cupid as tormented in Hell by the women who pursued him on earth. The second group of his writing includes mnemonic verse. In his erotic verse he praises love as a form of tender friendship. He wrote letters to his friends, and poetry, praising his apples and lamenting his verses with light-hearted gentleness. The wife of his youth died after a few years of marriage, but not before leaving him the comfort of children. He had written her a tender lyric in life, and thirty-six years later was still writing of her. Ausonius was a Christian, forever trapped between his religiosity and his keen interest in pagan antiquity.

EVANGELIA ANAGNOSTOU-LAOUTIDES

Selected Works

- Arkins, B. Sexuality in Catullus. 1982.
 Booth, J. Catullus to Ovid: Reading Latin Love Elegy: A Literary Commentary with Latin Text. 1999.
 Greene, E. The Erotics of Domination: Male Desire and the Mistress in Latin Love Poetry. 1998.
 Hallett, J., and M.B. Skinner. Roman Sexualities. 1997.
 Janan, M. When the Lamp is Shattered: Desire and Narrative in Catullus. 1994.
 Kennedy, D.F. The Arts of Love: Five Studies in the Discourse of Roman Love Elegy. 1992.
 Laigneau, S. La Femme et l'amour chez Catulle et les Eligiaques augusteens. 1999.
 Miller, P.A. Subjecting Verses: Latin Love Elegy and the Emergence of the Real. 2004.

Further Reading

- Coffa, D.J. The Influence of Callimachean Aesthetics on the Satires and Odes of Horace. 2001.
 DeBrohun, J.B. Roman Propertius and the Reinvention of Elegy. 2002.
 Dettmer, H. Love By the Numbers: Form and Meaning in the Poetry of Catullus. 1997.
 Fantham, E. Roman Literary Culture: From Cicero to Apuleius. 1996.
 Fantuzzi, M., and R. Hunter. Muse e modelli: La poesia ellenistica da Alessandro Magnoad Augusto. 2002.
 Feeney, D., and A.J. Woodman. Traditions and Contexts in the Poetry of Horace. 2002.
 Godwin, J. Lucretius. 2004.
 Holzberg, N. Catull. Der Dichter und sein erotisches Werk. 2a ed. 2002.
 Jacoff, R., and T. Schnapp. The Poetry of Allusion: Virgil and Ovid in Dante's Commedia. 1991.
 Janan, M. The Properties of Desire: Propertius IV 2001.
 Maltby, R. Tibullus: Elegies. Text, Introduction, and Commentary. 2002.
 Nappa, C. Aspects of Catullus' Social Fiction. 2001.
 Nussbaum, M.C. The Therapy of Desire: Theory and Practice in Hellenistic Ethics. 1994.
 Paschalis, M. Horace and Greek Lyric Poetry. 2002.
 Patterson, A.M. Pastoral and Ideology: Vergil to Valery. 1987.
 Putnam, M.C.J. Vergil's Aeneid: Interpretation and Influence. 1995.
 Spentzou, E. Readers and Writers in Ovid's Heroides: Transgressions of Genre and Gender. 2002.
 Thomas, R.F. Vergil and His Texts: Studies in Intertextuality. 2000.
 White, P. Promised Verse: Poets in the Society of Augustan Rome. 1993.
 Wray, D. Catullus and the Poetics of Roman Manhood. 2001.

LAURE (COLETTE PEIGNOT)

---

1903–1938

French thinker and writer

“Histoire d’une petite fille”

Georges Bataille and Michel Leiris published “Histoire d’une petite fille” in 1939. The text was included in a limited edition entitled Écrits de Laure, which also included Laure’s poems and her unfinished notes on the notion of the sacred. In 1977, her nephew Jérôme Peignot compiled the first public edition of Laure’s work, including the previously published material and her correspondence with Bataille, Michel Leiris, and others. Peignot also added his introduction “Ma mère diagonale” (“My Diagonal Mother”), and Bataille’s article “La vie de Laure” (“The Life of Laure”). Jeanine Herman’s English translation of this edition was published by City Lights Books in 1995.

“Histoire d’une petite fille” is a series of memories from the author’s childhood and adolescence, recorded chronologically in the form of a loosely crafted memoir. Bataille and Leiris chose the title from Laure’s notes, where she had also suggested the titles “Le triste privilège” (“The Sad Privilege”) and “Une vie de conte de fée” (“A Fairy Tale Life”). In “Histoire d’une petite fille,” the narrator seemingly purges herself of her most painful memories. She addresses death and eroticism in a language that is at once brutal and ambiguous. The first memory recounted is of a little girl going to bed in a room full of religious paraphernalia and falling victim to terrifying nightmares. It quickly becomes apparent that the narrator’s waking moments were no less frightening than her dreams, and she calls childhood ‘the stealer of children.’ There is a notable tension throughout “Histoire d’une petite fille,” and throughout Laure’s writing in general, which is self-consciously influenced by the forces of death, eroticism, and religious oppression.

In “Histoire d’une petite fille,” Laure describes events which she would later incorporate in her theory of the sacred. For Laure, the sacred is defined by two dueling components: the ‘high’ sacred, equated with the exultation she witnesses during religious ritual, and the ‘base,’ which she associates with issues of sexuality. The sacred experience is also founded on a mysticism maintained by concentrating on the infinite. Its roots are particularly evident in a lyrical passage of “Histoire d’une petite fille,” during which the little girl is overcome as she ‘discovers’ the immensity of the sky. The child protagonist is simultaneously fascinated by and frightened of both types of ‘sacred’ phenomena. From a very early age Laure is aware of the affinity between religious euphoria and sexual transgression, and she envies anyone who is unrestricted by bourgeois social structure. Such abhorrence of bourgeois ideals is perhaps the strongest current in “Histoire d’une petite fille,” and each childhood event is described as an expression of the need to break away from social restriction.

Laure’s oppressive life in Paris is all the more striking because juxtaposed with euphoric descriptions of the countryside. Her father teaches her about nature at the family’s country home, and the young child is enraptured. Any happiness is ephemeral however, as the Peignot family is devastated by a series of deaths during the first World War. Laure’s beloved father enlists in the army, and as the family is seeing him off at the train station the child has what she calls her first real sacred experience: she is part of a crowd whose patriotic fervor causes her to see her father as a willing human sacrifice. The experience makes her physically ill. Soon after this epiphany, Laure witnesses a staggering number of deaths. An uncle is first: having returned from the front with tuberculosis, he dies slowly in Laure’s bedroom. During the funeral a sheet of water escapes from the coffin and hits the pallbearers, one of whom swears loudly. Laure is stricken by this throwing together of solemnity and profanity, and is literally overwhelmed. Her father’s death follows, and Laure’s grief is augmented by what she calls the ‘spectacle of mourning’: her mother grieves most vehemently when guests are present, her aunt pays attention to her make-up while weeping, and there is a general feeling that her father’s death has been romanticized. For a short time Laure becomes attached to the young daughter of a family friend, and this toddler also grows ill and dies. The narrator states that she fully understood death when seeing this child’s tiny white coffin lowered into the ground.

At this time, Laure contracts tuberculosis, and after being nursed back to health she begins to lose religious faith. This is encouraged by the death of her godson, a young soldier who had vexed her mother during a previous visit because he had been unwilling to discuss combat. Laure likens this encounter to the day a friend of her brother’s sobbed uncontrollably in her mother’s presence, annoying her greatly. This boy was also killed.

Laure’s first sexual experiences added to her trauma: following the multiple deaths already described, she discovers that the family priest—known to her as Monsieur l’abbé—had been sexually molesting her older sister. The priest soon turns his attentions to Laure, and the situation is aggravated by the fact that he has symbolically taken over her father’s role within the household. When Monsieur l’abbé explains human reproduction to Laure, she is torn by the desire to confess her sexual thoughts to a priest and the knowledge that these thoughts were instigated by the relationship between this same priest and her sister. Confused, Laure guards her secret for quite some time.

As Laure rejects her family more fervently, she becomes increasingly withdrawn from social interaction. When she finally tells her brother about the priest’s misconduct, they tell their mother who promptly accuses them of lying. From this point on, Laure is deliberately cold towards her family and begins to express her anger through writing. Returning to school, her behavior is erratic and unpredictable; the only stable force in her life becomes her irreligion. She is briefly attracted to music, but eventually rejects even this as a form of escapism.

“Histoire d’une petite fille” is in no way a sexually explicit text. When read within the context of Laure’s other writings however, and in relation to Bataille’s theory of the sacred, the juxtaposing of the high and base elements of the sacred already present in Laure’s childhood acquires renewed importance. The author of “Histoire d’une petite fille” has expunged her most traumatic childhood experiences and incorporated them in a structured (if chaotic) épistémè of transgression, eroticism, and death.

Biography

Laure’s full name was Colette Laure Lucienne Peignot. Born into a Catholic, bourgeois family in Paris on October 8, 1903, she died of tuberculosis on November 8, 1938. Laure was linked to many important intellectual figures and movements during her short life: with the author Jean Bernier she collaborated with the French surrealists, with communist activist Boris Souvarine she contributed articles to La critique sociale, and with Georges Bataille she wrote for the political journal Contre-Attaque and participated in Acéphale (a secret society striving to recreate Dionysian rituals).

PATRICIA BERNEY

Editions and Selected Works

Écrits de Laure. Paris: Hors commerce, 1939.

Écrits de Laure (texte établi par J. Peignot et le Collectif Change). Paris: Société nouvelle des éditions J.-J. Pauvert, 1977.

Laure: The Collected Writings. Translated by Jeanine Herman. San Francisco: City Lights Books, 1995.

Une rupture, 1934: Correspondance croisée de Laure avec Boris Souvarine, sa famille, Georges Bataille, Pierre et Jenny Pascal, Simone Weil (texte établi par J. Peignot et Anne Roche). Paris: Éditions des Cendres, 1999.

Further Reading

Barillé, Élisabeth. Laure: la sainte de l’abîme. Paris: Flammarion, 1997.

Black, S.L. Laure: Life Under a Black Sun. Doctoral thesis, University of Sussex, 1998.

Devaux, Mandelli-Corinne and Anne Roche. “Simone Weil and Colette Peignot ou Qu’est-ce qu’une conviction non-prouvée?” Cahiers Simone Weil (Sept. 1984) 7:3, pp. 243–250.

Maubon, Catherine. “L’expérience ‘politique’ de Colette Peignot” in Des Années trente: groupes et ruptures (textes réunis par Anne Roche et Christian Tarding). Paris: Éditions du Centre National de la recherche scientifique, 1984.

Sahely, Nadia-M. “The Laure-Bataille Exchange: Celebrating the Dissymmetry of the Couple in Interwar French Thought.” Cincinnati Romance Review (1996) 15, pp. 41–49.

LAWRENCE, D.H.

---

1885—1930

British novelist, poet, essayist

Works

“I always labor at the same things,” David Herbert Lawrence commented while writing Lady Chatterley’s Lover, “to make the sex relation valid and precious instead of shameful.” With some qualification, this comment is a fair description of Lawrence’s major work. Generally, the “sex relation” he wrote about is heterosexual and genital—“phallic marriage,” as he called it—but not entirely, and the heterosexual relationships he portrayed explore a variety of erotic experiences.

Early Work

Before his elopement with Frieda Weekley and up to the completion of Sons and Lovers in 1912, his view of heterosexual relationships was that they are tragic, presumably because of the unhappy marriage of his own parents and his own intense Oedipal conflicts. In his first novel, The White Peacock, begun in 1905–6 and published in 1911, the strongly masculine farmer George Saxton is flirted with by Lettie because she feels in him the warm manliness she does not feel in Leslie (the better economic match whom she marries); because the desire she arouses in George cannot be satisfied in his subsequent marriage to the less “spiritual,” less educated Meg, he destroys himself with drink. “How much this first novel was written for his mother’s approval,” Richard Aldington remarked, “may be judged from this Band of Hope portrait of George and from the fact that Heinemann had a single advance copy of the book, printed and bound, for Lawrence to give his mother before he died.” The story is told from the point of view of a first-person narrator, Cyril, who feels himself to be a disembodied consciousness, “a pale, erratic fragility.” Cyril is very close to his mother and identifies with her middle-class sensibilities and refinement—his derelict father is dead and out of the story. Also present in the novel is a gamekeeper who anticipates the famous gamekeeper in Lady Chatterley’s Lover, but here the representative of male vitality is killed off in an accident in a quarry. The really positive presentation of erotic feeling is in the attraction that Cyril feels towards George, celebrated in what Jeffrey Meyers calls a “Whitmanesque” chapter, entitled “A Poem of Friendship.” Naked, Cyril and George swim together, and afterwards they dry each other:

... [H]e knew how I admired the noble, white fruitfulness of his form. As I watched him, he stood in white relief against the mass of green. He polished his arm, holding it straight and solid; he rubbed his hair into curls, while I watched the deep muscles of his shoulders, and the bands stand out in his neck as he held it firm ... [L]aughing he took hold of me and began to rub me briskly, as if I were a child, or rather, a woman he loved and did not fear. I left myself quite limply in his hands, and, to get a better grip of me, he put his arm around me and pressed me against him, and the sweetness of the touch of our naked bodies one against the other was superb. It satisfied in some measure the vague, indecipherable yearning of my soul; and it was the same with him. When he had rubbed me all warm, he let me go, and we looked at each other with eyes of still laughter, and our love was perfect for a moment, more perfect than any love I have known since, either for man or woman.

The tragic view of homosexual passion continues in his second novel, The Trespasser, published in 1912. The story of the illicit love affair between Siegmund and Helen and its consequences, treated with more intensity (complete with allusions to Tristan und Isolde) than was the love-tragedy of the first novel, and Siegmund rather inexplicably hangs himself. But the lyrical descriptions of nature shown through the lover’s eyes are an expression of their passion that lets them see the whole world afresh. It is not, however, till Sons and Lovers that heterosexual passion is no longer portrayed as somehow inherently tragic but as made unhappy by Oedipal conflicts. It is the middle-class mother, with her disapproval of the working-class father and his drinking, who exacerbates these conflicts. Frieda, with whom he had eloped to the European continent before finishing this third novel, helped him, with her experience of psychoanalysis, to see the Oedipal outlines of the essentially autobiographical story of Paul Morel's inability to find a satisfying sexual experience with a woman. "A woman of character and refinement goes into the lower class," Lawrence was able to write in 1912 describing his novel to his publisher, and has no satisfaction in her own life. She has had a passion for her husband, so the children are born of passion, and have heaps of vitality. But as her sons grow up, she selects them as lovers ... But when they come to manhood, they can't love, because their mother is the strongest power in their lives, and holds them ... William gives his sex to a fribble, and his mother holds his soul. But the split kills him ... The next son gets a woman who fights for his soul—fights his mother. The son loves the mother—all the sons hate and are jealous of the father ... The son decides to leave his soul in his mother's hands, and, like his elder brother, go for passion. Then the split begins to tell again ... The son casts off his mistress, attends to his mother dying. He is left in the end naked of everything ...

This conception of a "split" in erotic feeling is strikingly parallel to Freud's description of the causes of "psychical impotence" in his 1912 essay "The Most Prevalent Form of Degradation in Erotic Life." Because of the attachment to the mother, the boy cannot feel tenderness and esteem (i.e., cannot give his "soul") to the same woman for whom he feels sensual desire, and vice versa. "He was like so many young men of his age," Lawrence's novel tells us. "Sex had become so complicated in him that he would have denied that he ever could want Clara or Miriam or any woman whom he knew. Sex desire was a sort of detached thing, that did not belong to a woman." Paul's sexual intercourse with Miriam, who is supposed to be full of spiritual feelings and who gives in to him out of a feeling of obligation and self-sacrifice, is unpleasant to both. But with Clara—a feminist separated from her husband—he can experience a joyous, uninhibited sexual release. Lying with her on a river bank, he ... sunk his mouth on her throat, where he felt her heavy pulse beat under his lips. Everything was perfectly still. There was nothing in the afternoon but themselves.

When she arose, he, looking on the ground all the time, saw suddenly sprinkled on the black wet beech-roots many scarlet carnation petals, like splashed drops of blood; and red, small splashes fell from her bosom, streaming down her dress to her feet.

"Your flowers are smashed," he said.

But in the relationship that develops, Clara perceives it is not her that he wants but, as she puts it, merely "it."

The Rainbow

In Look! We Have Come Through!, most of which was written in 1912, Lawrence has cast off his tragic view of sex. Though it speaks of the difficulties they encounter in their relationship, this poetic sequence celebrates what he has discovered with Frieda. Now he can sing a "Hymn to Priapus," can assert that everything, from the mountains to the dandelion seeds, "starts from us," the sexually-fulfilled couple, can hope to "spend eternity/With my face down buried between her breasts," for it was by touching "the flank of my wife" that he escaped from solipsistic self-entrapment and rises from a kind of death "to a new earth, a new I, a new knowledge, a new world of time." His new view of sexual experience is expressed in the parable that opens his Study of Thomas Hardy. In this parable he derides the view that the red color of the flower can be explained as a lure to bees to effect its pollination; thus he exposes the puritanism at the basis of so-called scientific assumptions that suppose the purpose of sexual expression, in poppies or in humans, is reproduction. Though in his subsequent work (most notably in The Plumed Serpent) he makes harsh remarks about women who insatiably demand frictional stimulation of the clitoris, nevertheless sexual expression in many forms, apparently in "excess" of any reproductive purpose, is, according to his parable of the poppy, natural, and reproduction merely one of the possible consequences.

But it is his novel The Rainbow, written while he and Frieda were back in England during the war years, that gives the fullest and most powerful expression to his discovery. Now characters are not destroyed for following their sexual desires but rather find fulfillment though gratification of these desires. Sex is no longer seen as in some way inherently tragic but only made unhappy through the imposition of modern ideals of education and upward social mobility. When it was published in 1915, reviewers attacked The Rainbow with comments like “realistic to the point of brutality,” “a monotonous wilderness of phallicism,” “spoiled by crude sex details,” and these attacks were used to prosecute the publisher, who agreed to the destruction of all copies.

The novel spans three generations and gives us a history of marriage in the Brangwen family under the impact of gradual modernization from the first half of the nineteenth century to the beginning of the twentieth century. It opens with a poetic evocation of the life of the Brangwens as a well-to-do, English farming family, where the men had “a kind of surety” that came from their close physical connection with the organic rhythms of farm life, “cattle and earth and vegetation and the sky,” and that gave them a life without either emotional complexity or torment. But the women “were different” and wanted some higher, greater form of life, as they imagine the vicar enjoys, and set out to educate the children so these children can go “beyond” farm life and its animal physicality. Lawrence now sees the mother as the instigator of sexual troubles. The sufferings of young Tom Brangwen in trying to find a mate are the result of this ambition instilled in him by women—exacerbating his Oedipal conflicts—to rise above peasant instincts. “He had one or two sweethearts, starting with them in the hope of speedy development. But when he had a nice girl, he found that he was incapable of pushing the desired development ... He could not think of her like that, he could not think of her actual nakedness.” On the other hand, his experience with a woman who is not “nice” in his conventional sense shocks him. “Now when Tom Brangwen, at nineteen, a youth fresh like a plant, rooted in his mother and sister, found that he had lain with a prostitute in a common public house, he was very much startled. For him there was until that time only one kind of woman—that which was like his mother and sister.” Like Paul Morel, Tom suffers from what Freud called “psychical impotence,” for he can have only “nice” feelings towards “nice girls” and “not-nice,” that is to say, sexual, feelings towards “not-nice” girls; in other words, he cannot marry anyone he sexually desires. When he tries to find relief with a prostitute “it was with a paucity he was forced to despise.” So he drinks, trying to burn “the youth from his blood.” A partial exception to his dilemma—how to feel esteem for a woman he experiences sexually—occurs when at an inn he has a sexual encounter with a “light o’ love,” as the novel calls her, who is the mistress of an aristocratic foreigner. “Afterwards he glowed with pleasure,” and, when the man and woman have departed, he “began to imagine an intimacy with fine-textured, subtle-mannered people such as the foreigner ... and amidst this subtle intimacy was always the satisfaction of a voluptuous woman.” He has had a sexual experience with a woman he cannot despise for her sexuality because she comes from a more refined world than his. This experience prefigures his encounter with the aristocratic Lydia, who is the widow of, and has had a daughter by, a Polish patriot. Lydia is the solution to his Oedipal problem, for connection with her would satisfy the drive put in him by his mother to get “beyond” his farm world but without his abandoning his own physicality—indeed, he would go to his “beyond” by means of sexual intercourse. In Lydia’s foreign origins and aristocracy he can finally overcome the sense of inferiority his mother’s expectations gave him, but it takes two years of marriage before he can really overcome his inhibitions and embrace her without clumsiness. Lawrence expresses in rhapsodic terms the struggle and fulfillment they achieve.

With their discovery, the novel passes on to the next generation, to Lydia’s daughter Anna. Anna has suffered through the loss of her father and the subsequent too-close connection with her mother, and the frustrations Tom had felt (and still to some degree feels) create sexual difficulties for her as she matures, especially because he raises her to have lady-like sensibilities. Emotionally entangled with her family as she is, Anna as a young woman can only mate with another Brangwen, and marries Tom’s nephew, Will, who is town-bred and works as a lace-designer. After their marriage they almost immediately begin to fight one another until her fulfillment comes in the gestation and birth of a child, and in her pregnancy she does a naked, big-bellied dance alone before a mirror to “the Lord,” who for her is the ultimate origin of the child, not her husband. This passage was a special shock to early readers. The novel calls her “Anna Victrix,” because in her triumphant fecundity she creates a “little matriarchy” to which Will submits. He submits because, after an encounter which arouses him but which he does not consummate with a young woman in a theater, Anna accepts and provokes extreme sexual excitement in him:

He would go all day waiting for the night to come, when he could give himself to the enjoyment of some luxurious absolute of beauty in her. The thought of the hidden resources of her, the undiscovered beauties and ecstatic places of delight in her body ... sent him slightly insane ... And she, separate, with a strange, dangerous, glistening look in her eyes received all his activities upon her as if they were expected by her, and provoked him when he was quiet to more, till sometimes he was ready to perish for sheer inability to be satisfied of her ... Their children became mere offspring to them, they lived in the darkness and death of their own sensual activities. Sometimes he felt he was going mad with a sense of Absolute Beauty, perceived by him in her through his senses.

The obscurity a reader may find in such a passage may derive not only from a reticence to name the sexual acts specifically but also from the passage’s evocative intensity. The poetic power of The Rainbow, especially in its first half, comes from a method that seeks to express inner feelings rather than to depict characters, in the conventional manner, in scene and dialogue. But apparently the intercourse of Will and Anna depend greatly on sexual variations, especially anal eroticism:

All the shameful things of the body revealed themselves to him with a sort of sinister, tropical beauty. All the shameful, natural and unnatural acts of sensual voluptuousness which he and the woman partook of together, created together, they had their heavy beauty and their delight. Shame, what was it? It was part of extreme delight. It was that part of delight of which man is usually afraid. Why afraid? The secret, shameful things are most terribly beautiful.

With these acts they “accepted shame,” but this shame “was a bud that blossomed into beauty and heavy, fundamental gratification.” But for their children—the novel’s third generation, which has gone another step towards the modern, the urban, and the sophisticated—sexuality will be more conflicted than it was even for Will and Anna. Will has turned towards his daughter Ursula for emotional fulfillment even more than Tom had towards Anna, and Ursula, a modern young lady who goes to college, can find no satisfaction with the men in the book. Her lover Skrebensky, though attractive, is a soldier willing to submit completely to the purposes of the state and therefore has little feeling at his disposal for a woman. He envies a barge man with three children just because the barge man, in simply looking at Ursula, has an “impudent directness” and is capable of “worship of the woman in Ursula, a worship of body and soul together” of which he is incapable. A modern man, Skrebensky has no “self.” In her “hard and fierce” kiss, “her soul crystallized with triumph, and his soul was dissolved in agony and annihilation,” as if the aroused sex in a woman somehow can only destroy the modern man who is completely caught in the established order of things. Nevertheless she “caressed and made love to him” and pretends to admire him “in open life” so that “they were lovers, in a young, romantic, almost fantastic way”—lovers as the earlier generations, whose erotic experience occurred only in private, never were. As modern people, they live in public. There is no sexual consummation, and Skrebensky goes off to the army and to war, while Ursula goes to college and enters upon a lesbian relationship with Winifred Inger, described as “a rather beautiful woman of twenty-eight, a fearless-seeming, clean-type of modern girl whose very independence betrays her sorrow.” But this relationship dissolves and Ursula becomes a teacher herself, only to be disillusioned with the nature of a system that—in preparing children for the world of modern, industrialized work to which all else must be a “sideshow”—makes any personal relationship with them impossible. She begins to feel she lives in an “inner circle of light ... wherein the trains rushed and the factories ground out their machine-produce and the plants and the animals worked by the light of science and knowledge” that denies “the outer darkness.” She yearns for something to come out of that darkness for her. But it is only Skrebensky, returning from war, who comes to her. In the chapter entitled “The Bitterness of Ecstasy” she has a “superb consummation” with Skrebensky, yet for all its excitement it is unfulfilling to her:

The trouble began at evening. Then a yearning for something unknown came over her, a passion for something she knew not what. She would walk the foreshore alone after dusk, expecting, expecting something, as if she had gone to a rendezvous. The salt, bitter passion of the sea ... seemed to provoke her to a pitch of madness, tantalizing her with vast suggestions of fulfillment. And then, for personification, would come Skrebensky, whom she knew, whom she was fond of, who was attractive, but whose soul could not contain her in its waves of strength, nor his breast compel her in burning, salty passion.

She kisses him, “pressing in her beaked mouth till she had the heart of him”—the reference to “beaked mouth” anticipating the critique in his later novels of “the beakish will,” that is, the woman’s exertion of friction by the clitoris in sexual intercourse. Skrebensky then, while she lies motionless, serves her with violent motions that “lasted till it was agony to his soul ... till he gave way as if dead.” But in a waiter and a cab driver—two men outside middle-class respectability—she and Skrebensky encounter in London, she glimpses something she yearns for from the “unknown.” After her miscarriage and abandonment by Skrebensky, Ursula has a prophetic vision that “the sordid people who crept hard-scaled and separate on the face of the world’s corruption were living still, that the rainbow was arched in their blood and would quiver to life in their spirit” and that “the old, brittle corruption of houses and factories” would be swept away.

Women In Love

After the banning of The Rainbow, Lawrence begins explaining his vision to a world that had rejected it. He took on the role of prophet. Lawrence expresses these tendencies in Rupert Birkin, the main male character of the novel Women in Love, published in 1920. He lectures his friends on the horrors of modern civilization and the necessity to escape from its ideals by means of a marriage founded on some other principle than the “love” that is advanced as the highest motive. These harangues are especially for the benefit of Ursula Brangwen, who has the same name as the character in The Rainbow (both novels evolved out of an early manuscript called “The Sisters”) but who seems a different person, especially in her higher level of sophistication and in the somewhat elevated social world in which she now has her acquaintance. Her sister, Gudrun, an artist of some reputation, becomes the lover of Birkin’s friend, the handsome and wealthy Gerald Critch, who owns the local collieries. The two couples are shown in contrast—according to Lawrence’s developing sexual philosophy, Ursula-Birkin on the right path, Gudrun-Gerald on the wrong. Birkin believes that one should act in terms of spontaneous impulses, but Gerald opposes this view because he believes that would mean “everybody cutting everybody else’s throat in five minutes.” And in a scene in bohemian London early in the novel we see Gerald’s aggressive impulses gratified through a sexual experience with Miss Darrington, also called “Pussums” and “Minette” (as in faire minette = perform cunnilingus). She looks at Gerald the morning afterwards with the “inchoate look of a violated slave, whose fulfilment lies in her further and further violation,” and this look “made his nerves quiver with acutely desirable sensation.” Because he feels he must preserve his social position, Gerald will not have any lasting relationship with “Pussums,” though she does gratify his spontaneous desires. Instead he enters into a relationship with Gudrun. She, who was attracted to him on first seeing him, initiates their physical intimacy by suddenly (spontaneously) slapping him in the face. Gerald’s habit of exerting power piques her, as in the scene where she and Ursula watch him using his spurs cruelly to force a mare, terrified by a passing train, to stand. Their sexual intercourse begins after the death of his father, when, suffering one night from a terrible sense “of his own nothingness,” he stealthily enters the house of Gudrun’s parents, slips into her room, and tells he must have her:

... She let him hold her in his arms, clasp her close against him. He found in her infinite relief. Into her he poured all his pent-up darkness and corrosive death, and he was whole again. It was wonderful, marvelous, it was a miracle ... And she, subject, received him as a vessel filled with his bitter potion of death. She had no power at this crisis to resist. The terrible frictional violence of death filled her, and she received it in an ecstasy of subjection, in throes of acute, violent sensation.

In gratitude for her allowing him to do this, he “worshipped her, Mother and substance of all life.” He sleeps beside her like a child, but she is left in a state of “violent active superconsciousness” and cannot sleep. She feels “an ache like nausea ... a nausea of him.” Finally, on a winter excursion to the Alps with him and with the newly-married Birkin and Ursula, she torments Gerald by taking up with a sadistic German sculptor who admits that he had to slap the adolescent girl who was his model so she would remain still, and Gerald reacts to Gudrun's treatment of him by going off into the snow and, by a crucifix half-buried there, allowing himself to freeze to death. But the relationship of Ursula and Birkin, going on simultaneously with the unfolding of this deadly process, is life-affirming. Birkin has pulled himself away from Hermione Roddice, a woman who sees herself as a center of advanced culture. She and Ursula are contrasted later in the novel, after an argument about love, from Hermione's point of view:

... Ursula could not understand, never would understand, could never be more than the usual jealous and unreasonable female, with a good deal of powerful female emotion, female attraction, and a fair amount of female understanding, but no mind ... And Rupert—he had now reacted towards the strongly female, healthy, selfish woman ...

Birkin wants Ursula to commit herself to marriage—which for Birkin means the end of the dominance of woman. In his view, marriage should allow an “equilibrium” between the man and woman such as he sees in the play of two cats. The man and woman would relate to each other not in terms of personalities or conventional roles:

“There is [he tells her] ... a final me which is stark and impersonal and beyond responsibility. So there is a final you. And it is there I would want to meet you—not in the emotional, loving plane—but there beyond, where there is no speech and no terms of agreement. There we are two stark, unknown beings, two utterly strange creatures ... And there could be no obligation, because there is no standard for action there ... It is quite inhuman—so there can be no calling to book, in any form whatsoever—because one is outside the pale of all that is accepted, and nothing known applies. One can only follow the impulse ... only each taking according to the primal desire.”

Birkin's view is the denial of traditional notions of the subordination of sex to love and to other purposes that Christianity has promulgated. In so far as these needs are sexual, they are for more than procreation and even genital intercourse, as is illustrated in Ursula's kneeling, putting her arms around his loins, touching the back of his thighs and pressing her face against them and finding “release at last.” From “the darkest poles of the body”—his anus—her touch causes “a dark fire of electricity” that “rushed from him to her ... and flooded them both with rich peace, satisfaction.”

During the course of Birkin's relationship with Ursula, he tries to save Gerald from disaster, most notably in the scene where the two men wrestle together naked. After they have wrestled to unconsciousness Birkin accidentally touched the hand of Gerald, and “Gerald's hand closed warm and sudden over Birkin's.” Birkin wants Gerald to acknowledge that the contact they have had is significant and to commit himself to it, but it is finally too unconventional for Gerald. More than anything else, it is this refusal that gives him no escape from the fatal passion for Gudrun. Seeing the frozen corpse in the end of the novel, Birkin says Gerald was a “denier.” The novel ends with Birkin's insistence—in opposition to Ursula's objections—that he wanted a union with a man as “eternal” as the union he has with her: “another kind of love.” Significantly, a “Prologue” not published with the novel tells us at length that “although he was always drawn to women, feeling more at home with a woman than with a man, yet it was for men that he felt the hot, flushing, roused attraction which a man is supposed to feel for the other sex,” and he is deeply ashamed of his powerful homosexual longings.

Lawrence as Prophet

The two small volumes Psychoanalysis and the Unconscious (1921) and Fantasia of the Unconscious (1922) are Lawrence's attempts to theorize what, he claims, had so far come more or less unconsciously from his pen. He presents what he calls his “pollyanalytics,” but their serious, essential point is to make a correction of Freud. According to Lawrence, the Oedipus complex and other Freudian “horrors” do not express true human depths but are the result of the ideals of Western civilization, especially the ideal of Love, having been forced by education onto the “pristine unconscious.” Parents force ideas onto the body of the child instead of helping the child respond to life from its physiological “centres,” notably from the “solar plexus.”

This theory is a development of what Birkin was preaching to Ursula in his notion of marriage. "Coition" is not some union of minds or personalities but an act in which

... the two seas of blood in the two individuals, rocking and surging towards contact, as near as possible, clash into a oneness. A great flash of interchange occurs, like an electrical spark when two currents meet like lightning out of the densely surcharged clouds. There is a lightning flash which passes through the blood of both individuals, there is a thunder of sensation which rolls in diminishing crashes down the nerves of each—and then the tension passes.

The two individuals are separate again. But are they as they were before/ Is the air the same after a thunderstorm as before? No. The air is as it were new, fresh, tingling with newness. So is the blood of man and woman after successful coition. After a false coition, like prostitution, there is not newness but a certain disintegration.

Lawrence insists that this—and not some ideal purpose—is the "great psychic experience" from the point of view of a man or a woman. And "after all our experience with poetry and novels we know that the procreative purpose of sex is ... just a sideshow."

Nevertheless, in Aaron's Rod (1922), Kangaroo (1923), and The Plumed Serpent (1926)—called his "leadership" novels—sexual experience is relegated to a subsidiary theme and even, in Aaron's Rod, treated as something to avoid. This development seems related to unhappiness in these years in his marriage. Frieda had not been faithful to him even from the start, as is revealed in the long continuation—not published till 1984—of his fictional fragment Mr. Noon. In the three "leadership" novels, man–woman relationships are primary, but the homosexuality is sublimated into "leader–follower" relationships and political ideas that are sometimes strongly reminiscent of fascism. But it seems clear in The Plumed Serpent that basic to the revolution proposed for Mexico, that is supposed to overthrow Western and Christian ideals and restore the worship of Quetzalcoatl, is a new relationship between man and woman. The European heroine Kate is supposed to learn the womanly superiority of the Mexican woman, Theresa, to give up demanding from her husband, General Cipriano, "the old desire for frictional, irritant sensation ... the spasms of frictional voluptuousness ... orgiastic 'satisfaction,' in spasms that made her cry aloud." Instead, Cipriano "in his dark, hot silence, would bring her back the new, soft, heavy, hot flow, when she was like a fountain gushing noiseless and with urgent softness from the volcanic depths." In abandoning her craving for "the beak-like friction of Aphrodite" she can become the woman that Birkin and his prophetic avatars have been wanting. The resulting hot "gushing" would seem to correspond to the vaginal orgasm that Freud and his followers believed they could distinguish from clitoral orgasm. According to Brenda Maddox, Cipriano's deliberate denial of Kate's clitoral orgasm is the passage most offensive to feminist readers in all of Lawrence's writings.

Lady Chatterley's Lover

In his most famous novel he abandons his "leadership" themes and returns to a celebration of the possibilities in the sexual relationship of man and woman, though a source for the novel may have been E.M. Forster's Maurice, which seems to be a homosexual version that Forster did not allow published till 1970, though Lawrence may well have known about it in manuscript. Lady Chatterley's Lover itself, which pioneered in the use of common spoken language to describe sexual acts and in their graphic depiction in a serious literary context, was not legally printed in the United States till the Grove Press edition of 1959. Lawrence's essay A Propos of Lady Chatterley's Lover attempted to defend it from the charge of pornography and made some interesting distinctions; he claimed that pornography—as opposed to writing that simply aroused a reader sexually—did "dirt on sex," and that Jane Eyre was closer to being pornographic than was his work or Boccaccio's.

The novel opens with a summary of how his heroine Constance Reid came to be married to Sir Clifford Chatterley, who, shortly after their marriage, was wounded in the war and paralyzed from the waist down. But before their marriage she did not care anyway about physical sex. What mattered to her was "the impassioned interchange of talk" with men. "Love was only a minor accompaniment." Above all, she wants to remain free. And however one might sentimentalize it, "Connie thinks,

... this sex business was one of the most ancient, sordid connections and subjections ... Women had always known there was something better, something higher and now they knew it more definitely than ever. The beautiful pure freedom of a woman was infinitely more wonderful than any sexual love.

When she and her sister Hilda actually have sexual intercourse with men, in “the actual sex-thrill within the body” they “nearly succumbed to the strange male power.” But they are able to treat it as a mere “sensation” and so remain “free.” For Clifford, even before he is wounded in the war, sex mattered little:

... He had been virgin when he married: and the sex part did not mean much to him. They were so close, he and she, apart from that. And Connie exulted a little in this intimacy which was beyond sex, and beyond a man's “satisfaction.” Clifford anyhow was not just keen on his “satisfaction” ...

Thus, when he goes off to war shortly after their honeymoon and returns paralyzed from the waist down, little is changed between them sexually. His paralysis is only a symbolic confirmation of what he already was. In his paralysis, he is meant to symbolize the condition of modern man in general. Indeed, there may be much of Clifford in Lawrence himself. But Clifford is especially meant to symbolize the condition of the cultivated upper classes. After the war, Connie and Clifford try to carry on in their sexless marriage. Clifford—obsessed with success, with the need for making a display of himself that Lawrence tells us is typical of modern men—takes up fiction writing. Clifford even tells Connie she may take a lover. His speech to her minimizing the importance of sexual connection as opposed to their relationship based on “the habit of each other” loses its credibility when he concludes: “we ought to be able to arrange this sex thing, as we arrange going to the dentist.” He achieves some success and gathers around him the intellectuals of the day. One of these “cronies,” Tommy Dukes, more honest than the others, tells them in her presence of the idiocy and profound hatefulness of their vaunted “mental life,” and he becomes Lawrence's spokesman in affirming that what one needs—though Dukes himself cannot claim to have them—is “a good heart, a chirpy penis, and the courage to say ‘shit!’ in front of a lady.” Dukes says his own “penis droops and never lifts his head up ... The penis rouses his head and says:

How do you do? to any really intelligent person. Renoir said he painted his pictures with his penis ... he did too, lovely pictures!”

Being present during the conversations of the “cronies” does not make Connie happy. She tries taking a lover from this circle—Michaelis, a young Irish playwright. But he is far more excited by having her praise his play than he could be in “any sexual orgasm.” And in their intercourse “Connie found it impossible to come to her crisis before he had really finished his,” so that he has to remain erect in her, “with all his will and self-offering, till she brought about her own crisis, with weird little cries ... [L]ike so many modern men, he was finished almost before he had begun. And that forced the woman to be active.” But, sick with disillusion with the life she has chosen, one afternoon she by accident comes upon the gamekeeper Mellors, “naked to the hips,” washing himself at a pump. She has a “visionary experience” seeing “the warm, white flame of a single life, revealing itself in contours that one might touch: a body!” Later, by herself, she feels her own body “going opaque” and feels that at twenty-seven she is growing old “through neglect and denial.” The “mental life” now seems to her to be a “swindle.” She takes to going into the wood, on the excuse of seeing the spring daffodils, and again encounters Mellors. But he “had reached the point where all he wanted on earth was to be left alone.” He avoids contact with her, dreading “her female will and her modern female insistency”—his estranged wife had evidently been one of the “beakish” sort. Mellors, though from the working-class, had been an officer during the war, but had chosen afterwards to return to his own class in rejection of the modern mentality of trying to rise socially.

In the meantime, Clifford discovers that what excites him more than literary success is what he can know as owner of his coal mines: power. The pursuit of power over potency is—as Mark Shorer explains in his introduction to the Grove Press edition—the modern way, instead of the way Mellors takes. Connie has been looking at the pheasant chicks that Mellors has been raising when she is seized with “the agony of her own female forlornness,” and Mellors, seeing a tear drop on her wrist, is overcome with a feeling of compassion for her—compassion which is the same as sexual desire. That overpowering feeling is, interestingly, an example of the kind of feeling Freud means in his 1912 essay by full sexual potency, where the two streams of erotic feeling—tenderness and sensuality—combine, and, later in the novel, Connie uses terms that could well have come out of Freud's essay to explain to her incredulous sister what it is she and Mellors have together. Lawrence stresses that there is nothing consciously intended by either of them in the sexual act that is about to happen and that initiates their relationship — Mellors “stroked the curve of her flank, in the blind instinctive caress.” He takes her into the hut and at once must enter “the peace on earth of her soft, quiescent body.” The orgasm is all his. She feels “asleep” as it happens, yet, afterwards, feels “it lifted a great cloud from her,” yet does not know why and wonders if was “real”:

Her tormented modern-woman's brain still had no rest ... And she knew, if she gave herself to the man, it was real. But if she kept herself to herself, it was nothing ... And at last, she could bear the burden of herself no more. She was to be had for the taking ...

Modern man, but especially modern woman, have for Lawrence to come to this point of despair, where they have really given up trying to achieve happiness for themselves, and, especially, have given up the means that modern society offers (money, power, achievement, amusements) for satisfaction. Then the primal instincts can take over.

What works against all such sexual tenderness is “not woman's fault, nor even love's fault, nor the fault of sex,” Lawrence tells us. “The fault lay ... in those evil electric lights and diabolical rattlings of engines”—in “the insentient iron world and the Mammon of mechanized greed” that Sir Clifford manages and serves. Mellors wishes there were other men to fight this evil, but the novel offers no revolutionary hopes as did the “leadership” novels before it. The man and the woman will have to go it alone, hiding and trying to keep the feeling they have for each other. And Connie, with her “modern-woman” sensibility, fights this feeling herself. It disturbs her that it “really wasn't personal, “that she was “only really a female to him.” But she realizes that while men had been “very kind to the person she was,” they had been “rather cruel to the female”:

... Men were awfully kind to Constance Reid or to Lady Chatterley; but to her womb they weren't kind.

And he took no notice of Constance or of Lady Chatterley; he just softly stroked her loins or her breasts.

Indeed, since Mellors is presented in this novel as a paragon—not who Lawrence himself was but wished to be—Connie is in the position of learning to become what Lawrence thinks is a proper female. She learns through sexual experience. When she had no more heart “to fight for her freedom,” and, after he has his “helpless” orgasm, too soon for her though she feels “new strange thrills rippling inside her,” can no longer “harden and grip for her own satisfaction upon him,” he feels her need and instead of withdrawing is aroused again. Then she has an experience that leaves her “crying in unconscious inarticulate cries.” After this she lets “another self” come to life in her, “and with this self she adored him.” She still feels she can fight this adoration, can instead be “passionate like a Bacchante” and cling “to the old hard passion,” but she chooses the adoration: it was “her treasure.” Nevertheless, on another occasion, she can detach herself during the sexual act and “look on from the top of her head” so that “the butting of his haunches seemed ridiculous to her.” But when she tells him of her unhappiness afterwards, he takes her in his arms, strokes her “between her soft warm buttocks, coming nearer and nearer to the quick of her.” He is roused again and she “yielded with a quiver that was like death” and “went all open to him.”

...It might come with the thrust of a sword in her softly-opened body, and that would be death. But it came with a strange slow thrust of peace, the dark thrust of peace and a ponderous, primordial tenderness, such as made the world in the beginning ... She dared to let go everything, all herself, and be gone in the flood.

Finally, “in a soft shuddering convulsion, the quick of all her plasm was touched, she knew herself touched, the consummation was upon her, and she was gone. She was gone, she was not, and she was born: a woman.”

From then on, it is the malignancy of the “insentient iron world,” particularly through the agency of Clifford and Mellors' former wife, that the two must prevent from destroying them. Mellors tells her about his unhappy past with women and that he believes “in fucking with a warm heart”—that all would go well with the world if men and women could only do that. “It's all this cold-hearted fucking that is death and idiocy.” Pregnant, she has to leave him for awhile so that he will not appear to be the father of the child, and her last night with him is “a night of sensual passion, in which she was a little started and almost unwilling.” Mellors had always shown special attention to her buttocks and anus—he says she has “the nicest, nicest woman’s arse as is.” Now she lets him penetrate her anus, and the “piercing thrills of passion, different, sharper, more terrible than the thrills of tenderness ... shook her to her foundations, stripped her to the very last, and made a different woman of her. It was not really love.” These thrills burn out “the deepest, oldest shames, in the most secret places. It cost her an effort to let him have his way and will with her. She had to be a passive, consenting thing, like a slave ... “She experiences “all the refinements of passion, the extravagances of sensuality” such as are shown “on the Greek vases, everywhere!” “In the short summer night,” the novel tells us, “she learnt so much. She would have thought a woman would have died of shame. Instead of which, the shame died.” At the end of the novel, Mellors is away learning farming, preparatory to living a life with her.

Of course, Lady Chatterley’s Lover, just because it is such a “Pilgrim’s Progress,” as Wayne Burns calls it, may not be as great a novel when judged by literary criteria as The Rainbow or Women In Love. Two earlier versions exist. In both, and especially in the first, Mellors is less of a paragon. The second version may be more novelistic than the final version. But the final version gives Lawrence’s sexual views in their most evolved, coherent, and explicit form. After remaining underground for decades, these views gained publicity during the Lawrence revival of the 1950s and ‘60s, especially after the 1959 trial that allowed its publication in the United States. It is not going too far to say that reading Lawrence influenced the youth movements of the ‘60s—but to what extent his message was understood is open to question.

Biography

Born in Eastwood, Nottinghamshire, September 11, 1885, fourth of five children of a collier whose wife was a former schoolteacher. Attended Beauvale Board School, Nottingham High School. Winter 1901–1902 fell gravely ill with pneumonia. Became teacher in Eastwood, began first novel, attended Nottingham University College. Met Mrs. Frieda Weekley (née von Richthofen) in 1912, eloped with her to Metz, returned to England in 1913 and married her after her divorce. The Rainbow published in 1915 and ordered destroyed for its sexual content. After that it was difficult for him to earn a living as a writer. Lived with help from friends and patrons, and after the war traveled (Italy, Australia, Mexico, and New Mexico, where Mabel Dodge Luhan gave him a small ranch), wrote fiction, poetry, literary criticism, essays, and, later, painted. Lady Chatterley’s Lover privately printed in Italy in 1928, banned in the United States until 1959. Died of tuberculosis in Vence in southern France on March 2, 1930.

GERALD BUTLER

Selected Works

- The White Peacock*. 1911.
- Sons and Lovers*. 1913.
- The Prussian Officer*. 1914.
- The Rainbow*. 1915.
- Women In Love*. 1920.
- Psychoanalysis and the Unconscious*. 1921.
- Fantasia of the Unconscious*. 1922.
- Lady Chatterley’s Lover*. 1928.
- A Propos of Lady Chatterley’s Lover*. 1930.
- The Man Who Died*. 1931.
- Etruscan Places*. 1932.
- Foreword to Women In Love*. 1936.
- The First Lady Chatterley*. 1944.
- Sex, Literature and Censorship*. 1955.
- Complete Poems*. 1964.
- The Paintings of D.H. Lawrence*. 1964.
- Mr. Noon*. 1984.
- Study of Thomas Hardy and Other Essays*. Ed. Bruce Steele, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985.
- Letters*. (7 vols). 1979–1993.

Further Reading

- Aldington, Richard. D. H. Lawrence: Portrait of a Genius, But... New York: Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, 1950.
- Balbert, Peter. D.H. Lawrence and the Phallic Imagination: Essays on Sexual Identity and Feminist Misreading. Houndmills and London: Macmillan Press, 1989.
- Burns, Wayne. “Lady Chatterley’s Lover: A Pilgrim’s Progress for Our Time.” Paunch 26 (1966) 16–33.
- Butler, Gerald J. This Is Carbon: A Defense of Lawrence’s The Rainbow against his Admirers. Seattle: Genitron, 1986.
- Chambers, Jessie. The Collected Letters, The D.H. Lawrence Review 12 (1979).

LE PETIT, CLAUDE

- Clark, Colin. River of Dissolution: D.H. Lawrence and English Romanticism. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1969.
- Delany, Paul. D.H. Lawrence's Nightmare: The Writer and His Circle in the Years of the Great War. New York: Basic Books, 1978.
- Draper, R.P. D.H. Lawrence: The Critical Heritage. New York: Barnes and Noble, 1970.
- Green, Martin. The von Richthofen Sisters: The Triumphant and the Tragic Modes of Love. New York: Basic Books, 1974.

- Mensch, Barbara. D.H. Lawrence and the Authoritarian Personality. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1991.
- Meyers, Jeffrey. D.H. Lawrence: A Biography. New York: Knopf, 1990.
- Maddox, Brenda. D.H. Lawrence: The Story of a Marriage. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1994.
- Moore, Harry T. The Priest of Love: A Life of D. H. Lawrence. Middlesex, England: Penguin, 1974.

---

LE PETIT, CLAUDE

---

c. 1638–1662
French libertine poet

Claude Le Petit began his writing career in order to pay for his law studies. When only seventeen years old, he helped correct proofs of the controversial L'École des filles and authored its preface, the Madrigal. His choice of subject matter and candid detail, together with his forthright views on established religion, were to prove his downfall. When the capital's police commissioner succeeded in having a troupe of prostitutes sent to America, Le Petit was inspired to write L'Adieu des filles de joye à la ville de Paris [Farewells of Paris's Goodtime Girls] (1657) a 320-verse poem which criticized the political expediency and ultimate futility of the punishment. The passion with which this case was considered reflects Le Petit's affinity with those falling foul of society's norms. He became editor of La Muse du Coeur, a weekly gazette, which lasted for eight issues. Contrary to the customary anonymity of this type of publication, he put his name to five out of the eight editions. After returning to Paris in 1661, he began writing satirical pieces such as La chronique scandaleuse ou Paris ridicule [The Scandalous Chronicle or Ridiculous Paris]. The work's title emulated Rome ridicule of Saint-Amant and Paris is depicted as 'la cité de merde' [shit city] and the Jesuits are described as 'Fouëtteurs de petits enfans' [child-beaters]. Members of the order, as well as the recently deceased Mazarin, are accused of being avid practitioners of sodomy. In doing so, he was projecting a common insult hurled against libertine writers back to the camp of the accusers. He composed the Apologie de Chausson—a sonnet inspired by the case of Jacques Chausson who, together with his accomplice Jacques Paulmier, was burnt at the stake on December 29 1661, for the multiple rape of young boys. A novel entitled L'Heure du Berger appeared in 1662. This is a fantasy about a young man whose mistress is unfaithful, despite the fact she has always refused him sexual relations, and who spends a night of libidinous abandon with a mysterious woman he encounters.

His collection of poetical works, Le bordel des muses ou les neuf Pucelles putains, caprices satiriques de Théophile le jeune [The Muses' Bordello or the Nine Virginal Whores, Satirical Whims of Théophile the Younger] (1662), would later secure his conviction for blasphemy. One of the sonnets in this edition, 'Aux Précieuses,' alludes to lesbianism with its mention of a 'godemichi,' or dildo. This poem criticizes the precieuses, an intellectual movement of courtly women, and accuses them of hypocrisy by seeking satisfaction interchangeably in letters and sexuality (both solitary and Sapphic). This was published with the assistance of the two sons of the printer Pierre Rebuffé, and the title indicates that Le Petit saw himself as the literary heir of Théophile de Viau's subversive tradition. The collection contains earlier poems such as Paris ridicule as well as new material. The first of the Bordel's dedicatory sonnets is named the 'Sonnet fourtatif' [Fucking sonnet] and is a laudatory description of various sexual pleasures, including male and female sodomy. This abrupt opening, and its use of straightforward vocabulary to describe sexual acts with no discrimination between heterosexuality and homosexuality, sets Le Petit's agenda and describes sexuality in a manner that goes beyond his self-proclaimed master, Théophile. Sonnet LIX attacks the cult of the Virgin Mary, though it is primarily a parody of flamboyant and excessive devotion and religious hypocrisy. Such anti-religious satire was an established feature of libertine writers such as Brantôme. While he owed a debt to his parish priest for having tutored him as a child, Le Petit's experiences at the capital's Jesuit college colored his judgement of the clergy. He opined that the Jesuits ran his alma mater 'par pure sodomie' ('out of pure sodomy'). The fact that he also penned a religious work, Les plus belles pensées de saint Augustin, prince et docteur de l'Eglise [Selected Thoughts of St. Augustine, Prince and Doctor of the Church] (1666), and took the trouble of having it examined and gaining the approval of three doctors of the Faculty of theology at the Sorbonne on 9 October 1661, demonstrates that he never entirely rejected Catholicism. It is curious that this treatise was not published, nor was it alluded to at his trial as a defence against suspicions of heresy and atheism.

The writer had attracted the attention of the ecclesiastical and civil establishment, and after the authorities got wind of the Bordel's existence, this provided an opportunity to precipitate his downfall. When Daubray, a police official, surprised Le Petit red-handed with a manuscript of work, his fate was sealed. The largely unknown twenty-four-year-old poet lacked the assistance of powerful protectors that had helped Théophile de Viau escape the death penalty, and had the misfortune to be writing during a climate of increasing official anxiety towards a burgeoning genre of obscene-themed literature (already tested to the limits by contemporary writers such as Molière). He came to the attention of the authorities as an ideal candidate for receiving an exemplary punishment. Despite the fact that all copies of the work were destroyed by official order, a clandestine edition was published in Leiden in 1663. Le Petit's principal and dubious distinction, however, lies in the fact that he became the first, and the only, writer to be executed for the cause of censorship in seventeenth-century France.

Biography

Born at Beuvreuil in Normandie, the son of a Parisian tailor, in 1637 or 1638. Educated at the Jesuit Collège de Clermont, Paris and passed first law examinations, 1655. Murdered an Augustinian friar as an act of revenge for the cleric's public disapproval of him, October 1657: fled France to avoid justice, spending time in Spain, Germany, Bohemia, Italy; returned to Paris, February 1661. Arrested for the clandestine publication of a licentious work: condemned for lèse-majesté against God and the saints, 26 August 1662; burnt alive after having been strangled beforehand, 1 September, 1662.

PAUL SCOTT

Selected Works

L'Heure du Berger. Paris: Antoine Robinot, 1662.
Les Œuvres libertines de Claude Le Petit. Edited by Frédéric Lachèvre, Paris: Capiomont, 1918.

Further Reading

Alexandrian, Sarane. Histoire de la littérature érotique. Paris: Payot et Rivages, 1995.
 DeJean, Joan. The Reinvention of Obscenity: Sex, Lies, and Tabloids in Early Modern France. Chicago, IL: Chicago University Press, 2002.
 Pia, Pascal. Les Livres de l'Enfer du XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle à nos jours. 2 vols, Paris: Coulet et Faure, 1978.
 Schoeller, Guy (ed.), Dictionnaire des œuvres érotiques. Paris: Laffont, 2001.

---

LÉAUTAUD, PAUL

---

1872–1956

French novelist, essayist, theatre critic and diarist

Having resolved to devote himself wholly to writing, Paul Léautaud chose himself as his prime subject matter. His legendary misanthropy, misogyny (“I love woman, I do not like women”), and concern for animal welfare clearly stemmed from his unhappy and solitary childhood as told in Le Petit Ami (1903) and In memoriam (1905). He was abandoned by his mother, an aspiring actress, only a few days after his birth and it was his father, not an affectionate man, who raised him. Marie Pezée, a former prostitute, was hired to look after the child and acted as surrogate mother until she was dismissed in 1880 after reproaching her employer for setting a bad example to the child with his turbulent love-life. Paul Léautaud’s mother rarely visited him and he felt her absence keenly. In 1881, not wishing to see her son in the presence of his father’s sixteen-year-old mistress, she had the boy sent to her hotel room. He found her still in bed, barely clothed; it was the first time he had seen a woman “in such intimacy” and was greatly troubled by it. When he saw her again, in 1901, he was a man, and their meeting marked the beginning of a correspondence (Lettres à ma mère, 1956) whose incestuous overtones she found increasingly compromising and which she quickly brought to an end. Thirty-six years later, aged sixty-five, Léautaud was still dreaming about his mother: “I found myself with my mother (...) After lunch we made love very passionately, on her part and mine (...). She was completely naked, her face shining with pleasure. I’ve always had her—in my dreams.”

Except for three early autobiographical narratives, collected theater criticism, a few essays, and extracts from his diaries, Paul Léautaud published relatively little during his lifetime. He only came to prominence as a literary figure in his late seventies, when, in 1951, he reluctantly agreed to be interviewed at length for French national radio; his audience, particularly the young, were stunned and charmed by his biting wit and sparkling conversation. The publication of his Journal littéraire (Journal of a Man of Letters) started the following year, but only three of the nineteen volumes appeared before he died in 1954. He emerged as an erotic writer in 1956 when his editor Marie Dormoy revealed the existence of a personal diary, Le Journal particulier, 1917–1950, which she published as a limited edition in what we now know to be an edited version. A second personal diary was published thirty years later, after Marie Dormoy’s death and at her request: It included the entries for the year 1933 concerning the beginning of her affair with Léautaud, which lasted until his death and remained secret until her own.

Le Fléau. Journal particulier, 1917–1930

The first personal diary re-edited in 1989 focuses on Léautaud’s enduring affair with Anne Cayssac, whom he nicknamed la Panthère [The Panther] and later le Fléau [The Scourge]. This personal diary is a detailed record of their “sessions,” and a lucid, though obsessive account of his sexual dependency on a married woman, several years his senior, that he did not even like. She was a cantankerous, dominating, and possessive person, whose caring love for animals did not extend to the human species: “All my life,” Léautaud wrote at the time, “I shall never have any luck where love and tenderness are concerned.” It was with her, however, that at the age of forty-two he started enjoying sex to the full. She had a formidable appetite for sex and was never so ardent and attractive to him as after some violent outburst. They were perfectly matched: “She was,” he wrote, “the partner I had dreamed of, a being (...) possessing to the highest degree what I call the spirit of love, that is to say extreme licentiousness in word, attitude and gesture.” As he explained in Amour, a small volume of aphorisms inspired by le Fléau, love for him was first and foremost “physical sensual attraction, (...) pleasure given and received, (...) mutual enjoyment, (and) the union of two human beings made for each other sexually.” “The rest,” he added, “the exaggerations, the sighs, the uplifting of the souls, are jokes, (...) the dreams of minds that are refined and impotent.”

Journal particulier, 1933

In contrast to the first personal diary, which misses the entries for the first three years of the relationship with Anne Cayssac lent to her but never returned, the second private diary focuses exclusively on the year 1933 which saw the beginning of his relationship with Marie Dormoy. Léautaud was then, by all accounts, a wrinkled, toothless, shabbily dressed and smelly sixty-one-year old, and Dormoy an elegant and buxom forty-six-year old. The age difference was of concern to him and he was reluctant at first to respond to her advances: The affair with le Fléau was not quite over and he worried about the effect the new relationship might have on his health and his work. The diary gives a remarkably egotistic and crude account of the affair, which at first seems to only offer basic sexual gratification: Marie Dormoy’s body compared most unfavorably with Anne Cayssac’s and did not please him. As time passed, however, Léautaud became undeniably sensitive to her own characteristic beauty, her sexuality, and the way she cared for him. It is this gradual and understated awakening of emotion in a man entering old age that distinguishes this diary from the previous one.

The tone and style of the diaries, however, vary little. Léautaud, who was the epitome of the self-taught man, rejected all forms of literary embellishment. In novels, he insisted, we are never told about the “little wet mess” that follows the lovers’ embrace, and the embarrassing moments that ensue. Wary as he was of anything that remotely resembled grand, academic, or literary style, he opted for a spontaneous form of writing, akin in its simplicity to “written conversation”: “Anything worthwhile is written straight off, in the almost physical pleasure of writing, in the heat of the mind full of its subject.” Léautaud, whose sole purpose in life was to write, used the word “pleasure” to describe both writing and sex. In the personal diaries, the two are inextricably linked, and what he says about experiences being more strongly felt and intensely savored when he wrote about them than when he actually lived through them also applies to the erotic.

Biography

Born in Paris, January 18, 1872. Abandoned by his mother and raised by his father in Paris (1874–1882) and Courbevoie, a suburb of Paris (1882–1887). Left school aged 15 and held various office jobs in Paris, 1887–1908. Published his first essay in Le Mercure de France in 1895 and started moving in literary circles; was appointed secretary to Le Mercure de France, both a literary journal and a publishing house, in 1908 (dismissed 1941). As “Boissard,” was drama critic for Le Mercure de France, 1907–1920, La Nouvelle Revue française, 1921–1923, and Les Nouvelles littéraires in 1923. Never married but had lasting relationships with Jeanne Marié, 1889–1892, Georgette Crozier, 1894–1895, Blanche Blanc, 1898–1912, Anne Cayssac, 1914–1934, and Marie Dormoy from 1933 onwards. Wrote the first entry in his diary on November 3, 1893, and the last one on February 15, 1956. Died in Fontenay-aux-Roses, February 22, 1956.

MIREILLE RIBIÈRE

Selected Works

- Le Petit Ami*. 1903. In memoriam, 1905, Amours, 1906 ; reprinted in one volume, 1956; as The Child of Montmartre, translated by Humphrey Hare, 1959.
- Amour, Aphorismes*. 1934.
- Journal particulier*. 1917–1950, edited by Marie Dormoy, 2 vols., 1956; re-edited as Le Fléau, Journal particulier 1917–1930, suivi d’un fragment inédit 1932, edited by Edith Silve, 1989.
- Journal particulier de Paul Léautaud, 1933*. Edited by Edith Silve, 1986.

Further Reading

- Brou, Jacques. Paul Léautaud: le sexe et la plume. Paris: La pensée universelle, 1985.
- Franco, Henri G. Portrait of a misanthrope. Sherbrooke (Québec, Canada): Éditions Naaman, 1987.
- Harding, James. Lost illusions: Paul Léautaud and his world. London: Allen & Unwin, 1974.

---

LEDUC, VIOLETTE

---

1907–1972

French writer

Violette Leduc (1907–1972) has often been called France's greatest unknown writer. Admired by Jean Genêt and championed by Simone de Beauvoir, she had written three novels before she gained any serious critical attention. That attention came not for a work of fiction but for the first volume of her autobiography, La Bâtarde (1964). Her illegitimacy and its effect on her relationship with her mother, her poverty, her affairs, and her face, described by Simone de Beauvoir as “brutally ugly and radiantly alive”—all are a part of the fabric of that text. La Bâtarde established a dialogue with Leduc's novels; the autobiography doubled as a guide to understanding her earlier fictional texts. When considered in retrospect, Leduc's three earlier novels, L'Asphyxie (In the Prison of Her Skin) [1946], L'Affamée (Ravenous) [1948], and Ravages (1955), can be read as alternate visions of La Bâtarde. While such autofiction has become the norm for twentieth century literature (from writers as diverse as André Gide and Annie Ernaux), Leduc's works bring sexuality and sexual relationships, both lesbian and heterosexual, to the fore. Indeed, the originality of a woman writing openly about these topics created the scandal of her writing.

Leduc's works, fiction and autobiography alike, focus nearly exclusively on their female protagonist, her experiences of love and sexuality, and her disappointments. Leduc's sexual and emotional experiences with women and men, her long-term relationships with homosexual writers and intellectuals such as Maurice Sachs, Jacques Guérin, and Jean Genêt find their fictional counterparts in her novels, as most tellingly does her obsessive relationship with Simone de Beauvoir, who in some ways functioned as Leduc's ideal reader, her only intended audience. The erotic nature of the text substitutes for the unfulfilled relationship between Leduc and de Beauvoir. Leduc's fiction illustrates the range of her stylistic experimentation and themes while her style of writing has been likened to a sexualization of the text.

L'Affamée [Ravenous], 1948

Understanding Leduc's relationship with Simone de Beauvoir can serve as key to mapping the complex literary space of her fiction and autobiographical writings. L'Affamée presents an hallucinatory vision of the beginnings of the ambiguous relationship with “Madame,” the object of the narrator's fixation. Its form is an interior monologue, with no cohesive chronological structure. Hunger and sexual longing define the progression of the narrative. The narrator recounts her struggle to reach “Madame” in a series of unconnected, often violent fantasies. For example, the unrequited, unsatiated hunger inspires images of self-mutilation: “I know you're hungry. Slice your flesh. Eat.” (184) Both in form and theme, the text recalls Surrealist literature through its series of random violent images.

Finally, the narrator accepts her separation from “Madame” and realizes that the only way to bridge the chasm is through writing. The novel closes with the revelation: “To love is difficult but to love is a grace.” (254) L'Affamée overflows the boundaries of fiction and lays bare Leduc's obsession with de Beauvoir. The novel defines their later relationship in terms of a jouissance in literary, rather than sexual, terms.

Ravages (1955)

Leduc's third novel originally began with the account of a lesbian relationship between two adolescent girls in a boarding school. This section, “Thérèse et Isabelle,” was cut from the original Gallimard edition of the novel because of lesbian sexual acts between the narrator, Thérèse, and another schoolgirl, Isabelle. Gaston Gallimard and the senior staff worried about the potential repercussions from the publication of such a work, including a possible trial for obscenity. The moral climate of 1954, they concluded, would not tolerate such a frank description of lesbianism. After Gallimard's censorship of the novel, Jacques Guérin convinced Leduc to create a fake manuscript version of "Thérèse et Isabelle," which he published privately in a limited collector's edition. Eventually the reception of "Thérèse et Isabelle" elicited enough interest that Gallimard issued a highly edited version separately, in 1966. However, it was not until 2000 that Gallimard published the unexpurgated text.

The erotic scenes of the "Thérèse and Isabelle" episode shocked because of their frankness but Leduc had deliberately set out to challenge literary conventions. No other woman writer had written so explicitly about sex, least of all lesbian sex. The search of a new language for female sexuality leads Leduc to intertwine metaphors "we felt the rustling of taffeta in the hollow of our hands" with graphic details "she ... bruised my pubis with her thigh thrust between mine." Overall the descriptions are lyric and sensual in tone.

Ravages also recounts Thérèse's second relationship with a woman, a schoolteacher named Cécile whom Thérèse meets later in life. Thérèse and Cécile fall into the mold of a same-sex bourgeois couple. Cécile takes on the role of the provider while Thérèse becomes a housewife. Yet a second relationship develops between Thérèse and a weak young man whom she eventually marries. She becomes pregnant, has an abortion, and divorces. The parallels with Leduc's life are obvious. But the novel goes beyond the writing of the self. The complex interplay of the gender roles, traditional and non-traditional, and the tensions they create form the backdrop of each episode. Leduc's language loses much of the previous lyricism of prologue in describing the sexual encounters of her protagonist while retaining its sensuality. The tone becomes harsher, marked by short sentences that echo Thérèse's suffering.

Le Taxi (1971)

Leduc's last novella, Le Taxi, explores a different type of taboo, incest between an adolescent brother and sister.

Come inside me!

...

Hurry up ...

I am inside you.

All the way!

Thus begins a series of twelve dialogues that take place in a taxi hired for the purpose of a day of love-making and revelry away from the rest of the world. The brief conversations, punctuated by the young couple's repeated sex acts, trace the progression of the taxi through the city and reveal the long preparation that had gone into this single day. To the question: "are we perverse?" comes the reply "we're privileged," exemplifying the attitude of the youths. The setting recalls both the claustrophobic atmosphere of Cocteau's Enfants terribles and Leon and Emma's ride in Flaubert's Madame Bovary, while the disembodied voices parallels the works of Marguerite Duras and Nathalie Sarraute. Unlike the lushness of Leduc's erotic language in "Thérèse and Isabelle," here the sparseness of text highlights the exuberance of the protagonists. Of all of Leduc's text, this one is unmarked by despair or suffering; rather it exemplifies desire satisfied.

Biography

Born in Arras, 7 April 1907, illegitimate daughter of Berthe Leduc, a maid, and André Debaralle. Educated primarily in boarding schools, 1912–1926; failed baccalaureate in 1927. Moved to Vincennes in 1928, liaison with Denise Hertgès, 1928–1935. Took secretarial job with the publishing firm Plon in Paris, 1928–1932. Scriptwriter for Synops, 1937–1939. Married to Jacques Mercier in 1939; separated; 1941; divorced, 1947. Worked for various magazines during World War II; also engaged in black-market traffic. Traveled extensively from 1951–1955: central and southern France, Italy, Belgium, and the Netherlands, Spain. Hospitalized for a "nervous breakdown" in Versailles for six months, 1956–57. First visit to Faucon, 1961; bought house and settled there in 1965. Died of cancer in Faucon, 28 May 1972.

EDITH J. BENKOV

Selected Works

Fiction

L'Asphyxie. Paris: Gallimard, 1946; translated by Derek Coltman as In the Prison of Her Skin. London: Hart-Davis, 1970.

L'Affamée. Paris: Gallimard, 1948.

Ravages. Paris: Gallimard, 1955; translated by Derek Coltman with Therese and Isabelle. London: Arthur Baker, 1966.

LEGMAN, GERSHON (G. LEGMAN, ROGER-MAXE DE LA GLANNEGE)

La Vieille Fille et le mort. Paris: Gallimard, 1958.
Thérèse et Isabelle. Paris: Gallimard, 1966; complete edition 2000.
Trésors à prendre. Paris: Gallimard, 1960.
Le Taxi. Paris: Gallimard, 1971; translated by Helen Weaver, New York: Farrar, Strauss, 1972.

Autobiography

La Bâtarde. Preface by Simone de Beauvoir. Paris: Gallimard, 1964.
La Folie en tête. Paris: Gallimard, 1971.
La Chasse à l'amour. Paris: Gallimard, 1973.

Further Reading

De Courtivon, Isabelle. Violette Leduc. Boston: Twayne, 1985.

Hall, Colette Trout. Violette Leduc la mal-aimée. Amsterdam, Netherlands: Rodopi, 1999.
Hughes, Alex. "Desire and Its Discontents: Violette Leduc/La Bâtarde/The Failure of Love" in French Erotic Fiction: Women's Desiring Writing, 1880–1990, Alex Hughes and Kate Ince, eds. Berg. Oxford 1996; 69–92.
———. Violette Leduc: Mothers, Lovers and Language. London: Maney, 1994
Lacey, Elizabeth. The Pleasures of the Text: Violette Leduc and Reader Seduction. Rowman and Littlefield, 2002.
Marks, Elaine. "Lesbian Intertextuality" in Homosexualities and French Literature. George Stambolian and Elaine Marks, eds. Cornell University Press, 1979; 353–377.

---

LEGMAN, GERSHON (G. LEGMAN, ROGER-MAXE DE LA GLANNEGE)

---

1917–1999
American folklorist, bibliographer, lexicographer, and fiction writer

A polymath of extraordinary reach, Gershon Legman mapped the margins of popular culture. Over his long career he championed origami (the art of Japanese paper-folding), attacked the initiation rites of the medieval order of the Knights Templar, critiqued the typography of the fifteenth-century printer William Caxton, translated Ubi Roi by Alfred Jarry, and compiled a bibliography on the economist David Ricardo, but he devoted himself chiefly to the study of sexual humor and folklore. Personally irascible, he shared his erudition and insights generously; his home on the Riviera, crammed with a lifetime's collection of erotic materials, was the center of research into sexual folklore until the waning of censorship in the late twentieth century emboldened less courageous scholars. That censorship was real, and it prevented formal publication of some of Legman's work; as a result, many items appeared in pamphlets of limited circulation or languish still in manuscript.

Too little is known about his early life (though he claimed that his parents wanted him to be a rabbi) to analyze Legman's personality and achievements with the unrepentant Freudianism he himself used to interpret oral and written expression, but it is evident that he was motivated by a fascination with sexuality, a passion for collecting, and a moral sense that manifested itself in continuous polemic. As a young man, he crusaded for women's rights and for rational population control, but gradually his energies flowed into an increasingly opinionated examination of a culture warped by its refusal to accept sex as a natural part of life. A residual puritanism, however, shaped his concept of the "natural": he often seemed homophobic, despite his advocacy of oral sex for all genders; he claimed that women who wore trousers or depilated their pubic hair were "neurotic"; he excoriated drugs and rock 'n'roll music, terming the latter fascistic; he sneered at the “sexual revolution” of the 1960s, and called it a sham.

In the 1930s, Legman was one of several New York writers in the “Organization,” an informal group writing erotica for a wealthy private patron. Legman composed some of the stories that made up the Oxford Thesis series of erotic typescripts originally begun by Lupton Wilkinson, who wrote on commission for Oklahoma millionaire Roy Johnson (see entry on Mentulus, L. Erectus). Legman wrote The Passionate Pedant (1939) for Johnson himself, and kept copies to print for clandestine audiences. He probably assembled the volumes called A Further Oxford Thesis on Love (1938) and A Later Oxford Thesis on Love (1939) from stories anonymously written by himself, Clement Wood, Anaïs Nin, Carresse Crosby, Robert DeNiro, Sr. (father of the actor), and other members of the Organization. He probably helped his boyhood friend Robert Sewall (see entry on Sewall) gather other stories for The Oxford Professor (c.1948), and may have written some of that volume. The Kinsey Institute holds several short stories attributed to Legman (e. g., “Chippie Wagon” [1941?]). Writing erotica taught Legman a good deal about narrative and style (among writers, he admired Denis Diderot, Jules Michelet, and Thomas Carlyle) though he tired quickly of this opportunistic enterprise, and turned it over to Henry Miller and Anaïs Nin. Ironically, given his preeminence in underground bibliography, Legman himself never sorted out the provenance of these surreptitious volumes. Failures of memory aside, the reason for his reticence is just as ironic: despite a career of collecting, recording, and analyzing sub-genres, Legman avoided vulgarity in his own work, and actually sanitized the sadistic elements of one edition of Sewall’s famous The Devil’s Advocate. Legman’s first book for the general public, Orogenitalism: An Encyclopaedic Outline of Oral Technique in Genital Excitation Part 1: Cunnilinctus (1940), written under the anagram Roger-Maxe de La Glannége, was a manual on cunnilingus distinguished not only by his typically exhaustive treatment of technique but also by the careful diction he employed. (He later expanded the work to include fellatio.)

During the early 1940s, Legman’s interest in outlaw sub-cultures manifested itself in a lexicographical essay, “The Language of Homosexuality: An American Glossary” (1941), and in his collaboration with birth control activist Robert Latou Dickinson and with the odd “Kenneth S. Green” (aka Rex King), a pedophile, on the latter’s massive diaries on penis size and infant orgasm, which Green sent to Alfred C. Kinsey, who would unwisely use some of Green’s statistics in Sexual Behavior in the Human Male (1948). Through Dickinson, Legman met Kinsey, who hired him (in 1942?) to build archives for what would become (in 1947) the Institute for Sex Research (ISR) at Indiana University in Bloomington (now the Kinsey Institute for Research in Sex, Gender, and Reproduction). Although his passion for bibliography and folklore blossomed here, Legman left few traces at the ISR or at the prototype of Indiana’s Folklore Institute, founded in 1942 by Stith Thompson, who was soon joined by Richard Dorson, to systematize the study of folklore. Thompson devised the tale type index and the motif index to systemize comparative study of folkways, but declined to classify obscene materials. Dorson, also a seminal figure in folklore because of his insistence on the cultural and ethnic context of folk materials, later denied Legman a university instructorship on the grounds that he and Ozark folklorist Vance Randolph were simply “scholar-tramps” (Roll Me in Your Arms, 24), because the two were convinced of the value of “obscene” folklore that respectable academics shunned.

During his sojourn at Indiana University, Legman worked on bibliographic projects such as “Toward an Historical Bibliography of Sex Technique,” which catalogued photographs in the Kinsey archives by types of sexual behavior. Kinsey fired Legman in 1945, apparently over disputes about purchases and cataloguing of materials (Gathorne-Hardy, 232). A few years later, Legman published “Minority Report on Kinsey,” an attack on the sexologist for having used improperly gathered statistics, especially those on homosexuality, to buttress the conclusions of Sexual Behavior in the Human Male. Feeling beleaguered, Legman wrote “Sex Censorship in the U.S.A.” (1945) to contrast American and European attitudes towards sexual representation.

With financing from Jay Landesman, a St. Louis millionaire, Legman founded the journal Neurotica (1947–1951) to publish essays by Allen Ginsberg, Marshall McLuhan, Larry Rivers, Lawrence Durrell, and others. The journal’s title suggested its thesis, that society had succumbed to psychic disorder, a syndrome best examined, Legman thought, by focusing on documents of popular culture. Legman's own Neurotica essays formed the nucleus of Love and Death: A Study in Censorship (1949), rejected by 42 publishers until Legman published it himself. In the volume he developed the argument he would elaborate again and again. For Legman, the "degeneracy" of American culture, as manifest in its choice of representations, was the result of its sublimation of natural sexual desire into preferences for violence and sadism. The more a culture represses sexual representations, said Legman, the more it will embrace violent images as socially acceptable substitutes. Because writers, filmmakers, and artists were forbidden to depict human desire honestly and candidly, audiences became used to seeing guns rather than penises, and aggression rather than affection. Worse, he said, a public fed a steady diet of mediated violence was far more likely to accept violence as a solution to social problems. Love and Death's chapter called "Not for Children," a reworking of the Neurotica essay "The Psychopathology of the Comics," was an analysis of comic books deformed by sexualized violence; it foreshadowed the celebrated anti-comic book campaign of Frederic Wertham. Other chapters of Love and Death targeted writers such as Raymond Chandler, Dashiell Hammett, Ernest Hemingway, and Philip Wylie, all of whom Legman charged with maligning women by casting them either as sadists ("Avatars of the Bitch") or as victims ("Open Season on Women"). Despite praise for the volume from Leslie Fiedler and William Carlos Williams, among others, the Post Office harassed Legman for trying to sell Love and Death through the mail.

Relocating to France in 1953 permitted Legman to pursue his career as a "scholar-tramp," albeit an impoverished one. Supporting himself with freelance writing, editing, the compiling of anthologies, and a small inheritance from a relative, he began in earnest his investigation of erotica, its classification, and the bibliographic efforts that recovering prohibited printed texts and oral expression required. Two books established his credentials. The first, The Horn Book; and Other Bibliographic Problems (1953, later expanded in 1964 to The Horn Book: Studies in Erotic Folklore and Bibliography) grew out of Legman's tracing of editions of a famous text, The Horn Book: A Girl's Guide to the Knowledge of Good and Evil (1899), a guide to sexual technique. Legman's sleuthing revealed the activities of bibliographers such as Henry Spencer Ashbee, Louis Perceau, and Jules Gay, bookdealer-publishers such as Charles Carrington and Eric Dingwall, lexicographer-writers such as J.S. Farmer and William Henley, and collectors such as Bernard de La Monnoye and the Duc de la Vallière. Other chapters dealt with Legman's enthusiasms: Robert Burns's The Merry Muses of Caledonia, bawdy songs, limericks, and the need for a motif-index for erotic humor to fill out Thompson's index. Here Legman announced what amounted to his creed: "Sexual folklore is, with the lore of children, the only form of folklore still in uncontaminated and authentic folk transmission in the Western world. It has thumbed its nose for centuries at both censorship and print" (1964, 288). Cranky and colorful, the volume remains indispensable to students of erotica.

The second book, The Limerick (also 1953), gathered more than 1700 examples of "the only fixed poetic form original to the English language" (1969, lxxii) under a series of categories (e. g., "Strange Intercourse," "Virginity," "Buggery," "Prostitution"). In his introduction to the volume, Legman traced the limerick from its oral beginnings as nonsensical bawdy and satire to its more recent combination of intellectual ingenuity and obscenity ("the folk-expression" of academics [1969, xlv]), noting that periodic efforts to compose "clean" limericks invariably made them nasty ("the substitution of an allowed sadism for a prohibited sexual normality" [1969, xliii]). In a later second collection, The New Limerick (1977), organized in categories similar to those in the first volume, Legman tried to distinguish between limericks that qualified as "true folklore" and those that did not. He estimated that only a tenth of those he had collected, those "everyone knows," had actually "entered the authentic stream of orally transmitted folklore" (1980, xxx), but aside from noting the importance of constant repetition he did not shed much light on the dynamics of transmission.

Classifying examples on a scale of anxieties did not serve Legman well in the projects for which he is best known: The Rationale of the Dirty Joke: An Analysis of Sexual Humor (1968) and Rationale of the Dirty Joke, Second Series (1975). Critics lauded Legman for amassing hundreds of jokes, but suggested that his analyses were superficial and sloppy, the result of allowing his thesis that sexual humor masks aggression to foreclose other interpretations. Reviews criticized him for insisting that “a person’s favorite joke is the key to that person’s character” (1968, 16) on the grounds that the joke reveals the teller’s secret fears even as he makes light of his neurosis, and also for claiming that the listener to a joke is the real butt of the humor (1975, 20). Critics also dismissed his attacks on such structural analyses as Vladimir Propp’s Morphology of the Folktale, observing that it was naive for Legman to claim that content alone determines the meaning of a joke. Folklorists chided him for failing to provide the context of jokes, for classifying jokes according to their hostile motifs, for never providing a promised index to the two volumes, and, above all, for summarizing rather than printing versions verbatim.

Legman deliberately summarized jokes rather than commit them accurately to print in the not so paradoxical hope of preserving their oral ephemerality. Doing so, however, exposed a contradiction in his principal thesis. If western cultures systematically warp sexual discourse into violent language and images, then why does the folklore he so meticulously compiled also exhibit the same aggressive traits? Oral transmissions in a past less given to censorship should have escaped the kinds of sublimation that Legman detects in print and visual media of the twentieth century. Legman’s methodology exhibits the perils of studying folklore, a discipline that embraces what are at base mysterious forms of communication. Ideally, theories should arise from careful comparative examination of examples, but the sheer volume of jokes, stories, and legends often reverses the process; theory and categorization are invoked from the outset to impose order on the chaos of conflicting examples.

Moreover, Legman’s faith in folklore as the primary, universal source of erotic representation led him to make extravagant claims about its vulgar but democratic commonality. “All folklore is erotic,” he would insist in “Erotic Folksongs and Ballads: An International Bibliography,” an amazing list of samizdat versions, spin-offs, reprints, paperback editions, and other mutations of jokes, stories, songs, ballads, and broadsides that he published in 1990. Folklore is not simply a term used to distinguish venerable stories that contain obscenity from narratives that aspire to literary status: “Folklore,” said Legman, “is the voice of those who have no other voice, and would not be listened to if they did.” (“Erotic Folksongs,” 417).

Despite serious illness, he took on his last massive project. He and Vance Randolph never actually met, but the other aging “scholar-tramp” entrusted Legman with editing those portions of his archive of Ozark folklore long denied publication because of their explicit sexual content. Legman accepted out of a sense of obligation, having worried for years about the ephemerality of the items on which he based his own research. Long subject to seizure, erotic materials, especially those but slightly removed from their original oral expression, often survive only in single examples that must be hunted for years. Even where he was successful in tracking down fugitive manuscripts and destroyed editions, Legman, ever the careful scholar, was reluctant to publish papers based on examples of which he held the world’s only copy, since they were unavailable for others to evaluate. In an essay called “Unprintable Folklore? The Vance Randolph Collection” (1990), Legman settled some scores with Dorson and other folklorists, and promised to do justice to Randolph. Both carefully-edited volumes, Roll Me in Your Arms: “Unprintable” Ozark Folksongs and Folklore and Blow the Candle Out: “Unprintable” Ozark Folklore, appeared in 1992.

Although his reputation remains legendary, Legman’s contributions to the study of erotica may yet be judged by what he left unpublished. He may also eventually receive his due as a writer of erotica. Legman often disparaged his erotic fiction, usually in remarks that imagining sexual scenarios and fabricating desire diminished his own libido. Drawing on his own extensive sexual experience, however, added authority and verisimilitude to personalized tales of erotic encounters. For years Legman worked on an autobiography tentatively titled Peregrine Penis: An Autobiography of Innocence (the title is a play on Smollett’s picaresque novel, Peregrine Pickle). Only one small portion of that memoir, “Trio Amoroso,” has been published. “Trio Amoroso” is set during the World War II period in which Legman helped Brussel publish the underground "Medusa" edition of Henry Miller's Tropic of Cancer, the first American printing of the novel. This fragment contains glimpses of bookstore owner Frances Steloff, writer William Carlos Williams, artist Alexander King, and magazine magnate Henry Luce, set against a backdrop of work and leisure in New York City. Driving the narrative is the explicitly rendered intercourse of a ménage à trois involving Legman, his lover Magdalena, and their mutual lover, fashion artist Susan [Inez] Aguerra. In its lusty physical exuberance, the memoir superficially resembles those of Henry Miller, but Legman brings to it reflections on the nature of his own youthful sexuality and that of his partners, introspections that acknowledge the fragility of gender and desire.

More important, "Trio Amoroso" underscores significant aspects of Legman's legacy. First, it is an example of erotica written for intellectual sensibilities. In this respect, the maturity of "Trio Amoroso" differs markedly from the sniggering tales of the Oxford Professor. Second, it contains biographical information to be found nowhere else. Legman's portrait of Aguerra is the only account of this largely unknown erotic book illustrator, who drew under the name "Rahngild." If it is ever published, the larger autobiography will doubtless recall other equally fugitive figures in the history of American erotica. Third, "Trio Amoroso" reinforces Legman's conviction that writing erotica and studying it are both passions worthy of admiration. Legman's bibliographic studies and scholarly footnotes, enlivened with tales of real individuals who obsessively wrote and collected erotica, often make the same point: that creating sexual representations and interpreting them are immutably human pursuits. Beyond question such pursuits shaped Legman. Few scholars have given themselves up so completely to what were clearly labors of love.

Biography

Born George Alexander Legman to Julia Friedman and Emil Mendel Legman in Scranton, Pennsylvania on November 2, 1917. Julia's uncle, Friedrich Krauss, was editor of two journals of erotica (1880–1910), Anthropophytéia [The Sexual Relations of Mankind] and Kryptádia [Secret Things]; the latter was later edited by Freud. After one quarter at the University of Michigan, Legman educated himself at the New York Public Library, teaching himself several languages in the process. In the 1930s, he began working for the National Committee on Maternal Health, part of the Planned Parenthood Program in New York, where he would be arrested at least once for dispensing birth-control information, then considered a species of obscenity. In 1940, he briefly worked for Jake Brussel, a publisher and distributor of erotica, and otherwise supported himself by ghost-writing books, erotic stories, and radio scripts, and dealing in rare books. In 1953, as a result of what he called continuous persecution by the government, Legman moved to France, where, except for a year as a writer-in-residence at the University of California (1964–65), he remained. Legman was married to Beverly Keith, Christine Conrad (annulled), and Judith Evans. He had four children: Ariëla (1957), with Sima Colcher, and David (1968), Rafaël (1971), and Sarah (1973) with Judith Evans. He died of a stroke in Opio, France, February 23, 1999.

JOSEPH W. SLADE

Selected Works

As author or compiler

- "Bawdy Monologues and Rhymed Recitations." Southern Folklore Quarterly, 40 (March-June, 1976): 59–123.
- "Bibliography of Paper-Folding." Malvern, England: A preprint from the Journal of Occasional Bibliography, 1952.
- David Ricardo and Ricardian Theory: A Bibliographical Checklist*, by Burt Franklin and G. Legman. New York: Burt Franklin, 1949.
- "Erotic Folksongs and Ballads: An International Bibliography." Journal of American Folklore, 103 (October/December 1990): 417–501.
- The Fake Revolt*. New York: Breaking Point, 1967.
- "The Guilt of the Templars," The Guilt of the Templars, by G. Legman et al. New York: Basic Books, 1966.
- The Horn Book; and Other Bibliographic Problems*. New York: American Aphrodite, 1953; expanded to The Horn Book: Studies in Erotic Folklore and Bibliography. New York: University Books, 1964.
- "Introduction." The Mammoth Cod, and Address to the Stomach Club, by Mark Twain. Milwaukee: Maledicta Press, 1976, pp. 2–18.
- "Introduction." The Private Case: An Annotated Bibliography of the Erotica Collection in the British (Museum) Library, by Patrick J. Kearney. London: Landesman, 1981, pp. 3–34.
- "Introduction: The Art of Mahlon Blaine: A Reminiscence." The Art of Mahlon Blaine, by Mahlon Blaine. East Lansing MI: Peregrine, 1982.

- "Introduction." Children's Humor: A Joke for Every Occasion, by Sandra McCosh. London: Panther/Granada, 1979.
- "The Language of Homosexuality: An American Glossary," Appendix to Sex Variants, ed. George W. Henry. 2 vols. New York: Haerber, 1941, 2: 1149–1179.
- The Limerick: 1700 Examples, with Notes, Variants, and Index*. Paris: Les Hautes Etudes, 1953; San Diego: Greenleaf Classics, 1967; New York: Brandywine Press, 1970; New York: Bell Publishing, 1964, 1969, 1976; The Famous Paris Edition of The Limerick: 1700 Entries. Secaucus NJ: Citadel Press, 1979.
- Love and Death: A Study in Censorship*. New York: Breaking Point, 1949; New York: Hacker Art Books, 1963.
- "The Lure of the Forbidden." Libraries, Erotica, and Pornography, ed. Martha Cornog. Phoenix AZ: Oryx Press, 1991, pp. 36–68.
- "Minority Report on Kinsey." The Sexual Conduct of Men and Women, by Norman Lockridge [Samuel Roth]. New York: Hogarth House, 1948, pp. 13–32.
- The New Limerick: 2750 Unpublished Examples, American and British (aka More Limericks: 2750 Unpublished Examples, American and British)*. New York: Crown Publishers, 1977; rpt. New York: Bell, 1980.
- "Misconceptions in Erotica Folklore." Journal of American Folklore, 75 (1962): 200–208.
- On the Cause of Homosexuality: Two Essays, the Second a Reply to the First*, by G. Legman and G.V. Hamilton. New York: privately printed pamphlet, 1964.
- "On Sexual Speech and Slang." Dictionary of Slang and Its Analogues, Past and Present: A Dictionary Historical and Comparative of the Heterodox Speech of All Classes of Society for More Than Three Hundred Years with Synonyms in English, French, German, Italian, etc. Vol. I, by J.S. Farmer and W.E. Henley. New Hyde Park. NY: University Books, 1966, pp. 375–450.
- Oragenitalism: An Encyclopaedic Outline of Oral Technique in Genital Excitation Part I: Cunnilinctus*, by Roger-Maxe de La Glannége [an anagram]. New York: J.R. Brussel, 1940; rep. and exp. (with Part II: Fellation and the Sixty-Nine) by Legman under his own name, as Oragenitalism: Oral Techniques in Genital Excitation. New York: Julian Press, 1969; rpt. New York: Causeway Books, 1969; rpt. as The Intimate Kiss. New York: Paperback Library, 1971; rpt. London: Oragenitalism: Oral Techniques in Genital Excitation. Duckworth, 1972; rpt. New York: Bell Publishing Company, 1979.
- The Oxford Professor, In which L. Erectus Mentulus, Ph.D., late of Oxford College, is taken further in the narration of his adventures and misadventures, erotic, alcoholic, and otherwise; not to mention a choice accompaniment of drolleries, notes and excursi of one sort or another, metaphysical and also miscellaneous edifying and entertaining. "Done by the Hand of the Author Into a Manuscript at Natchitoches, Louisiana [by Robert Sewall and Gerson Legman, New York, c1948]"; rpt. The Oxford Professor, by L. Erectus [sic] Mentulus, Ph.D., Atlanta: Pendulum Books, 1968; rpt. The Professor's Tale, Industry, CA: Collectors Publications, 1968.*
- The Passionate Pedant, Being a New Oxford Thesis on Love, wherein L. Erectus Mentulus, late of Oxford, establishes incontrovertibly that the sexual enjoyment of women of divers races is evocative of distinctly different types and degrees of pleasure, through narratives of his own experience, with particular emphasis upon psycho-physiological adumbrations et cetera, for the entertainment as well as the enlightenment of his friends. In cunnis diversis—voluptates diversae. Done by the Hand of the Author into a Manuscript at Oshkosh, Wisconsin [New York, 1939]; rpt. with Torrid Tales [author unknown] as The Further Adventures of the Oxford Professor, by L. Erectus Mentulus, Atlanta: Pendulum Books, 1968; rpt. The Oxford Professor Returns, by L. Erectus Mentulus, New York: Venus Library, 1971.*
- "The Psychopathology of the Comics." Neurotica, 1:3 (Autumn 1948): 3–30.
- Rationale of the Dirty Joke: An Analysis of Sexual Humor*. New York: Grove Press, 1968.
- Rationale of the Dirty Joke: An Analysis of Sexual Humor, Second Series*. New York: Breaking Point, 1975; rpt. No Laughing Matter: An Analysis of Sexual Humor. Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1982.
- "Sex Censorship in the U.S.A." PLAN: Organization of the British Progressive League (London), 2:1 (January 1945): 2–9.
- "A Summer Reading List to End All Summer Reading Lists," Fact, 2:4 (July-August, 1965): 38–43.
- "Toward an Historical Bibliography of Sex Technique." Unpublished typescript, Kinsey Institute for Sex, Reproduction, and Gender, Indiana University, Bloomington, Indiana, 1942.
- "Toward a Motif-Index of Erotic Humor." Journal of American Folklore, 75 (1962): 227–248; rpt. The Horn Book, pp. 454–494.
- "Trio Amoroso," Libido: The Journal of Sex and Sensibility, 1 (1988): 1–10; rpt. in The Ecstatic Moment: the Best of Libido, ed. Marianna Beck and Jack Haffer-kamp. New York: Delta, 1997, pp. 220–248.
- "Unprintable Folklore? The Vance Randolph Collection." Journal of American Folklore, 103 (July-September 1990): 259–300.
- "A Word on Caxton's 'Dictes' and Sayings of the Philosophers." London: Bibliographical Society, 1948.

As Editor

- Burns, Robert. The Merry Muses of Caledonia, Collected and in Part Written by Robert Burns. A new ed., now reprinted for the first time in type-facsimile of the unique original, with additional songs from the Cunningham manuscript and other sources, edited by G. Legman, New Hyde Park, NY: University Books, [c1965].
- Les Chansons de Salle de garde*. Paris: R. Deforges, 1972.
- Jarry, Alfred. King Turd [Ubi Roi], trans. G. Legman and Beverly Keith. New York: Boar's Head Books, 1953.
- Kryptadia: The Journal of Erotic Folklore* (1968–?)

LELY, GILBERT

Neurotica (1947–1951); collected as The Compleat Neurotica, 1948–1951. New York: Hacker Art Books, 1963.

Neurotica: Authentic Voice of the Beat Generation, ed. with Jay Landesman. London: Jay Landesman, 1981.

Randolph, Vance. Blow the Candle Out: "Unprintable" Ozark Folklore, Vol. II. Fayetteville AR: University of Arkansas Press, 1992.

Randolph, Vance. Roll Me in Your Arms: "Unprintable" Ozark Folksongs and Folklore, Vol. I. Fayetteville AR: University of Arkansas Press, 1992.

Sewall, Robert. The Devil's Advocate, by "Wood C. Lamont" [Robert Sewall, as typed and enlarged by Gershon Legman], Chicago [New York]: mimeographed, 1942; see entry on Sewall, Robert.

Further Reading

Brottman, Mikita. Funny Peculiar: Gershon Legman and the Psychopathology of Humor. Hillsdale, NJ: Analytic Press, 2004.

Buehler, Richard E. "Rationale of the Dirty Joke: An Analysis of Sexual Humor [review]." Journal of American Folklore, 83: 327 (January-March 1970): 87–89.

Dudar, Helen. "Love and Death (and Schmutz): G. Legman's Second Thoughts." Village Voice, 1 May 1984, pp. 41–43.

Gathorne-Hardy, Jonathan. Sex the Measure of All Things: A Life of Alfred C. Kinsey. Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1998.

Gertzman, Jay A. Bookleggers and Smuthounds: The Trade in Erotica 1920–1940. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.

"Gershon Legman" [Obituary]. New York Times, March 14, 1999, p. 49.

Holmes, John Clellon. "The Last Cause: Gershon Legman," Evergreen Review, 44 (December 1966): 28–32, 93–101,

"Legman, Gershon." Contemporary Authors, New Revision Series 15: 277–78.

Oring, Elliott. "G. Legman, Rationale of the Dirty Joke: An Analysis of Sexual Humor, First Series and Rationale of the Dirty Joke: An Analysis of Sexual Humor, Second Series," Western Folklore, 38: 4 (October 1977): 365–371.

Vinocur, John. "Gershon Legman Doesn't Tell Dirty Jokes ... But He Has the World's Largest Collection of Them Lying Around His House." Oui, 4: 3 (March 1975): 94–96, 126, 130–131.

---

LELY, GILBERT

---

1904–1985

French poet and critic

Gilbert Lely is doubly meritorious in the history of erotic literature: as a poet, he is an excellent representative of surrealist eroticism, and as a literary critic he is the greatest expert on the works of the Marquis de Sade, whose correspondence and many unpublished writings he has revealed.

Pierre-Raphaël-Gilbert Lévy (who will take at the age of seventeen the pseudonym Lely) was born on the First of June, 1904, in Paris, at 8, rue Parrot (XII<sup>e</sup>me). His mother died when he was five years old, and his father, Adrien Lévy, trader of paper goods, after having remarried, sent him to the Lycée Jeanson-de-Sailly, a boarding school, in 1911, and then to the Lycée Lakanal de Bourg-la-Reine, from 1916 to 1920. When his parents retired in Hyères, in the Var, in 1921, Gilbert Lely stayed in Paris, worked in the Théâtre de l'Œuvre as a secretary and actor, and published at the Jouve library Les chefs-d'œuvre des poètes gallants du XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle [The Masterpieces of the Gallant Poets of the 18th Century], an anthology which denoted his precocity. It was exceptional that a man as young as he should show such erudition, presenting in original notices thirty-three poorly known poets.

Subsequently, Gilbert Lely published at nineteen years old his first collection of poems, Aréthuse ou Élégies [Arethusa or Elegies] (Alphonse Lemerre, 1923) and at twenty-three his second, Allusions ou poèmes [Allusions or Poems] (Bristol, Douglas Cleverdon, 1927). This was his classical period, when he displayed the influence of André Chénier. Still, he returned to surrealism in 1931, and his amorous lyricism, in Je ne veux pas qu'on tue cette femme [I do not want this woman to be killed], a eulogy of Mata-Hari, (Editions surrealists, 1936, with a frontispiece by Max Ernst), and in La sylphide ou l'étoile carnivore [The Sylphid or the Carnivorous Star] (Editions le François, 1938), caused André Breton and Paul Eluard to give him the nickname of “the scabrous lamp.” Indeed, he presented himself as a worrying fiancé, Arden, who dreamed of sexual situations of strange sophistication.

Gilbert Lely became the editor-in-chief of the medical journal Hippocrate in Paris, from January 1933 to September 1939, and was admitted as a member of the Medical Historical Society because of his works. He wrote a series of brilliant articles on physicians like Philippe Ricord, the syphilis expert, or Philippe Pinel, who revolutionized the treatment of mental illnesses. It was in his office at Hippocrate that he met Maurice Heine, who had just edited Sade's Les 120 journées de Sodome [The 120 Days of Sodom], by Sade, and who would introduce him to the Marquis's works. During the war, Gilbert Lely was stationed as a nurse at the air force base of Tours. At the armistice, he went to join the surrealists in Marseille and prepared in 1942 his first version of Ma civilisation [My civilization], the book of poems that he would never cease to rework. This clandestine edition, limited to twelve typewritten copies, contained “a graphic of a 10-minute sexual congress,” with the chart of excitement and orgasm. Among the seven illustrated panels, there was a collage representing his first wife, Lucienne, whom he married in 1929 and divorced in 1937. Ma civilisation was published in 1947 by Maeght, in a deluxe edition illustrated by Lucien Coutaud. Its reprinting in 1949 was accompanied by a lower blurb by Yves Bonnefoy. Gilbert Lely was then working as a radio announcer.

On the 22nd of January, 1948, while visiting the descendants of Sade in Condé-sur-Brie, Lely obtained from Count Xavier de Sade the permission to inventory the two boxes handed down by his ancestor, which no one in the family had opened. In them he found a whole treasure of unpublished writings: letters, plays, notebooks, etc.... He published three collections of these letters: L'Aigle, Mademoiselle [The Eagle, Miss] (Georges Artigué, 1949), Le carillon de Vincennes [The Bells of Vincennes] (Arcannes, 1953), Monsieur le 6 [Mister the 6] (Julliard, 1956), the Cahiers personnels [Personal Notebooks] (Corréa, 1953) and the rest, with a critical commentary. Possessing a knowledge of this author that no one had ever possessed before, Gilbert Lely wrote a Vie du marquis de Sade, écrite sur des données nouvelles, accompagnée de nombreux documents, le plus souvent inédits [A Life of the Marquis de Sade, based on new data, accompanied by many, often unpublished, documents], published by Gallimard in two large volumes, the first in 1952, the second in 1957. He also gave another edition, reviewed, corrected and extended by an examination of the works of Sade, in 1962. He also directed the “definitive edition,” at the Cercle du Livre précieux, of Œuvres complètes du marquis de Sade, établies sur les originaux imprimés ou manuscrits [The Complete Works of the Marquis de Sade, Established on Many of the Printed or Manuscript Originals] (1962–1964), in fifteen volumes with 360 illustrations. He added to the reprinting of 1966 a sixteenth tome of Mélanges littéraires et Lettres [Literary Mixes and Letters], with six introductions by his own hand. Much of what we know of Sade today we owe to Gilbert Lely. He enriched his Vie de Sade with new documents up to his last edition in 1982, at Garnier. His flamboyant style, together with his gift of evocation of the past and his meticulousness of a conscientious exegete, have made this biography an incomparable book. One of his admirers has called him the “prince of Sadiens”: nothing is more correct.

In 1977, outside of his Œuvres poétiques [Poetic Works], of an erotic lyricism, Gilbert Lely published non-commercially Kidama vivila, “sotadic poetry,” that is, frankly obscene, like *Lady K****, a hymn to a woman copulating with “three libertines, endowed with scandalous members.” Its title is derived from a melanesian chant which begins with kidama vivila ikanupwagega [let us suppose woman one instant she is lying down, open], that he dedicated to his mistress Betty, concluding, “Hail, sweetness of my soul! The memory of your breasts, of your secret wetness, pierces me through, more acutely than the moans of orgasm, carried by hertzian waves, of all the women in Paris at the same instant.”

On the 19th of January, 1979, Gilbert Lely married Marie-Françoise Le Pennec, 46 years his junior, whose presence by his side stimulated him to the end. He died on June 4th, 1985, at his Parisian address, 12 rue Emile-Allez (XVIIe). The centenary of his birth was celebrated in Paris in 2004, at the Sorbonne and at the Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal, by a cycle of conferences presided by Marie-Françoise Lely.

LESBIAN LITERATURE

SARANE ALEXANDRIAN

Selected Works

Kidama vivila, poesies sotadiques, avec 7 dessins de Julio Pomar. Paris, La Différence, 1977.

Vie du marquis de Sade. Liminaire de Philippe Sollers. Paris, Mercure de France, 1989.

Poésies complètes, texte établi et annoté par Jean-Louis Gabin. Tome I (preface d'Yves Bonnefoy) et Tome II: 1996. Tome III: 2000 Paris, Mercure de France.

Further Reading

Gabin, Jean-Louis. Gilbert Lely, biographie. Paris, Librairie Séguier, 1991.

Gilbert Lely. Etudes critiques inédites d'Yves Bonnefoy, Thierry Bouchard, Jacques Henric et Claudie Massaloux. Losne, Thierry Bouchard, 1979.

"Hommage à Gilbert Lely." In L'Infini, no 18, printemps 1987, Paris.

Pia, Pascal. Feuilletons littéraires. Tôme 1, Paris, Fayard, 1999.

Alexandrian, Sarane. "Gilbert Lely dans ses cinq aspects mémorables." In Supérieur Inconnu, no 17, janvier-mars 2000.

"Hommage à Gilbert Lely." Catalogue de la Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal, Paris, 2004.

---

LESBIAN LITERATURE

---

As a genre, Anglo-American lesbian literature is a phenomenon of the twentieth century. Whilst the literary exploration of lesbian themes had a first heyday in the early twentieth century, the study of lesbian writing in English developed, parallel to lesbian theory, from the 1970s onward. The genre of lesbian literature is polymorphous: it encompasses all literary forms, including novels, short stories, poetry, and so on. The genre has sometimes been divided into two main strands, fictional and autobiographical writings, although the boundaries between the two are fluid.

The first major accumulation of lesbian writing can be found in the modernist literature of the early twentieth century. However, the earliest known lesbian autobiography was written in the eighteenth century by the Yorkshire gentlewoman Anne Lister (published in 1998 as The Diaries of Anne Lister). Lister openly documented her lesbian desires, carefully noting how many women she slept with, whereby she referred to the sexual act as "kiss." Her autobiography provides a unique insight into eighteenth-century lesbian experience.

In the nineteenth century, the main strand of writing by women was connected to the feminist movement of the day. Its proponents include in Britain the French-born Vernon Lee (her real name was Violet Paget), Australian-born George Egerton (Mary Chavelita Dunne), the South African Olive Schreiner, and Sarah Grand (Frances Elizabeth Bellenden McFall), who was born in Ireland. Grand coined the term "New Woman" which gave the literature its name. Much New Woman literature concentrated on the moral and sexual development of a female protagonist, often featuring close female friendships and alluding to different forms of female desire. Similarly, in the United States, Kate Chopin, Charlotte Perkins Gilman, and Edith Wharton produced for the time often candid and daring representations of female sexuality. Outside feminist writings, lesbian erotic themes also played a role in the literature of the nineteenth-century Gothic movement. Here, the eroticism of the female vampire featured in a number of texts, such as Sheridan Le Fanu's short story Carmilla (1872), which was based on the allure of female same-sex desires. Carmilla is exemplary of this kind of writing, which appears simultaneously fascinated and repulsed by lesbian sexuality. A different literary observation on lesbianism can be found in the work of Henry James. In The Bostonians (1885) James focused on a woman who is caught between the love for a man and that for another woman. In The Turn of the Screw (1898), James more subtly explored female desire in the relationship between an eight-year-old girl and her governess. The religiously infused poetry of “Michael Field” provides a biographically unusual body of lesbian writing in the later nineteenth century. “Michael Field” was the pseudonym of the Englishwomen Katherine Bradley and Edith Cooper, who were aunt and niece—and lovers. As “Michael Field,” they published a series of homoerotic poetry volumes, the first of which was entitled Callirhoë and Fair Rosamund (1883).

In the first decades of the twentieth century a distinct artistic lesbian subculture emerged, which was connected to the concerns of the feminist movement. Some of the female authors of this period have been grouped together under the label “Sapphic modernism,” both for their increasingly open engagement with lesbian themes, and for the lesbianism of the authors themselves. The poetry of Hilda Doolittle, known as H.D., belongs to this group. Her poetry, such as the collections Sea Garden (1916) and Hymen (1921), subtly engages with erotic female same-sex longing. Her most explicit lesbian work is constituted by the largely autobiographical prose manuscripts HERmione (1926–1927), which were unearthed after her death. Here H.D. describes the relationship with her lover Bryher (Annie Winifred Ellerman), also a writer, who wrote under male literary covers. More open explorations of lesbian desire can be found in the short stories of Katherine Mansfield, especially Bliss (1920), which revolves around the female narrator’s sexual desire for another woman. Mansfield’s feminist concerns are similar to that of arguably the best-known woman writer of the period, Virginia Woolf. Women’s emancipation and female sexuality play a central role in Woolf’s work, much of which depicts lesbian homoeroticism. This is visible in her Mrs Dalloway (1925) in the portrayal of the relationship between the protagonist and her daughter’s governess, the suggestively named Doris Kilman. Three years later, Woolf published the gender-metamorphosing story of Orlando (1928), which intimated notions of same-sex desire through the sex change of the protagonist. Orlando was partly inspired by Woolf’s lover, Vita Sackville-West. The married Sackville-West was a prominent figure in contemporary Sapphist circles. She had first gained notoriety through her elopement with Violet Trefusius. Sackville-West fictionalized their affair in the novel Challenge (1923). Trefusius later wrote a novel entitled Pirates at Play (1950), which teems with homoerotic and androgynous themes.

Djuna Barnes was another influential writer loosely linked to the Sapphic modernism. Her novels were influenced by her own life, especially her experiences within the lesbian communities of the early twentieth century. Barnes’ erotically explicit Ladies Almanack (1928) and Nightwood (1936) were inspired by the lesbian communities in Greenwich Village and Paris. Paris attracted many lesbian intellectuals of the day, and Barnes had an affair with one of the central figures of 1920s lesbian Paris, Nathalie Clifford Barney. Barney’s other lovers included the writer and music hall star Colette, whose work comprises the erotically charged short story Nuits Blanches (1934), and the reflective autobiography My Apprenticeships (1936). The Paris circle further included Gertrude Stein, who lived openly with her lover Alice B. Toklas. Stein wrote an account of her lover’s life entitled The Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas (1933), which is one of the most unapologetic and erotically explicit early twentieth-century lesbian texts.

The Paris circle was fictionally portrayed in what has become the classic of lesbian literature, Radclyffe Hall’s The Well of Loneliness (1928) [see entry]. Hall’s novel was influenced by contemporary medical and psychological theories of female homosexuality. Hall was not the first to draw on the new theories, however. In 1917, Clemence Dane (Winifred Holtby) published Regiment of Women, which presented a psychological case study of the relationship between the aptly named sadistic headmistress Clare Hartill and her submissive younger female colleague Alwynne. Arnold Bennett, who had woven the passionate friendship between women into the subplot of his main exploration of the unconventional love between a wealthy bachelor and a French courtesan in The Pretty Lady (1918), took a psychological approach in the short novel Elsie and the Child (1924). Here he suggested that female homosexual desire was a natural occurrence during puberty. In 1927, Rosamond Lehmann’s Dusty Answer focused in the central section of the novel on an erotic friendship between two female students at Cambridge, engaging with questions of the naturalness of female homosexuality.

LESBIAN LITERATURE

This rich and varied production of lesbian literature came to a halt with the outbreak of the Second World War. In the immediate post-war period, one of the few writers who engaged with lesbian eroticism was Anaïs Nin. Many of her short stories, notably Ladders to Fire (1946), and experimental novels explicitly describe lesbian sexual desire. One of the few women writing about lesbianism in the 1950s and 60s was the American Ann Bannon. The repressive political climate of the McCarthy years is reflected in her novels, which portray the fears, but also the support among the gay community in Greenwich Village. Bannon's work was also amongst the first to explore the eroticism of butch-femme relationships, most explicitly in Beebo Brinker (1962), the fifth and last novel in a series of related works.

The 1969 Stonewall Riots in New York saw the birth of the lesbian and gay civil rights movement. The lesbian literature of the time influenced and was influenced by the radical lesbian feminist movement. In 1972, John Nestle founded the Lesbian Herstory Archives and Educational Foundation in New York. Like many of the writers of the time, Nestle published both fictional and theoretical works, including The Persistent Desire: A Femme-Butch Reader (1992). Among the most influential theorists and writers of the 1970s was Kate Millet, who came to fame with the theoretical milestone Sexual Politics (1970). Millet's political belief that the private is always the political informs her autobiographically inspired novel Sita (1977), which depicts the destructive sexual-emotional relationship she had had with an older woman. Tied in with radical feminist politics, much of the lesbian literature of the 1970s followed an anti-pornography agenda. However, some books such as Rita Mae Brown's successful Ruby Fruit Jungle (1973), contained explicit descriptions of lesbian sex. The celebration of lesbian desire was focal to many works, such as that of the French critic and writer Monique Wittig, whose Le corps Lesbien [The Lesbian Body] was published in 1973, or that of the radical lesbian feminist and poet Adrienne Rich. Rich produced a vast and varied number of poetry volumes, which have in common the search for a lesbian poetic voice. Famous for her critical work Compulsory Heterosexuality and Lesbian Existence (1981), Rich explores and celebrates lesbian eroticism in her poetry, such as The

Twenty-One Love Poems (1977), and she continues to publish at the beginning of the twenty-first century.

In the 1980s, a number of distinct lesbian texts were published. Audre Lorde's autobiographical Zami, or a New Spelling of My Name (1982) was rooted in feminist concerns relating to how to express specific female experiences, in this case growing up a black lesbian. The lesbian critic and writer Sara Maitland paid tribute to the lesbian feminists of the 1960s and early 70s, for example in her short story Lullaby for My Dyke and Her Cat (1987). A radical break with early feminism can be found in the work of Pat Califia. In 1982, she published Coming to Power. Its explicit erotic content caused furore, as it challenged the radical feminist anti-pornography movement of the 1970s. Califia explored lesbian sado-masochism in a series of lesbian leather and vampire writings, including Macho Sluts (1988), and the short story "The Vampire" (1988). Erotica entered the lesbian mainstream with the opening of the lesbian sex shop Sh! in London in 1992, and the launch of the American erotic magazine On Our Backs in 1995.

In 1985, Jeannette Winterson's coming-of-age story Oranges Are Not The Only Fruit was published, which became one of the most widely-read lesbian novels in Britain. Written in the tradition of lesbian autobiographical novels, the book's depiction of the lesbian protagonist is noteworthy for the way it unapologetically takes for granted lesbian sexuality. In her subsequent books The Passion (1987), Sexing the Cherry (1989), and Written on the Body (1992), Winterson continued to experiment with the narrative form, whilst depicting the often hilarious manifestations of sex.

Lesbian literature of the 1990s is made up of a wide range of different forms and subjects. It includes the haunting poetic voices of the black Scottish poet Jackie Kaye, whose most famous collection of poetry, The Adoption Papers, came out in 1991. In the same year the best-selling lesbian American author Katherine V. Forrest published Flashpoint, which combines a portrayal of lesbian relationships and contemporary American politics. Contemporary Ireland provided the location for Emma Donaghue's novel Stir Fry (1994), which humorously charts a young woman's sexual awakening. Donaghue's second novel Hood (1995) engages with issues of love and possessing someone, centered on the impact of the lesbian protagonist's sudden be-reavement. The theorist Judith Halberstam and the queer activist and photographer Del LaGrace Volcano investigate the erotic allure of the drag king in the Drag King Book (1998), whilst Patricia Duncker explores the life of the nineteenth-century James Miranda Barry (1999), who, born female, lived life as a man to become a doctor, and went undiscovered until her death.

One of the most successful lesbian writers at the beginning of the twenty-first century is Sarah Walters. Her rich and intricate novels are set in Victorian England and follow the emotional and sexual adventures of a variety of lesbian characters. Waters' first publication Tipping the Velvet (1998) challenges gender and sexuality stereotypes with the story of the of the Oyster-girl turned music hall star turned tomboy turned activist Nan King. The second novel Affinity (1999) charts the mysterious net a female prison inmate draws around her lady visitor. In 2002, Walters published her third novel Fingersmith. Fingersmith pays a tongue-in-cheek tribute to erotic literature in the figure of a celibate male character who meticulously and obsessively records even the most minor erotic publication to date. The two female heroines, meanwhile, find love and sexual fulfilment with each other.

HEIKE BAUER

Further Reading

- Faderman, Lilian. Surpassing the Love of Men: Romantic Friendship & Love between Women from the Renaissance to the Present. London: Junction Books, 1984.
- Lilly, Mark (ed.). Lesbian and Gay Writing: An Anthology of Critical Essays. Basingstoke: Macmillan, 1990.
- Hobby, Elaine and Chris White (eds), What Lesbians Do in Books. London: The Women's Press, 1991.
- Palmer, Paulina. Contemporary Lesbian Writing: Dreams, Desire, Difference. Buckingham and Philadelphia, PA: Open University Press, 1993.
- Wolfe, Susan J. and Julia Penelope (eds). Sexual Practice/Textual Theory: Lesbian Cultural Criticism. Cambridge, MA: Blackwell's, 1993.
- De Laurentis, Teresa. The Practice of Love: Lesbian Sexuality and Perverse Desire. Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1994.
- Halberstam, Judith. Female Masculinity. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1998.
- Hart, Linda. Between the Body and the Flesh: Performing Sadoomasochism. New York: Columbia University Press, 1998.
- Griffin, Gabriele. Who's Who in Lesbian and Gay Writing. London: Taylor and Francis, 2002.
- Summers, Claude, J. The Gay and Lesbian Literary Heritage: A Reader's Companion to the Writers and their Works. New York: Routledge, 2002.

---

LÉVEILLÉ, J.R.

---

1945–

French-Canadian novelist, poet, essayist, visual artist, and television journalist

To date Joseph Roger Léveillé (b. 1945) has published twenty-one books in various genres: novels, short fiction, poetry, and essays. His most unconventional works include assemblages presented as “visual texts” using collage that have been published in unusual formats, including a densely printed 40” x 26” poster titled Extrait. Léveillé's earliest novels (Tombeau and La disparate, the latter published under the pseudonym Jesse Janes) and poetry (Oeuvre de la première mort and Le livre des marges) invoke the polarities of desire and death, artistic creation and latent violence, and while they reveal unmistakably the influence of the French symbolists, notably Rimbaud, they anticipate the qualities that situate his subsequent work in the context of post-modern writing: fragmentation, intertextuality (allusions to other works), and an often playful self-referentiality. Léveillé's early novels share many features with the nouveau roman of Michel Butor and Alain Robbe-Grillet, and also with the novels of Samuel Beckett: indeterminacy (the deliberate creation of “blanks” or “gaps” by withholding or contradicting narrative information), abrupt segmentation of plot, and general narrative ambiguity. His later poetry abounds with intertextual references to painting, sculpture, and music as well as literature, while his “visual” works evoke the Dada movements of the 1920s, although Léveillé’s texts are much more graphically suggestive and densely scripted. Like his most recent novels, they can be situated in a literature of the extreme, transgressing the framework of literary genre.

Léveillé’s eroticism manifests itself in virtually all his works, be it in the sensuality of the narrator’s gaze or in the explicit description of sexual experience. It is derived from conceptions of eros ranging from Epicure to Zen philosophy, conceptions according to which the erotic is a spiritual practice involving the entire body. Léveillé adopts the Freudian notion that it is the life-affirming erotic impulse (eros) that vanquishes thanatos, the force of death. Furthermore, eros, the force of desire, is inextricably linked to aesthetic creativity, both of which are characterized by a dialectic of presence and absence: the act of writing (rendering present that which is absent) is equated with the fulfillment of erotic desire, in that the author inscribes the “blank page” (an emblem of absence) with the presence of the feminine figure that constitutes at once the subject of the text and the object of desire.

In Tombeau, the polarity of eros and thanatos is thematized in a kind of paradox: the entire narrative is centered almost obsessively on the female figure whose death (absence) is implicitly overcome by eros, the creative act producing the novel itself. In a subsequent novel, Plage, the deserted beach and the blank page are metaphors for an absence that is displaced by the virtual presence of the multiplicity of female images that inhabit it. The feminine image is not only the object of the narrator’s physical desire, but she also appears as a carrier of cultural meaning: she is compared to a totem, an African statue, an amphora, and as she rises up out of the water, the origin of organic life, she also inspires its aesthetic (re)creation: Botticelli’s painting of the birth of Venus comes to mind. Eros is thus at once carnal desire and the ultimate source of all life as well as the vehicle for its aesthetic transcendence.

L’Incomparable explodes the borders of literary genre in its assemblage of “fragments” inspired by the Greek poetess Sappho, the “incomparable” designated in the title. The work can be read both as an essay on the pleasure of the text, echoing French literary theorist Roland Barthes, and as a long lyrical prose poem in which the sensual pleasures of eros are inextricably bound up with aesthetic inspiration and the creative act.

Extrait, an enormous poster densely covered in small-print words, some of which appear in primary colors, radicalizes this “poetics of the fragment,” both formally and thematically. The words seem to be entirely devoid of context, and there are no syntactic marks such as punctuation. The persistent reader can nevertheless identify a thematic thread in the promise of pleasure and seduction evoked in each one of these decontextualized words, all of which Léveillé has excerpted, collage-style, from advertising. In its exhaustive listing of objects of desire, this mini-inventory of modern day-to-day life parodies and subverts the manipulative strategies of cynically eroticized contemporary advertising while it ironically affirms the timelessness and universality of these objects themselves.

Léveillé takes his exploration of the visual quality of the written text even further in Montréal poésie, published in magazine-format, and Pièces à conviction. In the preface to the latter, he poses a question that had already been raised by the Dadaists: “Est-il possible d’écrire comme on peint?” In other words, can writing be made to resemble the act (and the effects) of painting? In these densely constructed collage compositions, the signs of language become alienated from their habitual communicative functions. The iconic assumes a significance equal to the semantic, and as in all Léveillé’s work, it is charged with erotic signification. In “Corrida,” for instance, two roughly parallel, diagonally positioned bars of fragmented text whose shapes resemble the horns of a bull are clearly phallic. In “Prière d’ouvrir grand” [Open wide], the “o” in the center of the page evokes a wide-open eye, but also, due to the text fragments that converge on it, the “opening” that permits penetration and birth.

Léveillé’s later poetry, Les Fêtes de l’infini, Causar l’amour and Fastes, consists for the most part of a joyous celebration of an eros grounded in a sensuality negating the rupture between the erotic and emotive and the cognitive and intellectual. Far from constituting an object of sublimation that would undermine erotic desire and its sexual realization, the cultural artefact, be it painting, music, or a work of literature, is closely associated with the love-object and even deliberately confused with it. As in the chansons des troubadours of ancient France, cultural emblems become the vehicle that “causes” love in both its erotic and spiritual manifestations. If in these poems it is erotic love and joie de vivre that create an “infinite feast” transforming (aestheticizing and eroticizing) everyday life, they are also what inspire their poetic expression.

In his latest prose works, notably in Nosara, the sexual act stands at the center of the narrative and is depicted with a rawness and explicitness reminiscent of Henry Miller. Like Miller’s Paris novels, the erotic is overlaid with the exploration of cultural alterity, or “otherness,” which manifests itself in the choice of setting and in the “other” cultural identity of the narrator’s lovers. Unlike Miller’s works, however, Léveillé’s are characterized by a subtext whose theme is aesthetic perception itself. If the erotic is the union of subject and object of desire, of Self and Other, the aesthetic is the incorporation of the “strange” or unfamiliar with the known, the familiar. Like its erotic counterpart, aesthetic pleasure is not only sensual, but also grounded in the recognition of the Self in the Other. The dialectic of presence and absence found in Léveillé’s earlier work here takes the form of oppositional complementarities, expressed in a play of interaction between male and female, yin and yang, light and shadow, figure and ground, in which, in true post-modernist mode, the fictive reality of the narrative is constantly reconstituted.

Biography

Born in Winnipeg, November 10, 1945. Educated at Collège universitaire de St-Boniface, Winnipeg (BA 1966), and University of Manitoba (MA in French literature, 1968). Doctoral studies in French literature, University of Paris (Vincennes) and University of Manitoba (1969–1972). Married Suzanne Corbeil in 1970 (divorced in 1994). Married Christine Gosselin in 2004. Television journalist and producer with Radio-Canada since 1981.

ROSMARIN HEIDENREICH

Selected Works

- Parade ou Léveillé sur les autres*. Saint-Boniface: Éditions du Blé, 2005.
Nosara. Saint-Boniface: Éditions du Blé, 2003.
Fastes. Ottawa: Bibliothèque canadienne, 2003.
New York trip. Ottawa: L’Interligne, 2003.
Dess(e)ins II Drawings. With Tony Tascona Saint-Boniface: Éditions du Blé, 2001.
Le soleil du lac qui se couche. Saint-Boniface: Éditions du Blé, 2001.
Dess(e)ins avec Tony Tascona. Winnipeg: Éditions Ink Inc., 1999.
Pièces à conviction. Winnipeg: Éditions Ink Inc., 1999.
Une si simple passion. Saint-Boniface: Éditions du Blé, 1997.
Les Fêtes de l’infini. Saint-Boniface: Éditions du Blé, 1996.
Causser l’amour. Paris: Éditions Saint-Germain des Prés, 1993.
Anthologie de la poésie franco-manitobaine. Saint-Boniface: Éditions du Blé, 1990.
Montréal poésie. Saint-Boniface: Éditions du Blé, 1987.
L’incomparable. Saint-Boniface: Éditions du Blé, 1984.
Plage. Saint-Boniface: Éditions du Blé, 1984.
Extrait. Saint-Boniface: Éditions des Plaines, 1984.
Le livre des marges. Saint-Boniface: Éditions des Plaines, 1981.
Oeuvre de la première mort. Saint-Boniface: Éditions du Blé, 1978.
La disparate. Montréal: Éditions du Jour, 1975.
Tombeau. Winnipeg: Canadian Publishers, 1968.

Translated Works

- New York Trip*. Ottawa/Winnipeg: L’Interligne/Éditions Ink Inc., 2003. The Setting Lake Sun [novel], Winnipeg: Signature Editions, 2001.
Dess(e)ins II Drawing(s). With Tony Tascona, St-Boniface: Éditions du Blé, 2001.
Dess(e)ins Drawing(s). With Tony Tascona, Saint-Boniface: Ink Inc, 1999.

References and Further Reading

- Annandale, Eric. “La francophonie et l’ouverture à l’Autre: Roger Léveillé, romancier, poète, essayiste.” Cahiers franco-canadiens de l’Ouest. Vol. 13, No. 2, 2001, pp. 99–108.
Doyon-Gosselin, Benoit. “Autant en emporte les vents: portrait de la Métisse dans Le soleil du lac qui se couche de J.R. Léveillé.” Cahiers franco-canadiens de l’Ouest. Vol. 14, Nos. 1 and 2, 2002, pp. 243–253.
Dubé, Paul. “Portrait d’auteur: J.R. Léveillé.” Francophonies d’Amérique. No. 6, 1996, pp.75–84.
Gaboury-Diallo, Lise, Heidenreich, Rosmarin, Valenti, Jean, eds. Léveillé par les autres. Saint-Boniface: Les Éditions du Blé, 2005.
Gaboury-Diallo, Lise. “Manifestations du transculturel et du métissage chez Ronald Lavallée et J.R. Léveillé, deux écrivains contemporains du Manitoba

- français." Cahiers franco-canadiens de l'Ouest. Vol. 13, No. 2, 2001, pp. 125–142.
- . "Expression créative et réception critique dans un milieu minoritaire - le cas du Manitoba." In Toutes les photos finissent-elles par se ressembler? Actes du Forum sur la situation des arts au Canada français. Sudbury: Prise de parole/l'Institut franco-ontarien, 1999. pp. 123–139.
- Hardy, Stéphan. "De la Genèse à Une si simple passion de Roger Léveillé." Cahiers franco-canadiens de l'Ouest, Vol.13, No. 1, pp. 3–35.
- Hebert, Raymond. "Essai sur l'identité franco-manitobaine" in La question identitaire au Canada francophone. Les Presses de l'Université Laval, 1994, pp. 63–78.
- Heidenreich, Rosmarin. Paysages de désir. L'oeuvre de J.R. Léveillé. Ottawa: L'Interligne, 2005.
- . "Lecture d'un texte de Roger Léveillé: l'oeuvre littéraire comme objet de consommation." Les Actes du quatrième colloque du Centre d'études franco-canadiennes de l'Ouest. Saint-Boniface: CEFCO, 1985, pp. 109–116.
- . "Objet même de son écriture." In Anthologie de la poésie franco-manitobaine. Saint-Boniface: Les Éditions du Blé, 1990, pp. 409–415.
- . "Recent Trends in Franco-Manitoban Fiction and Poetry." Prairie Fire. Vol. 11, No 1, Spring 1990, pp. 54–63.
- . "Le canon littéraire et les littératures minoritaires: l'exemple franco-manitobain." Cahiers franco-canadiens de l'Ouest. Vol. 2, No. 1, printemps 1990, p. 21–29.
- . "Production et réception des littératures minoritaires: le cas des auteurs franco-manitobains." Francophonies d'Amérique. No. 1, 1991, pp. 87–97.
- . "Causer l'amour dans le Far-West du Canada: l'oeuvre de J.R. Léveillé." In Poétiques et Imaginaires (Francopolyphonie littéraire des Amériques). Pierre Laurette and Hans-George Ruprecht, eds., Paris: L'Harmattan, 1996, pp. 375–385.
- . "Tout est dans la ligne: Pièces à conviction de J.R. Léveillé." In La francophonie panaméricaine – état des lieux et enjeux. Actes du dix-huitième colloque du Centre d'études franco-canadiennes de l'Ouest, Presses universitaires de Saint-Boniface, 2000, pp. 137–145.
- . "Nouveaux courants dans la poésie francophone de l'Ouest du Canada." In Itinéraires de la poésie. ed. Robert Yergeau, Ottawa: Le Nordir, 2004, pp. 127–141.
- Lafontant, Jean. "L'art 'minoritaire': entre les conventions identitaires et l'émancipation." In Toutes les photos finissent-elles par se ressembler? Actes du Forum sur la situation des arts au Canada français. Sudbury: Prise de Parole / l'Institut franco-ontarien, 1999. pp. 43–49.
- Macdonell, Alan. "Le bon usage dans le roman de l'Ouest" in Langue et Communication. Actes du 9<sup>e</sup> Colloque du Centre d'Études Franco-canadiennes de l'Ouest. Presses universitaires de Saint-Boniface, 1990, pp. 171–180.
- Paré, François. "Romans. An American in Paris in Montréal: la ville palimpseste de J.R. Léveillé." University of Toronto Quarterly. Vol. 70, No. 3, Summer 2001, pp. 727–736.
- Roy, Nathalie. "Le religieux dans Les Fêtes de l'infini de J.R. Léveillé et La Beauté de l'affaire de France Daigle." Revue internationale d'études canadiennes. No. 23, Spring 2001, pp. 37–56.
- Véron, Laurence. "Entrevue avec J.R. Léveillé, écrivain." Cahiers franco-canadiens de l'Ouest. Vol. 13, No. 2, 2001, pp. 159–173.

---

LEWIS, MATTHEW GREGORY

---

1775–1818

English novelist, poet, dramatist and legislator

The Monk: A Romance

It was at The Hague in 1794 that Lewis—bored and unable to live within his father's allowance—wrote the novel that earned him the nickname "Monk." Lewis cited as his immediate source the Santon Barsisa, a Persian tale published in The Guardian in 1713, about a hermit whom Satan tempts to commit rape and murder.

He also drew on German, Danish, and Spanish legends. The strongest inspiration for The Monk, however, came from Gothic fiction such as Horace Walpole's The Castle of Otranto (1764), William Beckford's Vathek (1786), William Godwin's Caleb Williams (1794), and especially Ann Radcliffe's The Mysteries of Udolpho (1794).

The Monk centers on Ambrosio, a Capuchin abbot in medieval Madrid. Thought to be incorruptible, he succumbs to every imaginable crime, including a lustful affair with Matilda de Villanegas, who has disguised herself as the novice Rosario; the rape and murder of the beautiful virgin Antonia; the sexually tinged murder of Antonia's mother Elvira Dalfa; and the eventual pledging of his soul to Lucifer, who condemns him to a spectacular death that takes seven days. Lewis interweaves this plot with that of Raymond, the Marquis de las Cisternas, who attempts to rescue his beloved Agnes from her confinement in the convent of St. Clare. Don Lorenzo de Medina, himself smitten with Antonia, assists. Agnes is imprisoned and reported dead by the tyrannical Domina, the public recitation of whose crimes later sparks a riot in which she is torn limb from limb. Agnes is freed to marry Raymond, their child having died in the prison where she gave birth to it; Antonia being dead, Lorenzo marries Virginia de Villa-Franca, another inmate of the convent who has assisted in Agnes's rescue.

The Monk was published anonymously on 12 March 1796 to mostly positive reviews. A second edition came out in July 1796, signed "M.G. Lewis, Esq., M.P." These last two letters scandalized readers, notably Samuel Taylor Coleridge, who shuddered to think that a government representative should have penned such horrors. In a climate dominated by morality police such as William Wilberforce's Proclamation Society, The Monk became synonymous with pornography, although today we would not recognize it as such. Threats of prosecution and sales injunctions never materialized—possibly because, for the fourth edition in 1798, Lewis toned down the book's language and deleted a passage in which Ambrosio calls the Bible licentious.

Sexuality in The Monk has most commonly been understood in terms of contemporary politics; the Marquis de Sade thought such Gothic enormities clumsy but necessary to express "revolutionary shocks" (Reflections on the Novel, 1800). In what appears to be standard French-Revolution anticlericalism, Lewis exposes the monastic repression of healthy sexuality such as Agnes's, and even suggests it has turned Ambrosio and the Domina into deviants. That Ambrosio's crimes include incest—the raped Antonia is his sister, the murdered Elvira his mother—may further allude to the inbred corruption of the ancien régime. Others, however, see in Ursula's death the kind of rape-imagery that anti-revolutionary tracts such as Edmund Burke's Reflections (1790) employed to express a fear of the mob; or interpret Lewis' Catholic church as symbolic of bourgeois domestic ideology, which similarly subjugates women.

In a more philosophical vein, The Monk has been linked to eighteenth-century anxieties about sexual identity and difference. If this period invented sexual dimorphism, as Thomas Laqueur has argued (Making Sex, 1990), then The Monk's effeminate males, domineering females, and transvestites ("Rosario"/Matilda) imply the instability of the one-sex continuum. Lewis's portrayal of the dangers of sexual desire, moreover, has been read in terms of his all-but-proven homosexuality—something that, unless veiled like The Monk's "Rosario"/Ambrosio plot, risked violent persecution by the church, the state, or the mob. Further grounds for The Monk's skepticism about sexuality may be found in eighteenth-century theories of the sublime, as advanced by Burke (Philosophical Enquiry, 1757) and Immanuel Kant (Critique of Judgment, 1790) and reinterpreted by Jacques Derrida (The Truth in Painting, 1978). That is, the human body provokes disgust when apprehended as a sensuous object, rather than as a mere doorway to a state—such as death or mutual love—in which subject and object alike are annihilated. Ambrosio's self-aggrandizing lust—beginning with the famous scene in which Matilda exposes her shapely breast and threatens to stab herself if Ambrosio rejects her—consistently turns to loathing; by contrast, the half-dead Agnes remains selflessly devoted to her child even after it putrefies.

The afterlife of The Monk has been colorful indeed. In 1798, a parody appeared titled The New Monk, A Romance, by "R.S., Esq." The author—possibly Richard Sicklemore—states that his purpose is to ridicule modern immorality and its expression in novels such as Lewis's. The New Monk thus relies on humorous substitutions and bawdy innuendo while refraining from the graphic descriptions favored by its predecessor. It takes a topical dig at the alleged erotomania of the Methodists by making its Ambrosio-figure a hellfire preacher, the Rev. Joshua Pentateuch. Rosario/Matilda becomes Peter/Betsy; Antonia, Ann Maria Augusta; Elvira, Olivia; Raymond, Henry Mountfordington; Agnes, Alice; the convent of St. Clare, the boarding school of Mrs. Rod. Having forsworn meat and alcohol, Joshua meets temptation in the form of a talking pork chop. Alice is imprisoned in a wine-cellar, as is Ann, whom Joshua robs rather than rapes. The Monk itself crops up in the hands of several characters, including Henry, who notices striking parallels between Raymond's adventures and his own. The tale ends on a cautionary note, however, as Joshua murders both Olivia and Ann before being hanged.

Antonin Artaud hoped to realize The Monk as a film but, never getting farther than photographing a series of stills, instead published a novel, Le moine, in 1931. Unsure of his command of English, he probably relied on Léon de Wailly's 1840 translation. Artaud's version is, as he himself puts it, "neither a translation nor an adaptation...but a sort of 'copy' in French of the original English text" (17)—or, perhaps more accurately, a drastic abridgement. The erotic passages are substantially identical to Lewis's, although Artaud's brisker pace may be judged either to intensify or to diminish their effect. In one significant departure from Lewis, Artaud adds to Lorenzo's dream of Antonia's demonic abduction a vision of her being "fondled in the most obscene fashion" by a strange man while "she eagerly reciprocate[s]" (37). Generally, Artaud saw The Monk as a depiction of what happens when "feeling [is] repressed to its maximum degree"—adding that Lewis exhibits a "sadistic urge" that exceeds Ambrosio's, inasmuch as he erects various "barriers against the natural urges of love" if only to demolish them (17–18). While he found the "shoddy satanism" of its dénouement more "amusing" than compelling, Artaud admired the supernatural elements of Lewis's text for their power to purge "that common residue and excrement of the mind called reality" and provide intimations of the eternal (17, 19). The numerous other adaptations of Lewis range from Zofloya (1806) by Charlotte Dacre, who used the pseudonym "Rosa Matilda"; to the screenplay Le moine (1972) by Luis Buñuel and Jean-Claude Carrière.

Biography

Matthew Gregory Lewis was born in London on 9 July 1775, the eldest of four children from the unhappy marriage of Matthew Lewis and Frances Maria Sewell. Educated at Christ Church College, Oxford, he went to Weimar in 1792–1793, where he met Goethe and became a proficient German scholar. He served as attaché to the British embassy to Holland in 1794; and as M.P. for Hindon, Wiltshire from 1796 to 1802. Lewis inherited his father's sugar plantations in Jamaica upon the latter's death in 1812 and visited there in 1815–1816. A moderate abolitionist, he amended his will in 1816 to finance triennial inspections of his slaves; Percy Shelley, Byron, and Dr. Polidori witnessed the signing at Villa Diodati, Geneva. While returning to England from a second visit to Jamaica in 1818, he contracted yellow fever, from which he died on 14 May. His oeuvre of original compositions and translations includes some sixteen works for the stage, half a dozen "romances" and collections of tales, numerous ballads and other poems, and the Journal of a West India Proprietor.

ADAM KOMISARUK

Major Editions

- The Monk: A Romance*. London: J. Bell, 1796.
Ambrosio, or The Monk: A Romance, with Considerable Additions and Alterations. London: J. Bell, 1798.
 S[icklemore?], R[ichard?]. The New Monk: A Romance. London: Minerva Press, 1798.
The Monk. Ed. Howard Anderson, New York: Oxford University Press, 1973.
 Artaud, Antonin. The Monk. Trans. John Phillips, New York: Creation Books, 2003.
The Monk: A Romance. Ed. D.L. Macdonald and Kathleen Scherf, Toronto: Broadview Press, 2004.

Other Major Works by Lewis

- Village Virtues*. 1796.
The Minister. 1797.
The Castle Spectre. 1798.
Rolla; or, The Peruvian Hero. 1799.
The East Indian. 1800.
Adelmorn, the Outlaw. 1801.
Alfonso, King of Castile. 1801.
Tales of Wonder. 1801.
The Bravo of Venice. 1805.
Adelgitha; or, The Fruits of a Single Error. 1806.
Feudal Tyrants; or, The Counts of Carlsheim and Sargans. 1806.
Rugantino; or, The Bravo of Venice. 1806.
The Wood Daemon or "The Clock Has Struck." 1807.
Contributions to Romantic Tales. 1808.
Venoni; or, The Novice of St. Mark's. 1809.
One O'Clock! or, The Knight and the Wood Daemon. 1811.
Timour the Tartar. 1811.
Poems. 1812.
The Harper's Daughter; or, Love and Ambition. 1813.
Rich and Poor. 1814.
Journal of a West India Proprietor. 1815–1817.

Further Reading

- Ellis, Kate Ferguson. The Contested Castle. Urbana, IL: University of Illinois Press, 1989.
- Gamer, Michael. Romanticism and the Gothic. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2000.
- Hendershot, Cyndy. The Animal Within: Masculinity and the Gothic. Ann Arbor, MI: University of Michigan Press, 1998.
- Komisaruk, Adam. "Mortal Frames: Desire, Disgust and the Grotesque Body." Journal of the Association for the Interdisciplinary Study of the Arts 3.1 (1997): 17–31.

- Macdonald, D.L. Monk Lewis: A Critical Biography. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2000.
- Tuite, Clara. "Cloistered Closets: Enlightenment Pornography, the Confessional State, Homosexual Persecution and The Monk." Romanticism and the Net 8 (November 1997), 6 May 2002 <<http://www.erudit.org/revue/ron/1997/v/n8/005766ar.html>>.
- Paulson, Ronald. Representations of Revolution 1789–1820. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1983.
- Punter, David. "1789: The Sex of Revolution." Criticism 24.3 (1982): 201–217.

---

LI YU

---

1611–1680
Chinese novelist

Rou putuan [The Carnal Prayer Mat]

Although it was in question for a long time owing to an erroneous dating, attribution of the Rou putuan to Li Yu was recently confirmed by the discovery, in Japan, of a manuscript providing its most complete and coherent version, and dating its completion to the year 1657; a period when Li Yu was fully devoting himself to novel-writing. The similarities of the Rou putuan with the writings of Li Yu are so numerous that doubt is hardly permitted. That feeling is also strengthened when one reads the commentaries added at the end of each chapter: these confirm that we are here dealing with an author fully mastering his mode of expression, willing to assert his originality and, what is more, willing to tackle the issue of the proper place of sexuality in life from a fresh perspective. In doing so, he displays a stark ability for innovation and a form of imagination which, as he admits in a commentary, "really mocks everything."

During the Zhihe era (1328), a young man of letters by the pseudonym of Vesperus [Weiyangsheng] remains deaf to the advice of a monk called Lone Peak [Gufeng] concerning sexual moderation, and instead gives free rein to a fantasy of his urging him to try and marry the most beautiful woman in the world. Unable to be satisfied with the yet radiant beauty of Jade Scent [Yuxiang], his first wife and the prudish daughter of the austere Confucian greybeard Master Iron Door [Tieshan daoren], Vesperus sets to go hunting again. He is soon assisted by a master bandit and man of genius nicknamed The Knave [Sai-Kunlun], who quickly manages to convince him that the small size of his penis is a bridle to his pretensions. Once he's been surgically transplanted with the penis of a dog, which turns him into a matchless lover, Vesperus moves on to seducing Fragrance [Yanfang], a shopkeeper of ardent nature. Fragrance having eventually become pregnant, Vesperus on the sly conquers Cloud of Scent [Xiangyun], another beauty whom he had spotted long before his operation. The young woman introduces him to three relatives of hers: her aunt, who is a widow, and two "sisters" whose husbands happen to be away at the capital to take part in the official examinations and who have also proved, as husbands, not to be particularly well-gifted for nocturnal jousts. While Vesperus is unrestrainedly carousing with all four women, Fragrance's husband, a merchant by the nickname of Honest Quan [Quan Laoshi], seduces Jade Scent in a bout of revenge and gets her pregnant before selling her to a brothel in the capital, where she rapidly becomes the most sought-after prostitute in the whole Empire. Enticed by her reputation, Vesperus, who by now thinks himself a widower—as his father-in-law was always too ashamed to confess his daughter's elopement,— joins the crowd of patrons who aren't exactly queuing up. But when he finally finds himself ready to get down to the job, the husbands of his various gallant conquests have already had a taste of his legitimate spouse's privileges, and Jade Scent commits suicide to avoid such an embarrassing confrontation with her husband. Realizing, at last, that he's been going astray, Vesperus returns to Lone Peak, the monk who had long ago tried to divert him from his tragic fate. Firmly resolved no longer to follow the winding roads of debauchery, he castrates himself and takes his vows together with a group of new converts, among whom we also find The Knave and Honest Quan.

A summary of the novel may certainly show how subtly Li Yu wove his plot; and in so doing, he actually respected a principle that he would later advocate for playwrighting, namely to build the plot around a key-character and a central action for the story to revolve around [yi ren yi shi]. It may also give an idea of the considerable number of saucy scenes that the author managed to accumulate, the effective description of which owes a lot to their variety. However, the strength of the novel lies not as much in what is being narrated as in the way Li Yu chooses to do it. In that regard, any attempt at summarizing eclipses the real innovations of the Rou putuan, a novel which continues the tradition of Chinese erotic novels—some of which are duly referred to, such as the Chi pozi zhuan [Biography of a Foolish Woman], the Ruyi Jun zhuan [The Lord of Perfect Satisfaction], and the Xiuta yeshi [An Unofficial History of the Embroidered Couch—only to better assert its superiority and explore the theme of sexuality even further than they ever did.

The appended commentary pertinently insists not only on the dazzling imagination here at work, but also and above all on the main formal innovations. It has to be conceded that these are indeed sizeable and, as such, amply justify that this novel be considered a masterpiece of Chinese literature in vernacular language.

The first and foremost striking feature of the Rou putuan is probably its constantly humorous tone, which naturally resorts to plays on words, but also to learned expressions diverted from their original context. This humorous tone is carried by a remarkably fluid style which puts all the resources of vernacular language to good use. In addition, numerous entertaining metaphors give the narrative texture, such as comparisons between the futile resort to doping by candidates at the mandarin examinations and the illusory use of aphrodisiacs for sexual jousts by mediocre lovers, or between the art of literary composition and the practice of copulation. Li Yu furthermore very skillfully inserts digressions [yilun] in the narrative, sometimes even in the very height of a sex scene asides that gives him the opportunity to express his views on a variety of subjects including sexual practices, thereby turning the reader into some cat on a hot tin roof and reinforcing his/her interest in the story, the narration of which eventually resumes as if nothing had happened.

The novel combines such control of the output with perfect mastery in organizing the situations, many of the latter being chosen according to the surprise effect they may be able to trigger. Scenes of that kind are truly surprising and often comical; an example among others would be when Fragrance has Vesperus's sexual capacities secretly tested by her neighbor, who happens to be an excessively ugly woman. The effect that Li Yu draws from them is all the more powerful since the novel's chapters are all designed as independent episodes further assembled into a methodically organized progression, exactly the way they would in a theater play. Li Yu starts off by putting the reader into the comfortable position of a mere voyeur amused at the doings of a thoughtless young man so as to, later, better have him/her feel the horror of a tragic paroxysm which consummates the ruin of illusions, the latter eventually provoking the final revelation. Behind the novelist concerned with his effects, one feels the mark of the dramatist who presides over the destinies of his characters.

The number of characters is deliberately limited and reduced to a typology which characterizes Li Yu's works and which mainly operates on straight-forward oppositions between characters with clearly marked tempers. Thus, the rigoristic Confucian father who locks his daughter up to protect her from the dangers of the outside world contrasts with the open-minded bandit who frees himself from the barriers of privacy. In that regard, the character of The Knave who, ridding himself of all barriers, offers a forthright viewpoint on the sexual reality of his contemporaries, is a real find. Besides, by providing the hero with the means for his emancipation, The Knave is actually at the origin of Vesperus's career as a great seducer. But the tour de force of this moral tale certainly lies in the recourse to surgery—a practice literally poles apart from traditional Chinese medical science—which in the novel enables a young man (of originally mediocre capacities, when all is said and done) to become a top-grade stallion through the transplant of an animal sex organ. As the commentary indicates, it is indeed “complete aberration, which invites us to see the hero's feats as purely bestial acts.” And at the same time as he turns his main character into an outstanding lover, the author also warns his reader of the dangers the latter would face were he/she to take the story he/she is so brilliantly being told too literally. “Fiction,” the commentary informs us, “is parable.”

The lesson to be learned, which could be summed up by the injunction that one should remain moderate in matters of sex, is not only expressed using the allegorical mode and through the commentaries, but also, very surprisingly and in an original way, in a long essay that takes up the entire first chapter of the novel. That essay is in fact the preamble of a far more comprehensive treatise, the elements of which are provided to the reader in the numerous dialogues that punctuate the story, forming a real ars erotica that goes much further than a mere introduction and gives the novel a true educational and moral character.

Li Yu used to describe his Wushengxi as “a refreshing drink in a house on fire.” The Rou putuan actually offers all the characteristics of a “silent comedy”; it is namely a book which, under cover of an erotic comedy likely to enthrall even the most blasé of readers, brings along original and disturbing views on a hotly debated subject. Of higher moral qualities than it may appear on the first reading, the novel was conceived according to a process that Li Yu unveils in the introduction: the elevated, varied, and sensual narrative, rich in licentious episodes, is supposed to be “like the date wrapped around the bitter olive which, alone, brings each and everyone to eventually experience the flavour of the fruit it conceals.” Recourse to this kind of technique proves necessary, according to the author, in such times of trouble when “moral books” would serve only to “cover winepots or light pipes.”

The impact of the Rou putuan was tremendous at the time it was first released, and later on as well. Despite quickly becoming the target of a formal ban, the novel nonetheless continued to be circulated under various titles. Its influence on Chinese novel-writing, and mainly on that of erotic novels, was also considerable. Many a pattern, and even whole passages borrowed from it are to be found in other works. Yet, the savoir-faire it displays was never equalled, nor even really copied.

The same way as Li Yu's entire work is some sort of comet in the field of Chinese letters, this novel is a constellation of its own in that of Chinese erotic literature.

Biography

Li Yu (1611–1680) is a quite original and astounding figure in the history of Chinese letters. As it is, his work and contribution widely exceed the sole field of literature. After failing three times the examination to what then was the step before last to an official position, the Bachelor's degree, Li Yu soon (probably around 1642) abandoned any hope of making a career in the Imperial administration. He subsequently withdrew from society for a while, before taking up various activities which were to become his only source of income until the end of his lifetime.

Throughout his life, Li Yu mingled with high-level officials; from his early days when he was living in the Jinhua prefecture of Zhejiang province, and later in Hangzhou, where he stayed from the beginning of the 1650's before settling in Nanjing ten years later. He was to return from that city only in the spring of 1677, to spend his last years by the shores of the East Lake in Hangzhou, a place which remains intimately tied to his most famous penname: “The Old Fisherman by the Lakeside” [Hushang liweng].

But although he would often associate with officials, Li Yu nonetheless made a living from what his prolific imagination could yield, much more than from the occasional support that some of these friends would grant him. And being an inveterate hedonist, he always took great care in creating a suitable environment for himself and his large household to live in, often squandering the fruits of his inventiveness as fast as he had earned them.

Proof of Li Yu's ever-fermenting creativity is not only to be found in the field of writing, but also in that of publishing, as he, over the years, set up several publishing studios through which he issued his own works, as well as that of garden design and theater direction. All these activities led him to travel extensively across the Chinese Empire in search of contracts. And while, as a true charmer and captivating narrator gifted with pleasant conversation, he graciously bowed to the necessities of society, he would however never let go of his taste for provocation which, for instance, led him to put several of his very own concubines on stage and direct them as a theater group. Such actions tarnished his reputation for good and definitely draped his name and work with an aura of scandal. As a result, he was truly rediscovered only as late as the end of the Twentieth Century.

Li Yu, it has to be conceded, is a puzzling character: he was as innovative regarding his works as he was regarding daily life. The initiator of an art of living which places the pursuit of pleasure and of harmony above all the constraints of Confucian society, he would always seek to convince others of the validity of his own beliefs and share his tastes. In doing so, he would also unhesitatingly display his loss of affection for right-thinking routine, just as he would often hunt down generally accepted ideas. Put back in the context of a traumatic dynastic shift which ended with the setting up of Mandchu power (1644), his attitude is actually one of unequalled boldness. No longer part of the literati, as he was tuned into the world of business (publishing, design, theater management and direction), and yet not completely a businessman either, since he always kept in touch with literati circles (although his interest led him to the fringe of official culture), he somehow opened a new way which turned out to match his audacity and talent. The fact that he managed to keep his course certainly owes a lot to a strong personality blessed with wily optimism, but also to his fundamental conception according to which "there are no more major genres than there are minor ones; the important question is whether one excels in the genre one has chosen or not."

Li Yu's written production is in the image of the rowdy and bubbling nature of its creator.

It naturally appears profuse and original, but also provocative and laced with constantly underlying humor and irony. In as much as Li Yu would support the whole of it with unvarying fervor and took pleasure in constantly enriching it by implicitly or openly coming to the fore, it is thus difficult to take up one aspect of his work without referring to its entirety, and, even more so, to the author. For ages, Li Yu's work was however reduced to its most acceptable part.

Yet, it would be extremely inaccurate to limit its highlights, as many still often do, only to the two introductory books of his collection of open essays, the Xianqing ouji [Casual Expressions of Idle Feeling]. Besides this major treatise on dramatic art, the value of which has been prized ever since it was first published in 1671, Li Yu actually left a work covering the whole spectrum of literary genres that were valued at that time, ranging from poetry, an art which he practiced with much liberty and talent, to essay-writing and to theater, the latter genre being his favorite: he left us no less than ten successful comedies that were highly rated in his days.

He, who every single time had brought new life into genres that were being neglected or were losing momentum, could not possibly have avoided getting to grips with the art of writing novels in vernacular language, at some stage. He eventually did so, with consummate aptness and stunning mastery that were crowned with success. Within a period of three to four years, Li Yu thus managed to compose three collections of short stories and one novel in twenty chapters, delivering a work of remarkable coherence, revealing his will to offer a readership fond of novelty some quality entertainment while at the same time developing new forms of expression.

This work starts with the publication of two collections of tales entitled Wushengxi [Silent Comedies], probably between 1654 and 1656. The second issue, made up of only six fairly developed stories already shows real progress as compared to the first one, which consisted of twelve shorter pieces written in a form that was taking liberties with the traditional huaben format. Li Yu's style further evolves into an even more refined form of narrative with the publication of Shi'er lou [Twelve Towers], (1658) three years later, which offers twelve stories no longer told in one go but now organized in chapters. In these stories, the fading away of the oral form of the tale [huaben] inherited from the tradition of public storytellers and taken up by late-Ming literati such as Feng Menglong (1574–1645) and Ling Mengchu (1580–1644) becomes even more obvious, making room for a form of literary expression deliberately meant to be read silently. In addition, this new approach to the genre owes a lot to Li Yu's innate sense of comedy and taste for theater. His choice of uncalled for and sometimes shocking situations, of eccentric characters, of issues viewed from innovative angles, and subject to thematic variations in which humor and irony blend together, gives Li Yu's ever-evolving work a unique flavour. The maturity of its ultimate stage—which Li Yu probably considered impossible to surpass—certainly owes a lot to the practice of novel-writing. To an author seemingly unable to be satisfied with the marginalia and end-of-chapter commentaries which he used to lard his texts with from the early days, the cutting up of the story into chapters, in that respect, allows for even more elbow room to maneuver. This way, he could insert his voice in the very narrative, through digressions or racy interventions in which humor vies with mischievousness, nay self-advertising. These two collections, which together total thirty short stories, constitute Li Yu's "official" literary work, and after signing them he incidentally started embodying a new type of literati as he, on several occasions, showed ready to defend his copyright—as author and publisher—before the law, against rather unscrupulous booksellers. Yet, he already ventures to throw in a few saucy stories and scatologic details when he, for instance, wishes to illustrate the superiority of a countrywoman's sense of wit on a highwayman's deceitfulness (W I 5), the love of an effeminate young boy for his friend that leads him to emasculate himself (W I 6), the jealousy of a husband titillated by an impish friend during a drinking binge (W II 10), the sensuality of a naiad (S 4), or the frigidity of a wife in need of attention (S 8). However, the overall tone and content remain formally acceptable and good-mannered, as if care had been taken all along to remain within the limits of correctness. Such self-restraint must certainly have turned out to be extremely frustrating for an author who had repeatedly displayed his will to blow up all barriers, both formal and thematic! These barriers, he eventually did blow up; by writing the Rou putuan.

PIERRE KASER

Translated From The French
by Victor Thibaut

Selected Works

Translations

Wushengxi

Li Yu. A mari jaloux, femme fidèle. Kaser, Pierre (trans.), Arles: Editions Philippe Picquier, "Picquier Poche" n° 95, (1990) 1998, 268 p.

Li Yu. Silent Operas. Hanan, Patrick (ed.), Hong Kong: The University of Hong Kong, "Renditions Paperbacks." 1990, xiii+201 p.

Shi'er lou

Li Yu. A Tower for the Summer Heat. Hanan, Patrick (trans.), New York: Ballantine Books, 1992, xv + 249 p.

Rou putuan

Li Yu. The Carnal Prayer Mat [Rou Putuan]. Hanan, Patrick (trans.), New York, Ballantine Books, 1990, xiv + 316 p. Reprint: Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press, 1996, xiv + 317 p.

Further Readings

Hanan, Patrick. The Invention of Li Yu. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1988, 272 p.

Chang Chun-shu, Chang, Shelley. Crisis and Transformation in Seventeenth-Century China: Society, Culture and Modernity in Li Yu's World. Ann Arbor, MI: The University of Michigan Press, 1992, x + 452 p.

Kaser, Pierre. L'œuvre romanesque de Li Yu (1611–1680). Parcours d'un novateur. Université de Paris VII, 1994. 588 p. [Unpublished PhD]

———. "Présentation et traduction des commentaires du Rou putuan." in Dars, Jacques, Chan Hingho, Comment lire un roman chinois. Arles: Editions Philippe Picquier, 2001, pp. 182–196.

---

LIBERTINISM

---

Historically, the libertine novel is a literary phenomenon of the French eighteenth century. The earliest examples were inspired by the Regency (1715–1723) but written and published under Louis XV, while the last ones were written during the French Revolution, notably by the Marquis de Sade. The end of Louis XIV's reign stood under the influence of the austere and religious Madame de Maintenon, and when the king died the court happily anticipated more joyous times, welcoming the Regency style. Free from Versailles etiquette and the centralized power wielded by the self-proclaimed Sun-King, the aristocracy flocked to Paris in search of renewed pleasures. The libertine novel signals this renewal of exuberant and frivolous attitudes, opposed to the strict morality enforced at Versailles after the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes.

The two main branches of the genre end with the French Revolution. The mondain libertine novel, an aristocratic genre par excellence, declined when French aristocrats were guillotined or went into exile. At the same time, erotic or obscene libertine novels became political, taking the shape of pro- or anti-revolutionary or anti-royalist pamphlets directed against Louis XVI or against the very unpopular Marie-Antoinette.

The English term “libertine” encompasses the French libertin (masculine) and libertine (feminine). The type and its associated thought and behavior are not an eighteenth-century invention: there had been libertines in the previous century. However, some contemporary critics insist on a distinction between libertinage érudit [erudite libertinism] in the seventeenth century and libertinage des mœurs (libertinism of behavior) in the eighteenth century. The erudite libertines were more explicitly anti-religious and more articulate in their philosophical views, although they were also condemned for their sexuality, most notably the practice of sodomy, and their general turpitude. The second-wave libertines appear less concerned with abstract philosophical systems and more directly interested in sexual freedom, but they did have newer systems of beliefs. Theirs was an age that claimed frivolity as a philosophical tenet: far from being avoided or hidden, frivolity was now claimed as a moral and philosophical principle. It was appreciated not only by novelists and writers of fairy tales but also by philosophers who saw in the frivolous an ideal means to practice one of the fundamental tenets of the Enlightenment—didacticism. Jean-Jacques Rousseau, better known for his sentimental Julie; ou, la nouvelle Héloïse [Julie; or, The New Eloise] (1761) and his political treatises, such as Du contrat social; ou, principes du droit politique [Of the Social Contract; or, Principles of Political Right] (1762) also wrote a fairy tale, La reine fantasque [The Whimsical Queen] (1758). Voltaire also wrote dozens of philosophical tales of oriental inspiration, and Denis Diderot, the coeditor of the Encyclopédie, wrote a libertine novel in the oriental vein, Les bijoux indiscrets [The Indiscreet Jewels] (1748). The libertine side of otherwise prestigious Enlightenment philosophers was often erased from official histories of French literature: The Indiscreet Jewels, a novel in which a sultan who possesses a magic ring can make women's sex (“the jewels”) speak, was ignored for nearly two centuries. Diderot's writing a libertine novel has often been attributed to his dire financial situation, a myth created by the philosopher's daughter and by his friends after his death. It is now universally acknowledged that Diderot's libertine novel in fact makes an important contribution to his political and philosophical program. In his Histoire de la sexualité [History of Sexuality] (1976) Michel Foucault analyzed Diderot as a key witness to the sudden increase in discourses on sexuality in the eighteenth century, although it has now also been recognized that the sexual discourse provided by the jewels are highly biased, as no male “jewel” ever confessed in eighteenth-century libertine fiction.

But if libertinism is rife among eighteenth-century novelists and philosophers, there is no real consensus about what exactly constitutes the “libertine novel.” The word libertine refers to a whole range of types: on the one hand, the free-thinking spirit who claims an individual right to knowledge, advocates free inquiry, and refuses the precepts of the Church; and on the other, a person who claims as inalienable the right to individual pleasure and sexual gratification outside the moral norms imposed by society. The expression “libertine novel” is just as problematic: to qualify, does the libertine novel have to be about libertins and libertines, or should the text itself be libertine? In other words, does its ideological program have to follow the precepts advocated by libertines themselves? Rather than reading this apparent confusion as a restriction, I will concentrate on the variety and richness of a genre that remains one of the most distinguishable features of a century that is mostly remembered as “philosophical” but that proudly claimed to be at once libertine and frivolous.

The libertine novel is polymorphous: it can be an epistolary novel, a memoir-novel, a novel in dialogue form, in the first or third person, and so on. The genre has often been split into two main categories: the mondain novel (also sometimes called the galant) and the erotic libertine novel. The mondain novel is often associated with the aristocracy, and it takes the form of confession-memoirs relating the coming of age of young male aristocrats. Prominent examples are *Confessions du comte de **** [*The Confession of Count ****] (1741) by Charles Pinot-Duclos and Les égarements du cœur et de l'esprit [The Wayward Head and Heart] by Crébillon fils (not to be confused with his father, Crébillon, a once-famous playwright now mainly forgotten). Other mondain or galant libertine novels include such epistolary novels as Claude-Joseph Dorat's Les sacrifices de l'amour [The Sacrifices of Love], Les malheurs de l'inconstance [The Sorrows of Fickleness] (1772), and the most popular eighteenth-century French novel, Choderlos de Laclos's Les liaisons dangereuses (1782). The epistolary genre was a favorite form of the libertine mondain novel as it allowed greater manipulation of characters, the plot unfolding at the same time as the writing of the letter. Better than any other genre, epistolary novels allow libertines to manipulate their prey by controlling not only what they do but ultimately what they read, write, and think. Writing thus becomes the epistolary libertines' lethal weapon but also the cause of their demise—the Marquise de Merteuil's downfall in Les Liaisons dangereuses is brought about by the very same letters that had empowered her.

Erotic libertine novels such as Crébillon fils's Le sofa [The Sofa], Diderot's Indiscreet Jewels, and La Morlière's Angola (1746; Angola: An Eastern Tale) include more or less thinly veiled sexual allusions. Because of Antoine Galland's translation of Les mille et une nuits [The Arabian Nights] at the beginning of the eighteenth century, erotic libertine novels often draw on fashionable orientalist themes. They are often dialogues: a libertin reads an oriental and salacious tale to the countess he would like to seduce (as in Angola), or, in The Sofa, an oriental narrator tells a sultan and his sultana of his adventures when, transformed into a sofa, he was able to witness many libertine adventures. These pseudo-oriental novels are often satirical, and the erotic possibilities of the dialogue are never exploited. In fact, the tone is often amused or sarcastic: in Crébillon's novel, the stupidity of the male omnipotent sultan stands in contrast to the refinement of his sultana. La Morlière prefers not to give any clue as to the success of his libertine and leaves the novel unfinished (a libertine characteristic) by declaring that, unfortunately, the editor has not been given the last part of the manuscript.

Still ignored or rejected by some critics, the obscene libertine novel represents at once the most striking and popular genre of the eighteenth century. If some recent critics are still reluctant to attribute any value to these texts of the “second shelf” (as some French critics have referred to them), obscene novels better exemplify those definitions of the word libertine that include a philosophical dimension. As Robert Darnton has shown, these texts were “philosophical” at the time, and orders from the clandestine book trade included, side by side on the same list, works by philosophers (Diderot, Rousseau, Voltaire) and obscene texts, all under the same category of “philosophical texts” (see Darnton, 1995). Even so, historians have preferred to ignore the erotic output to concentrate on the philosophical impact of the eighteenth century on contemporary France. Yet the proliferation of philosophical writings coincides, after 1740, with a sudden increase in obscene texts. The vast production and numerous reprintings of obscene libertine novels throughout the century attest to their undeniable popularity.

LIBERTINISM

While the first obscene novels were usually dialogues—L'École des filles [The School for Girls] in 1655 and L'Académie des Dames (Women's Academy), first in Latin and in French in 1680—the eighteenth-century obscene libertine novel may also be epistolary, written in the first or third person, a memoir-novel, dialogues, or even very close to drama. The first obscene bestseller of the Enlightenment was Histoire de D[om Bougre], Portier des Chartreux [History of Dom Bougre] (1740) by Gervaise de Latouche, a book which Adélaïde, daughter of Louis XV, appreciated so much that she wanted to share it with her brother. Their father intervened. Dom Bougre even spawned an entire obscene dynasty: later in the century, his sister's raunchy confessions were also published as Mémoires de Suzon, sœur de Dom Bougre [Memoirs of Suzon, Sister of Dom Bougre] (1777) as were his niece's memoirs, Histoire de Marguerite, fille de Suzon, nièce de Dom Bougre (1784; History of Marguerite). The most popular obscene novel throughout the eighteenth century, published the same year as John Cleland's Fanny Hill, was Thérèse philosophe [The Philosophical Thérèse] (1748), attributed to Boyer d'Argens. It tackles the philosophical problems of human nature, temperament, and social organization and is written in an anti-clerical vein. It was reprinted throughout the century, and Sade even calls it the first truly immoral book in his Juliette (1797). Then came Fougeret de Monbron's Margot la ravaudeuse [The Amorous Adventures of Margot], Andréa de Nerciat's Félicia; ou, Mes fredaines [Félicia; or, My Mischief] and many other scantily dressed confessions.

Contrary to the first (mondain or galant) or even the second (erotic) libertinage, these obscene novels depict characters who either are not of aristocratic origin or do not function in the aristocratic world. And while libertinage mondain is interested in male rites of passage organized by more mature women, the obscene libertinage focuses mainly, although not exclusively, on female rites of passage (two exceptions include Dom Bougre and Le libertin de qualité [The Noble Libertine], attributed to Honoré Gabriel de Mirabeau, whose young hero becomes a gigolo). In obscene libertinage, female protagonists either end up in prison or lead a happy life enlightened by philosophy, as is the case with Thérèse.

Whether the novels belong to what today we would call pornography (a word first used in the nineteenth century) or to the more prestigious genre of mondain boudoir pre-Sadean libertinism, they share with Enlightenment philosophers one common concern—pedagogy. All libertine novels are mainly about the education of young men and women and their entry into the world of conventional aristocracy. Consequently, the moral implications of the erotic component are not only indirect but also sly: working against the grain of morality, the libertine novel deals primarily with the non-oppositional integration of new members into a society whose rules are not to be changed. By its nature and its objective (as a Bildungsroman), the libertine novel is faced with a dilemma: how can novels pretend to be at once libertine (i.e., oppositional) and also portray the efforts of heroes and heroines (aristocrats or future prostitutes, male and female) to fit into that particular society? This contradiction is often reflected in the closure of libertine novels: libertine heroes and heroines either eventually find “true love” and live happily ever after, or else they end up disfigured like Laoclos's Marquise de Merteuil. Similarly, the heroes and heroines of the obscene branch end up happily married or diseased, locked up or castrated. In other words, they are either completely rejected or just as completely adopted by a society that remains untainted by unruly, but temporary, sexual prowess and practices.

Undoubtedly the most notorious libertine author from the eighteenth century remains the Marquis de Sade, nicknamed the Divine Marquis. While locked up in the infamous Bastille (accused, among other things, of incest and numerous murders), Sade wrote among the most philosophical and most cruel of libertine novels. The libertine tradition culminates in Sade, who united in his work the old (and rather artificial) divide between the libertinism of credo and of behavior: his works are at once philosophical (notably atheist) and they list with a sometimes suspicious complacency endless varieties of sexual practices that usually involve cruelty. In addition to being among the most prolific libertine authors, Sade is the eighteenth-century writer whose work has been the most analyzed by members of the twentieth-century French intelligentsia, from Georges Bataille, Maurice Blanchot, and Pierre Klossowski to Jean Paulhan and Roland Barthes. Sade wrote in many genres, from short stories, Les crimes de l'amour [The Crimes of Love] (1800) to epistolary fiction, Aline et Valcour; ou, Le roman philosophique, 1795. His most famous productions are Les 120 journées de Sodome [The 120 Days of Sodom], Justine; ou, les malheurs de la vertu [Justine; or, The Misfortunes of Virtue], (1791) Histoire de Juliette; ou, les prospérités du vice (1797) [Juliette], and La philosophie dans le boudoir [Philosophy in the Bedroom] (1795). Sade's novels, still banned in the 1950s, are now being edited for the prestigious Bibliothèque de la Pléiade, a literary Pantheon immortalizing the classics of French literature. After editions causing much publicized lawsuits leading to the condemnation in 1957 of publisher Jean-Jacques Pauvert, this collection, printed on a paper referred to as "Bible paper" because of its thinness, marks an ironically fitting fortune for the "Divine Marquis."

Ultimately, the libertines exemplify the paradoxical relationship between the Enlightenment and new forms of morality and sexual ethics. Both fiercely aristocratic and mondain, the libertine novel also found comfort in heroes and heroines who reacted against the strict norms imposed by the Church. Ultimately, however, libertines were not allowed to oppose the state apparatus that had allowed the French aristocracy to survive and dominate for so long. Everyone agreed that changes were necessary, but libertines who did not conform were expelled, imprisoned, or maimed. It is not clear, however, if the reason for such closures was strictly moral or if the power to eliminate opposition so drastically was a case of wishful thinking, the last respite of an arrogant and refined class that felt its power and authority were already undermined, as the 1789 revolution would soon confirm.

JEAN MAINIL

Further Reading

- Brooks, Peter. The Novel of Worldliness: Crébillon, Marivaux, Laclos, Stendhal. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1969.
- Cazenobe, Colette. Le système du libertinage de Crébillon à Laclos. Oxford: Voltaire Foundation, 1991.
- Cryle, Peter. Geometry in the Boudoir: Configurations of French Erotic Narrative. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1994.
- Darnton, Robert. The Forbidden Bestsellers of Pre-Revolutionary France. New York and London: Norton, 1995.
- DeJean, Joan. Libertine Strategies: Freedom and the Novel in Seventeenth-Century France. Columbus, OH: Ohio State University Press, 1981.
- DeJean, Joan. Literary Fortifications: Rousseau, Laclos, Sade. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1984.
- Feber, Michel (editor). The Libertine Reader: Eroticism and Enlightenment in Eighteenth-Century France. New York: Zone Books, 1997.
- Goulemot, Jean-Marie. Forbidden Texts: Erotic Literature and Its Readers in Eighteenth-Century France. Translated by James Simpson, Cambridge: Polity Press, and Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1994.
- Hunt, Lynn. The Family Romance of the French Revolution. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, and London: Routledge, 1992.
- Hunt, Lynn (editor). The Invention of Pornography: Obscenity and the Origins of Modernity, 1500–1800. New York: Zone Books, 1993.
- Kearney, Patrick J. A History of Erotic Literature. London: Macmillan, 1982.
- Laroch, Philippe. Petits-mâitres et roués: Évolution de la notion de libertinage dans le roman français du XVIIIe siècle. Québec: Presses de l'Université Laval, 1979.
- Trousson, Raymond (editor). Romans libertins du XVIIIe siècle. Paris: Laffont, 1993.
- Wagner, Peter. Eros Revived: Erotica of the Enlightenment in England and America. London: Secker and Warburg, 1988.

---

LIBRARIES

---

The preservation of many works of erotic literature has frequently depended on the complex interactions not only of booksellers, collectors, and scholars, but also of police and customs agents, all of whom erratically deposited books considered morally questionable and culturally worthless in those few libraries willing to house and even to hide them. Many books never made it into libraries, of course, and have been lost. Those which did remained vulnerable to theft, mutilation, neglect, and removal by censors. Today, archival policies are more enlightened and acquisitions of modern examples of popular works are more Catholic, but gaps in the world's erotic heritage are legion.

Major Repositories

Despite a persistent rumor probably started inadvertently by Alfred Kinsey, who joked to a visitor that the Kinsey Institute for Research in Sex, Gender, and Reproduction owned the largest collection of erotic books outside of the Vatican, the Vatican Library has never compiled an archive of erotica, though it does own a few important volumes. The largest and most legendary repositories of classic erotic books, that is, those published in various western (and a much smaller number of oriental) languages prior to the early twentieth century, are in four major institutions: the British Museum Library (London), the Bibliothèque Nationale (Paris), the Library of Congress (Washington), and the Kinsey Institute for Research in Sex, Gender, and Reproduction (University of Indiana, Bloomington). For obvious reasons, these libraries exercise some control over access to erotica collections. Scholars should attempt to ascertain ahead of time the holdings of particular archives by using published guides and bibliographies, beginning perhaps with Deakin's bibliography of bibliographies.

British Museum (BM): The core collection of the British Museum Library, the so-called Private Case, was assembled by Henry Spencer Ashbee, greatest of bibliographers of English erotic literature, then supplemented by the collections of Edward Phelps, once housed in the Guildhall Library but transferred to the BM in 1950, and Charles Reginald Dawes, part of which was transferred to the BM in 1964. According to Paul Cross, deaccessions and losses had, by 1991, reduced the number of items in the archive to 2,143, of which Patrick J. Kearney's The Private Case (1981) lists 1,939 (Cross, 225). Kearney's long-promised second volume of his bibliography will trace those lost and missing. The collection, which boasts such early examples as "Antonia's" The Crafty Whore (1658), an English adaptation of Aretino's Ragionamenti, is unparalleled, and previously unnoted manuscripts and troves of ballads and bawdy poems turn up from time to time. Students attempting to locate similar English-language items in other libraries should consult Alfred Rose's still useful Register of Erotic Books (originally issued under the name Rolf S. Reade in 1936), a bibliography of 5,061 entries compiled from shelflists in the British Museum, with interpolations from the Bodleian Library at Oxford University, the Cambridge University Library, the Vatican, and a few other minor English archives.

Bibliothèque Nationale: The French national library began depositing erotic books in a special "Hell" section during the Napoleonic era. In 1991, according to Cross (225), the L'Enfer collection of the Bibliothèque Nationale contained roughly 1500 books, of which 108 were in English. Most of the rest, though many nationalities are represented, are examples of classic French erotic literature from the seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth centuries. The 1998 revision of Pascal Pia's first (1975) edition of Les Livres de L'Enfer, itself an updating of earlier guides, has been supplemented by 200 additions from the Roger Peyrefitte and Michel Simon collections. Digitalization has helped the Bibliothèque Nationale to integrate books from L'Enfer into its main online catalog, which makes searching much easier.

Library of Congress: Integration is also the practice of the Library of Congress. Where once access to erotic books in the so-called Delta (or Blue) section was limited, the Library now catalogues its items with the main collections. SCORPIO (the LC online catalog) lists them by author, title, and subject. That has been a rational strategy for coping with the flood of erotic books into the Library since the 1960s, when the waning of censorship led publishers of erotic books to apply for copyrights they previously would have not sought out of fear of prosecution; copyrighting a work requires that one copy be deposited at the Library of Congress. On the other hand, dispersal of restricted materials has sometimes meant that scholars have to search more diligently for items considered erotic.

Kinsey Institute: The Kinsey Institute houses the world's most concentrated collection of sexual materials: books, journals, reprints, ephemera, art, artifacts, film, photographs, data, and biographies, many of which are unique. Its erotic fiction sub-collection is replete with manuscripts, folklore, and classic bound volumes in many languages, some from the Dawes Collection, some deaccessioned duplications from the BM's Private Case, some from European collections, notably many volumes spirited away from the library of Berlin's Institut für Sexualwissenschaft before it was destroyed by the Nazis in the early 1930s. American works are impressively represented by imprints from pre-Civil War publishers to modern pulp houses. Especially valuable are the vertical files containing dealer catalogs and flyers; these old and new brochures indicate what sort of materials have circulated over time. The Kinsey's photography archives are the world's largest, with more than 70,000 individual prints, and its erotic film collections, especially strong in stag films, are the world's most historically comprehensive. Rooms hold erotic art and artifacts both Oriental (e.g., a phenomenal group of Japanese erotic woodcuts) and western. The electronic catalog is available on-line. Scholars can use it to locate specific texts, but extensive searches of particular genres of erotica, some of which have not been fully indexed, even under the Kinsey Library's unique nomenclature and descriptors, require the services of staff that includes anthropologists, sociologists, and psychologists. Research libraries throughout the world own the 120 microfilm reels of the Institute's mostly eighteenth- and nineteenth-century materials (novels, joke collections, woodcuts, scholarly works, etc.), but the microfilm set and its index, Sex Research, do not reflect additions deposited since 1983. Staff members, however, continuously revise and update bibliographies available for purchase.

To these four major institutions might in the future be added two others. The first is the Russian State Library (formerly the Lenin Library) in Moscow. Nikolai Skorodumov, deputy director of the Moscow State University Library, assembled 11,000 items of erotica (books, postcards, artwork, articles, pamphlets, and objects), which were moved to the Lenin Library in 1947. These and subsequent additions have never been catalogued, but visitors claim to have seen erotic poems by Lermontov and Pushkin, samizdat versions of erotic novels from the 1920s that were clandestinely circulated in the Soviet Union, and various erotic books from the West, some seized by authorities, others donated by collectors (Schmidt). Strong sub-collections of folk tales, chastushka (short rhymed folk songs), and barkoviana (bawdy burlesque poetry, a Russian version of an eighteenth-century French genre) are also likely. Eventually, these archives may revise the longstanding conviction that Russia and Slavic countries produced no erotica of note.

Second in potential are the erotica collections of the Institute for Advanced Study of Human Sexuality in San Francisco, which has followed an admirable policy of gathering chiefly modern ephemeral publications before they could be lost. The success of the strategy, however, has resulted in prolonged storage of thousands of uncatalogued materials literally in warehouses in widely dispersed locations. Eventually, students at the Institute, which grants graduate degrees in sexology, will get around to identifying and indexing these large, far-flung archives. The Institute's San Francisco library maintains modest collections of fiction and memoirs, mostly contemporary American examples, poetry (in manuscript and published form, much of it local), extensive collections of short stories

LIBRARIES

(again principally contemporary American), erotic periodicals containing fiction, and dissertations by its graduates on erotic genres.

Other Libraries

In Bibliotheca Erótica, a valuable research tool, José Antonio Cerezo has identified and cross-checked titles from the collections of the British Museum, the Bibliothèque Nationale, and the Kinsey Institute against significant holdings by the Biblioteca de Catalunya Barcelona, the Biblioteca Municipal de Madrid, the Biblioteca Nacional (Madrid), the Bodleian Library (Oxford), the Bayerische Stadtbibliothek (Munich), the Bibliothèque Universitaire (Montpellier), the Cambridge University Library, the Library of Congress, the New York Public Library, and the Wiener Stadt-und-Landesbibliothek (Vienna). Not surprisingly, concentrations in these repositories tend to be heaviest in works written in the languages of their respective countries, so that the Bayerische Stadtbibliothek, for instance, is a good source for nineteenth-century German examples. For German libraries, the bibliographies compiled by Hayn, Gotendorf, and Englisch and those included in the Bilderlexicon are indispensable.

Two other libraries deserve special mention. The first is that of the American Antiquarian Society of Worcester, Massachusetts, which was founded by Isaiah Thomas, perhaps the most distinguished of early American printers, and one who pirated an American edition of Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure. Although the AAS has no particular erotic orientation, its cabinets of books published in America before 1877 contain sensational and risqué works, including 42 Indian Captivity narratives and books written by George Thompson (Venus in Boston, 1849) and unknown authors (Confessions of a Washington Belle, 1863). It is especially rich in "sporting papers" such as The Whip, The Flash, and The Libertine, the scandalous tabloids of the 1840s in whose pages appeared some of the first erotica written by American authors. Available also are period publisher and dealer catalogs. Curators at the AAS, moreover, are familiar with early advertising and printing technologies, traffic in contraband, and the histories of marginal publishers.

Also important is the New York Public Library, whose wide-ranging acquisition policies have garnered both finely-bound classics and extremely cheap editions in many languages. Erotic books were once catalogued within a separate card system under what Gershon Legman called the xxx designation, and older, more fragile items are often still kept in special rooms, but many others can be requested through normal channels, and careful searching will discover English, German, French, Russian, and Slavic works from the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries as well as Oriental examples in both original languages and translations. Cheaper editions tend to be available only on microfilm, a medium adopted by the Library to preserve ephemera and to prevent theft. A scholar searching for erotic stories published during the 1920s and 1930s will find on a single microfilm reel an entire sub-collection of fifty pamphlets published—or in some cases mimeographed—under such imprints as the Erotica Bibliography Society of London and New York, the French Modern Art Society of Paris, the London Press, the Parisian Publication Company, the Havana Publishing Company (most of the places of publication are spurious), and many others. The New York Public Library now owns the holdings of the International Gay Information Center, which include fiction by virtually all American writers working in gay erotic genres from the 1960s to the 1980s. Routinely catalogued in CATNYP, the library's digital catalog, individual items are available to patrons in the main reading room.

University libraries also repay investigation. Trinity College (Oxford), for example, holds the Sir Francis Dawson Collection of erotic books, chiefly in the English language. Harvard holds the extremely rare manuscript of Butler's Dil-doides, and the Magdalene College Library at Cambridge owns a copy of Millot's Escole des Filles (1655), the book that so inflamed Samuel Pepys. Determined to build research centers, newer American universities have been more aggressive than their European counterparts in securing significant literary artifacts, often in manuscript form. Given the headstart of older institutions and the expense of acquiring classic texts, newer universities are more likely to cherry-pick singular items when they appear on the market. Dealers and auction houses now sell internationally, so that works may end up far from their countries of origin. Thus, books published by the eighteenth-century English erotica publisher Curll are in the University of Kansas Library; German, French, and Russian erotic titles are available at the Providence Athenaeum (Providence, Rhode Island). Competition among research libraries can be intense, with the result that pieces can be scattered. Henry Miller's prodigious output has been fragmented among the University of California at Los Angeles, the Henry Miller Memorial Library at Big Sur, California, the New York Public Library, the University of Southern Illinois at Carbondale, the University of Texas at Austin, the University of Virginia, and Yale University.

Occasionally writers donate their papers to their alma maters, as in the case of John Colleton (Robert Walter Marks), who left the manuscripts of his erotic and mainstream works to the College of Charleston, in South Carolina, but more celebrated authors may also sell them to the highest bidder. Institutions with the deepest pockets usually prevail. Selected items at the Harry Ramson Humanities Research Center at The University of Texas at Austin (one of the more aggressive acquirers) include the earliest known poetic fragment of The Court of Venus, but also the papers of the British Sexological Society from the 1910s to the 1940s; a collection of Havelock Ellis and another of Frank Harris; unusually broad collections of Radclyffe Hall and James Joyce, the latter including 39 copies of the first edition of Joyce's Ulysses, some with annotations by original owners such as Lawrence of Arabia; a large archive of civil rights attorney Morris Ernst, who defended The Well of Loneliness and Ulysses in America; the papers of Aleister Crowley; the papers of Jean Cocteau (especially his drawings), Pierre Louÿs, and Henri Pierre Roché; and many letters by authors of erotic works.

In recent years, academic interest in issues of gender and sexuality has led libraries and advocates for minority subcultures in most western countries to archive explicit texts. Brown University holds a pulp erotica collection that, with 4,600 gay novels (but only 31 lesbian titles), outstrips that of the New York Public Library. In addition, Brown's Katzoff Collection contains 31,500 mostly literary works relating to gays and lesbians, including the John Preston (author and editor of gay literature) and the Larry Townsend (sodomasochistic fiction and pictorial erotica) subcollections. Brown also supports a truly massive gathering of women's romance novels of varying degrees of explicitness. Guides by Gough and Miller and contributors to Cornog's Libraries, Erotica, and Pornography can help locate other such gay and lesbian collections. Scholarship on popular culture genre has fueled acquisitions of demotic literature. In decades past, folklorists compiled folk tales, ballads, broadsides, songs, poems, and chapbooks, depositing them in libraries such as the University of California (both Los Angeles and Berkeley), Indiana University, Harvard, and the Nottingham University Library, as well as in many European institutions. Modern day equivalents are underground comics and erotic graphic novels such as those housed at Bowling Green State University (Ohio), the University of Minnesota, and Michigan State University. French universities now accumulate bandes dessinées (comics) just as Japanese institutions purchase manga. In the same spirit, the National Library of Australia has begun to archive sexual materials from the Internet. It has been recording selected Web sites since 1996, including those which feature erotic fiction, and it steadily adds others in an attempt to establish a historical timeline.

Virtually all large public libraries throughout the world have been the recipients of erotic books when donors insisted that they accompany more "desirable" bequests. In today's relatively tolerant climate, librarians may quietly enter the items into catalogs, especially since, as Evelyn Geller points out, legendary "inferno" collections once closeted by public libraries in America usually contained books that are now considered harmless (Geller, 61). Legal records of seizures and prosecutions can be revelatory as well. The papers of the pioneering American anti-censorship attorney Theodore Schroeder, who defended many literary works prosecuted in the early twentieth century, are in the library at Southern Illinois University; the early records of the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice, which seized many books, are in the Library of Congress, while the papers of John Saxton Sumner, Comstock's successor as leader of the Society, are at the State Historical Society of Wisconsin (Madison). The British Museum holds the only surviving copy of the Polunbi Catalog (Verzeichnis der auf Grund des [section] 184 des Reichstrafgesetzbuches), which lists books seized by police during the Weimar Republic.

LIBRARIES

In searching for materials, especially primary texts, students of erotic literature should bear in mind several factors. First, many extensive collections are still in private hands, especially in France. Collections infrequently migrate; the most celebrated was that of J.P. Morgan, whose heirs removed it from his New York library and sold it back to French aficionados. When owners die, heirs may dispose of parcels without publicity, and it can take years for these to find their way into libraries. Second, collections in libraries often reflect the biases of their compilers. Some bibliophiles systematically strove to gather complete runs of authors or genres, while others sought only rare or expensive examples, ignoring cheap, “trashy” but nonetheless historically valuable ephemera. Still other donors obeyed the dictates of their own tastes, so that an assemblage of flagellants might not be representative of a place or historical period. Similar caveats apply to materials haphazardly seized by police or customs agents, and then seconded to a repository, a practice that has notably contributed to the growth of holdings in the Bibliothèque Nationale, the Library of Congress, and the Kinsey Institute, where readers often find court docket numbers stamped on copies. Third, despite the efforts of the Kinsey Institute to regularize sexual subject headings, many libraries prefer not to use them. Public libraries in particular avoid the heading “erotic literature” for fear that it will act as a flag to censors, and they are even less likely to employ formal terms for fetishes (though they occasionally opt for euphemisms such as “covert cultures” or “alternative literatures”) especially now that so many catalogs are available online. Even so, electronic services are a boon, because they make global searches increasingly viable. OCLC, RLIN, and WorldCat often furnish the location of specific editions in particular libraries, and can sometimes be used to request them.

JOSEPH W. SLADE III

Further Reading

- [Ashbee, Henry Spencer], pseudonym Pisanus Fraxi. Index Librorum Prohibitorum; Centuria Librorum Absconditorum; Catena Librorum Tacendorum, Being Notes Bio-Biblio-Iconographical and Critical on Curious, Uncommon and Erotic Books. 3 vols. London: Privately Printed, 1877, 1879, 1885; rpt. Index Librorum Prohibitorum; Centuria Librorum Absconditorum; Catena Librorum Tacendorum. 3 vols. London: Skilton, 1960; rpt. Bibliography of Forbidden Books. 3 vols. New York: Jack Brussel, 1962; rpt. The Encyclopedia of Erotic Literature. 3 vols. New York: Documentary Books, 1962; Forbidden Books of the Victorians: Henry Spencer Ashbee's Bibliographies of Erotica, ed. Peter Fryer. London: Odyssey, 1970.
- Bilderlexicon der Erotik. Ein bibliographisches und bibliographisches Nachschlagewerk, eine Kunst- und Literaturgeschichte für die Gebiete der erotischen Belletristik ... von der Antike zur Gegenwart*. 6 vols. Vienna and Hamburg: Verlag für Kulturforschung, 1928–1931, 1963. Edited by Leo Schidrowitz: I: Kulturgeschichte; II: Literatur und Kunst; III: Sexualwissenschaft; IV: Ergänzungsband. Edited by Armand Mergen: V and VI: Sexualforschung: Stichwort und Bild.
- Cerezo, José Antonio. Bibliotheca Erotica: Sive, Apparatus Ad Catalogum Librorum Eroticorum: (Ad Usum Privatum Tantum) José Antonio Cerezo. Madrid: Ediciones El Museo Universal, 1993.
- Cornog, Martha, ed. Libraries, Erotica, Pornography. Phoenix, AZ: Oryx Press, 1991.
- Cross, Paul James. “The Private Case: A History,” The Library of the British Museum: Retrospective Essays on the Department of Printed Books, ed. P. R. Harris. London: The British Library, 1991, pp. 201–240.
- Deakin, Terence. Catalogi Librorum Eroticorum: A Critical Bibliography of Erotic Bibliographies and Book-Catalogues. London: Cecil & Amelia Woolf, 1964.
- Geller, Evelyn. Forbidden Books in American Public Libraries, 1876–1939: A Study in Cultural Change. Westport CT: Greenwood Press, 1984.
- Gough, Cal, ed. Gay/Lesbian Archives and Libraries in North America. Rev. ed. Atlanta: American Library Association Gay and Lesbian Taskforce Clearinghouse, 1989.
- Hayn, Hugo, Alfred N. Gotendorf, and Paul Englisch. Bibliotheca Germanorum Erotica and Curiosa. Verzeichnis der gesamten deutschen erotischen Literatur mit Einschluss der Übersetzungen, nebst Beifügung Originale. 9 vols. 1912–1914; vol. 9, 1929; rpt. Hanau/München: Verlag Müller & Kiepenueuer, 1968.
- Kearney, Patrick J. The Private Case: An Annotated Bibliography of the Private Case Erotica Collection in the British (Museum) Library. London: Jay Landesman, 1981.
- Kinsey Institute for Research in Sex, Reproduction, and Gender. Sex Research: Early Literature From Statistics to Erotica: Guide to the Microfilm Collection. Woodbridge, CT: Research Publications, 1983.
- Matusak, Susan, comp. Bibliography of the Eighteenth-Century Holdings of the Institute for Sex Research. Bloomington, IN: Institute for Sex Research, 1975.
- Miller, Alan V., comp. Directory of the International Association of Lesbian and Gay Archives and Libraries. Toronto: International Association of Lesbian and Gay Archives and Libraries, 1987.
- Pia, Pascal [J. Durand]. Les Livres de L'Enfer. Bibliographie critique des ouvrages érotiques dans leurs différentes éditions du XVIe siècle à nos jours. Paris: Librairie Arthème Fayard, 1998.
- Reade, Rolf S. [Rose, Alfred]. Registrum Librorum Eroticorum. London: Privately printed, 1936; rpt. Rose,

- Alfred. Register of Erotic Books. 2 vols. New York: Brussel, 1965.
- Schmidt, Josephine. "Psst, Comrade: Check Out the Erotica in the Library." New York Times, 5 September 2001, p. B2.
- Scott, Randall W. The Comic Art Collection Catalog: An Author, Artist, Title, and Subject Catalog of the Comic Art Collection, Special Collections Division, Michigan State University Libraries. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1993.
- Slade, Joseph W. "Major Research Collections (and the Problems of the Librarian)," Pornography and Sexual Representation: A Reference Guide. 3 Vols. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2001, I: 317–343.
- Verzeichnis der auf Grund des [section] 184 des Reichsstrafgesetzbuches eingezogenen und unbrauchbar zu machenden sowie der als unzüchtig verdächtigen Schriften (Polunbi-Katalog)*. Berlin: Polizeipräsidium in Berlin, 1926. Nachtrag, 1929.

---

LORRAIN, JEAN

---

1855–1906

French novelist, journalist, and poet

As a writer, Jean Lorrain spanned the fin de siècle spectrum, from Zola's squalid naturalism to Maeterlinck's otherworldly fantasies, but without any sense of proportion or good taste. His novels, short stories, and poetry are a compendium of the decadent fads of the period: Florence and Venice, Medusa and Ophelia ("the charm of a virgin and a perverse boy," "Sur un portrait de Botticelli"), gems and poppies ("a breast-plate studded with amethysts grips his torso and he wears a huge crown of enormous purplish poppies," Coins de Byzance); melancholy lilies and irises which "revealed to me my infamous and chaste dishonour," La forêt bleue); barbarians and Byzantium ("Yes, let them come, let them burn everything here; let them empty my coffers, let them crush my pearls, let them crucify the steward, let them rape my mother," Coins de Byzance); the paintings of Gustave Moreau, Jan Toorop, and James Ensor; Sarah Bernhardt, for whom he wrote unproduced plays, and Yvette Guilbert, for whom he composed lyrics; Wagnerian operas and Arthurian legends, the color mauve and Black Masses, motley masks and necrophiliac orgies, erotic delirium and odors "of sex, of cosmetics, of sweat." All this is described in a lapidary vocabulary, an indigestible mix of recherché arcana and the latest slang.

The world of Lorrain's fiction is ruled by women, whose morbid and perverse psychology is expressed in interior decoration, wardrobes, and scents. Madame Litvinoff in Très russe (1886), with the "sourire inquiétant de Joconde," dominates feminine men, "doux comme un enfant," and practices chastity as an erotic refinement. Another of Lorrain's heroines concentrates on making half-naked acrobats fall from their trapezes and tightropes. Depravity is common in courtesans like "the pianist" whose expert fingers can rouse enfeebled dotards, or the twelve-year-old "graveyard hooker," who plays the schoolgirl for pedophiles. Even the chlorotic virgin in Ames d'automne wants to warm her chilled extremities inside the bosom of a stable-boy. The fashionable blend of Sadic and mystical themes is found par excellence in Princesses d'Ivoire et d'Ivresse (1902), teeming with enchanted maidens and femmes fatales.

An ether addict, perpetually in failing health, Lorrain excelled at portraying physical decrepitude and superannuated desire. For him, love consists of the intimate contact of two solitary and incompatible beings. It can only be expressed in excess, which leads to madness or violence. Characters who long for beauty tend to be repellent lunatics or venial perverts. Near death, impelled partly by patriotism, partly by a sense of waning fashion, Lorrain attacked the idols of his youth in his unfinished novel Pelléastres, savagely criticizing aesthetes, Wagner and Maeterlinck. Nor had he any compunction about mocking other's sodomitic penchants, calling Jacques d'Adelsward-Fersen "a petty suburban

LORRAIN, JEAN

Nero,” whose taste for Black masses “is better suited to the pink mass (vaseline and essence of Guerlain).”

Monsieur de Bougreton (1897)

The title character is a flamboyant charlatan, the narrator’s guide through Amsterdam. A grandiloquent, impoverished dandy based on Barbey d’Aurevilley, starving to death in his fine linen and laces, he recounts stories of low-life and grotesque passion. There is the Spanish girl, raped fifteen times, who has in expiation had 15 rubies imbedded in her flesh. Another tale tells of a chaste Dutchwoman, who dotes on her she-monkey and her macaw, and insists that her Ethiopian slave, clad only in a pair of leather shorts, help her, nude, into her bath and dress her again. One day the lady is found strangled, her throat cut, and her breast half-devoured.

Vice errant: Les Norontsoff (1902)

Vladimir Norontsoff is a fabulously wealthy Russian prince, who, loaded down with vices like an idol with precious stones, lives on the Riviera in a sumptuous villa. He imposes his mad caprices on his sycophants: dressed in sumptuous robes, he often receives on a chaise percée, has two sailors abducted from the port of Nice to spin him yarns, and organizes a fantastic party in honor of Adonis where he goes too far by serving his guests three naked tattooed men on an immense, flower-decked platter. Norontsoff is a Neronian absolutist, a Slavic scion of Byzantium who despises the Tatar hordes of the modern world. His destructive mixture of rage, ennui, and love is so contradictory that he has to kill himself to live out the desires of his delirious imagination.

Lorrain lavished his full talent for description on what he called a “heart-breaking chronicle of a frightful usury of the soul.” He considered the book a moral work: “To hypocrisy and human cowardice, to the ferocity of decent people and the decency of social climber, to the acknowledged defenders of virtue [...] I dedicate these pages of sorrow and lust, a great lust whose frightful distress and incurable ennui they cannot conceive.”

Monsieur de Phocas (1910)

Subtitled Astarté, its protagonist is the young Duc de Fréneuse, alias M. de Phocas, Lorrain’s answer to Huysmans’s Des Esseintes in A Rebours (other major influences are Rachilde, Wilde, Moreau, Whistler, and Toorop). Cherubic in appearance, but icily impotent, owing to his acute cerebralism, he lives in a state of hallucinatory tension. Each sensation is exacerbated, each thought obsessional, each desire magnified in this etiolated sensibility. His morbid desires are vitiated only by a sort of voluptuous somnambulism.

This complete neurotic seeks out extraordinary experiences, moving like a voyeur from drug-fuelled high-society parties to crapulous slums, hoping to grasp in transitory fleshly pleasure a flash of terror or pain, yet tormented by awful visions. These peregrinations are guided by weird characters such as the painter Ethal who catches in a picture the death agony of a young model. Phocas goes to his death seeking a wonderful shade of green he had once glimpsed in a pair of eyes, a certain glaucous gaze of Astarté, goddess of Lust, cold as emeralds and moving as the sea. Phocas’s disenchantment makes him a cross between the glacial aesthete and the bestial barbarian, a hybrid of Dorian Gray and Mr. Hyde. Lorrain’s matter may be derivative, but the overruling mood, a sort of mournful and sadistic sensuality, is very much his own.

Le tréteau

Written in 1906 and published posthumously, The Boards is a highly entertaining novel of theatrical life. Intricately constructed, it concerns the liaison of an actress Linda Monti, based largely on Sarah Bernhardt, and Mario Nérac, a young man come to Paris from the Midi to make a success as a playwright, based partly on Lorrain. They become lovers and the actress imposes her protégé’s works on Paris. Rivalries, intrigues, the interference of the actress’s lesbian sister, and the malice of a cast-off author lead to a duel. Mario, gravely wounded and partially paralyzed, is taken home by his mother, away from the influence of the fatal actress. (Mothers in Lorrain are always long-suffering saints.) Each character in this backstage comedy of manners is based on a real person, and no one is spared. For all its glamour, literary Paris is portrayed as a charnel house and a jungle, as if the dying Lorrain had poured his disillusionment, bitterness, and rancour about the theater into this novel.

Biography

Martin-Paul-Alexandre Duval, son of a Normandy ship-owner, arrived in Paris in 1881 to make a literary reputation as Jean Lorrain. His first published poems Le Sang des dieux (1882), which daringly featured Ganymede, Antinous, “Hylas, his arms polished by Hercules’ kisses,” and Bathyllus scorching sailors in low dives with his come-hither glances and revealing dances, met with modest sales but major publicity. They reflect Lorrain’s own weakness for what he called Fleurs de boue, especially fairground pugilists, “those gentlemen of the ring, a tiger skin/About their loins, bare chests, their own skins fine and clear” (Modernités). Himself of strapping physique, with the moustache of a Viking, Lorrain painted his face, rimmed his eyes with kohl, and adorned his fluttering hands with bizarre rings.

Lorrain soon won fame as a journalist, in such periodicals as Le chat noir, La vie moderne, and Le courrier français, where his columns were devoured for their colorful reportage and innuendo-saturated gossip. He haunted the galleries and theaters, puffing a painter or slating a star in articles which he signed with names from Sentillana and Salterella to Mimosa and Stendhaletta. “As unctuous as a frosted pastry,” Lorrain became known as “the Petronius of the decadence...the best observer of a milieu of which he was also the worst ornament” (Philippe Jullian). An early example of the celebrity homosexual as social and artistic arbiter, a role later played by Andy Warhol and Truman Capote, Lorrain was pilloried in Armory’s comedy Le monsieur aux chrysanthèmes.

LAURENCE SENELICK

Selected Works

Le sang des dieux. 1882; repr. 1920.
La forêt bleue. 1883.
Les Lépillier. 1885; repr. 1999.
Loreley. 1885; repr. 1897.
Modernités. 1885.

Viviane. 1885; repr. as Brocéliande in Théâtre.
Très russe. 1886; repr. 1913; as Ville mauresque, 1942.
Les Griseries. 1887.
Dans l'oratoire. 1888.
Sonyeuse; soirs de province; soirs de Paris. 1891; repr., 1903.
Buveurs d'âmes. 1893; repr. 1929; part one repr. as Sensualité amoureuse, 1902. [with Oscar Méténier] Très russe [play], 1893.
Yanthis, comédie en 4 actes. 1894.
Sensations et souvenirs. 1895.
Un Démoniaque. 1895.
La petite classe. 1895.
Monsieur de Bougreton. 1896; repr. 1903, 1927, 1928, 1944, 1993.
Une femme par jour; femmes d'été. 1896.
La princesse sous verre. 1896.
Poussières de Paris. Tome I. 1896.
L'Ombre ardente; poésies. 1897.
Ma petite ville. 1898.
Ames d'automne. 1898.
La dame turque. 1898; repr. 1903.
Princesse d'Italie. 1898.
Madame Baringhel. 1899.
Heures d'Afrique: chroniques de Naghreb (1893-1898). 1899; repr. 1930, 1994.
La Mandragore. 1899. [with A. Ferdinand Herold] Pro-méthée, tragédie-lyrique en trois actes., 1900; repr. 1925, 1960.
Vingt femmes. 1900; repr. as Femmes de 1900, 1932.
Histoires de masques. 1900; repr., Paris, 1922; 1966; suivi de Contes d'un buveur d'éther et de textes inédits, 1987.
Monsieur de Phocas. Astarté. 1901; 1922, 1929, 1966, 1992.
Le vice errant: Coins de Byzance. 1902; repr. 1922, 1926, 1979.
Le vice errant: Les Norontsoff. 1902, repr. 1922, 1979.
Princesses d'ivoire et d'ivresse. 1902.
Poussières de Paris. Tome II. 1902.
Quelques hommes. 1903.
Propos d'âmes simples. 1904; repr. 1931. [with Delphi Fabrice] Clair de lune, 1904.
Fards et poisons. 1904.
La maison Philibert. 1904; repr. 1926, 1928, 1932 [with Gustave Coquiot] Deux heures du matin, quartier Marbeuf. Pièce en deux actes, 1904. [with Gustave Coquiot] Hôtel de l'Ouest... Chambre 22, 1904. [with Gustave Coquiot] Une Nuit de Grenelle. Pièce en un acte, 1904.
Quatre femmes en pièces. Paris, 1904.
Le crime des riches. 1905; repr. 1919, 1927, 1996.
L'École des vieilles femmes. 1905; repr. 1930, 1995.
Heures de Corse. 1905; repr. 1997. [with Gustave Coquiot] Sainte Roulette. 1905. [with Charles Esquier] Une Conquête, 1906.
Madame Monpalou. 1906; repr. 1928.
Le Tréteau. Roman de moeurs théâtrales et littéraires. 1906; repr. 1941.
Théâtre. 1906.
L'Aryenne: gens de mer, bords de Seine, bords de Marne. 1907; repr. 1931.
Hélie garçon d'hôtel. 1908; repr. 1929.
Des belles et des bêtes. 1908.
Maison pour dames. 1908; repr. 1926.

LORRIS, GUILLAUME DE AND JEHAN DE MEUNG

- Narkiss*. 1908.
Soixante-huit lettres à Édouard Magnier. 1909.
Eros vainqueur. 1909.
Pelléastres. 1910.
Du temps que les bêtes parlaient. 1911; partially repr. as Portraits littéraires et mondains, 1926.
La jonque dorée: conte japonais. 1911.
La nostalgie de la beauté. 1912.
Voyages. 1921.
Quelques lettres curieuses et inédites. 1925.
Lettres à ma mère (1864–1906). 1926.
Correspondence de Jean Lorrain... suivies des articles condamnés. 1929.
L'Art d'aimer. 1929.
La ville empoisonnée; Pall-Mall Paris. 1936.
Lettres inédits à Gabriel Mourey et à quelques auteurs (1888–1905). Edited by Jean-Marc Ramos, 1987.
Lettre au docteur Tartarin 28 février 1900. edited by Jean-Louis Lacordaire, 1991.
La poison de la Riviera. Edited by Thibaut d'Anthonay, 1992.
Venise. 1997.
Correspondences et poèmes Jean Lorrain/Gustave Moreau. Edited by Thalie Raquetti, 1998.
La dame aux lèvres rouges. Edited by F. Lacason, 2000.
- Further Reading
- Anthonay, Thibaut d'. Jean Lorrain, barbare et esthète. Paris: Plon, 1991.
Armory, Carle. "The Gentleman of the Chrysanthemums." in Lovesick. Modernist Plays of Same-sex Love, 1894–1925. edited and translated by Laurence Senelick, London, Routledge, 1999.
Dalanzac, Joël. "Moreau contre Moro. La monstruosité picturale dans 'Monsieur de Phocas'." La Licorne 35 (1995): 113–124.
- Fleischmann, Hector. Le massacre d'une Amazone. Quelques plagiat de Jean Lorrain. Paris: Genonceaux, 1904.
Gaubert, Ernest. Jean Lorrain: biographie critique. Paris: E. Sanset, 1905.
Gauthier, Pierre-Léon. Jean Lorrain: la vie, l'oeuvre et l'art d'un pessimiste à la fin du XIXe siècle. Paris: A. Lesot, 1935.
Gauthier, Pierre-Léon. Jean Lorrain. Un second oratoire: chroniques retrouvées. Dijon: Jobard, 1935.
Jullian, Philippe. Jean Lorrain, ou La Satiricon 1900. Paris: Fayard, 1974.
Kingcaid, Renee A. Neurosis and Narrative: the Decadent Short Fiction of Proust, Lorrain and Rachilde. Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1992.
Kyria, Pierre. Jean Lorrain. Paris: Seghers, 1973.
Lucet, Sophie. "Le théâtre statique de Lorrain." In Statisme et mouvement au théâtre. edited by Michel Autrand, Poitiers: La Licorne, 1995.
Mourousy, Paul. Evocations. Jean Lorrain. Paris: Jacques Lanvin, 1937.
Normandy, Georges. Jean Lorrain (1855–1906), son enfance, sa vie, son oeuvre. Paris: Bibliothèque générale d'édition, 1907.
Normandy, Georges. Jean Lorrain. 20 portraits et documents hors-texte. Paris: V. Rasmussen, 1927.
Normandy, Georges. Jean Lorrain, intime. Paris, 1928.
Paré, Sébastien. "L'érotologie eschatologique. Le mythe obsessionnel du Fin des Temps chez Lorrain." In Le Fin des Temps. edited by Gérard Peylet, Talence: Université Michel de Montaigne, 2000.
Phillip, Winn. Sexualités décadentes chez Jean Lorrain: l'héros fin de sexe. Amsterdam, Atlanta, Ga: Rodopi, 1997.
Santos, Rose. L'Art du récit court chez Jean Lorrain. Paris: Librairie Nizet, 1995.
Sipala, Carminella. Mutazioni di fine secolo: i romanzi di Jean Lorrain. Catania: CUECM, 1998.
Uzanne, Octave. Jean Lorrain. Paris, Les Amis d'Édouard, 1913.

---

LORRIS, GUILLAUME DE AND JEHAN DE MEUNG

---

Lorris, Guillaume de

c. 1215–c. 1278

Meung, Jehan de

c. 1250–c. 1305

Romance of the Rose

The huge Romance of the Rose (almost 22,000 octosyllabic lines) introduces itself as an ars amandi, a treatise about love—especially about the methods to win the favors of a lady. The first part, written around 1225 by Guillaume of Lorris, follows the rules of courtly writing: presented as the first-person retelling of an allegorical dream, that has proven completely true in the narrator's real life, it describes how the young man wanders to the door of the closed garden of the God of Love; on the wall he sees the pictures of those who do not belong with love: Age, Poverty, Envy, Avarice, and so on. Love is an activity reserved for the young, the rich, and the idle. Welcome by the beautiful "Oiseuse" (the personification of Idleness, she spends her time combing her hair and looking at her reflection in a mirror), the young hero then falls in love with a beautiful, budding rose. He makes voluntary homage to the God of Love, who gives him the ten commandments of Love, plus a few practical pieces of advice, and promises he will get his reward if he serves Love well. The allegorical encoding of the text gives the story-line a very abstract tonality; feeling, moral attributes, and qualities are embodied by one-dimensional characters who play their part in the courtly game. With the help of "Bel Accueil" (or "Pleasant Greeting," the young lover succeeds in stealing a kiss from the Rose, but then she is imprisoned in a tower built by the villain "Dangier" ("Shame/Prudence") and Jealousy. Guillaume's poem ends after 4,056 lines in the midst of the desperate narrator's complaint, in the best tradition of the love-stricken trouvère. Despite the concrete advice and anecdotes provided by a few characters who try to enlighten the young lover about the real nature of love, this first Romance of the Rose is very much a courtly cansó, the narrative development of the typical lyrical situation.

Almost fifty years later, a rather famous writer by the name of Jehan de Meung takes over the story of Guillaume and his Rose where the previous author left it (actually, he does not say anything about the change in writers before the middle of the romance, five thousand lines further). However, Jehan's approach is much more pragmatic, or cynical: the goal is certainly not any more to obtain the Rose's love, but to enjoy her ultimate favors in the most straightforward way possible. In order to reach that goal the lover enlists a number of somewhat disreputable characters, like "Faux Semblant" the hypocritical false cleric or "la Vieille" (an old hag who turned a pimp when she could not sell her body anymore); all of them try to give sound advice to the lover, putting the accent on the satisfaction of erotic desire without caring about the so-called noble love. The most impressive change is the replacement of the God of Love by his mother, the Goddess Venus. She embodies feminine sensuality, and through the means of her burning arrows awakens the desire of the Rose, who stops being a passive object of passion to become an active participant in the game of love. Venus does not care overly for courtly discourse, and the text strongly suggests that even when she hides it, woman is "hotter" than man and can barely wait for the satisfaction of her inexhaustible lust. The rise of Venus over her son reveals the fascination and fear of feminine sexuality at the root of Jehan's continuation of the Romance of the Rose.

After the Rose has been inflamed by Venus' arrows, the lover-narrator turned pilgrim is able to enter the fortress built by Jealousy. The last sequence of the Romance is actually a long metaphor of the sexual act, depicted very graphically as the various steps of a successful pilgrim's quest; precisely when the pilgrim reaches the heart of the sanctuary, however, the dream ends up abruptly, and the dreamer wakes up. Although the second part of the Romance was at the root of the so-called "Quarrel of the Romance of the Rose," it seems that Jehan of Meung is not primarily interested in the ars amandi initiated by his predecessor. Two of his most original characters are Nature and Genius, her chaplain. Both follow the tradition started by Alanus de Insulis in his De planctu Naturae, according to which Nature bitterly deplores the various vices developed by mankind, mainly sodomy, to escape its natural destination—crescete et multiplicamini. The refinements of courtly love, as well as the tricks pertaining to venal love, detract human beings from playing the only serious game intended for them by God, the game of generation. Nature and Genius incite men and women to make love in order to produce offspring, without caring for the niceties of civilization.

Except for this generative duty laid on man by God himself, however, the poem does not have much use for the feminine. The text is deeply misogynistic—although not more than most clerical writings of the time. Sexuality is indeed seen in a rather positive light, as long as it satisfies the requirements of generation, but at the same time the possibility that women do enjoy sex makes them into whores who are not to be trusted. Paradoxically, what starts out as a courtly poem exalting noble love for a lady ends up as an apology for free sexuality disengaged of any reference to love, and as a tacit dismissal of all women as being no ladies at all. Jehan of Meung's Romance of the Rose will remain for two centuries the bluebook of misogyny, although it is somehow more concerned about gathering knowledge in all areas pertaining to sexuality, the relationship between man and woman, and what can be loosely called "love"—including a discussion on semantics and the meanings of words.

LOUÏS, PIERRE

ANNE BERTHELOT

Editions

- Le Roman de la Rose*, edition and translation A. Strubel, Paris: Livre de Poche (LGF), Series "Lettres gothiques"; 1992.
- Le Roman de la Rose*, 2 volumes, ed. F. Lecoy (scholarly edition, no translation), Paris: Champion, Series "les Classiques du Moyen-Age,". 1966 and 1968.
- Le Roman de la Rose*, ed. D. Poirion (without translation or notes), Paris: Livre de Poche (LGF), 1974.

Frances Horgan's 1994 translation for Oxford World Classics is clear and exact, but with very little notes to help the reader.

Charles Dahlberg's 1971 translation for Princeton Univ. Press is more scholarly. The third Edition, in 1995, corrects a few errors and gives an update of the scholarly publications about the work.

Allen, Peter L. The Art of Love: Amatory Fiction from Ovid to the Romance of the Rose. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1992.

Further Reading

Bloch, R. Howard. Medieval Misogyny and the Invention of Western Romantic Love. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press, 1991.

John V. Fleming. The Roman de la Rose: A Study in Allegory and Iconography. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1969.

Gunn, Alan M.F. The Mirror of Love: A Reinterpretation of "The Romance of the Rose." Lubbock, TX: Texas Tech Press, 1952.

Kristeva, Julia. "Manic Eros, Sublime Eros." In Tales of Love, 59–82. New York: Columbia University Press, 1987.

Lewis, C.S. The Allegory of Love: Studies in a Medieval Tradition. New York: Oxford University Press, 1936.

---

LOUÏS, PIERRE

---

1870–1925

French poet and novelist

Pierre Louÿs (he adopted the archaizing spelling c. 1889) is notable for the quantity and variety of his erotic production and the playfulness and exuberant humor that characterizes much of it. It was written throughout his life, with the same obsessive method that he brought to documenting his active sexual life, to research into and classification of female experiences, including a Manuel de Gomorrhe [Manual of Gomorrha] on sodomy, and to erotic photography. It was not a sideline distinct from his published work (three very different novels, stories, prose poems, and Parnassian poetry); it provides the most provocative expression of his unchanging views. The Preface to Aphrodite sets up as an ideal the morality of antiquity based on the right of the individual to pursue happiness while respecting that of others. Sexuality and sensuality ("volupté") have a central role in human life and are mankind's raison de vivre. Sexual and moral freedom have however been restricted by conventional morality, prudishness, and "Protestantism," against which he constantly campaigned; nudity and sexuality should be seen not as shameful or sinful, but as subjects for contemplation, even worship.

On Louÿs's death some 400 kg of unpublished erotic manuscripts—the figure probably expresses astonishment rather than an accurate estimate—were discovered in his library, and dispersed uncatalogued through specialist booksellers. Some 1,200 pages have subsequently been published, at first clandestinely in limited editions, starting in 1926 with Trois Filles de leur mère [Mother's Three Daughters] and the Manuel de civilité [Handbook of Good Manners]; as much again is probably still in private collections. Much of it is incomplete: Louÿs was as capable of abruptly changing his subject of interest as he was of obsessive work developing one idea. All the works conjure up alternative closed worlds given over to sex. Louÿs's erotic work is not the relation of individual experience; it involves all humanity in frenzied consensual sexual activity, free from any coercion or violence, which displaces all other activities and values. The only restriction in his ideal of erotic liberty, which embraces lesbianism, incest, sodomy, coprophilia, and bestiality, is towards male homosexuality, generally ignored or treated as incomprehensible, although it does figure fleetingly in a few works. Louÿs's key idea is summed up in the poem "Philis, il serait bon...": "Rien n'est en soi pervers, ni vil, ni ridicule" [Nothing is in itself perverse, base or ridiculous]: our only guide should be the quest for pleasure.

Louÿs's published work provides a world, a theme, and above all a language to exploit in sexually explicit parallel versions. The sequence of prose poems, Les Chansons de Bilitis [The Songs of Bilitis], composed in a uniform pattern of four paragraphs that form a prose sonnet, purport to be a translation of the works of a Greek poetess contemporary with Sappho (Louÿs enjoyed practical jokes and hoaxes). They form a "lyrical novel" tracing her awakening sensuality in the natural paradise of Pamphylia, her love for the young Mnasidika on Lesbos, and her life of debauchery as a courtesan on Cyprus. For Louÿs the twin dangers of erotic writing were a Satanic or a smutty presentation of woman and sex. The subversive hedonism of the poems rehabilitates a natural sensuality and tranquilly accepts heterosexual and lesbian sexuality and prostitution. The poems are also bold in their discreet but unambiguous allusions to the clitoris, masturbation, artificial phalluses, sodomy, and fellatio. The volume's index teasingly lists poems that were "not translated," implying the existence of some too audacious to print. These hints are developed by Louÿs in the Chansons secrètes de Bilitis [Secret Songs of Bilitis]. Some are alternative versions of the published ones: where in the opening poem, "L'Arbre" [The Tree], a young girl sits innocently astride a branch, in the "secret" version she stimulates herself; in another, Paris sees not "the secret" but "the vulva" of the three goddesses. Sometimes the erotic version makes more sense than the published one and clearly precedes it; in other cases it is clearly a subsequent elaboration. But all keep the same atmosphere of uncomplicated sexuality in an idyllic world.

The same idealized pagan world is found in Aphrodite, an evocation of the life of courtesans in 1st-century BCE Alexandria. Through the relationship between the courtesan Chrysis and the sculptor Démétrios the novel demonstrates the danger of passion that enslaves and the paradoxical superiority of art and imagination—here, as Jennifer Birkett has argued, the privilege of the male—over physical reality. Again the published novel was bold in its relaxed presentation of sexuality: in the opening chapter, Chrysis has her pubic hair shaved and masturbates in the bath. Louÿs had to excise one scene of bestiality from the published novel, but planned a series of 172 monologues of seduction for Chrysis, abandoned by Démétrios, not as part of the novel, but existing parallel to it. Ten were completed; in them she conjures up a series of erotic experiences to entice him back from a handsome youth, culminating with coprophagy. They are a linguistic tour de force, a set of lyrical variations on a theme exploiting the novel's style: long harmonious sentences and elaborate imagery.

Les Aventures du roi Pausole [The Adventures of King Pausole] is in contrast a light-hearted philosophical tale presenting a benign king with two Louÿsian principles: do not harm others, apart from that, do what you will. He rules over a utopia where characters can respond uninhibitedly to all the calls of sensuality. It has its counterparts in two very different works. Histoire du Roi Gonzalve et des douze princesses [The Tale of King Gonzalve and the Twelve Princesses], part utopia, part fairy tale, traces the gradual sexual initiation of his twelve compliant and enthusiastic daughters, aged from 18 to seven-and-a-half, by the King himself, assisted by his chambermaid. The potential repetitiveness is avoided by Louÿs's inventiveness. Court protocol intrudes incongruously into new areas (it does not permit the King to take the same virgin twice in succession). The daughters are differentiated by their manner and language: Tertia, aggressive and contemptuously vulgar; Septima, cheerfully indecent; Prima, languorous and literary; Puella (nine), impudent and with a taste for sweat and coprophagy... Louÿs plays off the outrageous explicitness of the daughters against the restrained, formal voice of the third-person narrator. The varied incestuous sexual acts are extended by dialogue, as the sisters bicker, boast, and egg each other on, rather than by depiction. The second parallel novel, L'Île aux dames [The Island of Ladies], echoing Jules Verne's L'Île mystérieuse [The Mysterious Island], exists as little more than an outline for a novel, though it runs to some 120 pages. The utopia of sexual freedom is here all encompassing. The heroine, Fernande, lands on an unknown island where she is guided around the town by Lucienne, gets to know her family, is introduced to court, and finally becomes a prostitute specializing in sodomy. What she discovers with initial surprise, then enthusiastic involvement, is a society, from court to working quarters, solely, openly, and uninhibitedly occupied with sex. The children above all know no obstacles in the form of modesty, family relationships, or class. The island had been discovered in 1623: the expedition's leader, named 'King,' decreed the "licence de foutre" [licence to fuck] which allows total freedom for all male and female subjects to enjoy any sexual activity with consenting women or girls (again, this excludes male homosexuality), in private or in public. Virginity is banned after puberty; abduction and rape however are capital offences. Louÿs's inventive imagination devises local equivalents for the diverse aspects of normal life: the various booths at the fair, the religious festivals, the annual court orgy (by invitation only), the Charity Brothel that raises money for the poor. Above all, Louÿs's classificatory zeal conjures up lists: a delirious catalogue of street names, the titles of the establishments in the Street of Forty Brothels, the program for a concert at the lesbian boarding school. New trades prompt neologisms, like "cunnovate" for the fortune-teller who can read pudenda. These "absurd complications" are conjured up with a sense of bizarre detail, and sometimes teeter into the excessive: theatrical coprophagy, or the brothel of dead women to cater to necrophiliacs. At the same time some ideas have subsequently been overtaken by reality: men putting their penis through a grill to be anonymously fellated; the sex museum (waxworks represent positions); illustrated guides to masturbation; prostitutes behind shop windows.

Louÿs's published work thus stimulated the production of parallel erotic versions; so did parody. In the Manuel de civilité pour les petites filles à l'usage des maisons d'éducation [Handbook of Good Manners for Little Girls, Especially Recommended for Use in Schools], Louÿs's blithely deadpan guide to "good behavior" offers a series of instructions for behavior in a variety of situations: at home, in class, out shopping, at the theater, or the seaside... The humor calmly takes for granted a defiance of conventional morality, and both the proscribed and the prescribed evoke outlandish situations: partners are masturbated at society balls and priests in the confessional, beggars are offered fellatio, and dildos are given as wedding presents. "If you have used a banana to amuse yourself with alone or to make the chambermaid come, do not replace it in the fruit bowl without having carefully wiped it." "Do not ask a chambermaid to go down on you more than twice a day. You must not tire out the servants." As the work is, again, a stylistic exercise, Louÿs plays with verbal as much as behavioral impropriety. Obscene expressions intrude into the prim instructions: "Do not say: 'When you suck him he comes at once.' Say: 'He is impulsive.'" The world predicated is dominated by masturbation, incest, and sodomy, embodying an underlying universal desire for sexual satisfaction on which only hypocrisy, misguided modesty, and a narrow view of virtue impose restraint. "You must understand this truth that everyone present, whatever their age or sex, has the secret desire for you to go down on them, but that most will not dare to say so."

In the known narrative fiction, which includes several abandoned fragments, parody enables Louÿs to adopt a variety of voices for evoking spontaneous and guilt-free sexual encounters. He mimics the Bible in Au temps des juges [In the Time of the Judges], the Oriental fairy tale in Farizade (with spoof learned footnotes), the "Realist" autobiography of a prostitute in Mémoires de Joséphine [The Memoirs of Josephine], where the atmosphere of squalor is pushed to comic excess and the events plunge into absurdity. The most substantial is Toinon [The Erotic Adventures of Toinon], a first-person narration by a sexually and linguistically innocent girl joining a boarding school, of her sexual education. As this is substantially complete by the end of the first night and the other girls are equally knowledgeable, Louÿs introduces variety in the form of an English-speaking assistant mistress.

Several works could be grouped under the heading “plays”; they are essentially “armchair theater” designed for reading and the imagination rather than for performance (unlike, say, Maupassant’s A la feuille de rose, maison turque). Not only would they present problems in staging an action which is both relentlessly sexual and frequently acrobatic; Louÿs uses dialogue to displace performance. On the one hand exchanges between characters, rather than stage directions, evoke acts that they are in the act of performing or about to perform: in Jeunes filles, Lucienne describes an elaborate position she has dreamed up, and dictates it to the participants, then Jean as a spectator describes what he can see when it is assembled. But also an exchange between characters can imply the activity they are engaged in, while simultaneously conjuring up another encounter in the past that is stimulating them now as they recall it. In this “double scenario” the narration of events is shifted to the character, foregrounding its essentially linguistic nature. Jean sodomizes Simone, but this present act is evoked simply by her instructions; at the same time she questions him about his activities with the other two girls, Berthe and Lucienne, and this exchange simultaneously conjures up a second, past act.

These theatrical works, though substantial, are all abandoned fragments presenting Louÿs’s hedonism in differing conventional settings: parody is ever-present. Jeunes filles presents the initiation of Simone as she stays with two sisters. The successive acts represent not so much plot development as the extension of sexual activities as Simone moves from ignorance and distaste to curiosity, then enthusiastic participation (Lucienne conveniently possesses an 8-cm clitoris—one of the recurrent implausibilities of Louÿs’s scenarios, where female autonomy goes hand-in-hand with a masculinized portrayal of female sexuality: women get hard and ejaculate). Participants (the maid, her boyfriend, the mother) are added as the play progresses around the house. Connette et Chloris hilariously parodies the situations and language of seventeenth-century French theater, introducing the complications of lesbianism and intercourse into the jealousies, betrayals, and unrequited loves of Racinian tragedy. The verbal comedy lies in the contrast between the formality and restraint of Classical tragedy and the activities evoked. Filles de ferme [Farm Girls] represents a marathon of cunnilingus and coprophilia by a sexually voracious 14-year-old girl in a caricatural rustic setting reminiscent of Zola’s Naturalist fiction.

This “theater” is at its most successful—inventive, ludic, provocative, linguistically varied—in Douze douzains de dialogues [Dialogues of the Courtesans], a sequence of brief exchanges, all shorter than a page, mostly between female characters, with settings ranging from society balls to street corners, classified under twelve headings: women masturbating or masturbated, phallogophores, mothers and daughters... The challenge of a numerical framework prompts a proliferation of varied scenes. The sequence is again triggered by a pre-existing work: Lucian of Samosata’s Dialogues of the Courtesans that Louÿs had himself translated in 1894. The exchange establishes the context and evokes the action; it frequently relies on the “double scenario”: two women masturbate as they talk on the telephone, one arousing her partner by describing another couple observed in mutual cunnilingus, and inviting the telephonist to join in. Louÿs conjures up absurd or bizarre situations: maids gossip about the help they have to give the girls in their houses; concierges encourage sex on the staircase; children play hot cockles, using penises rather than hands. Even conventional situations are enlivened with an exuberant lack of inhibition, or by inventive details: the maid being interviewed by a new mistress takes off her hat to demonstrate her oral skills. The Dialogues rely above all on the inventive and ingenious use of language. Louÿs deftly mimics a range of registers, from the invitation to sodomy couched as an invitation to a dance at a ball, to the stream of obscenities proffered by a 10-year-old girl.

Trois filles de leur mère [Mother’s Three Daughters]

The French title suggests that they take after their mother, probably written c. 1913, stands apart from other fictional works, both narrative and theatrical, in its coherence and completeness. It is a freestanding work neither parodying another genre nor complementing one of Louÿs’s own works (though there are parallels with the Spanish novel La femme et le pantin [The Woman and the Puppet], in which an older man trapped in an obsessive relationship with a young woman tells how she repeatedly entices, exploits, then refuses him. The 20-year-old narrator meets in turn, living in an adjacent apartment, Mauricette (aged 14), her mother Teresa (36), and her sisters Lili (10) and Charlotte (20), and is led by them through a varied, increasingly outrageous series of sexual acts, first individually, then jointly. Although he makes his preferences clear to Mauricette at the start: “To make love,” this straightforward pleasure is one that they refuse, tricking him either with their agile bodies or by extracting promises into other acts. As the novel progresses, these become more complex, and they are increasingly displaced by mediated representations: first by the women’s accounts of their pasts, then by the evocation of future acts and by playlets in which they and the narrator improvise on scenarios the women have devised (prostitute and client, lecher and young girl, classroom scene, catechism). This process is increasingly frustrating for the narrator, so much so that, exactly halfway through the novel, after his first encounter with each, he escapes to visit his friend Margot, exhausted but desperate to make love “in front,” and does so to great relief. After this first cycle he is drawn back to the four women, but is increasingly frustrated. On the fourth day Mauricette announces that she will allow herself to be publicly deflowered by him (she is still technically a virgin). Although the act is announced three times, in increasing detail, and even rehearsed with Teresa paying Mauricette’s role, it is never carried out; the narrator becomes baffled by the games that the four women are playing with him and their role-playing. The novel ends with an abrupt epilogue: the family leaves, without ever reaching the deflowering of Mauricette; but also with a promise (or threat) of resumption: Teresa leaves a note with the concierge saying: “We will meet again.”

The novel is in many ways a compendium of Louÿs’s erotic writing, both in its insistence on his favorite themes: uninhibited and guiltless sexuality, the dominance of sodomy, masturbation, and incestuous sapphism, and by integrating ideas from other works: Teresa’s practical hints about fellatio recall the Manuel de civilité, the playlets recall the Dialogues, the catechism scene recalls Histoire du roi Gonzalve. The action is verbal, not just in the reliance on dialogue to evoke ongoing and to plan future sexual activity, and on the “double scenario” where narrating about the past accompanies present activities, but also in the foregrounding of language. For once there is a role for the voice of a male narrator (elsewhere Louÿs tends to rely either on dialogue, as in the playlets, or the narrative voice of fictional women in pseudo-memoirs, or an omniscient external narrative voice), which is played off against the voices of the four women: Teresa, authoritative; Mauricette, defiant; Charlotte, languid and self-deprecating; Lili, playful and impudent. From the beginning the narrator’s coy periphrases are met by the provocative frankness of Mauricette, both in what she does (displaying her virginity) and in her language (repeating “I’m wanking” eight times). Restrained, a bit pedantic, he relies on the reader being able to pick up incongruous but deft cultural allusions, from the music of Louÿs’s friend Debussy to Catullus or La Fontaine. For the women freedom of language is a source of pleasure just as much as sex is: as Teresa reaches one climax she unleashes on the narrator a torrent of obscenities. Whether as spectator or participant in their scenarios, he is bewildered, recurrently judging them “mad,” discomfited by their self-assured quest for their own pleasure, in sodomy (which avoids the dangers of conception), in masturbation (as Charlotte says: “You come when you want”), and increasingly disturbed by his discoveries about them. Teresa has brought up Charlotte so that she has a “vice”: to be aroused when insulted; she vainly attempts to get the narrator to insult her as she conjures up for him a series of degrading acts to which she has been subjected, culminating in her relationship with a notable who imposes acts of bestiality. But even then, as she evokes fellating farm animals or being sodomized by a goat, she arouses in the narrator only desire and pity. Nor can he respond to Mauricette’s masochism, similarly the product of her mother’s “education,” inculcated as a conditioned reflex. He submits to their more excessive demands reluctantly and cannot describe certain scenes. The rational, open-minded, even libertine narrator had initially looked forward enthusiastically to the prospect of unlimited sex with his four neighbors. He finds himself trapped in an alternative world of apparent sexual freedom, and used, as spectator or as participant, in acts that they determine and increasingly stage-manage. The language and deeds of the seemingly inexhaustible women frustrate, outrage, and bewilder him. Louÿs's premise is that there are no moral limits: the inhibitions of the "liberated" narrator serve perhaps more forcefully than elsewhere to dissolve any fixed guidelines.

The foregrounding of language is heightened by a constant sense of artifice: both actions and the novel itself are highly self-conscious. The narrator at times thinks himself in a novel that he cannot quite make sense of, plays humorously with psychological and moral paradoxes, and comments on his actual writing (and loses track of what he is saying mid-sentence). He addresses the reader directly, attributing to this "reader" a range of different possible characters: male or female, naïve or experienced, hostile or sympathetic, commenting on potential reactions and assuming a range of different voices, from the ironically moralizing to the flippant. He repeatedly insists that his implausible tale is true as the women's exploits become increasingly implausible (as in Charlotte's preposterous account of Lili's conception, achieved by transferring sperm from her anus to Teresa's vagina, or Lili's massaging of the narrator's penis from inside Teresa's vagina during anal intercourse), and, as John Phillips has argued, these exploits provoke increasingly astonishment and admiration rather than arousal: this is the comic world of Boccaccio or Rabelais, not that of Sade. The final evening is dominated by play-acting: Lili's performance as a serpent-girl accomplishing oral autoerotic acts is followed by a series of improvised playlets. Sex is an "act" in which the narrator, like the hero of La Femme et le pantin, cannot know the true feelings of the others; it is a performance, both in that it increasingly involves gymnastic expertise (the family are double-jointed acrobats) and that it is a display for spectators, as when Mauricette demonstrates her newly-acquired skill at fellatio by executing it "brilliantly" on the narrator before the others. It is also a game, with its combination of rules, improvisation, and pure enjoyment, especially for the younger girls, reinforcing the playfulness of the novel as a whole. And in these areas it is the women, especially Lili, who are the natural performers.

In Louÿs's published erotic poetry, pre-existing works, forms, or characters often provide the challenge to produce a set of variations. He parodies past literature (La Fontaine's fables, the exotic Romanticism of Hugo or Musset) by inserting invitations to sodomy or drunken debauchery, and reworks folk songs and children's game rhymes by introducing sexuality or obscene words. Not all these variations are comic: the reinvented Wagnerian heroines of Le Trophée des vulves légendaires [The Trophy of the Legendary Vulvas] maintain an appropriately heroic status in their sexually voracious exploits. In Pybrac the springboard for invention is the moralizing Quatrains of the sixteenth-century Guy du Faur de Pibrac, Louÿs's target the morality campaigner Senator René Béranger. He produces a series of alexandrine quatrains in the manner of the Manuel de civilité, mostly starting: "Je n'aime pas à voir..." ["I do not like to see..."], each conjuring up a vivid scenario of some activity contrary to conventional values of decency in family, religion, or society: the schoolboy masturbating behind his mother, then ejaculating over her dress; a soldier raping a girl of 17, then sodomizing her, being fellated, and having his penis bitten off. Not only does the moralizing voice paradoxically evoke what it condemns; Louÿs ironically adopts a tone of mild disapproval for a series of activities that are outlandishly excessive, apparently implying that something just slightly less excessive would be quite acceptable, again undercutting moral guidelines by tut-tutting at a shepherd who sodomizes a 13-year-old shepherdess, then ejaculates in her mouth, on the grounds that "wisdom in love is content with less." 314 of these quatrains have been published; a manuscript of over 500 more was auctioned in 1936 but has disappeared; two other manuscripts exist in private collections. Pybrac is perhaps the most extreme demonstration of the fact that a simple idea can lead Louÿs to seemingly endless multiplication: his erotic work is excessive both in its insistent return to key preoccupations and words, and in the proliferation of variations on a single model.

It is in poetry in particular that formal difficulty can serve as a stimulus: Louÿs's friend Paul Valéry defined the poet as someone to whom the inherent difficulty of his art gives ideas. Over one third of the published erotica is rhymed (poetry or verse playlets). There are several examples of extreme ingenuity in rhyme scheme: an acrostic sonnet on lesbians, a poem using the notes of the tonic sol-fa as rhymes. The many non-parodic poems published fall into two main groups. One is of serious and lyrical poems, such as La Femme, planned in 1890 as a sequence of twelve groups of twelve sonnets, each celebrating in the manner of the sixteenth-century poetic blason a part of the woman's body, a type of woman, or an act. They are Parnassian in their choice of a difficult form, and exploit musicality of line and a traditionally poetic language with rare or archaizing vocabulary and with imagery drawn from nature, precious stones, religious worship, or classical mythology. The emphasis is on delicacy, sensuality, and mystery; the poems seek nobility and intensity, while in no way disguising the physical reality of the activities hymned. The second group consists of brief scenes evoked in a few octosyllabic quatrains. Inside this constraining form, with its short lines and rigid rhyme scheme, Louÿs produces witty, neat, or ironic sketches spiced with realistic detail and displaying an excellent ear for popular language, in the manner of Douze douzains de dialogues. Here the language is not conventionally poetic but direct, sometimes obscene. A snatch of dialogue suffices to conjure up a scene—between prostitute and customer, bourgeois woman and servant, mother and daughter—light-hearted, outrageously subversive of conventional morality, and with an undercurrent of disrespect for authority and the establishment. Mothers encourage daughters to masturbate; a maid advises her mistress that incest or sex with domestics is better for her son than going out “to catch the pox in town”; schoolgirls are let off their homework as they were prostituting themselves.

Not all the poems fit into these two categories: there are—for instance—some serious poems that represent sexual acts lyrically but with a direct realism and specifically modern accessories, such as sewing machines or bicycles. “Camille,” the verse monologue of a hermaphrodite, first published in 1994, or the novel L'Île aux dames, only published in 1988, are, the one in terms of character, the other in setting and form, very different from Louÿs's previously known erotic work in these genres. His unpublished works may reserve surprises: the revised edition of Jean-Paul Goujon's study (2002) signals their diversity, from spoof news items to erotic dialogues in English, and they include several hundred poems. Louÿs operates with a bewildering variety of forms and tones: a realism that can be satirical or crude; utopian fantasy; idealized antiquity; parody; elevated lyricism.

Two things, nevertheless, remain constant. One is the simple hedonistic message whose very straightforwardness lends itself to countless variations. The other is a limited number of recurrent preoccupations that fill the differing alternative sexual worlds that he creates. Much of the work is anchored in the Belle époque that he knew, from brothels and street prostitutes to society balls or gentlemen seeking thrills with the lower classes. Louÿs's permissiveness and individualism have affinities with the literary anarchism of contemporaries like Remy de Gourmont: a hatred for the state's restrictive laws, a mockery of bourgeois respectability, of which the church forms part, are coupled with delight in showing the frank enjoyment of all who defy convention. He never depicts dangerous passion, jealous and obsessive, which (in his published works) leads only to humiliation, enslavement, and death. He may depict characters like Mauricette who enjoy pain, or even coprophilia, but shuns violence and cruelty. Guilt is totally absent. The insistent preoccupations are incest and lesbianism, with a marked tendency to involve young girls in these, especially in the formulaic setting of boarding school (a closed feminine world) or among the working class; Louÿs's fantasy presents them consistently as sexually aware, surpassing the adults in their uninhibitedness, and spontaneously enthusiastic for all manifestations of sexuality, confidently usurping the role of the adults. Sodomy, enjoyed by both participants, is obsessively present and is the subject of nearly half his erotic poems, corresponding to a personal interest (Louÿs kept a file, with dated photos, labelled Enculéés [Women sodomized], covering 1892–1907).

The settings of Louÿs's erotica may seem dated: an idealized antiquity, 1900s Paris, worlds of fantasy that are its double, but it is in some ways modern. The role of formal difficulty and numerical patterns as the trigger anticipates the practices of the OuLiPo writers of the 1960s and later who used formal constraints to prompt literary creation. The exuberant excess of the activities evoked goes hand-in-hand with a verbal excess: Louÿs attacked not just the lack of sexual freedom in his time, but the inability to talk about it, so he repeats forbidden words, rewrites innumerable variations on the same scene in a series of works which remain pre-eminently linguistic exercises. The self-consciousness and playfulness underline the fictive nature of the text: it is a game, a linguistic construct, in the brief and witty dialogues in prose and verse as much as in the interplay of voices and the ironic teasing of the reader(s) in Trois Filles de leur mère or the sequence of Pybrac, works both infinitely extensible but equally capable of being abruptly dropped.

Biography

Pierre-Félix Louis was born 10 December 1870 in Ghent, Belgium. After his mother's death in 1879, his upbringing was largely entrusted to his half-brother Georges Louis, who may have been his father. Educated at private establishments in Paris 1879–1882, then Ecole Alsacienne, Paris 1882–1888, Lycée Janson de Sailly, 1888–1889. Registered Faculté des Lettres and Faculté de Droit, Paris, 1889–1892 but attended little and failed examinations. Military service 1893–1894, discharged for ill health. Dissipated within three years his inheritance on majority (1892), and extravagance left him in frequent financial difficulty even after the success of his novel Aphrodite (1896). Ceased to publish new work after 1901 and increasingly withdrew into private writing and scholarship, his health and eyesight progressively declining (cigarettes, drugs). Traveled notably to England, visiting Oscar Wilde (1892, 1893), Bayreuth (1891, 1892), Belgium (introducing Debussy to Maeterlinck, 1893), Spain (1895, 1896, 1900, 1903) and North Africa (Algeria 1894, 1895 with André Gide, 1896–1897, Egypt 1901). Married Louise de Heredia 1899 (divorced 1913), Aline Steenackers 1923 (one son, two daughters); one son by Marie de Régnier. Died of emphysema, Paris, 4 June 1925.

PETER COGMAN

Selected Works

- Les chansons de Bilitis*. 1894; as The Songs of Bilitis, translated by Alvah C. Bessie, 1926; as The Songs of Bilitis, in Two Erotic Tales, translated by Mary H. Harrison, 1995.
- Aphrodite*. 1896; as Aphrodite, translated by Frances Keene, 1960; as Aphrodite, in Two Erotic Tales, translated by Mary H. Harrison, 1995.
- La femme et le pantin*. 1898; as The Woman and the Puppet, translated by Jeremy Moore, 1999.
- Les aventures du Roi Pausole*. 1901; as The Adventure of King Pausole, translated by Charles Hope Lumley, 1919.
- Manuel de civilité pour les petites filles à l'usage des maisons d'éducation*. Privately printed, 1926; 1976;

as Handbook of Good Manners for Little Girls, Especially Recommended for Use in Schools, translated by Sabine d'Estrée, 1971.

- Trois filles de leur mère*. Privately printed 1926; 1970; as The She-Devils, by Peter Lewys, 1958; as Mother's Three Daughters, translated by Sabine d'Estrée, 1969. Histoire du roi Gonzalve et des douze princesses, privately printed 1927; 1977.
- Poésies érotiques de Pierre LouÏs*. Privately printed 1927; in Poésies, 1988.
- Pybrac*. Privately printed 1927; in Poésies, 1988; as Pybrac, translated by Neil Crawford, 1997.
- Douze douzains de dialogues, ou petites scènes amoureuses*. privately printed 1927; 1976; as Scènes de Péripatéticiennes. Privately printed, 1937; 2000; as Dialogues of the Courtesans. translated by Guy Daniels, 1973.
- Aphrodite*. With erotic passages, 3 vols, edited by Pascal Pia, privately printed, 1928; as Un Chapitre érotique inédit d'Aphrodite, 1991.
- Les chansons secrètes de Bilitis*. Privately printed 1929; 1961.
- Au temps des juges*. Privately printed 1933; in L'Œuvre érotique, edited by Jean-Paul Goujon, 1994.
- La femme*. Privately printed 1938; in Poésies, 1988.
- Poèmes inédits: poésies libres*. Privately printed 1938; in Poésies, 1988.
- Proses inédites: pièces libres*. Privately printed 1940; in L'Œuvre érotique. Edited by Jean-Paul Goujon, 1994.
- Le trophée des vulves légendaires*. Privately printed 1948; in Poésies, 1988.
- Cydalise*. Privately printed 1928; in Poésies, 1988.
- Jeunes filles*. Privately printed 1978; in L'Œuvre érotique, edited by Jean-Paul Goujon, 1994.
- Pastiches et parodies*. Privately printed, 1981; in L'Œuvre érotique, edited by Jean-Paul Goujon, 1994.
- La soliste*. Privately printed, 1983; in L'Œuvre érotique, edited by Jean-Paul Goujon, 1994.
- Farizade ou les vœux innocents* (in collaboration with Louis Louviot). Privately printed, 1984; in L'Œuvre érotique, edited by Jean-Paul Goujon, 1994.
- Les mémoires de Joséphine, suivi de Filles de ferme et de Paroles*. Privately printed, 1984; in L'Œuvre érotique, edited by Jean-Paul Goujon, 1994.
- Petites miettes amoureuses (Poèmes libres, Deux contes)*. Privately printed, 1986; in L'Œuvre érotique, edited by Jean-Paul Goujon, 1994.
- L'Île aux dames*. 1988.
- Poésies*. Edited by Jean-Paul Goujon, 1988.
- Toinon*, 1991. As the Erotic Adventures of Toinon. translated by John Phillips, 1999.
- L'Œuvre érotique*. Edited by Jean-Paul Goujon, 1994.
- Manuel de Gomorrhe*. 1994.
- Le sentiment de la famille*. 1996; translated by Wendy Parramore, 1996.

Further Reading

- Alexandrian, Sarane. Histoire de la littérature érotique. Paris: Seghers, 1985.
- Birkett, Jennifer. The Sins of the Fathers. London: Quartet, 1986.

- Clive, H.P. Pierre Louÿs: A Biography. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1978.
- Goujon, Jean-Paul. Pierre Louÿs: une vie secrète (1870–1925). Paris: Seghers/J.-J. Pauvert, 1988; revised edition, Paris: Fayard, 2002.
- Goujon, Jean-Paul. “Pierre Louÿs photographe érotique.” Recherche photographique. no. 5 (1988): 39–47.
- Goujon, Jean-Paul. “Pierre Louÿs ou la subversion de la morale.” Europe. 69, nos 751–752 (1991): 61–69.
- Millan, C. Gordon. Pierre Louÿs ou le culte de l’amitié. Aix-en-Provence: Pandora, 1979.
- Niederauer, David J. Pierre Louÿs: His Life and Art. Ottawa: Canadian Foundation for the Humanities, 1981.
- Phillips, John. “Sexual and Textual Excess: Pierre Louÿs’s Trois Filles de leur mère.” In John Phillips. Forbidden Fictions: Pornography and Censorship in Twentieth-century French Literature. London: Pluto Press, 1999.
- Venuti, Lawrence. “The Scandal of Translation.” French Literature Series. 22 (1995): 25–38.
- Zinszner, D. “Pybrac et La Perle.” Histoires Littéraires. 3 (2002):63–71.

LÜ DONGBIN

c. 755–c. 805
Taoist sexual alchemy

True Classic of the Complete Union, by All-assisting Lord Ch’un-yang

This longish title, Chunyang yen-cheng fu-yu ti-chün jiji chen-ching, so translated by Robert van Gulik, is rendered somewhat differently by Douglas Wile: All-Merciful Lord Chunyang’s True Classic of Perfect Union. The book exists only in compilations, together with another work of Deng Xixian, Explanation of the Meaning of the Cultivation of Truth, by the Great Immortal of the Purple-gold Splendour [Zijin guangyao daxian xiuzhen yanyi], under the common title of Baizhan bi sheng [Victory assured in every battle].

The Chinese text, as copied in van Gulik’s Erotic Prints from a late nineteenth-century Japanese print, is said to be identical to a small Chinese block print of the Wan-li era (1573–1620). According to van Gulik: “Whereas the main text shows many archaic features, the commentary bears the hall mark of a late Taoist sexological text, and seems to date from the early Ming period” (15th century). Wile (p. 114) agrees with this theory and classifies both works among handbooks for householders.

The term yanyi (amplifying the meaning) was, since the sixteenth-century, a rather common denomination for popular amplification turning history into romance. Would it be far-fetched to consider the original edition as a late Ming commercial venture caring for a larger public at a time when prohibition of such book was lax? Should it be read as a pleasant pastiche of the battle of love rather than a serious guide to immortality? The following work seems to preclude such a hypothesis.

The main text of the booklet, less than four hundred words, is divided by commentaries in nine sections where the opposition we/ them (the enemy) is to be explained as ego/she. The archaisms, sounding Tang (618–906), are indeed within the reach of any scholar of average competence of that time. The comments, in rather plain language, must not have been out of the reach of an eager though popular readership. Let us submit to the best of our judgment the penultimate paragraph when the description of the final battle turns rather more technical, in the tentative translation below:

While we slow down, they rouse up, and the situation becomes again momentous. While arms clash, we enter and retire again, sucking anew their supplies and seizing their grains. Tortoise, tiger, snake and dragon: retracting, terrifying, swallowing and absorbing. For sure they will throw up their arms. We shall reap winds and rains. That is what completes victory and lengthen peace for a whole generation. The battle is over and arms at rest. Stretched in the void, we aspire for rest, lying on the back. Returning the booty to our armoury, we climb the highest point.

Momentous means the intensity of her excitation. Her arousal being complete, one must again enter, deep or shallow, methodically, and retire again a short while. One should suck her tongue and seize her breasts. When following the previous procedures, her true essence will be entirely shed while one gathers and absorbs it. After this completion, the true Yang is to be obtained. A dozen years form a generation. By mastering the true Yang after completion it is possible to lengthen one's life by a generation. Armoury means the marrow-sea, the brains. The highest point is the niwan (top of the brain). After the battle, it's time to dismount and rest, lying on the back. By stretching the waist and undulating, we ascend the highest point in order to return to our primal stock. Then, protected against any disease, we should obtain long life.

What is this true Yang leading to immortality? The preface of Deng Xixian clarifies somewhat what is at stake: "After completion, jiji (translated in the title Complete Union by van Gulik, Perfect Union by Wile), is the name of a hexagram in the Yijing (Confucian Classic of Mutations). The upper trigram is called kan, the lower li. Li is the male, but the void (a broken line) in the middle is the true Yin. That is why male is Yang on the outside, but Yin inside. Kan is the female trigram, full male in the middle. That is why female is Yin on the outside, but male inside. In the intercourse of kan with li true Yin can be absorbed to reinforce true Yang which becomes pure Yang. That is why "after completion" is part of the title of the following book."

Biography

Dongbin is the well-known nickname of Lü Yan who may have lived around 755–805.

ANDRÉ LÉVY

Editions

Gulik, Robert van. Erotic Colors Prints of the Ming Period, with An Essay on Chinese Sex Life from the Han to the Ch'ing Dynasty, B.C. 206–A.D. 1644. Trois volumes, 210 + 243 + 50 p., privately published, Tokyo 1951, vol. II, p. 91–96.

Wile, Douglas. Art of the Bedchamber, The Chinese Sexual Yoga Classics, including Women's Solo Meditation Texts. State University of New York Press, Albany 1992. "All-Merciful Savior Lord Ch'un-yang's True Classic of Perfect Union," p.133–136.

Further Reading

Gulik, Robert van. Sexual Life in Ancient China, A preliminary survey of Chinese sex and society from ca. 1500 B.C. till 1644 A.D. Leiden: E.J. Brill 1961, p. 277–280.

---

LÜ TIANCHENG

---

c. 1580–c. 1620
Chinese novelist

Xiuta Yeshi [Unofficial History of the Embroidered Couch]

Xiuta Yeshi [The Unofficial History of the Embroidered Couch] is a short novel likely written about 1600, in the flourishing region south of the Yangzi river in China. This work, like many other works of pornography of its time, has limited literary value, and its fame has been tied to its status as pornography rather than as literature. It did not survive the Qing dynasty (1644–1911) censorship and quickly fell out of wide circulation, while erotic novels of greater literary merit like the Jin Ping Mei became increasingly famous and now are counted among the masterpieces of Chinese literature. Xiuta Yeshi was not singled out by the Qing Imperial code but rather was among many works banned and burned by decrees of 1688, 1702, and 1710 prohibiting all fiction with obscene words. It was later singled out by name and banned by the Prefect of Zhejiang in 1844 and the Governor of Jiangsu in 1868. Xiuta Yeshi, was never forgotten, though, since it is mentioned twice by name as an example of pornographic literature in the much more famous and well-regarded novel Rou Pu Tuan [The Carnal Prayer Mat], and referenced by many other works as epitomizing Ming pornographic fiction.

The plot of Xiuta Yeshi is simple, and serves primarily as a framework to recount all manner of sexual acts and to describe them in very coarse, direct language. It concerns a candidate of literature named Yao Tongxin, who goes by the name of “Dongmen” who has a beautiful wife and a homosexual lover who is a younger colleague called Zhao Dali. After Dongmen’s wife dies in the first pages of the story, he marries a bawdy young girl named Jin, who at his behest has a liaison with his friend Dali. Dali’s mother is a young widow called Mrs. Ma, who is infatuated with Dongmen. Over the course of the novel, these four people engage each other in sexual combat, in all possible combinations and positions; with the young maids of the Dongmen household occasionally joining in. Jin, Mrs. Ma, and Dali all die untimely deaths, and Dongmen repents and enters a monastery.

One of the few remarkable aspects of this novel lies in its vigorous colloquial style, using specific slang, rather than euphemisms, to describe anatomy and sex acts. The poems at the end of each chapter are the only aspect of the work to receive critical praise, in part because they approximate the poetry in more esteemed works of erotic narrative. Much of the value of Xiuta Yeshi lies in its cache as the epitome of popular Ming pornography, its citations by later, better works, and its indebtedness to earlier ones. In particular, it is influenced by Jin Ping Mei. The protagonists Dongmen (“Eastern Gate”) and Jin of Xiuta Yeshi are obvious references to Ximen (“Western Gate”) and Jinlian, the most notorious characters of Jin Ping Mei. There is borrowing of phrases and motifs, for instance the odd situation of a Buddhist monk supplying characters with dangerous sexual aphrodisiacs. As an anthropological text, it is notable for its representation of a much wider spectrum of sexual activity, fellatio, anal sex, cunnilingus, male and female auto-eroticism, and so forth, than is presented in more literary works. Thus it serves primarily as an important work for the study of literati culture and the history of Chinese literature.

There is evidence that Xiuta Yeshi was quite popular during the time of its author. Over the last decades of the Ming Dynasty, it was published in no less than three separate editions. In the waning years of the Ming which fell in 1644, the Xiuta Yeshi and similar obscene novels were read all over China, and exerted great influence on erotic paintings and picture albums, which frequently featured their poems. Most erotic pictures in Ming Dynasty sexual manuals are also accompanied by an explanation in verse. Additionally, erotic albums often featured poetry alongside their pictures matching the name of the poem’s metrical pattern or a line of the poem to a subject or sexual position featured in the plate. Many of the poems in Xiuta Yeshi and erotic albums are entirely or practically identical, showing a widespread community of producers of erotic literature and painting that were mutually influential.

Biography

The title page of early editions ascribe the authorship to the “Master of Perverse Desires,” but it now appears that Xiuta Yeshi was written by Lü Tiancheng (c. 1580–1620), a native of Zhejiang province, who seems to have spent most of his life in Suzhou and Nanjing. Chiefly known as a poet, he may have also written another erotic novel called Xianqing Bie Zhuan [Unofficial Record of Leisurely Passion]. It has been postulated by Van Gulik that the poems in Xiuta Yeshi, its primary literary achievement, were composed by a number of authors. These were likely members of the author’s literary group who met regularly and wrote poems while drinking and enjoying the company of courtesans. The famous scholar Li Zhi (1527–1602) added a commentary, and Feng Menglong (died 1644) edited the text.

ANDREW SCHONEBAUM

Editions (and Translations)

Lü Tiancheng. The Embroidered Couch, trans. Lenny Hu. Vancouver: Arsenal Pulp Press, 2001.

Xiuta Yeshe [Qingdianzhuren zhu] Minguo sinian Shanghai Tushuguan paiping ben. In Zhongguo gu yan xi pin cong kan. di 2 ji reprint Taipei, 1987.

Further Reading

Van Gulik, R.H. Erotic Color Prints of the Ming Period. Privately published in fifty copies in Tokyo 1951.

Van Gulik, R.H. Sexual Life in Ancient China: A Preliminary Survey of Chinese Sex and Society from ca. 1500 B.C. till 1644 A.D. Leiden: Brill 1961.

See also Jin Ping Mei Hong Lou Meng Zhulin Yeshe

---

LUNCH, LYDIA

---

1959–

American poet, dramatist, and novelist

The artist Lydia Lunch may best be described as a confrontationalist. Whether Lunch is using music, film, photography, poetry, prose, or spoken word, she engages her audience with the apathy and oppression of modern industrialized society: “the ills that obsess” her. Her material is, thus, primarily non-fictional. She marks as influences Henry Miller, Hubert Selby Jr., and Jean Genet: artists she sees as having had no fear in revealing “the truth about their lives.”

Many of Lunch’s spoken word pieces focuses on human sexuality. In Oral Fixation (released in 1988; included on 1996 reissue The Uncensored Lydia Lunch/Oral Fixation and on Crimes Against Nature, 1994, reissued 1999), sex is presented as “an animal act” that has been convoluted by emotion. Lunch portrays sexuality as a struggle in which “the human animal” vainly attempts to control sexual instinct “in order to ... fit into the norm of society.” With “the banality of” life becoming “too chronic and depressing a constant to bear,” it is only “the threat of constant danger or the imprisonment of incomprehensible pain” that can offer a “suitable distraction” from “dull reality.”

Noted among Lunch’s musical works for displaying a concern with the erotic are 1989’s Stinkfist and 1998’s Matrikamantra. Stinkfist is a percussive sexual mantra depicting the “life cycle as practiced in the ritual of coition.” Lunch collaborated on the album with Jim “Foetus” Thirlwell (formerly of the Birthday Party and using the alias Clint Ruin). Matrikamantra (Mother of all Mantras; Om; the magical sound that brought forth everything in existence) is a double-CD in what Lunch calls the illustrated word style. Lunch’s E.M. Coiran and Baudelaire inspired lyrics are set against the atmospheric musical compositions of Joseph Budenholzer. The album deals with what Lunch calls the “transgenerational orgy” that perpetuates human existence. It opens with the song Need to Feed, which includes lines from Paradoxia: A Predator’s Diary that discuss the void within the self and a search for meaning beyond the cycle of life and death.

Among her films, Fingered (1986) and Visiting Desire (1996) are noted for their erotic content. Fingered was directed by Richard Kern. Lunch scripted and performed in the 25-minute, black-and-white film focusing on the relation between sex and violence (see Bataille’s Eroticism, for relation between sex and violence). In Visiting Desire, director Beth B placed her camera before a bed and had twelve people, including Lunch, interact with each other in attempts to satisfy their sexual desires. The results highlighted the connection between sexuality and identity.

In 1982, Adulterers Anonymous (a book of poetry) was released. Lunch collaborated with Exene Cervenka, formerly of the Los Angeles punk band X. Many of the poems present the brutal side of the male/female sexual relationship that is the focus of much of Lunch’s work. In 1992, Incriminating Evidence, illustrated by

LUNCH, LYDIA

Kristian Hoffman, was released. The book is a collection of some of Lunch's spoken word pieces (The Beast and Daddy Dearest are on the CD Crimes Against Nature; The Gun is Loaded has been released on video), essays, stories, and plays. Lunch thrusts upon the reader a challenge to examine the darker side of human existence. This includes frank and vivid considerations of the sex/violence matrix. In the play, South of Your Border, Lunch posits that power and control are central to this matrix. Whether it is Captain Leonardo raping, beating, and cutting a bound Lydia Lunch, or Lunch, as a dominatrix, threatening her bound, hooded client, the roles of victim and victimizer are not absolute: they vary between situations dependant upon who controls the sex/violence matrix.

Paradoxia: A Predator's Diary was Lunch's first novel, published in 1997 by Creation Books. The novel is an autobiographical work that chronicles the author's relationships with men. Throughout the book the duplicity of Lunch's character is evident. Her desire to control, abuse, and consume men is matched with her quest for men who are themselves seeking to control, abuse and consume. She is a predator preying on predators.

The novel aptly begins with the first and defining male relationship of her life: her father Lenny. He is portrayed as a small-time hustler and gambler turned door-to-door salesman who thrives on the weak resistance that lonely housewives offer against his sexual advances. Lunch identifies herself as her "father's daughter" in that she has inherited his predatory nature.

Raised under his mental and physical (violent and sexual) abuse, Lunch's psyche is constructed as a copy of the father's, that of the male predator: "So twisted by men, a man, my father that I became like one"(7). She defines males and herself as being ruthless, arrogant, stubborn, distant, and cruel. She admits to adoring these qualities in males but is also cognizant that men despise these same qualities in women. In Lunch's work, the physical male/female binary is maintained while the mental binary is torn asunder. This establishes the role reversal of sexual mentality and ensuing power struggles that underlie Lunch's conflictive relationships with men.

However, there is an affinity between Lunch and her partners: the desire for an excessive behavior that breaks through the boundaries of social constraints. These excesses are manifested in drug and alcohol indulgence, violence, and sexual practices, usually in combination. Propelled by an insatiable thirst, Lunch travels through locals which include New York, Los Angeles, London, San Francisco, and New Orleans, recounting a journey of one-night stands, orgies, and long-term relationships with a cast of sexual partners that includes women, young-boys, musicians, artists, drifters, and criminals. The constant upon which these myriad encounters are tied is Lunch's attempt to "find someone, anyone, something, anything, that could feed into me what I needed" (Lunch uses these lines in Need to Feed). Lunch's epiphany comes with the realization of her "vampirism," her understanding that she was trying to steal from others those aspects of their being which reminded her of herself. Of this struggle through mutilation, physical and mental, self-inflicted and received, and her own penchant for using others, Lunch concludes: "I was looking in vain for myself as I willingly disappeared inside of others"(149).

Biography

Born Lydia Koch in Rochester, New York 1959. Ran away from home to New York City at the age of 14. In 1976, started New York "No-Wave" band Teenage Jesus and the Jerks. Lunch's career picked up momentum in 1979 when the band was featured on the No New York album, conceived of and produced by Brian Eno. In 1984, Lunch founded Widowspeak Productions to facilitate the release of her diversifying art and that of other non-mainstream artists. The labels first release was of spoken word material, The Uncensored Lydia Lunch (1984). Co-presented with Matthew Yokobosky, curator of the Whitney Museum, The History of Underground Film. Taught a visiting artist workshop in the Performance/Video Department of the San Francisco Art Institute. Coeditor of online magazine called Sex and Guts where Lunch contributes essays and reviews on myriad topics and products ranging from the political to the erotic.

MICHAEL KEARNEY

Selected Works

Adulterers Anonymous. With Exene Cervenka, 1982, reissued 1996.
The Gun is Loaded. (Video), 1988.
Bloodsucker. Illustrated by Bob Fingerman. 1992.

Incriminating Evidence. Illustrated by Kristian Hoffman, 1992.
As.fix.e.8. With Nick Cave. Illustrated by Mike Matthews, 1993.
Crimes Against Nature. (Audio), 1994.
Stinkfist + The Crumb. (Audio), 1996.
Paradoxia: A Predator's Diary. 1997.
Matrikamantra. (Audio), 1998.
Adulterers Anonymous II. With Exene Cervenka, 2001.

Further Reading

Bataille, Georges. Eroticism. translated by Mary Dalwood, London: Penguin, 2001.

Bockris, Victor. Beat Punk: New York's Underground Culture from the Beat Generation to the Punk Explosion. New York: Da Capo Press, 2000.
 Hancunt, Maren. Lady Lazarus: Confronting Lydia Lunch. Blaenau Ffestiniog UK: Questing Beast, 2000.
 Kristeva, Julia. The Sense and Non-Sense of Revolt. Translated by Jeanine Herman, New York: Columbia University Press, 2000.
 McNeil, Legs. Please Kill Me: The Uncensored Oral History of Punk. New York: Penguin, 1997.
 Moi, Toril. Sexual/Textual Politics: Feminist Literary Theory. London: Routledge, 2002.
 Sargent, Jack. Suture: The Arts Journal. London: Creation Books, 1998.
 Vale, V. RE/Search #13: Angry Women. San Francisco, CA: RE/Search Publications, 1992.

---

LUSTFUL TURK, THE

---

The Lustful Turk was first published in 1828 in London by John Benjamin Brookes and reprinted later in the century by William Dugdale. The anonymous author of The Lustful Turk appears to have also written Scenes of the Seraglio, a similar work published first in the 1820s by Brookes that was also reprinted by Dugdale.

An epistolary novel largely composed of letters between Emily and her cousin Silvia, the Dey of Algiers and the Bey of Tunis, it also features a description of convent life in Italy and recollections of abductions and seductions that are loosely bound together by the theme of harem life. The Lustful Turk sets out many of the fantasies and tensions in nineteenth-century Orientalist literature by focusing on the “Eastern” predilection for Western women and the sexual decadence of the harem. According to Edward Said, such Western beliefs about the Orient emerged from “a battery of desires, repressions, and investments, and projections.” Thus, the novel details a Western libidinal investment in the East, rather than mapping the libido of the East itself. The novel features heterosexual intercourse, deflorative rape as a method of inducing female passion, flagellation, anal intercourse, and anti-clerical allegations. Set against the Greek uprising against the Ottoman Empire, the story makes use of current anti-Turk accusations laid out in Byron, Gothic motifs, and eighteenth-century libertine works. Thus, the writer demonstrates a familiarity with contemporary literature and with the history of pornography.

The main story of Emily Barlow and her cousin Silvia, begins in 1814 when Emily’s parents send her to the marriage market in India. On her voyage, Emily is abducted by Moorish pirates who send her to the Dey’s harem where he rapes her, thereby awakening her passions. Little distinction is made in the novel between Moors, Algerians, Arabs, and Turks or between seduction and rape. Throughout the story, virginity is an aphrodisiac to men and a impediment for women; the penis becomes a weapon and an instrument of pleasure a “wonderful instrument of nature—this terror of virgins, but delight of women.” (The Lustful Turk, 39) As her familiarity with the harem and its inhabitants grows, Emily recounts the histories of its inhabitants which include an Italian, a Greek, and a French woman. The Italian woman, Honoria, married her lover but was afraid to consummate the union. An abduction on the Mediterranean brought Honoria to the Dey’s harem where she was flogged for struggling and then raped, introducing her to sensuality.

LUSTFUL TURK, THE

Honorina informs Emily of the Dey's penchant for anal sex bringing about a stalemate: Emily struggles to use the Dey's affections for her to guarantee his abstinence, whereas the Dey sees it as one of his natural rights to her body. Emily's searches for an ally in the contest and finds that a Greek girl in the harem also dislikes anal intercourse. This leads to another aside: a failed but heroic attempt of Greek resistance told through the Ozman's machinations to steal the Greek girl's virginity. Oddly enough, while the Turks are vilified for murdering her lover and father, the Dey is absolved of all responsibility because of his skills as a lover. The letters then relate Silvia's abduction by the Dey. Interspersed with these harem stories are letters that detail the Dey's own sexual machinations and desires, and "found" letters from priests who supplied the harem with women from Italian convents.

This novel contrasts the hypocrisy of the Western treatments of sexuality with the sensual transparency and sexual pleasures of harem life. The harem stripped away social proscriptions from Western women and encouraged them to realize their supposedly inborn sexual nature. Western convents and marriages impede female sexual pleasure; the harem, in contrast, creates an ambiance for abandoned sexuality as each girl lets go of false modesty and prudery to find sexual pleasure. At the same time, though, the variety of women confined for a single male's pleasure extols the benefits of unrestrained, rampant masculine privilege. The plethora of women and complete sexual control over them allows for an exploration of man's capacities for sexual freedom, but only at the expense of the women's. Attempts to reconcile despotism with natural sensuality lead to a model in which women desire a loss of freedom when controlled by a good master. "The Dey, indeed had soon discovered my folly [chastity], and like a man of sense, took the proper method to subdue me. In this way, in one short night, you see, he put to rout all my pure virgin scruples, rapturously teaching me the nature of love's sacred mysteries, and the great end for which we poor weak females are created." (The Lustful Turk, 62–63)

The Lustful Turk illustrates the pleasures of the harem but demonstrates that these pleasures devolve into degeneracy in sexuality as in politics. The Dey is eventually castrated by a harem slave when he "commenced his attack on her second maidenhead." Because he loses all desire as a result of castration, he liberates his harem and the inhabitants return home. Still, the Dey's skills as a lover remain unquestioned: Emily comments that she will never marry until she finds as good a lover as the Dey. The vacillation between admiration for the harem and condemnation for Eastern sexual degeneracy, particularly the Eastern penchant for sodomy, frames the story. The Lustful Turk resolves this by showing the Turk to be at once both dominant and subordinate, rampant and castrated.

Although at the time it was published the epistolary novel had gone out of vogue in English literature, The Lustful Turk shows its continued efficacy as an erotic medium; the confessional letters create multiple viewpoints allowing for multiple subjectivities and a great deal of indeterminacy. The loose links between letters creates a pastiche-effect rather than a clear narrative structure. The continued representation of women as needing domination, however, creates a model of female sexuality that was outdated, even for nineteenth-century erotic literature, but one that presaged later erotic tales like "The Story of O."

LISA Z. SIGEL

Further Readings

- Colligan, Colette. "Obscenity and Empire: England's Obscene Print Culture in the Nineteenth Century." PhD Dissertation, Queen's College, 2002.
- Kendrick, Walter. The Secret Museum: Pornography in Modern Culture. New York: Viking Press, 1987.
- Marcus, Steven. The Other Victorians. New York: W.W. Norton & Company, 1985.
- Mendes, Peter. Clandestine Erotic Fiction in English 1800–1930. London: Scholar Press, 1993.
- Said, Edward, Orientalism. New York: Vintage Books, 1979.
- Sigel, Lisa Z. Governing Pleasures: Pornography and Social Change in England, 1815–1914. New Jersey: Rutgers University Press, 2002.
- Yeazell, Ruth. Harems of the Mind: Passages of Western Art and Literature. Yale University Press, 2000.

M

---

MACORLAN, PIERRE

---

1882–1970

French novelist, essayist, journalist, poet, and chansonnier

Pierre MacOrlan was a major exponent of post-1918 inquiétude, the cultural and intellectual disorientation following World War I. Although he only established himself as a novelist with the pirate novel Le Chant de l'équipage (1918) and the major body of his work was produced between the two world wars, his extensive career began before World War I and continued until he was in his eighties. He is best known for his 1927 novel Le Quai des brumes following its adaptation into a successful film (1938) directed by Marcel Carné and starring Jean Gabin and Michèle Morgan; nonetheless, other novels, such as L'Ancre de Miséricorde (1941), also brought him considerable commercial success. MacOrlan was a member of the prestigious Académie Goncourt and received the Légion d'honneur in 1967 (although reservations about his morality due to the pornographic writing he had published under his own family name before World War I delayed this for two years).

MacOrlan's distinctiveness as a writer resides in his invention of what he calls le fantastique social, an unhealthy, threatening presence hidden beneath the surface of modern bourgeois urban society, of which modern technology, satanism, violence, and, in particular, morbid sexual violence are key elements. Within this fantastique social he constantly uses techniques and subject matter from German Expressionism to depict the disturbing landscape of the modern city, post-1918 inflation and decadence, prostitutes and gangsters, and doomed adventurers. His bleak, negative view of sex is discernible in some of his essays but is most evident in his established, post-1918 fiction—for example, in the satanism of Le Nègre Léonard et maître Jean Mullin (1920) and Picardie (1943), in the female espionage fiction of Filles d'amour et ports d'Europe (1932) and La Nuit de Zeebrugge (1934), in the portrayal of murdered prostitutes in Quartier réservé (1932) and Le Tueur no 2 (1935) and in the unconventionally eroticized poverty of the prostitute character Nelly in Le Quai des brumes (1927). The title characters of the apocalyptic novels La Cavalière Elsa (1921) and La Vénus internationale (1923) share characteristics with his prostitutes and his female spies in that they are all ultimately portrayed as masochists who are the victims of what, for MacOrlan, is sexually stimulating violent death, whether it be as the dismembered prostitutes in Quartier réservé, the female spies hanged or shot by firing squad in Filles d'amour et ports d'Europe, or the crucified Claude in La vénus internationale.

The eroticization of sexual violence with women as victims links the more mainstream post-1918 fiction described above to MacOrlan's earlier pornography. Many critics, and indeed MacOrlan himself, claimed that his pornographic writing was merely a way of relieving hunger in what was a period of unremitting poverty for him, but there is evidence which belies this claim. Although his pornographic output was indeed written mostly before World War I, four pornographic novels were also published after the war when he was established, and while MacOrlan did use a variety of pseudonyms for his pornography, he also used his own family name (Dumarchey, possibly in defiance of the "respectable" uncle who had brought him up), and crucially the sadomasochistic preoccupations of his pornography are central to his post-1918 fiction. The pornography is conventional and functional, with undeveloped characters, in particular the females, and for the most part the effect is relatively tame. La Semaine secrète de Vénus (1926) is an example of this "soft-core" pornography. Possibly in line with his post-1918 position as an established writer (although published anonymously), this novel is written in a much more highbrow style than some of the earlier pornography. Comprising seven male "confessions" alongside the depiction of sexual acts, it also contains much philosophical reflection. The confessions are variously situated in an office with a "modern" typist; in the street with a member of les classes dangereuses, with une gigolette, and with a prostitute who will be murdered; in brothels; and at a devil-worship ceremony. These diverse settings reflect MacOrlan's constant interest in "modernity" and in the pulp-fiction categories of gangsters, prostitutes and satanism. However, MacOrlan also wrote a number of pornographic texts which were more "hard-core," focusing almost exclusively on flagellation, which French courts required to be destroyed—Les Aventures amoureuses de Mademoiselle de Sommerange (1910), for example. Some of MacOrlan's pornography has continued to be republished since his death, for example: La semaine secrète de Vénus, Les aventures amoureuses de Mademoiselle de Sommeranges, and Petite Dactylo.

There is no romantic love depicted in MacOrlan's established fiction, and this is not surprising given that his treatment of sex is grounded in his sadomasochistic pornography, with its defining paradigm in Eros and Thanatos, in an obsession with death and particularly the execution of women. In exploiting the pain and suffering of his female characters, MacOrlan draws, again, on the pulp-fiction categories of satanism, espionage, and prostitution and manages to force his readers into the prurient, voyeuristic position of realizing that they are reading pornography, the power of which he has no doubts about. Like the adventure writing he theorizes on in Le petit manuel du parfait aventurier (1920), MacOrlan maintains that erotic writing can have considerable power over a reader and that this is dangerous because it unleashes the imagination.

Biography

Born Péronne, France, February 26. Educated at the Lycée d'Orléans and then the Ecole Normale d'Instituteurs, Rouen (1888–99). Arrived in Paris (Montmartre) in 1899. Spent 1901–5 in Rouen as a copyeditor/proofreader for a publisher before returning to Montmartre. Traveled to London, Le Havre, Knokke, Bruges, and Naples before 1914. Married Marguerite Luc (1913). Invalided out of World War I at Bapaume in 1916. Subsequently traveled to Alsace and the Rhineland, Barcelona, Brest, Tangiers, Tunis, Berlin, and Brighton after the war, often as a journalist. Moved from Paris to Saint-Cyr-sur-Morin in 1927. Elected to the Académie Goncourt (1950). Awarded Légion d'honneur (1967). Died June 27.

ROGER W. BAINES

Editions

- Filles d'amour et ports d'Europe*. Paris: Editions de France, 1932.
La cavalière Elsa. Paris: Gallimard, 1921.
Le nègre Léonard et maître Jean Mullin. Paris: Editions de la Banderole, 1920.
La nuit de Zeebrugge. Paris: Le Masque, Librairie des Champs Elysées, 1934.

La Vénus internationale. Paris: Gallimard, 1923.
Le Quai des brumes. Paris: Gallimard, 1927.
Le Tueur no 2. Paris: Librairie des Champs Elysées, 1935.
On Board the Morning Star. Translated by Malcom Cowley. New York: Boni, 1924.
 “One Floor Up.” In La Tradition de Minuit, translated by Vyvyan Holland. London: Hamish Hamilton, 1932.
Picardie. Paris: Emile-Paul, 1943.
Quartier réservé. Paris: Gallimard, 1932.

Pseudonymous Works

Anonymous. La Semaine secrète de Vénus. Paris: Cotinaud, 1926.
 ———. Entrée interdite au public [?]: Cotinaud, 1926.
 “Chevalier de X.” Femmes du monde et du sang bleu. Hors Commerce, 1908.
 “Claude de Saint-Hièble.” L’Instrument des apothicaires. Paris: Fort, 1920.
 “Pierre du Bourdel.” Les Aventures amoureuses de Mademoiselle de Sommerange. Quebec: Sweetgra’s, 1910.
 ———. Mademoiselle de Mustelle et ses amies. Quebec: Sweetgra’s, 1911.
 “Pierre Dumarchey.” La Comtesse au fouet. Paris: Fort, 1908.

———. Les Grandes flagellées de l’histoire. Paris: Fort, 1909.
 ———. Le Masochisme en Amérique. Paris: Fort, 1910.
 ———. Lise fessée. Paris: Fort, 1910.
 “Pierre de Jusange,” preface to Docteur Fowler, Les Flagellants. Paris: Fort, 1911.
 “Sadie Blackeyes.” Baby douce fille. Paris: Fort, 1912.
 ———. Miss. Paris: Fort, 1912.
 ———. Quinze ans. Paris: Fort, 1913.
 ———. Petite dactylo. Paris: Fort, 1914.
 “Sadinet.” Petites cousines [?]: A La Folie du Jour, 1919.

Further Reading

Baines, Roger W. ‘Inquiétude’ in the work of Pierre Mac Orlan. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 2000.
 Grainville, Patrick. Preface to Mac Orlan, La Semaine secrète de Vénus. Paris: Arléa, 1993.
 Hewitt, Nicholas. “Montmartre and ‘Inquiétude’ in the Interwar Novel: Dorgelès and Mac Orlan.” Essays in French Literature 37 (2000): 45–61.
 Lacassin, Francis. Preface to Mac Orlan (“Sadinet” pseud.), Petites Cousines. Paris: Ramsay, 1987.
 Lamy, Jean-Claude. Mac Orlan, l’aventurier immobile. Paris: Albin Michel, 2002.
 Pia, Pascal. Preface to Mademoiselle de Mustelle et ses amies. Paris: Ramsay, 1980.

---

MADNESS

---

The definition of madness has not remained stable and probably never will, for defining madness is primarily a social act, the concept of madness itself a cultural construct. There is no such thing as a transhistorical or universal definition of madness. The term is simply a generic one used to label a wide array of ideas and/or behaviors thought to be abnormal. Because our beliefs and practices change over the centuries and differ across cultures, so too does our perception of what is rational or irrational, what is sane or insane. Beliefs that would have seemed perfectly reasonable to a person living during the Middle Ages might seem rather mad to those of us living in the twenty-first century. In the medieval realm of medicine, for example, it was considered important to keep women under control or subordinate, for medical authorities believed that if a man allowed his wife to move toward any degree of equality, she would be liable to somatic change and apt to challenge him for control. This idea may have gained support from the writings of the tenth-century philosopher and physician Avicenna, who asserted that if a hen fought with and conquered a rooster, she would grow spurs.

Like beliefs, practices that might seem mad to us today were considered perfectly acceptable or even desirable in the past. In 920 CE, during the reign of the Southern Tang dynasty, the ancient Chinese practice of foot binding became popular and remained so until it was formally outlawed in 1911. Despite the fact that the binding of a five-year-old girl’s foot resulted in the breaking of bones, the malformation and malodor of the foot, an inability to walk without aid, and in some cases ulceration, paralysis, and gangrene, the practice was considered highly fashionable; and on an adult woman, the tiny three-inch foot, referred to as the “golden lotus,” was considered erotic. Crippling the body for the sake of eroticism was not limited to the East, however. In the 1800s and early 1900s, women in many Western countries wore corsets laced so tightly that a 26-inch waist became a 17-inch waist. And while a corset may have given a woman the S-curve silhouette considered desirable at the time, it also, if laced too tightly, created lower back pain, breathing difficulties, and knee problems. With the rise of the twentieth century’s “let it all hang out” attitude, the corset ceased to play a central role in everyday fashion, becoming instead a popular fetish item, the costume of the dominatrix; and for those living in the first decade of the twenty-first century who wish to take their fetishism to what might be called its dramatic and artistic height, it is possible to get a corset piercing: two vertical columns of back surface piercings that mimic corset eyelets through which ribbon can be threaded. Although an erotic attachment to a handkerchief seemed aberrant enough to be labeled a paraphilia in nineteenth-century Vienna, today this fetish would seem quaint indeed, for now there are acrotomophiliacs, or amputee devotees (nicely exemplified by Flannery O’Connor’s Manly Pointer, a young Bible salesman who is attracted to a woman because of her wooden leg), and apotemnophiliacs, or amputee wannabes, who wish to have a limb removed in order to feel whole. Clinicians refer to this condition as “body integrity identity disorder.” The slide from fashion to fetish is a short one, and although perversion was not assigned its sexual sense by the Oxford English Dictionary until the publication of its 1933 supplement, it has always been easy to draw a vector from the sexual to the perverse to the insane.

MADNESS

Perhaps the most vivid example of this vector, capable of showing in narrative form the vicissitudes of madness, is hysteria, which has a long and venerable history. For centuries, the symptoms of hysteria have been associated with “deviant” sexual conduct and conditions such as masturbation, stimulation by pornography, irregular menstruation, and childlessness. And thus, since the time of Plato, the cure for hysterical abnormality has been the “normality” of marriage and pregnancy. We may be accustomed to thinking of hysteria as a Victorian ailment, but it has been around for centuries, the oldest known record being an Egyptian medical papyrus dating from about 1900 BCE. The Egyptians believed the cause of hysteria to be the dislocation of the uterus, which they conceived of as a mobile organism, capable of shifting up and away from its normal position. Given this explanation for the cause of hysterical disturbances, the cures the Egyptians came up with seem perfectly logical if rather humorous. In order to get the uterus to return to its proper place, one of two approaches could be taken: a woman’s genitals could be treated with fragrant substances to attract the uterus from below, or a woman could be given unpleasant-tasting potions to swallow in order to force the uterus back into place from above. In medieval times, hysteria was no longer thought of as an illness but as a form of witchcraft or demonic possession. By the eighteenth century, the explanation for hysteria had become attached to the notion of “sympathies” and the nervous system. Because women were supposed to have a more highly impressionable sensibility than men, they were more frequently attacked by the illness. It is not surprising that in the early nineteenth century, moral and ethical components had been added to hysteria’s etiology. By the late nineteenth century, Freud was connecting the medieval theory of possession to his own theories of the foreign body and the splitting of consciousness. And by 1897, his analyses of hysterical patients had convinced him that the “medieval demons” that possessed them were actually close male relatives such as fathers, uncles, brothers, and cousins. If what typically comes to mind when one thinks of the hysteric is something akin to the creature that New York physician E.H. Dixon wrote of in the 1840s:

[a] “patient writhing like a serpent upon the floor, rending her garments to tatters, plucking out handfuls of hair, and striking her person with violence—with contorted and swollen countenance and fixed eyes resisting every effort of bystanders to control her it’s no surprise that this is how the hysteric is represented in a literary text such as Jane Eyre, which features Bertha Mason, the quintessential madwoman in the attic whose intemperate and unchaste behavior was said to have prematurely developed the germs of insanity.

BECKY McLAUGHLIN

Further Reading

- Foucault, Michel. Madness and Civilization: A History of Insanity in the Age of Reason. New York: Vintage, 1988.
- Gilman, Sander. Seeing the Insane. New York: John Wiley and Sons, 1982.
- Goffman, Erving. Stigma: Notes on the Management of Spoiled Identity. New York: Touchstone/Simon & Schuster, 1986.
- Goldberg, Ann. Sex, Religion, and the Making of Modern Madness. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Grob, Gerald N. The Mad Among Us: A History of the Care of America's Mentally Ill. New York: Free Press, 1994.
- Hacking, Ian. Mad Travelers: Reflections on the Reality of Transient Mental Illnesses. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2002.
- . Rewriting the Soul: Multiple Personality and the Sciences of Memory. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1998.
- Jimenez, Mary Ann. Changing Faces of Madness: Early American Attitudes and Treatment of the Insane. Hanover, NH: University Press of New England, 1987.
- Jordanova, Ludmilla. Nature Displayed: Gender, Science and Medicine, 1760–1820. London: Pearson Education; New York: Longman, 1999.
- Lunbeck, Elizabeth. The Psychiatric Persuasion: Knowledge, Gender, and Power in Modern America. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1994.
- McDonald, Michael. Mystical Bedlam: Madness, Anxiety, and Healing in Seventeenth Century England. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1981.
- Ng, Vivien W. Madness in Late Imperial China: From Illness to Deviance. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1990.
- Porter, Roy. A Social History of Madness: The World Through the Eyes of the Insane. New York: E.P. Dutton, 1987.
- Showalter, Elaine. Hystories. New York: Columbia University Press, 1998.
- Torrey, E. Fuller, and Judy Miller. The Invisible Plague: The Rise of Mental Illness from 1750 to the Present. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2002.
- Whitaker, Robert. Mad in America: Bad Science, Bad Medicine, and the Enduring Mistreatment of the Mentally Ill. Cambridge, MA: Perseus Publishing, 2003.
- Wood, Jane. Passion and Pathology in Victorian Fiction. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

---

MAHABHARATA

---

Kama as a deified abstraction appears from time to time in the Mahabharata, usually accompanied by his twin vice, Krodha (Anger), less often by his wife Rati (Sexual Pleasure). And the Mahabharata on occasion refers to, but does not tell, the story of Kama's conquest by Shiva. But kama as a force in human life dominates the text, determining major moves in the plots.

The basic problem posed by kama in this text is that in generation after generation, kings keep falling in love with the wrong women, thus putting the royal line of success in jeopardy and leading to violent, deadly conflicts. It begins with the inappropriate lust (kama) of the great-grandfather of the heroes, King Shantanu, who, first of all, falls in love with an incarnate river goddess (the Ganges). She makes him promise to destroy all of their children at birth, until at last the eighth, Bhishma, survives to be the legitimate son (though the Ganges departs, abandoning him) [1.94]. Shantanu then falls in love with a lower-class woman, Satyavati, a fisherman's daughter and already a woman with a past: she has already given birth to the sage Vyasa after a one-night stand with a sage [1.99]. Satyavati makes Shantanu promise that her son(s) will rule, passing over Bhishma, whom she forces to swear a vow of eternal chastity, and Shantanu, overpowered by kama, rashly agrees to this. When Shantanu dies, and his sons by Satyavati die, Bhishma is unable to assume the throne; Vyasa therefore begets sons by Shantanu's widows, but these sons are flawed: Pandu is "pale" (which seems to amount to being functionally impotent) and Dhritarashtra is blind [1.100]. (A parallel quandary appears in the Ramayana when Dasharatha falls in love with a woman who demands that her son, rather than Rama, the legitimate heir, assume the throne.)

Pandu becomes king but is again undone by kama. He kills a sage who took the form of a stag to mate with a doe. The dying stag/sage curses Pandu for killing him at such a special moment, when the sage was deluded by kama. He therefore curses Pandu to be similarly “deluded by kama” and to die at that moment, lying with the woman he loves. And this does happen. Elsewhere in the Mahabharata [1.173], another king who has been cursed to become a man-eating demon devours a sage who was making love to his wife (still in human form), and the wife, furious because she had not “finished,” curses the king to die if he embraces his own wife. (Again there is a parallel text in the Ramayana, though it is composite: Rama’s father, king Dasharatha, mistakes a boy for an elephant, kills the boy, and is cursed to lose his own son [2.57–8]; and the author himself, the poet Valmiki, saw a hunter kill the male of a pair of mating cranes, and when the hen grieved, Valmiki cried out, “Hunter, since you killed one of these birds at the height of its passion, you will not live very long” [1.1–2].)

Death and sex are thus closely intertwined in the foundational plot, as they are in countless subplots. The Kamasutra (composed in the 3rd century CE, the end of the period of the recension of the Mahabharata) warns against the dangers of desire and cites an episode from the Mahabharata: “Kichaka with Draupadi ... and many others afterward were seen to fall into the thrall of desire and were destroyed” [1.2.34–36]. Yashodhara, the 13th-century commentator on the Kamasutra, tells only part of the story: “Kichaka is said to have been super-powerful because he had the strength of a thousand elephants; but even he was destroyed by desire, for Bhima killed him when he lusted after Draupadi.” “Killed him” is putting it mildly: Kichaka demands that Draupadi come to his bed; Bhima, one of Draupadi’s five husbands (about whom more later), dressed as a woman, takes Draupadi’s place and beats Kichaka to such a pulp that when people find his mangled corpse the next morning they say, “Where is his head?” “Which are his hands?” [4.21.1–67]—yet another example of deadly sex in disguise.

Yashodhara mentions Draupadi again, a bit later, when the Kamasutra quotes another scholar who said that any married woman who is known to have had five men can be seduced without moral qualms [1.5.30], and the commentator adds: “If, besides her own husband, [a woman] has five men as husbands, she is a loose woman and eligible for everyone who has a good reason. Draupadi, however, who had Yudhishthira and the others as her own husbands, was not eligible for other men. How could one woman have several husbands? Ask the authors of the Epic!” Draupadi, the heroine of the Mahabharata, indeed has five husbands, the five sons of Pandu (including Bhima and Yudhishthira), under circumstances extenuated in various ways by various texts (both in the original Sanskrit version and in various retellings in Sanskrit and in vernacular languages) but never sufficiently to protect her from frequent slurs against her chastity. So the tradition looks upon them, too, the sons of Pandu, as having made a problematic sexual choice, not with regard to the particular woman but with regard to the practice of polyandry.

The sage Shvetaketu, cited often in the Kamasutra as a sexual authority, also has a sexual history, as Yashodhara reminds us:

Once upon a time, there was so much seduction of other men’s wives in the world that it was said:
 Women are all alike,
 just like cooked rice, your majesty.
 Therefore a man should not get angry with them nor fall in love with them, but just make love with them.
 But [Shvetaketu] forbade this state of affairs, and so people said:
 “[Shvetaketu] forbade common people to take other peoples’ wives.”
 Then, with his father’s permission,
 Shvetaketu, who had amassed great ascetic power, happily composed this text, which distinguishes those who are eligible or ineligible for sex.

This is told at greater length in the Mahabharata [1.113.9–20]:

The great sage named Uddalaka had a son, named Shvetaketu, who became a hermit. Once, right before the eyes of Shvetaketu and his father, a Brahmin grasped his mother by the hand and said, “Let’s go!” The sage’s son became enraged and could not bear to see his mother being taken away by force like that. But when his father saw that Shvetaketu was angry he said, “Do not be angry, my little son. This is the eternal dharma. The women of all classes on earth are not fenced in; all creatures behave just like cows, my little son, each in its own class.” The sage’s son could not tolerate that dharma, and made this moral boundary for men and women on earth, for humans, but not for other creatures. And from then on this moral boundary has stood: A woman who is unfaithful to her husband commits a mortal sin that brings great misery, an evil equal to killing an embryo, and a man who seduces another man's wife, when she is a woman who keeps her vow to her husband and is thus a virgin obeying a vow of chastity, that man too commits a mortal sin on earth.

The Epic keeps insisting that this is all hearsay, as if to make us doubt it; the primal scene that it imagines is a vivid, quasi-Freudian narrative, explaining a kind of sexual revulsion. A Brahmin's right to demand the sexual services of any woman he fancies evokes violent protest in ancient Indian texts; a notorious example in the Mahabharata is the story of Yavakri, who tried to exert this right on the wife of another Brahmin and died [3.137.1–20].

This basically negative attitude to kama is only slightly balanced by stories in which good women love good men and save them (as Savitri saves her husband, Satyavan, when the god of death comes to take him way), or at least wait faithfully for them (as Damayanti waits for Nala) or, finally, follow them through thick and thin, as Draupadi follows her husbands into exile. But the Mahabharata is, after all, a tragic text, and in it love, certainly sexual love, is more tragic than romantic.

WENDY DONIGER

Edition

Vyasa. Mahabharata. Poona: Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute, 1933–69.

Further Reading

Bhattacharya, Narendra Nath. History of Indian Erotic Literature. New Delhi: Munshiram Manoharlal, 1975.

Doniger, Wendy. The Bedtrick: Tales of Sex and Masquerade. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2000.

Meyer, Johan Jakob. Sexual Life in Ancient India. New York: Barnes and Noble, 1953.

O'Flaherty, Wendy Doniger. Asceticism and Eroticism in the Mythology of Siva. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1973; retitled Siva: The Erotic Ascetic. New York: Galaxy, 1981.

———. Tales of Sex and Violence: Folklore, Sacrifice, and Danger in the Jaiminiya Brahmana. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985.

———. Women, Androgynes, and Other Mythical Beasts. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1980.

Schmidt, Richard. Beiträge zur Indischen Erotik. Das Liebeslebens des Sanskrit Volkes. Berlin: Verlag von H. Barsdorf, 1911.

———. Liebe und Ehe im alten und modernen Indien. Berlin: Verlag von H. Barsdorf, 1904.

Valmiki. Ramayana. Baroda: Oriental Institute, 1960–75.

Vatsyayana. Kamasutra. With the commentary of Sri Yasodhara. Bombay: Laksmivenkatesvara Steam Press, 1856.

———. Kamasutra. Translated by Wendy Doniger and Sudhir Kakar. Oxford World Classics. London and New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.

MANGA

Japanese comic books

Manga are a multimillion-dollar industry and are published in a number of genres and styles on a variety of topics. During the peak period of the manga boom in the early 1990s, manga were estimated to comprise 40 percent of all print publications in Japan, and Shōnen Jump, the most popular among boys' manga, routinely sold over five million copies a month. However, manga are not simply for children but have a wide readership among adults as well. Eromanga, or so-called erotic manga, are very popular, and many titles exist, aimed at both men and women.

The term manga originally meant “random sketches,” and antecedents of the genre can be found as far back as the seventh century. However, the origins of modern manga, which are an amalgam of illustrations and text, can be traced to illustrated tales popular during the Edo period (1603–1868). This was a time of increasing urbanization, when literacy was spreading throughout the newly emergent middle classes. The development of woodblock printing technology ensured that books, or at least unbound printed sheets, were available at a sufficiently low price to appeal to a broad audience. Yomihon, or “reading books,” that employed simplified scripts as well as elaborate illustrations were printed on a variety of topics, of which one of the most popular proved to be ukiyo-zōshi, or “floating-world story books.” These contained tales about the courtesans of Japan’s brothel districts (euphemistically known as the “floating world”). Most of these tales are fairly innocent in nature, but a pornographic genre known as shunga, or “spring pictures,” developed that explicitly focused on scenes of sexual intercourse involving a wide range of partners in a variety of poses, including autoerotic and homosexual scenes. Trouble with the censors meant that this kind of reading matter was frequently banned, and it remained impossible to reproduce these illustrations uncensored in books or museums in Japan until as recently as the early 1990s.

MANGA

The depiction of sex in modern erotic manga is constrained by Article 175 of the Japanese penal code, which prohibits the sale of “indecent” material to minors. In actual practice, definitions of indecency where pictures are concerned tend to focus exclusively on depictions of pubic hair and sexual organs. So long as these are not included in the picture, material of an erotic nature is permitted, even in comics aimed at a young audience.

Since the 1980s, the most widespread form of erotic comic aimed at men has been “Lolita complex” stories referred to in Japanese as rorikon. It is commonly observed that seinenshi (magazines for youths) and seijinshi (magazines for adults) often contain at least one rorikon story, in which a young girl is featured as a sexual object. However, the very stylized manner in which these girls are drawn, with long legs, blond hair, and big, saucer-like eyes, works against a literalistic reading of these images: they are not meant to depict “real” girls. Since Article 175 is interpreted as prohibiting only realistic depictions of sex, rorikon manga can contain a range of paraphilic activities, most commonly sadomasochistic scenarios in which the girls are groped by phallic stand-ins such as alien feelers, tentacles, or machine parts. Extreme versions compose a distinct subgenre known as hentai (or “perverted”) manga, which are not generally available from kiosks and high-end bookstores.

“Ladies’ comics” (redikomi) cover the same kind of themes as do comics for men. At their peak in the mid-1990s there were over fifty women’s titles published monthly with a combined annual circulation of 120 million. Many of these manga contain at least one erotic story, and some titles, such as Comic Amour, the most popular women’s eromanga, focus exclusively on erotic stories, many of them written and illustrated by women artists like Milk Morizono. The sex depicted is not necessarily softer or more romantic than that featured in men’s manga but frequently explores fantasies of rape, anal penetration, pedophilia, bondage, and sex with transvestites, transsexuals, threesomes, foursomes, and in orgies.

One of the most interesting aspects of Japanese comics is the fascination for depicting male homosexual liaisons in shōjo manga, or girls’ comics. Stories about boys in love with boys date back to the early 1970s, when a newly emergent group of women artists dispensed with the tired boy-meets-girl theme that had previously characterized the genre. Instead, artists such as Moto Hagio and Keiko Takemiya began to depict bishōnen, or “beautiful boys” who were in love with each other. Classics of this genre, when collected in book form, can run into several volumes and include Hagio’s Tōma no shinjō [The Heart of Thomas] (1974), which is the tragic tale of a menage à trois that takes place in a German public school at the turn of the twentieth century. The first same-sex bed scene featuring beautiful boys was drawn by Takemiya in her Ki to kaze no uta [The Song of the Wind and the Trees] (1976). By the end of the decade, stories about the homosexual liaisons of beautiful boys had become as common in girls’ manga as rorikon stories were to become in men’s. In 1978, June became the first monthly manga to specialize exclusively in boy-love stories, selling, at its peak, 150,000 copies a month.

Interest in boy-love stories has been stimulated in Japan due to the existence of a vibrant amateur manga movement comprising mainly young women artists and writers who create and distribute their own comic books at komi-etto (comic markets) and, increasingly, on the Internet. This amateur genre is known as YAOI, an acronym of the Japanese phrase Y*A*manashi, Ochi nashi, Imi nashi, which means “no climax, no point, no meaning” and refers to the somewhat slender plots that the authors create as a pretext to get their male heroes in bed together. It has many similarities to the “PWP” (Plot? What plot?) genre of slash fiction, popular among Western women, which takes the male leads of popular TV dramas and imagines them in sexual interaction with each other.

New media such as the Internet, computer games, and mobile phones (which in Japan are used to surf the Net) have cut into manga sales in recent years, but there is no sign that erotic manga are about to disappear. Indeed, the development of the Internet has increased the number of amateurs who create their own stories and illustrations and has given wider distribution to extreme hentai stories that could not be published in print form because of censorship.

MARK McLELLAND

Editions

Hagio, Moto. Tōma no shinzō. Tokyo: Shogakukan, 1974, 1995.

Takemiya, Keiko. Ki to kaze no uta. Tokyo: Hakusensha, originally published 1976, 1995.

Further Reading

Allison, Anne. Permitted and Prohibited Desires: Mothers, Comics and Censorship in Japan. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1996.

Buckley, Sandra. “Penguin in Bondage: A Tale of Japanese Comic Books.” In Technoculture, edited by Constance Penley and Andrew Ross. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1991.

McLelland, Mark. Male Homosexuality in Modern Japan: Cultural Myths and Social Realities. Richmond, VA: Curzon Press, 2000.

———. “No Climax, No Point, No Meaning? Japanese Women’s ‘Boy-Love’ Sites on the Internet.” Journal of Communication Inquiry 24 (July 2000): 274–91.

Schodt, Frederik. Dreamland Japan: Writings on Modern Manga. Berkeley, CA: Stone Bridge Press, 1996.

Shiokawa, Kanako. “‘The Reads’ and ‘Yellow Covers’: Pre-Modern Predecessors of Comic Books in Japan.” Journal of Asian Pacific Communication 7 (1996): 19–29.

---

MANN, THOMAS

---

1875–1955

German novelist

Thomas Mann’s homoerotic writings are remarkable for their simple, honest, and open presentation of raw emotion and genuine passion. These writings also tend to be among Mann’s most accessible and personal, reflecting his own nascent and lasting yearnings and appreciation of male beauty. In spite of Mann’s apparently stable marriage of 50 years, most biographers acknowledge his bisexual, if not primarily homosexual, orientation, and critics readily interpret his characters as the embodiment of Mann’s own sexual frustration. Two works of particularly homoerotic merit balance each other in this theme and context, providing the reader with male heroes, one an awkward adolescent, the other a mature, solitary man, transformed by their devotion to beautiful male figures: Tonio

Kröger, 1903, and Death in Venice [Tod in Venedig], 1912.

The eponymous hero of Tonio Kröger is, like Mann himself, a physically dark figure who wants to become an artist. He is slight and gangly, and he believes that his hair, eyes, and skin reflect his racially mixed background. Although Tonio’s central struggle lies in his coming to terms with his mixed heritage, he also struggles briefly with his initial homosexual feelings. His first true love is the remarkable Hans Hansen, the epitome of an idealized Germanic male: extraordinarily handsome, blond, blue-eyed, well-built, and athletic. He is also, at least to the adolescent Tonio, popular, intelligent, and kind. A simple walk together fills Tonio with palpable joy, and the narrator declares Tonio’s intense love for Hans, while noting that it is sexually and emotionally unrequited. Tonio himself believes that his passion is founded in the purity and harmony with which Hans appears to interact with the world, and the world with him. He loves Hans for what he is not and for that which he cannot become. Likewise, he knows that Hans cannot reciprocate the same desires for someone so seemingly foreign and out-of-place; tellingly, Hans will call him by only his German surname, Kröger, because he is repulsed by Tonio's given, foreign name.

Mann allows Tonio to experience this intense crush as little more than a brief phase, quickly introducing Ingeborg Holm, a blond, blue-eyed female counterpart to Hans. Tonio's passion for Ingeborg seems no less intense, but she, like Hans, remains an unattainable image rather than a clearly defined character. Tonio leaves town to become an artist and returns several years later. The objects of his earlier desire have become nearly indistinguishable, and it is no surprise—for neither the reader nor Tonio—to learn that they are a couple by the conclusion of the work. Tonio writes to a friend that he feels stranded between the worlds of the bourgeois (represented by his father) and the artist (his mother), and he is not fully at home in either realm. He declares that his deepest and most secret love will forever be reserved not for Ingeborg, nor for Hans, but for what they represent: the blond, the blue-eyed, the happy, and the commonplace.

Death in Venice could well be considered an ersatz sequel to Tonio Kröger, as Mann introduces Gustave von Aschenbach, a sickly but respected novelist in his fifties who finds his passions restored by a beautiful youth. Like Tonio, he is also physically dark and slight, and he too is drawn to his opposite. Walking past a cemetery one day, Aschenbach finds himself struck by an adolescent male with reddish hair and milky skin. He watches him for a brief while and then realizes that the young man is staring back with an unpleasant grimace. Aschenbach breaks his stare and immediately feels renewed vigor, deciding to travel at that instant. He chooses Venice as his destination (where Mann actually began writing this piece), and once there, he encounters what he terms the pure visage of Eros: Tadzio, a young Polish man of perfect, godlike beauty. Aschenbach marvels at his ivory skin and blond, curly hair, and he spends the remainder of his stay obsessively watching and following Tadzio. Slowly, he comes to believe that Tadzio is cognizant of his desires and that the two take pleasure in brief exchanged glances. Aschenbach contends that human beings naturally feel respect and love for one another as long as they do not come to know each other so well that they can judge the other's motives. To that end, he appears content to watch Tadzio from afar, even as he takes great pains to improve his own appearance by dying his hair, choosing his ties carefully, and applying cologne. The work's most passionate scene alludes to and transforms Aschenbach's first encounter with the grimacing adolescent at the cemetery. One evening he unexpectedly happens upon his dear Tadzio (Eros) and believes that the young man has smiled directly at him, a smile that is so unexpected and enthralling, he becomes flush with emotion and must run away. He collapses from desire on a bench, sighing for the first time the words, "I love you."

The work ends quietly, as Aschenbach watches Tadzio swimming alone at dawn. He enters a dreamlike state and envisions Tadzio beckoning him to come forward; he collapses silently in his chair and passes away that evening. It remains unclear whether Tadzio was ever truly aware of Aschenbach. What is clear, however, is that Mann affords Aschenbach a deep, fully realized respect for his homoerotic feelings that he could not allow Tonio earlier and, perhaps, himself.

Biography

Born in Lübeck, June 6. Attended elementary school (Volksschule) and high school (Gymnasium) in Lübeck; graduated from the Gymnasium with low grades and ceased formal education, 1894. Married Katja Pringsheim, 1905; three daughters and three sons. Visited Venice, 1911. Supported the German war effort, 1914; life spared by German Soviet ruler Ernst Toller at conclusion of World War I, 1919. Awarded Nobel Prize for Literature, 1929. Journeyed to Switzerland, 1933. Moved to Vienna, 1935. Lost German citizenship and became Czech citizen, 1936. Lectured at Princeton, 1939. Moved with family to California, 1941; became American citizen, 1944. Son Klaus committed suicide, 1949. Lectured in both East and West Germany, 1949. Returned to Switzerland, 1952. Died of arteriosclerosis in Kilchberg, Switzerland, August 12.

WALTER RANKIN

Selected Works

Buddenbrooks. 1901; translated by John E. Woods, 1993.
Tonio Kröger. 1903; translated by David Luke, 1988.
Tod in Venedig. 1912; as Death in Venice, translated by David Luke, 1988.
Der Zauberberg. 1924; as The Magic Mountain, translated by John E. Woods, 1996.
Doktor Faustus. 1947; as Doctor Faustus, translated by Helen T. Lowe-Porter, 1948.

Further Reading

Apter, T.E. Thomas Mann: The Devil's Advocate. New York: New York University Press, 1979.

Hayman, Ronald. Thomas Mann. New York: Scribner, 1995.
 Heilbut, Anthony. Thomas Mann: Eros and Literature. New York: Knopf, 1996.
 Izenberg, Gerald N. Modernism and Masculinity: Mann, Wedekind, Kandinsky through World War I. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press, 2000.
 Ritter, Naomi, ed. Death in Venice: Complete, Authoritative Text with Biographical and Historical Contexts, Critical History, and Essays from Five Contemporary Critical Perspectives. Boston, MA: Bedford, 1998.
 Stock, Irvin. Ironic out of Love: The Novels of Thomas Mann. Jefferson, NC: McFarland, 1994.
 Wolf, Ernest M. Magnum Opus: Studies in the Narrative Fiction of Thomas Mann. New York: Lang, 1989.

---

MANNOURY D'ECTOT, MARQUISE DE

---

Nineteenth-century French novelist

Works

There is no longer any debate among scholars about Mannoury d'Ectot's authorship of Les Cousines de la colonelle [The Cousins of the Colonel's Wife] and Le Roman de Violette [The Novel of Violette]. The circumstances of publication suggest that she may also be the author of Mémoires secrets d'un tailleur pour dames [Secret Memoirs of a Ladies' Dressmaker]. All three works appear to have been published in Belgium during the period 1880–85. Her works, like those of other women authors of erotic novels, were frequently attributed by rumor to well-known men, including Théophile Gautier, the elder Dumas, and Maupassant.

Les Cousines de la colonelle (ca. 1880) tells of the sexual development of two sisters who follow divergent paths. One, by accepting a proposal of marriage from a much older man, enters into a situation that occurs regularly in French novels of the late nineteenth century: the wife is young and innocent, while the husband, already worn out by pleasure, is of precarious virility. But the emphasis in Mannoury d'Ectot's novel is not on dark secrets of debauchery hidden in the man's past. The novel does not indulge at length in the prurient mixture of psychosexuality and moral indignation that is the standard fare of the time. Rather, the emphasis is on the quality of the young woman's pleasure and the expedients which allow her a degree of satisfaction in conjugal sex. Her sister follows a more adventurous path, agreeing to live with her lover, a Polish count, until such time as he can be free of a promise made to an aging aunt. The social risks taken in this case are great, but they are managed with a degree of support from her sister and from her guardian. The novel's tone is never outrageous, as these young women find their pleasure in realistic, pragmatic ways.

Le Roman de Violette (1883) is an interesting thematic hybrid. It has many elements in common with those classical stories of erotic training that abounded in Italian and French in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries: a girl is initiated into erotic womanhood by being taught the art of pleasure. Before 1700, the teacher was usually a woman, but male characters often played the role in later texts. Le Roman de Violette recycles and renovates this basic story by having a young woman, Violette, come under the protection of a man, the narrator-hero, who takes it as his delightful obligation to provide the erotic training. He has a rival for the role, the beautiful lesbian Odette. Odette herself is well aware of the traditional role assigned to women as practical educators in amorous positions and techniques. She sees it as a lesbian prerogative, if only to prepare the way for later heterosexual lovemaking. But her efforts to reestablish the classical role are not so much thwarted as carefully managed, since the hero, Christian, is always one step ahead of her. After deflowering Violette himself, he arranges to hide in order to observe the two women, then intervenes in order to bring Odette to climactic pleasure by stealth. This is in itself a sign of Christian's great skill and sensitivity, since Odette, now widowed, was married in her youth to a much older man who treated her brutally and has become a confirmed man-hater. Christian has one very general advantage as a teacher: he is a professor of medicine. Having medical knowledge about sexuality was not a part of classical initiation stories, but sexual pathology was a prominent concern in France in the last decades of the nineteenth century. Le Roman de Violette thus brings together two kinds of teaching: practical instruction in lovemaking, and theoretical lectures about the supposed norms of human sexuality combined with the requirements of sexual hygiene.

MANSOUR, JOYCE

Mémoires secrets d'un tailleur pour dames has little in common with these two novels. It is a collection of worldly vignettes with no strong thematic coherence, and indeed some contradictions in narrative point of view. The tone is decidedly more frivolous and more smug than in the two novels. There are allusions in sophisticated language to farcical and obscene events. The stories are often male centered, and there must be considerable doubt, on internal evidence, about the text's authorship.

Biography

Relatively little is known about the life of the Marquise de Mannoury. She appears to have been the granddaughter of a French inventor, Nicolas Le Blanc, whose work went unrewarded by Napoleon III's regime. She married a man much older than she, the Marquis d'Ectot, and was left a widow at a relatively early age. There is no evidence that she regarded her widowed state as an affliction, entertaining artists such as Verlaine and Maupassant at her country estate or at her salon in Paris. She may, however, have fallen victim to men who profited unduly by her generosity, and was reduced in the 1870s to running a matrimonial agency. It is likely that her publication of erotic novels was motivated in part by financial need.

PETER CRYLE

Selected Works

Le Roman de Violette. Paris: Le Serpent à plumes, 2002.
Les Cousines de la colonelle. Paris: Le Grand Livre du mois, 1995.

Further Reading

Lepelletier, Edmond. Paul Verlaine, sa vie, son œuvre. Paris: Société du Mercure de France, 1907.
Pauvert, Jean-Jacques. "Présentation" to Le Roman de Violette. Paris: La Musardine, 1999.

---

MANSOUR, JOYCE

---

1928–1986

French Surrealist writer and poet

Joyce Mansour, widely accepted as the most prominent French woman Surrealist writer, created a magnificent opus of passionate, aggressive, and highly erotic works that questioned bourgeois principles and the patriarchal order through her disruption of preexisting concepts, values, and rules of language. She claimed that writing "came" to her—it was not thought out or developed in any conscious way, but was a natural and inevitable process. Her poetry does not conform to traditional or standardized rules of meter, rhyme, or versification, but instead follows natural impulses.

Greatly influenced by the Marquis de Sade, Mansour's work consequently draws on the ideas of one of history's most notorious erotic writers. Erotic expression was a feature of Surrealist writing in general, but the singular blend of eroticism and humor in Mansour's work is particularly reminiscent of de Sade. Mansour's work displays other qualities typical of Surrealist writing, including a criticism of organized religion, a subversive attack on the patriarchal order and bourgeois values, the devaluation of reason and logic vis-à-vis the valuation of all things wild and natural, and the Surrealist preoccupation with the femme-enfant (woman-child). Although not affiliated to the French women's movement, Mansour's work is nonetheless also consistent with many facets of French feminism: the abjection of the female body apparent in her work is comparable to that theorized by Julia Kristeva in 1980, and the way in which she uses irony to comment on the physical and emotional oppression and repression of women is similar to that of many French women writers in the late twentieth century: "La rage la souffrance la jouissance et le crime / Tous enterrés sous le masque de la sérénité féminine" [Madness suffering pleasure crime / All buried beneath the mask of women's serenity] (Faire signe au machiniste). Also in accordance with feminist ideals is Mansour's utopian vision of a world in which women would be emancipated. This runs parallel to her argument for the emancipation of the working class and of Nature, suggesting that all these liberations are connected.

Hailed by André Breton as "l'enfant du Conte Oriental" (the child of the Eastern story), Mansour's work is heavily imbued with a sense of her Egyptian origins. Critics have seen in her work references to Hathor, the Egyptian goddess of love, as Mansour rejects the Westernized representation of a male deity who, from a feminist/feminine perspective, perpetuates guilt and division: "Oublie-moi mon Dieu / Que je me souviennne" [Forget me my Lord / That I may remember myself] (Cris). Instead, Mansour celebrates a female genealogy with origins outside of Western culture. Her Egyptian heritage, upbringing in England, and position in the French literary canon lends a unique multicultural aspect to her œuvre that enhances its sense of universality. The themes and ideas in her work are consistent, and certain terms are repeated and echoed throughout (death, silence, tomb, penis, vagina, anus, urine, fecal, excrement). These are indicative of the common themes in Mansour's work (sex, death, abjection) and reinforce the sense that all of her texts combine to form an opus greater than any individual piece. An overall simplicity and the consistency of themes and ideas render her writing accessible, while the Surrealist preoccupations evident in her work still challenge her readers to question existing perceptions of reality: "L'œil doux de la cuisinière / Cuit dans une soupe épaisse" [The sweet eye of the cook / Simmers in a thick broth] (Déchirures).

Mansour's work is aggressively erotic, full of black humor and caustic irony. She uses violent and often vampiric sexual imagery and writes with an unsettling frankness of sex, body parts, illness, and death. The linking of sex and death is an important leitmotif of her work, indicating the importance of the "id" (Ça), the deepest level of the unconscious, dominated by Eros and Thanatos: "Malgré moi ma charogne fantasme avec ton vieux sexe débusqué / Qui dort" [In spite of myself, my corpse fantasizes about your old sleeping flushed out / penis] ("Rhabdomancies" in Rapaces). Many of her references to corporeality depict the body as either dismembered or orgasmic, demonstrating both the oppression of the female body and its ultimate potential for redemption through jouissance.

Mansour plays with language, engaging in a "fiery deconstruction" (Bishop, xvi) of words and meanings to subvert traditional rules of grammar and the patriarchal/colonial order they represent. Her verse has been described by David Kelley and Jean Khalfa as "a feminine version of André Breton's (largely masculine) appeal for sexual liberation," and Bishop sees in her writing a "virile liberty," evident in the way in which Mansour challenges preconceptions about women's place and role: "Les vices des hommes / sont mon domaine / Leurs plaies mes doux gâteaux / J'aime mâcher leurs viles pensées / Car leur laideur fait ma beauté" [The vices of men / are my estate / Their wounds my sweet cakes / I like to chew on their vile thoughts / For from their ugliness comes my beauty] (Cris). Thus, Mansour's writing can be not only viewed in the context of Surrealism, but also theorized in terms of écriture féministe/féminine: like many other French women writers in the latter half of the twentieth century, she uses a “masculine” language and “masculine” devices to subvert the old order from a position of submission. However, as Hubert Nyssen suggests, it is too simplistic to “reduce Joyce Mansour to an erotic and rebellious Surrealist oracle” (“réduire Joyce Mansour à une espèce d’égérie du surréalisme, érotomane et révoltée”), as there is more to her work than a homogeneous “surrealist” or “feminist” label might suggest. For example, her outrageous metaphors are juxtaposed with a relentless lucidity: “Ne mangez pas les fleurs rouges de l’été / Car leur sève est le sang des enfants crucifiés” [Do not eat the red flowers of summer / For their sap is the blood of crucified children] (Cris), and her social consciousness is blended with a wicked sense of humor: “Vous qui voulez maigrir rappelez-vous que: femme qui roule n’amasse pas mousse” [Women who want to lose weight, remember: a rolling woman gathers no moss] (“Rubrique lubrique”).

Mansour is an important erotic writer because of her unfettered and uncensored depiction of the human body, in its abject state as well as in its glory. The claim that Mansour is one of the few genuine expressions of the Surrealist voice situates her work within a theoretical framework as well as a philosophical context: she “writes the body” both consciously and unconsciously, opening up the female form to new possibilities through language and reasserting the feminine by using an eroticized, aggressive writing style more traditionally associated with the “masculine.” Mansour’s individual and provocative work assures her place not only within the Surrealist movement, but also within the French literary canon.

Biography

Born Joyce Patricia Adès in Bowden, England, into a Jewish-Egyptian family. Educated in England, Switzerland, and Egypt. Spent most of her early life in Cairo, where she first became interested in the Surrealist movement. Moved to Paris in 1953, and published there her first collection of poetry (Cris, 1953). This attracted the attention of the Surrealists, notably André Breton, and she joined the Surrealist group in Paris in 1954, one of the few women accepted into the Surrealist movement. She is considered one of the most authentic expressions of the Surrealist voice. Greatly influenced by Breton, she later dedicated four of her works to him. After the disintegration of the Paris Surrealist group in 1969, she was one of a majority of adherents who regrouped around the Bulletin de liaison surréaliste. Wrote mainly poetry (16 collections), although her bibliography also includes four works of prose, one play, and several journal articles, as well as three poems published posthumously. Wrote primarily in French, but interspersed this with occasional poems or stanzas of poems in English. Many of her literary works were illustrated by prominent Surrealist artists, and several have appeared in English translation. Wrote typically Surrealist “automatic” writings, as well as more controlled works. Died in Paris of breast cancer.

HELEN VASSALLO

Selected Works

Poetry

- Carré blanc*. Paris: Soleil Noir, 1965.
Cris. Paris: Seghers, 1953; as Screams, translated by Serge Gavronsky. Sausalito, CA: Post-Apollo, 1995.
Déchirures. Paris: Minuit, 1955.
Faire signe au machiniste. Paris: Soleil Noir, 1977.
Flammes immobiles. Paris: Fata Morgana, 1985.
Jasmin d’hiver. Paris: Fata Morgana, 1982.
Prose et Poésie: œuvre complète. France: Actes Sud, 1991.
Rapaces. Paris: Seghers, 1960.

Prose

- Ça*. Paris: Soleil Noir, 1970.
Histoires nocives. Paris: Gallimard, 1973.
Jules César. Paris: Seghers, 1968.
Jules Gisants satisfaits. France: Jean-Jacques Pauvert, 1958.
 “Rubrique lubrique pour petites bringues.” L’Archibras 3 (1968): Le Surréalisme en mars 1968.

Theatre

- Le Bleu des fonds*. Paris: Soleil Noir, 1968.

Further Reading

- Balakian, Anna. Literary Origins of Surrealism: A New Mysticism in French Poetry. London: University of London Press, 1947.
 Bédouin, Jean-Louis. La Poésie Surréaliste. Paris: Seghers, 1964.

- Bishop, Michael, ed. Women's Poetry in France, 1965–1995. Winston-Salem, NC: Wake Forest University Press, 1997.
- Bosquet, Alain. La Poésie Française depuis 1950: Une anthologie. Paris: La Différence, 1979.
- Deforges, Régine. Poèmes de femmes: Des origines à nos jours. Paris: Le Cherche Midi Éditeur, 1993.
- Deluy, Henri, and Liliane Girandon, eds. Poésie en France depuis 1960: 29 femmes. Paris: Stock, 1994.
- Dunstan Martin, Graham, ed. Anthology of Contemporary French Poetry. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1972.
- Hackett, C.A., ed. New French Poetry: An Anthology. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1973.
- Hubert, Renée Riese. "Three Women Poets." Yale French Studies 21 (1958).
- Kelley, David, and Jean Khalfa, eds. The New French Poetry. Newcastle upon Tyne: Bloodaxe Books, 1996.
- Matthews, J.H. Toward the Poetics of Surrealism. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1976.
- . French Surrealist Poetry. London: University of London Press, 1966.
- Rosemont, Penelope, ed. Surrealist Women: An International Anthology. London: Athlone Press, 1998.
- Sorrell, Martin. "The Poetry of Joyce Mansour." In Other Words: The Journal for Literary Translators 7 (Summer 1996): 29–30.
- . Modern French Poetry. London: Forest Books, 1992.
- Suleiman, Susan Rubin. Subversive Intent: Gender, Politics and the Avant-Garde. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1990.
- . "A Double Margin: Reflections on Women Writers and the Avant-garde in France." Yale French Studies 75 (1988).

MAO XIANG

Chinese poet
1611–1693

Yingmeian Yi Yu

Yingmeian Yi Yu [Reminiscences of the Plum-Shadow Hermitage] is a biographical account written by the Ming scholar Mao Xiang, after the death of his favorite concubine, Dong Xiaowan, which was popular because of its lyrical, romantic portrayal of love, longing, and loss. It is interesting as a moment in Chinese literary history in part because of its portrayal and perpetuation of the literary ideal of the sick and suffering woman. The ephemeral figure of Dong Xiaowan, often ill and subject to attacks of fever at the slightest emotion, foreshadows the type of very young, fragile, and delicate woman that during the Qing period would become the ideal of feminine beauty. Yingmeian Yi Yu is also well known for its concise and beautiful literary style.

Mao Xiang writes that Dong Xiaowan was exceedingly attractive, and though she was once a singer in the pleasure quarters, he writes that once she became his concubine, their affection was never tainted with lasciviousness. Thus, when she inevitably falls ill, it is from the disease of maidens, of passion repressed and not expressed. There no sexual description in Mao's account. In fact, much of his memoir deals with their frequent separation, and particularly her suffering, from hunger, illness, robbers, weather, and so forth while they are apart or while she is trying to reach him. Whatever eros lies in the memoir is derived from this account of female devotion and suffering.

Mao describes Dong Xiaowan as an ideal companion and mentions frequently how much his friends admired her. After becoming his concubine in 1642, she took part in her husband's literary work, copying out texts for him and keeping his books and manuscripts in order. She had a natural gift for poetry and painting, and they would pass entire evenings together talking about the works of the famous Tang poets. She had a great talent for memorizing poetry and amused herself by culling from old literature references to women's dress, personal adornment, dancing, and singing, which she then compiled into a brief treatise entitled Lianyan [The Elegance of the Dowry].

The memoir moves back and forth in time, with Mao stopping the narration to comment on his present circumstances. He says of her study, where she would have books piled up all around her, and where she would often fall asleep with volumes of poetry by her pillow or under her bedclothes, that it is now locked up and covered with dust, and that he could not bear to enter. He writes that he will do his best to sustain his grief and try to collate her work and have it published.

He details her many habits, what she ate and how, her penchant for placing a lamp in front of a flower so it would cast a shadow on a curtain. He talks about her clever way of learning how to make culinary delicacies and how she could hold her liquor better than he could.

Mao Xiang's romance with Dong Xiaowan happened during a period of great historical turmoil. The Ming dynasty was overthrown by the Manchus in 1644, causing many to lose their households and fortunes. Mao writes that there were rumors that the local garrison had mutinied, and everyone fled their town for the country. As invading forces continued to push south into China, many, including Mao and his family, tried to stay ahead of them. Mao writes of how thoughtful Dong was in preparing for their travels, always displaying her loyalty and resourcefulness. He recounts their fleeing before the invading troops and bandits and the grief it caused them. Such a life on the run took a terrible toll on both Mao and his concubine. At one point, during a severe winter, they had to hide in an empty house in a desolate city. They could not go on because Mao had fallen seriously ill, and Dong Xiaowan tended to him tirelessly.

They were together for nine years. She had always been of delicate health, and when she was twenty-six, she died, presumably of consumption. Tradition has it that Dong Xiaowan did not die in her prime, as Mao Xiang would have liked her to be remembered, but rather was forcibly carried away by the new Qing emperor or one of his relatives and admitted to the palace as imperial consort. This theory, however, is likely fictional, since we have many couplets and verses composed by Mao's friends on the occasion of her death that are available in their respective literary works. Mao Xiang himself lived to an old age, but he could never forget her. The reminiscences he wrote of Dong Xiaowan, in a highly polished literary style, rank among the masterpieces of Qing literature. In addition to being an account and testament to their love, Yingmeian Yi Yu is also an important historical document that records personal experiences of the turbulent period during the change of dynasties.

Biography

Mao Xiang was born into a wealthy family in the late Ming dynasty. His family was so well known that in his youth, Mao Xiang was considered one of the "four famous aristocrats," a designation approximately equivalent to "most eligible bachelor."

DOUGLAS WILE

Editions and Translations

Yingmeian Yi Yu. Changsha: Yuelu shushe, 1991.
 Mao P'i-chiang. The Reminiscences of Tung Hsiao-wan.
 Translated by Pan Tze-yen. Shanghai: The Commercial Press, 1931.

---

MARA

---

1933–?
French novelist

Journal d'une femme soumise

The Diary of a Submissive Woman is not structured as fiction: it is a seemingly genuine, irregularly dated diary kept between 1958 and 1973. Virtually nothing has been written about this work since the only edition was published by Flammarion in 1979. The pseudonym “Mara” appears to be less a literary persona than an expression of the author’s genuine—and successful—attempt to remain anonymous. This is in keeping with Mara’s general fascination with the concept of anonymity, a fascination which she explores in some detail in Journal d'une femme soumise and pushes even further in Journal ordinaire, her subsequent book. Journal d'une femme soumise contains a postface by Michèle Causse, in which Causse essentially draws attention to the many literary and theoretical influences on Mara’s text, while noting the relevance of the Journal for contemporary feminists.

Like much writing not intended for publication, Journal d'une femme soumise is written in an extremely disjointed and elliptical style. There is often little or no apparent link between entries, and no background information is given regarding characters or events. The author’s passion for and extensive knowledge of literature is obvious throughout the Journal, and Mara’s personal observations are frequently juxtaposed with references to Baudelaire, Breton, Alphonse Daudet, de Sade, Marguerite Duras, Foucault, Rimbaud, Virginia Woolf, and numerous others. Mara’s strongest influence, however, is clearly Georges Bataille. The linking of death with eroticism, the quest to understand existence through transgression and excess, and the questioning of language as conveyor of ultraviolence are all clearly Bataillan themes. Mara incorporates Bataille’s ideas deliberately, stating that she wants to write the female equivalent of “Dirty,” the lascivious heroine of Bataille’s Le bleu du ciel. For Mara, however, this is more than a literary exercise: she claims to live these phenomena as well as write them.

Journal d'une femme soumise does not have a distinguishable plot. Rather, the description of “real” events is positioned alongside artistic, emotional, and intellectual impressions, which are in turn punctuated with historical facts. The leitmotif of Mara’s diary is her relationship with her husband, N., a man whose near constant physical and psychological absence causes his wife intermittent outbursts of agony and anger. Mara is N.’s willing slave, and she submits herself to numerous acts of degradation at his hands and at the hands of strangers and friends. As N. becomes Mara’s pimp, she tries simultaneously to please him through total obedience and to surpass his violent desires with her own sexual excesses. This fundamental ambivalence toward the nature of submission is a forceful undercurrent in the Journal. Even as Mara is traded among men as property, is beaten, performs fellatio on large numbers of men in public places, and allows herself to be ejaculated, urinated, and defecated on, her lucidity and ironizing disrespect with regard to her “master(s)” express a paradoxical and masochistic power. Mara’s journal is thus a concise playing out of the primordial contradiction that defines masochistic strength, which is by definition precarious and exhausting. More precisely, the narrator is never completely able to decide whether the strength she sees in her deliberate submission—i.e., that of rising above and defeating the violence being inflicted (and the person inflicting it) by welcoming and submitting to it—is communicable and therefore real. More alarmingly, she describes herself as someone who exists only as others see her, an entity that is transparent until seen, and the fear that her strength may pass unnoticed even by the man to whom she submits poses a serious metaphysical problem. Mara blames such issues for her unhappiness, and fears she will go insane or be deemed insane and institutionalized by N. During her worst periods of self-doubt and deprecation, she does in fact write her entries from a psychiatric clinic.

MARA

Mara's goal of total submission requires that she allow herself to be violently degraded and mistreated. In prostitution, she finds the ultimate expression of anonymity and obedience. She calls her special breed of "nymphomania" an attempt to shatter her individuality, become invisible (because interchangeable), and thus become what she deems "absolutely a woman." De Sade's influence is extremely apparent here and elsewhere in the Journal, as Mara's definition of feminine strength demands absolute submission to and satisfaction of men's physical desires. Despite her underlying condescension toward these "dominant" men, the narrator is incessantly and profoundly afraid that her submission is more a display of cowardice than of strength.

Despite the frank manner in which Journal d'une femme soumise addresses the psychology of sadomasochism, the book is anything but a titillating series of sexual adventures. In fact, any sex acts which are described are vastly overshadowed by the reasons behind and reactions to such behavior. This is particularly relevant given Mara's literary goal—to embody the chaotic voice of Bataille's female protagonists, to be "sovereign" (the term is Bataille's), and to obtain through excess a knowledge which is distinctly other compared with the trials of everyday life. In a particularly Bataillan turn, Mara uses the realm of eroticism to confront and meditate on death. Death and eroticism are irrevocably linked for both authors: each views sexual excess as a way of welcoming and describing death. Mara even calls her writing the "autopsy of a suicide." While death-obsessed eroticism is a consciously Bataillan phenomenon, its expression through complete submission and humiliation adds an important twist. Even more notable is the fact that Mara claims to be expressing a uniquely feminine worldview. In a move that takes Bataille's érotisme to a more violently personal level, Mara makes herself a willing and conscious human sacrifice in an attempt to welcome the sacred silence of extreme violence and eroticism into her life (and death).

Although not crafted as fiction, Journal d'une femme soumise is an extremely self-conscious and auto-representative text. As Mara admittedly prefers literature to life, she defines her diary as the effort to turn her life into a fiction and to structure her existence. She tries to write her life and then examines the effects of this process. She refers to her desire to "vomit" words, and her writing is reminiscent of the bulimia to which she alludes on several occasions. Mara sees literature as the ultimate space of transgression and defines her own writing as an act of violence, robbing dictionaries of their words in order to refurbish language with its original transgressive power. For this reason she forces herself to record in writing even her most violent experiences of humiliation.

Journal d'une femme soumise is a brutally honest discussion of the complicated concepts of submission, domination, death, and eroticism, and it provides a paradoxical and lucid expression of what it can mean to be a woman dealing with these issues. Mara's desire to surpass domination through submission poses serious questions in the domains of literature, sexuality, and feminism, and the form of the nonfictional journal provides a particularly self-reflexive outlet. Journal d'une femme soumise is especially interesting given the turn its author will take in Journal ordinaire: namely, toward purely lesbian sexual relationships and even greater submission and anonymity.

Biography

The identity of the author known as Mara is not known. When Journal d'une femme soumise was published in 1979, Mara claimed to be a woman approaching the age of 40, living in Paris with her husband and two children. The book's title is taken from a journal entry, and there is no indication that it was chosen by the author. Mara did not publish anything (under this name) during the years the journal was kept, but she did publish another text, Journal ordinaire, in 1984.

PATRICIA BERNEY

Complete Works

Journal d'une femme soumise. Paris: Textes/Flammarion, 1979.

Journal ordinaire. Paris: Textes/Flammarion, 1984.

---

MARGUERITE DE NAVARRE

---

1492–1549

French short story writer, dramatist, and poet

Marguerite's religious writings are not free of erotic motifs, some quite extravagant, though they belong to a religious tradition dating back to the Song of Solomon and express in her case an ardent, devout, and total submission to the power of divine grace. In the Heptaméron, as is traditional in the early-modern short story, love, both marital and extramarital, forms a major theme, hence Marguerite's onetime reputation for licentiousness. However, she is particularly original in considering desire, cuckoldry, and illicit affairs more in their psychological consequences and moral dimensions than as mere comic motifs. Eros is also set in contrast with courtly love, Platonic love, and agape (spiritual) love, all of which feature in different ways in the stories proper. But Marguerite also orchestrates many of the storytellers' discussions and activities, for a further novel feature of the collection is the way in which these ten characters (who are variously married, widowed, celibate, and/or in love with other group members) both debate and enact different love themes which their tales introduce and which stretch from absolute dedication to God down to fetishism, incest, necrophilia, and rape.

The violence and perversion of these latter topics help emphasize two connected topics: the corruption rife among contemporary clerics and the aggression inherent in male sexuality, themes sufficiently prevalent in the Heptaméron to be safely identifiable as preoccupations of the author herself. It is, moreover, notable that she does not present the battle of the sexes at all one-sidedly; hence, for instance, her men attack women's sexual discretion as mere hypocrisy and cruelty. Nor is the status of marriage presented without ambiguity, as Oisille, eldest and most respected of the narrators, imputes reservations concerning marital love to St. Paul, and Marguerite herself chooses to depict marriages which are in most cases failing and whose partners are scarcely ever happy.

Marriage in the sixteenth century was not exclusively based on physical attraction, especially among the wealthy and powerful, hence the prevalent cultural theme of loves, be they adulterous or chaste, defied conjugality. Again, however, Marguerite is not simplistic in her treatment of this subject. One of the happiest marriages described (nouvelle no. 30) is between the (unknowingly) incestuous couple of a brother and a bastard sister whom her husband had (again unwittingly) sired via his own mother. Meanwhile, Parlamente (the character most often identified with Marguerite herself) sees the selfless love of the adoring suitor as outdated, while Dagoucin, a celibate possibly in love with Parlamente, tells a tale (no. 9) in which just such a parfaite amour ends only in death.

The reason for this reticence may well once more be religious. Human love, however perfect, can draw one away from God, a message discernible in St John's First Epistle, which Oisille reads to the company in the prologue to the sixth day. Hence courtly love, as displayed in the overlong but deeply significant tenth nouvelle, is corrupted, nay even parodied, in the life of its hero, Amadour. Marguerite's Platonism, which most scholars regard as relatively superficial, is also mitigated by this preoccupation. Unlike the Florentine neo-Platonist Ficino, for whom physical desire could lead to God via a process of sublimation and idealization, Marguerite presents access to sacred love more as the result of catastrophe or disillusionment with profane love, as in the life of Floride, whom Amadour loves devotedly for years but then attempts to rape.

However, it remains vital for an appreciation of Marguerite's work to realize to what extent these and other messages remain implicit and thus debatable. Rather than through dogmatic systems and didactic allegories, her approach operates via allusiveness, dissimulation, and fragmentation, which, speaking generally, scholars have linked both to Renaissance aesthetics and to female susceptibility.

MARLOWE, CHRISTOPHER

Biography

Born in Angoulême, April 11, daughter of Charles d'Orléans (d. 1496) and Louise de Savoie (d. 1531), who secured her an education which included classical and modern languages. Married Charles, duc d'Alençon, in 1509 and joined the royal court on the accession of her brother (1515), whom she tended during his captivity in Madrid (1525). Widowed in the same year, she then married Henri d'Albret, king of Navarre (1527), by whom she had a daughter, Jeanne (b. 1528), the eventual mother of King Henry IV of France. Having been strongly influenced in the 1520s by the reformist zeal of Bishop Guillaume Briçonnet and his vicar-general, Jacques Lefèvre d'Étaples, Marguerite gave significant support to religious dissidents and may for some years have exerted a moderating effect on Francis's religious policy. However her sway over him declined in the later 1530s, whilst her restrained and pietistic religiosity was outflanked by the Calvinist reform, which she never espoused. Semiretirement to her courts of Pau and Nérac in the remote southwest led to an increase in her literary composition. As the writer of highest social rank in French history, she wrote plays and devotional poetry, some of it condemned by the Catholic censors; but her masterpiece is the Heptaméron, a collection of 72 short stories written in imitation of Boccaccio's Decameron and intended similarly to number 100. Despite this plan, the book remained incomplete on her death (1549), which came two years after the accession of her nephew Henry II.

JOHN PARKIN

Editions

Heptaméron. Edited by R. Salminen. Textes Littéraires Français, 516. Geneva: Droz, 1999.
The Heptameron / Marguerite de Navarre. Translated with an introduction by P.A. Chilton. London/New York: Penguin Books, 1984.

Further Reading

Cazauban, Nicole. L'Heptaméron de Marguerite de Navarre. Paris: Société d'édition d'enseignement supérieur, 1977.
Cholakian, Patricia F. Rape and Writing in the Heptaméron. Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1991.
Déjean, Jean-Luc. Marguerite de Navarre. Paris: Fayard, 1987.
Febvre, Lucien. Amour sacré, amour profane: Autour de l'Heptaméron. Paris: Gallimard, 1930.
Gelernt, Jules. World of Many Loves: The Heptaméron of Marguerite de Navarre. Chapel Hill, NC: University of North Carolina Press, 1966.
Jourda, Pierre. Marguerite d'Angoulême, étude biographique et littéraire. Paris: Champion, 1930.

---

MARLOWE, CHRISTOPHER

---

1564–1593

English poet and playwright

Hero and Leander

Christopher Marlowe's Hero and Leander ranks as a singular achievement in 16th-century English verse. Published in 1598, five years after Marlowe's early death, it was immediately recognized as a remarkable work. The two Sestiads composed by Marlowe were completed by George Chapman, who also added a dedication and provided a synopsis of each Sestiad. Within the next half century, there would follow no less than seven editions. Initially thought to be the final work written by Marlowe, some modern scholars have proposed that the poem represents work done during Marlowe's years at Cambridge, though the debate is hardly over.

Hero and Leander has been classified as an "epyllion," after the short narrative verse used by classical authors, most notably Catullus' poem 63. The influence certainly is classical in tone and theme as well as structure. Marlowe infuses his poem with a rich sensuality not seen even in the sensual 16th century. The narrative of the poem recounts the story of two lovers separated by a stretch of sea. In attempting to cross the sea, Leander drowns, and upon the discovery of his body, Hero dramatically takes her own life by throwing herself from her tower. Unfortunately, Marlowe's poem is unfinished. Though Chapman's completed version is not incompetent, it cannot compare to Marlowe's brilliance.

Marlowe's narration begins with a description of Hero and then of Leander. The story had been told in a poem identified by Renaissance scholars as having been by Musaeus, considered the greatest of the Greek lyricists. In recent scholarship, the origins of the story have been shown to be anonymous. Marlowe's other source comes from Ovid's Heroides. Ovid's influence on Marlowe is considerable and predominates throughout this poem.

After the descriptive introductory sections, the narrative begins in earnest as a feast at Sestos brings Leander to town, where he spies Hero while she is making sacrifice to Venus. They meet and Leander begins the first of several speeches to persuade Hero to recant her vow of virginity to Venus. Hero resists with tears and platitudes, but Leander persists with all the rapacious force of Marlovian rhetoric. Won already, Hero recounts the story of Hermes and afterward faints. Leander revives her with a kiss. She returns to her room, having made plans to meet with Leander in the evening. The night is given to erotic play. The next day Leander returns home to Abydos. His desire increased by Hero's absence, he swims the Hellespont to see her again. Neptune sees Leander swimming and makes sexual advances to him but is rebuffed. Neptune takes the refusal in stride, but when Leander willfully ignores Neptune's speech in his haste to return to Sestos, Neptune plans revenge. Leander arrives at Sestos, and he and Hero return to her bed, where their love is consummated. Hero leaves their bed and goes for a walk. As she returns, Leander gazes on her nude body, and she feels embarrassment. The poem's narrative breaks off here.

The most striking aspect of the poem is not the narrative itself, but the rich sensuality of the lines and the apparent homoeroticism throughout. Though common in Greek and Roman poetry, the overtly frank assertion of homoerotic male desire is somewhat odd in the 16th century.

One can discern this by comparing Marlowe's description of Hero with his description of Leander. Hero's beauty is limited by a sense of woman's incompleteness. Indeed, a description is commonplace in erotic lyric of the time. The focus is more or less on her clothing and other fetishistic complements. With Leander, however, Marlowe presents us with the full glory of Greek masculine beauty. There are few lines in English poetry to match his description of Leander's neck, "Even as delicious meat is to the tast, / so was his necke in touching" (63-4). The description overflows into erotic ecstasy: "And whose immortall fingars did imprint, / That heavenly path, with many a curious dint, / That runs along his backe" (67-9). Further, there are references to Narcissus that seem to reinforce Leander's own ambiguous sexuality. What is most particular here are the numerous references to the Ganymede myth. Marlowe demonstrated a singular fascination with Ganymede, even devoting the first scene of his play Dido, Queen of Carthage to an erotic tryst between Ganymede and Jupiter. This interest in the homoerotic openness of the classical world is continued in Hero and Leander.

Aside from the homoerotic content of the poem, it is truly the language of the poem that is so refreshing and powerfully erotic. Marlowe is the first writer in English to beat the Ancients at their own game. The language is light and delicate and flows with graceful fluidity, yet explores the psychology of sexual intimacy. Hero's embrace upon realizing Leander's gaze marks such a moment. This poem contains one of the only lines known to have been borrowed by Shakespeare from one of his contemporaries and remains very well known today, "Who ever lov'd, that lov'd not at first sight?" (176). The language has a visceral quality. Marlowe's description of Hero and Leander's erotic hand play takes the reader into the heart of the sensual feel of seduction to an unprecedented degree in English poetry.

Except for his translations of Ovid, this poem constitutes Marlowe's only extensive contribution to lyric poetry and one in which he could have been justifiably proud. The erotic in Marlowe is an overwhelming force that draws us to itself in an unrelenting and cruel, perhaps even violent, manner. The description of Venus' temple with its depictions of rapes and the Dionysian atmosphere of erotic license serve to illustrate the true power of erotic desire when unleashed.

MARTIN DU GARD, ROGER

Biography

Born 1564 in Canterbury, England. Killed in a quarrel in Deptford, England. His first significant play, Tamburlaine, was published in 1590. Known principally for his plays and influence on early Shakespeare, Marlowe also wrote poetry and translations from classical authors, especially Ovid. He apparently served in the Elizabethan secret service under Walsingham, for which service the Privy Council ordered the conferring of his MA from Cambridge despite his long absences from university.

GRANT HAMBY

Editions

“Hero and Leander.” In Complete Works of Christopher Marlowe. Vol. 1. Edited by Roma Gill. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1987.

Selected Works

Tamburlaine. 1590.
Edward the Second. 1594.
Doctor Faustus. A-text, 1604.
Doctor Faustus. B-text, 1616.
The Jew of Malta. 1633.

Further Reading

Bakeless, John. Christopher Marlowe: The Man in His Time. New York: William Morrow, 1937.
Bloom, Harold, ed. Christopher Marlowe. New York: Chelsea House, 1986.
Rowse, A.L. Christopher Marlowe: His Life and Work. New York: Harper and Row, 1964.
Steane, J.B. Marlowe: A Critical Study. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1964.
Tromly, Fred. Playing with Desire: Christopher Marlowe and the Art of Tantalization. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1998.

---

MARTIN DU GARD, ROGER

---

1881–1958

French novelist and dramatist

Roger Martin du Gard’s work should not really be included among so-called erotic literature. Political and social preoccupations take pride of place in his work. However, from his first writings (perhaps under Naturalist influence), he showed a concern with problems connected with sex, and this is why his most representative novels explore a certain eroticism. This erotic character is also influenced by the environment in which his work developed. Martin du Gard lived among a circle, headed by André Gide, in which homosexuality was prevalent, and we think that he inclined more closely to this tendency than appears at first sight. His proven discretion made him take refuge in literature, where he found a way to show his deepest desires and his phantoms about sex and eroticism. These composed an essential subject in his work and remained a defining force all his life, as is proved by his letters, journal, and private papers.

In his most representative work, Les Thibault, eroticism is represented in some of the relations between two brothers, Jacques and Antoine. Jacques’ first flirtation with the German Lisbeth or his feelings for Gise, Mlle de Waize’s favorite, show clearly this tendency. Gise is the erotic dream of his early adolescence, a dream which is completed by prohibition. The phantom of incest turns up because the young lady is considered almost his sister. They never have sexual intercourse, but the dream and the girl’s animal sensuality fill Jacques’ mind with erotic thoughts and obsessions that are explicit in the story La Sorellina and are a sort of catharsis for him. When he returns after his flight at the end of his studies, Lisbeth represents his sexual desires, which are mingled with a certain tenderness. The young German lady likes to think of herself as a leader, and her maternal instinct plays an important role in their relationship. However, neither of these experiences satisfy Jacques. Only Jenny quenches his thirst for the absolute.

The character which best represents eroticism is Rachel, lover of the elder brother, Antoine, who changes his life and leaves an indelible mark on his mind. Because of her Jewish origins and sexual freedom, Rachel symbolizes what is forbidden. Nothing is taboo in her life; lesbian relationships, incest, interracial sex are all embraced. All that is important to her are her personal erotic fulfillment and a happy sex life, untroubled by religious or social complexes. Rachel is born from the writer's erotic mind and represents his extension of femininity to apotheosis. Her flaming head of hair resembles the mane of a lion, an appearance which is emphasized by the pink color of her room. According to Martin du Gard, pink is the color of eroticism. Antoine, a physician, is seduced when Rachel appears by the sickbed of the niece of his father's secretary. While Antoine is trying to save the little girl, Rachel's presence there both disturbs and elates him. After that, the outcome is inevitable. The reward for his medical victory is the possession of Rachel, who shows him what love and sex are. Previously he was used to only hygienic experiences to maintain balanced health. From this moment on, the young doctor lives the most wonderful period of his life and is led by Rachel to destroy all the sexual taboos that conditioned his past behavior. He will have joyous memories of her. Her body, the verses of the Song of Songs that show his feelings, and the perfume of the amber from her necklace follow him throughout his life and become deeply identified with his concept of love. His later relationship with Anne de Bataincourt, despite the exciting anxiety it creates, can't be compared to his experience with Rachel. Without a doubt, Rachel represents the erotic ideal of Martin du Gard.

There are other little elements with erotic meanings that are not as powerful as Rachel—in particular Mme de Fontanin's feelings for her husband: even though he is unfaithful to her and abandons her during the worst moments of her life, nevertheless his perfume of cinnamon and verbena trouble her, and she is unable to avoid the fascination that he exercises on her. Jérôme fascinates Rinette too, and his personality permeates the whole novel, so he represents Don Juan's myth. Incest features once again, committed this time by two brothers. The determinism of the story cannot erase the memory of the impulse that made the brother and sister, Jacques and Gise, love and enjoy their feelings for each other.

In his latest work, Maumort, the writer's old phantoms appear with energy. A great part of the novel deals with the first sexual experiences of the youthful Guy (perhaps a portrait of André Gide), which is observed by Maumort (Martin du Gard?). "La Baignade" is a passage of this story where the eroticism arises. Eros and Thanatos come together again in the writer's work. In the second part, the relationship between Maumort and a young girl from Martinique recall the links between Antoine and Rachel, but less powerfully.

Biography

Roger Martin du Gard was born in 1881 in Neuilly-sur-Seine, outside Paris. In 1906 he graduated from the École des Chartes. His first success as a writer was the novel Jean Barois, published in 1913. Martin du Gard spent most of World War I at the front lines. After the war, he devoted most of his time to writing Les Thibault. The twelve volumes of the series were published between 1922 and 1940. He won the Nobel Prize for Literature for Les Thibault in 1937. In 1940 Martin du Gard fled to Nice, where he spent most of World War II. He was at work on a large novel, Le Lieutenant-Colonel de Maumort, when he died in Bellême on August 23.

ANGELS SANTA

Editions

Oeuvres complètes. Vol. 1 ("Devenir," "Jean Barois," "In Memoriam," "Les Thibault" [Le Cahier gris, Le pénitencier, La Belle Saison, La Consultation, La Sorcellina, La Mort du Père]); Vol. 2 ("Les Thibault" [L'Été 1914, Épilogue], "Vieille France," "Confidence Africaine," "Le Testament du Père Leleu," "La Gonfle," "Un Taciturne," "Notes sur André Gide"). Paris: Bibliothèque de la Pléiade/Gallimard, 1955.

Le Lieutenant-Colonel de Maumort. Edited by André Daspre. Paris: Pléiade/Gallimard, 1983.

Further Reading

Daspre, A., and J. Schlobach, eds. Roger Martin du Gard. Etudes sur son oeuvre. Paris: Klincksieck, 1984.
Emeis, Harald. L'Oeuvre de Roger Martin du Gard: Sources et signification. Essen: Verlag Die Blaue Eule, 2003.

Garguilo, René. La Genèse des Thibault de Roger Martin du Gard. Paris: Klincksieck, 1974.

Santa, Angels, and Montse Parra, eds. Relire L'Été 1914 et Épilogue de Roger Martin du Gard. Lleida, Spain: Pagès Editors, 2000.

Tassel, Alain, and A. Daspre. Roger Martin du Gard et les crises de l'histoire (colonialisme, seconde guerre mondiale). Nice: Presses Universitaires de Nice–Sophia Antipolis, Nice, 2001.

---

MARTORELL, JOANOT

---

1410/11–1465

Spanish novelist

Joanot Martorell is the author of Tirant lo Blanc, a complex chivalry novel that mixes history and fiction. What makes this novel important in the context of the medieval narrative is its dose of rationality and verosimilitude. The physical and moral qualities of the hero Tirant are described in great detail, so Tirant becomes a realistic and rounded character. Martorell accurately reports the amorous adventures of Tirant in order to describe the knight's proper behavior, and often establishes comparisons between the abilities of Tirant in the battlefield and his abilities in the "siege" and "conquest" of ladies. War and love, therefore, become the two axes of the novel. Eroticism affects the whole work, but it is especially important in the chapters that take place in the court of Constantinople.

Chapters 115–296 are set in the Greek empire, and they contain most of the erotic adventures of the novel. The Empire of Constantinople is about to be attacked by the Turks, and the emperor asks for the help of Tirant, who accepts the challenge. In Constantinople he meets Carmesina, the princess, and they fall in love. The result is that Tirant feels distressed, which concerns the emperor. Just before an expedition to Cyprus, the princess asks Tirant what worries him. He replies that he is deeply in love with a lady. Carmesina wants to know her name, and Tirant gives her a mirror. Tirant goes on to win several important battles against the Turks. Later on Viuda Reposada, former wet-nurse of Carmesina, falls in love with Tirant and organizes several tricks to make the lovers fall out. Carmesina falls into her traps and rejects Tirant, and as a result he is distressed. Thanks to Plaerdemavida he breaks into Carmesina's chambers and slips into her bedroom, but he is discovered, and during his escape he jumps from the window, causing him to break his leg. While he is recovering, he and Carmesina they start to exchange love letters. At the same time, the empress falls in love with the knight Hipòlit, who hides for two weeks in her room. Viuda Reposada tries again to separate Tirant and Carmesina by trying to convince him that Carmesina has sexual relations with a gardener. In Chapters 271–2 Tirant and Carmesina get married in secret, but the marriage cannot be consummated, since it would cause a scandal. This leads to several erotic encounters. In the end, all of these tribulations are overcome, and in the final part of the novel the two formalize their marriage.

Martorell deals with love in several forms—for instance, courtly love and its rituals, as well as passionate, direct love that includes lesbianism and erotic fantasies such as fetishism and voyeurism. The writer analyzes a range of topics such as the importance of pleasure, the torture of love, and the idealization of desire. Moreover, he dwells on the language of passion, its codes and double meanings. Sex is described in both metaphorical terms and direct language.

Tirant lo blanc contains many explicit passages in which vital and passionate desire is depicted. These adopt a refined level of eroticism and are often about humorous encounters. In the most famous passage, Plaerdemavida takes Tirant to Carmesina's bed and makes him lie down beside the princess. When Tirant has lain down, the maiden tells him to be still and not to move. Then she places Tirant's hand on the princess's breasts, and he touches her nipples and her belly. The princess complains, and Plaerdemavida says: "You've just come out of the bath, and your skin is so smooth and nice that it makes me feel good just to touch it." The princess replies: "Touch all you like, but don't put your hand so far down." They spend more than an hour at this play, and he does not cease touching her. But the princess begins to wake up, and she asks Plaerdemavida: "What are you doing? Have you gone mad, trying to do what is against your nature?"

The novel places human relationships in an intermediate position between moral virtue and the pursuit of pleasure, although pleasure usually prevails. It is also remarkable that there is no concept of sin in the novel; this has been considered very modern in relation to other chivalric novels. The affair between the knight Hipòlit and the empress is a good example of this, since their adulterous relationship is awarded with marriage and the social ascension of the knight.

The novel is full of jovial situations based on the fears and social constrictions of Tirant and Carmesina. When they finally get married, the wedding night is ironically described as a battle that Tirant wins in less than one hour. Carmesina begs for mercy, but Martorell, using metaphorical language, tells us that Tirant "went in the castle by the force of arms." Tirant, a very brave knight who is also adept at all kinds of diplomatic problems, is in fact extremely shy and lacks confidence when it comes to declaring his love. On the other hand, Carmesina is always concerned about the social gap existing between them, and what is more, she is constrained by religious concerns.

The love between Tirant and Carmesina and other characters is intercalated with Tirant's battles and military campaigns in order to sharpen the attention of the reader. The relationship between the two main characters is both gentle and shameless and has a subtle, spiritual, and refined side, yet it is also tinged by provocation and sensuality. The characters of Tirant lo Blanc show different discourses in relation to love. According to Plaerdemavida, it has to be divided in two categories: courtly love, based on fidelity, characteristic of nobles; and gross desire. Estefania divides love into three categories: virtuous (the dame has to love the knight who carries out heroic deeds), profitable (she loves in relation to the benefits she obtains), and depraved (which only takes into account sexual satisfaction). In the novel there are examples of all these kinds of love, and Martorell offers a wide catalogue of erotic situations: petting, adultery, anal sex, fetishism, carnivalesque scenes, relationships with or without sex, lesbianism, and voyeurism.

Biography

Born in Valencia, Spain. Member of a decadent noble family, had several duels, and was imprisoned for numerous crimes. Martorell lived in England, 1438–39, and often traveled to Naples during the 1440s–50s. In 1452, he became assistant to the Catalan king Alphonse the Magnanimous. In 1460, he started to write Tirant lo Blanc, which was first published in Valencia in 1490 and was reprinted in Barcelona in 1497. Martorell probably died in Valencia.

JORDI CORNELLÀ-DETRELL

See also Catalan

Editions

Tirant lo Blanc. Translated by David H. Rosenthal. London: Macmillan, 1985; Baltimore: John Hopkins University Press, 1996.

Tirant lo Blanc: The Complete Translation. Translated by Ray La Fontaine. New York: Peter Lang, 1993.

Tirant lo Blanc. Edited by Martí de Riquer. Barcelona: Ariel, 2000.

Further Reading

Badia, Lola. "Tot per a la dona però sens la dona. Notes sobre el punt de vista masculí al Tirant lo Blanc." Journal of Hispanic Research 2 (1993–1994): 39–60.

Beltran, Vicenç. "Realismo, coloquialismo y erotismo en Tirant lo Blanc." In Estudios sobre el Tirant lo Blanc, edited by Juan Paredes, Enrique Nogueras, and Lourdes Sánchez. Granada: Universidad de Granada, 1995.

Beltran, Rafael, and others. Tirant lo Blanc: New Approaches. Edited by Arthur Terry. London: Tamesis Books, 1999.

Cacho Blecua, Juan Manuel. "L'amor en el Tirant lo Blanc: Hipòlit i la Emperadriu." In Actes del Symposium Tirant lo Blanc. Barcelona: Quaderns Crema, 1993.

Espadaler, Anton M. "Milícia i sexualitat a la part anglesa del Tirant." Anuari de Filologia 20 (1997): 9–23.

Hart, Thomas R. "Comedy and Chivalry in Tirant lo Blanc." In The Age of the Catholic Monarchs 1474–1516, edited by Alan Deyermond and Ian Macpherson. Liverpool: Liverpool University Press, 1989.

MASTURBATION

McNerney, Kathleen. "Elements of Courtly Romance in Tirant lo Blanc." In Courtly Romance, edited by Guy Mermier. Detroit: Fifteenth-Century Symposium, 1984.

———. Tirant lo Blanc Revisited. A Critical Study. Detroit: Michigan Consortium for Medieval and Early Modern Studies, 1983.

Miralles, Carles. "La dona és el món." In Actes del Simposion Tirant lo Blanc. Barcelona: Quaderns Crema, 1993.

Riquer, Martí de. Aproximació al Tirant. Barcelona: Quaderns Crema, 1990.

Yates, Alan. "Tirant lo Blanc: the Ambiguous Hero." In Hispanic Studies in Honour of Frank Pierce, edited by John England. Sheffield: University of Sheffield, 1980.

---

MASTURBATION

---

Masturbation is one of life's great pleasures, and references to it appear everywhere in all cultures and all societies. Mostly, however, the descriptions of the act are not put in erotic terms, but simply reported, sometimes facetiously. Most of the reports are about males, and the male semen was regarded as especially important. In ancient Egypt, creation itself is associated with masturbation of Atum (Bullough, 62). References to masturbation are common in classical literature, especially in the writings of Martial (died about 104 CE). It was the Romans in fact who gave us the word masturbation. Often in the past, the term was said to be derived from a combination of the word manus (hand) and stupro, meaning to defile. This derivation almost immediately puts a sinful and negative connotation on masturbation, with which the Romans would not have agreed. An equally possible and more likely source is a combination of the word manus with the verb turbo, meaning to agitate or disturb, which both is descriptive and removes the stigma from such action. Martial implies that it was the custom to masturbate with the left hand, and he calls his left hand a "Ganymede" to serve him (Martial, Epigrams, II, 43).

In the Qur'an masturbatory discharges by men are regarded in the same way as a discharge during intercourse, and the male involved (even if they were wet dreams) had to undergo ritual purification, which required that he wash himself all over. Women had to make the same kind of ablutions after their menses. Though the hadith (the sayings of Muhammad) hold that those who masturbate are cursed, no such language exists in the Qur'an. In fact, many Islamic commentators justify the practice as a way of relieving lust. The learned Abu Hanifa (c. 700–767) permitted the use of silken cloth to rub the penis in case of emergency. Some commentators have held that to masturbate is a commendable way of honoring beauty in a woman who should not be approached but whose sighting allows the male to have all kinds of erotic fantasies.

In Hinduism, especially the antinomian cults associated with Krishna, masturbation was widely accepted. The ancient Hindu literature describes many devices (apadravya) to take the place of the penis (in case of women) or of the vulva (in case of men). One such instrument for men was the viyoni (literally "without yoni"; yoni = vagina), which was made of wood and cloth and shaped like a female, with a yoni-like opening. The Kritrima linga, or artificial phallus, was used by both men and women. Dildos were made from radishes or other tubers, from eggplants and bananas, and also from candle wax, baked clay, wood, bone, or metal. Many writers on eros urged men to use such devices to stimulate their female partners before intercourse.

Less permissive of masturbation were the ancient Chinese, who believed that such activities would result in the loss of vital essence, and it was condoned only in special circumstances. Probably, however, the most hostile were the Christians, who under the influence of St. Augustine regarded even foreplay as sinful. Augustine stipulated that sexual activity should be engaged in only for the purpose of procreation, with the proper instrument, the penis, and the proper receptacle, the vagina, and with the female on the bottom and the male on the top.

In spite of this Christian hostility, medical writers in the West were far more accepting of masturbation, going so far as to regard it as essential for women in some cases in order to expel accumulated secretions. All of this changed in the eighteenth century, when the concept of homeostasis became the dominant medical doctrine, and both the voluntary and involuntary loss of semen, or of orgasmic expulsions in women, was regarded as harmful to health. The major advocate of this view came to be the physician Samuel Auguste David Tissot, and his influence dominated medical ideas through the end of the nineteenth century. Despite this, however, people continued to masturbate.

In fact the psychiatrist Wilhelm Stekel (1868–1940) claimed that everyone masturbated, consciously or unconsciously, although his definition of masturbation included mannerisms involving the tongue, scratching, finger-boring of the nose, and various tics. Masturbation, according to Stekel and most other writers who dared to openly discuss the topic, was usually accompanied by fantasies of one kind or another. One early study of these fantasies was published by Lukianowicz in 1960, who reported on visual masturbatory experiences as reported to him by 188 patients, 126 of whom were male and 62 female. He classified these erotic fantasies into two basic groups, heterosexual and homosexual, but with subgroups such as transvestism, fetishism, masochism, sadism, zoophilia, etc. He found the heterosexual imaginary partner to be the most common of fantasized love objects. Among fantasy themes were kleptomania, gambling, and pyromania. These fantasies occurred very early in the life of the individual and were as much remembered by those who had been child masturbators as they were currently part of the fantasies being reported.

Despite the fact that we know that fantasies and erotic daydreaming are common, it is difficult to find much descriptive literature. For example, we know that Gustave Flaubert (1821–80) found release for his sexual tensions through masturbation, but we know little of what he fantasized. One major testament to the place that fantasy literature plays in masturbation is provided by the oil millionaire Roy Melisander

Johnson of Ardmore, Oklahoma. He collected erotic works to read as he masturbated, and in the process gathered together one of the world's largest collections of erotica. Fortunately or unfortunately, he wanted more than he could find, since once he had read a book or saw an illustration, he was no longer aroused. His solution was to commission original erotic works through literary agents. He received two new manuscripts a week, one from an agent in New York City, another from an agent in California. For each of these Johnson paid $200, to be split between the agent and the writer. Gershon Legman, who was writing regularly for him, recruited, among others, Anaïs Nin to do so. On Legman's advice she kept carbon copies of the material she sent him, and after Johnson's death, she published the best of them as The Delta of Venus (1977) and Little Birds (1979). Nin also recruited some of her friends to write for Johnson, two of whom she later identified in her diaries as Virginia Admiral and Caresse Crosby. Interestingly, Johnson's wife, who knew of his collection, would not let him keep the material in the house. Instead he kept them in his office in old green filing cabinets. After his death in the 1960s, she sold off the collection, which served as the source of many of the printed erotic books hitting the market at the end of that decade.

We also know that when some groups of males get together, masturbation serves as an erotic athletic event, to see who can go the longest or ejaculate the most. Interestingly, one instance of such erotic competition has been recorded in a Scottish sex club of the eighteenth century, known as the Beggars Benison (Stevenson). Members apparently had to publicly masturbate to be admitted, and then at club meetings they often masturbated to sensuous lectures or demonstrations usually dealing with females. It was not just in the eighteenth century that such practices occurred. Following football games in the high school attended by one of my informants in the 1940s, the players on the winning team had ejaculation contests in the showers afterward.

As American obscenity laws relaxed, X-rated movie theaters opened, in which many individuals masturbated to porno movies; and X-rated bookstores, which also sold videotapes, opened special rooms for patrons to masturbate in. Prometheus Books published eight volumes of guides to X-rated movies during the 1980s and 1990s, until the market collapsed due to the availability of both information and product on the Internet. In fact, the Internet became so vital a source of erotica that some observers have gone so far as to claim that its rapid success was due to its pornographic websites. Whether this is true or not, the Web has become the great dispenser of erotica and pornography. Those who need visual fantasies to masturbate by can get any type they want. Sex therapists and marriage counselors have often advised both sexually blocked individuals and couples to watch porno films and visit Internet porno sites and learn from them, especially about the importance of what can be called masturbatory foreplay in the couple relationship.

MATSUURA RIEKO

Perhaps inevitably, masturbation became a fictional theme. The number-one best seller in 1969 was Philip Roth's Portnoy's Complaint, which the publishers called "the most talked about novel of our time." It certainly broke down the barriers to openly discussing masturbation in fiction, and other writers, while not trying to compete with Roth, have included masturbation since then. Perhaps encouraged by the success of Roth's book, nonfiction accounts of the joys of masturbation also appeared, most notably by Betty Dodson, whose Sex for One, also published as Selflove and Orgasms, and Liberating Masturbation, appeared first in 1974. She includes sections on romantic images, erotic images, sex art, and genital imagery, as well as masturbatory stories. Even in nonfiction accounts, the eroticism of masturbation is emphasized.

VERN L. BULLOUGH

References and Further Reading

- Bullough, Vern L. Sexual Variance in Society and History. New York: Wiley, 1976.
- Dodson, Betty. Sex for One: The Joy of SelfLoving. New York: Crown, 1996.
- Fitch, Noel Riley. The Erotic Life of Anaïs Nin. Boston: Little, Brown, 1993.
- Lukianowicz, Narcyz. "Imaginary Sexual Partner: Visual Masturbatory Fantasies." Archives of General Psychiatry 3 (1960): 429–49.
- Martial. Epigrams. Translated by Walter C.A. Ker. London: William Heinemann, 1958. Some translations of the Epigrams are much more specific than those of the Loeb Library, and the reader is advised to look at them.
- Roth, Philip. Portnoy's Complaint. New York: Random House, 1969.
- Stekel, Wilhelm. Autoeroticism. Translated by James S. Van Teslaar. London: Peter Nevill, Ltd., 1951.
- Stevenson, David. The Beggar's Benison. East Lothian: Tuckwell Press, 2001.

---

MATSUURA RIEKO

---

1958–
Japanese novelist and essayist

Yoko, the heroine of Natural Woman, is a writer of very morbid mangas, as is her female lover, Hanayo. Matsuura Rieko translates the language of manga into a very precise and lively style. This novel is a bildungsroman, a coming-of-age tale, tinged with melancholy. Though it has been read as cocktail pop-pulp, or as belonging to a new pornographic pulp genre and lesbo-feminist literature, Matsuura's style and the story itself are based on delicate sensations alternating with extreme sex. Her style is measured and sober, with a sad tonality, even in the hard sex scenes.

Her themes are first of all lesbianism with a zest for sadomasochism, as a game of master/slave in Sebastien and in Natural Woman. She writes about sexual relations between lesbian partners, trying to find out whether this is a specific sexuality or not. Mixing the feminine sex drive and the masculine feelings derived from the male supplementary organ will help her exploration through a monstrous organic reality. It can be the octopus met by Yoko and Yuriko in the kitchen of a hotel, or the "Flower Show," an erotic freak show in which all the sexual components are abnormal. Kazumi has a toe penis, Sachie has a vagina dentata, and Tamotsu has two penises, his and that of Shin, his conjoined brother inside of him.

We can link these novels to the Japanese economic boom of the 1980s, when women began to work as much as men, creating turmoil in feminine identity, which was no longer defined in relation to men. Matsuura Rieko may be describing a new female type: neither feminist nor conservative; a hybrid metamorphosis. She also describes a sociological fact: that there is a lack of interest among many young Japanese adults in normal careers or behavior. They are called moratorium ningen, "those who wait," or Kurisutaruzoku, the "crystal generation," after Tanaka Yasuo's famous 1981 novel of that name. Young Japanese girls experiment in social drifting from school toward violence and prostitution. Matsuura glorifies the margins of society in terms of sexual difference, as do other young Japanese writers. Her work is closely in touch with this behavioral change. For example, Kitahara Minori has created the "Love Piece Club" in Tokyo where women can improve their sex lives with items usually bought by men, and she has created, from Matsuura's novel, a vibrator which can be placed on the groin.

The aim of Matsuura's novels and essays is not only to affirm a lesbian identity. She contributes to the deconstruction of national identity in current Japanese literature. She emphasizes the variety of the notions of sex and gender beyond chromosomal definition. Kazumi, in Big-Toe Penis, for instance, is a hybrid girl. She imagines a new human being who is androgyne. Conventions and roles can no longer be thought of as before, and sexual roles especially have to be redefined. It is this phenomenon which is described in her novels.

During her odyssey of sex, Kazumi in her early twenties and her brand-new toe penis lack any kind of mastery, but her way of thinking is extremely fluid, and she is emblematic of a new generation which hesitates between the "Lover Ship" (the name of a love encounter club) and the "Flower show" (erotic showbiz, but also therapy for abnormality, discover of human identity in love sufferance). Finally, what is developed is "skinship"—the physical contact, modeled on the mother/child relationship. It is not surprising in a country where these contacts are said to be deficient, and for a society in which the language is gendered and separates men and women.

Using the trick of Kazumi's big-toe penis enables Matsuura to try to understand masculine pleasure (penetration and masturbation) in all of its phallocratic power, from the feminine point of view, as well as the dysfunctions of male sexuality, especially impotence. It is the end of passive feminine sexuality. The heroine, who relates her adventures to a female writer called M., seeks a sexual and affective happiness which is linked to skinship rather than to mere penetration, active or passive. The ideal sexual act is finally defined as "making love with love" by the transsexual Masami.

In conclusion, sentimental love is back inside free sexuality. Without love, there is no happy sex, whatever that sex can be. Companionship and the importance of family are stressed, as well as the couple, but they cannot be compared to the existing ones. Love is reevaluated through point of view of abnormality and rediscovered as an illimited new emotional field.

Biography

Born in Matsuyama; lives and works at the moment in Tokyo. In 1978, Matsuura received the Bungakukaishinjichô (new young writer's prize) for Sôgi no hi [The Funeral Party]. Since then, she has published an anthology of short stories, three novels, and several essays. Sebastien (1987) is often related to the cult of Mishima and she is considered a direct descendant of that writer. She is praised by her contemporaries, such as Nakagami Kenji. Big-Toe Penis (1993) was in a few days a best-seller. She had been a cult writer; suddenly, she came to the attention of the mass media. This novel won the Joryubungakushô (prize for feminine literature). Since then, she has been regarded as a feminist writer. And indeed, Natural Woman, her next novel, dealt with the theme of feminine homosexuality. She almost won the Akutagawa Prize.

MARC KOBER

Selected Works

Novels, Short Stories

Sougi no hi. Tokyo: Bungei shunjuu (now Kawadeshobou Shinsha), 1978.

Sebastien. Tokyo: Bungei shunjuu (now Kawadeshobou Shinsha), 1987.

MATZNEFF, GABRIEL

Oyayubi-P no shugyo jidai. Tokyo: Kawadeshobou Shinsha, 1993.

Nachuraru uman [Natural Woman]. Tokyo: Kawadeshobou Shinsha, 1994.

Essay Collections

Poketto fetisshu [Pocket Fetish]. Tokyo: Hakusuisha, 1994.

Yasashii kyosei no tame ni [For a Gentle Castration]. Tokyo: Chikuma Shobo, 1997

Oboreru jinsei sodan [Advice for a Drowning Life]. Tokyo: Kadokawa Shoten, 1998.

Ura-vajon [Reverse Version]. Tokyo: Chikuma Shobo, 2000.

Translation

Takekurabe. Poems by Higuchi Ichiyou. Tokyo: Kawade Shobo Shinsha, 1996 (translation into modern Japanese; first publication in the review Bungakukai, 1985).

Further Reading

Borel, France. Le Vêtement incarné. Paris: Pocket, 1998.
Mourthé, Claude. "Matsuura Rieko, grande prêtresse de Lesbos." Le Magazine littéraire 352, March 1997.

Nakagami, Shigeki. What's Happening to Sexuality? Corporeal Sensations in Matsuura Rieko's Oyayubi-P no Shugyo jidai. In Love and Sexuality in Japanese Literature, edited by Eiji Sekine. Vol. 5. Lafayette, IN: Midwest Association for Japanese Literary Studies/Purdue University Press, 1999.

Souzenelle, Annick de. Le Symbolisme du corps humain. Paris: Albin Michel, 1991.

---

MATZNEFF, GABRIEL

---

1936–

French novelist, essayist, diarist, poet, columnist, and critic

Gabriel Matzneff is no doubt the most controversial living French writer, simultaneously glorified as a literary genius by scores of intelligentsia and villified as a violent sex offender by child protection agencies, parent organizations, and government lobbies on both sides of the political divide. Yet despite the defiant candor with which he relentlessly narrates his sexual adventures, he has never been put into prison, his works have never been censored, and some of the most prestigious French publishers are queuing to reprint his intimate diaries. For obvious reasons, perhaps, his work has not been translated into English, yet in his homeland he remains the undisputable, if not undisputed, enfant terrible of letters.

Although Matzneff himself has divided his literary output into novels, diaries, essays, and poetry, the contents of these works are remarkably similar. Almost invariably, they are stories of lust-driven adults who desperately seek to make the acquaintances of, seduce, and love fourteen- and fifteen-year-old boys and girls. Countering the odium associated with the term "pedophilia," Matzneff describes the devouring passion of his protagonists (under whose thinly disguised names and characters he situates his own experiences) as the practice of "philopedia," a mixture of religion (worship) and eroticism (sexual pleasure), with which the aging man can satiate his hunger for eternal youth. In La passion Francesca, which details his passionate involvement with a fifteen-year-old girl, Matzneff puts it as follows: "This is how I shall suck your heart and your brains, much like drinking Coca-Cola with a straw. You will never break up with me. I give you too much pleasure. If you break up with me, I will drive you crazy. You are in my power and in order to escape it, your heart will have to bleed liters and liters of blood." The "philopedic" narrator clearly appears as a cruel and selfish predator here, yet in the end (and perhaps inevitably) he also knows that he will be slaughtered on the altar of the young girl's sexual appetite. Time and again, the narrator discovers that his beloved has betrayed him with another (younger) man or that she is not who he thought she was—madly jealous instead of happily indulgent, loudly demanding instead of quietly obsequious. And so he is forced to break off the relationship, yet only in order to woo a new, purer nymph into the realm of his desire, ad infinitum.

If Matzneff designates the acts of his character(s) as “philopedic,” he never really endeavors—like André Gide in Corydon, for example—to plumb their psychological motives. Matzneff is adamant that they are part and parcel of an irreducible ars vivendi, a “way of life” or, as he calls it, “une diététique.” Combined with the aforementioned religious dimension of “philopedia,” this principle endows his work with moralistic overtones, yet at the same time Matzneff is rarely inclined to teach or preach, which may explain why he has managed to escape censorship. Rather than elevating his narration to the level of an ethical or philosophical doctrine and developing its exoteric qualities, Matzneff elaborates his discourse in an ultra-intimistic fashion, sharing with his readership thoughts and feelings that few people would want to admit to themselves, and simultaneously recording (the admittedly scandalous) events of his love life in a form that commits them to posterity. Matzneff challenges our erotic codes, but the main challenge for himself as a writer seems to be to capture in writing all the unspoken (and often unspeakable) fragments of an idiosyncratic erotic experience.

Insofar as the fictionalized truth of Matzneff’s writings brings to mind the devious acts and assertions of Humbert Humbert, their style is also reminiscent of the outstanding stylistic qualities of Nabokov’s Lolita. Matzneff is renowned for saying that he has only ever been faithful to the French language and that his writing is primarily an exercise in style, which could also mean that unlike the many boys and girls with whom he has shared his bed, the French language has never let him down. Hence, whatever the reader may experience in the content of his works, their style is extraordinarily persuasive and seductive, so that even if the reader is disgusted by the story line, its purified aesthetics may still exert a strong power of attraction.

Biography

Gabriel Matzneff was born August 12 in Neuilly-sur-Seine of Russian parents who had emigrated to France after the 1917 Russian revolution. The Franco-Russian community in which he grew up conditioned his lifelong allegiance to the Orthodox Church. Educated at the École Tannenberg and the Lycée Carnot, he read classics at the Sorbonne during the 1950s. In 1957 he wrote to Henri de Montherlant, which signals the beginning of a lifelong friendship between the two men. Matzneff started his military service in 1959, which he performed with so much skill and enthusiasm that his brothers-in-arms dubbed him “Gab la Rafale” (Burst-Gab). After he tried to commit suicide, he was discharged from the military and spent two months in a psychiatric hospital. During the early 1960s he devoted most of his time to traveling, writing, and pursuing his passion for (pre)adolescent boys and girls. In 1962 he started writing a weekly column for Combat, which gradually earned him a reputation as a new literary stylist. His first collection of essays, Le défi, was published in 1965, followed a year later by his first novel, L’archimandrite. In 1974, his essay Les Moins de seize ans caused a scandal because of its uninhibited celebration of cross-generational sexual relationships. With the publication during the 1970s and 80s of his intimate diaries, containing detailed autobiographical accounts of an endless series of erotic encounters with minors, Matzneff became a thorn in the eye of French law enforcers. In December 1982 his apartment was raided and he was accused of being a member of a notorious pedophile ring, yet three years later he was cleared of all charges. His image tarnished, he lost his acclaimed column in Le Monde, but it didn’t deter him from his literary and sexual activities. During the 1990s he continued to seduce, write, and publish in the same vein, shamelessly rendering public his most intimate moments of love and hate with (pre)adolescent girls, whilst also appearing on the catwalk for fashion designer Yohji Yamamoto. Matzneff’s latest book is a collection of essays entitled Yogourt et Yoga (2004), and critics are eagerly awaiting the publication of his post-1987 notebooks.

DANY NOBUS

Selected Works

Cette camisole de flammes—Journal intime, 1953–1962, 1976 (2nd ed., 1989)
Douze poèmes pour Francesca, 1977
Harrison Plaza, 1988
Ivre du vin perdu, 1981.
La diététique de Lord Byron, 1984
La passion Francesca—Journal intime, 1974–1976, 1998
L'Archimandrite, 1966 (2nd ed., 1981)
Le défi, 1965 (4th ed., 2002)
Le taureau de Phalaris, 1987 (2nd ed., 1994)
Les lèvres menteuses, 1992
Les moins de seize ans, 1974 (5th ed., 2005)
Les passions schismatiques, 1977 (3rd ed., 2005)

Mes amours décomposés—Journal intime, 1983–1984, 1990
Yogourt et yoga, 2004

Further Reading

Bulletin de la Société des Amis de Gabriel Matzneff, 1999–2004, 10 issues Delannoy, Philippe. Gabriel Matzneff. Monaco: Editions du Rocher, 1992.
Hocquenghem, Guy. “Les Écrivains de la transgression.” Le Quotidien de Paris, November 5, 1985.
Lire 218, November 1, 1993.
Roy, Vincent. Matzneff. L'Exilé absolu. Paris: Editions Michalon, 2003.

---

MAUPASSANT, GUY DE

---

1850–1893

French novelist and author of short stories

In the short stories on which his literary reputation is principally based, Maupassant reveals a pessimistic vision of mankind marked by Schopenhauer's denunciation of love as a mask for the reproductive instinct, of woman as nature's trap to ensure the continuance of the species. In over half of this oeuvre, sexuality is the driving force, with results that can be comic (an ignorant young bride mistakes orgasm as the onset of rabies) or disastrous (when infidelity, repression, or jealousy drive to murder). The prostitute often serves as a figure whose honesty shows up hypocrisy, subverts respectability, or reveals the fragility of social distinctions. Pleasure is totally separate from marriage: indeed it is the social constraints on desire that lead to unhappiness and crime.

Maupassant attacked in his journalism the inability to talk frankly and explicitly about the plain fact of coupling as something natural, useful, and innocent, but the stories inevitably resort to allusion and euphemism. On occasion his directness led to censorship difficulties. The poem “Au bord de l'eau” [At the Water's Edge] links sensual eroticism with a realistic setting in nature: when it was published in a review in 1880, Maupassant was charged with outrage to public morality, though the case was dismissed. His first novel, Une Vie [A Woman's Life] (1883) was briefly banned from sale in railway book-stalls for its direct evocation of the marital disillusionments of the sexually ignorant and romantic heroine.

Such works attempted to confront certain realities while remaining within the boundaries of what could be published openly. Maupassant's erotic work represents, however, an exaggerated protest against hypocrisy, and an antidote both to sentimental idealizing and to the lyrical disguising of natural instincts, through a blunt insistence on physical reality.

In his journalism Maupassant called for bold and passionate poems celebrating sex, without crude words, lewd jokes, or innuendo. His known erotic poems were written between 1874 and 1878. Three were published in Belgium in 1881; of several others written, some have been lost, and three are in private collections. “Désirs de faune” [A Faun's Desires] fits his prescription, balancing a lyrical evocation of sex with intensity and realism. “Ma Source” [My Spring] less successfully celebrates cunnilingus with an incongruous series of overconventional poetic images coupled with sacrilegious overtones: moss, spring, the rock struck by Moses; it closes with the poet carrying away the woman's odor on his mustache like a censer. Two others are provocatively anti-poetic, exaggerated, and demythificatory. "La Femme à barbe" [The Bearded Lady] describes a sexual encounter with down-to-earth directness. The woman startles the poet by aggressively acting out a male role; there is no pretense of emotional feeling: he is motivated by curiosity, she by the desire for "a good screw." The story "69" desentimentalizes that act even further: the woman in the story is old, ugly, and dirty, the language violent and crude.

During the same period that he wrote these poems, Maupassant devised, together with four boating friends, the one-act play A la feuille de rose, maison turque (the untranslatable title suggests a Turkish establishment called "At the Rose Leaf," but is also a slang expression for anilingus). He organized private stagings in 1875 and 1877; the audience for the second included Zola, Flaubert, and Maupassant's father. All the roles were played by the group of male friends; the women characters had gaping vaginas painted on their costumes, the men had giant phalluses made of draught excluders. The manager, Miché ("Pimp"), has dressed the three prostitutes in his Parisian brothel in Turkish costumes to attract customers; unfortunately, only one, Raphaële (played by Maupassant), is presentable. One plot line is provided by the arrival of Monsieur Beauflanquet ("Well-endowed"), the mayor of Conville, and his wife, lured to this "hotel" by Léon, who wishes to have intercourse with the wife. This plot is interrupted by a series of clients, all of whom select Raphaële, to the mounting distress of the servant Crête-de-Coq ("Coxcomb," but also a genital growth), the lover of Raphaële and an ex-seminarist. The clients, all acted by the same man, are a series of comic stereotypes: a cesspool emptier whose stammering produces a series of crude puns, a hunchback, an army captain who refuses protection on the grounds that "you don't sheath a sabre when charging" (the servant points out that he will be discharging), a boastful Marseillais who claims to have killed a woman with his member but who fails to reach orgasm, a military sapper, an Englishman who thinks it is a museum and copulates with the "waxwork" Raphaële. The farcical plot is enlivened by juvenile jokes and conversations at cross-purposes: Mme Beauflanquet innocently misreads the sexual terms, such as "pussy" and "doggie-style," used by the whores: her "knowledge" astonishes them. The preposterous climax involves a complex exchange of sexual partners in the dark between M. and Mme Beauflanquet and Raphaële and Léon. After a standard recognition scene echoing The Marriage of Figaro, the Beauflanquets return to the provinces; Miché, desperate for money, offers to satisfy the cesspool worker himself when the whores refuse; and the servant, spurned by Raphaële, is reduced, as in the seminary, to masturbation.

The playlet represents a series of denigrating male jokes for men (the women in the audience were not amused). The crude realities of sex and money aggressively de-poeticize sentimental illusions; it is not just a "realistic" corrective to idealism, but also an exuberantly gross farcical exaggeration. The (mimed) sexual acts are increasingly performed on stage, before the other characters as well as the audience, blatantly immodest and veering to the scatological: the sapper, unable to afford Raphaële, dunks his penis in her urine in compensation. The customers want only sex, but most cannot pay or cannot perform adequately; the whores embody eager availability and lesbianism. It mocks the establishment (the army and religion) and exposes bourgeois hypocrisy: Mme Beauflanquet, the frustrated wife, yields to Léon and then to Raphaële's lesbian advances; her boring husband is ready to make love to the entire harem. The play is a demystifying jape, but one carried off with verve.

Biography

Born at Château de Miromesnil, commune of Tourville-sur-Arques, Normandy, August 5. Educated at Lycée Napoléon, Paris, 1859–60; as boarder at the Institution ecclésiastique, Yvetot, 1863–68; then at Rouen Lycée 1868–69. Attended Faculté de Droit, Paris 1869–70. Mobilized July 1870 and served in the Supply Corps during the Franco-Prussian War. Civil servant in the Ministry for the Navy and the Colonies 1872–78, then Ministry of Education 1878–82 (on extended leave from 1880). The success of his story "Boule de Suif" in 1880 opened up collaboration with major Parisian newspapers, notably the Gaulois (1880–88) and Gil Blas (1881–91) for both short fiction and journalism; he also published six novels. Already suffering from ill health, Maupassant visited spas in Switzerland and France (1877, 1883, 1888, 1890). Returning frequently to Normandy, he also traveled in mainland France and to the Channel Islands (1879), Corsica (1880), North Africa (1881, 1888, 1890), and England (1886). From 1891 general paralysis affected his mental capacities; after attempting suicide in January 1892 he was interned in Dr Blanche's clinic in Passy. Died of tertiary syphilis, July 6.

MEAKER, MARIJANE (ANN ALDRICH AND VIN PACKER)

PETER COGMAN

Selected Works

- “Ma Source,” “La Femme à barbe,” and “69.” In Nouveau Parnasse satyrique du XIXe siècle, 1881.
“Mars et Vénus,” 1903.
“Désirs de faune,” 1927.
“Eglogue bien amoureuse,” 1939.
A la feuille de rose, maison turque, 1946.

Œuvres poétiques complètes: ‘Des Vers’ et autres poèmes.
Edited by Emmanuel Vincent. Rouen: Université de Rouen, 2001.

Further Reading

- Douchin, Jacques-Louis. La Vie érotique de Maupassant. Paris: Suger, 1986.
Ignotus, Paul. The Paradox of Maupassant. London: University of London Press, 1966.
Lanoux, Armand. Maupassant le bel-ami. Paris: Fayard, 1967.
Leclec, Yvan. Crimes écrits: La littérature en procès au XIXe siècle. Paris: Plon, 1991.
———. “Maupassant, poète naturaliste?” Bulletin Flaubert-Maupassant 9 (2001): 181–93.
Place-Verghnes, Floriane. “Maupassant pornographe.” Neophilologus 85 (2001): 501–17.
Steegmuller, Francis. Maupassant. London: Collins, 1950.
Stivale, Charles J. “Horny Dudes: Guy de Maupassant and the Masculine Feuille de rose.” Esprit Créateur 43 (2003): 57–67.
Vincent, Emmanuel. “‘Des vers’ et autres poèmes de Maupassant.” Bulletin Flaubert-Maupassant 9 (2001): 169–80.

---

MEAKER, MARIJANE (ANN ALDRICH AND VIN PACKER)

---

1927–
American novelist

It was at the Fawcett publishing house, where she worked as a secretary, that Meaker began, in 1952, to write and publish novels under the first of several pseudonyms she has used throughout her career. When asked about the pseudonyms under which she wrote for Fawcett, Meaker said, “Because I couldn’t get an agent, I became my own, using various disguises as my clients” (Lovisi, 18). Although she is now best known for her work writing young adult novels as M.E. Kerr, in the postwar period she wrote a number of very popular mass-market paperbacks for Fawcett as Vin Packer and Ann Aldrich. The Vin Packer novels came primarily under two categories, so-called JD, or juvenile delinquent, novels and novels featuring lesbian characters which are prized by collectors of lesbian pulp fiction. As Ann Aldrich, Meaker wrote both fiction and nonfiction solely on the lesbian theme.

The Vin Packer and Ann Aldrich books were written for Fawcett’s Gold Medal line of paperback originals. The first of these was Spring Fire, a novel about lesbian love published in 1952. Spring Fire was an instant success. This may be partly due to the fact that it was included on the list of books investigated by the House Select Committee on Current Pornographic Materials in 1952. The novel was introduced into the record as evidence of “books [which] extol by their approbatory language accounts of homosexuality, lesbianism and other sexual aberrations” (US Congress, 14). Spring Fire went through five reprintings between 1952 and 1965.

Following the success of Spring Fire Meaker wrote JD and lesbian novels as Vin Packer throughout the 1950s. These two themes came together in 1958 in The Evil Friendship, a novel based on the Australian Parker-Hulme case of 1954, in which two lesbian lovers were tried for murder. Meaker has said that she and her editor often followed cases in the press and then chose to base novels on them (Lovisi). Two Vin Packer novels (Dark Don't Catch Me, 1956, and 3-Day Terror, 1957) were based on interracial sex and the violence it provoked toward black men in the segregated South. The plots were drawn from the case of Emmet Till and other newspaper reports of the period. Dark Don't Catch Me and 3-Day Terror fall into a category of postwar mass-market fiction which exploited the threatening concept of interracial sex in America. It is clear from comments made by the House Committee on Current Pornographic Materials in 1952 that interracial sex was commonly classed as a perversion. As such it was exploited by paperback houses and no doubt consumed, like lesbian pulp, by those seeking to articulate dissident sexualities.

Meaker began writing under the name Ann Aldrich, a pseudonym specifically attached to a lesbian persona, in 1955. The first of the Ann Aldrich paperbacks was We Walk Alone (Through Lesbos' Lonely Groves). This book takes the form of a nonfiction exposé of the imaginary lesbian underworld of the 1950s. Chapter titles include "Who Is She?" "How Did She Get That Way?" "Gay Paris," "Can a Lesbian Be Cured?" and "A Word to Parents." These titles exemplify the complicated pose of being both an agent of voyeuristic pleasure and a socially concerned commentator taken by Aldrich and other writers of lesbian pulp paperbacks. The cover of We Walk Alone contains commentary by one "Dr. Richard Hoffman, world famous psychiatrist," who describes Aldrich as "herself a member of the sisterhood."

Following the success of We Walk Alone, the Aldrich persona was exploited in four other titles between 1955 and 1963. The most notable of these is Carol in a Thousand Cities, an edited collection including European and American literature and medical commentary. Selections in Carol include everything from Carol Morgan (Patricia Highsmith)'s contemporary lesbian writing to an essay by Sigmund Freud and extracts from Colette and Guy de Maupassant.

At least five of Meaker's Fawcett Gold Medal titles were published in British editions during the 1960s. Take a Lesbian to Lunch, another Aldrich paperback which might be viewed as part of this period, was not published until 1971.

The novels of Vin Packer and Ann Aldrich are often mentioned in life-history accounts by women who lived as lesbians in the postwar era. Meaker's novels are not often remembered with the fondness attached to the works of Ann Bannon and Valerie Taylor. Rather, Ann Aldrich came to exemplify a self-deprecating tone which lesbians sought to distance themselves from in the wake of the feminist and gay liberation movements. She is most often cited as an example of the repression under which lesbian sexuality formed itself in the 1950s and 60s. In her essay "Cruising the Libraries," Lee Lynch mentions The Evil Friendship and Take a Lesbian to Lunch, describing the characters as "more miserable than Sartre's, and despised as well" (Lynch, 40). Despite this later view of Aldrich as a negative role model, it is clear that many lesbians, including lesbian writers, formed their own ideas and aspirations through the process of reading her novels. Their bold and sensational treatments and massive distribution through Fawcett made them a ready vehicle for lesbian identification, whether women worked with or against their objectifying tone.

Into the 21st century, Marijane Meaker is well known as the writer of young adult novels and teacher of writing M.E. Kerr. Her young adult titles often continue her lifelong preoccupation with sexuality and sexual identity.

Biography

Marijane Meaker was born in Auburn, New York, May 27. She was raised in upstate New York and attended Stuart Hall boarding school in Virginia from 1943, then attended the University of Missouri from 1946 to 1949 as an English literature major. She moved to New York City in 1949 and sold her first story to Ladies' Home Journal in 1951. She worked for some time as a journalist and then as a secretary at the Fawcett publishing house.

MEREDITH MILLER

Selected Works

(All Greenwich, CT: Fawcett)

MECHAIN, GWERFUL

As Vin Packer

Spring Fire, 1952.
Look Back to Love, 1953.
Come Destroy Me, 1954.
Dark Don't Catch Me, 1956.
3-Day Terror, 1957.
The Evil Friendship, 1958.
The Twisted Ones, 1959.
Something in the Shadows, 1961.

As Ann Aldrich

We Walk Alone (Through Lesbos' Lonely Groves), 1955.
We, Too, Must Love, 1958.
Alone at Night, 1963.
We Two Won't Last, 1963.
Editor. Carol in A Thousand Cities, 1960.

Further Reading

Danielson, Audrey Marie. "Interview with M.E. Kerr." At <http://www.teenreads.com/authors/au-kerr-me.asp>. Retrieved March 15, 2006.
Lovisi, Gary. "An Interview with Marijane Meaker, the Woman Behind Vin Packer and Ann Aldrich." Paperback Parade 47 (1997).
Lynch, Lee. "Cruising the Libraries." In Lesbian Texts and Contexts: Radical Revisions, edited by Karla Jay and Joanne Glasgow. London: Onlywomen Press, 1992.
M.E. Kerr website, at <http://www.mekerr.com>
U.S. Congress. House. Select Committee on Current Pornographic Materials (Senator E.C. Gathings, chairman), 82nd Cong., 2nd session, pursuant to House Resolution 596. Washington: United States Government Printing Office, 1952. Commonly referred to as the Gathings Report.

---

MECHAIN, GWERFUL

---

c. 1462–1500
Medieval Welsh poet

"The Female Genitals"

"The Female Genitals" ("Cywydd y Cedor"; cedor is translatable as "cunt") is an attack on those practitioners of Welsh bardic poetry who readily describe a woman's beauty but fail to make reference to the "clear excellence" of that most important aspect of the female anatomy—the vagina itself. The poem begins with an assault on "Every foolish drunken poet" who has ever "declaimed fruitless praise" upon a woman's hair, face, breasts, arms, and hands. Although the speaker credits these poets with good taste in offering their accolades to the hair ("gown of fine love") or breasts ("lovely shape / the smoothness"), the failure to address adequately a woman's sexuality by avoiding the lower body is seen as an affront to the woman's own desires and needs, a snub to her very womanhood. The condemned male poets and their unsatisfactory verse are dismissed with a speed similar to that with which they disregard the female genitalia. After opening with an outcry against other poets, the speaker continues not by a prolongation of the attack on these bards, but by using the remainder of the poem as an ideal opportunity to offer the praise of the female genitals so distinctly lacking in their work.

The poem explores in graphic detail the nature and desires of womanhood that the speaker sees as symbolized by the vagina. The "middle" which is left "without praise" is both "the place where children are conceived, / and the warm quim, clear excellence, / tender and fat, bright fervent broken circle." These lines associate female sexuality on one level with a purely reproductive purpose but counter this by the elaborate description of the "quim below the smock," which means that the reader is left in no doubt that this part of the body is also perceived to be the seat of desire, pleasure, and delight. Particularly interesting is the way in which the possibility that the sex of the speaker is male (Mechain was a woman) is revealed to us through this description of the female genitals. They are described as the place "where I loved, in perfect health, / the quim below the smock," and from this point in the poem the speaker begins her own process of eulogizing (in stark contrast to her fellow bards) about the beauty and attractiveness of the quim.

The speaker cleverly manipulates the poetic language of the bards in the comparisons she makes between the vagina and the natural world, so that the “cunt there by the swelling arse” is also “a valley longer than a spoon or a hand, / a ditch to hold a penis two hands long.” The genitals later become a “sour grove,” a “very proud forest,” and “a girl’s thick grove” (in the original Welsh, the meaning is subtly ambiguous because llwyn can mean both “grove” and “pubic hair”). But the speaker also falls into the trap of generalizing, to the extent that the object of the speaker’s desire—which seemed at first to be specific (“where I loved”)—becomes merely a “cunt.” The speaker also de-eroticizes the subject of the poem through an ironic reversal of her complaint about other poets. In the other bards’ writing, the speaker feels that there is no emphasis on the genitals themselves; in her own poem, the woman is only the genitals.

The daring of Gwerful Mechain’s inclusion of references to the church is of interest because this emphasizes the God-given naturalness of female sexuality. These references eroticize the female genitals so as to tempt the men of the cloth. The speaker writes that even “the bright saints, men of the church, / when they get the chance ... don’t fail ... to give it a good feel,” and this fact is brought into the poem as a justification for the attack on other poets—if even churchmen cannot resist the female genitals, why should poets hold back their own praise? Indeed, as the poem draws to a close, the speaker declares that it is “for this reason, thorough rebuke / all you proud poets / let songs to the quim circulate / without fail to gain reward.” The poem concludes with a final call for all to praise the female genitals—“lovely bush, God save it.”

The poem’s eroticism resides largely in the speaker’s open assertion of female sexual desire (as displayed in the luxuriant descriptions of the “cunt”) and the subversion of the bardic tradition in descriptions of such lust. Unwilling to fall into line with the traditional poetry of praise, Gwerful Mechain’s frank portrayal of female sexuality in “The Female Genitals” continues to mark her out as one of the more interesting, and still controversial, figures of medieval Welsh poetry.

Biography

Little is known of Gwerful Mechain’s life apart from the fact that she came from Mechain in Powys (mid-Wales). As a poet she was active in the late fifteenth century (ca.1480–1500), and a relatively large amount of her work survives. Most famous for her salacious verse and her erotic poems (such as “The Female Genitals” and “To Jealous Wives,” although her authorship of the first is supposed rather than certain), she also wrote many religious pieces and one of her best poems concerns the passion of Christ. She has been described by Ceridwen Lloyd-Morgan as “the most important and prolific woman poet of the Middle Ages.”

MARK LLEWELLYN

Further Reading

- Conran, Anthony. “The Lack of the Feminine.” New Welsh Review 17 (Summer 1992): 28–31.
- Johnston, Dafydd, ed. and translator. Canu Maswedd yr Oesoedd Canol / Medieval Welsh Erotic Poetry. Bridgend, Wales: Seren, 1991.
- Lloyd-Morgan, Ceridwen. “Women and Their Poetry in Medieval Wales.” In Women and Literature in Britain, 1150–1500, ed. Carol M. Meale. Cambridge Studies in Medieval Literature 17. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.

---

MELÉNDEZ VALDÉS, JUAN

---

1754–1817

Spanish lawyer and poet

Los besos de amor

Outstanding in Meléndez's poetic output are the pastoral anacreontics which in theme and tone are close to the Besos de amor, a group of 23 erotic poems which remained unpublished in the poet's lifetime. Though not printed until 1894, the Besos must have circulated in manuscript because they were banned by the Inquisition in 1801, being listed in the 1805 Suplemento to the Spanish Index of prohibited books. Described there as anonymous translations of the sixteenth-century, neo-Latin Basia of Joannes Secundus (Jan Nicolaus Everaerts), the researches of John Polt have attributed some of Meléndez's Besos to other neo-Latin authors, while the remainder could well be original.

The eroticism of the Besos de amor, as the title suggests, is principally focused on kissing and the sensual play involved in touching, caressing, and contemplating the loved one. The poems present the thoughts of the unnamed male lover to his female love, who bears various conventional pastoral names: Amarilis, Amarílida, and Filis (all once), Nise (twice), Galatea (four times), and, predominantly, Nisa (twelve times). The tone is refined, with constant use of euphemistic phrases to refer to aspects of the physical relationship. The concentration on the kiss gathers power as the reader advances through the 23 poems. The sensuality seems designed to evoke images of the physicality of kissing but nevertheless achieves erotic intensity because of the cumulative effect of the series of compositions. The poems vary in length from 12 to 95 lines, but most have less than 40. Having examined the vocabulary used by Meléndez, Mario Di Pinto has highlighted the repetition of "dulce" [sweet] and its derivatives, used 45 times. The style of the poems owes much to the anacreontic tradition. Line length is generally short and frequently heptasyllabic, though some poems alternate heptasyllables with hendecasyllables (Odas 12 and 13). The characteristically Spanish light assonantal rhyme is generally preferred, though a few poems have full consonantal rhyme (Odas 12, 13, 21).

The love play is mutual both in its passion and in its emphasis. Oda 3, with antecedents in two poems by Secundus, has Nise as protagonist, initiating the action by kissing her lover and taking him in her arms. Her behavior is termed "lasciva" ("lascivious," perhaps "passionate," used 18 times in all in the collection), and the effect of her kisses leads his hand to caress her "nevado vientre" (snowy stomach). She sighs, moves, speaks haltingly, asks him to stop, but kisses again with a bite, mouthing desire as she moves. Oda 5, which translates an epigram by Muret, is powerfully succinct, centering on eyes and kisses. The passion ascends through three levels resulting from three actions; her look, their kissing, and his being taken to her bed. Yet kisses are at the heart of these poems. Oda 2 evokes the first kiss the implied author gave Nise. Oda 6 climaxes with the combination of Nisa caressing her lover's neck while she kisses him lasciviously, gazing at him and smiling. In Oda 11 the lover wants to kiss Nisa's eyes and hair, and when his flesh is pierced by her nails he kisses her more and tightly embraces her body. Oda 14 extends his kisses over Nisa's cheeks, eyes, lips, neck, and breasts.

Kisses are counted as part of the lovers' ritual in Odas 8, 11, 16, and 21. Oda 20, with antecedents in two Basia by Secundus, concerns "besos lascivos" [passionate kisses], compared to the sweetness of honey and the pecking of doves, hovering between sensuality and eroticism. Her trembling tongue and sighing lips in the closing lines make his soul wither (fallece, literally "die") with delight. Oda 18, a mere 24 lines, is one of the most intensely erotic compositions in the group. It seems to contain a wish rather than recount a concrete occasion. The poet imagines Filis regaling him with kisses, caresses, and love on her soft bed. She entwines herself around his neck with their mouths joined; her eyes respond as his hand seeks her body and she gives off a gentle murmur, and as passion takes hold she gently sighs. In the final two quatrains her sighing animates him as her tongue bites him; her arms enfold him and her desire increases his urgency; the climax comes, not like death (“muerte”), but transmitting life.

The other poem expressing heightened passion is Oda 13, an erotic fantasy in which the poet dreams of Amarílida. Though comparisons have been made with works by Bonnefons and Propertius, it appears to be an original composition by Meléndez and is ambitious in its length, which contrasts with the surrounding texts of the collection. It is more overtly rhetorical in its reiterated exclamations of wonder and joy which initially look back to the previous night of passion, but then recount a dream the previous day. In some respects it is a summation of most of the elements which appear less comprehensively in other poems; its greater extension allows this fullness, though with its mixture of seven and eleven syllable lines, in strict rhyme, it is less light and concise, less given to suggestion and more to explanation. The first scene of the dream is his gazing at her body, contemplating her arms, her breasts, her waist, before expressing his wish to enjoy her beauty. The poem may be entirely original, revealing Meléndez’s mastery of this poetic subgenre.

Biography

Born in Extremadura at Ribera del Fresno on March 11. Meléndez studied law and humanities at Salamanca University, where he taught briefly before entering government service as a lawyer in the provincial capitals of Zaragoza and Valladolid, and later Madrid. An active liberal intellectual, he was memorably painted by Goya, but his principal claim to fame is a substantial body of poetry. His compositions are predominantly philosophical, including a significant reworking of Alexander Pope’s “Essay on Man,” as well as more socially committed political satires, praise of enlightened figures, and nature poems. He died in Montpellier, France, on May 24.

PHILIP DEACON

Editions

“Los besos de amor. Odas inéditas de D. Juan Meléndez Valdés.” Edited by Raymond Foulché-Delbosc. Revue Hispanique 1 (1894): 166–95.

“Los besos de amor.” In Obras en verso, edited by John H.R. Polt and Jorge Demerson, 293–310. Oviedo: Cátedra Feijoo, 1981.

Los besos de amor. Edited by Mario Di Pinto. Naples: Liguori, 1999. Spanish text with accompanying Italian translation.

Further Reading

Cerezo, José Antonio. “Meléndez, Valdés.” In Literatura erótica en España: Repertorio de obras 1519–1936. Madrid: Ollero y Ramos, 2001.

Di Pinto, Mario, “L’osceno borghese (Note sulla letteratura erotica spagnola nel Settecento).” In Codici della trasgressività in area ispanica. Atti del Convegno di Verona 12–13–14 giugno 1980, 177–92. Verona: Istituto de Lingue e Letterature Straniere, 1980.

García Montero, Luis. “Juan Meléndez Valdés y el optimismo de los cuerpos.” In El sexto día. Historia íntima de la poesía española, 127–47. Madrid: Debate, 2000.

Gies, David T. “Sobre el erotismo rococó en la poesía del siglo XVIII español.” In Luz vital. Estudios de cultura hispánica en memoria de Victor Ouimette, edited by Ramón F. Llorens and Jesús Pérez Magallón, 85–95. Alicante: McGill University–Caja de Ahorros del Mediterráneo, 1999.

Haidt, Rebecca. Embodying Enlightenment: Knowing the Body in Eighteenth-Century Spanish Literature and Culture. New York: St Martin’s Press, 1998.

Moreno, J.I. “Notas sobre la poesía del siglo XVIII a propósito de los Besos de Amor.” In Estudios sobre literatura y arte dedicados a Emilio Orozco Díaz. Vol. 2, 463–71. Granada: Universidad de Granada, 1979.

Polt, J.H.R. “Juan Meléndez Valdés’s translations from the Latin.” Dieciocho 16 (1993): 119–29.

Real Ramos, César. “Meléndez Valdés, poète de l’érotisme.” In Éros volubile. Les Métamorphoses de l’amour du Moyen Âge aux Lumières, edited by Dolores Jiménez and Jean-Christophe Abramovici, 254–66. Paris: Desjonquères, 2000.

---

MELTZER, DAVID

---

1937–

American novelist and poet

David Meltzer's The Agency Trilogy is an outstanding example of how poets influenced erotic writing in the 20th century. In these three novels—The Agency, The Agent, and How Many Blocks in the Pile?—Meltzer conveys his poetic vision in a spare, allusive style, using techniques and elements of science fiction. Meltzer's metaphor for the way we conduct our sex lives is extended according to emotional logic. His trilogy was first published as separate volumes by Essex House in California in 1968, and appeared together in a second edition from Richard Kasak Books in 1994.

The Agency in the novel by that name is a well-organized, self-sufficient sexual underground. In The Agency a young man is picked up by sexual agents and spends the rest of the novel being indoctrinated with The Agency's tyrannical precepts. Brainwashed, he becomes an agent himself, ready to propagate the fantasy of The Agency. In The Agent the satirical possibilities implied in The Agency are applied more broadly. Meltzer's deliberately ambiguous portrayal of two agents who may or may not be working for the same agency is often reminiscent of scenes from the movie Dr. Strangelove. But his employment of multiple first-person narrative, voices sliding in and out of focus, confirms that his intention is to address his theme of power and sex in the indirect, allusive manner of poetry.

How Many Blocks in the Pile? only hints at the existence of The Agency. In the concluding volume of his trilogy, Meltzer creates an exaggerated portrait of its customers, a married couple who respond to sexual advertisements. The Agency, according to Meltzer is "both cause and effect of dehumanized sex and its relationship to American society."

The poet's notion that erotic writing expresses the secret sexual life of America is abundantly illustrated by The Agency Trilogy, but in his next novel, Orf (1968), he not only plumbs the national psyche on a deeper, mythical level, he achieves a fusion of poetic approach and erotic subject matter that beautifully demonstrates how the lessons and concerns of poetry can influence modern erotic writing. The title character Orf is a rock singer, a contemporary incarnation of the poet Orpheus. Orf's agent Schlink is a repulsive character who exploits singers, but he is not a caricature; he personifies Meltzer's theme of exploitation. The poet allows him his own human meaning—in fact, he is the book's strongest character.

Orf rises to national prominence at a concert in which he is literally ripped to pieces by his "Sacred Harlots." Of course the story of Orf is a retelling of the myth of Orpheus; the rock singer is a closer equivalent to the mythical figure than the modern poet, if only because of the violent nature of the audience's response to him. Meltzer seems to be saying that in America we use sex and dreams (the rock singer creates the background music for our dreams—and nightmares) to affirm the fact of our existence in an exploitative world.

Meltzer followed Orf with his most ambitious project, The Brain-Plant Tetralogy (1969), consisting of Lovely, Healer, Out, and Glue Factory. In classical Greek drama, a tetralogy is a group of four dramatic pieces, either four tragedies or three tragedies and a satire. Meltzer's Brain-Plant novels are not tragedies in the classical sense, but satire is a prominent feature in each of them.

The Tetralogy demands study as a whole, before it is possible to grasp the meaning of any one of the four novels. The complexity of Meltzer's design, his fantastic inventiveness, and his large cast of characters are such that it is best to approach a critical reading with a few guidelines. Meltzer's novels are designed according to the imperatives of poetry, not logical prose fiction; his tone is often satirical, but his novels are not satires; and finally, his theme is the exploitation of people through sex, power, and dreams.

The theme of Star (1970) is once again exploitation; in this case the users are Hollywood studio bosses, and the used are both the movie stars who people celluloid dreams and the audiences to whom they play. Star is after The Martyr (1969), Meltzer's most accessible novel. He seems to know as much about the film world as he does about rock music; his satire is controlled and effective, his characters three-dimensional, and his narrative straightforward. His most recent erotic novel, Under (1994), is a return to his signature themes.

Meltzer proves in his eleven erotic novels that he was correct to call them "fierce moral tracts." Although his work is crowded with vividly erotic scenes, their effect is more often frightening than arousing. In novels written like poems, eroticism is the physical exploitation of one person by another and is assaultive and outrageous, never loving or tender, never a path to transcendence. In a sense, his erotic work is an indictment of sexuality, challenging and chilling.

Biography

Born in Rochester, New York. He graduated from Los Angeles City College in 1955 and studied at the University of California, Los Angeles, 1955–56. His first book, Poems, was published in 1957. His selected poems, Arrows, appeared in 1993. He has written eleven erotic novels, criticism, and a biography of the artist Wallace Berman, and edited many anthologies and magazines. He teaches at the New College of California in San Francisco.

MICHAEL PERKINS

Selected Works

The Agency. 1968.
The Agent. 1968.
How Many Blocks in the Pile?
Orf. 1968.
The Martyr. 1969.
Lovely. 1969.
Healer. 1969.
Out. 1969.
Glue Factory. 1969.
Under. 1994.

---

MÉMOIRES DU BARON JACQUES, LES

---

Les mémoires du Baron Jacques is a novel told as a first-person account of the life of a rich, young aristocrat, written by Alphonse Gallais under the pseudonym "A. S. Lagail" sometime in the first ten to fifteen years of the 20th century. In October 1913, the book was banned for immorality by a Parisian court. It begins when the four-year-old Jacques is introduced to oral sex by his widowed mother. The sexual initiation lasts until Jacques turns ten and his mother dies while making love with her son. After five years of mourning, Jacques moves from his castle in Tours to Paris, where he settles in a stately mansion. Part diary, part poetry, part apocryphal autobiography, the bulk of the book relates Jacques's sexual exploits during his adult life.

Jacques vows never to have intercourse with women, creatures he accuses of being physically ugly and prone to venereal diseases and declares his passion for men and sodomy (the only notable female character is a lesbian who betrays one of Jacques's male partners). His mother stands out as the one exception to this blanket misogyny. Jacques even recovers her bones so that he can use them for masturbation and foreplay.

Sadism and necrophilia are another major theme. Aside from his posthumous relation with his mother, Jacques regularly has sex with dead, or dying, children, adults, and animals. In one episode, a twelve year old suffocates as he performs oral sex on Jacques. Other children are sacrificed during weekly black masses Jacques organizes for his friends. In one such orgy, one adult kills himself, after which other participants masturbate themselves with, then eat his body parts. Animals ranging from chickens to dogs and a calf, among others, also figure prominently, as Jacques experiments with new sexual practices. Graphic episodes succeed themselves at a brisk pace, with Jacques and his friends ejaculating up to ten times in a few hours. Their priapic tendencies seem to consume most of their lives, for brief references to Jacques's literary works are the only evidence of nonsexual activities.

The characters' indolence illustrates one last, important subtext of the work: social criticism. Contrary to many other erotic writers, Gallais did not write the work to arouse, but to shock and disgust. Subtitled "the diabolical debaucheries of the decadent aristocracy," Les mémoires du Baron Jacques criticizes the rich for going to the worst extremes, including murder, in their belief that no law has a right to prevent them from satisfying their degenerate cravings. Tipped by one of Jacques's disgruntled servants, the police finally raid one of his orgies, and Jacques dies shortly thereafter in the Parisian prison of Fresnes, "after delicate surgery on his rectum."

The book's parallels with real-life characters, not its style or literary merit, make it noteworthy. Early-twentieth-century readers familiar with Parisian life would have had no problem identifying Baron Jacques d'Adelsward-Fersen as the real-life aristocrat whose sexual depravities Gallais purported to describe in his work. Adelsward, born in 1880, came from a line of Swedish aristocrats who had settled in France during the Revolution and enriched themselves in the steel industry. Spending most of his early life in Paris, Adelsward started a successful literary career as a novelist and a poet. The title of a poem in Les mémoires du Baron Jacques, "Notre-Dame des verges fortes" [Our Lady of the Sturdy Cocks] is a parody of the title of one of Adelsward's novels, Notre-Dame des mers mortes [Our Lady of the Dead Seas] (1902). Several characters in Gallais's book also have their real-life counterpart in Adelsward's circle of friends, including writers Pierre Loti and Jean Lorrain.

As in Gallais's book, one of Adelsward's valets told the police that his employer was holding private parties in which teenage men drawn from neighboring high schools took part. The ensuing trial, involving boys and adults drawn from the highest circles of Parisian society, attracted tremendous popular and media attention, and many surmised that the parties were of the orgiastic, satanic kind described in Gallais's portrayal of the Baron's black masses. Court records are still not available, but it seems that the parties were actually more subdued affairs in which scantily clad young men participated in tableaux vivants inspired by classic antiquity, as Adelsward recited poetry (a homosexual and a pederast, Adelsward may have had sex with these young men as well). Arrested and condemned for public indecency, Adelsward spent six months in jail at Fresnes and was forced to break up his wedding plans with a wealthy aristocratic lady. He unsuccessfully tried to kill himself, then to enroll in the Foreign Legion.

Contrary to the literary Baron, the real Adelsward survived his judicial ordeal and spent the rest of his life in Capri, Naples, and Nice, and traveling around the Mediterranean and Asia. He wrote numerous other novels and poems, sharing his bed with a succession of male lovers and boys. An opium and cocaine addict, he died in Naples on November 5, 1923, of a drug overdose. Roger Peyrefitte later offered a dramatized version of Adelsward's life, more historically accurate than the apocryphal Mémoires du Baron Jacques, in L'Exilé de Capri (1959).

Little is known about the life of Alphonse Gallais. Even his birth and death dates are uncertain. He was a French pornographer of the fin-de-siècle. Also writing under the name "Grimaudin d'Echara," Gallais composed a variety of erotic short stories, novels, and songs, along with songs and essays dealing with radicalism and occult sciences. The author Lagail claims that Les Mémoires du Baron Jacques was first published in 1904 in Priapeville by the "Librairie Galante" publishing house, which may refer to the publisher Jean Fort, in Paris.

PHILIPPE R. GIRARD

Editions

Lagail, A.S. Les mémoires du Baron Jacques: Lubricités infernales de la noblesse décadente. Priapeville [Paris?]: Librairie Galante [Jean Fort?], 1904.

d'Echara Grimaudin. "Les Mémoires du Baron Jacques." In Passions de femmes. Roman vécu de moeurs féminines et autres. Luxures orgiaques et ordurières. Livre III [c. 1913]; as The Memoirs of Baron Jacques: The Diabolical Debaucheries of Our Decadent Aristocracy, translated by Richard West, Vancouver: Ageneios Press, 1988.

"Les Mémoires du Baron Jacques." In Dossier Jacques d'Adelsward-Fersen, edited by Patrick Cardon, 63–95. Lille: Cahiers Gai-Kitsch-Camp, 1991.

Other Selected Works of Alphonse Gallais, A. S. Lagail, and Grimaudin d'Echara

- Mémoires d'une fille de joie*, 1902.
Amours d'Apache: Roman de la basse pègre, 1903.
La confession d'un pot de chambre, 1903.
Les paradis charnels, ou, le divin bréviaire des amants: art de jouir purement des 136 extases de la volupté, 1903.
Le roi s'amuse: tirade de Saint-Vallier... corrigée pour l'usage des écoles chrétiennes, 1903.
Tableau de l'amour charnel, ses extases, ses tares, ses vices, ses démenes, ses turpitudes et ses crimes, 1905.
En voulez-vous du repos hebdomadaire, 1906.
Refus d'obéissance: drame social en un acte, 1908.
Aux camarades de l'internationale ouvrière, 1909.
Les mystères de la magie, 1909 (with Léon Roze).
Les enfers lubriques (sadiques et sataniques). Curiosités, excentricités, et monstruosités passionnelles, 1906.
Le véritable trésor des sciences magiques, 1910. (with Léon Roze).
Plaisirs fangeux, 1911.
Cochons d'hommes, 1911.
Cécile Coquerel tailleuse de plumes, 1911.
Orgies à bord d'un yacht, 1911.
Un bordel modern-style, 1911.
Scènes lubriques, 1911.
Les Messalines modernes, 1912.
Blasées en rut, 1912.
Ces dames s'amusent, 1912.
Sadisme sanglant, 1912.
Les mystères de Vermenton ou l'Apache-ivrogne et Sainte-Vipère, 1931.
La muse vermontaise, 1931.
J'attends les soirets! 1934.

Selected Works of Jacques D'Adelsward-Fersen

- Conte d'amour*, 1898.
Chansons légères, 1900.
Poèmes de l'enfance, chansons légères, 1901.
Ebauches et débauches, 1901.
L'Hymnaire d'Adonis, 1902.
Notre-Dame des Mers Mortes, 1902.
Les Cortèges qui sont passés, 1903.
L'Amour enseveli, 1904.
Lord Lyllian. Messes noires, 1905.
Le danseur aux caresses, 1906.
Une jeunesse, 1906.
Le poison dans les fleurs, 1906.
Ainsi chantait Marsyas, 1907.
Le baiser de Narcisse, 1907.
Et le feu s'éteignit sur la mer, 1910.
Akademos, revue d'art libre et de critique, 1910.
Le sourire aux yeux fermés, 1912.
Paradinya, 1913.
Hei Hsiang, le parfum noir, 1921.
La neuvaine du petit faune (unfinished).

Further Reading

- Cardon, Patrick, ed. Dossier Jacques d'Adelsward-Fersen. Lille: Cahiers Gai-Kitsch-Camp, 1991.
 Lorrain, Jean. Pelléastres: Le Poison de la littérature. Paris: A. Méricant, 1910.
 Ogrinc, Will H.L. "A Shrine to Love and Sorrow: Jacques d'Adelsward-Fersen (1880–1923)." Paidika, The Journal of Pedophilia 3 (1994): 30–58.
 Peyrefitte, Roger. L'Exilé de Capri. Edition définitive [1959]. Paris: Flammarion, 1974.

---

MENDÈS, CATULLE

---

1841–1909

French novelist and short story writer

Catulle Mendès made his first mark on the Parisian literary scene by means of two reviews which he founded in the 1860s and which served as a link between the Romantic and Symbolist generations: La Revue fantaisiste (1861) and Le Parnasse contemporain (1866, 1871, 1876). In addition to his work as a poet, editor, and critic, the versatile Mendès also enjoyed subsequent success as a prolific author of novels and short story collections, many of which might be described as semi-erotic in intention. These will provide the main focus for the present article. Although academic commentators, perhaps unjustly, have tended to dismiss these later works as trivial and superficial, Mendès must be seen as one of the key architects of fin-de-siècle decadence. He also enjoyed some success as a playwright and librettist.

Mendès's first collection of short stories—Histoires d'amour (1868)—set the tone for what would follow. The longest story in the book is a dramatic study of precocious adolescent sexuality caused by prolonged illness; another concerns an adroit scheme hatched by an aging society belle to win a younger lover; while a third features a young dandy who attracts a string of mistresses by affecting such a sense of ennui that it is feared he is constantly on the point of self-destruction. Although Mendès would further refine the writing style, the majority of his short fiction might broadly be seen as the modern (i.e., post-1871) embodiment of the long French tradition of gauloiserie. In essence, these are light-hearted stories of sexual misunderstandings and accounts of the clever strategies employed by more experienced lovers to overcome the resistance of the naive or inhibited. In all, Mendès would pen nearly fifty such collections, their very titles clearly signposting the curious blend of elegant sophistication (note the references to bathing or dressing, makeup, and fashion) and decadent symbolism (note the references to religious practices or institutions together with the occasional suggestion of sexual aberration) in which their greatest appeal resides: Monstres parisiens (1883), Jupe courte (1884), Le boudoir de verre (1884), Pour lire au bain (1884), Pour lire au couvent (1887), Robe montante (1887), Le confessional (1890), La messe rose (1892), Arc-en-ciel et sourcils rouges (1897), etc.

The sheer number of titles in this vein issued by Mendès (who was by no means the only author of such works) would tend to suggest that, as in America slightly later, leisure time in France was becoming increasingly bound up with the erotic. This is especially true of those wealthy enough to buy books such as Mendès's Les îles d'amour (1886) and Lila et Colette (1885). The former consists of twelve short texts, each accompanied by an engraving, and was published in a luxurious edition of 1,040 numbered copies; the latter, which contains ten short stories, in addition to its sumptuous design, has a cover illustration which was hand-painted. Though many collections were more modest in appearance, there is no doubt that these works were aimed mainly at the carriage trade.

Perhaps the most amusing story ("L'Expérience") to be found in Lila et Colette concerns a bet made by the two eponymous heroines (one blonde, the other brunette) with the handsome Valentin. If, after spending the night with one of the women in a darkened room, he can correctly identify his lover, he will have the right to make love to both in broad daylight (if he fails, of course, he will never sleep with either again). Valentin, after having undergone this experiment, is confused as to whether he has spent the night with Lila or Colette, and it is only after he returns from a long walk that he manages to figure out the solution to the problem—they were both in the room at the same time and periodically changed places. By modern standards this may seem somewhat ridiculous, but such risqué little narratives obviously struck a chord with well-heeled purchasers in late-nineteenth-century Paris.

Interestingly, both Les îles d'amour and Lila et Colette were reprinted (in abridged translations) several times in the United States in the 1930s and '40s by publishers known for producing cheap editions of classic literature, including gallantia, for department-store shoppers. Not surprisingly, given the censorship which prevailed in the United States between the world wars, "L'Expérience" was excluded from the various editions of Lila and Colette out of New York.

Generally speaking, Mendès's work as a novelist is more somber and pessimistic compared with his short stories. This is particularly true of the novels discussed by Mario Praz (The Romantic Agony), who, in a telling phrase, describes Mendès as the belated purveyor of the "more succulent morsels from the Baudelarian table," referring to Mendès's Zo'har (1886), La Première maîtresse (1887), and Méphistophéla (1890). The typical focus of these works includes not only incest and lesbianism, but also relationships in which the woman takes the virile role. This is particularly true of La première maîtresse, in which a much older woman seduces a youth hardly out of school, draining his energy (to the point at which he becomes a virtual invalid) by the insistency of her sexual desires. Although some form of vampirism is hinted at, this is presumably intended only as a metaphor for fellatio. Unlike Mendès's shorter fiction, where the tone is mostly polite and urbane, these novels are written in a distinctly overblown and frenzied manner. Similarly Gothic embellishments may be found in other novels by Mendès, such as La vie et la mort d'un clown (1879), which deals with the consequences of a wealthy woman's sexual obsession with a member of the criminal subclasses. One memorable passage concerns a jailer being raped by a lunatic during a thunderstorm—though it should be noted again that what is exceptional about this scene is that it is a woman who takes the virile role.

Mendès himself would seem to have enjoyed an active erotic life. In 1866, he married Judith Gautier, daughter of the Romantic writer Théophile Gautier. The marriage was not a success. Subsequently, he lived with the composer Augusta Holmès (with whom he had two daughters, celebrated by a charming painting by Renoir entitled “Les Filles de Catulle Mendès”), Marguerite Moréno, and Jane Mette. If his shorter fiction is typified by Gallic lightness and wit, his longer fiction explores the dark side of the fin-de-siècle imagination, with its fears of virile women and hereditary insanity. In recent years, various works by Mendès have been reprinted in French (though none of his novels are available in English and there is still no standard biography), and it seems that his writing is slowly receiving more recognition in his native country.

Biography

Catulle Mendès was born in Bordeaux on May 22, of Jewish extraction. He founded the Revue fantaisiste, contributed to the Parnasse contemporain, and wrote many volumes of verse, including Philoméla and La grive des vignes. When he died, his body was discovered in the railway tunnel of Saint Germain. It is thought that he had left Paris by the midnight train the day before and that he'd opened the door in the night, thinking the momentarily stopped train was in the station.

TERRY HALE

Selected Works

- Histoires d'amour*. Paris: Lemerre, 1868.
La vie et la mort d'un clown. 2 vols. Paris: Dentu, 1879.
Monstres parisiens. 2 vols. Paris: Chez tous les libraires, 1883.
Jupe courte. Paris: Havard, 1884.
Le boudoir de verre. Paris: Ollendorff, 1884.
Pour lire au bain. With 154 illustrations by Fernand Besnier. Paris: Dentu, 1884.
Lila et Colette. Illustrations by Gambard et Roy. Paris: Monnier, 1885.
Zo'har. Paris: Charpentier, 1886.
Les îles d'amour. With 6 etchings and 38 original illustrations by G. Fraipont. Paris: Frinze, 1886.
Pour lire au couvent. With 60 illustrations by Lucien Métivet. Paris: Marpon et Flammarion, 1887.
Robe montante. Paris: Piaget, 1887.
La première maîtresse. Paris: Charpentier, 1887.
Méphisphéla. Paris: Dentu, 1890; repr. ed. Jean de Palacio, Paris: Séguier, 1993.
Le confessionnal. Paris: Charpentier, 1890.
La messe rose. Paris: Charpentier, 1892.
Arc-en-ciel et sourcils rouges. Paris: Charpentier, 1897.
Lila and Colette. New York: William Faro, 1931; New York: Golden Hind, 1934.
The Isles of Love. Iliion, New York: Privately printed, 1927.
Lila & Colette and The Isles of Love. With Illustrations by Rahngild and Decorations by Valentin Le Campion. New York: Boar's Head Books, 1949.

Further Reading

- Badesco, Luc. La Génération poétique de 1860. 2 vols. Paris: A.-G. Nizet, 1971.
 Praz, Mario. The Romantic Agony. Translated by Angus Davidson. London and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1970.

---

MESOPOTAMIAN, SUMERIAN, AND AKKADIAN

---

Mesopotamian literary works form but a small percentage of textual sources written on clay tablets in a style known as cuneiform (“wedge shaped”), which was produced by the imprint of a sharp stylus on the damp surface of a tablet. The writing system is composed of word signs, syllabic signs, and vowel signs, all of which can convey different phonetic and/or semantic values. Such multiple readings are the result of using this system to render two distinct languages, Sumerian (not part of any known language groups) and the Semitic Akkadian. The understanding of Sumerian literary texts is hampered by the facts that the writing did not attempt to accurately record all parts of speech and that an oral exegesis most likely accompanied the reading of such compositions in antiquity. Poetic texts and especially erotic passages employ a range of euphemisms and metaphors which are not always obvious to the Western, contemporary scholar. Extant translations of Mesopotamian, especially Sumerian, erotic literature therefore differ widely from one another, with scholars disagreeing fundamentally not only over some minor literary allusion but over the intent and erotic content generally. Akkadian texts are comparatively more straightforward to understand, although badly preserved tablets leave gaps in the texts (see Gilgamesh Epic).

Sumerian Erotic Myths

Most of the available copies of Sumerian erotic literature come from the archives of the ancient city of Nippur, a well-known center of cuneiform learning. They were written in the Old Babylonian period (c. 2000–1600 BCE), although some were composed at an earlier date, most likely the time of the Third Dynasty of Ur (c. 2200–2000 BCE). The understanding of such texts is hampered by the fact that Sumerian does not differentiate gender in either verbs or nouns. There was no discernible ancient category for erotic compositions, and modern commentators have variously grouped them into love songs, bridal songs, courtly love poetry, sacred marriage songs, etc. A number of love songs have the Sumerian subtitle balbal.e, which points to a particular musical accompaniment, but not all of the known balbal.es have erotic contents.

Despite uncertainties as to the categorization of these texts, one can differentiate two major groupings on the basis of the main protagonists and literary form: (1) erotic myths, consisting of narrative texts some several hundred lines long which feature male deities and deal with impregnation and fertilization, and (2) love songs, which, like song in general, are shorter compositions with a refrain and a lack of narrative structure. They deal primarily with a female protagonist (and her bridegroom/lover) and celebrate female sexuality without privileging conception.

The most important sexually active male protagonist in Sumerian literature is the god Enki, a deity whose center of worship was Eridu, in present-day Iraq. He was the god who presided over the “sweet water ocean” (source of groundwater and rivers), the primary supplier of water and fertility in the rainless alluvial plains of southern Mesopotamia. In Sumerian the word for “water” is synonymous with the word for “sperm,” and hence Enki’s sperm is said to have filled the Tigris and Euphrates with their life-giving waters, as described in the myth “Enki and the World Order.” The same theme occurs in the myth known as “Enki and Ninhursaga,” which best exemplifies the genre. Enki presents a city to his bride Ninsikila, who complains that it lacks the most essential commodity, fresh water. In the presence of a goddess called Nintur, the god fills the ditches with semen and “has his phallus glut the reeds with an overflow of sperm.” From this perhaps masturbatory action he proceeds to full intercourse by commanding the goddess Damgalnunna (his official wife in the Sumerian pantheon) to lie down in the marshes. She conceives and gives birth to another goddess after a gestation period of nine days. Then follows a section which is repeated verbatim four times, except for the change of the female deity’s name. The daughter grows up and ventures into the marshes, where Enki hangs out, and, seeing her, he desires her, and promptly possesses the girl. She likewise conceives and gives birth to another daughter, and so on. Eventually the mother-goddess Ninhursaga warns her granddaughters to demand more from the lusty Enki than presents of “cucumbers, apples and grapes” and advises the young Uttu to resist his advances until he improves his rather mechanical lovemaking. So, Enki now strokes Uttu’s thighs and massages her first. Ninhursaga removes Enki’s sperm and uses it to grow eight plants. When Enki sees the grown plants, he is filled with desire to consume them, is cursed for his gluttony by Ninhursaga, and becomes pregnant, which makes him very ill. Ninhursaga places him in her vagina to give birth on his behalf and four gods and four goddesses emerge from her womb, who heal the ailing parts of Enki.

The text abounds with puns and allusions, but the primary references are to Enki’s ever-lustful member as the source of water, and hence fertility, and the locale of the marshes, which have strong erotic connotations in many other Mesopotamian sources, including potency incantations. The impregnation of the girl is equated with her being “watered by the sperm” of the male—in cosmogonic myths, Sky makes love to Earth in order to trigger the differentiation of the universe, depicted as a series of divine generations. The circumstances of the impregnation of the goddess Ninlil by her husband-to-be Enlil in the myth “Enlil and Ninlil” is essentially similar to the scenario described in the “Enki and Ninhursaga” myth but with much attention to the sociocultural restrictions on sexuality. Both gods are described as “young,” and the myth charts the maturation from adolescent and irresponsible lovemaking to social approval as a married couple.

Sumerian Love Poetry

In contrast to these narratives, which focus on impregnation and the fertilizing properties of the phallus, there are compositions which give voice to a uniquely female expression of eroticism. The main protagonist here is the goddess Inanna, whose main cult center was at Uruk (present-day Iraq). Royal inscriptions from the Early Dynastic period (c. 2800–c. 2250 BCE) refer to Inanna’s role as the loving “spouse” of the EN, the holder of the highest office at Uruk. Inanna was the patron of libidinous love in all its manifestations and not a mother-goddess; prayers and hymns, as well as myths and other narratives, emphasize her sex appeal and sexual appetite, as well as her ambition for power. In a syncretistic merging with the Semitic deity Esh-tar, equated with the planet Venus, she also acquired masculine traits, such as a love for battle.

The erotic texts concerning Inanna comprise several scenarios which relate to the different stages of female sexual development. Firstly, they concern the nubile Inanna who rejoices over her breasts and pubic hair as the outward signs of her ability to consummate marriage (e.g., Alster, “Sumerian”: 152). Some texts describe the premarital courtship and trysts between Inanna and her lover, Dumuzi the Shepherd (see Jacobsen: 8–12). She meets the young man in the garden, which becomes a metaphor for her own body: “Into the garden of apple trees he brought joy, for the shepherd the apples in the garden are loaded(?) with attractiveness” (Alster, “Manchester”: 1–7). In most of these texts, Inanna speaks in the first person, describing the caresses of her lover, although other voices, such as those of her female companions, or at times that of the lover, can also be heard. They call each other “brother” and “sister,” and the language abounds with allusions and metaphors, which have been variously interpreted. While some of these texts could be taken as traditional wedding songs, with their references to gifts being brought by the groom and banquets held at the brides’s house—even the exhortatory refrain “plough my vulva, man of my heart”—others are located in a more exclusively cultic context and mention specific amulet stones and the terminology of priestly titles (see Alster, “Sumerian”: 151; Alster, “Manchester”: 23; Jacobsen: 6, 21). It has long been proposed that some form of ritualized sexual performance was linked to rites of increase and fertility (notably Kramer). There are no references as to which personages were involved and where and at what times such rites took place. As a literary topic the sexual union between Inanna (and other city goddesses) and the representative of the urban community or, later, the king of the country, had currency especially during the time of the Third Dynasty of Ur and the Isin/Larsa period (c. 2200–1800 BCE). In a royal hymn for King Shulgi, for instance (who reigned c. 2094–47), Inanna declares that since the king, called Dumuzi in this context, “the one lying down by the holy Inanna,” had laid his “hands on my pure vulva,” she will decree “a good fate” for him (Klein: 153). A similar theme is pursued in the hymns to the Isin ruler Iddin-Dagan (reigned c. 1953–35), where it is stated that Inanna “demands the bed that rejoices the heart,” “the bed that makes embrace delicious” (Kramer: 501, see also Reisman).

Sumerian erotic poetry dwells on female sexual enjoyment and concentrates attention on the vulva. Several texts extol the “sweetness” and the moisture of the vulva. It is compared to “the heavenly barge of the moon,” “a fallow plot in the desert, a field of ducks, full of ducks, well-watered hilly land” (Alster, “Two Sumerian”: 21), “sweet like beer” (Alster, “Sumerian”: 134), as well as a garden, where lettuce grows (Alster, “Two Sumerian”: 21). Possible metaphors for the clitoris include “barley-corn,” “a fruit-tree bearing fruit at the top,” “the dubdub-bird in its hole,” and the “holy pin”; see Leick: 119–23, 129). Lovemaking (“that which is honey-sweet”) takes place on “the honey-flowing bed” (Alster, “Two Sumerian”: 22), the male lover is told to “squeeze it there for me,” to “pound and pound it in there for me! as (one would) flour into the old dry measuring cup” (ibid.). The lover, referred to as the “honey-man,” does “sweet things” and “waters the lettuce” (Jacobsen: 94); he is equated with sensations he brings, his limbs “are honey,” and they “make honey flow,” as the woman enjoys his “sweet sex appeal,” a rather unsatisfactory translation for the complex notion of the Sumerian word hi.li, which also means “voluptuousness, attractiveness, libido.” The tone of such poems or songs is languorous and seductive, the voice of an experienced woman or courtesan who seeks her pleasure on a perfumed bed. Some poems set in dialogue form have proved particularly difficult to interpret because of the richly allusive language and ambiguity of grammatical gender (see Jacobsen: 97 and Alster, “Sumerian”: 3, as well as the discussion in Leick: 126–28 and 153–56).

Akkadian Erotic Literature

The smaller number of Akkadian erotic compositions compared with the Sumerian is likely to have been due to the vagaries of survival of sources; according to a library tablet, 400 titles of songs in Sumerian and Akkadian were recorded, which included such titles as “I smile at the lusty shepherd,” “I’ll let you stay the night, young man,” and “Tonight, this evening,” but only one of these has so far been recovered (Black). There are Babylonian hymns to Ishtar which largely echo the Sumerian epithets for Inanna (“She of joy, clothed with love,” “adorned with seduction, grace, and sex appeal”; Thureau-Dangin). One poem from the Old Babylonian period is equally influenced by Sumerian examples:

In your delicious lap, the one for lovemaking, your passion is sweet, growing luxuriantly is your “fruit.” My bed of incense is ballukku perfumed. Oh by the crown of our heads, the rings of our ears, the hills of our shoulders, the voluptuousness of our breast, the bracelet of our wrists, the belt of our waist, reach out (and) with your left hand touch our vulva, fondle our breasts, enter, I have opened (my) thighs. (Goodnick-Westenholz)

An apparently new genre are love dialogues between divine couples such as Nabu and his wife Tashmetum, which were probably sung to the statues of the gods during the daily(?) rituals in their temple (Livingstone: 35f). The language of these songs is less earthy and more metaphorical than in the poem quoted above, and abounds with descriptions of jewelry and ornaments; the divine pair are said to delight in each other in “the garden,” and there are allusions to “twittering birds” and the “plucking of fruit.” The most direct references to sexual activity can be found in the Babylonian potency and love-magic texts, although they cannot be counted as literature in the strict sense (see Biggs). However, there was no such distinction in antiquity, and there are frequent crossovers between omen literature, incantations, spells, and cultic songs with what we perceive as “secular” literature (for the sexual omen texts, see Guinan). The treatment for impotence, diagnosed as the “hand of Ishtar,” consisted of a ritual which included spells with graphic descriptions of animals copulating. In severe cases one could tie a she-goat in heat to a bed and have her mounted by a billy.

Other passages recall hymns to Ishtar and her libidinous powers. Love spells for women wanting to seduce particular men and eliminate a rival also include references to sexuality in animals (“the dog is lying down, the boar is lying down. You, lie down again and again on my thighs”; see Scurlock: 108). Such texts address the psychologically distressing aspects of erotic passion: insecurities about male performance and (female) jealousy. They deal with slander and gossip and doubts about a lover’s faithfulness:

... ([S]o that) she may not love you, may Ishtar, the queen, strike [her] with blindness; may she, like me, be afflicted with sleeplessness; may she be weary, [and toss around] all night. ... I shall attain victory ... over my gossiping women, and I shall [return] happily to my lover. (Held).

A late Babylonian text deals with female rivalry and jealousy as affecting the great god Marduk, his wife Sarpanitum, and his “slippery girl” Ishtar. The injured wife hurls abuse at her rival, who she says “was preferred to me, so I hear, to make love with” and infers that her husband’s lover is but “a little thing one can have for money” and casts spells on her: “Into your vulva, in which you set such great store, I shall make a (guard) dog enter and will tie shut the door.” It mentions the “reek of armpits,” exhorts the women of Babylon not “to give her a rag to wipe your vulva, to wipe your vagina” (see Edzard; Lambert). Akkadian myths also include erotic episodes. In “Nergal and Ereshkigal,” the goddess of the Underworld, Ereshkigal, pines for a male companion and manages to seduce Nergal on a rare visit to her realm. Despite being warned by the wise god Ea not to “do what comes naturally to men and women,” Nergal embraces Ereshkigal, who appears before him in a transparent gown (see Dalley: 163–81). The Descent of Ishtar to the Underworld describes the consequences of Ishtar’s (temporary) death as the cessation of all copulation, amongst animals and human beings. Ea’s solution was to create a being of ambiguous gender (a castrato? a transsexual?), who tricks Ereshkigal, mistress of the Underworld, into rendering up the corpse of Ishtar to be revived by the Waters of Life. Ereshkigal curses the transsexual “with the Shining Face” by condemning him to a life of destitution in the “shade of the city walls” (Dalley: 154–64). A similar imprecation is uttered by Enkidu against the prostitute in the Gilgamesh epic.

GWENDOLYN LEICK

Primary Texts (in translation)

- Alster, Bendt. “Enki and Ninhursag.” Ugarit Forschungen 10 (1978): 15–27.
- . “Sumerian Love Songs.” Revue d’Assyriologie 79 (1985): 152.
- . “The Manchester Tammuz.” Acta Sumerologica 14 (1992): 1–7.
- . “Two Sumerian Short Tales and a Love Song Reconsidered.” Zeitschrift für Assyriologie 82 (1993): 186–201.
- Attinger, Pierre. “Enki et Ninhursaga.” Zeitschrift für Assyriologie 74 (1985): 1–52.
- Biggs, Ronald D. S.A.ZI.GA: Ancient Mesopotamian Potency Incantations. Locust Valley, NY: Augustin, 1967.
- Dalley, Stephanie. Myths from Mesopotamia: Creation, The Flood, Gilgamesh, and Others. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Edzard, Dietz Otto. “Zur Ritualtafel der sogenannten ‘Love Lyrics.’” In Language, Literature and History: Philological Studies Presented to Erica Reiner, edited by Francesca Rochberg-Halton, 57–70. New Haven, CT: American Oriental Society, 1987.
- Foster, Benjamin. From Distant Days: Myths, Tales and Poetry of Ancient Mesopotamia. Bethesda, MD: CDL [California Digital Library] Press, 1995.
- . Before the Muses: An Anthology of Akkadian Literature. 2 vols. Bethesda, MD: CDL Press, 1996.
- George, Andrew. The Epic of Gilgamesh. Harmondsworth: Penguin Classics, 2003.
- Goodnick-Westenholz, Joan. “A Forgotten Love Song.” In Rochberg-Halton, Language, Literature, and History, 415–25.
- Held, Moshe. “A Faithful Lover in Old Babylonian Dialogue.” Journal of Cuneiform Studies 1 (1961): 1–26; 2 (1962): 37–39.
- Jacobsen, Thorkild. Harpes That Once ... : Sumerian Poetry in Translation. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1987.
- Klein, Jacob. Three Sulgi Hymns. Ramat-Gan, Israel: Bar-Ilan University Press, 1981.
- Kramer, Samuel Noah. “The Sumerian Sacred Marriage Texts.” Proceedings of the Society of Biblical Archaeology 107 (1963): 485–525.
- Kramer, Samuel Noah, and John Maier. Myths of Enki, the Crafty God. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Livingstone, Alasdair. Court Poetry and Literary Miscellanea. Helsinki: Helsinki University Press, 1989.
- Reisman, Daniel D. “Iddin-Dagan’s Sacred Marriage Hymn.” Journal of Cuneiform Studies 25 (1973): 189–202.
- Scurlock, J.A. “Was There a ‘Love Hungry’ Entu Priestess Named Etirtum?” Archiv für Orientalforschung 36/7 (1989–90): 107–12.
- Sefati, Yitschak. Love Songs in Sumerian Literature: Critical Edition of the Dumuzi-Inanna Songs. Ramat-Gan: Bar-Ilan University Press, 1998.
- Thureau-Dangin, François. “Un Hymne à Ishtar.” Revue d’Assyriologie 22 (1925): 169–77.

Further Reading

- Black, Jeremy. “Babylonian Ballads: A New Genre.” Journal of the American Oriental Society 103 (1983): 25–34.
- Cooper, Jerrold S. “Sacred Marriage and Popular Cult in Early Mesopotamia.” In Official Cult and Popular Religion in the Ancient Near East: Papers of the First Colloquium on the Ancient Near East, edited by Eiko Matsushima [n.p.] (Winter 1993): 81–96.
- Guinan, Ann K. “Auguries of Hegemony: The Sex Omens of Mesopotamia.” Gender and History 9 (1997): 462–79.
- Lambert, Wilfred G. “The Problem of the Love Lyrics.” In Unity and Diversity, edited by Hans Goedicke and J.M.Roberts, 104–6. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1975.
- Leick, Gwendolyn. Sex and Eroticism in Mesopotamian Literature. London and New York: Routledge 1994.

---

METAMORPHOSIS

---

The erotic possibilities of metamorphosis—the change from one physical shape or state to another—have fascinated authors from the earliest times. Ancient stories of metamorphosis stem from the belief that borders between the divine, human, and animal worlds are permeable and fluid. Classical writers, most notably Ovid in his Metamorphoses (c. 2 CE) used this idea to examine the relationship between eroticism and marginal states of being, with changing bodies as metaphors for culturally specific desires and fantasies. Christianity's new sexual ideologies brought different literary inflections to metamorphosis. Following the New Testament story of Christ's temptation (Matthew 4:2–3), early Christian and medieval saints' lives are full of eroticized battles between celibate saints and shape-shifting devils who take on various seductive forms to lure the saints into sexual transgression. These human–demon metamorphoses fed into a rich suite of oral literature, from folktales such as The Frog Prince and Beauty and the Beast to (it might be argued) the stories of erotic shape-shifting preserved in the confessions of women accused of witchcraft. In due course Gothic fiction, with its fascination for boundaries and the links between the supernatural and the erotic, was drawn to metamorphosis, especially in Victorian times. R. L. Stevenson's The Strange Case of Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde (1886) and other tales of humans changing into animals or animal–human hybrids express the bestial and archaic desires that are never far below the surface of acculturated man. Sheridan Le Fanu's Carmilla (1869), Oscar Wilde's The Picture of Dorian Grey (1891), and Bram Stoker's Dracula (1897) are all centered on eroticized bodies metamorphosing between death and life. Sexual comedy has always been a part of literary metamorphoses, too. Shakespeare drew on Apuleius' second-century CE Latin novel of human–animal metamorphosis, The Golden Ass, for the love story of Titania and Bottom in A Midsummer Night's Dream (c. 1595). In the twentieth century, feminist authors in the postmodern

Gothic and magic realist genres reworked metamorphosis stories to interrogate male sexual fantasies about women humorously and ironically.

Myth cycles and hymn cycles preserve the oldest erotic fantasies of metamorphosis, usually based on gods moving between human and animal forms. One Egyptian story relates how the goddess Isis changed from human shape into a bird of prey so that she could alight on the phallus of her dead husband Osiris and be impregnated by him. This was a central episode of a cosmogonic myth, even though the image of a bird-goddess hovering over an aroused corpse may now seem deeply uncanny. Ancient Greek literature, the product of a more patriarchal culture, tends to embed metamorphosis in narratives of sexual pursuit and flight. This was a trope of Greek erotic writing in every genre, because fear of rape was believed to make women more sexually attractive. Typically, Greek metamorphosis stories involve gods pursuing human women (or occasionally vice versa) and the pursued changing shape in order to evade being caught and sexually mastered. Perhaps the most familiar is the story of Daphne, who turns into a laurel tree to avoid being raped by Apollo. In other narratives, metamorphosis is a divine punishment for inappropriate sexual conduct and is connected with other powerful erotic fantasies—voyeurism and sadism. All three are central to the myth of Actaeon, who while out hunting saw the virgin goddess Artemis naked. She changed him into a stag and watched as he was torn apart by his own hounds.

In the first century CE, the myths of Daphne and Actaeon were among many others retold by the Latin poet Ovid in his Metamorphoses. Here he drew on the rich pool of Greek mythology to explore the erotic potential of metamorphosis for a sophisticated Roman audience. Many of the metamorphoses Ovid recounts are more sexually aggressive than their Greek originals, since Roman culture relished images of eroticized violence. Stories like that of Tereus and Philomela (Metamorphoses 6.411 ff) have disturbingly misogynistic undertones to modern readers. Tereus abducts Philomela and hides her in a cabin in a forest, where he rapes her and cuts out her tongue so that she can never accuse him. But Philomela takes revenge on Tereus by killing his children and serving them to him at a feast, eventually being changed into a nightingale because she no longer deserves to be human. Ovid cleverly ties together Philomela's brutal forest rape, her awful revenge, and ultimate metamorphosis to explore the idea of the beast in man, with all of its sexual implications.

Translations of the Metamorphoses were among the first printed books—William Caxton produced a prose version as early as 1480—and they provided Western writers with a fertile resource of erotic narratives, metaphors, and images. Shakespeare, for instance, makes a version of the Philomela myth central to the erotic machinery of Titus Andronicus (1594), and the story of Actaeon figures in Twelfth Night (1601). This story particularly appealed to Elizabethan poets and dramatists because it reflected the cultural conceit of the queen's own carefully preserved virginity. But perhaps the story from Ovid most frequently retold in explicitly erotic terms is that of Pygmalion (Metamorphoses 10.240ff). Where this differs from other metamorphosis stories is that the change is of physical state rather than physical form, so that there is a transition from inanimate to animate object of desire. According to Ovid, Pygmalion was a sculptor who fell in love with the statue of a beautiful woman he had carved himself. He dressed it up like a mannequin, and watched it obsessively. Eventually Venus took pity on Pygmalion's passion for the statue and made it come to life. This statue-into-woman metamorphosis has been interpreted as a patriarchal sexual fantasy of woman as passive object of male desire. The eroticism of this dynamic underpins the numerous fantasies of male-created female bodies—mummies, marionettes, or automata—that come to life and interact sexually with humans.

One example is Bram Stoker's The Jewel of Seven Stars (1903), a narrative of sexual danger featuring a female mummy revealed by male archaeologists. Angela Carter subverted these conventions in her short story The Loves of Lady Purple (1974), a feminist reworking of Pygmalion. Here Lady Purple, a puppet who performs in a peep show, comes to life, destroys her creator, and becomes a prostitute. Cynthia Ozick's novella Puttermesser and Xanthippe (1982) inflects this basic story differently by introducing the traditional Jewish figure of the golem, a dummy animated by occult knowledge to become the servant of its creator. The heroine, Puttermesser, creates a female golem who helps her become the first woman mayor of New York, but the golem develops into a grotesque parody of the monstrously feminine. Her unleashed sexuality soon wrecks Puttermesser's career.

DOMINIC MONTSERRAT

Further Reading

- Bynum, Caroline Walker. Metamorphosis and Identity. New York: Zone Books, 2001.
- Clarke, Bruce. Allegories of Writing: The Subject of Metamorphosis. Albany, NY: State University of New York Press, 1995.
- Diaz, Nancy Gray. The Radical Self: Metamorphosis to Animal Form in Modern Latin American Literature. Columbia, MO: University of Missouri Press, 1988.
- Forbes-Irving, P.M.C. Metamorphosis in Greek Myth. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1988.
- Gross, Kenneth. The Dream of the Moving Statue. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1993.
- Hofmann, Michael, ed. After Ovid: New Metamorphoses. New York: Farrar, Strauss & Giroux, 1995.
- Hughes, Ted. Tales from Ovid. London: Faber & Faber, 1997.
- Montserrat, Dominic, ed. Changing Bodies, Changing Meanings: Studies on the Human Body in Antiquity. London: Routledge, 1998.
- Rousselle, Aline. Porneia: On Desire and the Body in Antiquity. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1988.
- Stoneman, Richard. Daphne into Laurel: Translations of Classical Poetry from Chaucer to the Present. London: Duckworth, 1982.

MEUSNIER DE QUERLON, ANGE GABRIEL

---

1702–1780

French novelist, critic, journalist, and essayist

La tourière des Carmélites

The Doorkeeper of the Carmelites, serving as a sequel to “P. des C.” [Portier des Chartreux] was anonymously published in 1745 and attributed to Meusnier de Querlon by the Marquis de Paulmy. This novel was intended to be the female answer to the adventures of Saturnin, the famous title character in Le Portier des Chartreux: Histoire de Dom Bougre (bugger), which was a resounding success in 1741.

Like the portier Dom Bugger, Sister Agnès is a doorkeeper (tourière), of a community of the Carmelite order, which she has entered at the age of forty-five. By so doing, she has come full circle, having been born in the convent as a result of a clandestine amour of her mother, the prioress, with one of her numerous lovers. Agnès could not but follow in her mother’s footsteps, multiplying in her turn the adventures, which have made her pregnant several times. Nicknamed “Sainte Nitouche” because of her innocent looks, as a young woman she trained in the school of filles du monde and entered a career of prostitution. On the backdrop of the Parisian demimonde, she experienced all kinds of adventures, from moments of glory to moments of violence to moments of humiliation, having to change her name and residence when the heat was on, finding herself in prison for syphilis, and trying successively lesbian tribadism, Jesuitism, and Jansenism before opening her own house of pleasure. She meets La Duchapt, a Parisian fashion designer who really existed and was well known in the eighteenth century, who tells her her story. The novel thus presents an account of the tribulations of picaresque heroes, whose lives are precarious lives and fates uncertain. The burlesque scenes are lessons of social philosophy.

Anticlerical satire denudes the hypocrisy of priests. The institutions of power all seem to be schools of vice and sources of injustice and humiliation.

Written with less rigor and imagination than P. des C. and less ambitious in claiming a philosophy of pleasure, La Tourière des Carmélites nevertheless ups the ante by showing us Agnès making love with her father, a line Dom Bougre (though “released from prejudice”) had refused to cross when invited to the bed of his mother, sister Monique. The ban on incest was henceforth defeated. Having thus taken up where the Portier had left off inchoately, La Tourière des Carmélites opened the way for the descendants of the Dom Bougre to redress this omission, as in Mémoires de Suzon, D.B., portier des chartreux (1778) and L’Histoire de Marguerite, fille de Suzon, nièce de D.B. (1784). The network expands. The Dom’s sister and niece spread the fine words that libertinism should be a family affair, and who could doubt it?

The Greek Novels

Meusnier de Querlon is known for his work in the genre of French eighteenth-century writing that focused on the courtesan of classical antiquity. The trend began with the historical Les Belles Grecques ou l’histoire des plus fameuses courtisanes de Grèce [Lovely Greek Women, or the History of the Most Famous Greek Courtesans], published by Catherine Bedacier in 1712. Novels then took over in their turn. After the adventures of Boret’s Cythéride (“a gallant history translated from the Greek”) (1743) and of Lycoris (in 1754), and the publication of Godart de Beauchamps’s Hipparchia, histoire galante, traduite du grec, divisée en trois parties (1748) (another “gallant history”), Meusnier de Querlon joined the vogue (which crosses that of the girl novels; see Fougeret de Monbron) and published La courtisane philosophe ou l’apologie du P*** (reprinted as Psaphion ou la courtisane de Smyrne) [Psaphion, or the Courtesan of Smyrna] (1748). The ancient inspiration also nourishes a part of the Impostures innocentes, which in 1761 will gather the collection of light works of Meusnier de Querlon, among which are Cinname, histoire grecque.

In Psaphion ou la courtisane de Smyrne, Cynare, the most famous courtesan of Ionia, takes care of Psaphion's education: singing, dance, language courses taught by a sophist, reading of the "tender poems" of Sappho and of "soft elegies" of Antimachus—nothing is missing for making the young girl a perfect courtesan. The slave Sussion makes her acquainted with the "amorous ecstasy," before Psaphion imposes herself onto the career as the equal of Aspasia. They nickname her, at the age of sixteen, the "Venus of Smyrna." The story tells of the encounters, debauchery, orgiastic parties, and the successive lovers (vigorous older, dissipated young people) enjoyed by Psaphion, whose main merit is that she knows how "to spiritualize pleasures."

The tale of Cinname is that of a competition between the painter Pausanias and the sculptor Charès: whoever makes the most beautiful image will take away the most beautiful girl of Athens. Charès plans to sculpt the likeness of the fair Cinname. He bribes one of her servants so that while he looks at Cinname behind a divider during her bath, the servant should make her mistress strike the most voluptuous of postures. Apprised of the hidden beauties of his model, Charès takes away the palm leaf before being assassinated. Cinname stays a widow and pure at the end of the story.

In a language loaded with gallant phrases, Meusnier de Querlon re-creates a world devoted to pleasure but crowned by Aphrodite's flowers. Erudition and eroticism meet to extol an image of voluptuosity "à l'antique," as opposed to the brutal and cynical energy of the obscene novels. Charles Nodier will thus evoke the effeteness and mannered graces of Meusnier de Querlon, who was a giant to those who would celebrate Greek voluptuousness after him, as, for instance, Pierre Louis would do.

Designating his story an "erotic fragment" (relative to amour, in the context of Greek literature), Meusnier de Querlon anticipates the familiar meaning that the word "eroticism" will take (in opposition to "pornography") in the second half of the twentieth century.

Biography

Born in Nantes, Meusnier de Querlon was a lawyer in Paris in 1723. Recognized for his erudition, he was attached to the guard of the manuscripts of the Royal Library, whose erudite editions he multiplied as a translator of Greek and Latin. He was also active in early journalism, working with several newspapers, most notably the Affiches de province. Devoid of livelihood toward the end of his life, he was given charge of the library of the financier Nicolas Beaujon as a means of support.

PATRICK WALD LASOWSKI

Editions

La tourière des Carmélites, servant de pendant au "P. des C." Constantinople: The mufti's printer, 1745.

Sainte Nitouche, ou l'histoire galante de la tourrière [sic] des carmélites: Followed by the history of La Duchapt, published for the first time in full in the author's autograph [sic] manuscript, in order to serve as a sequel to the Portier des Chartreux. London, 1830.

La courtisane philosophe. Cologne, 1748. Reprinted the same year under the title of Psaphion ou la courtisane de Smirne [sic], erotic fragment translated from Greek by Mnaseas on a manuscript of Lord B***, where Les Hommes de Prométhée by Thomson has been attached; London [Paris].

THE MIDNIGHT RAMBLER: OR, THE ADVENTURES OF TWO NOBLE NIGHT-WALKERS

---

Eighteenth-century English novel

The anonymous The Midnight Rambler is a racy tale in the tradition of eighteenth-century libertinism. Related in 26 pages, the book sold inexpensively for sixpence. The omniscient narrator tells the story of two women, Lady Betty and Mrs. Sprightly, who go out on a “midnight ramble” to trace the ribald escapades of their profligate husbands. Their journey is used to describe the happenings of a night on the town and as a device to make comments on contemporary events.

Taking up the gossip of the day, the story concerns characters referred to as “Persons of Rank and Distinction.” Thus the narrator questions, “Who does not know of Dorimant, the Son and Heir apparent of a noble British Peer?” He explains that due to the extravagance of Dorimant’s ancestors, the family estate had been depleted. His father therefore married off his son to a lady of a “very large Fortune” and set them up with an annuity of 2,000 pounds per annum, while procuring him a post with a large salary entailing little work. Already debauched since his early days, Dorimant took off in pursuit of his own pleasures, much to the consternation of his wife, “Lady Betty who, as she had been educated in the strictest Principals of Virtue, could not refrain viewing Dorimant’s dissolute Course of Life, with the utmost Horror and Detestation.” He spent his evenings in riotous mirth and licentiousness about the taverns of the town and was frequently found in the arms of a courtesan from a bagnio (a bathhouse doubling as a brothel, in much the way that modern massage parlors are said to do). His wife strove hard to reclaim him from the bottle and his mistresses, but finding her admonitions in vain, she assumed the indifference of a lady of quality.

After this introduction to the history of the couple, the story itself takes off.

Ned Sprightly, a close friend of Dorimant who lives in the same neighborhood, rarely goes to bed before approach of day and then usually intoxicated with liquor. His wife, the daughter of a country baronet, also takes to the distractions of the metropolis, enjoying the masquerades, balls, assemblies, and town life. Mrs. Sprightly and Lady Betty become friends and combine in a plot to uncover their husband’s nightly rambles, to find out what they are doing and whose company they are keeping. They make plans over a breakfast of a “Dish of Chocolate.” Lady Betty has already ascertained from her drunken husband where they are to go—the Bedford-Arms in Covent Garden Piazza, then on to the Covent Garden playhouse. That night, after fortifying their spirits with a bottle of champagne, the two ladies secretly follow their husbands. They take with them a companion, their milliner, Mrs. Flimm, since she is acquainted with the streets and knows the ways of the town. They spy their husbands in a balcony box with two Town-Misses who frequent the coffeehouses and bagnios. But the night’s rambles take a turn as Dorimant and Sprightly make their way to Temple-Bar tavern, and the three women are unable to pursue them because of the rain and lack of coaches in which to follow. The women become entangled in a fight with four streetwalkers they encounter along the Strand and call the night watchman for help. He is in the pay of the whores, but luckily three gallants who have come out of the Crown and Anchor to investigate the commotion leap to their aid. The ladies dine with these gentlemen, a captain of the Foot Guards and two independent gentlemen of small fortunes, and then go on in pursuit of their husbands accompanied by Mrs. Flimm.

They drive on to Temple-Bar, where they expect to find Dorimant and Sprightly, but an accident with their coach, in which a wheel flies off, means they have to trudge on by foot. On the way home, they come across a constable who mistakes them for streetwalkers. Mrs. Flimm has the forbearance to bribe him so he will take them to his own house where they will be safe. From there, they can send for someone who might vouch for their characters. The constable keeps an alehouse and has a wine license, so they refresh themselves as they wait, while Mrs. Flimm sends for a laceman of her acquaintance, who reprimands the constable for causing the ladies such trouble. Making their way home, the two drunken husbands demand that the coach stop to let them get in. Too drunk to recognize the women, the men fall to kissing them. Not until they arrive home do they discover, to their surprise, that it is their own wives whom they have accosted. The husbands promise to mend their ways.

The tale is written as a “Warning to the Female Sex, not to trust themselves abroad on any Frolicks.” The women’s encounters and adventures are depicted in an atmospheric setting of the town at night, evoking danger, darkness, and difficulties of vision. The moon, rather than street lamps, light their way, highlighting the problems of walking out in the ill-lit alleys and secluded passages of London, which were frequented by robbers and whores.

The four main participants are stock characters—two rakes and their irate wives—who do not have clearly defined individual characteristics. A general sense of confusion is conveyed, as if feeling one’s way through the jumbled events of a drunken evening in the dark streets. The characters are less important than the overall story line, which fits with a genre of tales of nights on the town, with their ensuing escapades.

JULIE PEAKMAN

Edition

Anon. The Midnight Rambler: Or, The Adventures of Two Noble Night-Walkers. London: B. Dickson on Ludgate-Hill, 1754.

---

MILLER, HENRY

---

1891–1980
American novelist

Henry Miller’s improbable journey from college dropout to telegram currier for Western Union to struggling writer to banned novelist with a reputation for pornography to an American icon and Nobel Prize nominee is the stuff of literary legend, the quintessential myth of the ribald Romantic artist having leeches into the twentieth century. That journey was finally the subject matter of his quasi-autobiographical novels, what longtime friend Lawrence Durrell called “a single, endless autobiography.” While Norman Mailer hailed him as the “Grand Speliologist of the Vagina,” Miller saw himself as an advocate of human freedom rather than as champion of the libertine life. His principal preoccupation, like that of all Romantic writers, from Jean-Jacques Rousseau onward, was “the struggle of the human being to emancipate himself, that is, to liberate himself from the prison of his own making.” The heroes he revered were those who did not “impose their authority on man; on the contrary, they sought to destroy authority. Their aim and purpose was to open up life, to make man hungry for life, to exalt life—and to refer all questions back to life” (The Books of My Life, 1952).

The Tropics

While the Tropics were published in Paris in 1934 and 1939, they remained banned as obscene and pornographic in the United States and the United Kingdom until 1964. A breakthrough might have come in 1958 when Miller was elected to membership in the American Institute of Arts and Letters, the citation calling him “the veteran author of many books whose originality and richness of technique are matched by the variety and daring of his subject matter.” That daring was of course his sexual explicitness in an age of puritan repression. Miller’s American publisher, New Directions Press, quickly issued The Henry Miller Reader, edited and with an introduction by Lawrence Durrell. The Reader included nothing that might have tested American censorship laws, however, and Durrell opened his introduction by calling attention to an irony: “It would be invidious to make extravagant claims for the genius of an author the better part of whose best work is unavailable to his countrymen.” Miller would need another champion in the United States to make the Tropics freely available to his countrymen and to launch him into the pantheon of American writers. This champion appeared as neophyte publisher and anti-censorship crusader Barney Rosset of the fledgling Grove Press.

Rosset bought his first copy of Tropic of Cancer from legendary bookseller Frances Steloff of the Gotham Book Mart in New York City shortly after he matriculated at Swarthmore College in 1940. The only edition then available (and that illegally) was the Paris edition published by Jack Kahane’s Obelisk Press. Even Kahane was cautious, however, asking Miller first to write a literary study of D.H. Lawrence to establish his literary legitimacy (finally published as The World of Lawrence: A Passionate Appreciation in 1979). For Rosset the appeal of Miller was political not erotic. “I was so naive,” he noted of his undergraduate reading: “I didn’t even know Tropic of Cancer was banned in this country. ... I loved it. I’ve never felt Tropic of Cancer was at all sexy, but I found it exciting because it was anti-American and anti-conformity. ... I came out of [reading Miller] with a loathing for the United States, and I left school. I read it, and it made that big an impression on me. ... I ran away.” It would take another 21 years before Rosset had the opportunity to share that experience with his and Miller’s countrymen.

While Rosset may not have deemed Miller “at all sexy,” certainly a puritanical America did, since Miller’s work, at its very core, celebrates the human body performing its most private, intimate activities. In the chapter “A Saturday Afternoon” from Black Spring, Miller assaults propriety that denies the honest consideration of the body: “No more peeping through keyholes! No more masturbating in the dark! ... Unscrew the doors from their jambs! I want a world where the vagina is represented by a crude, honest slit. ... I’m sick of looking at cunts tickled up, disguised, deformed, idealized.” Miller’s work is thus foremost an assault on propriety and authority, a rejection of “creeds and principles. I have nothing to do with the creaking machinery of humanity—I belong to the earth.” The earth itself is often represented as a female body in all its glorious eroticism:

The earth is ... a great sprawling female with velvet torso that swells and heaves with ocean billows; she squirms beneath a diadem of sweat and anguish. Naked and sexed she rolls among the clouds in the violet light of the stars. All of her, from her generous breasts to her gleaming thighs, blazes with furious ardor. (Tropic of Cancer)

By April of 1959 Rosset was determined to risk all and publish Miller’s most audacious work in the United States, and he traveled to Big Sur, California, to make his first offer to Miller, a $10,000 advance and an agreement that Grove would assume the cost of all litigation involving the book. The following year he upped the ante, proposing a $10,000 overt payment and $40,000 against royalties. Miller refused a second time, with surprising rationale: “Part of my reluctance to wage open combat with our American authorities arises from the fact that I see no evidence of genuine revolt in the people themselves. We have no real radicals, no body of men who have the desire, the courage and the power to initiate a fundamental change in our outlook or in our way of life.” Miller feared that if he triumphed it would be as “the king of smut.” Rosset had no such reservations, shunning neither “open combat with our American authorities” nor the label “king of smut.” Miller finally acquiesced once he realized that Rosset was capable of just such “genuine revolt.”

The road to publication of Miller’s Tropics was paved on July 21, 1959, by Judge Frederick van Pelt Bryan’s ruling that Lady Chatterley’s Lover was a serious work of literature and not, as Postmaster-General Arthur E. Summerfield had claimed, “smutty filth.” The decision was upheld on March 25, 1960, and the US attorney general decided not to bring the case before the Supreme Court. The Lady Chatterley decision enjoined the US Postal Service “from denying the mails to this book or to the circular announcing its availability.” Thus the Tropics too would be allowed through the mails once they were published. The legal battles over them would be in defense of individual booksellers prosecuted by local district attorneys. Such prosecution as a means of censorship had been established in the United States as early as 1930 when a bookseller in Massachusetts was convicted of selling a “lewd and obscene” book, Theodore Dreiser’s An American Tragedy. To allay the fears of booksellers in 1961, Rosset offered to defend any of them who were prosecuted for selling the books. The result was that Grove fought over 60 separate, local legal cases before the US Supreme Court ruled on June 22, 1964, that the Tropics were entitled to constitutional protection under the first amendment.

Part of the legal strategy that finally succeeded was to establish the literary value of the book by soliciting a critical appraisal from Karl Shapiro. In his introduction, Shapiro compared Tropic of Cancer to James Joyce’s Ulysses (a book itself banned in the United States from 1922 to 1933). Shapiro called Miller’s achievement “miraculous; he is screamingly funny without making fun of sex.” With the publication of the Tropics, Miller’s international reputation would grow for a decade, and for three years (1975–78) he was nominated for the Nobel Prize. Norman Mailer compiled a massive anthology of Miller’s work called Genius and Lust (1976), which was perhaps the anthology that The Henry Miller Reader should have been in 1959. The genius that Durrell could not claim for Miller, Mailer could.

Within the next decade the spirit of the erotic revolution that Miller (and Rosset) championed would face another, more formidable challenge. Despite being among the first writers to recognize and celebrate what he called “female writing” (or what would later come to be called écriture féminine) in the work of Anaïs Nin, whose writing, he noted, “rearranges the world in terms of female honesty,” Miller became a target of rising feminism. The writer who battled Anglo-Saxon Puritanism, who criticized American materialism, who attacked middle-class values, who, in fact, led the sexual and moral revolution we loosely call “the Sixties,” was again under attack, but now from the intellectual and political left, not the moralistic right. The assault was led by Kate Millet, whose Sexual Politics (1969) singled out Sigmund Freud, D. H. Lawrence, Norman Mailer, and Henry Miller as writers who dehumanized and so degraded women. For Millet “Miller’s ideal woman is a whore.” She found the emphasis in the novels not on the erotic, or on intimacy, or on the beauty of the nude body, for instance, but simply on fucking—or on the “disassociated adventures of cunt and prick.” Miller’s writing represented “[t]he complete de-personalization of woman into cunt,” and Miller was a writer “converting the female to a commodity.” Such an analysis has had so profound an effect on Miller’s reputation that when Erica Jong came to write her memoir/biography of Miller, The Devil at Large (1993), she felt it necessary to apologize for his work before celebrating its spirit, “Because of his sexism, his narcissism, his jibes at Jews. ... He treats women horribly and doesn’t seem to care.” She finally recovers from so scathing an initial critique to celebrate the life force of one of America’s most original and revolutionary writers.

Biography

Henry Valentine Miller was born in Brooklyn, New York, on December 26. He grew up the son of a tailor, and much of his formal education served him as negative example. He briefly attended the City University of New York in the fall of 1909, and, as he wrote in It Stands Still Like a Hummingbird (1962), the required reading of Edmund Spenser’s The Faerie Queene turned him toward writing—of a very different sort: “To think that this huge epic is still considered indispensable reading in any college curriculum! ... Let me confess that today it seems even more insane to me than when I was a lad of eighteen. ... What a poor second to Pindar!” Miller went on to become less Pindar than a curious blend of Rabelais and Rimbaud.

In 1917 Miller married Beatrice Sylvas Wickens (a version of whom appears as Maude in Sexus), with whom he had a child, but an affair with his mother-in-law upset the first of what became five failed marriages. He soon left his family to live with June Mansfield Smith, a sometime dancer who encouraged his writing and who appears as Mona-Mara in the Tropics (1934, 1939), Black Spring (1936), and the trilogy The Rosy Crucifixion (1965), which includes

MILLER, HENRY

Sexus (1949), Plexus (1953), and Nexus (1960) and deals with the years before the flight to Paris. In 1922 he had written his first and still unpublished book, Clipped Wings, and by 1930, his life having become little more than a long, rosy crucifixion, a penniless Miller headed to France for what would become a decade-long, picaresque romp. In Paris he needed the support of new friends like Alfred Perlés and the writer Anaïs Nin, who was instrumental in arranging for the publication of Tropic of Cancer with Jack Kahane, for which volume she wrote a laudatory preface. In an essay entitled “Un Etre Etoilique” (written for T. S. Eliot’s magazine, The Criterion, and collected in Max and the White Phagocytes, 1938), Miller returned the favor, placing Nin among the great confessional writers, like St. Augustine and Rousseau—and, by implication, like Miller himself. A portion of those confessions from 1931–2 was excerpted for the best-selling Henry and June: The Unexpurgated Diary of Anaïs Nin (1986; film version directed by Philip Kaufman, 1990). Miller himself treated that period in Quiet Days in Clichy (1956; film versions by Jens Jorgen Thorsen in 1970 and by Claude Chabrol in 1989) and most magnificently in the Tropics diptych, Tropic of Cancer (Paris, 1934; New York, 1961) and Tropic of Capricorn (Paris, 1939; New York, 1961). In the years since, Miller’s principal Paris address, 18 de la Villa Seurat, where much of the Tropics was written, has become a literary shrine.

With the prospect of war in Europe, Miller fled Paris in 1940 for Greece and Corfú at the invitation of Lawrence Durrell. The short stay resulted in The Colossus of Maroussi (1941) and a lifelong interest in Greece. Miller returned to the United States in 1940, traveling cross-country to take up residence in Big Sur, California, where he spent the next 20 years in semi-seclusion, writing, painting, and becoming an American mystic. The cross-country trip resulted in devastating critiques of American culture, The Air-Conditioned Nightmare (1945) and Remember to Remember (1947) in particular. The alternative was the harmony Miller finally found in Big Sur and celebrated in Big Sur and the Oranges of Hieronymous Bosch (1957)—and in his painting, the spirit of which is captured in the titles of two works: To Paint Is to Love Again (1960) and The Paintings of Henry Miller: Paint as You Like and Die Happy (1982). In 1960, after the breakup of his fifth marriage, Miller moved to Pacific Palisades in southern California, where he devoted more time to painting than writing and where he died on June 7.

S.E. GONTARSKI

Selected Works

- Tropic of Cancer*. Paris: Obelisk, 1934; New York: Grove, 1961.
- What Are You Going to Do About Alf?* Paris: Lecram-Servant, 1935; Berkeley: Porter, 1944; London: Turret, 1971.
- Aller Retour New York*. Paris: Obelisk, 1935.
- Black Spring*. Paris: Obelisk, 1936; New York: Grove, 1963.
- Scenario (A Film with Sound)*. Paris: Obelisk, 1937.
- Money and How It Gets That Way*. Paris: Booster, 1938; Berkeley: Porter, 1945.
- Max and the White Phagocytes*. Paris: Obelisk, 1938.
- The Cosmological Eye*. Norfolk, CT: New Directions, 1939.
- Tropic of Capricorn*. Paris: Obelisk, 1939; New York: Grove, 1961.
- The World of Sex*. Chicago: Abrahamson, 1940; New York: Grove 1965.
- The Colossus of Maroussi*. San Francisco: Colt, 1941.
- The Wisdom of the Heart*. Norfolk: New Directions, 1941.
- Sunday After the War*. Norfolk, CT: New Directions, 1944.
- The Air-Conditioned Nightmare*. New York: New Directions, 1945.
- Maurizius Forever*. Waco, TX: Motive, 1946; San Francisco: Colt, 1946.
- Remember to Remember*. New York: New Directions, 1947.
- The Smile at the Foot of the Ladder*. New York: Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, 1948.
- Sexus*. Paris: Obelisk, 1949; New York: Grove, 1965.
- The Books of My Life*. London: Owen, 1952; Norfolk, CT: New Directions, 1952.
- Plexus*. Paris: Correa, 1952 (French); Paris: Olympia, 1953; New York: Grove, 1965.
- Nights of Love and Laughter*. Edited by Kenneth Rexroth. New York: Signet/New American Library, 1955.
- The Time of the Assassins: A Story of Rimbaud*. Norfolk, CT: New Directions, 1956.
- Quiet Days in Clichy*. Paris: Olympia, 1956; New York: Grove, 1965.
- A Devil in Paradise*. New York: Signet/New American Library, 1956.
- Big Sur and the Oranges of Hieronymous Bosch*. New York: New Directions, 1957.
- The Henry Miller Reader*. Edited by Lawrence Durrell. New York: New Directions, 1959.
- The Intimate Henry Miller*. Edited by Lawrence Clark Powell. New York: Signet/New American Library, 1959.
- Reunion in Barcelona*. Northwood, England: The Scorpion Press, 1959.
- Nexus*. Paris: Obelisk, 1960; New York: Grove, 1965.
- To Paint Is to Love Again*. Alhambra, CA: Cambria, 1960.

Stand Still Like Hummingbird. Norfolk, CT: New Directions, 1962.
Just Wild About Harry: A Melo Melo in Seven Scenes. New York: New Directions, 1963.
Henry Miller on Writing. Edited by Thomas H. Moore. New York: New Directions, 1964.
The Rosy Crucifixion: Sexus, Plexus, Nexus. New York: Grove Press, 1965.
Insomnia: Or, the Devil at Large. Albuquerque, NM: Loujon, 1971.
My Life and Times. Chicago: Playboy, 1971.
On Turning Eighty: Journey to an Antique Land: Forward to the "Angel Is My Watermark." Santa Barbara, CA: Capra, 1972.
Reflections on the Death of Mishima. Santa Barbara, CA: Capra, 1972.
First Impressions of Greece. Santa Barbara: Capra, 1973.
Henry Miller's Book of Friends: A Tribute to Friends of Long Ago. Santa Barbara, CA: Capra, 1976.
Genius and Lust. Edited by Norman Mailer. New York: Grove Press, 1976.
Mother, China, and the World Beyond. Santa Barbara, CA: Capra, 1977.
Gliding into the Everglades. Lake Oswego, OR: Lost Pleiade Press, 1977.
My Bike and Other Friends. Santa Barbara: Capra, 1978.
Joey. Santa Barbara, CA: Capra, 1979.
The World of Lawrence: A Passionate Appreciation. Santa Barbara: Capra, 1979; London: John Calder, 1980.
The Paintings of Henry Miller: Paint as You Like and Die Happy. San Francisco, CA: Chronicle Books, 1982.
Opus Pistorum. New York: Grove, 1983.

The Henry Miller Reader. Edited by John Calder. London: John Calder Publishers; New York: Riverrun Press, 1989.
Crazy Cock. New York: Grove Press, 1991.
Moloch: Or This Gentile World. New York: Grove Press, 1992.
Nothing but the Marvelous: Wisdoms of Henry Miller. Edited by Blair Fielding. Santa Barbara: Capra, 1999.

Further Reading

Durrell, Lawrence, and Alfred Perlès. Art and Outrage: A Correspondence about Henry Miller (With an Intermission by Henry Miller), 1959.
 Fraenkel, Michael. The Genesis of "Tropic of Cancer," 1946.
 Hargraves, Michael. Henry Miller Bibliography with Dis-cography, 1980.
 Hutchison, E.R. Tropic of Cancer on Trial: A Case History of Censorship, 1968
 Jong, Erica, The Devil at Large, 1993.
 Kersnowski, Frank L., and Alice Hughes, eds. Conversations With Henry Miller, 1994.
 Mailer, Norman. Genius and Lust: A Journey Through the Major Writings of Henry Miller, 1976.
 Martin, Jay. Always Merry and Bright: The Life of Henry Miller, 1978.
 Nin, Anaïs. Henry and June: The Unexpurgated Diary of Anaïs Nin, 1931–1932, 1986.
 Rembar, Charles, Jr. The End of Obscenity: The Trials of "Lady Chatterley," "Trial of Tropic of Cancer," and "Fanny Hill" by the Lawyer Who Defended Them, 1968.

---

MILLET, CATHERINE, AND JACQUES HENRIC

---

1948–
 Contemporary art critic
La vie sexuelle de Catherine M.

Henric, Jacques

1938–
 Essayist and novelist
Légendes de Catherine M.

La Vie sexuelle de Catherine M.

Catherine millet's autobiographical text entitled La vie sexuelle de Catherine M. was first published in 2001 and is now a best seller, translated into more than thirty languages. It received the "Prix Sade," dedicated to freethinking, awarded to a book that surpasses the boundaries of censorship or political and moral oppression. Her husband, Jacques Henric, also published in 2001 an autobiography entitled Légendes de Catherine M., complemented by essays and 50 photographs depicting his wife in the nude.

La vie sexuelle consists of four chapters, written in a simple, refined and oftentimes crude style, and portrays unashamed Millet's sexuality as uninhibited by cultural taboos. It relates, for instance, many group-sex experiences. The first chapter, entitled “Le nombre” [Numbers], begins, not surprisingly, by highlighting the author’s fancy for numbers. During her childhood, the author spent much time partaking in numeric-based activities. Ironically, as an adolescent, in the weeks following the loss of her virginity, seeing no moral conflict, Catherine M. starts a long series of sexual encounters with multiple partners. Millet specifies that at present, she can count 49 men with a name, or in some cases with a basic identity, with whom she has had intercourse. It is impossible, however, for her to put a number “on those that blur into anonymity.” This notion of anonymity summarizes exactly the essence of her book. An emissary for a sexual network, it is impossible for Millet to know all of the players. The numerous identities of the men encountered in her sexual activities finish by merging into a long blur of flesh.

The two following chapters, entitled “L’Espace” [Space] and “L’Espace replié” [Confined Space], associate physical love with the conquest of space. The author reveals her need for travel, on geographical terms, in order to access, through a symbolic identity quest, some parts of herself. Millet relates her experiences in the outdoors as well as travel memoirs, then in closed spaces. In “L’Espace replié” Millet relates various sexual episodes where the relationship to pain (caused by headaches, for example) is perceived as another manner through which to disintegrate the Self, just as pleasure, displeasure, and abjection allow her to escape her body’s fleshiness and consequently attain a state of well-being. However, the withdrawal into pain does not provide any excitement, whereas an unknown gaze provides the reverse effect. The gaze of the “Other” assumes an important place of protection and security in Millet’s narrative.

Her husband, Jacques Henric, always prefers transitional spaces of passage when taking nude photographs of her. For example, Millet describes how, at the Port-Bou train station in Spain, she modeled for her husband wearing an unbuttoned dress despite the masses of people nearby. It is with this same scene that Jacques Henric begins Légendes de Catherine M. Over a span of 30 years, Henric took pictures of his wife’s body that, despite the years he claims, has not lost any beauty. These photographs, of which Henric emphasizes the banality and repetition, compose a family album with his wife as the only member. None of those photographs should be considered pornographic, a genre that Henric admits having little use for, his interest tending toward the way in which space and the body interact. For the author, nudity empowers his wife, her sex becoming a source of energy. Throughout Henric’s narration, he specifies, on many occasions, how Catherine is the inspiration for his novels’s feminine characters. Between the photographs, the author retells, while also alluding to writers such as Georges Bataille, the story behind the snapshots. Despite the photographs, Henric’s narrative is less erotic than La vie sexuelle de Catherine M.

In Millet’s last chapter, “Détails” [Details], the author confesses that pleasure was never considered the motive behind her sexual experiences, further emphasizing that the precise descriptions of her body and her sexual acts in fact created a detachment from the Self; writing a book in the first person thus helps Millet see herself from a third-person perspective. Sexual orgasm procures for the author this same feeling: one of distancing one’s self from the body. Catherine Millet talks willingly about her sexuality, establishing nonetheless a distinction between love and sex. Millet only briefly alludes to her conjugal life, while still underlining that her sexual promiscuity diminished with the beginning of this relationship.

After having given her body away to many men, Millet’s body is then literally read in La vie sexuelle de Catherine M. and left at the disposition of the viewer in Légendes de Catherine M. In 2004, Jacques Henric’s Comme si notre amour était une ordure was even more explicit regarding his wife’s sexual life and the aftermath of their book’s publication. He also describes what he felt while viewing pornographic videos featuring his wife, Catherine. In its own way, this book attempts to reunite love and sexuality.

Biography

Born in France, Catherine Millet (1948–) is editor and cofounder of the French art magazine Art Press. Well known in the art milieu, she has published several books of art criticism, including L’Art contemporain (1997). She is married to Parisian Jacques Henric (1938–), a French essayist, novelist, and collaborator on the Art Press project.

NATHALIE DUMAS

Editions

La Vie sexuelle de Catherine M. Paris: Seuil, 2001; Paris: Seuil (Points), 2002, as The Sexual Life of Catherine M., translated by Adriana Hunter, New York: Grove Press, 2002.
Légendes de Catherine M., Paris: Denoël, 2001.

Selected Works*Catherine Millet

Textes sur l'art conceptuel. 1972.
Yves Klein. 1982.
L'Art contemporain en France. 1987.
Conversation avec Denise René. 1991.
Roger Tallon, designer. 1993.
De l'objet à l'œuvre, les espaces utopiques de l'art. 1994.
Le critique d'art s'expose. 1995.
L'Art contemporain. 1997.
Riquet à la houe, Millet à la loupe. 2003.

Jacques Henric

Archées. 1969.
Chasses. 1975.

Paradigme du bleu jaune rouge, Albert Ayme. 1979.
Caroussels. 1980.
La peinture et le mal. 1983.
Car elle s'en va la figure du monde. 1985.
En plein dans tout, Bernard Dufour. 1986.
Walkman. 1988.
Pierre Klossowski. 1989.
Tombeau de Van Gogh, le triomphe d'A.A., 1989.
Le Roman et le sacré. 1990.
Céline. 1991.
Du portrait, Jean Rault. 1991.
L'Homme calculable. 1991.
Adorations perpétuelles. 1994.
Dormez mes bien-aimées, Édouard Manet. 1995.
C'est là que j'entreprendrai des sortes de romans. Fismes 1960–1970. 1996.
L'Habitation des femmes. 1998.
Et si au contraire du poisson, le XXe siècle pourrissait par la queue. 1999.
Comme si notre amour était une ordure. 2004.

Further Reading

Authier, Christian. Le nouvel ordre sexuel. Paris: Bartillat, 2002.

---

MILLOT, MICHEL, OR JEAN L'ANGE

---

Mid-seventeenth-century French sex manual writer

L'École des filles* (attributed)

One aspect of the development of publishing in the seventeenth century was the appearance of numerous practical manuals on a variety of subjects, from horsemanship to fencing, gaming, agriculture and the like. The earliest books of this type often seemed more interested in quoting literary sources or humanistic knowledge than getting down to business. As the century progressed, however, more and more of these books offered relatively “practical” knowledge of their subject. Instead of quoting Vitruvius, a later book might actually explain how to build a building.

Ovid and Aretino notwithstanding, Millot's (or L'Ange's) L'École des filles of 1655 really offers the first practical sex manual published in France and perhaps in the Occident. The author makes his intentions clear from the beginning:

Beautiful and curious ladies, here is the School of your wisdom and the collection of the principal things you will want to know to satisfy your husbands when you are married; it is the infallible secret to make yourselves loved by men, even if you are not beautiful.

There follows an Aretino-like dialogue (opinions are divided as to whether the École des filles was actually influenced by Aretino or is merely similar to it) between an experienced woman and a young, more naive girl—Suzanne and Fanchon. There follows a sort of anatomy lesson, with vocabulary like “cul, con, vit et couillons” (ass, cunt, dick, and balls). Fanchon is interested in a certain Monsieur Robinet, and Suzanne encourages her to overcome her shyness the next time he comes over. There follows a lengthy and perhaps repetitious recital of sexual encounters—with varying positions, “mignardises” [delicacies], rosebuds and jasmine incense, and the like.

Michel Camus comments that L'École des filles is almost exactly contemporary with the very differently inspired Carte du Tendre, Madeleine de Scudery's anti-vulgarian précieuse. What the two texts have in common, as mid-seventeenth-century productions, is the way they move in an orderly, progressive fashion, expressing each in its own way this classicist aesthetic.

Indeed, the École des filles is curiously and methodically annotated, with over a hundred and fifty subject headings paralleling its explicit, sexy narrative—so that when Suzanne explains:

This is how it happens: sometimes the boy and the girl are alone in a bedroom or in a garden, it doesn't matter where, and they make small talk; most often it doesn't occur to them to give each other pleasure, because of some other concern they might have; and the boy would merely like to kiss her once before leaving, just to be polite. The girl, who knows about such things, as soon as she feels the boy's mouth press against her own, pushes the point of her tongue little by little into his mouth and rubs it against his lips so energetically that she puts the boy in the mood. He asks her to begin again. Then the girl can take another pleasure and, having looked all around to see if anyone is watching, she puts her tongue in the boy's mouth and kisses him, sliding her hand over his organ, which she takes hold of inside his fly all the while, the subheadings are indicating soberly: “[23] “Great and different virtues of the hand of a girl to give pleasure to boys ... [24] First virtue. [25] Second virtue,” and so on.

In the later parts of their discourses, as the argument explains, the two women “investigate and examine everything which relates to love and its game, and do so with such rare and tickling and amusing and new questions, so subtle and so convincing, that they inspire love as they are read” (they get pretty philosophical: Descartes's method prescribed that his inventories should be complete and omit nothing). Actually, the last parts of L'École des filles introduce the well-known theory of Platonic love, the reunification of separated souls, the power of feminine beauty, and its resemblance to divine beauty. The author adapts this view to his own ideas opposing conventional morality and favoring all-out sex.

Meanwhile the various editions of L'École des filles had a curious history of being found in the bedrooms of various womanizers and aristocratic daughters of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries—Louis XIV's sometime treasury minister Fouquet, various daughters and ladies in waiting of Louis XV, and the like.

Biography

Not much is known about Michel Millot or Jean L'Ange (but see Lachèvre below). One or both of them presented the manuscript to a Paris printer—who accepted payment and then turned them over to the police. L'Ange was sentenced to five years in the galleys, a sentence later reduced. Millot, who benefited from higher social standing and apparently had friends in high places—possibly the ribald novelist Paul Scarron, or even Scarron's wife, Françoise D'Aubigné, later to marry Louis XIV—was simply burned in effigy with most of the copies of the book, and he himself was allowed to flee. Nowadays there is apparently no known copy of the first (1655) edition, with extant texts based on later publications.

HERBERT DE LEY

Editions

Anon. L'École des filles. Edited by Michel Camus. Oeuvres érotiques du XVIIe siècle. L'Enfer de la Bibliothèque Nationale. Paris: Fayard, 1988.

Further Reading

De Ley, Herbert. “Dans les reigles du plaisir ...Transformation of Sexual Knowledge in Seventeenth-Century France,” edited by W. Leiner. Onze nouvelles études sur l'image de la femme dans la littérature française du dix-septième siècle. Tübingen: G. Narr, 1984.

Foucault, Michel. Les mots et les choses. Paris: Gallimard, 1966.

Lachèvre, Frédéric. “Trois grands procès de libertinage.” Le Libertinage au dix-septième siècle. Vol. 2. Paris: Champion, 1920.

Larson, Ruth. “Sex and Civility in a Seventeenth-Century Dialogue—L'Escole des filles.” Papers on Seventeenth-Century French Literature (PFSC) 24 (1997): 475–511.

---

MINUT, GABRIEL DE

---

1520–1587

Essayist, humanist

Gabriel de Minut is the author of two medical texts, the first published before 1584, possibly in Toulouse, of which only the title has survived: Dialogue au soulagement des affligés. Interlocuteurs: Gabriel, malade patient, et Blaise, chirurgien agent. The second was published in Lyon in 1587, Morbi Gallos infestantis salubris curatio et sancta medicina, hoc est malorum, quoe intestinum crudeleque Gallorum bellum inflammant, remedium. Gabriel wrote an unpublished musical treatise with Louis du Pin that discusses the influence of the musical score written by Antoine de Bertrand (c. 1530–1581) for the first book of the “Amours de Cassandre” of Pierre de Ronsard. There also exists in manuscript form a study on astrology by Minut (Alphabet de l’astrologie judiciaire).

De la beauté

Gabriel de Minut wrote De la beauté [On Beauty] but was not able to publish it himself because of his death shortly after he composed the text in 42 nights. He had planned to dedicate it to the queen mother, Catherine de Medici. His sister, Charlotte de Minut, abbess of a Toulouse monastery, took it upon herself, after she found the manuscript among his papers, to write an epistle to the queen mother in order to get it published.

As De la beauté points out, Minut’s discourse is based on the tenet that “ce qui est naturellement beau, est aussi naturellement bon” [What is naturally beautiful is also naturally good]. He bases this statement on the scriptures, the Greek χαλδὸν χάλαθδα, and the Hebrew בְּרֵךְ. The author uses many examples from antiquity to illustrate and corroborate his discourse.

The text recalls first how in antiquity people revered beautiful creatures, so that a beautiful person was worthy of a kingdom. At the same time, it is said that ugly newborns were to be suffocated at birth. It also discusses Theban law as it affected the raising of children (branding for Theban identification, forbidding marriage with foreigners, building of one’s tomb before one’s house, and killing ugly girls and sacrificing them to the Gods). Minut then offers the argument of the possible metamorphosis of an ugly girl into a beautiful one by changing the milk she drank. Minut recalls that in certain cultures, men allowed their wives to have sex with other men in order to procreate beautiful children, because it was believed then that a better seed would produce a better harvest. Minut condemns this practice. He then tells of women who affect the looks of their child-to-be by looking at the portrait of a beautiful person. This allows an indiscreet married woman to have the child of another man without being found unfaithful because the child will look very much like her husband. Thus it can happen that a common person may look very much like a monarch or a common man—Minut cites the example of Martin Guerre. At this point, Minut introduces a quick story dealing with Nero, leaving it to the reader’s discretion to believe it or not: the Roman emperor is reported to have had an anal incision performed on his servant Sporus as an alternative to having sex with the empress Sabine.

If children’s beauty does not match that of their parents, the reason may be that they were conceived, for instance, after a time when the parents had been sick. It is quite important to make sure that children are taught to behave properly in their youth so that they will not act lasciviously as adults. It is also suggested to parents that they should be aware of their children’s friendships if they wish to keep them away from corruption and vices. Bawdiness is to be put under check especially because humans can perform sexual acts all the time. Bathing in virtue is preferable to wallowing in vice, the author suggests.

A child, Minut advises repeatedly, should not drink the milk of anyone but his mother, to prevent inheriting someone else’s bad complexion or ill temper: this is used to explain Caligula’s bad temper, as it is recorded that on one occasion he drank the blood of his nurse after she had been stabbed. Nursemaids should be avoided also because of alcoholism. A woman who is addicted to alcohol is also addicted to sex. According to Minut, the planets do not play a role in deciding the beauty or ugliness of a person. Rather, it is God's will that determines such choice.

Beauty can be a dangerous gift: Minut tells the story of one Democles, who decided to throw himself into a cauldron of boiling water rather than accept the advances of a certain Demetrius.

The last important discussion in De la beauté centers around three types of beauties in women. The first is the beauty of the body, which is qualified as being seditious or scandalous; the second is the beauty of the mind, which is qualified as soberly ribald; and the third is the beauty of the soul, which is qualified as a religious beauty, holy, chaste, and modest.

De la beauté is followed by a curiously titled text: La Paulegraphie [The Paula-ography], a detailed description of a cousin of Minut named Paule Viguier. Minut explains that he introduced the three types of beauty as a temple to the glory of la belle Paule, a woman without compare from pole to pole. Born around 1518, she was considered to be the epitome of beauty in her days and was ordered by the Toulouse municipal magistrates to appear on her balcony twice a day to avoid riots in the city. When King François I visited Toulouse in April 1533, he received the keys of the city from her hands. She was married twice and died in 1607. It is quite possible that Minut wrote De la beauté because, even late in life, he was enamored of his cousin—he is reported to have written poems to her two weeks before his death. Once Minut has lavished his praise upon Paule, he begins a detailed description of her, starting with her hair (a mixture of gold and silver), which is long enough to hide her naked body. He then describes her forehead as a true representation of her personality. Her sky-blue eyes perfectly fit the size of her face. Her eyebrows match so symmetrically well that one could think they were painted. Her straight nose has the shape that surpasses any other. Her lips and her cheeks are of the perfect color. The shape of her ears are an indication of her good, gentle, and generous spirit, just as her earlobes point to her lenient character, free of anger and dissent. Her chin and throat are of a perfect white marble hue. Based on the testimony he has received, Paule's breasts are more beautiful than any others in shape, size, and skin tone. After a description of her arms and hands, her belly is described as small, round, white, and firm. Mentioning the area described as la porte pour la sortie des enfants [the gate through which children exit] allows Minut to discuss the chastity of la belle Paule as one who should not be touched or mentioned. The same goes for her thighs, although Minut assumes that they are perfect because the rest of her body is. The buttocks are described as small cushions. La Paulegraphie concludes with an envoi that summarizes the beauty and goodness of la belle Paule.

Biography

Gabriel de Minut, baron de Castera, was born in southern France. He spent most of his life in the city of Toulouse, but it is doubtful that this was the place of his birth. His father, Jacques de Minut, died on November 6, 1536, after he had held the prestigious office of first president of the Parliament of Toulouse. At the age of 15, Gabriel started studying law, philosophy, medicine, and theology at the University of Paris. Later, he was the seneschal of Rouergue, an area east of Toulouse that would not become a part of France until 1607. He was attached to the staff of the queen mother and was an ordinary gentleman of the king's chamber. In De la beauté, Minut's major work, he digresses in chapter 15 to introduce briefly his ancestors in classical Rome as being one of its most important families, who are even mentioned by Cicero, while another ancestor is introduced as a captain of one of Pompey's legions. He is generally considered one of the most learned scholars of his time, as demonstrated by his best-known work, De la beauté.

CLAUDE FOUILLADE

Selected Works

De la beauté; discours divers pris sur deux fort belles façons de parler, desquelles l'hébreu et le grec usent, l'hébreu Tob, et le grec Kalon Kagaçon, voulant signifier ce qui est naturellement beau et aussi naturellement bon. Avec La Paule-graphie; ou, Description des beautés d'une dame tholosaine, nommée la belle Paule. Geneva: Slatkine Reprints, 1969.

De la beauté. Brussels: A. Mertens et fils, 1865.

Ruelle, Pierre. L'Ornement des dames, Ornatus mulierum. Brussels: Presses universitaires de Bruxelles, 1967.

---

MIRBEAU, OCTAVE

---

1848–1917
French writer

Le Journal d'une femme de chambre

According to the preface to Diary of a Chambermaid (1900), it is a genuine diary, written by Célestine R., a real chambermaid, who would have hardly asked Octave Mirbeau for help with editing—but this claim is transparently a literary device enabling the author to write in the first person. Célestine did not have a happy childhood in Brittany: her father died when she was very young, and her violent, alcoholic mother became a low-class prostitute. As a teenager, Célestine left her hometown of Audierne to go to Paris and earn a meager living as a chambermaid (interestingly, Mirbeau himself occasionally worked as a manservant in Paris in the late 1870s).

The diary starts in mid-September 1899 when Célestine arrives at the fictitious village of Mesnil-Roy in Normandy, about to start a new job working for the umpteenth time as a chambermaid—this time for the wealthy but reclusive Lanlaire family at their austere mansion called Le Prieuré. Célestine will keep her diary for several weeks, both chronicling her daily life and service at Le Prieuré and recounting over twenty incidents that happened to her with previous employers in Paris. Without any narrative chronology, all these stories, rich in anecdotes, portraits, and descriptions, intertwine two major themes: the chambermaid's dire life and her employers' decadence, with several minor themes in the background: the hypocrisy of Catholicism, the bourgeoisie's moral decay, nationalism, and social scandals. The perverse nature of the relationship between masters and servants lies at the heart of all the stories, usually with an element of sex, with the maid invited to sleep with a male member of the household (sometimes the father, sometimes the son or even the grandson, or the chief butler) and, without much resistance, Célestine would accept, as a good working girl is expected to do. Calculating but always honest, Célestine explains and justifies her behavior, even when she knows that it was not ethical (for instance, with young Monsieur Georges, who is terribly ill and weak and ends up dying whilst having sex with her).

Whilst narrating all these past stories, Célestine languishes at Le Prieuré, failing to find much interest in local gossip and loathing Madame Lanlaire's despising attitude. Henpecked Monsieur Lanlaire (who regularly has sex with the insipid cook Marianne) and poison-tongued neighbor Rose (who proudly shares her employer's bed) are of little interest to Célestine, unlike the mysterious factotum Joseph, who has been working for the Lanlaire family for fifteen years. Initially repulsed by his monstrous ugliness, she gradually falls in love with him, even if he is probably a rapist and murderer (though this is never fully clarified), as well as a thief, eventually robbing the Lanlaire family of their silver. After some awkward courting, he offers Célestine marriage—she briefly hesitates then accepts, realizing that no man has ever excited her as much as Joseph. The last chapter of the book is almost an epilogue, written eight months later. Célestine briefly narrates how she is now married to Joseph; they have left Le Prieuré and are now happily settled in Cherbourg, where, ironically enough, they have their own domestics. They own a small café called "A l'Armée Française," which is rapidly becoming the favorite meeting point of all local anti-Semitic, militarist activists.

Written as a satire of Parisian society in the wake of the Dreyfus affair, this long novel ends up being an excellent sociological and historical documentary about the decadence and hypocrisy of the Parisian upper classes at the turn of the twentieth century and about the condition of chambermaids (and servants in general, be they cooks or footmen). It is a fine piece of social criticism (showing Mirbeau's talents as a radical journalist and cynical social commentator), yet it was dismissed by many critics of the time as pornography and was initially banned in the United States: in 1901, the American anarchist Benjamin Tucker attempted to publish his own translation, but the US Postal Service, under the puritanical guidance of Anthony Comstock, put a stop to it on grounds of obscenity (Tucker later deleted some of the book's best passages and released an abridged edition). All these claims and the subsequent censorship are due to the fact that the book depicts a wide range of sexual acts, from fetishism (the first story, only three pages into the book, is that of an elderly gentleman with a fetish for women's leather boots, Monsieur Ravour, who dies in his bed with one of Célestine's boots in his mouth, having seemingly choked to death) to lesbianism (which Célestine discovered with her friend Cléclé when working in a convent run by exploitative nuns).

MIRBEAU, OCTAVE

Le Journal d'une femme de chambre has inspired two of the best filmmakers of the twentieth century: Jean Renoir (1894–1979) and Luis Buñuel (1900–1983). Renoir's version, released in 1946 with Paulette Goddard and Burgess Meredith (who were both also coproducers), was highly praised, yet less so than Buñuel's 1964 version: with Jeanne Moreau as Célestine, Buñuel's film has become a classic (though it must be said that it took some distance from Mirbeau's original story line). Mirbeau is now becoming fashionable again, with all of his work coming back into print; his play Les Affaires sont les affaires [Business Is Business] (1904) made a triumphal return to the Paris stage in 1995, and his novels are again being translated and published in English, some for the first time. There is very little in terms of secondary literature about Mirbeau, though; the main specialist is French scholar Pierre Michel, who is the director of the Société Octave Mirbeau.

In terms of erotic imagery, the key element of Le Journal d'une femme de chambre is the French maid as object of desire, with her strict uniform: a black dress with long sleeves, a white ribbon tie-back apron, and a lace headpiece, yet a French maid who is not a naive ingénue: Célestine is the French maid who knows how to manipulate men to her advantage. Almost a literary archetype, she is a key character of the commedia dell'arte of erotic literature.

Biography

Octave Mirbeau was a political activist (an anarchist) and a man of letters in the broadest sense; he published widely, as a novelist, playwright, ghostwriter, art critic, and journalist. Yet, nowadays he is remembered mainly for two books: Le Journal d'une femme de chambre and Le Jardin des supplices [Torture Garden] (1899), a bildungsroman about Chinese tortures and sadomasochism that doubles as a political pamphlet denouncing murder and colonialism.

LOYKIE LOÏC LOMINÉ

Editions

Le Journal d'une femme de chambre. Paris: Flammarion, c. 1983.

The Diary of a Chambermaid. Translated by Douglas Jarman, with an introduction by Richard Ings [c. 1966]. Sawtry, UK: Dedalus, 1991.

Further Reading

Michel, P., and J.F. Nivet. Biographie d'Octave Mirbeau, l'imprécauteur au cœur fidèle. Paris: Séguier, 1990.

Michel, P. Édition critique de l'oeuvre romanesque de Mirbeau. 3 vols. Buchet/Chastel: Société Octave Mirbeau, 2000.

---

MISHIMA, YUKIO

---

1925–1970

Japanese novelist, dramatist, and essayist

The sexuality, eroticism, and fascination with the body that characterize much of Mishima's literary work are also clearly discernible in his life. He was a vocal critic of the consumerism that he believed had polluted Japan and led to the loss of traditional samurai virtues. Mishima felt that the Japanese "salaryman," the archetypal emblem of postwar masculinity, had become effeminate, and he invested a great deal of effort in bodybuilding in pursuit of his own perfect masculine body. He was later to write about the transformation of his body from that of an effete intellectual to a man of action in the homoerotically charged Taiyō to tetsu [Sun and Steel] (1968).

Mishima's exhibitionism was notorious; he appeared dressed in a fundoshi (traditional loincloth) in several photo albums extolling the beauty of the male form, including Bara-kei [Ordeal by Roses] (1963) and Taidō [The Way of the Body] (1967). He also starred in macho roles in a number of gangster movies. Despite marrying and fathering two children, as was expected of a man of his class, Mishima had strong homosexual inclinations. He was attracted to members of the working classes, particularly manual laborers, who feature as objects of desire in several of his novels.

Mishima was not conscripted during the Second World War because of ill health. However, he was nostalgic for the homosocial world of the soldier, and in 1967 he began training with Japan's Self-Defense Forces. In 1968, he founded a paramilitary group known as the Shield Society, which was pledged to protect the emperor and his interests. Mishima invested a great deal of energy training with these men and in designing their uniforms, and he seems to have been attempting to re-create something of the homoerotic ethos of the samurai era. Indeed, at this time he published Hagakure nyūmon [The Way of the Samurai] (1967), a commentary on a little-known samurai text from the eighteenth century that extolled nanshoku (male homoeroticism) and praised the willingness of the samurai to die for his master. In a now-famous maxim, it is argued in Hagakure that "[t]he way of the samurai is death," and Mishima clearly saw his own suicide by seppuku (ritual disembowelment) as a continuation of this samurai practice. His own death was anticipated by two graphically depicted seppuku scenes in the short story Yūkoku [Patriotism] (1966) and in the novel Homba [Runaway Horses] (1969).

Mishima was well read in works of Western sexology, and he incorporated in his novels ideas from Freud and Magnus Hirschfeld, along with Eastern themes deriving from Hinduism and Buddhism. The compulsive nature of sexual desire lies at the heart of much of his fiction, where it proves to be a dark, destructive force that cuts through social convention, driving characters from high and low social strata alike to acts of violence and depravity. Kamen no kokuhaku [Confessions of a Mask] (1949) is a semi-autobiographical work in which Mishima writes of his discovery of masturbation, brought about by his coming across Guido Reni's painting of St. Sebastian pierced by arrows. In the novel he speaks of his incipient desire for the night-soil collector, whose job it was to clean out the latrines, and of his sadistic fantasies where "young Roman gladiators offered up their lives for my amusement" and a naked schoolmate was served up to him on a plate. Scenes of necrophilia were to recur throughout his later fiction.

Images of sex, death, and the body's animal functions are common. Ai no kawaki [Thirst for Love] (1950) describes the passion a rich young widow feels for a local farmhand. When she observes him cavorting at the local shrine festival clad only in a loincloth, she frenziedly scratches his back with her nails. Yet, when he responds to her advances, she panics and kills him with a scythe. Gogo no eikō [The Sailor Who Fell from Grace with the Sea] (1963) features another widow, this time besotted with a sailor. In this story, the widow's thirteen-year-old son watches his mother making love to the sailor through a chink in the wall. For the son, the sailor's capitulation to desire for a woman makes him a fallen hero and he hatches a plan to poison and then mutilate him.

MISHIMA, YUKIO

In the novels, sex is a demonic force that leads the possessed individual to transgress all rules of etiquette and personal decorum, leading to downfall. This theme is brilliantly explored in Kinjiki [Forbidden Colors] (1951). In this novel, Yuichi, "an amazingly beautiful young man" whose body "surpassed the sculptures of ancient Greece," brings disaster to the lives of all his lovers, both men and women. Mishima shows how the power of youthful physical beauty can defeat riches, breeding, or education. He shows sexual desire to be a great leveling force that brings all men and women, no matter how rich, well born, or erudite back down to the level of their primal animal natures. For Mishima beauty was something terrible, a force that could consume and annihilate the lover. This theme is dealt with metaphorically in Kinkakuji [The Temple of the Golden Pavilion] (1956), in which a young priest, driven mad by the beauty of the temple, burns it down.

Beauty does not last in Mishima's novels; most youthful lovers either kill themselves or are murdered. In his last work, the tetralogy Sea of Fertility (1965–1970), the original hero of the novel either kills himself (or, in the third volume, herself) or dies at the end of each novel and is reincarnated in the next. Honda, the hero's best friend from the first book, survives to reencounter his friend in each subsequent reincarnation; but while his friend lives and then dies at the peak of his/her beauty, Honda lives on to face an old age of senility and decrepitude. Tennin gosui [The Decay of the Angel] (1970), the title of the final volume, completed the night before Mishima's suicide, is a reference to the Buddhist belief that even the gods, when their store of merit is exhausted, fall from their lofty perches back into the world of human suffering. The obsession with the terrifying nature of beauty and distaste for its inevitable decline dealt with in many of Mishima's novels help explain what was to follow.

On November 25, 1970, Mishima and a group of followers from the Shield Society stormed the office of the commander-in-chief of the Self-Defense Forces in an attempt to convince him to support Mishima's demand for constitutional reform that would allow Japan to rearm and restore the full rights of the emperor. When it became clear that the attempt had failed, Mishima committed ritual suicide by cutting open his belly, while his second in command, reputedly his lover, decapitated him with a samurai sword. Mishima's suicide struck most Japanese as a perversely anachronistic gesture, coming as it did on the eve of Japan's most spectacular period of growth and prosperity.

Today, Mishima remains a controversial and slightly embarrassing figure in Japan. Over thirty years after his suicide, the gruesome circumstances of his death that mirror so closely scenes described in his novels still make it difficult to disentangle Mishima's life from his art.

Biography

Yukio Mishima is the pen name of Kimitake Hiraoka, who was born in Tokyo on January 14. His ancestors on his father's side were of peasant origin, although both his father and his grandfather were government officials; his mother's forebears were of upper-class samurai stock. Mishima was sent to the elite but austere Peers' School, where he showed precocious literary talent, publishing his first short story while still a student. He graduated first in his class in 1944, later attended the prestigious Law Department of Tokyo University, and served a brief stint in the finance ministry. Then he turned to writing full time. His first novel was not well received, but his second, Confessions of a Mask, was a critical success which launched him on a literary career that was to result in over thirty books, including novels, short stories, essays, and plays. This prolific career was brought to an abrupt and premature end with Mishima's suicide at the age of forty-five.

MARK McLELLAND

Selected Works

- Kamen no kokuhaku*. 1949; as Confessions of a Mask, translated by Meredith Weatherby. 1958.
Ai no kawaki. 1950; as Thirst for Love, translated by Alfred H. Marks. 1969.
Kinjiki. 1951; as Forbidden Colors, translated by Alfred H. Marks. 1968.
Kinkakuji. 1956; as The Temple of the Golden Pavilion, translated by Ivan Morris. 1959.

Gogo no eikō, 1963; as The Sailor Who Fell from Grace with the Sea, translated by John Nathan. 1965.
Hagakure nyūmon, 1967; as The Way of the Samurai translated by Kathryn Sparling. 1977.
Tennin gosui, 1970; as The Decay of the Angel, translated by Edward G. Seidensticker. 1974.

Further Reading

Keene, Donald. "Yukio Mishima." In Kodansha Encyclopedia of Japan, edited by Gen Itasaka. 9 vols. Tokyo and New York: Kodansha, 1983.

Jackson, Earl, Jr. "Kabuki Narratives of Male Homosexual Desire in Saikaku and Mishima." Theatre Journal 41 (1989): 459–77.
 Nakao, Seigo. "Yukio Mishima." In The Gay and Lesbian Literary Heritage, edited by Claude J. Summers. New York: Henry Holt, 1995.
 Scott Stokes, Henry. The Life and Death of Yukio Mishima. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1994.
 Starrs, Roy. Deadly Dialectics: Sex, Violence and Nihilism in the World of Yukio Mishima. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press, 1994.
 Wolfe, Peter. Yukio Mishima. New York: Continuum, 1989.

---

MISTRAL, GABRIELA

---

1889–1957

Chilean poet, cultural ambassador, and educational reformer

Gabriela Mistral's writing career began in 1914 when Sonetos de la muerte [Sonnets of Death] received a commendation during the Juegos Florales de Santiago, one of Chile's most prestigious literary competitions. This was also the first occasion on which she employed the sobriquet Gabriela Mistral, a name derived from that of her two favorite poets: Gabriele D'Annunzio and Frédéric Mistral. She herself thought that her existence was marred by tragedy—the broken home of her own childhood, the suicide of her lover, and her failure to have children of her own. Out of such personal sadness, however, she wove the rich tapestry of her poetry, which is marked by its compassion, warmth, humanity, and love of children.

Treated with hostility in her own country, her talents were first recognized in neighboring Latin American states. Mistral's anti-establishment ideas and left-wing views—both inspired by Christian humanism—made her unpopular with her peers and other members of the teaching profession. This was especially true of the Santiago bourgeoisie, who considered her a criolla—an ignorant peasant woman. National newspapers such as El Mercurio and El Diario Ilustrado refused to publish her articles after she attacked the regime of Gabriel Gonzalez Videla (1949–1952), not only for persecuting Pablo Neruda, the eminent poet and member of the Chilean Senate, but also for first labeling as Communists and then dismissing hundreds of public employees.

In 1922 she accepted the invitation of José Vasconcelos to become Mexico's guest of honor and take part in the plan to establish new secondary schools and libraries—put into effect by the Mexican government after the Revolution (1910–1917). Aged thirty-three, Mistral went into voluntary exile. Except for rare visits to her native country, she would spend the rest of her life outside Chile. Indeed, Chile's failure to recognize her talents as a poet is reflected in her publishing record. Mistral's only volume of poetry to appear in Chile before being brought out elsewhere was the 1954 collection Lagar [Winepress].

Although Mistral focuses mainly on spiritual rather than physical or erotic love, the language used to describe religious and spiritual passion is very much eroticized. Eroticism is never described as experienced in the flesh; it is all the same enhanced by religious experience, a tendency toward asceticism, unsatisfied maternal yearnings, and a natural communion with the land.

In her Sonetos de la muerte, the central theme is grief over the death of a lover. Physical love is portrayed as an elusive goal, achievable only in death, which in turn symbolizes the safe haven where rest can be achieved. Spiritual love, a love that has the power to right all wrongs, is equated with poetry. In Desolación, Tala, and Lagar Mistral turns a mystic eye on basic elements such as water, light, and earth, as well as salt, maize, and bread, often in relation to indigenous rituals. Mistral's "Pan" [Bread] (from Poesías completas 1976: 350) is particularly charged with sexual imagery. The protagonist feels in ecstasy when the smell of freshly baked bread gets to her. The sensual experience continues as she opens it, penetrating the white, warm, soft bun with her fingers, anticipating the joy of pacifying her oral and tactile cravings. This is described in such a way that it clearly evokes carnal pleasure. Water becomes a particularly sensual topic, which Mistral associates with the washing off of sins and compares to a lover. In her poem "El agua" [Water], Mistral tells a little child that fear of water is worth experiencing in anticipation of the exhilarating pleasure the stream will give him. Water is also a source of oral pleasure, as it calms one's thirst. Furthermore, it symbolizes fertility, for it makes nature bloom. For Mistral, physical pleasure is also experienced when in contact with Latin American landscapes and its pre-Columbian cultures. In "América" (Poesías completas 1976: 359), maize, central to the culture and diet of the Aztecs, becomes irresistible gold that, when kissed, brings spirits to life. The corn plant becomes a symbol of virility, whose erect fruit seduces gods, humans, and birds alike.

The theme of love is ever-present in Mistral's metaphysical poems Desolación, Tala and Lagar. Nevertheless, unlike other female post-modern South American writers (such as Delira Agustini, 1886–1914; Juana de Ibarbourou, 1892–1928; and Alfonsina Storni, 1892–1979) Mistral is not concerned with love as an erotic force but with love as a spiritual entity: the love of God, nature, and one's fellow creatures.

During her formative years the Bible was Mistral's main source of moral instruction and poetic inspiration. This would be reflected in her work as a whole, which replicates her religious beliefs, the renunciation of carnal desire, and the insistence of continual self-purification. It is perhaps because of this that her Cartas de amor [Love Letters] created such controversy at the time, since they revealed an unknown side of Mistral's persona. Her Cartas are addressed to the writer Manuel Magallanes Moure, a renowned writer and public figure at the time. They maintained an intense, though chaste, epistolary relationship; actually Mistral set eyes on Magallanes only once. Although her erotic desire is never addressed, Mistral's letters reveal her need for a perhaps more carnal relationship. Indeed, at times the letters fill the void of carnal love; Mistral confesses to Magallanes that sometimes after reading his letters she has to lie down, physically exhausted, her heart pounding after so much romance, his words so sweet that they actually touch her.

Mistral's correspondence is extremely frank, although inclined to safeguard the "mystery" of her sexuality. As it develops, the reader gains a privileged insight into Mistral's innermost feelings toward herself: she heroically and blatantly confesses being aware of her "rough looks" and lack of femininity. Because of that, she is determined to keep her love affair exclusively to the writing and the reading, to save her platonic lover from having to kiss her and caress and make love to an ugly woman. When Magallanes finally deserts her to marry a wealthy bride from Santiago, Mistral resolves to devote the rest of her life to the poor, the weak, and the downtrodden, to compensate for her lack of romantic attachment by dedicating herself to children, and thus exploiting her maternal drive in her role of devoted teacher.

Biography

Lucila Godoy Alcayana, who wrote under the pen name Gabriela Mistral, was born in Vicuña, Chile, in April. Despite her hostility to the Chilean regime, she represented Chile at the League of Nations (1926), was consul at Naples (1932), Madrid, and Lisbon (both in 1933), and later became plenipotentiary minister responsible for promoting Spanish and American literature and culture. In 1945 she became the first Latin American to receive the Nobel Prize for Literature. Gabriela Mistral died in New York City.

CAROLINA MIRANDA

Editions

Desolación. New York: Instituto de las Españas, 1922.
Tala. Buenos Aires: Sur, 1938.

Lagar. Santiago: Pacífico, 1954.
Cartas de amor de Gabriela Mistral. Edited with introduction by S. Fernández Larrain. Santiago de Chile: Bello, 1978.

Selected Works

Poesia para mujeres. México: Porrúa, 1923.
Ternura. Madrid: Saturnino Calleja, 1924.
Poema de Chile. Edited with preface by Doris Dana. Barcelona: Pmaire, 1967.
Selected Poems of Gabriela Mistral. Edited by Doris Dana. Baltimore MD: Library of Congress/Johns Hopkins University Press, 1971; bilingual edition, 1972.
Crickets and Frogs. Edited by Doris Dana. New York: Atheneum, 1972.
Poesías completas: Desolación; Ternura; Tala; Lagar I. Madrid: Aguilar, 1976.

Further Reading

Alegría, Fernando. Genio y figura de Gabriela Mistral. Buenos Aires: Editorial Universitaria de Buenos Aires, 1966.
 Arce de Vazquez, Margot. G. Mistral, the Poet and Her Work. Translated by Hélène Masslo Anderson. New York: NYU Press, 1964.
 Caimano, Sister Rose Aquin, O.P. Mysticism in Gabriela Mistral. New York: Pageant, 1969.
 Gazarian-Gautier, Marie-Lise. Gabriela Mistral: The Teacher from the Valley of Elqui. Chicago: Franciscan Herald Press, 1975.
 Johnson, Harvey L. Gabriela Mistral's Affiliation with the United States. Los Ensayistas: Georgia Series of Hispanic Thought (March 1951): 79–83.
 Taylor, Martin C. Gabriela Mistral's Religious Sensibility. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1968.

---

MOGADOR, CÉLESTE

---

1824–1909
 French memoirist

Adieux au monde: Memoires

Adieux au monde, which might more rightly be called Adieux au demi-monde, was written with the aid of Mogador's lover, her lawyer Desmarrest, and read aloud to the playwright Camille Doucet, the Girardins, and Alexandre Dumas père, who put it on a par with the confessions of Rousseau. He puffed the book in Le Mousquetaire and Girardin helped draw up new terms with the publisher. The book, which covered Mogador's picaresque career up to her meeting with Chabrillan, was published in five volumes in Paris in 1854; this edition was suppressed. It was republished in 1858 in four volumes, with information added about the romance of Céleste and "Robert," and again confiscated.

The reviews, which appeared while Mogador was in Australia, were severe. Villemessant in Le Figaro (April 25, 1854) suggested that certain books, like certain creatures, could turn lending libraries into brothels, and feared that "our daughters and sisters" would learn from them that the shortest road to a social position was prison and prostitution. Although there was a flourishing market for ghostwritten autobiographies of loose women, few were prepared to welcome an ex-prostitute's account of her struggle to establish an identity and pursue personal happiness in a society that overeroticized women. For instance, Mogador's portrait of the poet Alfred de Musset, whom she had entertained in a brothel, gave great offense. He is portrayed as a drunken, petulant lout prone to such boorish behavior as squirting seltzer water at her during a dinner at the Rocher-Cancale.

Mogador displeased with her straightforward language, her candor about sex, her refusal to titillate, and her contempt for the publicity establishment which had launched her. She complained of the way in which men of letters, short of a better subject, chose to celebrate ugly, stupid tarts.

Journalists treat women like governments: they invent them; after having invented them, they cry them up and afterward try to unmake them. It used to be there were only one or two public dance halls; why are there ten nowadays? Because of the female celebrities whom you enjoyed creating in your leisure hours. This tinsel glory has attracted envious women. Thousands of young women are dragged into the public dance halls, lured by this fraudulent renown. Young men go to see these competitions, these onslaughts of legs. (II, 286)

MOGADOR, CÉLESTE

Mogador left some 15 notebooks of reminiscence dealing with the period 1859 to 1907. These passed into the possession of Françoise Moser, whose biography is still the most reliable. It is Moser who declared that although Mogador, in her published memoirs, “arranged” part of the truth and novelized another part, what she says deserves to be believed.

Biography

Élisabeth-Céleste Vénard (Comtesse Lionel de Moreton de Chabrillan), illegitimate daughter of a suicidal laundress, was born near the Boulevard de Temple, Paris, December 27. Her father, a hatter, was affectionate but died when Céleste was six, leaving her feckless mother to drift from one abusive man to another. After a time in Lyon, where mother and daughter had fled to escape the violence of the current lover, the precocious and headstrong girl was apprenticed to an embroidery maker in Paris. Sexually molested at 15 by her mother’s latest boyfriend, Céleste ran away and, exhausted and expiring, was given shelter by a prostitute in a brothel on la Cité. A raid landed her in St.-Lazare women’s prison, where she received writing lessons; and, at 16, with her mother’s consent, she registered with the police as a prostitute. From a high-class bordello, she moved to an apartment provided by a rich admirer and became a fixture in the Parisian demi-monde.

Dance-hall managers would promote star dancers for publicity, and Céleste was put forward as a rival to Reine Pomaré at the Bal Mabille. She was given the name Mogador when on September 26, 1844, as she was stormed by would-be partners, her sponsor declared, “I’d have less trouble defending [the North African town of] Mogador than my dancer.” Also called the Queen of the Prado, she was a tall, handsome brunette, with arched eyebrows, mildly pockmarked skin and the “bold proportions of Michelangelic caryatids” (Larousse du XIXème siècle). At masked balls, she would turn up the sleeves of her stevedore’s smock to show off her exquisite arms. From the dance hall, Mogador moved to the circus, but her career as a bareback rider at the Hippodrome ended when she broke her leg in a chariot race.

Mogador the courtesan, rather than giving her body to the best-paying customer, gave “her soul, her body and her trust to the most loving.” This turned out to be Count Paul-Josselin-Lionel de Chabrillan (b. 1818), former attaché to the French legation in Copenhagen, who set her up in a mansion and went bankrupt in his inept attempts to make a fortune by gambling and stock speculation. When he sailed for Australia to try his luck in the gold fields, Mogador tried to cope with his debts by acting under the name Céleste at the Folies-Dramatique (1850), the Variétés (1851–52), and the Théâtre du Luxembourg (1852), where as Cristal in La Revue of 1852 she performed a new dance, the “Impériale.” She also reluctantly wrote her memoirs (in which Lionel appears as Robert), without telling him. When Céleste and the count married in London, on January 27, 1854, she tried, without success, to prevent the book’s publication. Chabrillan had been appointed consul in Melbourne and hoped they could begin afresh; but Mogador’s memoirs preceded her to the Antipodes and she was shunned by good society. After a controversial time in office, Chabrillan died in Melbourne, December 29, 1858.

Céleste returned to France, ruined, and was ill for six months. She then set out to improve her literacy through self-education. Her in-laws tried to remove her titled name, but neither their offers of compensation (an annual pension of 12,000 francs for life) nor their lawsuits could force her to give it up. Evidently resolved to be rehabilitated and with the encouragement of Dumas, she churned out sensational novels (Sapho, 1858; Miss Pewel, 1859; Est-il fou? 1860) and in 1862 took over the management of the Petit Théâtre des Champs-Élysées, where, under the pseudonym Mme Lionel, she presented her own plays Bonheur au vaincu, En Australie, and En garde, before turning it over to the actor Montrouge for 15,000 francs. He renamed it the Folies Marigny. Her oeuvre consists of 33 plays and operetta libretti, and a certain number of poems and songs. For a while she managed the Nouveautés and even performed in a music hall in 1865, before returning to writing. Critics commended her valiant struggle to overcome her past but suspected that her notoriety as Mogador would overshadow her literary efforts. The least unreadable of her fictional works are Les Voleurs d'or (1864), later dramatized, and Mémoires d'une honnête fille (1865). In 1877, drawing on her Australian diaries, she issued a sequel to her memoirs, Un Deuil au bout du monde. She died in the asylum of La Providence, Montmartre, February 7.

LAURENCE SENELICK

Editions

- Adieux au monde: Mémoires de Céleste Mogador*. 5 vols. Paris: Locard-Davi et De Vresse, 1854.
Mémoires de Céleste Mogador. 4 vols., with additions. Paris: Librairie nouvelle, 1858; 2 vols., 1876.
Mémoires de Céleste Mogador, 1824–1854, où une jolie fille raconte sa jeunesse misérable et scandaleuse, comment elle devint la vedette du bal Mabille et de l'Hippodrome, fut entretenue par les plus riches viveurs et se racheta en épousant un jeune comte ruiné, chercheur d'or, puis consul dans l'Australie des convicts. Paris: Les Amis de l'Histoire, 1968.
Memoirs of a Courtesan in Nineteenth-Century Paris. Translated by Monique Fleury Nagem. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2001.
Un Deuil au bout du monde; suite des Mémoires de Céleste Mogador. Paris: Librairie nouvelle, 1877;
The French Consul's Wife. Memoirs of Céleste de Chabrilan in Gold-Rush Australia. Translated by Patricia Clancy and Jeanne Allen. Carlton South, Victoria, Australia: Miegunyah Press, 1998.

Selected Works

- Les Voleurs d'Or*. 1857.
Miss Pewell. 1859.
Un miracle à Vichy. 1860.
Est-il fou? 1860; repr. 1879.
Mémoires d'une honnête fille, with Alfred Delvau. 1865.
Un amour terrible (Sapho), 1876.
Émigrantes et déportées, ou Les deux soeurs, 1876; repr. 1887.
Une méchante femme. 1877.
La duchesse de Mers. 1881.
Les forçats de l'amour. 1881.
Marie Baude. 1883.
Un drame sur la Tâge. 1885.

Further Reading

- Haldane, Charlotte F. Daughter of Paris: the Life Story of Céleste Mogador, Comtesse Lionel de Moreton de Chabrilan. London: Hutchinson, 1961.
 Larousse, P., ed. Grand Dictionnaire universel du XIXème siècle. 17 vols., 1865–1890.
 Leclercq, Pierre Robert. Céleste Mogador: Biographie. Paris: La Table ronde, 1996.
 Moser, Françoise. Vie et aventures de Céleste Mogador, fille publique, femme de lettres et Comtesse (1824–1909). Paris: Albin Michel, 1935.

---

MOIX, TERCENCI

---

1943–
 Spanish prose writer

La noche no es hermosa: Textos de Eros

La noche no es hermosa (1994) is a miscellany which unites erotic texts previously published by Terenci Moix in various forms, including short stories, fragments from novels, selections from memoirs, and articles from newspapers and magazines. The number and variety of these pieces (which range from three or four pages to narratives of more than forty pages) provide a very representative account of the multiplicity of registers adopted by Moix's erotic writings up to 1993; samples are given from about fifteen different books. Mirroring a Dante-esque itinerary, the collection is divided into three parts: "Inferno," "Purgatory," and "Paradise," with the addition of a "Stravaganza" and "Finale." The use of irony and a subversive toying with tradition, together with a penchant for "culturalist" re-creation, permeate the texts throughout. Alongside some medieval settings that cannot fail to add meaning to the Dante-esque character of the work, Moix's deeply ingrained Mediterranean cultural sensibility recurrently frames his writings in the pseudo-mythical spaces of ancient Egypt, Greece, and Rome.

These become ideal scenarios for the celebration of hedonism and sexual refinement, but also, in many cases, for the celebration of cruelty and abuse as a means to attain ultimate sexual gratification. Accompanying these journeys into the past, a number of selections have strictly contemporary settings, situating themselves especially in large and modern cities such as Madrid and Barcelona, where the night life is treated as an experience leading to the furthest frontiers of sexuality.

Many of the texts, particularly those published before the end of the sexually repressive Franco dictatorship in 1975, incorporate a palpable component of provocation that nonetheless managed to elude the censorship that was still in force during the last years of Franco's regime. This attitude would earn Moix a reputation as a precocious enfant terrible of Spanish letters. With a degree of explicitness perhaps unprecedented in the country's literature, Moix's writings not only delved into what might at the time have been considered conventional sexual taboos (autoeroticism, homoeroticism, transvestism, and oral sex), but they also treated with equal explicitness and detail practices such as sadomasochism, incest, pederasty, bestiality, coprophagy, and even anthropophagy practiced for sexual satisfaction. Witchcraft, torture, and criminal pedagogy of evident de Sadean reminiscence complete the background for this summa of unconventional practices. All of these experiences, of course, are detailed without the least indication of moral condemnation. On the contrary, they are seen as an incentive and stimulus for artistic creation.

Quite frequently, there exists a sense of playfulness that in some way undermines the "drama" arising from the situations depicted and any possibility of tragic implications. In many cases the very excess of exaggeration intentionally strips verisimilitude from the effects inscribed in the texts. If tragedy appears at all, it is as a result of the feeling of loneliness that emerges from many of the selections, a feeling that always seems to coincide with the experience of the subject in contemporary society, no matter how ancient the times dealt with in the texts. In this respect, and despite the meticulous documentation gathered by Moix throughout years of study and travel to the sites of his imaginative incursions, his creative work is one that perhaps can be understood only in terms of the sociocultural context of a young generation of the 1960s and 70s avid for cultural and political change and for the modernization of its country.

Though the selections are very different in conception and realization, as are the original sources from which they are extracted, some recurrent preoccupations and topoi traverse the volume. These include the relation between Eros and death, the interplay between the sacred and the profane, the conception of sex as an illusion or as acting, and the materiality of a desire that ends up leading to frustration, weariness, or dissatisfaction.

Eros and death intertwine in a near obsession with the passage of time and the disfiguration of beauty, a theme which is also manifested in the intermingling of pleasure and pain. Amputations and castrations are not infrequent as components of extreme erotic experiences; vomiting may become a stage of pleasure. As a counterpart, there is a constant celebration of youth, with the exaltation of pederasty of classical inspiration, as well as an assumption of narcissism that acquires a perhaps insuperable expression in the act of masturbation in front of the mirror.

The duality of the sacred and the profane projects itself onto the intersection of the sublime and the abject, and onto the rituality observed in sexual practices related to scenes depicting, for example, crucifixion and martyrdom. In spite of apparently spiritual resonances, such an opposition underscores the carnality and rich sensuality that can be discovered beneath the surface of the most radical religious attitudes.

The pieces set in contemporary times are perhaps the ones that more visibly illustrate the inner emptiness to which the mere material satisfaction of desire may lead. These are the selections that also develop more prominently the challenge to an essentialist conception of sex by playing with changes in identity and roles. The idea of sex as a permanent and proteic performance is perhaps best embodied in the figures of transvestites and transformists that appear in some of these selections.

In general, the multiculturalist perspective that presides over much of the whole collection correlates with the blend of racial, textual, and sexual hybridity manifested therein. It also seems to be naturally in agreement with the combination of high and low culture always found in Moix's works.

One of the best expressions of such a combination is represented by his passion for cinema and his re-creations of the lives and the glamour of Hollywood stars. Perhaps as a result of this influence, many of his writings reveal a deliberate search for visual excess and even artificiality, presenting spaces, characters, and effects that seem to have been drawn from a movie set. As he repeatedly indicates in his memoirs and elsewhere, the cinema provides him with a complement or substitution for the experiences he was deprived of as a child in the very sparse environment of post-civil war Spain. That reservoir of images and stories is constantly present in La noche no es hermosa, testifying to his firm inclination toward cultural pastiche. He may re-create the sexual battles between Marc Antony and Cleopatra, or penetrate the intimacy of an opera diva, or present the reader with an adolescent's experiences with sex, alcohol, and drugs in a nightclub in Madrid, but all of this is executed with the same lightness of tone.

A visible icon of Spanish gay culture, Terenci Moix has extensively participated in Spanish media and cultural life, with frequent appearances on TV shows and in collaborations with the most widely circulated newspapers and magazines. Through its combination of personal confessions and fantastic flights of imagination, this volume offers a dual perspective that justly represents a figure who has adopted the permanent vocation of keeping life and literature inextricably intertwined.

Biography

Born Ramón Moix in Barcelona, Spain, January 5. During the second half of the 1960s he began publishing fictional works, primarily in Catalan, and his first collection of stories, La torre dels vicis capitals, was awarded the Víctor Català prize in 1967. Around 1980 he adopted Spanish as his primary language for the writing of fiction. Other literary awards include the popular Planeta Prize, which he received in 1986 for his novel No digas que fue un sueño, a work that sold more than one million copies.

RICARDO KRAUEL

Editions

The stories and fragments included in La noche no es hermosa appeared initially in the following publications (in many cases, the author has modified previous versions of the texts or their translation from the Catalan):

- “El demonio” and “Lilí Barcelona.” In La torre del vicis capitals. Barcelona: Selecta, 1968; as La torre de los vicis capitales, translated by Joan Enric Lahosa, Barcelona: Taber, 1969.
- “La Adalgisa.” In Onades sobre una roca deserta. Barcelona: Destino, 1969; as Olas sobre una roca desierta, translated by José Miguel Velloso, Barcelona: Destino, 1979.
- “La canción del barrio.” In El día que va morir Marilyn. Barcelona: Edicions 62, 1969; as El día que murió Marilyn, translated by José Miguel Velloso, Barcelona: Plaza y Janés, 1984.
- “Boy Hungry.” In Terenci del Nil: Viatge sentimental a Egipte. Barcelona: Selecta, 1970; as Terenci del Nilo: Viaje sentimental a Egipto, translated by the author, Barcelona: Plaza y Janés, 1983.
- “Narciso y los espejos de china.” In Siro o ia Increada consciència de la raça, Barcelona: Edicions 62, 1971; as Melodrama o la increada consciència de la raza, translated by Ana María Moix, Barcelona: Lumen, 1976.
- “El banquete” and “La bestia llamada hembra.” In Món masclé. Barcelona: Aymà, 1971; as Mundo Macho, translated by Jaume Pomar, Barcelona: Aymà, 1972; edition by the author, Barcelona: Plaza y Janés, 1986.
- “Glorificando a la masturbación europea,” “Marcovaldo o el sabor de los obeliscos,” and “Minifac Steiman, novelista de orgasmos fallidos.” In La caiguda de l'imperi sodomita i altres històries herètiques. Barcelona: Aymà, 1976.
- “Misterios iniciáticos.” In Nuestro Virgen de los Mártires. Barcelona: Plaza y Janés, 1983.
- “La menstruación de los dioses.” In Amami Alfredo! (Polvo de estrellas). Barcelona: Plaza y Janés, 1984.
- “El misterio del amor.” In Terenci del Atlas, El País [daily newspaper]. Madrid: August 28–30, 1985.
- “Lamento de la malquerida” and “Placeres de la reina Cleopatra Séptima.” In No digas que fue un sueño. Barcelona: Planeta, 1986.
- “Yo Cristo, yo rey” and “Domina Brunilda.” In Extraño en el paraíso, El País [daily newspaper]. Madrid: May 1, 1986 through December 10, 1986.
- “Fedro o la agonía” and “Damas en subasta.” In El sueño de Alejandría. Barcelona: Planeta, 1988.
- “Flor de onanismo.” In El cine de los sábados (El peso de la paja I). Barcelona: Plaza y Janés, 1990.
- “La noche del Viernes.” In Garras de astracán. Barcelona: Planeta, 1991.
- “El Domingo del joven triste,” “La piel amada,” and “A un moderno Telémaco.” In Máscaras alejandrinas, El País Semanal [weekly magazine]. Beginning November 1, 1992.

Selected Works

- El beso de Peter Pan (El peso de la paja II)*. Barcelona: Plaza y Janés, 1993.
- Venus Bonaparte*. Barcelona: Planeta, 1994.
- Sufrir de amores*. Barcelona: Planeta, 1995.
- Mujercisimas*. Barcelona: Planeta, 1995.

MOLLOY, SYLVIA

El amargo don de la belleza. Barcelona: Planeta, 1996.
Extraño en el paraíso (El peso de la paja III). Barcelona: Planeta, 1998.
Chulas y famosas; o bien, La venganza de Eróstrato. Barcelona: Planeta, 1999.
El arpista ciego. Barcelona: Planeta, 2002.

Further Reading

- Chávez-Silverman, Susana, and Librada Hernández, eds. Reading and Writing the "Ambiente." Madison, WI: University of Wisconsin Press, 2000.
- Ellis, Robert Richmond. The Hispanic Homograph: Gay Self-Representation in Contemporary Spanish Autobiography. Urbana, IL: University of Illinois Press, 1997.
- Forrest, Gene Steven. "El mundo antagónico de Terenci Moix." Hispania 60 (1977): 927–35.
- Krauel, Ricardo. Voces desde el silencio: Heterologías genérico-sexuales en la narrativa española moderna (1875–1975). Madrid: Libertarias, 2001.
- Lucio, Francisco. "Aproximación a la narrativa de Terenci Moix." Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 263–64 (1972): 461–75.
- Merlo, Philippe. "Terenci Moix, 'enfant terrible' ou 'enfant prodigue' de la littérature espagnole: A propos de Venus Bonaparte." In Postmodernité et écriture narrative dans l'Espagne contemporaine, edited by George Tyras. Grenoble: Université Stendhal, 1996.
- Smith, Paul Julian. Laws of Desire: Questions of Homosexuality in Spanish Writing and Film 1960–1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1992.
- Sobrer, Josep Miquel. "Ironic Allegory in Terenci Moix's El sexe dels angels." Bulletin of Hispanic Studies 75 (1998): 339–56.

---

MOLLOY, SYLVIA

---

1938–

Argentinean literary critic and novelist

Sylvia Molloy is a central figure in the North American (as well as European and Latin American) literary milieu. In addition to her work on Latin American writers such as Jorge Luis Borges, she has contributed to the growing field of sexuality studies with books and articles about sexuality and difference in the Hispanic world, including the coedited collection Hispanism and Homosexualities (1998). While she is an important figure in the academic world because of her work in literary criticism, it is with her first novel, En breve cárcel (translated as Certificate of Absence) (1981) that she made her mark as a writer of fiction. En breve cárcel is one of the first novels by a Latin American woman to deal overtly with lesbian themes, through its presentation of a first-person lesbian protagonist who is in the process of writing her memoirs and subsequently discovering her identity.

Eroticism is presented as a key factor in identity formation both in the dissolution of static binarisms that is necessary in order for the protagonist to find her lesbian identity and in the linking of language and writing with the body and sexuality.

En breve cárcel is first and foremost a novel about the process of writing. The protagonist is in the process of writing the story of her life (and simultaneously writing herself into being) in a room of indeterminate location (at least until the end). Through her writing, we learn of her childhood as well as two dysfunctional (and often abusive) love affairs.

The novel is divided into two parts, each with a unique structure. Part I sets up dualities: between the narrator and each of her ex-lovers, Renata and Vera; between Renata and Vera themselves; between the narrator and her sister Clara; and between the narrator as writer and written self. Structural binaries are presented as well, including the all-important dichotomy of presence and absence, which is encapsulated in the written word. Thus, when the protagonist writes about Renata, she is aware of Renata's presence within the writing at the same time that she is aware of the way in which the writing signals Renata's "real" absence. Finally, a spatial binary is set up through the opposition of the outside world (which the protagonist views through her window panes) and the inside space of the room in which she appears to be trapped (escaping only through the written word).

Part II of the novel serves as a binary to Part I while also beginning to destruct the dualisms hitherto presented. Molloy begins this process of pluralization through triangularization, liminal dissolution, and both mirroring and fragmentation. The doubles set up in Part I are destabilized by the introduction of a triadic structure. Thus, although relationships are presented in pairs in Part I of the novel, Part II focuses on relationships as triangles. The primary Oedipal triangle of mother/father/daughter is shown to be replicated in the relationship of the narrator and her two lovers, Renata and Vera. It is not through dual opposition that the protagonist will be able to carve out her lesbian identity, but rather in the change and space provided by the rupture of this “third” element.

The binaries presented in Part I are also dissolved through the uniting of two apparently disparate entities. This can be seen most clearly in the linking/dissolution of language and writing to/with the body and sexuality. Thus, the novel is not only a text about the writing of a novel, but also a novel about the writing of the body and the expression of sexuality. The act of writing is both violent and pleasurable, an act on and through language, just as sex is a violent and pleasurable act on and through the body. The uniting of these two binary systems comes about in the text through the repeated image of the hand—an instrument of writing, alimentation, violence, and sexual caresses. In addition, the room in which almost the entire novel takes place becomes a space for these binaries to join together as it provides a meeting place for the present tense of linguistic creation and the past tense of the pain and pleasure of sexuality (the protagonist’s past love affairs).

Finally, Molloy adopts the theories of both Lacan and Derrida in order to describe her protagonist’s journey toward identity. This is seen through a variety of motifs present in the text, including a proliferation of mirrors and mirror images. However, rather than agreeing with Lacan that the subject must enter the ordered world of the symbolic (moving past the “mirror stage”) for a full development or maturation, she rewrites the symbolic (perhaps melding it with the pre-symbolic) and asserts that only with the subject’s acceptance of disorder and Derridean fragmentation can she truly transform herself.

En breve cárcel deals with the presentation and destruction of dualities while positing that language can write into being a stable (if not entirely unified) sexual subject. Through a displacement of a traditional view of dichotomies as discrete entities, Molloy creates a novel that simultaneously writes its lesbian subject into existence paradoxically through the questioning of language, space, place, individual identity, and both presence and absence. Not only is language all-important for the protagonist’s identity development in the novel, but her sexuality (tacitly defined as “lesbian”) becomes intricately linked to that language. Thus, the protagonist must accept a fragmentation of language and sexuality in order to understand herself and arrive at her self-identity at the end of the novel—a lesbian identity, but one that is neither unified nor necessarily coherent.

Biography

Born in Buenos Aires, Argentina. Grew up speaking English, French, and Spanish in a multilingual household. Received a doctorate in literature at the Sorbonne. Has taught in Spanish programs at the State University of New York/ Buffalo, Vassar, Princeton, Yale, and New York University. Received a fellowship from the National Endowment for the Humanities in 1976, a Guggenheim fellowship in 1984–1987, and a doctorate of humane letters from Tulane and has served as the president of both the Institute of Iberamerican Literature and the Modern Language Association. Has written over 84 essays and articles, as well as several books of literary criticism.

TRACY FERRELL

Selected Works

At Face Value: Autobiographical Writing in Spanish America. 1991.
En breve cárcel, 1981; as Certificate of Absence, translated by Daniel Balderston and Sylvia Molloy. 1989.
Hispanism and Homosexualities, coedited with Robert Irwin. 1998.

MONK, MARIA

Further Reading

- Boling, Becky. "The Gaze, the Body and the Text in Sylvia Molloy's En breve cárcel." Hispanofila 123 (May 1998): 73–89.
- Kaminsky, Amy. Reading the Body Politic: Feminist Criticism and Latin American Writers. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1993.

- Martínez, Elena M. Lesbian Voices from Latin America: Breaking Ground. New York: Garland Publishing, 1996.
- Norat, Gisela. "Textual/Sexual Inscription of Lesbian Identity in Sylvia Molloy's En breve cárcel." Monographic Review 11 (1995): 291–301.

---

MONK, MARIA

---

1816/17–c. 1850
Canadian memoirist

The Awful Disclosures of Maria Monk was first published in New York in January 1836. The public eagerly awaited it because it had been puffed some months earlier in the American Protestant Vindicator. The hyperbolic anti-Catholic book was an immediate success because of its sensational disclosures of sexual defilement, infanticide, and beatings at the Canadian Hotel Dieu Nunnery. It had sold more than 300,000 copies by 1860 and was second only to Uncle Tom's Cabin as a best seller. It has remained in print continuously.

Monk's apocryphal tale differs from typical "ecclesiastical erotic" stories, epitomized by Boccaccio's nymphomaniac nuns in The Decameron, Denis Diderot's lesbian title character in The Nun, and Rosa Matilda's libidinous title character in Confessions of the Nun of St. Omer. Monk's story reflects the contemporaneous nativist literature of Bourne, Cuthbertson, de Ricci, Mahony, and Reed.

Monk's disclosures are sexually coy compared with more traditional erotica. For example, she describes her sexual initiation:

Father Dufresne called me out, saying, he wished to speak to me. I feared what was his intention; but I dared not disobey. In a private apartment, he treated me in a brutal manner; and, from two other priests, I afterward received similar usage that evening. Father Dufresne afterward appeared again; and I was compelled to remain in company with him until morning. (Chapter 6)

Not only did the nuns service the priests in the adjoining seminary; Monk claims that they were also visited by the 350 priests who lived in the Montreal district. In order to not attract attention in such numbers, the priests accessed the convent via a subterranean passage or a sheltered door, where they rang a concealed bell and then made "a peculiar kind of hissing sound" before they could be admitted (Chapter 9). Though the book shies from explicit sexual detail, it revels in sadistic and masochistic detail. Monk describes a number of torture implements, including a belt worn for self-mortification:

I had my hands drawn behind my back, a leathern band passed first around my thumbs, then round my hands, and then round my waist and fastened. This was drawn so tight that it cut through the flesh of my thumbs, making wounds, the scars of which still remain. A gag was then forced into my mouths [sic], not indeed so violently as it sometimes was but roughly enough. (Chapter 18)

The worst was a leather cap which was "fitted close to the head, and fastened under the chin with a kind of buckle." The wearer experienced "violent and indescribable [sic] sensation ... like that of a blister, only much more insupportable. ... It would produce such an acute pain as to throw us into convulsions" (Chapter 18).

One of the most brutal passages describes the murder of a nun who rebuffed the priests' advances:

In an instant [a] bed was thrown upon her. One of the priests ... sprung like a fury first upon it, and stamped upon it, with all his force. He was speedily followed by the nuns, until there were as many on the bed as could find room, and all did what they could, not only to smother, but to bruise her. Some stood up and jumped upon the poor girl with their feet, some with their knees, and others in different ways seemed to seek how they might best beat the breath out of her body, and mangle it, without coming into direct contact with it, or seeing the effects of their violence. (Chapter 11)

Because children resulted from these illicit liaisons, Monk recounts numerous instances of infanticide:

When [the priest] had baptized the children, they were taken, one after another, by one of the old nuns, in the presence of us all. She pressed her hand upon the mouth and nose of the first, so tight that it could not breathe, and in a few minutes, when the hand was removed, it was dead. (Chapter 16)

The bodies were buried in the basement. According to her book, Monk fled the convent when she discovered she was pregnant and told her story to a sympathetic minister in New York—thus conveniently explaining her illegitimate child.

Not surprisingly, the book attracted considerable attention, and Monk's claims were refuted by various people, including Col. William Stone, a Protestant sympathizer and editor of a mildly anti-Catholic publication, New York Commercial Advertiser. He visited the convent and compared it with Monk's description, and when the two didn't tally, he printed a pamphlet exposing Monk as a fraud. Maria Monk had never been a nun, she wasn't Catholic, and she had never resided in the Black Convent. Maria Monk has fostered an industry which still survives in books and on Internet sites today.

Biography

Maria Monk was born to a Protestant family in St. Johns, Quebec. She was an uncontrollable child and was admitted to Magdalen Asylum for Wayward Girls in Montreal in an effort to reform her; apparently, at the time, she was working as a prostitute. Her behavior did not improve and she was asked to leave. At 18 and pregnant, she formed an alliance with William K. Hoyte (or Hoyt), an ardent anti-Catholic. She and Hoyte went to New York City, where they associated with a group of Protestant sympathizers, among whom were Rev. George Bourne, who wrote Monk's Awful Disclosures (and had earlier written Lorette, another purported nunnery exposé), and Rev. John J. Slocum, author of Further Disclosures of Maria Monk. Monk left Hoyte and started a relationship with Slocum. In 1837 she ran away to Philadelphia with an unidentified man. While there she met William Sleigh, author of An Exposure of Maria Monk, and gave birth to another illegitimate child. Completely discredited, Monk drifted from man to man and returned to prostitution. She was arrested for pickpocketing her male companion and died in prison on Welfare Island, New York, aged 33.

TONI JOHNSON-WOODS

Editions

The Awful Disclosures of Maria Monk as Exhibited in a Narrative of Her Life and Sufferings during a Residence of Five Years as a Novice and Two Years as a Black Nun in the Hotel Dieu Nunnery in Montreal. New York: Howe & Bates, 1836.

Awful Disclosures by Maria Monk of the Hotel Dieu Nunnery of Montreal. Whitefish, MT: Kessinger Publishing, 2003.

Further Reading

Anon. Awful exposure of the atrocious plot formed by certain individuals against the clergy and nuns of lower Canada, through the intervention of Maria Monk. Montreal: Jones and Company, 1836.

Billington, Ray Allen. The Protestant Crusade, 1800–1860: A Study of the Origins of American Nativism. New York: Macmillan, 1964.

Bourne, George. Lorette. The History of Louise, Daughter of a Canadian Nun: Exhibiting the Interior of Female Convent. New York: Wm. A. Mercein, 1833.

Buntline, Ned. The Beautiful Nun. Philadelphia: Pater-son, 1866.

Culbertson, Rosamond. Rosamond; or, A Narrative of the Captivity and Sufferings of an American Female under the Popish Priests. Introduction and annotation by Samuel B Smith. New York: Leavitt, 1836.

DE Ricci, Scipione. Female Convents, Secrets of Nunneries Disclosed. Compiled from the autograph manuscripts by [L.J.A.] de Potter. New York: Appleton, 1834.

Ewens, Mary Ann. The Role of the Nun in Nineteenth Century America. New York: Arno, 1978.

Griffin, Susan M. "Awful Disclosures: Women's Evidence in the Escaped Nun's Tale." PMLA [Proceedings of the Modern Language Association of America] (1996): 93–107.

McCarthy, Maureen A. The Rescue of True Womanhood: Convents and Anti-Catholicism in 1830s America.

MONSTERS

- Ph.D. thesis, Rutgers University, New Brunswick, NJ, 1996.
- Mourão, Manuela. Altered Habits: Reconsidering the Nun in Fiction. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2002.
- Mahony, Dorah. Six Months in a House of Correction. Or, The narrative of Dorah Mahony, who was under the influence of the Protestants about a year, and an inmate of the house of correction, in Leverett St., Boston, Massachusetts, nearly six months in the year 18–. With some preliminary suggestions by the Committee of Publication. Boston: Benjamin B. Mussey, 1835.
- Matilda, Rosa [Charlotte Dacre]. Confessions of the Nun of St. Omer. London: J. F. Hughes, 1805. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1972.
- Schultz, Nancy Lusignan. Veil of Fear: Nineteenth-Century Convent Tales by Rebecca Reed and Maria Monk. West Lafayette, IN: NotaBell, c. 1999.
- Reed, Rebecca. Six Months in a Convent. Or, The Narrative of Rebecca Theresa Reed, who was under the influence of the Roman Catholics about two years, and an inmate of the Ursuline Convent on Mount Benedict, Charlestown, Mass., nearly six months, in the years 1831–2. Boston: Russell, Odiore and Metcalf, 1835.
- Mrs. Sherwood. The Nun. Princeton, NJ: M. Baker, 1834.
- Sleigh, William Wilcocks. An exposure of Maria Monks pretended abduction and conveyance to the Catholic asylum, Philadelphia by six priests on the night of August 15, 1837: with numerous extraordinary incidents during her residence of six days in this city. Philadelphia: T. K. & P. G. Collins Printers, 1837.
- Slocum, Rev. J.J. Further Disclosures by Maria Monk, concerning Hotel Dieu Nunnery of Montreal; also, Her Visit to Nun's island, and Disclosures Concerning that Secret Retreat. New York: Leavitt Lord and Coy, 1836.
- St. John Eckel, L. Maria Monk's Daughter. New York: United States Publishing Company, 1874.
- Stone, William Leete. Maria Monk and the Nunnery of the Hotel Dieu, Being an Account of a Visit to the Convents of Montreal, and Refutation of the "Awful Disclosures." New York: Howe & Bates, 1836.
- Sullivan, Rebecca. "A Wayward from the Wilderness: Maria Monk's Awful Disclosures and the Feminization of Lower Canada in the Nineteenth Century." Essays on Canadian Writing (1997): 201–22.
- Thompson, Ralph. The Maria Monk Affair. New York: n.p., 1934.

---

MONSTERS

---

When we think of monsters and the erotic, we probably call to mind Fuseli's famous painting The Nightmare, which pictures an incubus of medieval European folklore crouching on the bosom of a sleeping woman; or perhaps we call to mind the equally disturbing image of a cannibalistic Donestre inserting a man's forearm into his mouth. But just as the human subject has changed over time, so too have the monsters it creates. In fact, if we were to chart what might be called the vicissitudes of the "I" from the ancient world to the modern, we would necessarily be charting the vicissitudes of our fears and desires or what we find monstrous and what we find erotic.

Although the shape of our fears and desires has altered over time, what has remained constant is the tension that exists or the ambivalence of the relationship between what we fear and what we desire. As early as Hesiod's Theogony, for example, we see a poet establishing a causal link between a monstrous act and its erotic result in the story of Aphrodite's birth. As Hesiod tells it, when Great Heaven, desirous of love, spread himself over Earth, his son Kronos ambushed him with a metal reaping hook and cut off his genitals. From the blood that splashed onto the earth came the Great Giants, a race of huge and powerful beings who were, properly speaking, neither men nor gods, and the Furies, hideous creatures who hunted down and exacted retribution from those who spilled kindred blood; and from the castrated genitals, which were flung into the ocean and mingled with sea foam, came the beautiful goddess Aphrodite. Born of Great Heaven's bloody genitals, Aphrodite represents the powerful and often destructive force of sexual desire, the monstrously erotic fruit of mutilation and violence. In Hesiod's genealogy of the gods, then, not only do we see the monstrous and the erotic arising from one source and one act, and thus coupled as "twin" siblings, but we also see in narrative form the antecedent of what will later take a theoretical form in the modern psychoanalytic principle whereby castration (or lack) is said to give rise to desire.

In Homer's Odyssey, we again find the monstrous and the erotic rubbing elbows, as Odysseus makes his way back from the battlefields of Troy to the island of Ithaca. During his ten-year journey homeward, Odysseus confronts obstacles that take either the monstrous forms of Charybdis, a whirlpool that sucks men to their death, and Scylla, a six-headed monster that chews men up with row upon row of sharp teeth, or the erotic forms of Circê and Calypso, beautiful nymphs who trap Odysseus in their beds. But whether it is the biological "big death" offered by a monster or the metaphorical "little death" offered by a nymph, the monstrous and the erotic are structurally the same in Homer's narrative. That is, both operate as a lure that seduces Odysseus into delaying his return to Ithaca and thus to his duties as husband, father, and king. Perhaps this is why the monstrous and the erotic are often considered taboo, for they distract us from the duties laid out for us as members of a social community.

